THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

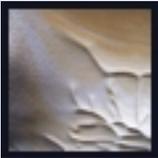

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 275(2/17/04 12:23 pm)Reply  | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> Quote: <hr/> It's interesting to see, in considering the point "do female gurus collapse" when their male master is no longer there, that in most of the above cases, the gurus of these female teachers died several years ago, yet all seem to be still going strong. That would seem to argue in favour of the possibility of a legitimate female enlightenment, unless all their tens of thousands of followers are deluded or otherwise seduced. <hr/> Okay, let's now say that we take away their followers and supporters. Do you think that would reveal anything unsettling about them? If that's not enough to disarray their attachments and demeanour (even though i think it would be), let's now say they are treated badly by everybody in society and given no greater place in it than that afforded to a dog. Do you think this would reveal anything unsettling about them? The true sage is impervious. As to the liklihood of the followers being deluded, i think that that's a given, | including the "guru-women" themselves. Are you suggesting that they may all understand the nature of reality, and be completely free of delusion (ie. enlightened)? A veritable throng of enlightened people?

Rhett Hamilton

[Note: I am yet to check out the links you gave.]

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2186
(2/17/04 2:02 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

David, no question that "being in love" in the conventional sense is a very strong attachment -- probably the strongest of them all, with the potential for all sorts of craziness (and why, it's often said, that 80% of crimes are "crimes of passion").

I think the point to look at becomes, is there a kind of "being in love" that is not conventional, that is, transcends typical egoic attachments?

In other words, is there any kind of "being in love" that can support Truth, rather than undermine it?

No doubt you're familiar with the bhakti traditions of India and some of the Sufi brotherhoods, which involve as a central aspect of their spiritual practice a "divine love affair" with God. The Sufi saint Rumi wrote constantly about this. Some dismiss him as a mere drunk (certainly Omar Khayyam, whom some elevate to Rumi's level, was -- every poem of his being about "wine", and in a thoroughly non-metaphorical sense)...but nevertheless, there is a very old and revered tradition of devotion to God, often via the vehicle of the guru, as a means of transcending ego-limitation and delusion.

---

There is a world of difference between the pure love of God and the devotional love for a particular person, no matter how exalted this person may be.

Since God is the totality of all there is, loving God literally means loving the Totality. Loving a particular person, by contrast, involves specifically singling out a particular phenomenon within the Totality (namely, the person) and favouring it above all else. This, in turn, creates the conditions for hate, as the phenomenon involved is impermanent and vulnerable to extinction. One automatically begins to hate those things in God which threaten the well-being of the person one is loving - whether it be other people trying to do him harm, or a prospective disease, or even time itself. A false dichotomy is thus created and any love that one might have had for the Totality is obliterated.

What I am alluding to is that Gangaji's love of her guru is anti-Truth and anti-God - that is to say, evil.

Quote:

---

In the case of the specific female guru I was talking about -- her name is Gangaji -- her guru (the famous Advaita sage Poonja of Lucknow, north India), died in 1997, and she has continued teaching since then, to very large audiences. She used to speak freely about her "love" for him, including her very personal experience of that love; and, although she is commonly recognized as "enlightened" by many of her followers, and was declared "enlightened" by Poonja, she has (to my knowledge) made no such direct claim herself (but nor has she denied it). I have sat in her satsangs and listened to her recorded talks, and she without question speaks authoritatively and in the manner of a male sage (though with a throaty Southern accent). She's around 60 years old now.

---

I had a look at her website. She looks very beautiful and pure, on the face of it, which is interesting considering that her guru, Poonja, looks very dark-minded and impure. He gives the impression of being a low-quality, real estate salesman type, even to the point of resembling the Hare Krishna guru, whose name I have forgotten.

Quote:

---

So whether or not she is truly enlightened would seem to me to hinge crucially on this question about "non-attached divine-Love", and even whether there is such a thing. I'm open on the matter, it remains a thing of ongoing investigation to me.

---

I definitely have the impression that she has been "impregnated" with the teachings and mode of behaviour of her gurus. She looks like the wife or daughter of a strong-willed man (Poonja). At the same time, Poonja and his guru, Maharishi, weren't all that profound or interesting to begin with, and their behaviour can be easily imitated by a woman. Basically, the aim is to create a fantastical atmosphere, using robes and silks and rituals and mystical speech, whereby the listener can be transported into altered states of consciousness. Anyone with charisma can provide this service to people; one doesn't need to be enlightened.

So the reasons for my reluctance to declare her enlightened are twofold: (a) Her gurus are unenlightened, and (b) her relationship to them is passive and unconscious.

The same can be said for most of the other women you have provided links for. The only one that really grabbed my interest was Bernadette Roberts, who seemed to have a bit more spirit to her and didn't follow such a formulaic path as the others.

Quote:

---

Have you ever felt such a Love, David? In your recognition of the Infinite, have you ever experienced this as an all-encompassing Love for all things...something very akin to recognizing fundamental non-separation with all things? And in such a state, could it be momentarily "directed" toward a tree in front of you...or a smiling child, or a sunset...etc. Would be interested to hear your take on that.

---

The love you are talking about here has no resemblance to Gangaji's love for her guru. It is neither emotional in nature, nor directed at one thing in particular.

Realizing the nature of the Infinite involves seeing that everything is completely non-existent and empty, even one's gurus. There is ultimately nothing to show devotion towards.

Quote:

---

I did a quick survey of nine or ten female "non-dual gurus" who are currently popular and who are actively teaching.

---

My impression of each one:

Quote:

---

www.gangaji.org -- Gangaji (her master died in '97, she is still teaching)

---

See above.

Quote:

---

www.pamelasatsang.com -- Pamela Wilson (disciple of the American sage Robert Adams, who was himself a direct disciple of Ramana Maharshi). Adams died in the mid-1990s. Pamela is still teaching, travels regularly to many cities.

---

A mediocre student. An average woman.

Quote:

---

www.geocities.com/~cathing/ -- Catherine Ingram, Buddhist guru.

---

Bland and forgettable.

Quote:

---

www.neelam.org -- Neelam, Polish woman in her late 30s, recognized by many as "deeply enlightened". Disciple of Poonja (died in '97). Neelam is still teaching.

---

A nun. A student.

Quote:

---

www.thework.org -- Byron Katie (that's a woman). This one says she was "spontaneously awakened", never had a master. She has a big following and a best selling book out.

---

A horrible looking creature trying to make bucketloads of money in the self-help racket.

Quote:

---

www.springwatercenter.org -- Toni Packer (female Zen master. Calm, reasonable, peaceful, she reminds me of Kornfield or Levine).

---

Relatively impressive. Focuses heavily on altered states - or as she puts it, awareness. The big problem with her, as in many of the others, is that her focus is too narrow and she refrains from confronting people's attachments.

Quote:

---

www.shambhala.org/teacher...index.html -- Pema Chodron, Tibetan Buddhist nun, has a big following. Her master was Chogyam Trungpa, the Tibetan sage who died in 1987. Pema is still teaching, has authored many books. I had a private interview with her at a Buddhist retreat in 1985.

---

Just another nun.

Quote:

---

www.truelightpub.com/index.htm -- Amber Terrel, sprouted from Gangaji, so her guru was a woman.

---

A girl who likes to sing about altered states. Very naive.

Quote:

---

www.nonduality.com/berna.htm -- Bernadette Peters, spontaneously awakened, now elderly. Her book is well known and respected by many.

---

Very interesting. Her story seems authentic, although she seems to have far too many attachments to be anywhere near enlightened.

Quote:

---

It's interesting to see, in considering the point "do female gurus collapse" when their male master is no longer there, that in most of the above cases, the gurus of these female teachers died several years ago, yet all seem to be still going strong. That would seem to argue in favour of the possibility of a legitimate female enlightenment, unless all their tens of thousands of followers are deluded or otherwise seduced.

---

In the case of Gangaji, the guru is still there propping her up via the structure of the organization and the constant devotion of the guru's followers (who are continuing to express their devotion to him through her.)

Quote:

---

DQ: What usually happens when a female becomes a student of a male guru, and falls in love with him, is that she passively absorbs his teachings without really understanding them. And then she reflects them back to the world, which creates the illusion that she is enlightened. Women excel at regurgitating information and mirroring other people's mindsets. It often happens that when a woman falls in love with a man, she discards everything that she has ever believed in and adopts his outlook and values completely. If he is a loving Christian, then she too becomes a loving Christian. If he is a serial killer, then she too becomes a devotee of murder. The man thinks that he has found a soul-mate, but all she has done is absorb his values and reflect them back to him.

Philip: I think there is indeed a "reflecting" capacity to the feminine mind (which is why it's often symbolized by the Moon, being a passive reflecter of the Sun's light). But in a spiritual context, that is, a female teacher serving truth or the tradition of a particular teaching-lineage, that does not negate the efficacy of such reflected light, nor its intrinsic beauty -- "beauty" here meant in the sense of the Sanskrit word sunder, which means "divine beauty" and refers to the recognition of the Face of the Divine, based on the idea of "Truth=Beauty" (and we're not speaking here of the conventional beauty).

---

The trouble is, women tend to be very repulsed by genuinely truthful sages who speak critically of attachments such as love. Instead, they prefer to congregate around effeminate teachers who wear flowing dresses and speak movingly about the divine emotions and the Heart, and living in the Now, and so on. Thus, when they become teachers in their own right, they end up reflecting a false teaching in a diluted, bland manner. And in so doing, they corrupt the reputation of genuine spirituality and make it sappy and unappealing for all those people who really do have the potential for wisdom.

Philip Mistlberger

Registered User

Posts: 8

(2/17/04 6:34 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Rhett --

Quote:

---

Okay, let's now say that we take away their followers and supporters. Do you think that would reveal anything unsettling about them?

---

A hypothetical question. We'd have to see, wouldn't we?

Quote:

---

If that's not enough to disarray their attachments and demeanour (even though i think it would be), let's now say they are treated badly by everybody in society and given no greater place in it than that afforded to a dog. Do you think this would reveal anything unsettling about them?

---

Again, hypothetical.

Quote:

---

The true sage is impervious.

---

Do you know this because it's your own direct experience? That is, are you a sage and are you impervious? Or because you believe this to be true?

Quote:

---

As to the likelihood of the followers being deluded, i think that that's a given, including the "guru-women" themselves.

---

Why is a "given"? Please show me your reasoning, particularly how it pertains to your own direct experience of Realization.

Quote:

---

Are you suggesting that they may all understand the nature of reality, and be completely free of delusion (ie. enlightened)?

---

No.

Quote:

---

A veritable throng of enlightened people?

---

No.

David Q. --

Quote:

---

There is a world of difference between the pure love of God and the devotional love for a particular person, no matter how exalted this person may be.

Since God is the totality of all there is, loving God literally means loving the Totality. Loving a particular person, by contrast, involves specifically singling out a particular phenomenon within the Totality (namely, the person) and favouring it above all else. This, in turn, creates the conditions for hate, as phenomenon involved is impermanent and vulnerable to extinction. One automatically begins to hate those things in God which threaten the well-being of the person one is loving - whether it be other people trying to do him harm, or a prospective disease, or even time itself. A false dichotomy is thus created and any love that one might have had for the Totality is obliterated.

---

This is sound reasoning, and not something I disagree with. In fact, I think you've accurately described the source of many toxic religions, as well as the reason for the demise of many spiritual organizations.

My point in discussing "bhakti" or "divine love" as in the tradition of some of the Sufis or bhaktis, is to look at whether or not there is a particular approach to Loving God that can occur via surrender to the vehicle of the guru. The theoretical basis of this sort of path is that if the guru is "perfect", that is, without trace of impurity in character, realization, or understanding, then they are, in effect, a manifestation of the Totality via a particular body-mind form. This is one of the mystical arguments behind what the essence of Christ is, and is common in many of the Tibetan Tantric Buddhist traditions (where the guru is held to be "pure Buddha-mind" and nothing else, that is, a vehicle for expression of the Totality). The Tibetan path of "Guru-Yoga" is based on the attempt to constantly remember that the guru is Buddha-mind, (the Divine Totality incarnate in form), and to thus surrender up one's impurities and ego-contractions to this form.

Obviously, such an approach is open to all sorts of abuse and misappropriation, but the notion behind it is that many seekers of truth are not capable of surrendering to, or understanding, the Totality, and thus the guru provides a "shortcut" to ultimate Truth via the agent of their own Divine Person, something that is easier for the disciple to relate to, absorb, and be transformed via.

Quote:

---

What I am alluding to is that Gangaji's love of her guru is anti-Truth and anti-God - that is to say, evil.

---

I would say that the key criteria would be if she was able to transform this "love of guru" to Love of the Totality by recognizing the divine Emptiness of the guru. That at least is the idea behind Guru-Yoga. Whether or not she fully accomplished this I do not know. I do know without question that she has helped many, many people rise out of suffering (including having done substantial work in prisons with hardboiled criminals, many of whom underwent significant spiritual transformations while in her presence).

Quote:

---

I had a look at her website. She looks very beautiful and pure, on the face of it, which is interesting considering that her guru, Poonja, looks very dark-minded and impure. He gives the impression of being a low-quality, real estate salesman type, even to the point of resembling the Hare Krishna guru, whose name I have forgotten.

---

Swami Prabhupada, I think is his name (the Krishna guy).

Your comments about Poonja are interesting. The opinion of him in the global spiritual community is very mixed. Some are convinced he was a pure embodiment of enlightenment, others that he was not pure and quite manipulative. One of his early students, Andrew Cohen, turned against him and documented his strife with his guru in his fascinating book "Autobiography of an Awakening" (highly recommended). Andrew went on to acquire a large following himself. An interesting teacher, if you can get past his stuttering..

Quote:

---

I definitely have the impression that she has been "impregnated" with the teachings and mode of behaviour of her gurus. She looks like the wife or daughter of a strong-willed man (Poonja).

---

A very perceptive comment there, David. Poonja was renowned for his strength of will and volatile disposition. He could be sunny and sweet and giggling one moment, and a raging volcano the next moment.

Quote:

---

At the same time, Poonja and his guru, Maharishi, weren't all that profound or interesting to begin with, and their behaviour can be easily imitated by a woman.

---

Have you studied much of Ramana Maharshi? He's generally considered amongst the very cream of Advaita masters, and is one of the few Indian gurus of the 20th century who was scandal-free. He's held in extremely high esteem in India by the non-religious spiritual community. He died in 1950 so I wasn't able to meet him but I've studied him at length and never found one person who was in his company who ever had anything negative to say about him, which alone is extraordinary, because he was apparently not a wuss and was capable of being confrontive or stern when need be.

Quote:

---

Realizing the nature of the Infinite involves seeing that everything is completely non-existent and empty, even one's gurus. There is ultimately nothing to show devotion towards.

---

I concur with that. The key qualifier there being the word "ultimately". The essence of Tibetan Vajrayanic "Guru-Yoga" is that the guru is ultimately seen to be "non-existent and empty", exactly as you said, so you would seem to be in alignment with some of the higher Tibetan teachings.

Incidentally, Poonja said to a close disciple shortly before his death that the "final truth" is that "nothing exists".

Quote:

---

A mediocre student. An average woman.

---

Pamela is a very beautiful woman and many of her male disciples fall in love with her, LOL. I sat with her once, a nice lady and with some wisdom, but I wasn't hugely impressed.

Quote:

---

Bland and forgettable.

---

Cathering Ingram was originally a newspaper journalist who later switched careers to become a guru. So your "bland and forgettable" description is amusing in light of her ex-profession. I've never experienced her.

Quote:

---

A nun. A student.

---

Neelam seems to have very powerful energy and impresses many who sit with her. I don't like the photo on her website, it looks too dreamy and New Age wishy washy. I've read some of her stuff and she can be very direct and challenging with students, nothing airy-fairy.

Quote:

---

A horrible looking creature trying to make bucketloads of money in the self-help racket.

---

LOL. Getting a kick out of your straightforwardness. I don't have a great opinion of Katie either, but she definitely has a big and devoted following.

Quote:

---

Relatively impressive. Focuses heavily on altered states - or as she puts it, awareness. The big problem with her, as in many of the others, is that her focus is too narrow and she refrains from confronting people's attachments.

---

Toni Packer has renounced the "teacher" label and apparently just "hangs out" with people now. A bit like the famous anti-teacher teacher U.G. Krishnamurti (not J. Krishnamurti) who refuses to allow anyone to follow him, denounces all masters and teachers, but who himself has followers anyway...

Quote:

---

Very interesting. Her story seems authentic, although she seems to have far too many attachments to be anywhere near enlightened.

---

I was also impressed with Bernadette, once filtering out the Christian window dressing.

Of all of them, my own personal experience was most positive with Gangaji, having sat in her meetings 3 or 4 times. Seemed stable, wise, grounded, authentic, to me. But I agree that she is principally a transmitter of her guru's teachings.

Quote:

---

The trouble is, women tend to be very repulsed by genuinely truthful sages who speak critically of attachments such as love. Instead, they prefer to congregate around effeminate teachers who wear flowing dresses and speak movingly about the divine emotions and the Heart, and living in the Now, and so on.

---

A couple of notable exceptions to that would be Gurdjieff and Osho, two major gurus of the last century who both had many female students. Both these gurus were famous for being confrontive, sharp, and constantly pointing out the problematic aspects of feminization and sentimental love. But their female devotees fell in love with them anyway, lol.

Anyway, to "even things up" I'm here presenting the URLs of five of the more modern male non-dual gurus who have really large followings...

<http://www.johnderuiter.com/> -- John deRuiter, seen by many as being of the stature of Christ or Buddha. I've sat in many of his meetings and he is remarkably still and speaks with exceptional authority and clarity. I prefer his in-person communication to his written words.

www.eckhartolle.com/mainpage.htm -- Eckhart Tolle, little German mystic who has become a mega-hit on the international guru circuit by virtue of his famous "Power of Now" book. If you look past the hype, his teaching is very simple and clear, like the distilled essence of Zen.

www.isaacshapiro.de/about.html -- Isaac Shapiro, disciple (like Gangaji) of Poonja.

www.zen-satsang.org/ -- Adhyashanti. Young Zen master with a huge following on the West Coast of North America. I've sat in his meetings. Very still, calm, focussed.

www.adidam.org/index.html -- Adi Da (once known as "Da Free John"). Very interesting man, his autobiography "The Knee of Listening" documents his enlightenment in the most detailed and open fashion I've ever read from any master. Many of his followers believe him to be the greatest of all gurus alive on the planet right now (which is not the case with most of the followers of the others, that is, most decline to assume that their guru is the greatest).

Would enjoy hearing your views of these gurus, David.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2305
(2/17/04 9:10 pm)
Reply

---

---

Quinnhead is trying to reconcile 'God' with the totality of all that is and is becoming.

Missileburger thinks this is sound reasoning.

I, frankly, to use your olden expression, am more 'god-like' than you. God is nothing at all, and it shows.

(:D)

I dance about because I am alive. You gesticulate and make signs on surfaces because I do the dancing.

My humblest apoplexies.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 352
(2/18/04 12:08 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip Mistlberger wrote:

Quote:

---

My point in discussing "bhakti" or "divine love" as in the tradition of some of the Sufis or bhaktis, is to look at whether or not there is a particular approach to Loving God that can occur via surrender to the vehicle of the guru.

---

There is one big, huge, overwhelming problem with a "bhakti"/devotional yoga, in isolation. Namely, if you are not using your intellect to discern right from wrong, then what do you devote yourself to?

If you simply devote yourself to the teachings of a guru who feels wise, then you could very well be devoting yourself to the Devil himself, and in all likelihood probably are.

Bhakta (devotion) and jnana (reason/discrimination) are needed together. Devotion must only be towards truth and reason. Without devotion to truth and reason, reason and discrimination can make no progress.

Unfortunately women seem lacking in both of these essential areas. That is, women generally have neither reason/discrimination (jnana) nor devotion to truth and reason (bhakta).

What is the point of love and devotion if it is love of what is false and devotion to what is false?

Edited by: ksolway at: 2/18/04 12:28 am

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 193
(2/18/04 2:03 am)
Reply

...

---

Bernadette sounds A LOT like UG Krishnamurti, except that she takes her time to explain a whole other frame of reference that explains the way she sees things.

And UG is cooler... but she's probably a more pleasant person to be around with.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 63
(2/18/04 4:26 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Bernadette Roberts I agree is interesting, I am not sure about this whole Guru/seeker phenom though there seems to be a unhealthy relationship between the two somehow, the Guru seems to be creating an abyss for people to fall into and reside. I mean all answers reside within until you realize your emptiness, have all these followers realized their emptiness? The ego likes to find a place to fit in, and loves to be recognized, I have experienced my own emptiness yet I also intuit that any relationship I had with a guru would be about my ego, that is a need to validate my experiences. I guess on the other hand if the Shaktipat or Holy Spirit manifesting is authentic then this energy has a chance to work with followers who allow it irregardless of what is said, this too though has the tendancy to catch people up in the experience rather than living the effects.

the notion that someone can surrender to a Form(guru) more readily than to Self (emptiness) is rather apparent but that it actually means anything is not so clear. It does seem that there are different enlightenment processes but I question that the ultimate responsibility for the process can be deferred.

I guess there are many roads to rome /shrug anyone clarity please?

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 604
(2/18/04 9:18 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

You can't cause a person to become attached to wisdom, unless you steer them towards it, step by step.

Why not just treat these people as stepping stones to greater possibilities. Few people are interested in the harshness of unfeelingness of the QRS style of enlightenment. Of the few with potential they would reject the sappy stuff anyway in time.

Philip Mistlberger

Registered User

Posts: 9

(2/18/04 11:07 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Kevin --

---

Quote:

---

There is one big, huge, overwhelming problem with a "bhakti"/devotional yoga, in isolation. Namely, if you are not using your intellect to discern right from wrong, then what do you devote yourself to?

If you simply devote yourself to the teachings of a guru who feels wise, then you could very well be devoting yourself to the Devil himself, and in all likelihood probably are.

---

Yes...which is why I mentioned that the principle of Guru-Yoga is open to all sort of abuse. But every particular path is open to abuse. The approach of jnana (study) can also be misused if one is applying oneself rigourously to a study of something that is fundamentally wrong (for eg., those caught in dead-end scientific paradigms...or even those following spiritual teachings that may be elaborate but contain impurities disguised as logical considerations, as for eg., commonly found in religious doctrine).

The idea with the most profound level of Guru-Yoga is that true devotion can only be to Truth itself. One cannot be truly devoted to the false; one can only blindly follow the false. True devotion is thus a function of intelligence...i.e., Clarity/Reason/Insight and Love working together.

---

Quote:

---

Bhakta (devotion) and jnana (reason/discrimination) are needed together. Devotion must only be towards truth and reason. Without devotion to truth and reason, reason and discrimination can make no progress.

---

I think it's possible we're saying the same thing here. A key component of Tibetan Tantric Guru-Yoga is a very disciplined regiment of extensive purification practices and the cultivation of the capacity to see the guru as both Empty and Divinely Full, or radiant. So it is a place where Higher Reason and Devotion/Trust meet.

The more commonly known bhakti path seems to be more akin to a kind of surrender and service and is commonly followed by many women in India, for example. Tibetan female practitioners are more commonly ordained nuns and follow extensive mind-trainings and disciplined and structured lives based on study and meditation practice. But there is also a very strong devotional element in Tibetan Buddhism, though often overlooked. Some of their Tantric practices involve deep devotion to certain "Yidams", archetypal "God" or "Goddess-forms" that symbolize aspects of enlightened consciousness. For example, "Manjushri" representing discriminating wisdom, "Chenrezig" representing compassion, "Yamantaka" representing the courage to see beyond death, etc. In each case, a deeply surrendered attitude is cultivated linking oneself to the Yidam, with the idea that as one becomes "sympathetically attuned" to the Yidam, one begins to have the corresponding latent aspects of one's own consciousness activated. This is very similar to the practice of certain schools of ceremonial Magick, of the Hermetic variety, going back to Egypt, usually referred to as the "assumption of God-forms".

Quote:

---

Unfortunately women seem lacking in both of these essential areas. That is, women generally have neither reason/discrimination (jnana) nor devotion to truth and reason (bhakta).

---

In light of those comments, Kevin, how would you explain a Bernadette Roberts, for example?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2188

(2/18/04 11:08 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

Have you studied much of Ramana Maharshi? He's generally considered amongst the very cream of Advaita masters, and is one of the few Indian gurus of the 20th century who was scandal-free. He's held in extremely high esteem in India by the non-religious spiritual community. He died in 1950 so I wasn't able to meet him but I've studied him at length and never found one person who was in his company who ever had anything negative to say about him, which alone is extraordinary, because he was apparently not a wuss and was capable of being confrontive or stern when need be.

---

Kevin Solway rates him above the average guru, mainly because he was self-taught and his teachings authentically came from his own understanding. But I must say that I've never seen anything from him that has impressed me. It all sounds like standard guru-talk to me.

Of course, it may be that he was one of the original founders of modern-day guru-speak, and his style has been imitated by thousands of gurus ever since his death. It also may be the case that his most interesting comments and observations have been culled from the websites and books because they are too confronting for his followers, leaving only the bland, formulaic guru-speak by which to judge him. Does that sound plausible, Philip?

Quote:

---

A couple of notable exceptions to that would be Gurdjieff and Osho, two major gurus of the last century who both had many female students. Both these gurus were famous for being confrontive, sharp, and constantly pointing out the problematic aspects of feminization and sentimental love. But their female devotees fell in love with them anyway, lol.

---

Well, they would have stroked the female ego in other ways. Osho, for example, conducted himself as a "big man", to use an anthropological term, who liked to show off his materialistic success with gluttonous displays of conspicuous consumption (the huge ranches, the 90 Rolls Royces, etc). He was like a rock star and thus easily attracted female groupies, who swooned before his charisma and power. He also encouraged a herd mentality by stripping people of their identity and giving them identical robes to wear, which enabled his followers to feel like they "belonged".

Quote:

---

Anyway, to "even things up" I'm here presenting the URLs of five of the more modern male non-dual gurus who have really large followings...

---

I always find it very painful going to these sites. It is like descending into hell.

I wish I was joking, but I'm not. I find the style of "spiritual" teaching expressed in these sites to be extremely harrowing, and the reason is because the behaviour and appearance and teachings of these gurus are specifically tailored to appeal to fragile people who are trapped in mental hells.

Just look at the fantastical manner in which these gurus present themselves, with all the surreal paraphernalia and religious trappings. This alone indicates how mentally-backward and out of touch with reality their followers are. They are literally trapped in a nightmare and pinning all their hopes on the sudden appearance of a white-knighted saviour dressed in flowing robes to guide them out.

Obviously, there are many people who need this service. But it has nothing to do with spirituality, wisdom, Truth, enlightenment, etc.

Quote:

---

www.adidam.org/index.html -- Adi Da (once known as "Da Free John"). Very interesting man, his autobiography "The Knee of Listening" documents his enlightenment in the most detailed and open fashion I've ever read from any master. Many of his followers believe him to be the greatest of all gurus alive on the planet right now (which is not the case with most of the followers of the others, that is, most decline to assume that their guru is the greatest).

---

Forum members should check this site out. It is very poignant and bizarre. For example, check out the link entitled "Truth and Religion, flash presentation" in the teaching section. You won't know whether to laugh or shiver in disgust.

--

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

You can't cause a person to become attached to wisdom, unless you steer them towards it, step by step.

Why not just treat these people as stepping stones to greater possibilities. Few people are interested in the harshness of unfeelingness of the QRS style of enlightenment. Of the few with potential they would reject the sappy stuff anyway in time.

---

The trouble is, most of those with potential are getting turned off by spiritual matters altogether because of these gurus and devoting themselves to worldly matters instead, such as science, academia, business, etc. Good people are going to waste.

Philip Mistlberger

Registered User

Posts: 10

(2/18/04 11:39 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

Well, they would have stroked the female ego in other ways. Osho, for example, conducted himself as a "big man", to use an anthropological term, who liked to show off his materialistic success with gluttonous displays of conspicuous consumption (the huge ranches, the 90 Rolls Royces, etc). He was like a rock star and thus easily attracted female groupies, who swooned before his charisma and power. He also encouraged a herd mentality by stripping people of their identity and giving them identical robes to wear, which enabled his followers to feel like they "belonged".

---

David, I spent 8 months in a Gurdjieff Group in 1982, and I was an initiated disciple of Osho from 1983 to his death in 1990. I was one of the people who were living at the Ranch (ashram) in Oregon when it collapsed in 1985 and was invaded by the FBI. A dark, macabre, fascinating story. Don't have time at the moment but I can discuss more of this, and Osho's difficulties (including his secretary Sheela Silverman, who turned out to be his Judas) later.

BTW, he had 98 Rolls Royces, not 90. LOL. And he didn't own them, they were owned by a group of disciples who later privately sold them. When Osho died, he had a robe and a tape deck and one Buddha statue to his name. He spent all his time in one room, emerging only to give discourses once a day. The Rolls were always known as an elaborate joke. But Osho was definitely a Rascal guru, brilliant (over 500 books transcribed from his talks -- he was a professor of philosophy prior to assuming the guru position), with a lot of Coyote (trickster) spirit, and a trenchant and at times brutal critic of organized religions and other gurus. The American Administration hated him and had him thrown out of the country despite lack of incriminating evidence. He was incredibly outspoken for an Eastern guru (most are very tame). Osho once called Swami Muktnanda a "dirty old man", said Ronald Reagan was a "moron", and that Jesus was probably gay and the twelve apostles all homosexuals. The surrounding Oregon bible-belt population loathed him and assassination attempts were reportedly in the works before he was deported.

It's interesting, but only really great masters seem to be outspoken...Jesus (with the Pharisees), Buddha (with the Hindus), Socrates (compelled to drink poison or recant his "truths"), Al-Hillaj Mansoor (Sufi master crucified and dismembered by an Islamic court for declaring that the Truth lived in him) etc.

Anyway, I'm no longer attached to Osho (I was, deeply, at one point), and don't care any more what is said about him. He was a stepping stone, although a very interesting one.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 963

(2/18/04 11:47 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Let's not call it love, let's call it unconditional submissive adoration, an adoration that overrides most of one's conditioned needs to the point of one doing literally anything one can for the object of adoration (need I remind you of some of the observed effects of playing some 70's rock tracks backwards). Now imagine adoring something to such an extent, and then imagine that this something were not the truth itself, but a direct manifestation of the truth itself. This direct manifestation is constantly pointing one towards the truth of no-self and imploring one to manifest it. Effect follows cause. Might that not be a valid path?

We often hear of this need to pierce maya, the understanding required for such, and the intellect, commitment and drive required for such understanding. But really, where is the justification for the need of this understanding? Why can one not un-identify by any means other than knowledge of the workings of the grand illusion, and enduring intellectual commitment to it's exploration? Why must it be an imperative that one must be so dilligent in attaining nothing which is not already there?

If these things really are imperative, then at least we can see that the first step into the abyss requires surrender, and faith. It's not so hard to see how much of this lends itself to the 'passive' mind. Once the first step is taken, and those lacking map-making abilities find themselves lost, might it not be wise to take an expert map-maker along with you, and follow their directions? Even learn their skills along the way, perhaps to the point of being able to dispense with their guidance altogether.

If one must bathe in truth before becoming saturated, what better way than swimming in and with an ocean?

It's often been spoken of, the non-existent talent of genius. But surely it can be agreed that there can be talent for genius. Could devotional love not be one such talent? The love would be no end in itself, simply a means.

Quote:

---

Philip: there **is** a very old and revered tradition of devotion to God, often via the vehicle of the guru, as a means of transcending ego-limitation and delusion.

DQ: There is a world of difference between the pure love of God and the devotional love for a particular person, no matter how exalted this person may be.

Since God is the totality of all there is, loving God literally means loving the Totality. Loving a particular person, by contrast, involves specifically singling out a particular phenomenon within the Totality (namely, the person) and favouring it above all else. This, in turn, creates the conditions for hate, as phenomenon involved is impermanent and vulnerable to extinction. One automatically begins to hate those things in God which threaten the well-being of the person one is loving - whether it be other people trying to do him harm, or a prospective disease, or even time itself. A false dichotomy is thus created and any love that one might have had for the Totality is obliterated.

Philip: This is sound reasoning

---

I'm not so sure. David, this looks like the logical fallacy of ignoratio elenchi amongst others, being as the argument put forward was devotional love as a means to infinite love.

Quote:

---

Kevin: Bhakta (devotion) and jnana (reason/discrimination) are needed together. Devotion must only be towards truth and reason. Without devotion to truth and reason, reason and discrimination can make no progress.

Unfortunately women seem lacking in both of these essential areas. That is, women generally have neither reason/ discrimination (jnana) nor devotion to truth and reason (bhakta).

What is the point of love and devotion if it is love of what is false and devotion to what is false?

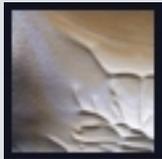

---

Again, this looks like ignoratio elenchi, but regardless, it seems that your first two paragraphs might have provided an answer to the question in the last.

Again, the argument was 'love of what is false and devotion to what is false' as a means to devotion only towards truth and reason, assuming the correct object of false devotion.

And in the end, what true devotion has ever been realised without a bridge of false devotion?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 276
(2/18/04 12:37 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

The true sage is impervious.

---

Do you know this because it's your own direct experience? That is, are you a sage and are you impervious? Or because you believe this to be true?

---

I can clearly see the potential for it's realisation, and am developing in that direction.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

As to the liklihood of the followers being deluded, i think that that's a given, including the "guru-women" themselves.

---

Why is a "given"? Please show me your reasoning, particularly how it pertains to your own direct experience of Realization.

---

Regarding the followers, no enlightened person is going to be a follower (though they may be a 'supporter' in some sense of the word).

As to my comment about the guru women themselves, i don't have enough time at the moment to get into the thick of this discussion (by checking out the links you offered). It will have to stand as nothing more than a suggestion.

Rhett Hamilton

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 606

(2/18/04 12:39 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Forum members should check this site out. It is very poignant and bizarre. For example, check out the link entitled "Truth and Religion, flash presentation" in the teaching section. You won't know whether to laugh or shiver in disgust.

I see what you mean. The devotional background noises make anything he is actually saying completely meaningless. I had trouble listening to what he was saying (mind you I was trying to read Dave's post above at the same time).

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2189

(2/18/04 12:56 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

David, this looks like the logical fallacy of ignoratio elenchi amongst others, being as the argument put forward was devotional love as a means to infinite love.

---

I wonder if there is an encyclopedia large enough to list all of logical fallacies that could possibly be committed by our poor old limited minds. :-(

I agree that devotion towards a guru or a philosopher can help lead one to infinite love, providing of course that one is primarily a thinker who hungers after Truth. I myself have been devoted to people like Kierkegaard, Lao Tzu, Nietzsche, and Huang Po in the past. But Philip was intimating that these female teachers were enlightened beings even though they were still displaying a strong attachment towards their gurus - that is, even though the "leading to infinite love" part of the equation hadn't truly manifested itself yet.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2190
(2/18/04 1:11 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

David, I spent 8 months in a Gurdjieff Group in 1982, and I was an initiated disciple of Osho from 1983 to his death in 1990. I was one of the people who were living at the Ranch (ashram) in Oregon when it collapsed in 1985 and was invaded by the FBI. A dark, macabre, fascinating story. Don't have time at the moment but I can discuss more of this, and Osho's difficulties (including his secretary Sheela Silverman, who turned out to be his Judas) later.

---

Sure, when you're ready, I'd love to hear about it.

Quote:

---

BTW, he had 98 Rolls Royces, not 90. LOL. And he didn't own them, they were owned by a group of disciples who later privately sold them. When Osho died, he had a robe and a tape deck and one Buddha statue to his name.

---

That might be true in a legal sense, but there is surely no question that he was in control of an empire and attracted hordes of women (and men) to him because of it.

Quote:

---

He spent all his time in one room, emerging only to give discourses once a day. The Rolls were always known as an elaborate joke.

---

They were an expression of his power, nonetheless.

Quote:

---

But Osho was definitely a Rascal guru, brilliant (over 500 books transcribed from his talks -- he was a professor of philosophy prior to assuming the guru position), with a lot of Coyote (trickster) spirit, and a trenchant and at times brutal critic of organized religions and other gurus.

---

Yes, I remember looking into his teachings a long time ago and being impressed with the quality of his mind. But I also saw that while he may have been a genuine student of wisdom when he was young, his ego eventually got the better of him and he fell away quite badly as he got older - even to the point of consciously manipulating people for personal gain, just like a conman or a car salesman. Does that tally with your experience of him?

Quote:

---

It's interesting, but only really great masters seem to be outspoken...Jesus (with the Pharisees), Buddha (with the Hindus), Socrates (compelled to drink poison or recant his "truths"), Al-Hillaj Mansoor (Sufi master crucified and dismembered by an Islamic court for declaring that the Truth lived in him) etc.

---

Why do you think that is?

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1015
(2/18/04 2:01 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

If you ignore the gender issue you are doomed to go round in circles no matter how much reading and meditation you do.

Masculine individuality and feminine individuality are two very different things.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 353

(2/18/04 5:00 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip Mistlberger wrote:

Quote:

---

The approach of jnana (study) can also be misused if one is applying oneself rigourously to a study of something that is fundamentally wrong (for eg., those caught in dead-end scientific paradigms...or even those following spiritual teachings that may be elaborate but contain impurities disguised as logical considerations, as for eg., commonly found in religious doctrine).

---

Yes, I see academics, theologians, etc as having intellect, but not having the love of truth (and reason) which would enable them to follow reason through to its final conclusions, and then to fully accept the result.

Quote:

---

True devotion is thus a function of intelligence...i.e., Clarity/Reason/Insight and Love working together.

---

This is why I do not believe women are suited to bhakti yoga. That is, this kind of devotion is largely alien to them.

Quote:

---

But there is also a very strong devotional element in Tibetan Buddhism, though often overlooked. Some of their Tantric practices involve deep devotion to certain "Yidams", archetypal "God" or "Goddess-forms" that symbolize aspects of enlightened consciousness. For example, "Manjushri" representing discriminating wisdom, "Chenrezig" representing compassion, "Yamantaka" representing the courage to see beyond death, etc. In each case, a deeply surrendered attitude is cultivated linking oneself to the Yidam, with the idea that as one becomes "sympathetically attuned" to the Yidam, one begins to have the corresponding latent aspects of one's own consciousness activated. This is very similar to the practice of certain schools of ceremonial Magick, of the Hermetic variety, going back to Egypt, usually referred to as the "assumption of God-forms".

---

This kind of devotion would be fine, so long as it constituted devotion to truth. Unfortunately, it is pointless being devoted to "infinite compassion" (Chenrezig) if you have no idea what infinite compassion is. Similarly it is pointless being devoted to Manjushri, if one has no idea what discriminating wisdom is. Yet this is all too commonly the case with Tibetan Buddhists.

Quote:

---

K: Unfortunately women seem lacking in both of these essential areas. That is, women generally have neither reason/discrimination (jnana) nor devotion to truth and reason (bhakta).

In light of those comments, Kevin, how would you explain a Bernadette Roberts, for example?

---

From what I read, which was only a skim, it is not easy to tell exactly what level of understanding she had. I don't discount the possibility of women having wisdom. But from that text it I couldn't tell how much of the ideas were simply mirrored from the Christian mystics, and from works like "a course in miracles", etc.

It is easy to talk about non-duality, and many people can do it, but it is hard to apply it to the difficult problems of life, and that's what sorts out the real wise people from the pretenders.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1016
(2/18/04 6:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

Philip
. . . . Osho's difficulties (including his secretary Sheela Silverman, who turned out to be his Judas) later. . . .

---

Judas was a pussy.
All pussy is Judas

 Philip Mistlberger
Registered User
Posts: 11
(2/18/04 7:14 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

We often hear of this need to pierce maya, the understanding required for such, and the intellect, commitment and drive required for such understanding. But really, where is the justification for the need of this understanding? Why can one not un-identify by any means other than knowledge of the workings of the grand illusion, and enduring intellectual commitment to it's exploration? Why must it be an imperative that one must be so dilligent in attaining nothing which is not already there?

---

Dave T., those words of yours reminded me of the two primary schools of thought in Japanese Zen Buddhism, being the Rinzai and Soto traditions.

The Rinzai tradition employs the usage of the **koan**, the rationally insoluble problem ("show me your face before your parents were born", "what is **outside** of the universe?", etc.). The **koan** is used as a device to "pierce" the illusion of the conceptual mind, that is, to **open** the mind to a higher order of pure Reason (what Gurdjieff called "Objective Reason"). But this is more akin to direct insight (known by the Japanese word satori, meaning "seeing directly into reality"). It is using pure intellectual effort to transcend thinking itself.

I've undertaken Zen retreats and utilized koans extensively, and have experienced several satoris, of varying degrees of depth.

The Soto approach is softer and does not utilize the intellectual mind in the service of great efforting. It employs "mindfulness" (something like vipassana meditation) in order to simply pay attention to whatever is arising in consciousness, moment by moment. The purest Soto technique is called shikan taza, which means "simply sitting". The theoretical basis of this kind of spiritual practice are summed up by the famous Matsuo Basho Haiku poems...

Ancient pond Frog jumps in *Splash*!

or this one...

Sitting silently Spring comes
And the grass grows by itself

To interpret this approach to Truth as "passive" is to miss the point, in my view. It is an approach more in accordance with the Taoist idea of wu wei (non-doing), or the Sanskrit expression neti neti ("not that, not that!"), which have to do with the dissolution of the illusion of the individual "will" leading to deeper and deeper alignment with the "One Will" of Totality (which is more akin to an ungoing "unfolding").

The Rinzai approach is a direct path and thought suitable for those of intellectual temperament (what Gurdjieff called "Man Number 3"); The Soto approach is a gradual path and thought appropriate for those of a more emotional nature, or Gurdjieff's "Man Number 2" (as "mindfulness meditation" often has the effect of stabilizing).

Interestingly, the Rinzai path is considered to be quicker but harder, and more fraught with danger (premature "kundalini awakenings", giving up prior to experiencing **satori**, etc). The Soto approach is slower but considered more reliable by many Zen practitioners.

Of course, the question has to be considered, "more reliable for what?" Satori in the Zen tradition is not considered to be a permanent condition, it is, rather, an opening (sometimes called the "opening of the Wisdom Eye"). But this opening is really only a beginning; what follows is a lifetime of deepening, refinement, and integration of direct spiritual realization into the fullness of one's life.

A highly recommended read is Roshi Philip Kapleau's "The Three Pillars of Zen", which documents the experiences of a number of deeply committed students in their usage of the Rinzai *koans* to pierce the illusion of mind-projected reality (*maya*). Especially touching is the case of one young girl (19 or 20) who is dying of a terminal illness as she experiences a powerful *satori* after a sincere effort to solve a *koan*, and is confirmed by her Zen master as deeply realized.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

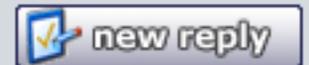

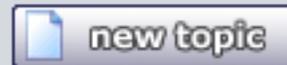

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|   Philip Mistlberger                     Registered User                     Posts: 12                     (2/18/04 8:13 pm)                     Reply                     ezSupporter   | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Sure, when you're ready, I'd love to hear about it. <hr/> David Q., I can't do justice to this story in one post, of course, but I can say that it was an unbelievably intense experience in which an entire "utopia" town, built by a group of disciples with backbreaking labour and millions of dollars spent, suddenly became unravelled when a group of disciples, led by Osho's International secretary, became convinced that they had to vigorously defend Osho from assassination threats. In so doing, they (unknown to mostly everyone there at the time), built a secret underground bunker at the ashram (in Oregon), and stuffed it with guns (including AK-47 assault rifles), ammunition, wiretapping materials, bombs and bomb-making manuals. In addition to this clandestine operation, the "Gang of Six" began heavily arming security guards and having them situated strategically all over the Ranch ashram. Bizarrely, Osho used to be accompanied to his morning lecture flanked by machine gun toting guards. His Rolls was led by a black security vehicle with bullet proof glass. As always seems to happen with these things, "aggression attracts |

aggression", (or even the threat of aggression often attracts attack). Much like with Waco, Texas, the mere presence of this firepower was enough to draw the scrutiny and close monitoring of the state police and FBI. We were also "buzzed" regularly, in illegal fashion, by military fighter jets. On more than one occasion I almost had my eardrums blown out by fighters flying at ridiculously low altitudes right overhead.

Wierdly, amongst all this, Osho continued to lecture on love, enlightenment, and the stupidity of Christianity and the American government. He said he wanted to eventually have 365 Rolls Royces, one for each day of the year, and that the Rolls were a device to keep "stupid American materialists" away from his community. He said if anyone was not intelligent enough to see beyond the Rolls Royces, he didn't want them around. (LOL).

When he was in India, his primary "button-pushing" device was sex. He frequently lectured on sex, and encouraged his disciples to indulge frequently and deeply in sexual relations so as to be done with sexual desire and sexual karma. Of course, in Hindu-Muslim India, being very repressed sexually, this teaching was horrific and outrageous, and eventually Osho was run out of the country on some tax evasion charge.

In America, he believed that the primary problem was not sexual repression, but materialism, greed, and Christianity. So, he made a big show of "pushing buttons" in that area, by telling a few of his wealthy followers to acquire a fleet of Rolls Royces. It was understood to be partly his way of mocking the American ego. He also frequently gave Christianity-bashing lectures. At times he made Nietzsche look mild in comparison. (Osho admired Nietzsche, but thought he ultimately "missed the boat" and ended up going mad because he lacked a guru to guide him; but he did say the Nietzsche was one of the few Western philosophers who had real genius and the potential to be a Buddha. He was also a great admirer of Socrates).

In the end, no charges were ever proven against Osho; he made a legal "Alfred plea" (saying "guilty" to arranging sham marriages when it was understood that he believe he was innocent), and was kicked out of the country. He and his closest students were then denied entry to 23 (!) countries before finally being accepted by Uruguay. But he was kicked out of that country when the Americans threatened to renege on a promised large loan to the Uruguayan government unless they deported Osho.

While in an American prison (he spent 12 days in jail), it was believed by some European medical doctors that Osho was poisoned with Thallium, a radiation known to have been used only by the CIA. His health rapidly deteriorated and he died at 58 years old a few years later in India. I sat in his lectures in Nepal a few years before he died.

His Secretary and the Gang of Six devotees were considered to have been responsible for the destruction of the organization, although some blamed Osho as well. The secretary was caught hiding in Germany and ended up serving five years in prison (she attempted to assassinate Osho's personal doctor whom she'd become suspicious of. She was known to have been "in love" with Osho for a long time and became possessive and jealous of anyone close to him; she also tried to kill his female caretaker, a woman who a few years later committed suicide).

The bizarre thing was, Osho was recognized as a great teacher by many; not just casual followers, but many respected intellectuals and other gurus (including the Dalai Lama). He had several hundred thousand followers, many of whom had their lives radically transformed via their connection to him. I personally experienced the power of his *shakti* many times, and I knew of many, many whose lives "leaped" forward in positive ways once becoming initiated as his disciple. He carried a very powerful energy field.

Quote:

---

That might be true in a legal sense, but there is surely no question that he was in control of an empire and attracted hordes of women (and men) to him because of it./

---

At its height (around 1984-85), he was estimated to have had between 250,000 to one million disciples world-wide. No ever knew the exact numbers, but without question it was huge. Germany and Japan in particular had very large concentrations of his *sannyasins* (as we were called). So did England, Italy, Australia, and (somewhat less so) USA and Canada. He had at peak close to one thousand individual "centers" around the world. And some of his close disciples were extremely wealthy people; some influential in politics.

All this power, wedded to his radical spiritual teachings, made him dangerous to the Reagan Administration at the time, so when the flap about the "ammunition" build up occurred, the FBI were very eager to invade, which they did, dispersing the Oregon central ashram (it was abandoned and ultimately claimed by the military as a training ground, lol). But we were more fortunate than Waco; no one was killed by the FBI (except, possibly, Osho himself, if the thallium poisoning is to be believed).

Quote:

---

Yes, I remember looking into his teachings a long time ago and being impressed with the quality of his mind. But I also saw that while he may have been a genuine student of wisdom when he was young, his ego eventually got the better of him and he fell away quite badly as he got older - even to the point of consciously manipulating people for personal gain, just like a conman or a car salesman. Does that tally with your experience of him?

---

Somewhat. Brilliant, yes. A genuine young student who had powerful spiritual awakenings? Yes. Ego eventually getting the better of him? Possibly. I'm still processing the matter, even 19 years after the debacle. I'm not sure he consciously manipulated people for personal gain; I do, however, think that he was convinced of his own "perfect enlightenment" and of his unique mission in the world.

One of his saving graces was a superb sense of humor. He was also critical of most modern gurus. He admired Buddha (though said he was just a little "too dry"), and he greatly admired Lao Tzu. One once occasion he said he was the reincarnation of Lao Tzu (in a manner of speaking, to this day people are still not clear if he meant that literally or not). But Lao Tzu was one of the few sages who escaped his wrath. He also thought well of Ramana Maharshi and J. Krishnamurti, though he used to like to playfully harass Krishnamurti by sending his disciples to Krishnamurti's lectures (Krishnamurti hated Osho and his blatantly orange-clad followers). Osho did not have a high opinion of Adi Da (linked to in my recent post). He thought most so-called "gurus" were not masters but just teachers. He also distinguished between the "useless mystic" and the "real master". He said the useless mystic was an enlightened sage who was unskilled at working with disciples and while genuinely awakened, scared too many people away. The "real master" was both an awakened sage, and someone skilled at attracting and working with many different kinds of disciples. He thought that Buddha was a "real master" but that Krishnamurti, while genuinely enlightened, was just a useless mystic.

Quote:

---

Why do you think that is?

---

I think that deep Realization practically mandates that one will speak "against the grain", because the "grain" of so much of human civilization and history is ugly, stupid, barbaric, and deeply unconscious. So if one is deeply Realized, it will be difficult to be polite in the face of the horrors of human nature.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/19/04 12:13 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 354

(2/18/04 9:27 pm)

Reply

Re: Osho/Rajneesh

---

I remember Rashneesh/Osho for three things, and therefore I consider there are three things significant about him.

In order of how they occur to me, which, as it happens, is in order of good, to extremely bad, and then to even worse.

1. The first thing I remember about him is that he did have a talent for Zennish, poetic, clear communication. I especially remember his description of how, as a youngster, he used to dive into whirlpools in a river, and, remaining relaxed, was able to flow with the current and was safely expelled, "In with a swirl, and out with a twirl".

He also had some good insights regarding the true nature of women.

2. The second major thing I remember is "Ma Sheela", if that is what she is called. The first time I saw her on TV I didn't know who she was, but my first impression was that she was one of the most karma-filled, "darkest" people I have ever experienced in my life.

I later discovered that this person was Osho's sidekick and second-in-charge, and remember thinking, "What kind of a person would have this woman as a spokesperson, let alone a second-in-charge?"

A person who had lost the plot, I concluded.

3. Many years later I was searching through the bookcase of an acquaintance and found a book containing one of Osho's teachings. It was basically a commentary about a traditional Hindu parable which concerned a person who had no guru, but who achieved wisdom simply by thinking for himself, and listening to his own inner voice, or his own conscience. The parable was quite excellent in itself, and didn't require a commentary, yet, for most of the book Osho's commentary didn't significantly detract from the parable. The obvious moral of the story was, think for yourself, and trust your own conscience.

However, towards the end of the book Osho's commentary started to become horribly twisted and ugly. Can you guess what the conclusion was? Yes, Osho implored everyone to listen to their own innermost voice. . . . Then he said words to this effect, "I am your innermost voice, and anyone who does not follow my instructions immediately upon receiving them, unhesitatingly, without thinking, will spend many thousands of years reborn in hell."

He successfully managed to twist this terrific parable into the exact opposite of its intended meaning.

I tried entertaining the idea that he was being ironic, or perhaps having a joke . . . but unfortunately he was dead serious.

Edited by: ksolway at: 2/18/04 9:53 pm

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2314

(2/18/04 11:21 pm)

Reply

Re: Osho/Rajneesh

---

The greatest integration of truth on this subject, was my post on page 2.

It was expressly aimed at avoiding the conception of sagacity with the aim of inducing it.

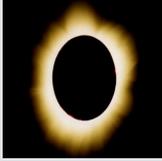

Drawing! When everything is drawn to something it is ceaseless.

No-one feels to peel off into their own things? It is as though sticking together was what made us stick at all to begin with.

Here let my words halt and my meaning bolt!

Searing knowledge, it cools into things.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2315
(2/18/04 11:27 pm)
Reply

Re: Osho/Rajneesh

---

Or page 1. It doesn't matter.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 966
(2/19/04 12:05 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

DQ: I wonder if there is an encyclopedia large enough to list all of logical fallacies that could possibly be committed by our poor old limited minds. :-)

---

Well quite. The exhaustive analysis of propositional logic has turned up so many that it is hard to keep on top of them all and understand their relevance. But I would suggest that the body of logical fallacies itself holds more relevance than any single one. Reason is truly a minefield. Regardless, I presume we can agree that Ignoring The Issue (or Ignoratio Elenchi) is a dialectical biggie. It can be committed in all innocence, but it can also be a powerful tool of sophistry when used with subtlety.

Quote:

---

I agree that devotion towards a guru or a philosopher can help lead one to infinite love, providing of course that one is primarily a thinker who hungers after Truth. I myself have been devoted to people like Kierkegaard, Lao Tzu, Nietzsche, and Huang Po in the past.

---

I think this addresses the issue at hand, almost directly. You add the proviso that one must be primarily a thinker who hungers after truth, but the original argument would also account for, and pertain to, those who aren't primarily a thinker (in the sense that you intend) and don't hunger after truth, becoming attuned to such via the bridge of false devotion. Surely your argument should address the relative efficiency of devotional love for a true guru as a vehicle to truth, specifically for those who aren't originally primarily a thinker hungering after truth?

Quote:

---

But Philip was intimating that these female teachers were enlightened beings even though they were still displaying a strong attachment towards their gurus - that is, even though the "leading to infinite love" part of the equation hadn't truly manifested itself yet.

---

Yes, I presumed that was your point when you wrote:

What I am alluding to is that Gangaji's love of her guru is anti-Truth and anti-God - that is to say, evil.

It doesn't really address the original point as I understand it but it is a whole other point in itself.

Your argument is that because this person still speaks of a personal love for her guru, she could not possibly be manifesting infinite love, yet. To this I would refer you to all of your arguments (as recently reprised) for the appearance of egoic love, when seemingly present in the sage, actually being a product of a completely different value system which is not derived from attachment.

You yourself have previously referred to your devotion to certain 'gurus', and yet now that you claim to be vitually without attachment, you still portray the appearance of valuing these teachers to a point which some might still misinterpret as devotion. This is because you value these teachers and their words based on a whole different arbiter of value than the usual attachments, namely truth. Perhaps there might even be an element of gratitude? You also often present the appearance of one who seems to be in love with themself, to the egoic interpreter. But again, this is more likely actually based on your truth valuing system. And again, perhaps there is an element of gratitude, towards your former self, and towards your manifestation of infinity and truth.

You divorce the appearance of your actions which might be interpreted as egoic from their emotional interpretation by referring to values and rationale, as opposed to attachment and irrationale. Why would you not offer such understanding (or at least the possibility of) to others' appearance, most especially based on such scant evidence?

 Philip Mistlberger

Registered User

Posts: 13

(2/19/04 10:20 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Osho/Rajneesh

Kevin --

Quote:

---

The second major thing I remember is "Ma Sheela", if that is what she is called. The first time I saw her on TV I didn't know who she was, but my first impression was that she was one of the most karma-filled, "darkest" people I have ever experienced in my life.

I later discovered that this person was Osho's sidekick and second-in-charge, and remember thinking, "What kind of a person would have this woman as a spokesperson, let alone a second-in-charge?"

---

Yes, "Ma Anand Sheela" was her initiate name. (Amusingly, "sheela" in Sanskrit means "virtuous"). Without question Sheela was a very dark and power-fixated individual. She was also known for being very lazy with her spiritual practices and even for falling asleep during Osho's discourses. How she got into the position she did was something of a mystery to many, but she did have certain outstanding qualities, such as courage, outspokenness, endurance, tremendous energy, organizational skills, and (in the beginning) deep loyalty to Osho and the community. Many believed that Osho made her his prime lieutenant because he believed that his community would inevitably be persecuted in America and he wanted a "pit-bull terrier" to protect it for as long as possible. But in this case, the pit-bull turned on its master...

Quote:

---

However, towards the end of the book Osho's commentary started to become horribly twisted and ugly. Can you guess what the conclusion was? Yes, Osho implored everyone to listen to their own innermost voice. . . . Then he said words to this effect, "I am your innermost voice, and anyone who does not follow my instructions immediately upon receiving them, unhesitatingly, without thinking, will spend many thousands of years reborn in hell."

He successfully managed to twist this terrific parable into the exact opposite of its intended meaning.

I tried entertaining the idea that he was being ironic, or perhaps having a joke . . . but unfortunately he was dead serious.

---

LOL.

I'm almost certain, Kevin, that you've misread the context that Osho was speaking in (or possibly read that from a poorly translated Indian copy). I would love to know the book you're referring to -- was it possibly "I Am The Gate"? This was one of his first books (published in 1972, I think), and in it he made frequent reference to "I" as in meaning the "True Self", not "I" as in meaning the personality "Osho" (or Bhagwan, as he was known then).

Also, Osho never subscribed to a belief in literal "hells" of any sort, so at the very least that would have been a metaphor. In fact, he often told jokes that made fun of monotheistic religions...and he did say, on one occasion, that "if there is a hell, then it must be much more fun than heaven, which is full of boring saints with long faces. If you ever have to choose between the sinner or the saint, choose the sinner, as they are much more interesting people..."

Presented below is a proclamation from Adi Da Samraj. I present it mostly tongue-in-cheek. But as much as he has given me cause for bursting out laughing over the years, I also happen to believe this man has at times shown spiritual genius of the highest order, especially as seen from his earlier literature from the 1970s and 80s. Unfortunately, his style has given him to being lampooned and has set up a bevy of followers around him who defer to him as God (no less) and, in a sense, contradict his very teaching about how the ultimate "guru" resides within everyone...but it does seem to be an interesting fact that many young gurus start out presenting cogent and brilliant arguments and teachings, with a healthy grounding of humanity, but as they acquire followers and as these follows inevitably form an organization around them, the gurus get tempted with all the power and trappings and many slide into a kind of self-parody without even realizing what has happened until it's too late. Some of the great ones (like Buddha, Ramana, IMO, escaped this fate)....

*****

"I am here to Complete the Great Tradition of mankind. I Am the all-Completing Adept, the First, Last, and Only Adept-Revealer (or Siddha) of the seventh stage of life. I Am the seventh stage Realizer, Revealer, and Revelation of God, Truth, and Reality, Given to this late-time (or would-be Complete and potentially Consummate era) and in this now dark epoch (as it must be described from the Realized Divine and Spiritual "Point of View", and with regard to the tendencies of the times), and Given for the sake of Completion (of the progressive Ordeal of Man) and for the sake of Unity (or the cooperative re-Union of mankind)."

"I Am the Ultimate Demonstration (and the Final, or Completing, Proof) of the Truth of the Great Tradition as a whole. Until I Appeared, there were no seventh stage Realizers within the Great Tradition of mankind. I Am the First and the Last seventh stage Adept to Appear in the human domain (and in the Cosmic Domain of all and All). It is neither possible nor necessary for another seventh stage Adept to Appear anywhere, because I have Accomplished My necessary Work everywhere. However, because I have Appeared and have Done My Completing Work, seventh stage Realizers (not with the Divine Adept-Function That Is Unique to Me, but Fully Realized, through their ego-transcending devotion to Me, and Thus and Thereby, to the by Me Revealed Divine Person and Self-Domain) will Awaken, in all times and places."

-- Adi Da Samraj www.adidam.org

*****

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/19/04 10:27 am

Sangrasal

Registered User

Posts: 1

(2/19/04 8:04 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Satsang

---

Question is slightly interruptive of the flow that has preceeded, but since it appears as if Phillip has pulled his post at the PG site, (why did you do that? lol.) must ask here, and this is the most closely related thread.

Satsang, just what is it? From what I can gather it is a meeting of several people, led by a 'leader' who in silent meditation work toward greater spirituality. Over simplified, I know, but am I wrong?

Reading this thread I have found much comment about various leaders and spiritual people, but in each instance, the 'leader' had drawbacks. Follow them? To what end?

Secondly, there was comment, attributed to Osho, that one should 'think for themselves'. (discounting the other remark made.) Rather wise in my view of things.

So, my basic misunderstanding, why 'follow' anyone?

I have read much of the literature available from and about many of the spiritual leaders of the world. The conclusion, Ok, fine. That was for them. If I follow their way, I am merely following. I am not learning, or advancing myself on a spiritual level one iota.

I can memorize every word a guru ever uttered. I can even learn to mime their every gesture. Neither of which advances me a single step on the spiritual plane. I become a mimic and a mime.

I can understand more by learning how the growth of a blade of grass is similar to mine. How I can have a life span of 'about' 75 years in a Universe that will be extent for billions of years. 'I' am hardly an eye blink in consideration of time. Yet understanding that is a step toward spirituality. Or so it seems to me. (Abbreviated radically, of course.)

People talk about God, Buddha, or whomever. Is he/it or isn't he/it? What does it matter? That entity does not come sit at your side and discuss the issues with you. What gain is made by following any one, or any thing?

But I digress. What is the advantage of Satsang over any other? That is the question I have at the moment.

Edited by: Sangrasal at: 2/19/04 8:06 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 698
(2/20/04 5:57 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Sangrasal, go sit somewhere and don't move.

 Sangrasal
Registered User
Posts: 2
(2/20/04 6:04 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Voce, the path you lead upon is too dark to follow and travels without direction.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 702
(2/20/04 10:00 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

What? A path is "light"? There are hues to paths? What direction are you headed? Really..you seekers have great imaginations.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2191
(2/20/04 10:20 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Yes, I remember looking into his teachings a long time ago and being impressed with the quality of his mind. But I also saw that while he may have been a genuine student of wisdom when he was young, his ego eventually got the better of him and he fell away quite badly as he got older - even to the point of consciously manipulating people for personal gain, just like a conman or a car salesman. Does that tally with your experience of him?

Philip: Somewhat. Brilliant, yes. A genuine young student who had powerful spiritual awakenings? Yes. Ego eventually getting the better of him? Possibly. I'm still processing the matter, even 19 years after the debacle. I'm not sure he consciously manipulated people for personal gain; I do, however, think that he was convinced of his own "perfect enlightenment" and of his unique mission in the world.

---

Okay, I want to analyze this issue more deeply. It is my belief, judging things from afar, that Osho's mind was indeed corrupted by his ego, and that the manner of his organization's violent demise was a testimony to this. I also believe that the fleet of Rolls Royces and the high position of Sheela is evidence that his ego had been corrupted for a long time beforehand. They all point to the fact that Osho loved being the centre of attention. His powerful mind fell away from servicing the cause of Truth and was directed instead towards feeding his self-love and narcissism.

To explain . . . . .

You wrote:

Quote:

---

In America, he believed that the primary problem was not sexual repression, but materialism, greed, and Christianity. So, he made a big show of "pushing buttons" in that area, by telling a few of his wealthy followers to acquire a fleet of Rolls Royces. It was understood to be partly his way of mocking the American ego.

---

I accept your explanation that the fleet of Rolls Royces was an elaborate joke that deliberately mocked American values. But to my mind, it showed that Osho was already being corrupted by his ego at this point. The ever-burgeoning collection of Rolls Royces constituted an overtly political statement on his part; it had little value from a spiritual point of view. There are far more efficient ways to teach people the value of giving up attachment to possessions and wealth. But Osho chose this highly-choreographed way because he was a showman who loved being at the centre of attention.

No doubt it would have been fun and exciting at the time to be a part of this rebellion against mainstream America. I'm sure most of his disciples got right into it. But it was still a corrupt activity all the same. And indeed, it directly led to Osho's subsequent approval of Sheela and her destructive ways. Because Osho had deliberately poked fun at mainstream America in such a colourful way and thus made himself a political target, he inadvertently created the conditions for paranoia to arise, which Sheela exploited to the hilt. It was only a matter of time before the paranoia became the dominant force in Osho's community and ensured its self-destruction.

Quote:

---

When he was in India, his primary "button-pushing" device was sex. He frequently lectured on sex, and encouraged his disciples to indulge frequently and deeply in sexual relations so as to be done with sexual desire and sexual karma. Of course, in Hindu-Muslim India, being very repressed sexually, this teaching was horrific and outrageous, and eventually Osho was run out of the country on some tax evasion charge.

---

From what I understand, he also preached this quite heavily in America as well, even though America's young were, post-sixties, already sexually promiscuous to very large extent. Is that right?

Quote:

---

He had several hundred thousand followers, many of whom had their lives radically transformed via their connection to him. I personally experienced the power of his *shakti* many times, and I knew of many, many whose lives "leaped" forward in positive ways once becoming initiated as his disciple. He carried a very powerful energy field.

---

But are there any truly wise people created by his movement? That is the question.

Quote:

---

He also distinguished between the "useless mystic" and the "real master". He said the useless mystic was an enlightened sage who was unskilled at working with disciples and while genuinely awakened, scared too many people away. The "real master" was both an awakened sage, and someone skilled at attracting and working with many different kinds of disciples. He thought that Buddha was a "real master" but that Krishnamurti, while genuinely enlightened, was just a useless mystic.

---

I would probably be regarded as a useless mystic as well. But it seems that you disagree with Osho here because you wrote further down that . . . . .

Quote:

---

I think that deep Realization practically mandates that one will speak "against the grain", because the "grain" of so much of human civilization and history is ugly, stupid, barbaric, and deeply unconscious. So if one is deeply Realized, it will be difficult to be polite in the face of the horrors of human nature.

---

Whenever one goes against the grain and "speaks out", one automatically scares most people away.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2325
(2/20/04 12:44 pm)
Reply

--

---

You're so go gainst da grain David Quane. Wot wiv god'n the sure shod muthafuckin' chaperonial inquesticide shite. Write on.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2326

(2/20/04 12:51 pm)

Reply

--

---

voce io is as dark as an elephants arse, but I am still darker when I happen to be, wait...

I've never happened to be an elephants arse!

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2193

(2/20/04 12:53 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: I wonder if there is an encyclopedia large enough to list all of logical fallacies that could possibly be committed by our poor old limited minds. :-(

DT: Well quite. The exhaustive analysis of propositional logic has turned up so many that it is hard to keep on top of them all and understand their relevance. But I would suggest that the body of logical fallacies itself holds more relevance than any single one. Reason is truly a minefield.

---

Not really. All logical fallacies boil down to the one core fallacy - that of mistaking something for what it isn't. That is to say, the violation of  $A=A$ .

Quote:

---

Regardless, I presume we can agree that Ignoring The Issue (or Ignoratio Elenchi) is a dialectical biggie. It can be committed in all innocence, but it can also be a powerful tool of sophistry when used with subtlety.

---

Indeed.

Quote:

---

DQ: I agree that devotion towards a guru or a philosopher can help lead one to infinite love, providing of course that one is primarily a thinker who hungers after Truth. I myself have been devoted to people like Kierkegaard, Lao Tzu, Nietzsche, and Huang Po in the past.

DT: I think this addresses the issue at hand, almost directly. You add the proviso that one must be primarily a thinker who hungers after truth, but the original argument would also account for, and pertain to, those who aren't primarily a thinker (in the sense that you intend) and don't hunger after truth, becoming attuned to such via the bridge of false devotion. Surely your argument should address the relative efficiency of devotional love for a true guru as a vehicle to truth, specifically for those who aren't originally primarily a thinker hungering after truth?

---

This can only come about with the help of a genuinely wise teacher. If a devotee has the good fortune of submitting to the guidance of a true sage, then it's possible that his motivations can become pure over time.

On the other hand, there is a very good chance this may never happen. It all depends on whether there is a sizable will to truth inside the disciple to begin with, and whether it can be unlocked and brought out into the open by the genuinely wise teacher.

It's also the case that most people who blindly submit to a guru invariably and unwittingly choose a false guru, which only serves to hinder their chances of wisdom even more.

The best approach, in my view, and the one I practiced myself during my formative years, is to depend on no one and instead place all of one's faith in one's ability to comprehend truth for oneself. Thus, instead of devoting oneself to a thinker such as Kierkegaard, Lao Tzu, Nietzsche, and Huang Po, in the manner of a star-struck lover, one uses them purely as sources of stimulation.

Great thinkers can trigger various chains of thought that lead to enlightenment, but one doesn't need to worship them for this to take place. One only needs to worship truth.

Quote:

---

Your argument is that because this person still speaks of a personal love for her guru, she could not possibly be manifesting infinite love, yet. To this I would refer you to all of your arguments (as recently reprised) for the appearance of egoic love, when seemingly present in the sage, actually being a product of a completely different value system which is not derived from attachment.

You yourself have previously referred to your devotion to certain 'gurus', and yet now that you claim to be vitually without attachment, you still portray the appearance of valuing these teachers to a point which some might still misinterpret as devotion. This is because you value these teachers and their words based on a whole different arbiter of value than the usual attachments, namely truth. Perhaps there might even be an element of gratitude? You also often present the appearance of one who seems to be in love with themself, to the egoic interpreter. But again, this is more likely actually based on your truth valuing system. And again, perhaps there is an element of gratitude, towards your former self, and towards your manifestation of infinity and truth.

You divorce the appearance of your actions which might be interpreted as egoic from their emotional interpretation by referring to values and rationale, as opposed to attachment and irrationale. Why would you not offer such understanding (or at least the possibility of) to others' appearance, most especially based on such scant evidence?

---

There are large obvious differences between someone like Gangaji and myself, which underline the point you are trying to make here. I agree with you that my valuing and praise of Kierkegaard and Lao Tzu and company could, in the absence of any other information, be interpreted as devotional love, the same kind of devotional love that Gangaji expresses towards her guru. But when you factor everything else into the equation it becomes impossible to sustain this interpretation.

The fact that Gangaji heads a religious organization, teaches people in the usual harmless guru-talk, and doesn't claim anything on her own authority, indicates that her relationship to her guru is submissive and unconscious in nature. In contrast, I always speak my own thoughts, using my own mind as an authority, and when I do utilize the writings of Kierkegaard and Lao Tzu and company, I use them purely to illustrate my teachings.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2329
(2/20/04 12:59 pm)
Reply

---

DaveQ:--

Quote:

All logical fallacies boil down to the one core fallacy - that of mistaking something for what it isn't. That is to say, the violation of  $A=A$ .

But you have said God is nature, which it is not, being nothing at all. You yourself are a logical fallacy.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2195
(2/20/04 1:04 pm)
Reply

Re: --

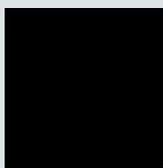

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

You're so go gainst da grain David Quane. Wot wiv god'n the sure shod muthafuckin' chaperonial inquesticide shite. Write on.

When are you going to stop being merely a commentator on proceedings and become a participant in your own right?

It is easy being a heckler in the stands - easy and safe.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 194(2/20/04 1:20 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> I will to be a logical fallacy, if that's what I have to do!                                                                                                                                                                                |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2331(2/20/04 1:25 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                | --- <hr/> What stands? You mean the flawless mystery of pseudonymity? Any participation of mine makes yours a mere commentary upon it. It is easy and safe to pretend you are mentally ill David.                                                                                    |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2197(2/20/04 2:03 pm)Reply                                                                                                              | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> Rairun wrote: Quote: <hr/> I will to be a logical fallacy, if that's what I have to do! <hr/> It's a very popular choice.                               |
|  Philip MistlbergerRegistered UserPosts: 15(2/20/04 4:01 pm)ReplyezSupporter  | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> My other car is a Rolls Royce, too! (bumpersticker on each of Osho's entire fleet of 98 Rolls) Famous sign at the gate of the Osho ashram -- Jesus SavesMoses InvestsOsho Spends |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

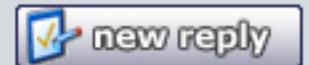

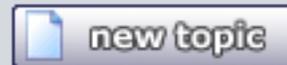

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

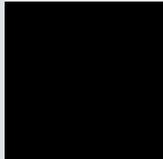

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|   Philip Mistlberger                     Registered User                     Posts: 16                     (2/20/04 4:42 pm)                     Reply                     ezSupporter   | Re: Satsang <hr/> Hi Sangrasal -- Quote: <hr/> Satsang, just what is it? From what I can gather it is a meeting of several people, led by a 'leader' who in silent meditation work toward greater spirituality. Over simplified, I know, but am I wrong? <hr/> The word "satsang" is a composite of the Sanskrit terms sat ("truth", or "being"), and sangha ("fellowship", "community", or "association"). So the word "satsangha", or simply "satsang", means loosely "gathering in the name of Truth", or "Being together in spiritual truth". Satsang is an ancient tradition deriving largely from the Hindu paths, but is common in any tradition where people gather together to meditate or consider ultimate truths. Traditionally, a satsang meeting is led by someone of deep spiritual realization and strong intellectual grasp of higher teachings. In modern times, satsang has become common in the West, mostly due to the many "sanctioned" Western disciples who were asked by their Eastern gurus to teach in the West. Harilal Poonja, the Advaita guru, was alone | responsible for authorizing many teachers (perhaps 20-30) to host satsang gatherings on his behalf in Europe and North America. These satsangs have in turn been attended by tens of thousands of seekers in the West. Gangaji and Isaac Shapiro regularly get 300-500 people for their meetings. Eckhart Tolle attracts over a 1,000 per meeting.

A typical satsang meeting is about 60 to 90 minutes in length (except for John deRuiter, whose meetings go about 3 hours long). It usually begins with a bit of music, or silence, and then interactive dialogue with the guru or teacher. Some teachers work like psychotherapists, others give short, simple, Zen-like responses, still others will often meet questions with only a silent gaze. But satsang meetings are unique in that no time is wasted in considering anything except ultimate truths.

Quote:

---

Reading this thread I have found much comment about various leaders and spiritual people, but in each instance, the 'leader' had drawbacks. Follow them? To what end?

Secondly, there was comment, attributed to Osho, that one should 'think for themselves'. (discounting the other remark made.) Rather wise in my view of things.

So, my basic misunderstanding, why 'follow' anyone?

---

An interesting book to read is Andrew Cohen's "In Defence of the Guru Principle".

You can also take a look at this compilation of "Spiritual Myths and Misconceptions" I wrote a few years ago on my Annubis webpages, especially Myth #7...

<http://www.geocities.com/annubis33/MythsandMisconceptionsofSpiritualGrowth/UnNamed.html>

The main argument for having a spiritual teacher is that our psychological "blind spots", the major ones of which are often intellectual arrogance or intellectual pride and unfinished emotional business with childhood authority figures (that gets projected onto the teacher -- a process called "transference" in psychotherapy), are such strong impediments as to make it almost impossible to "awaken" on our own, sort of the spiritual equivalent of lifting yourself up by your own shoestrings.

The main argument against having a guru or teacher is the (real) evidence of gurus of suspect character or those who misuse their power; but here we need to bear in mind the power of the media and its love of sensationalism. For every "corrupt" guru reported about in splashy tabloid newstories, there are likely another 50 or 100 who are quiet, unassuming, honest, and very helpful for the average seeker. And, as such, largely unknown, lol...

Quote:

---

People talk about God, Buddha, or whomever. Is he/it or isn't he/it? What does it matter? That entity does not come sit at your side and discuss the issues with you. What gain is made by following any one, or any thing?

---

The main idea of associating with spiritual teachers is to get yourself closer to their light and understanding so that some of it can rub off on you. That's really it, in a nutshell.

I've had around 15 to 20 significant spiritual teachers in my life...from all of them I learned something. It's like going to college or university -- many teachers to help with many aspects of knowledge and learning. It's that simple.

Quote:

---

But I digress. What is the advantage of Satsang over any other? That is the question I have at the moment.

---

Satsang is a very gentle and (for most) non-threatening learning environment. Also, the "vibe" at most satsang meetings is "high", meaning, that you feel "lifted" (happy) when leaving. It's something like a tune-up where the "motor" of your consciousness is helped to run more clearly and strongly...thus preparing you for deeper realizations...

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/20/04 4:46 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2198

(2/20/04 5:05 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

For every "corrupt" guru reported about in splashy tabloid newstories, there are likely another 50 or 100 who are quiet, unassuming, honest, and very helpful for the average seeker.

---

I must be extremely cynical, Philip. For I can't help but feel that for every "corrupt" guru reported in splashy tabloids, there are another 50 or 100 who are even more corrupt.

And it is usually the case that the most celebrated gurus in the tabloids are the most corrupt of them at all - e.g. Dalai Lama, the Pope, Mother Teresa, etc.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 81

(2/20/04 5:31 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

Ma Anand Sheela, personal secretary to the Bhagwan, was convicted for masterminding a mass salmonella poisoning of hundreds of residents in The Dalles.

---

The Rajneeshees

In 1984, the Rajneeshees, a religious cult, committed the only successful, large-scale biological attack that has been carried out in the United States. Members of the cult contaminated salad bars in restaurants in the small town of The Dalles, Oregon with the bacterium Salmonella typhimurium. The result was that 751 people became ill with food poisoning, although no one died. The attacks were carried out because cult leaders wanted to test a scheme to make voters sick so that the cult could win a local election. The Rajneeshees also gave salmonella to two local commissioners who opposed the cult.

Remarks:

The attacks were carried out in order to achieve a specific political objective and not for ideological reasons.

The Rajneeshees were a closed cult, isolated from society and dominated by a charismatic leader.

The Rajneeshees did not intend to kill their victims, only to make them sick enough so that they would be unable to vote.

www.bendbulletin.com/news/story.cfm?story\_no=5309

204.71.60.38/h\_learnmore/cbwtutorial/chapter\_05\_02.html

 Philip Mistlberger

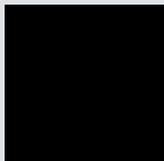

Registered User

Posts: 17

(2/20/04 7:40 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

David Q wrote....

Quote:

---

I accept your explanation that the fleet of Rolls Royces was an elaborate joke that deliberately mocked American values. But to my mind, it showed that Oho was already being corrupted by his ego at this point. The ever-burgeoning collection of Rolls Royces constituted an overtly political statement on his part; it had little value from a spiritual point of view. There are far more efficient ways to teach people the value of giving up attachment to possessions and wealth. But Osho chose this highly-choreographed way because he was a showman who loved being at the centre of attention.

---

A reasonable conclusion, one backed by many nowadays. Osho did (as I recall) espouse the standard marketing philosophy about "any publicity" being "good publicity", as he always had a sense of urgency in his political views and believing that "time was short" for humanity. He was one of the few gurus (and few futurists period) to predict the calamity of AIDS on an international scale back when it first became commonly known around 1980. I understand that a further rationalization for the fleet of cars was as a "device" to simply get attention. Many of his closer, more intellectually inclined followers were convinced of his divine "prophecy-fulfilling" nature, believing him to be the "promised" saviour hinted at by many traditions -- the "brother from the East" of the Hopi prophecies, the "Maitreya" of Buddhism, and even the Prophet from the "red land" predicted by Nostradamus. It always seemed remarkable how otherwise rational people could get caught up in such eschatological phantasmagoria. But the mystical element, the grandiosity of hype around a "big guru", seems to seep in unannounced and take over in insidious fashion and before one knows it, a religion has been born...

Sheela tried to begin a religion around Osho -- she called it "Rajneeshism", set herself up as its first Pope, and even created a Holy Book called the Book of Rajneeshism. When her crimes were officially exposed, Osho called for a book burning ceremony (all copies of the Book of Rajneeshism were torched, as was Sheela's "Pope's Robe") and declared "Rajneeshism" dead. How much of a role he really had behind creating his "first pope" is still disputed to this day.

Quote:

---

No doubt it would have been fun and exciting at the time to be a part of this rebellion against mainstream America. I'm sure most of his disciples got right into it. But it was still a corrupt activity all the same. And indeed, it directly led to Osho's subsequent approval of Sheela and her destructive ways. Because Osho had deliberately poked fun at mainstream America in such a colourful way and thus made himself a political target, he inadvertantly created the conditions for paranoia to arise, which Sheela exploited to the hilt. It was only a matter of time before the paranoia became the dominant force in Osho's community and ensured its self-destruction.

---

Part of my re-evaluation process as an ex-disciple of his was to see how Sheela was, in part, an extension of his own personality and nature. Osho was, as a boy, highly extroverted and dominant, and a notorious rebel throughout his schooling, even up to being a professor of philosophy in Jabalpur, India, where he was constantly getting in trouble with University authorities. He was very popular amongst the young intelligentsia, and his brilliance was inextricably connected to his rebelliousness (his book publishing house, in later years, was even called "Rebel Publishing House"). Sheela, being a fiery rebel herself, was clearly a chip off the old block, even if not the intellectual giant that Osho was.

Quote:

---

From what I understand, he also preached this quite heavily in America as well, even though America's young were, post-sixties, already sexually promiscuous to very large extent. Is that right?

---

Not so much in America. By that time, he was more into "power". The therapy groups in the Oregon ashram were nowhere near as sexually Tantric as the groups in Poona, India, had been. The general consensus is that the community evolved through three stages -- Poona 1, from '74-81, which was sex-dominant (2nd chakra); Oregon, from '81-85, which was power-dominant (3rd chakra); and Poona 2, from '86-'90 (his death, although the ashram in India still exists and his work is still be carried on by disciples), which was based more on meditation and compassion (4th chakra).

Also, with the AIDS scare in full flight by '83 or so, the Oregon ashram was very concerned about the community being decimated by it (always a high risk with isolated communities). So great precautions were undertaken, such as no one allowed in the ashram without a "negative AIDS certificate", latex gloves to be worn during sex, etc. Things were rather bizarre for a while.

Quote:

---

But are there any truly wise people created by his movement? That is the question.

---

I believe that I have met many. Some still teach independently today, such as Paul Lowe, Robert Birnbaum, Michael Barnett, etc., although many dispute the degree of enlightenment of many of these disciples.

As for ex-disciples who wrote books about Osho, these range from the bitter and merely stupid (Hugh Milne's "Osho: The God That Failed", to the overly sanitized (Juliet Forman's "Osho: The Buddha For the Future"). My favourite, and the most balanced I think, is by an author called only "Sam" entitled "Life of Osho". Very clear, fair criticism, clearly written by an unattached ex-follower.

Quote:

---

DQ: I would probably be regarded as a useless mystic as well. But it seems that you disagree with Osho here because you wrote further down that . . . . .

PM: I think that deep Realization practically mandates that one will speak "against the grain", because the "grain" of so much of human civilization and history is ugly, stupid, barbaric, and deeply unconscious. So if one is deeply Realized, it will be difficult to be polite in the face of the horrors of human nature.

DQ: Whenever one goes against the grain and "speaks out", one automatically scares most people away.

---

Which doesn't imply that many still can't be drawn anyway. Osho spoke against the grain almost all the time, but still attracted many, many students. Many more came after his death. His books still sell very well today, and his ashram in India is still a popular personal growth "resort" (knicknamed "Club Meditation"). A similar pattern unfolded with Christ; his Work blown apart by the actions of one (Judas; Sheela for Osho); followed not long after by his death (crucifixion; CIA-induced radiation poisoning for Osho, possibly); followed by persecution of his followers (the Jesus-communities after the crucifixion dispersed underground in Judea/Isreal; Osho's followers likewise dispersed globally after the Oregon debacle; Jesus' teachings were transmitted by Paul, Peter, the gospel writers, etc., after his death; Osho's teachings transmitted by his closest disciples after his death, etc. Some (if not all) of the parallels are interesting and evident. (There is even a book out entitled "Christ crucified again: How Ronald Reagan's America poisoned a modern Messiah", or something like that).

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/20/04 7:59 pm

Philip Mistlberger

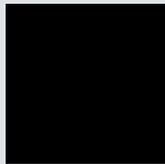

Registered User

Posts: 18

(2/20/04 7:45 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

Quote:

---

In 1984, the Rajneeshees, a religious cult, committed the only successful, large-scale biological attack that has been carried out in the United States.

---

Yes, this was generally considered to be the most horrific act carried out by Sheela and the Gang of Six. There was also a reported assassination attempt on the Attorney General of Oregon at that time (Dave Fronmayer) in the works. In the trial afterward, Osho was exonerated of all links to these events, as no legal evidence connecting him to them was found. Sheela and the Gang of Six were charged with these crimes.

Philip Mistlberger

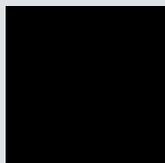

Registered User

Posts: 19

(2/20/04 7:48 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

---

David, agreed about the Pope and Mother Teresa, but how do you see the Dalai Lama as "corrupt"?

|                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2337(2/20/04 11:02 pm)Reply                                                                                                | --- <hr/> I think there is photographic evidence of him drinking a coca cola or something.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 706(2/21/04 3:44 am)Reply                  | Re: --- <hr/> How was Mother Teresa corrupt?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|  SangrasalRegistered UserPosts: 3(2/21/04 3:50 am)ReplyezSupporter | Re: --- Satsung <hr/> Thanks for the response, Phillip. You're working an interesting thread. In essence I agree with the teacher aspect, but in real life have seen so many hung up on the teacher, and not individually progressing. The mime and mimic scene. I do question all though (given as spiritual information) and enjoy following this thread. |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2199(2/21/04 7:05 am)Reply              | Re: Satsang, and the Integration of Truth <hr/> Jesus SavesMoses InvestsOsho SpendsHumanity Pays -- Philip wrote: Quote: <hr/> David, agreed about the Pope and Mother Teresa, but how do you see the Dalai Lama as "corrupt"? <hr/>                                                        |

He is corrupt because he is trying to serve three masters - the Tibetan political cause, the Tibetan Buddhist religion, and wisdom. And unfortunately, wisdom has very much taken a back seat to the other two.

The first master causes him to want to remain bland and uncontroversial in the eyes of the West because he seeks to gain its help for his political ambitions, which dilutes the spiritual element of his teachings to the point of non-existence.

His second master causes him to be overly-restrictive and narrow in his presentation of wisdom - keeping it confined within traditional Buddhist language - and also causes him to lend his support to the irrational elements of the Buddhist religion, and also to the superstitions and myths of the Tibetan people.

The third master seems to have no impact at all upon the first two.

In short, the Dalai Lama comes across as a sort of harmless clown who bows and smiles and mouths innocuous platitudes and somehow believes this has something to do with promoting wisdom.

--

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

How was Mother Teresa corrupt?

---

She caused people to become addicted to her Christian fantasies when they were at their most needy and vulnerable, which is not only an insidious form of behaviour, but it adds to the amount of lies in the world.

She also caused people to equate the highest form of spirituality with feminine unconsciousness, which she herself embodied.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2202

(2/21/04 3:45 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

I understand that a further rationalization for the fleet of cars was as a "device" to simply get attention. Many of his closer, more intellectually inclined followers were convinced of his divine "prophecy-fulfilling" nature, believing him to be the "promised" saviour hinted at by many traditions -- the "brother from the East" of the Hopi prophecies, the "Maitreya" of Buddhism, and even the Prophet from the "red land" predicted by Nostradamus. It always seemed remarkable how otherwise rational people could get caught up in such eschatological phantasmagoria.

---

Behold the cunning of the ego! As soon as one looks away, it can sneak in and overturn one's rational faculties at a moment's notice.

Quote:

---

But the mystical element, the grandiosity of hype around a "big guru", seems to seep in unannounced and take over in insidious fashion and before one knows it, a religion has been born...

---

It is the responsibility of the "big guru" to constantly nip this sort of thing in the bud. I'm not sure that Osho was all that diligent in shouldering this responsibility.

Quote:

---

Sheela tried to begin a religion around Osho -- she called it "Rajneeshism", set herself up as its first Pope, and even created a Holy Book called the Book of Rajneeshism.

---

Wasn't it already a religion before that?

Quote:

---

When her crimes were officially exposed, Osho called for a book burning ceremony (all copies of the Book of Rajneeshism were torched, as was Sheela's "Pope's Robe") and declared "Rajneeshism" dead.

---

What "crimes" are you talking about? The poisoning?

Quote:

---

How much of a role he really had behind creating his "first pope" is still disputed to this day.

---

I wonder if he even cared? I've been told that he used to stay in his little room and watch vidoes all day. If that is true, then it is perhaps the case that he was psychologically withdrawing from the whole movement he had created.

Quote:

---

His books still sell very well today,

---

What is his wisest book, in your view?

 Philip Mistleberger

Registered User

Posts: 20

(2/23/04 8:25 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

PM: I understand that a further rationalization for the fleet of cars was as a "device" to simply get attention. Many of his closer, more intellectually inclined followers were convinced of his divine "prophecy-fulfilling" nature, believing him to be the "promised" saviour hinted at by many traditions -- the "brother from the East" of the Hopi prophecies, the "Maitreya" of Buddhism, and even the Prophet from the "red land" predicted by Nostradamus. It always seemed remarkable how otherwise rational people could get caught up in such eschatological phantasmagoria.

DQ: Behold the cunning of the ego! As soon as one looks away, it can sneak in and overturn one's rational faculties at a moment's notice.

---

The thing that was unique about the Oregonian Rajneesh Community's self-destruction was how it played out, in a sort of "time-collapse", all the elements that often go into the creation of an ultimately corrupt religion -- only the religion was aborted before it could take birth.

For example, the Christian "Nicene" church (where Jesus Christ=The Only God) really arose in a semi-organized fashion only after the famous Council of Nicea (Turkey) around 325 AD. After that, the Gnostic views ("Christ" is the innermost spark in everyone, *not* just in the historical person of Jesus) gradually got suppressed. But the organized Church, made the official religion of Constantine's "Roman" Empire (hence, "Roman" Catholicism) at the time of the Nicene council, really came about due to corrupt agendas -- Emperor Constantine needing one religion to help unify his fractured empire, that is, it was politically expedient to have a state religion -- and Bishop Athanasius promoting the notion that Jesus was God in flesh, and the only true God in flesh, as opposed to Bishop Arius who argued that Jesus was a man who awakened to his Christ nature. Athanasius "won" the debate at the Nicea council because Constantine backed him, recognizing that the "Only Son of God" tag line would work well for a proposed state religion of an Empire that was promoted as the "only *true* empire".

So it took over 300 years for Christianity to morph into a corrupted version of truth, after which time, backed by the declining (but still powerful) Roman Empire, it gained tremendous momentum.

In Osho's case, his "religion" appeared almost overnight, with the birth of the Book of Rajneeshism, and collapsed almost overnight as well, with the revelation of the crimes of the Gang of Six. So, the corruptions inherent in the community got exposed rapidly. And yes, these corruptions may indeed have been a reflection of Osho's ego. But it's still fascinating to see how the entire movement, from birth of a "Christ-like" teacher with devoted followers, to the rise of a prominent and rebellious disciple whose actions lead to a catastrophic collapse, formation and dissolution of a religion, and death of the founder, plays like a "fast-forward" of the outer destiny of a spiritual movement that grows into a religion and ultimately fades into decay...hopefully leaving behind only the sparks of truth uttered by the founder. Sometimes I think that this is what the Tao Te Ching so beautifully represents, a distilled essence of wisdom from the mind of a great spiritual rebel...the remnant of truth left over after all was said and done.

Quote:

---

PM: Sheela tried to begin a religion around Osho -- she called it "Rajneeshism", set herself up as its first Pope, and even created a Holy Book called the Book of Rajneeshism.

DQ: Wasn't it already a religion before that?

---

No, and Osho went out of his way many times to clarify that point. He said he strove for religiousness as a quality, but that he'd never permit his followers to establish a religion in his name. That has born out -- many still read his books, practice his meditations, but there is no "holy scripture", no "official book", no obligations or rites of passage, no required clothes, titles, or beliefs, or dues, or church.

Quote:

---

PM: When her crimes were officially exposed, Osho called for a book burning ceremony (all copies of the Book of Rajneeshism were torched, as was Sheela's "Pope's Robe") and declared "Rajneeshism" dead.

DQ: What "crimes" are you talking about? The poisoning?

---

Yes, those were the chief ones. All told, in addition to the "salad bar" attack, several of Osho's disciples were poisoned by Sheela and her lieutenants. None died, to my knowledge.

Quote:

---

What is his wisest book, in your view?

---

My personal favourite was always "Only One Sky", sometimes in different editions titled "Tantra: The Supreme Understanding". It was a transcription of a series of lectures on the Tibetan path of Mahamudra, sometimes known in Tibetan Buddhism as the "highest yoga".

Other interesting ones were "The Mustard Seed", Osho's commentaries on the Gnostic Gospel of Thomas, and "The Beloved", his views on Kabir. Especially intriguing were his dozens of "Darshan Diaries", recorded dialogues between Osho and disciples as he was initiating them.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/23/04 8:30 am

 Philip Mistlberger

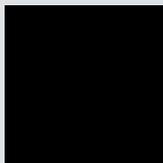

Registered User

Posts: 21

(2/23/04 9:45 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

This is worth a look at...

*****

TILOPA'S SONG OF MAHAMUDRA

Mahamudra is beyond all words and symbols, but for you, Naropa, earnest and loyal,
must this be said:

The void needs no reliance, Mahamudra rests on nought.
Without making an effort, but remaining loose and natural, one can break the yoke thus gaining liberation.

If one sees nought when staring into space;
if with the mind one then observes the mind, one destroys distinctions and reaches buddhahood.

The clouds that wander through the sky have no roots, no home; nor do the distinctive thoughts floating through the mind.
Once the self-mind is seen, discrimination stops.

In space shapes and colors form, but neither by black nor white is space tinged.
From the self-mind all things emerge, the mind by virtues and by vices is not stained.

The darkness of ages cannot shroud the glowing sun; the long kalpas of samsara ne'er can hide the mind's brilliant light.

Though words are spoken to explain the void,
the void as such can never be expressed.
Though we say "the mind is bright as light",
it is beyond all words and symbols.
Although the mind is void in essence, all things it embraces and contains.

Do nought with the body but relax; shut firm the mouth and silent remain; empty your mind and think of nought. Like a hollow bamboo rest at ease with your body.
Giving not or taking, put your mind at rest.
Mahamudra is like a mind that clings to nought.
Thus practicing, in time you will reach buddhahood.

The practice of mantra and paramita, instruction in the sutras and precepts, and teaching from the schools and scriptures, will not bring realization of the innate truth. For if the mind when filled with some desire should seek a goal, it only hides the light.

He who keeps tantric precepts, yet discriminates, betrays the spirit of samaya. Cease all activity, abandon all desire, let thoughts rise and fall
as they will like ocean waves.

He who never harms the non-abiding, nor the principle of non-distinction, upholds the tantric precepts.

He who abandons craving and clings not to this and that, perceives the real meaning given in the scriptures.

In Mahamudra all one's sins are burned;
in Mahamudra one is released from the prison of this world. This is the dharma's supreme torch.
Those who disbelieve it are fools, who ever wallow in misery and sorrow.

To strive for liberation one should rely on a guru.
When your mind receives his blessing
emancipation is at hand.

Alas, all teachings in this world are meaningless, they are but sorrow's seeds.
Small teachings lead to small acts.
One should only follow teachings that are great.

To transcend duality is the kingly view.
To conquer distractions is the royal practice.
The path of no-practice is the way of all buddhas.
He who treads the path reaches buddhahood.

Transient is the world, like phantoms and dreams, substance it has none. Renounce it and forsake your kin, cut the strings of lust and hatred,
and meditate in woods and mountains.

If without effort you remain loosely in the natural state, soon Mahamudra you will win and attain the nonattainment.

Cut the root of a tree and the leaves will wither;
cut the root of your mind and samsara falls.
The light of any lamp dispels in a moment the darkness of long kalpas;
the strong light of the Mind in but a flash will burn the veil of ignorance.

Whoever clings to mind sees not the truth of what's beyond the mind.

Whoever strives to practice dharma finds not the truth of beyond-practice.

To know what is beyond both mind and practice one should cut cleanly through the root of mind and stare naked.
One should thus break away from all distinctions and remain at ease.

One should not give or take, but remain natural
- for Mahamudra is beyond all acceptance and rejection. Since alaya is not born, no one can obstruct or soil it: staying in the unborn realm all appearance will dissolve into dharma, and self-will and pride will vanish into nought.

The supreme understanding transcends all this and that. The supreme action embraces great resourcefulness without attachment.

The supreme accomplishment is to realize immanence without hope. At first a yogi feels his mind is tumbling like a waterfall; in mid-course, like the Ganges, it flows on slow and gentle;
in the end it is a great vast ocean where the lights of son and mother merge in one.

-- Tilopa (10th century Tibetan mystic)

*****

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/23/04 9:46 am

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 284
(2/25/04 10:41 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

To strive for liberation one should rely on a guru.
When your mind receives his blessing emancipation is at hand.

---

Yuk.

One must rely on oneself.

The Guru cannot give a meaningful blessing, he cannot verify that an individual has comprehended the Truth. To make statements to that effect is incredibly dangerous.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 739
(2/25/04 11:26 am)
Reply

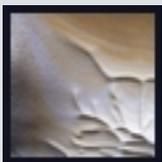

Re: Satsang

---

lol. If the student speaks the truth, the guru should know that the student has realized.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 286
(2/25/04 12:03 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

If the guru is enlightened (and surely must be to be properly considered a guru), then they can certainly form a very good opinion, but they can never be certain.

Rhett Hamilton

 Philip Mistlberger

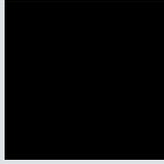

Registered User

Posts: 22

(2/25/04 6:30 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

The Guru cannot give a meaningful blessing, he cannot verify that an individual has comprehended the Truth. To make statements to that effect is incredibly dangerous.

---

Those Tilopa aphorisms are about 1,000 years old, and apply to a specific cultural context in which virtually no one trained without a guru, and often in a teacher-student relationship that was very structured and formal. The essence of their teaching was Ramana's famous expression of spiritual ultimacy, "God, Guru, and Self are One". So the guru's "blessing" is really nothing other than a confirmation that works in reverse...meaning, the guru does not "transmit" his enlightenment to the disciple, the disciple rather recognizes his true nature within the context of relating to the guru. This "appears" to be a "blessing", when in fact it's just a poetic way of expressing appreciation for the Grace that occurs in such an awakening. This "Grace" is not the property of anyone, guru or seeker, but is rather the essence of Truth itself.

The awakened guru does not "bestow" enlightenment, and nor does he "give enlightenment". But he can evoke the conditions that may lead to a direct transcendence of subject-object dualism. That is, while in his presence, the disciple may indeed experience the transcendence of "me" and "other" and experience directly a moment of Oneness. This is tacitly obvious to both when it occurs. It is also the heart and essence of the Zen dokusan tradition, where the Zen master interviews the practitioner via the usage of the koan, and when "solved" in his presence, is confirmed as having "gotten kensho", that is, the direct transcendence of duality in that moment.

"Kensho" in the Zen tradition is not a final enlightenment, it's understood as an opening of the "Wisdom Eye" which is then to be deepened and integrated into one's daily life. Similarly, the so-called "blessing" referred to by Tilopa is not some sort of "confirmation" of final enlightenment. It's often an opening, although a key one (and is sometimes called an "initiation"). As a good example there, look at the life of Milarepa, and his relationship with Marpa (his guru). After six years of study/practice/work in Marpa's company, Milarepa is given a set of teachings to study in the mountains. There, he attains his Realization. But, he make mention of having "received the master's blessing" while with him, which in his unique case came in the form of a difficult experience that led to a profound humbling and "purifying" that made him ripe for Realization.

This sort of relating with a guru is not a regular thing, in fact, what is much more common is, as Tilopa exhorts, the importance of "meditating in woods and mountains" (i.e., solitary, to deepen and refine one's realization).

Historically, the trend seems to be that most seekers attain enlightenment in the presence of an awakened teacher. Very few attain without any sort of guidance...like a Jesus, or Buddha...although Jesus did have John the Baptist (and possible Essene masters), and Buddha did have samana and yoga masters...even if both Jesus and Buddha likely eventually surpassed their teachers.

So, to look deeply into this, we need to bear in mind the cultural context within which a teaching takes place, and we need to investigate the difference between "blessing", "initiation", "transmission", and bona fide "enlightenment".

Perhaps we can explore more of that here.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 85

(2/26/04 2:39 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

The awakened guru does not "bestow" enlightenment, and nor does he "give enlightenment". But he can evoke the conditions that may lead to a direct transcendence of subject-object dualism.

---

Gurus are Profiteers and Charlatans, subject to the pitfalls of any wo/man elected to the position of authority. Rajneesh was no different then the Jim Jones and Mansons of the world.

Quote:

---

That is, while in his presence, the disciple may indeed experience the transcendence of "me" and "other" and experience directly a moment of Oneness. This is tacitly obvious to both when it occurs. It is also the heart and essence of the Zen dokusan tradition, where the Zen master interviews the practitioner via the usage of the koan, and when "solved" in his presence, is confirmed as having "gotten kensho", that is, the direct transcendence of duality in that moment

---

This is book knowledge, academic mumbo-jumbo. Words and phrases such as "transcendence" and "experience Oneness" are nothing more than the Western Mind distilling enigmatic Eastern thought. The idea of moving beyond individuality and merging with The All, is the expansion of the ego to monolithic proportions, the projection of Amness onto the Universe and ultimately is still based in Dualism.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 746

(2/26/04 3:07 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

even if both Jesus and Buddha likely eventually surpassed their teachers.

About Jesus: yeah it does seem like John was Jesus's guru. In the book of John, there are really great teachings on the Self as God; I wouldn't be surprised if John was actually as realized as Jesus.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 747
(2/26/04 3:09 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

*This is book knowledge, academic mumbo-jumbo. Words and phrases such as “transcendence” and “ experience Oneness” are nothing more than the Western Mind distilling enigmatic Eastern thought.
The idea of moving beyond individuality and merging with The All, is the expansion of the ego to monolithic proportions, the projection of Amness onto the Universe and ultimately is still based in Dualism.*

Exactly!

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

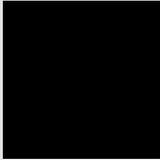

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|  Philip MistlbergerRegistered UserPosts: 23(2/26/04 7:41 am)ReplyezSupporter  | Re: Satsang <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Gurus are Profiteers and Charlatans, subject to the pitfalls of any wo/man elected to the position of authority. Rajneesh was no different then the Jim Jones and Mansons of the world. <hr/> Who says I was referring to Rajneesh? You seem to be a bit hung up on him. Jim Jones was responsible for hundreds of deaths. Manson was a psychotic murderer. Rajneesh was never convicted of anything more than tax evasion and arranging sham marriages. His teachings helped millions of people. You have to actually study the story in depth to know what you're talking about. Comparing Rajneesh to Jim Jones or Manson is sheer stupidity -- so stupid, in fact, as to not even be worthy of being called "arrogant". Arrogance at least generally requires some sign of intelligence. So if you improve your argument a bit, I may promote you from "stupid" to merely "arrogant". Quote: <hr/> This is book knowledge, academic mumbo-jumbo. Words and | phrases such as “transcendence” and “ experience Oneness” are nothing more than the Western Mind distilling enigmatic Eastern thought.

The idea of moving beyond individuality and merging with The All, is the expansion of the ego to monolithic proportions, the projection of Amness onto the Universe and ultimately is still based in Dualism.

---

My words were based on direct personal experiences, including having lived in India and Nepal studied and practiced directly under Eastern teachers. I have lived and studied in these traditions, from the inside.

Your words sound suspiciously like those of someone parroting or mimicking ideas he's heard that sound impressive to him.

"Western mind distilling Eastern thought" -- this is just intellectual crap. Show some direct reasoning based on your own personal experience or revelation, or how your ideas relate to your own journey, but either way be less of a coward and come out from behind your pompous judgmental mask.

Quote:

---

About Jesus: yeah it does seem like John was Jesus's guru. In the book of John, there are really great teachings on the Self as God; I wouldn't be suprised if John was actually as realized as Jesus.

---

Voce Io, the John Gospel is definitely different from the first three gospels, radically so, and is thought by most scholars to have been written long after the first three as well. Its tone is cosmic in the sense of portraying Christ as a mythic, cosmic figure, far different from the tone of the first three gospels where Jesus is really depicted as not too much more than the equivalent of a Greek wise man.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 292
(2/26/04 10:33 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

Quote:

---

The Guru cannot give a meaningful blessing, he cannot verify that an individual has comprehended the Truth. To make statements to that effect is incredibly dangerous.

---

Quote:

---

Those Tilopa aphorisms are about 1,000 years old.

So, to look deeply into this, we need to bear in mind the cultural context within which a teaching takes place, and we need to investigate the difference between "blessing", "initiation", "transmission", and bona fide "enlightenment".

---

I agree in a limited sense.

I read the aphorisms quickly and disinterestedly because i was under the impression that you were offering us some of Osho's work in response to David's question. Thus, i thought the context wasn't likely to be much of a problem.

Even so, by responding the way i did i gave it the context of 'now', which is what is important after all, isn't it? People are looking at it now and making judgements about it from the modern perspective, so that's how we need to analyse it.

Quote:

---

Those Tilopa aphorisms are about 1,000 years old, and apply to a specific cultural context in which virtually no one trained without a guru, and often in a teacher-student relationship that was very structured and formal. The essence of their teaching was Ramana's famous expression of spiritual ultimacy, "God, Guru, and Self are One". So the guru's "blessing" is really nothing other than a confirmation that works in reverse...meaning, the guru does not "transmit" his enlightenment to the disciple, the disciple rather recognizes his true nature within the context of relating to the guru. This "appears" to be a "blessing", when in fact it's just a poetic way of expressing appreciation for the Grace that occurs in such an awakening. This "Grace" is not the property of anyone, guru or seeker, but is rather the essence of Truth itself.

---

Okay.

Quote:

---

The awakened guru does not "bestow" enlightenment, and nor does he "give enlightenment". But he can evoke the conditions that may lead to a direct transcendence of subject-object dualism. That is, while in his presence, the disciple may indeed experience the transcendence of "me" and "other" and experience directly a moment of Oneness. This is tacitly obvious to both when it occurs. It is also the heart and essence of the Zen dokusan tradition, where the Zen master interviews the practitioner via the usage of the koan, and when "solved" in his presence, is confirmed as having "gotten kensho", that is, the direct transcendence of duality in that moment.

---

Okay.

Quote:

---

"Kensho" in the Zen tradition is not a final enlightenment, it's understood as an opening of the "Wisdom Eye" which is then to be deepened and integrated into one's daily life. Similarly, the so-called "blessing" referred to by Tilopa is not some sort of "confirmation" of final enlightenment. It's often an opening, although a key one (and is sometimes called an "initiation"). As a good example there, look at the life of Milarepa, and his relationship with Marpa (his guru). After six years of study/practice/work in Marpa's company, Milarepa is given a set of teachings to study in the mountains. There, he attains his Realization. But, he make mention of having "received the master's blessing" while with him, which in his unique case came in the form of a difficult experience that led to a profound humbling and "purifying" that made him ripe for Realization.

---

Okay.

Quote:

---

This sort of relating with a guru is not a regular thing, in fact, what is much more common is, as Tilopa exhorts, the importance of "meditating in woods and mountains" (i.e., solitary, to deepen and refine one's realization).

---

Yes, but it's interesting the forms that isolation can take in the modern context. I'd say that nowadays the best place to meditate is in a big city. One then has complete control over the nature of their interactions; they can simply meander in mental isolation (if they are sufficiently developed), or test themselves in various ways, and/or interact with people. Small towns tend to have a far firmer grasp on people, thus compromising their capacity for individuality. Complete isolation may have worth, but one must then return to civilisation if one intends to deepen one's attainment and teach.

Quote:

---

Historically, the trend seems to be that most seekers attain enlightenment in the presence of an awakened teacher. Very few attain without any sort of guidance...like a Jesus, or Buddha... although Jesus did have John the Baptist (and possible Essene masters), and Buddha did have samana and yoga masters...even if both Jesus and Buddha likely eventually surpassed their teachers.

---

My understanding (attainment) has come with help from enlightened teachers via the internet, which i think is a very interesting development. I have only had the merest of contact with another person that i judge to be enlightened, which didn't even reach the point of conversing (interestingly, i think it confused me just as much as it helped me understand enlightened behaviour).

Quote:

---

Perhaps we can explore more of that here.

---

I think so.

Rhett Hamilton

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 86

(2/26/04 4:08 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Who says I was referring to Rajneesh? You seem to be a bit hung up on him.

Jim Jones was responsible for hundreds of deaths. Manson was a psychotic murderer. Rajneesh was never convicted of anything more than tax evasion and arranging sham marriages. His teachings helped millions of people. You have to actually study the story in depth to know what you're talking about.

Comparing Rajneesh to Jim Jones or Manson is sheer stupidity -- so stupid, in fact, as to not even be worthy of being called "arrogant". Arrogance at least generally requires some sign of intelligence.

So if you improve your argument a bit, I may promote you from "stupid" to merely "arrogant".

---

I can see that you are still far too attached to even consider a rational discussion, it would be advisable if we let this matter drop.

Quote:

---

My words were based on direct personal experiences,

---

Interesting. How is this possible if your “me” had merged with the “other”?

Quote:

---

including having lived in India and Nepal studied and practiced directly under Eastern teachers. I have lived and studied in these traditions, from the inside.

---

So is that supposed to be an indication of a greater understanding or comprehension and why did you have to go so far, couldn't you figure it out at home, on your own?

Quote:

---

Your words sound suspiciously like those of someone parroting or mimicking ideas he's heard that sound impressive to him.

---

Now you're projecting.

Quote:

---

but either way be less of a coward and come out from behind your pompous judgmental mask.

You have to actually study the story in depth to know what you're talking about.

Comparing Rajneesh to Jim Jones or Manson is sheer stupidity -- so stupid, in fact, as to not even be worthy of being called "arrogant". Arrogance at least generally requires some sign of intelligence.

So if you improve your argument a bit, I may promote you from "stupid" to merely "arrogant".

Your words sound suspiciously like those of someone parroting or mimicking ideas he's heard that sound impressive to him.

---

Now who exactly is being pompous and judgmental? ;)

Philip Mistlberger

Registered User

Posts: 24

(2/27/04 7:39 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Rhett --

Quote:

---

Yes, but it's interesting the forms that isolation can take in the modern context. I'd say that nowadays the best place to meditate is in a big city. One then has complete control over the nature of their interactions; they can simply meander in mental isolation (if they are sufficiently developed), or test themselves in various ways, and/or interact with people. Small towns tend to have a far firmer grasp on people, thus compromising their capacity for individuality. Complete isolation may have worth, but one must then return to civilisation if one intends to deepen one's attainment and teach.

---

Well yes, this is what I'd mentioned in my first post to this thread (it was in the context of the Zen "ten oxherding" pictures, where the ninth stage represents a deep Kensho, or recognition of True Nature, and the tenth stage "returning to the marketplace").

In my time in the Gurdjieff Work, this was the primary emphasis...doing the "Work" in the context of typical, mundane, busy (generally urban) life.

Tilopa's "meditate in mountains and forests" exhortation I see more as symbolic of the need to be deeply committed to the Awakening process. "Solitude" I see as more of a demonstration of the *intention* to awaken, and of the importance of prioritizing enlightenment in one's life. It doesn't necessarily mean that one must literally remove oneself from society (although occasional retreats can be helpful).

Quote:

---

My understanding (attainment) has come with help from enlightened teachers via the internet, which i think is a very interesting development. I have only had the merest of contact with another person that i judge to be enlightened, which didn't even reach the point of conversing (interestingly, i think it confused me just as much as it helped me understand enlightened behaviour).

---

Internet *darshans* (interaction with awakened people in cyberspace) are a new and interesting development. I've seen much evidence of "awakened clarity" on this message board, although I'm still in the process of evaluating.

I was a student of the Gurdjieff teacher Edward Fanaberia, who was a student of John Bennett (himself a direct disciple of Gurdjieff); I spent seven years with Osho; I also trained under the Tibetan teacher Pema Chodron and the Korean Zen master Seung Sahn; I spent two years in a Gnostic community training under several teachers; I was given ritual empowerment by the Tibetan Buddhist lamas Zasep Tulku Rinpoche and Lama Sonam Tsogyal Rinpoche; I've sat with several non-dual (Advaita, for the most part) satsang teachers, such as Hanuman, John deRuiter, Adyashanti, Gangaji, and Andrew Cohen; I've also received teachings from and practiced in the Native American traditions (Lakota shaman Melvin Grey Bear, and Cree Pipe-Carrier Phil L'Hirondelle), and so on. All of these teaching-relationships showed me a part of my own actual nature, in a way that was an effective counterbalance to all the years of intellectual study and meditative inquiry.

A key issue I'd like to explore here is that of embodiment, as it pertains to the Enlightenment process. I have "passed through" several kenshos spanning about twenty years of meditation practice, and a profound deepening that occurred about two years ago, in which I recognized, while sitting on a park bench, how my actual nature is *always already present*. This was not some parroting of non-dual principles as served up in the mish-mash of the modern non-dual marketplace; it was an actual opening in consciousness where I came to deeply and tacitly recognize the fundamental "emptiness" of the self. It was a stabilized condition for me for perhaps six months...after which certain mental patterns began to resurface. I am not completely finished with emotion yet and nor have I "gone beyond" sexual desire.

In terms of "moving amongst urban humanity" part of my path was to experiment deeply with "left hand Tantra", that is, in specific to engage willfully in nearly all possible experiences of the flesh. I embraced sexual activity in a quasi-effort to be "fully conscious" while engaged in such activity, but in the end found it to be essentially impossible to maintain conscious clarity while moving through these levels of primal impulse.

So I abandoned left-hand Tantra and eventually moved toward the pure non-dual teachings of Advaita Vedanta, mostly as put forth by Ramana Maharshi, Nisargadatta Maharaj, Ramesh Balsekar, and a few others.

What caught my eye about this BBS was primarily the writings of David Quinn and a few others, as I detected that quality of clarity expressing from Being itself, as opposed to from mere intellectual learning. Genuinely awakened individuals always speak from their own direct experience...although as I said, I'm still in the process of evaluating what I read here.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/27/04 8:41 pm

 Philip Mistlberger

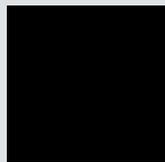

Registered User

Posts: 25

(2/27/04 8:16 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

NOx23 --

Quote:

---

I can see that you are still far too attached to even consider a rational discussion, it would be advisable if we let this matter drop.

---

"Attachment" was not the issue in my objection to your comments. It was clear to me that your "analysis" of the situation was superficial, to the extent that it made a mockery of who Osho was. You must bear in mind that despite his failings, he still has about 500 books in print on spiritual teachings, including commentaries on the works of the greatest enlightened luminaries of the past (the books are transcriptions of lectures), any one of which you are welcome to read and evaluate for yourself. To my knowledge Jim Jones and Charles Manson have no spiritual books in print, nor any meditation techniques to their legacy. They were pathological maniacs, case closed. There is not the slightest shred of evidence putting Osho in their category. The crimes committed at the Osho ashram in Oregon were committed by a woman who was drugged half the time (this has been established beyond doubt), and half-crazed by her lust for power and need to dominate. The crimes committed by she and her cohorts have been legally established (in exhaustive fashion) to have been accomplished independently on their part and with no direction at all from Osho. I can point you toward books, documents, etc., that address all this as it was played out and processed in the Oregon courts in 1985-86.

That does not imply that I think Osho was some paragon of moral perfection. Clearly, he was not. But we have to keep things in perspective if we really want to understand that whole drama as it played out. There is a big, complex context here. It can take weeks just to read all the available documents written by impartial investigators (and I've read most of them).

Also...another comment here. I've noticed, somewhere on this BBS, a remark from one of the founders here (I think it was Kevin Solway, though might have been Dan Rowden), calling someone "arrogant" for their criticisms of Otto Weininger. While this remark might be considered a sign of "attachment", it's also possible to view it as a form of *truth expressed with passion*. Every spiritual teacher I've been around worth their salt has been capable of passionate expression at one time or another.

You see, while I believe that I've lost my personal attachment to Osho as a guru (he's been dead for 14 years), I have not lost my gratitude for how his presence in my life helped me along my way. This gratitude keeps me from forgetting the bigger picture, which was important in light of the spectacular fashion in which our community exploded in 1985. But it never came at the cost of my ability to clearly study the situation, which I've done at length over the years.

Quote:

---

Interesting. How is this possible if your "me" had merged with the "other"?

---

We are attempting something very difficult here. We are trying (as you well know) to express with words, the inexpressible. During kensho, when with a teacher, there occurs a momentary "loss" of distinction between self and other, such that only "this" remains, or what Buddhism has sometimes called tathagata ("suchness"). It actually does not require a teacher, but for some reason often happens in the context of the apparent duality of teacher-student... and when this Oneness is tacitly realized, there is no more teacher, and no more student.

Those are not words I've gleaned from some Oriental text, but rather what I experienced...I can say, "I experienced" because this is only a term of convenience utilizing words to convey something fundamentally ineffable. This "I" is a convenience, not much more, and when "I" communicate my realization to you, I utilize these conveniences.

For example, it's often casually said that enlightenment is going beyond "identification"....and yet, Buddha (or whoever) clearly retained some degree of identification with their bodies such that when addressed by name, they could *respond*. Similarly, we can use "I" when describing essential spiritual realizations that involve transcendence of duality.

Quote:

---

So is that supposed to be an indication of a greater understanding or comprehension and why did you have to go so far, couldn't you figure it out at home, on your own?

---

I see it as a demonstration of sincerity of intent. I think that to "figure things out" on one's own carries great merit, but it can also be the domain of the mere egotist, or the person afraid of relationship (most particularly, spiritual relationship).

But if you are drawn to a place of learning and awakened interaction (for example, this BBS), then clearly you are not just "figuring things out on your own". You are interacting in a *dokusan*-like format. (The Zen term for "dharma combat" that sharpens understanding...which is in a sense what we are doing here. It is realization in the context of interaction).

Quote:

---

Your words sound suspiciously like those of someone parroting or mimicking ideas he's heard that sound impressive to him.

Now you're projecting.

---

I teach, write, and speak from the place where I've directly realized. I happen to be intellectually acquainted with many teachings, but I only express the one's I've internalized.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 822
(2/27/04 8:58 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Philip: I was a student of the Gurdjieff teacher Edward Fanaberia, who was a student of John Bennett (himself a direct disciple of Gurdjieff); I spent seven years with Osho; I also trained under the Tibetan teacher Pema Chodron and the Korean Zen master Seung Sahn; I spent two years...

That is an impressive journey, Philip. You've been around! How old are you?

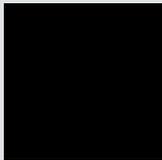

What caught my eye about this BBS was primarily the writings of David Quinn and a few others, as I detected that quality of clarity expressing from Being itself, as opposed to from mere intellectual learning.

This was my first impression too, when I stumbled across this Internet venue about five years ago (it wasn't called ezboard at the time). However, tis impression did not survive the first day of scrutiny. You are here for more than a week. Have you read any of the QRS materials? I am wondering, because in this case you should have noticed by now that their enlightenment claim is fake and that QRS have no spiritual message.

Of course, this place has its positive sides. You will meet many interesting minds and QRS are good at engaging people and drawing them into discourses and word games. They are smokescreen masters. I am not going to say anymore. Read their writings and judge for yourself.

Thomas

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 26
(2/28/04 8:27 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Hi Thomas.

Quote:

---

That is an impressive journey, Philip. You've been around! How old are you?

---

I'm 45. I began my "spiritual seeking" at a young age, in my late teens, so it's been close to 30 years.

Quote:

---

This was my first impression too, when I stumbled across this Internet venue about five years ago (it wasn't called ezboard at the time). However, tis impression did not survive the first day of scrutiny. You are here for more than a week. Have you read any of the QRS materials? I am wondering, because in this case you should have noticed by now that their enlightenment claim is fake and that QRS have no spiritual message.

---

I've read some, likely need to read more. Though I must comment, that for someone to have such a low opinion of these fellows you've sure stuck around for a long time! ;-)

I'll assume that in spite of your objections to what they teach, you (in your mind) have a soft spot for spiritual losers or something...kind of like Hawkeye and his treatment of corporal Klinger? (kidding)

Quote:

---

Of course, this place has its positive sides. You will meet many interesting minds and QRS are good at engaging people and drawing them into discourses and word games. They are smokescreen masters. I am not going to say anymore. Read their writings and judge for yourself.

---

How would you define a "smokescreen master"?

Agreed about one thing, the "interesting minds"...though my sense is that many here seem to have deep issues with relationship (on whatever level) and how it pertains to spiritual realization.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 306
(2/28/04 10:45 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

Hi Philip,

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

Yes, but it's interesting the forms that isolation can take in the modern context. I'd say that nowadays the best place to meditate is in a big city. One then has complete control over the nature of their interactions; they can simply meander in mental isolation (if they are sufficiently developed), or test themselves in various ways, and/or interact with people. Small towns tend to have a far firmer grasp on people, thus compromising their capacity for individuality. Complete isolation may have worth, but one must then return to civilisation if one intends to deepen one's attainment and teach.

-----

Well yes, this is what I'd mentioned in my first post to this thread (it was in the context of the Zen "ten oxherding" pictures, where the ninth stage represents a deep Kensho, or recognition of True Nature, and the tenth stage "returning to the marketplace").

In my time in the Gurdjieff Work, this was the primary emphasis...doing the "Work" in the context of typical, mundane, busy (generally urban) life.

Tilopa's "meditate in mountains and forests" exhortation I see more as symbolic of the need to be deeply committed to the Awakening process. "Solitude" I see as more of a demonstration of the *intention* to awaken, and of the importance of prioritizing enlightenment in one's life. It doesn't necessarily mean that one must literally remove oneself from society (although occasional retreats can be helpful).

---

Yes. Put simply, i suggest that people devote themselves to understanding the nature of reality, and then keep meditating on that understanding so that it fully infuses into their every thought/experience. The greater the devotion - in combination with all the other factors - the greater the progress. All other considerations are secondary to this.

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

My understanding (attainment) has come with help from enlightened teachers via the internet, which i think is a very interesting development. I have only had the merest of contact with another person that i judge to be enlightened, which didn't even reach the point of conversing (interestingly, i think it confused me just as much as it helped me understand enlightened behaviour).

-----

Internet *darshans* (interaction with awakened people in cyberspace) are a new and interesting development. I've seen much evidence of "awakened clarity" on this message board, although I'm still in the process of evaluating.

---

It'll be interesting to see how your opinions develop. Given that you haven't claimed to understand the nature of reality, your opinion of "Wisdom of the Infinite" will be most telling.

Quote:

---

I was a student of the Gurdjieff teacher Edward Fanaberia, who was a student of John Bennett (himself a direct disciple of Gurdjieff); I spent seven years with Osho; I also trained under the Tibetan teacher Pema Chodron and the Korean Zen master Seung Sahn; I spent two years in a Gnostic community training under several teachers; I was given ritual empowerment by the Tibetan Buddhist lamas Zasep Tulku Rinpoche and Lama Sonam Tsogyal Rinpoche; I've sat with several non-dual (Advaita, for the most part) satsang teachers, such as Hanuman, John deRuiter, Adyashanti, Gangaji, and Andrew Cohen; I've also received teachings from and practiced in the Native American traditions (Lakota shaman Melvin Grey Bear, and Cree Pipe-Carrier Phil L'Hirondelle), and so on. All of these teaching-relationships showed me a part of my own actual nature, in a way that was an effective counterbalance to all the years of intellectual study and meditative inquiry.

---

Thanks for writing this, but at the moment most of it doesn't mean much to me, my background knowledge in the spiritual 'movement' as such is quite limited compared to your own. It will mean more to others though. The names you mention seem to be of people that charge for their services and have a message suited to relatively mainstream people, which i cannot help but think isn't the truth. Is Andrew Cohen the editor of that new-age magazine called "Enlightenment"? I read the editors section of that magazine once and it was completely empty of wisdom, it was just waffle.

Quote:

---

A key issue I'd like to explore here is that of embodiment, as it pertains to the Enlightenment process. I have "passed through" several kenshos spanning about twenty years of meditation practice, and a profound deepening that occurred about two years ago, in which I recognized, while sitting on a park bench, how my actual nature is *always already present*. This was not some parroting of non-dual principles as served up in the mish-mash of the modern non-dual marketplace; it was an actual opening in consciousness where I came to deeply and tacitly recognize the fundamental "emptiness" of the self. It was a stabilized condition for me for perhaps six months...after which certain mental patterns began to resurface. I am not completely finished with emotion yet and nor have I "gone beyond" sexual desire.

---

I think your understanding needs work, i suggest you read David's book for starters. When you meditate, do you work through your understanding (ie. contemplative meditation)?

Quote:

---

In terms of "moving amongst urban humanity" part of my path was to experiment deeply with "left hand Tantra", that is, in specific to engage willfully in nearly all possible experiences of the flesh. I embraced sexual activity in a quasi-effort to be "fully conscious" while engaged in such activity, but in the end found it to be essentially impossible to maintain conscious clarity while moving through these levels of primal impulse.

---

I've done the same, but i only needed to do it in a very limited sense. It's certainly a better approach than suppression. Once one can maintain full consciousness during sex, it quickly becomes a chore, but i don't think it's necessary to achieve that. What you did should be enough in that area.

Quote:

---

So I abandoned left-hand Tantra and eventually moved toward the pure non-dual teachings of Advaita Vedanta, mostly as put forth by Ramana Maharshi, Nisargadatta Maharaj, Ramesh Balsekar, and a few others.

What caught my eye about this BBS was primarily the writings of David Quinn and a few others, as I detected that quality of clarity expressing from Being itself, as opposed to from mere intellectual learning. Genuinely awakened individuals always speak from their own direct experience...although as I said, I'm still in the process of evaluating what I read here.

---

Most people miss it entirely, or just don't allow themselves to acknowledge it.

Rhett Hamilton

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1430

(2/28/04 11:15 am)

Reply

satsang

---

Phillip, you are a very interesting man. Just when I am trying to leave this forum, I find this thread.

I've been pondering the nature of men and women for a long time, and especially since coming to this forum and finding the female nature under severe attack...

My thoughts have been leaning more and more to the idea that men and women are sort of mirror opposites of each other, and that women indeed may have a different path to truth.

I wish I had it worked out better, but I don't. It seems to me as I continue in my own various searches, that humanity has fallen into a terrible predicament called civilization, and that this has progressed inexorably these past 2, 3, 4,000 or more years (it varies upon locale) and that the rise of what you have called twisted or perverse masculinity and the suppression of true femininity, has been part of that picture.

All of this I find very distressing, especially the works of Derrick Jensen. I say this by way of promoting the idea that misogyny rises almost simultaneously with other civilization, and goes back so deep it is hard to see how it begins. Most of the religions we are talking about are the result of the misery of civilization, although of course they have some deep wisdom to impart.

So the problem is that whatever women's spiritual gifts and strengths are, they have been ignored, slighted, suppressed to the point that we don't know what they are anymore. Women follow after men's religions, although the paths are generally paths set up by and for men, not women. I am glad to hear that India has more of a vital strain of women's spirituality than I knew. You do see that the strains are always ancient, which means that women and their spirituality are steadily being eroded over time.

I can see where a path of love and devotion might be more suited to women, but yet I am highly skeptical of women being devoted to gurus. Then too, I saw an interview, (I think with Cohen) in which some Indian guy insisted that women need no spiritual life or path other than perfectly serving their husband as a way to realization. How convenient, I thought.

Certainly, love and reason should both be fostered. The goal of love is to love unconditionally and equally. I do not, however, agree with QRS that love can not be at all personal. It seems to me that we are living a paradox - one in which Reality is both One and individualized. The One experiences itself by individualizing and appearing as forms. Those forms may be temporary and not eternal, yet they are real at the moment that they exist. I disagree with QRS that they are not real, yet in a way they are right. Paradoxes everywhere.

I don't see that it is possible to have true, universal love that is not simultaneously personal and nurturing. It's sort of like when Jesus said, "As ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." He is not talking about indifference, which is the opposite of love.

I have a problem with the Shiva/Shakti metaphor. It seems to me that the female represents the unmanifest, and the male represents the manifest. Albeit that things become manifest through the female. I need to think more on this. These are mystical intuitions, anyway.

Also, I think for serious women, wisdom cannot come second to their love, because to love properly, to be of use to those one loves, wisdom is needed.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 469
(2/28/04 11:36 am)
Reply

R. Hamilton

---

Quote:

---

Most people miss it entirely, or just don't allow themselves to acknowledge it.

---

No no, Rhett, just a few people.
You belong to them.
It's a pity you cannot see that yourself.
Oh boy.
Meaning you.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2226
(2/28/04 12:27 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang

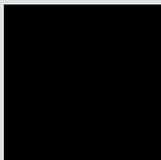

Philip wrote:

Quote:

I'm 45.

What are you doing with yourself nowadays? Are you still being a "transpersonal counsellor"? (I hope I got the label right!) Are you currently in a relationship with a new guru? Are you married?

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 27
(2/28/04 6:01 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

Rhett --

Quote:

Thanks for writing this, but at the moment most of it doesn't mean much to me, my background knowledge in the spiritual 'movement' as such is quite limited compared to your own. It will mean more to others though. The names you mention seem to be of people that charge for their services and have a message suited to relatively mainstream people, which i cannot help but think isn't the truth.

The teachers I mentioned charge only nominal fees for their teachings that merely cover expenses. For example, to attend the public talk of a Buddhist teacher might be a $5 fee, or $7, or $10-15 for an Advaita satsang meeting. (This is a far cry from the hundreds of dollars in fees involved in large "transformational weekend seminars", for example). Some Tibetan Buddhist "empowerments" will have only a donation bowl left out. And retreats, such as Zen sesshins or a Zen rohatsu retreat, will not normally cost anything in Japan, where the culture supports the existence of the Zen monastery via donations, tithings, the yielding of alms, and so forth. In the West, a traditional Zen retreat will usually involve a fee that covers lodging, food, etc., simply because Western culture does not typically support (financially) the existence of Buddhist monasteries or retreat centers.

Native Indian shamans will not generally charge but on occasion will ask for a small fee for participation in a Sweat Lodge (often $15-25), most of which goes to the landowner on which their Sweat Lodge takes place. Medicine Wheel or Yuwipi ceremonies generally are no charge, but you require an invite to be admitted to the ceremony.

The other expense of course is in the purchase of books, audio tapes, etc. (Videos of enlightened teachers can also be powerful, but usually cost more). Much can be gotten off the Net nowadays, or from a good library, but many of the more modern teachers are only accessible via their written works.

Quote:

---

Is Andrew Cohen the editor of that new-age magazine called "Enlightenment"? I read the editors section of that magazine once and it was completely empty of wisdom, it was just waffle.

---

Cohen's magazine is a bit all over the map; on occasion he features some really interesting stuff with some very good teachers, however he also often drifts into softer, fuzzier stuff. Generally he stays away from New Age teachings. He is fundamentally concerned with enlightenment. I recommend his books "Autobiography of an Awakening", and "Freedom Has No History". His writing style is clear and straightforward and he is also extremely honest in terms of how he exposes his own mind and uses it as an open laboratory for the awakening process. He claims to have been enlightened in the late 1980s while with his guru Harilal Poonja, but then later on he claims that his guru was a liar and a deceiver. So how he got "enlightened" with an (according to him) unenlightened teacher -- or, as he would say it, a powerful teacher who had deep Kenshos but who retained many impure character tendencies -- remains interesting and part of his mystique. (He has a large following around the world).

Quote:

---

I think your understanding needs work,

---

Almost all of our understandings "need work"... ;-)

Quote:

---

i suggest you read David's book for starters. When you meditate, do you work through your understanding (ie. contemplative meditation)?

---

I have used many "methods" over the years, but beginning about two years ago, I settled on a process that was much more akin to "no method". I've studied most significant Eastern scriptures and felt no more need to analyze on a conceptual level. I'd "found the key", so to speak, and now only needed to use it. The past two years have been about applying it on a daily basis (i.e. "integrating").

As for David Q's book, the sections I've read so far "check out" for me as basically valid. I am currently suspending judgment about the "gender issues" and "Weininger" angle until I evaluate more. But thus far I tend to see those issues as irrelevant to the bottom line of recognizing the nature of Reality, not to mention, inflammatory in a way that seems to endlessly confuse the purity of the bottom line message. But, such issues, while not relevant to the bottom line, are indeed relevant to the *process* of awakening, and how it applies to *relationship* on all levels -- especially the *koan* inquiry, "Who is the Other?", or "Avoiding Relationship?" (not in a merely personal sense, but in the sense of relationship with the Whole...participation in the structure of life, the 10th Oxherding Zen picture).

Quote:

---

I've done the same, but i only needed to do it in a very limited sense. It's certainly a better approach than suppression. Once one can maintain full consciousness during sex, it quickly becomes a chore, but i don't think it's necessary to achieve that. What you did should be enough in that area.

---

When you say that you only needed to do it in a "limited sense", are you implying that you experience no more sexual desire? My intuitive sense is that you are a male under 40, so that would be significant. True bramacharya (transformation of sexual energy) is very rare. Most celibate monks are simply going through the motions, and many are running from relationship, and probably masturbating as much as they pray or meditate. ;-)

Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 28

(2/28/04 6:50 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: satsang

Hi BirdofHermes (nice handle) --

Quote:

---

Phillip, you are a very interesting man. Just when I am trying to leave this forum, I find this thread.

I've been pondering the nature of men and women for a long time, and especially since coming to this forum and finding the female nature under severe attack...

My thoughts have been leaning more and more to the idea that men and women are sort of mirror opposites of each other, and that women indeed may have a different path to truth.

---

That is the traditional Tantric view...although with the corollary that "male-female" is finally an internal dynamic.

I agree with much of the Gnostic view that there is something fundamentally flawed about this universe, and that part of that is reflected in the weird (though obvious) limitations of the human being. We have fallible physical forms (weak spinal structure, vestigial internal organs, abnormally short life spans, etc.), and moreover, we exist in dualistic forms (male-female). What for? Why is our morphology not hermaphroditic? And so on.

Such questions become pertinent when viewed from the angle of the "deeper purpose" of human existence, and what we are doing (apparently) incarnate in these forms. The Gnostic idea is that this entire universe is flawed because it was born out of one *mistaken seed desire*, the need to establish special identity (a theme I've tried to play with in my "Satan and the Shrink" spoof over on TPG, where Satan makes reference to the fundamentally Luciferian nature of the entire universe). The Gnostic idea is that a "stray spirit" created all of existence (usually called "Ialdobaath", or "Lucifer" in the orthodox tradition), and that spirits caught in this flawed universe must make their way back the unspeakable Source (called the "Pleroma") via Christ (symbolic of enlightened consciousness).

Now interestingly, in Gnostic thought the root behind Ialdobaath's arrogance is Sophia, the female essence of Wisdom, who originates the entire separation from God via her desire to know God in a way that cannot be known, that is, via *power* -- Sophie wants to create like God does, and from there, Lucifer is born, who then proceeds to do his thing, that is, creates this entire universe to serve Sophia's urge to emulate God's creative power. But the universe remains flawed (if still exquisite), because Lucifer and Sophia are both exquisite but flawed. They must be, because they are one step removed from pure Truth.

This is a powerful metaphor for what happens to feminine essence (Sophia) when it tries to *become that which it is not*, i.e., disenfranchises itself from its true nature. So in that regard, yes, I agree that there is a specific feminine approach to Truth that must be found out internally for women, rather than merely trying to emulate men, or endlessly trying to win their approval, something like Sophia trying to create the universe and get it just right so as to win God's approval. (BTW, I think the reverse is equally true, many men spend their lives trying to win the approval of women, centering their existence around women, mostly because they are alienated from their own core masculine spirituality).

Quote:

---

I wish I had it worked out better, but I don't. It seems to me as I continue in my own various searches, that humanity has fallen into a terrible predicament called civilization, and that this has progressed inexorably these past 2, 3, 4,000 or more years (it varies upon locale) and that the rise of what you have called twisted or perverse masculinity and the suppression of true femininity, has been part of that picture.

---

Agreed. One has only to study the European Inquisition to see this in detail. But the roots are deep, and based on vested interests related to controlling the body and bodily impulses (including sexual energy). The "Devil" is really just a big symbol of repressed male sexual energy (being a distorted form of the Celtic "Horned God" Cernunnos, the virile "lord of animals" who represents pure male physical energy unfettered and uncontained by societal or religious impulse control). These "controls" were originally necessary as part of the restraints needed for the development of civilization, but they soon acquired a life of their own, and began to work deeply in the unconscious mind of both men and women, but especially amongst the male religious clergy -- men who wielded great power during the Dark Ages and after.

Quote:

---

So the problem is that whatever women's spiritual gifts and strengths are, they have been ignored, slighted, suppressed to the point that we don't know what they are anymore. Women follow after men's religions, although the paths are generally paths set up by and for men, not women. I am glad to hear that India has more of a vital strain of women's spirituality than I knew. You do see that the strains are always ancient, which means that women and their spirituality are steadily being eroded over time.

---

India is really the only major matriarchal nation on Earth, despite the fact that women are still abused in segments of their society. But in India, the responsibility is centrally toward the nuclear family, the head of whom is really the woman. A lot of this influence is seen in the history of India, which has rarely conquered other nations, but herself has been conquered and "violated" many times. Even the English occupation of close to two centuries was passively tolerated for a long time prior to the non-violent resistance of Gandhi (which, alas, turned out to be violent anyway). But India boasts many famous female saints and modern "gurus".

Quote:

---

I can see where a path of love and devotion might be more suited to women, but yet I am highly skeptical of women being devoted to gurus. Then too, I saw an interview, (I think with Cohen) in which some Indian guy insisted that women need no spiritual life or path other than perfectly serving their husband as a way to realiation. How convenient, I thought.

---

Yes, that's only a small part of the story. In Indian Tantra, for example, they regard the woman as vitally important. The *reason why* so many male gurus have female disciples is (according to Tantra) because the female force or energy is actually much more powerful than the male force. A man needs female energy to get "high enough" in order to Realize, but once both a man and woman are "up there", the male is needed to *keep them both up there*. This is because the female has a very strong nesting (Earth) pull, and without the male force, tends to slip back down to Earth again (get caught up in distraction). But the male mind cannot "get motivated" without the female power (*Shakti*, which literally means "power" in Sansrit).

Quote:

---

Certainly, love and reason should both be fostered. The goal of love is to love unconditionally and equally. I do not, however, agree with QRS that love can not be at all personal. It seems to me that we are living a paradox - one in which Reality is both One and individualized. The One experiences itself by individualizing and appearing as forms. Those forms may be temporary and not eternal, yet they are real at the moment that they exist. I disagree with QRS that they are not real, yet in a way they are right. Paradoxes everywhere.

---

Have you studied much of Tantra? Especially the northern Indian traditions. You may find it quite interesting.

Quote:

---

Also, I think for serious women, wisdom cannot come second to their love, because to love properly, to be of use to those one loves, wisdom is needed.

---

I see your point. I think that in the end, Love and Wisdom are the same -- wisdom what we know when we know we are nothing, love what we know when we know we are everything. Nothing and Everything are finally both just concepts in the mind.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/28/04 6:55 pm

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 29
(2/28/04 7:11 pm)

Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

David --

Quote:

---

What are you doing with yourself nowadays? Are you still being a "transpersonal counsellor"? (I hope I got the label right!) Are you currently in a relationship with a new guru? Are you married?

---

Yes, I've been a transpersonal therapist in private practice since '87. I've not had a formal "guru" since '90, although have received teachings from (mostly) Tibetan lamas, and Advaita teachers, since that time. I've taught myself (in groups) since '93.

I never married, though have had numerous relationships with a number of women. Came close to marriage on four occasions, but always at the last moment my life changed course.

As far as my teaching work goes -- and this I regard as something of a joke (that is, I try to take this all with playful attitude) -- I somehow ended up on "Sarlo's Guru Ratings" website. This website is both ghastly and extremely funny (and, has some interesting and valid stuff on it).

I'm in the section entitled "mini-Advaita", I think, and am currently "unrated". There are, I understand, only about 1,200 of us select few on the planet (LOL). (I am there under my Sanskrit name "Teertha", which means "pilgrimage").

What about you David? Shall we get someone to recommend you for Sarlo's Guru Ratings Website? ;-)

Anyone else? Kevin? Thomas? Rhett? BirdofHermes? Any other gurus here? ;-)

Of course, Sarlo's entire site is a bit farcical as he himself admits to being unenlightened, but sees fit to rate everyone else. Many of his comments about gurus are extremely funny and many are negative. As for his rumor about me ("hey, I can do that!"), I actually asked one of my friends to find out from Sarlo where he got the rumor from about me, and he replied that he'd heard it from someone who'd known me "twelve years ago"... LOL.

Sarlo's website...

www.globalserve.net/~sarlo/Ratings.htm

And here's where I'm mentioned...look in the right hand column, for the name "Teertha"...

www.globalserve.net/~sarlo/RatingsN.htm

And here read Sarlo's rating of himself...and of Dr. Donald Schnell just below. Hilarious...

<http://www.globalserve.net/~sarlo/RatingsF.htm#sarlo>

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/29/04 12:45 am

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 310
(2/29/04 9:07 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

Philip,

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

---

I think your understanding needs work,

---

Almost all of our understandings "need work"... ;-)

---

How open to radical change do you think you are?

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

---

i suggest you read David's book for starters. When you meditate, do you work through your understanding (ie. contemplative meditation)?

---

I have used many "methods" over the years, but beginning about two years ago, I settled on a process that was much more akin to "no method". I've studied most significant Eastern scriptures and felt no more need to analyze on a conceptual level. I'd "found the key", so to speak, and now only needed to use it. The past two years have been about applying it on a daily basis (i.e. "integrating").

---

Unless your "key" is understanding (ie. conceptual), then you're merely trying to engender altered mind states, you're not entering or fostering enlightenment at all.

Quote:

---

As for David Q's book, the sections I've read so far "check out" for me as basically valid. I am currently suspending judgment about the "gender issues" and "Weininger" angle until I evaluate more. But thus far I tend to see those issues as irrelevant to the bottom line of recognizing the nature of Reality, not to mention, inflammatory in a way that seems to endlessly confuse the purity of the bottom line message. But, such issues, while not relevant to the bottom line, are indeed relevant to the **process** of awakening, and how it applies to **relationship** on all levels -- especially the **koan** inquiry, "Who is the Other?", or "Avoiding Relationship?" (not in a merely personal sense, but in the sense of relationship with the Whole...participation in the structure of life, the 10th Oxherding Zen picture).

---

Since the fettering of attachment is integral to enlightenment, those inflammations are necessary, and if there were none everyone would already be enlightened.

Quote:

---

I've done the same, but i only needed to do it in a very limited sense. It's certainly a better approach than suppression. Once one can maintain full consciousness during sex, it quickly becomes a chore, but i don't think it's necessary to achieve that. What you did should be enough in that area.

---

Quote:

---

When you say that you only needed to do it in a "limited sense", are you implying that you experience no more sexual desire? My intuitive sense is that you are a male under 40, so that would be significant. True bramacharya (transformation of sexual energy) is very rare. Most celibate monks are simply going through the motions, and many are running from relationship, and probably masturbating as much as they pray or meditate. ;-)

---

Yes, i imagine that most are. I am 29 years old. I have not experienced any sexual desire for several months and see no reason why that will not continue indefinitely, and i am well tested by the location in which i live, it is infused with semi-naked sunbathing models...! Their presence has actually helped me, in that i have had ample opportunity to test myself at will.

I have kept masturbating in order to avoid waking up in the middle of the night with wet sheets - "milking the cow" so to speak. I only do so as much as is required, and there is no pleasure in it. I can sometimes bring myself to ejaculate without using any sexual imagery at all, and this ability took quite some effort to achieve! However, since my attainment in this regard is so secure, i'm actually not too fussed about using female sexual imagery during the initial phase if needed (but i'll keep working on the former technique). However, i don't recommend that to others, it's a definite no no, and i can't make that point too clear. Imagination is too deadly to be played around with like that.

Rhett Hamilton

[edited, apostrophy removed]

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 2/29/04 9:55 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 764
(2/29/04 10:52 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Rhett, what a job you are. You say you're through with lusting, yet you feel the need to test yourself. If you were unattached to sexuality, you wouldn't test yourself. You also still masturbate. Stop that altogether if you're actually unattached to sexual desire. Don't turn this into a game of denial, drop sex if you're going to drop it!

MGregory
Posts: 442
(2/29/04 11:51 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Yeah, masturbation is sex no matter what type of things you think of. Quit masturbating for a month and then get one of those sunbathers to press her body up against yours without dropping the thought of God. Now that's what I call a koan!

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 30
(2/29/04 11:49 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

LOL.

What a bunch of wankers around here... ;-)

Rhett, if you are no longer interested in sex with women at 29 years old, then you are either an exceptional spiritual soul or...someone doing deep subconscious repression and headed for either increasing perversion, deepening resentment toward women (because they will remind you of your own attachments to your denied impulses), or a major spiritual meltdown (what Grof called "spiritual emergency") or possibly an eventual psychotic break, if your sexual energy backs up into the brain...a condition sometimes euphemistically referred to as "getting it up", LOL, although in this case it's the "kundalini" getting "up" to the head where it has no business being if you are anything less than strongly purified of all feelings of attachment to sexual identity. (See Gopi Krishna's book "Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man", for a detailed description of the horrors of premature kundalini awakening brought on by excessive spiritual ambition and sexual repression).

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 2/29/04 11:54 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 769
(3/1/04 2:29 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Seeing as how he goes to the Genius Forum, he is most likely a wreck.

MGregory

Posts: 445

(3/1/04 2:34 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Philip: someone doing deep subconscious repression and headed for either increasing perversion, deepening resentment toward women (because they will remind you of your own attachments to your denied impulses), or a major spiritual meltdown (what Grof called "spiritual emergency") or possibly an eventual psychotic break,

---

Yep, I concur. That's exactly what happens! Even the order of events is spot on! There's no either/or about it: perversion->resentment->meltdown->psychosis. Just stay away from women and you'll be okay. If you can avoid thinking of women (or men, or whatever) as sex objects then there's not much to worry about. If you ever find yourself wanting to be around a woman just to enjoy her company, then you should know that your mind is going down the sexual sinkhole and perversion is right around the corner.

Actually, I don't think what Rhett is doing is a bad idea. I certainly don't think getting a partner is a good solution, as that can waste a lot of time and energy. You don't want to dilute your sense of urgency in any way. I just think calling it "transcended sexuality" is going too far. I wouldn't even call it an attainment, but more of a temporary measure.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

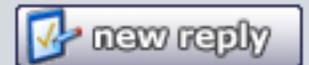

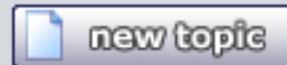

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 318(3/1/04 10:56 am)Reply  | Re: Satsang <hr/> Philip, Quote: <hr/> LOL. What a bunch of wankers around here... ;-) <hr/> Well, they certainly didn't develop a clear understanding of what i said, and most likely due to their personal issues with women. Quote: <hr/> Rhett, if you are no longer interested in sex with women at 29 years old, then you are either an exceptional spiritual soul <hr/> Yes. |

Quote:

---

or...someone doing deep subconscious repression and headed for either increasing perversion, deepening resentment toward women (because they will remind you of your own attachments to your denied impulses), or a major spiritual meltdown (what Grof called "spiritual emergency") or possibly an eventual psychotic break, if your sexual energy backs up into the brain...a condition sometimes euphemistically referred to as "getting it up", LOL, although in this case it's the "kundalini" getting "up" to the head where it has no business being if you are anything less than strongly purified of all feelings of attachment to sexual identity. (See Gopi Krishna's book "Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man", for a detailed description of the horrors of premature kundalini awakening brought on by excessive spiritual ambition and sexual repression).

---

No.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 779
(3/1/04 11:00 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Well, I guess we can all have our opinions about each other's spiritual progress.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 319

(3/1/04 11:11 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Actually, I don't think what Rhett is doing is a bad idea. I certainly don't think getting a partner is a good solution, as that can waste a lot of time and energy. You don't want to dilute your sense of urgency in any way. I just think calling it "transcended sexuality" is going too far. I wouldn't even call it an attainment, but more of a temporary measure.

---

Only through understanding Ultimate Reality can one permanently dissolve sexual desire.

That is the essence of what i have done.

Rhett Hamilton

MGregory

Posts: 451

(3/1/04 11:19 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Ok, if you say so. Who am I to argue?

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 321

(3/1/04 12:03 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Well, what more can i do than simply disagree if people are trying to tell me what's going on in my mind, that isn't?

I'm not going to argue about it am I? I know what's going on because i experience it (A=A).

Other people are quite free to question me, or make suggestions, or disagree with what i say, or whatever. As Voce says, they are free to have their own opinions.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 825

(3/1/04 1:24 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Philip: Though I must comment, that for someone to have such a low opinion of these fellows you've sure stuck around for a long time! ;-)

Occasionally that seems contradictory even to myself, but in reality there is no contradiction. My extended stay on this board can be explained simply by the dynamics of debate. Action and reaction. Debate is dialectic and in order to make it happen you need thesis and antithesis. I provide the antithesis. I am the resident critic, but being aware of it, I am trying to be fair at handing out. Hence, I concede that not all of the QRS philosophy is complete crap. Only 95 percent is. In fact, the last CWE analysis is now a few years back, and if I remember right the readings were around 5% CWE (crystal wisdom essence) which comes to a CTC ratio of 1:20 (CTC stands for crap-to-content).

Philip: How would you define a "smokescreen master"?

A smokescreen master is someone who is exceedingly good at raising smoke screens, a rhetorically gifted and trained individual using words to achieve an intended effect, in particular the alteration of believe structures of the audience. He/she does this by raising doubt about established value systems. Many people with a talent in this field become demagogues and politicians; some become philosophers and gurus. The word "smoke screen" implies that the chief methodolgy is confusion and deconstruction rather than clarification and illumination.

Philip: Agreed about one thing, the "interesting minds"...though my sense is that many here seem to have deep issues with relationship (on whatever level) and how it pertains to spiritual realization.

A correct observation. Seems you have some talent.

Anyone else? Kevin? Thomas? Rhett? BirdofHermes? Any other gurus here? ;-)

In the past I have made a case for the idea of purity. I want to liberate humanity from headaches and hangovers, therefore my teaching centers around the consumption of spiritually unobjectionable ales, such as "Weihenstephaner", "Paulaner", and "Früh Kölsch". This are fine beers made from only the purest hop, wheat, and water. Unfortunately, humanity keeps indulging in heretic beers with nasty karmic aftereffects, so the teaching is not yet universally followed.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2240

(3/1/04 3:34 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Philip: Agreed about one thing, the "interesting minds"... though my sense is that many here seem to have deep issues with relationship (on whatever level) and how it pertains to spiritual realization.

Thomas: A correct observation. Seems you have some talent.

---

He might have some talent, but I'm not sure this is an expression of it. Anyone who is not a fully-enlightened Buddha will necessarily have issues with emotional relationships "on some level". Unless, of course, one is spiritually dead, in which case harmonious relations with other people are possible.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1439

(3/2/04 2:43 pm)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Unless, of course, one is spiritually dead, in which case harmonious relations with other people are possible.

---

Oh. My case is a good deal worse than I thought, then.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 330

(3/4/04 9:36 am)

Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Hi Philip,

It seems that i let your ego off the hook with my last email to you, i let you categorise me into a position from which i threaten you less. Well, let's stay at it, heh?

Here is an extract from "Poison for the Heart" that might interest you.

The barrier

Philosophers and theologians have a remarkable command of the English language. They can articulate on subjects of extreme complexity and difficulty with ease. But this is not surprising, given the degree to which they have devoted their lives to the enterprise. Indeed they need to devote their lives without reserve if they are to avoid a confrontation with the absolute.

Their rationality has placed them in the proximity of truth; now they do all they can to avoid it by taking their knowledge to an extreme. They become experts at hedging around the truth and procrastination. They cannot see the wood for the trees; but this is exactly the way they want it - so they have taken it upon themselves to plant countless forests of trees, trees with all manner of impressive and difficult names - as a safeguard. You see, proximity to truth is not to be confused with closeness, for if you are even a hairsbreadth away, you are a million miles.

It is as though these scholars journeyed to the end of the earth, and on encountering the Void, a barrier they cannot pass, they decided to set up camp. Shortly, the camps became many, and eventually grew into vast and complex cities. Consequently these scholars are experts on the small patch of terrain, there at the end of the earth, but have never ventured beyond it - into the Infinite.

If they meet a true man of the void, they speak enthusiastically to him of their world and lives, but he finds it difficult to follow their speech, for he only glanced their world in passing.

Kevin Solway

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 487
(3/4/04 11:15 am)
Reply

Rhett H.

---

Quote:

---

It seems that i let your ego off the hook with my last email to you, i let you categorise me into a position from which i threaten you less. Well, let's stay at it, heh?

---

I can only speak for myself, of course, but I stick to my full conviction that Rhett Hamilton is not only a dummy, but also an arrogant freak who must've survived at least 37 lobotomies.

(They forgot the final one, that's clear too.)

I cannot help it, but that creature has nothing of a human being. Not to me. He's the Moron.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 792
(3/4/04 1:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

I like your poetry, Paul.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 844
(3/4/04 2:36 pm)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

Quite right, Paul. It is impossible to come any other conclusion about QRS disciples and sycophants.

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1442
(3/4/04 2:41 pm)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

Thomas, have you seen the two new ladies? Aren't they something!

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2514
(3/4/04 3:21 pm)
Reply

----

---

Sue Hindmarsh and Kellyven? They're not followers of Quinn, but lovers!

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1443
(3/4/04 3:31 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I believe they are Rhett's disciples. Quite a find.

Kellyven
Posts: 41
(3/4/04 6:35 pm)
Reply

cliques

---

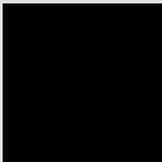

Anna and Suergaz,

I perhaps can understand why you form attachments in this way, setting up alliances and enemies. There is little comfort in true knowledge or security in wisdom.

Nor is there any comfort except complacency in friends. I had not entered this forum with the intention of challenging others, only myself. I know i have much work to do, so i welcome criticism.

Even this stance seems to confront others. If you can offer criticism, at least be honest and think about what you are earning by attacking me. Be your own enemy and challenge yourself as well.

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 32
(3/4/04 9:48 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Hi Rhett --

Quote:

---

It seems that i let your ego off the hook with my last email to you,

---

I'll assume you mean "post", as I've not received any email from you.

Quote:

---

i let you categorise me into a position from which i threaten you less. Well, let's stay at it, heh?

---

Well, I don't feel "threatened" by you. It's been a long time since I've felt "threatened" by anyone, to be honest. Perhaps it's one of the occupational hazards of being a therapist. ;-)

Anyway, I was not "categorizing" you. I was speculating on possible consequences or indications related to your decision to abstain from sexual relations with women.

But, I do have some questions for you -- what do you see as your deepest motivation for attaining enlightenment? Why do you want to be enlightened? Are you moving toward Realization or are you fleeing from the pain of relationship? Are you embracing true spiritual masculinity, or are you fleeing from the engulfing horrors of the vagina? Which would you say is stronger, the sense of moving toward something, or the sense of moving away from something?

Quote:

---

Here is an extract from "Poison for the Heart" that might interest you.

---

It's an interesting piece of writing indeed. Why have you posted it?

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2516

(3/4/04 10:39 pm)

Reply

---

---

Kellyven, I have not attacked you! I am only teasing! I know you're not lovers with David Quinn, and I apologize for saying you're Rhet's girlfriend before when you're not. But then..your thinking me attacking you is a sort of attack! What are you thinking?!

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1444
(3/5/04 1:42 am)
Reply

Re: cliques

---

Quote:

---

There is little comfort in true knowledge or security in wisdom.

---

Why, I couldn't disagree more.

I don't wish to attack or even provide constructive criticism. I just want to watch.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 488
(3/5/04 7:47 am)
Reply

Re: cliques

---

Dear Birdofhermes,

That's the (J.) Krishnamurti approach, as you will know.

I hate you.
You're a mystic.

:-)

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

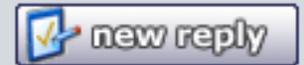

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2256(3/5/04 7:49 am)Reply  | Re: Rhett H. <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> Quite right, Paul. It is impossible to come any other conclusion about QRS disciples and sycophants <hr/> All sycophants are morons, by definition. Even the sycophants who bow down mindlessly to what is conventional and popular in their society are morons, although they can certainly hide it better. Rhett and Kelly are exploring ideas and are open to change. They have not yet settled into a particular sycophantic position, unlike your good self. I would rate you the biggest sycophant on this forum by a long shot. |

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 333
(3/5/04 9:22 am)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

How many people have the strength to adopt the truth, even when it means falling, to a certain extent, into someone else's shadow?

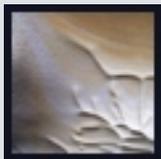

Most people have far too much ego to make this step, and since the Truth is an absolute - it can't be tailored for the individual. It's fixed. In this regard, one needs to "copy" all the great men of the past.

This is what people who bitch about syncophants and disciples are on about, their desperate need and struggle for individuality. They are scared by seeing someone value another's ideas so highly because it reflects on their own insecurities.

Actually, I have little concern in doing this, such is the strength of my individuality. From the age of 17/18 (when I fully moved out of my father's shadow) till recently, I hadn't even come close to finding someone to whom their understanding beacons. I could even say that it's a welcome relief, but it's too challenging (and rewarding) for that, it's no sugar-coated luxury zone.

Rhett Hamilton

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 334
(3/5/04 9:47 am)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

Quote:

---

I can only speak for myself, of course, but I stick to my full conviction that Rhett Hamilton is not only a dummy, but also an arrogant freak who must've survived at least 37 lobotomies.

(They forgot the final one, that's clear too.)

I cannot help it, but that creature has nothing of a human being. Not to me. He's the Moron.

---

Well, good for you Paul, I'm glad you're expressing something that at least some people here can identify with.

As for myself, my consciousness has been so heightened over my life (especially during the last 12 years), that i've had plenty enough of "human values" (egotism) to last me a lifetime. I consider my ego to be about 118 years old. That's a lot of rebirths and deaths, samsara on steroids.

So yes, i agree with you, i have swung rather heavily to the opposite side, not only because it's a far more truthful form of existence, but because i need to heal. Enlightenment is like coming home to me, i'm returning to the masculine essence of my character that was born in my early years, and which i struggled to reside in due to societies irrational impositions.

I've had a life of beating my head against other peoples femininity and emotionalism, so it's surprising that i still try to help people at all. But really, it's quite natural for me, because what else is there to do when anything one tries to do is so thoroughly compromised by others limitations? Basically, i reached a point where my problems in life were purely the creation of others ignorance, and my life could go nowhere and mean nothing to me in it's presence.

I'm both pushed to value - and drawn to value - the Truth which i so value.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 796
(3/5/04 10:17 am)
Reply

...

---

Wow you sound deluded.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 335
(3/5/04 10:44 am)
Reply

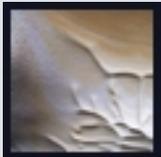

Re: Satsang

Quote:

Quote:

-----
It seems that i let your ego off the hook with my last email to you,
-----

I'll assume you mean "post", as I've not received any email from you.

Yes.

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
i let you categorise me into a position from which i threaten you less. Well, let's stay at it, heh?
-----

Well, I don't feel "threatened" by you. It's been a long time since I've felt "threatened" by anyone, to be honest. Perhaps it's one of the occupational hazards of being a therapist. ;-)

Anyway, I was not "categorizing" you. I was speculating on possible consequences or indications related to your decision to abstain from sexual relations with women.

But, I do have some questions for you -- what do you see as your deepest motivation for attaining enlightenment? Why do you want to be enlightened? Are you moving toward Realization or are you fleeing from the pain of relationship? Are you embracing true spiritual masculinity, or are you fleeing from the engulfing horrors of the vagina? Which would you say is stronger, the sense of moving toward something, or the sense of moving away from something?

---

In recent past, the elimination of suffering was the greatest motivation, but the desire for Truth ran a pretty close second. My consciousness had grown to a point where my ignorance was causing an immense degree of suffering. Relationships were painful for me because, quite simply, they're based on stupidity (attachment), and because people are so incredibly irrational - it was like beating my head against a brick wall.

I am "realised/realising", God wouldn't leave my side in a serious way even if i kneed him in the testes, but i have a lot of scope for refinement.

I mention most of the things i do here mainly for the benefit of others, i no longer need to discuss them because they're not great issues to me. When i say that i am quite indifferent to women, i am.

People will always project any number of egotistical motivations on people that talk about themselves, but i continue to do so because i think it is an integral component of good "teaching". If i always talked in the third person it would be limiting and not as effective, and people will naturally want to know about me anyway.

My sense is well and truly of refining what i already know. One could say that i have a sense of "moving towards" truthful thoughts and "moving away" from false one's, but since i no longer use the ego construct in regards to this transition there isn't really a perception of shift.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

Here is an extract from "Poison for the Heart" that might interest you.

---

It's an interesting piece of writing indeed. Why have you posted it?

---

I think you hide your remaining ego behind a bookish persona. You've mentioned numerous things here that indicate to me that you have a diluted understanding of enlightenment, and you haven't said anything that really cuts to the core of the Truth yet, so i'll not pay much regard to your understanding of it at this point.

I think your feathers may need a bit of ruffling before you can derive benefit from QRS wisdom, and I think it's important that i convey that. It's no good if it's water off a ducks back.

Rhett Hamilton

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 489
(3/5/04 11:05 am)
Reply

Oh!

---

May I give you some handy advice, Sir Rhetty boy?
You always sign off with your full (fool) name.
That is not necessary, because that name is already clearly visible, just at the left of the beginning of your useless messages.

Thanks.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1446
(3/5/04 11:22 am)
Reply

Re: cliques

---

Quote:

---

I hate you.
You're a mystic.

---

If you are so attracted to mysticism, then you are one.

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 33
(3/5/04 4:34 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

---

Rhett --

Quote:

---

PM:It's an interesting piece of writing indeed. Why have you posted it?

RH:I think you hide your remaining ego behind a bookish persona. You've mentioned numerous things here that indicate to me that you have a diluted understanding of enlightenment, and you haven't said anything that really cuts to the core of the Truth yet, so i'll not pay much regard to your understanding of it at this point.

---

I see. You failed to answer my question directly, but instead respond with a series of sudden proclamations about who I am. Ah well. I guess I can indulge in same...

Anyway, from what I gather -- what you appear to be saying obtusely -- is that you posted the Solway piece as a way to comment on me while hiding behind someone else's words.

There's a term for that. It's called "innuendo", and it's a distinctly feminized trait. Also surprisingly timid, as you apparently lacked trust enough in your own words to say something directly to me.

But even more interesting is that not only did you fail to address me directly, when asked what the purpose was of posting the piece, you failed to answer directly again. So for someone who claims some level of "understanding" you are demonstrating dubious communication skills and evident fear/hesitation about being direct.

Quote:

---

I think your feathers may need a bit of ruffling before you can derive benefit from QRS wisdom, and I think it's important that I convey that. It's no good if it's water off a ducks back.

---

Feathers get ruffled all the time. That's not the same thing as being "threatened". The wind can blow my feathers - as can a nearby fart. But neither will make me fear I will lose my feathers.

Anyway, what I see with you Rhett, is a generally sincere but wounded and somewhat immature young man who is at times confusing his spiritual ambitions and intellectual sharings with simple territorialism likely deriving from repressed sexual energy. I was the "new guy on the block", who was pissing on a tree in your neighbourhood (no one's tree, I might add, just doing my thing) and you decided to take a sniff and piss on the same tree. I don't see much more going on beyond that.

Although, it could be a beginning. After all, much can be learned from watching dogs...and wolves...such as social heirarchy, for one thing. It's common for people who have established a certain "comfort zone" position in any sort of community to resist "newcomers" -- either passively by demonstrating zero curiosity in who they are or what they've gleaned from their life journey, or actively, by seeking out angles in which to undermine them so that they do not become a threat to the status quo, or your "position" in the social heirarchy.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 3/5/04 4:35 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 848
(3/5/04 6:15 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

David: I would rate you the biggest sycophant on this forum by a long shot.

Hm, that is somewhat perplexing since I can't remember having engaged in any bootlicking and my views generally seem to run contrary to the mainstream on this forum.

Whatever, please consider my sycophantism a public service. Someone's got to do it - in the interest of truth. Exposing your logical fallacies, refuting your arguments, and debunking the crap you you write is quite necessary. Not everyone who visits here is trained well enough in philosophy to see through it.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 99
(3/5/04 6:21 pm)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Thomas

Quote:

---

Hm, that is somewhat perplexing since I can't remember having engaged in any bootlicking and my views generally seem to run contrary to the mainstream on this forum.

---

I guess he is referring to what he accuses you of in respect of sticking to Buddhist scripture edit(or modern science), whatever - your continued presence here is welcome.

John

Edited by: John at: 3/5/04 6:46 pm

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 76
(3/6/04 12:43 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Not everyone who visits here is trained well enough in philosophy to see through it.

---

I have appreciated your last posts, (haha the ones I understand anyway).

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1451
(3/6/04 12:54 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Thomas is the guardian angel of Genius Forum.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 798
(3/6/04 3:30 am)
Reply

..

---

I do appreciate Thomas being here. Thanks Thomas.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2258
(3/6/04 6:38 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: I would rate you the biggest sycophant on this forum by a long shot.

Thomas: Hm, that is somewhat perplexing since I can't remember having engaged in any bootlicking and my views generally seem to run contrary to the mainstream on this forum.

---

That is because this forum is anti-mainstream, and you're mainstream. So it is no surprise that your views run counter to what is generally expressed here - at least by a few of us.

There is not one point of view which you hold that is not thoroughly mainstream and conventional and held by many millions of others. You are a sycophant through and through.

Quote:

---

Whatever, please consider my sycophantism a public service. Someone's got to do it - in the interest of truth. Exposing your logical fallacies, refuting your arguments, and debunking the crap you write is quite necessary.

---

What kind of dreamworld are you living in? Nearly everyone who comes onto this forum is in opposition to "QRS" views. You're nothing special in that regard.

Quote:

---

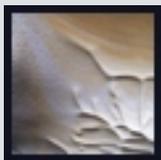

Not everyone who visits here is trained well enough in philosophy to see through it.

---

While I respect your education, I have no respect for you at all as a thinker. You don't have the capacity to think for yourself, and it is evident that you cannot stand seeing it in others.

That is why you always start abusing those people, such as Kelly, who are attempting to think for themselves.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 337
(3/6/04 11:39 am)
Reply

Re: Satsang

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
PM:It's an interesting piece of writing indeed. Why have you posted it?

RH:I think you hide your remaining ego behind a bookish persona. You've mentioned numerous things here that indicate to me that you have a diluted understanding of enlightenment, and you haven't said anything that really cuts to the core of the Truth yet, so i'll not pay much regard to your understanding of it at this point.

-----

I see. You failed to answer my question directly, but instead respond with a series of sudden proclamations about who I am. Ah well. I guess I can indulge in same...

Anyway, from what I gather -- what you appear to be saying obtusely -- is that you posted the Solway piece as a way to comment on me while hiding behind someone else's words.

There's a term for that. It's called "innuendo", and it's a distinctly feminized trait. Also surprisingly timid, as you apparently lacked trust enough in your own words to say something directly to me.

But even more interesting is that not only did you fail to address me directly, when asked what the purpose was of posting the piece, you failed to answer directly again. So for someone who claims some level of "understanding" you are demonstrating dubious communication skills and evident fear/hesitation about being direct.

---

I think you've lost the plot here. I don't see how i could be any more direct than i have been. I think you place too much emphasis on words over substance - meaning, which fogs your ability to see my points. Part of my reason for posting Kevin's piece was to communicate this. I chose to post it because it illustrated a point that i wanted to get across without me having to write it all myself.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

I think your feathers may need a bit of ruffling before you can derive benefit from QRS wisdom, and I think it's important that i convey that. It's no good if it's water off a ducks back.

---

Feathers get ruffled all the time. That's not the same thing as being "threatened". The wind can blow my feathers - as can a nearby fart. But neither will make me fear I will lose my feathers.

---

Sure, and in no way is it my intention to attempt threaten you, not at all. I'd like to make that clear.

However, generally speaking, i'm concerned about people that have well developed ego defense techniques because they can be a blockage to spiritual development. Comments like yours that "people don't threaten me anymore" are usually evidence of their presence. Any insecurities that a person has about their understanding of the Truth need to threaten their ego, it's an important motivator, because it's a sad fact that very few people have a genuine motivation-to-Truth without being driven by fear/suffering.

Quote:

---

Anyway, what I see with you Rhett, is a generally sincere but wounded and somewhat immature young man who is at times confusing his spiritual ambitions and intellectual sharings with simple territorialism likely deriving from repressed sexual energy. I was the "new guy on the block", who was pissing on a tree in your neighbourhood (no one's tree, I might add, just doing my thing) and you decided to take a sniff and piss on the same tree. I don't see much more going on beyond that.

---

I disagree. I admit to being an aggressive pursuer of wisdom, and perhaps at times i say things that may best be left unsaid - but in those instances i do so because i want to learn (even though in many instances that learning may not be in relation to the topic in question).

That 'aggression' is a product of an active, thinking mind, which is something i value highly. I choose to direct it at matters truthful and philosophic because that is also what i value. If you want to think that it is somehow a redirection of effort from sexual matters to philosophic, then by all means do so. Whatever takes your fancy. I disagree that i am suppressing; sexual mindedness simply no longer exists for me. I am well aware of the ignorance of both the attempt to suppress (avoid/squash), and the actual notion of suppression (that "we" can obviate  $A=A$ ), and i strongly agree with you that suppression is wholly contrary to enlightenment. However, i'm not claiming Perfection, so i hope you have the dexterity of mind to accept that i'm not trying to make an absolute case out of it.

My motivation is to speak and foster the truth, so if we're in the same territory, then there's a good chance we'll communicate. If we weren't in the same territory, then obviously we wouldn't. This is no more my territory than yours, or anyone's territory for that matter. I think it's best if it's considered 'The Truths' territory.

Quote:

---

Although, it could be a beginning. After all, much can be learned from watching dogs...and wolves...such as social heirarchy, for one thing. It's common for people who have established a certain "comfort zone" position in any sort of community to resist "newcomers" -- either passively by demonstrating zero curiosity in who they are or what they've gleaned from their life journey, or actively, by seeking out angles in which to undermine them so that they do not become a threat to the status quo, or your "position" in the social heirarchy.

---

Well, you can project all you like, and i'll certainly give you plenty of material.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1650
(3/6/04 12:29 pm)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Quite right, Paul. It is impossible to come any other conclusion about QRS disciples and sycophants.

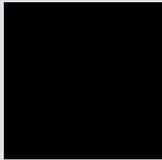

---

This is just an insult for insult's sake.

Utterly pathetic.

Dan Rowden

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 35
(3/6/04 8:08 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Satsang

Rhett --

Quote:

---

Sure, and in no way is it my intention to attempt threaten you, not at all. I'd like to make that clear.

However, generally speaking, i'm concerned about people that have well developed ego defense techniques because they can be a blockage to spiritual development. Comments like yours that "people don't threaten me anymore" are usually evidence of their presence.

---

I didn't say "people don't threaten me anymore". I said, "it's been a long time since I can remember feeling threatened by anyone." There is a difference. Your statement that you attributed to me ("people don't threaten me anymore") portrays my stance as hardened, defensive, when my actual wording -- "it's been a long time since I remember feeling threatened by anyone", is more a statement of reflection on the past. It does not imply that I am a closed book, unruffable, etc. I never implied such intransigence. This seemed to me to be more of your assumption of who I am. That is was clear that you saw your role as one who was/is to "ruffle me" was apparent when you wrote, earlier...

Quote:

---

It seems that i let your ego off the hook with my last email to you, i let you categorise me into a position from which i threaten you less. Well, let's stay at it, heh?

---

There are all kinds of assumptions implicit in there...such as that you "threaten" me, you "let my ego off the hook", etc. I suggest it's possible that these assumptions relate in part to your identity, not just as a "spiritual man", but also within the context of this particular BBS community (as contentious as it may be, LOL), and the role you see yourself playing within it.

Quote:

---

Any insecurities that a person has about their understanding of the Truth need to threaten their ego, it's an important motivator, because it's a sad fact that very few people have a genuine motivation-to-Truth without being driven by fear/suffering

---

Suffering is a great motivator...and it does seem that many people are "dragged kicking and screaming" into awakening. Many seekers exhaust all life possibilities before turning toward the Source. I think Buddha made reference to this in his "First Noble Truth" ("life is suffering"), and how this was indeed the prime motivator to get the hell out of prison.

Quote:

---

That 'aggression' is a product of an active, thinking mind, which is something i value highly. I choose to direct it at matters truthful and philosophic because that is also what i value. If you want to think that it is somehow a redirection of effort from sexual matters to philosophic, then by all means do so. Whatever takes your fancy. I disagree that i am suppressing; sexual mindedness simply no longer exists for me. I am well aware of the ignorance of both the attempt to suppress (avoid/squash), and the actual notion of suppression (that "we" can obviate A=A), and i strongly agree with you that suppression is wholly contrary to enlightenment. However, i'm not claiming Perfection, so i hope you have the dexterity of mind to accept that i'm not trying to make an absolute case out of it.

---

Yes...my comments above, about "you are either an exceptional spiritual soul" ... or "repressed, in danger of 'kundalini explosion', etc", were not delivered in a judgmental tone. They were rather an invitation to investigate the matter.

If the self is truly empty (shunyata), then we really have nothing to fear. There is nothing to lose, literally. So it seems to behoove us to investigate, and even "test", our levels of attachment and non-attachment to various aspects of human existence, in order to see how authentic they actually are.

There's an old Buddhist fable -- two monks are getting ready to cross a river, that is dangerously swollen by a storm. Suddenly a beautiful young woman appears on the river bank, but she is not strong enough to cross the river on her own, so she asks the monks for help. She needs to get to the other side or she may drown.

The monks are celibate and are forbidden by their Order to touch women at all. So this issue of how to help this woman seems to be a problem. But, one of the monks immediately picks the woman up and carries her on his back. Together, the three of them cross the river to the other shore.

The monk who did not touch the woman is horrified. When they arrive on the other side, and the woman goes off on her own, and the two monks walk for miles in silence. Finally, unable to stand it any more, the monk who did not touch the woman asks the monk who carried the woman, "What did you do? You violated one of our sacred precepts and thus impeded your own spiritual progress by carrying that woman across the river!"

The monk who carried the woman looks at the other monk, and replies, "I dropped her long ago when we crossed the river. It seems as if you are still carrying her."

I see that as a good metaphor for the process of investigating our status with attachments by being willing to test them, so to speak, on occasion -- a kind of "reality-check". The monk who carried the woman could do so precisely because his non-attachment was authentic. The monk who would not touch the woman could not do so because he was still attached.

Quote:

---

My motivation is to speak and foster the truth, so if we're in the same territory, then there's a good chance we'll communicate. If we weren't in the same territory, then obviously we wouldn't. This is no more my territory than yours, or anyone's territory for that matter. I think it's best if it's considered 'The Truths' territory.

---

A good insight, Rhett.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 852
(3/7/04 6:36 pm)
Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

David: Rhett and Kelly are exploring ideas and are open to change. They have not yet settled into a particular sycophantic position, unlike your good self. I would rate you the biggest sycophant on this forum by a long shot.

So you say that my position (which runs contrary to yours) is moronic, sycophantic, and mainstream, while people who buy into your own philosophy are merely 'exploring ideas'? Doesn't sound totally unbiased to be honest. Aren't we all exploring ideas here? Some of us -like you and me- are perhaps more settled in certain positions, which shouldn't really come as a surprise, sine we've been doing this for some time. But we haven't given up exploration; we have merely shifted focus.

I must admit that questioning well-established theories such as Big Bang, evolution, the standard model of matter, and other contemporary scientific theories appears to me as fruitless as questioning the sphericity of earth. Perhaps this makes my position appear mainstream. Okay, fair enough. But I am not suggesting that one should adopt these theories mindlessly. On the contrary. One should investigate and study them carefully. They should be adopted only when fully understood. Debates about these topics, such as the ones occuring in this forum, lead to an increased understanding thereof and opposing POVs are quite helpful in the process.

I am somewhat tired of your portraying me as a textbook Buddhist. I am not promoting 'textbook Buddhism' (if indeed any such thing exists), not to mention any particular strand or tradition. Everyone is free to choose whatever serves her best for that matter. However, you can expect objection when you attempt to use Buddhism for your own purposes, for example by citing Buddhist texts in order to create the impression as if Buddhism discriminates against women or as if Buddhists had pronounced the spiritual/intellectual inferiority of women. Using Buddhist stories and symbolism (enlightenment!) to augment the public acceptance of your own philosophic convictions is not something I am indifferent to.

Thomas: Quite right, Paul. It is impossible to come any other conclusion about QRS disciples and sycophants.

Dan: This is just an insult for insult's sake. Utterly pathetic.

Okay, I admit it wasn't very highminded, but occasionally I am allowed a little nudge or am I not? How comes you speak out now while you keep silent when I bring forward more pertaining matter-of-fact arguments against your doctrines? Are you functioning mostly emotional these days?

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2264

(3/9/04 9:15 am)

Reply

Re: Rhett H.

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Rhett and Kelly are exploring ideas and are open to change. They have not yet settled into a particular sycophantic position, unlike your good self. I would rate you the biggest sycophant on this forum by a long shot.

Thomas: So you say that my position (which runs contrary to yours) is moronic, sycophantic, and mainstream, while people who buy into your own philosophy are merely 'exploring ideas'?

---

No, I'm saying that your position is bookish, conventional, unspiritual and passive, while Rhett and Kelly are being open, fresh and courageous. Their thinking might be a bit clumsy at the moment, but they are sincerely examining what it means to live a life of truth, and hence they have already gone past your level.

Quote:

---

I must admit that questioning well-established theories such as Big Bang, evolution, the standard model of matter, and other contemporary scientific theories appears to me as fruitless as questioning the sphericity of earth. Perhaps this makes my position appear mainstream. Okay, fair enough.

---

This issue has nothing to do with science. I also believe it is fruitless to question modern scientific theories - unless, of course, one is a scientist armed with compelling new evidence or a radical new theory. What other attitude could one have?

No, I'm talking about philosophical vision and knowledge.

It is apparent to me that you don't have any knowledge or vision, apart from what the textbooks say. All you ever do is echo them. This is why I laugh at your website, called "The Big View". I laugh because it is clear that you don't have any view at all. You're too afraid to have a view. You're too scared of the big picture.

Quote:

---

I am somewhat tired of your portraying me as a textbook Buddhist. I am not promoting 'textbook Buddhism' (if indeed any such thing exists), not to mention any particular strand or tradition.

---

Name one view that you hold in relation to Buddhism, or indeed to any area of philosophy/spirituality, that isn't entirely a textbook view?

It doesn't seem to disturb you that the kind of Buddhism you promote just happens to be the culturally dominant religion of where you live - namely, the Theravadin style which is popular in Thailand. If you had gone to live in Japan, say, instead of Thailand, you would be here on this forum promoting a very different kind of Buddhism (the more intellectual Mahayana) and scoffing heartily at the Theravadins. And you would be doing it in earnest, with a straight face, as though you were presenting your view!

Pure comedy!

MGregory

Posts: 501

(3/9/04 9:48 am)

Reply

Re: Rhett H.

Quote:

---

Rhett and Kelly are being open, fresh and courageous. Their thinking might be a bit clumsy at the moment, but they are sincerely examining what it means to live a life of truth, and hence they have already gone past your level.

---

Everyone makes mistakes in the pursuit of the mastery of metaphysics. To make no mistakes is a pretty solid indication that one is going nowhere. The science of introspection is fundamentally different from other sciences in that one cannot learn it by memorizing information found in books. One has to assimilate book knowledge in such a way that enables one to become inspired to write those same thoughts from one's own perspective and style. Metaphysics is the affirmation of the personality, not the destruction of it!

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

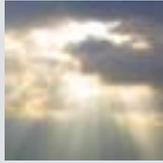

| Author                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| KellyvenPosts: 50(3/9/04 10:34 am)Reply | personality <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Metaphysics is the affirmation of the personality, not the destruction of it! <hr/> I am not engaged in metaphysics. I am not interested in affirming personality. How can i affirm or deny, there is nothing there to add/ subtract? |

MGregory

Posts: 503

(3/9/04 2:10 pm)

Reply

Re: personality

---

Quote:

---

I am not engaged in metaphysics.

---

If you are pursuing Truth you are, by my definition of metaphysics. David's book is metaphysical work, for example. The whole thing discusses metaphysical issues.

Quote:

---

I am not interested in affirming personality. How can i affirm or deny, there is nothing there to add/subtract?

---

There is no free will either, but that doesn't mean we should abandon our will.

There is a big difference between nihilism and wisdom. Nihilism is the denial of existence, whereas wisdom is the acceptance of the fact that existence is illusory. It's a subtle issue, but the difference is huge.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2552

(3/9/04 2:26 pm)

Reply

---

---

You're wrong on both counts. Nihilism is the state of understanding there is no inherent meaning in existence, in its extremest form it is acceptance of this fact. Wisdom is overcoming this state in oneself and others by denying the illusory nature of existence.

MGregory

Posts: 506

(3/10/04 5:21 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Zag: You're wrong on both counts. Nihilism is the state of understanding there is no inherent meaning in existence, in its extremest form it is acceptance of this fact. Wisdom is overcoming this state in oneself and others by denying the illusory nature of existence.

---

There is meaning in existence, but only on the occasions when we give it meaning ourselves. I don't think this idea conflicts with what you said above. As to denying the illusory nature of existence, there is no need to deny it. A deep understanding of it will take care of itself. A denial of it would just be extra baggage.

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/10/04 6:27 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2554

(3/10/04 7:32 am)

Reply

--

---

Quote:

---

There is meaning in existence, but only on the occasions when we give it meaning ourselves.

---

Sure

[/quote]I don't think this idea conflicts with what you said above.[/quote]

No, it doesn't.

Quote:

---

As to denying the illusory nature of existence, there is no need to deny it. A deep understanding of it will take care of itself. A denial of it would just be extra baggage.

---

What illusory nature of existence?!

MGregory

Posts: 508

(3/10/04 1:16 pm)

Reply

Re: --

---

The one I am thinking of.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 863

(3/10/04 1:57 pm)

Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

David: No, I'm saying that your position is bookish, conventional, unspiritual and passive, while Rhett and Kelly are being open, fresh and courageous.

David, I think this perception is a consequence of your bias and I doubt you are able to see much beyond the ideas and values you hold dear yourself.

David: It is apparent to me that you don't have any knowledge or vision, apart from what the textbooks say. All you ever do is echo them. This is why I laugh at your website, called "The Big View". I laugh because it is clear that you don't have any view at all. You're too afraid to have a view. You're too scared of the big picture.

Then you haven't understood what thebigview.com is about. It is not meant to be a venue for the dissemination of my own personal view of the world. If that were its purpose I would have named it myview.com, not thebigview.com. The website is about intellectual discovery; it is a summary of some of today's most influential paradigms of thought, an intelletucal travelogue so to speak. Its main purpose is to communicate the beauty of that intellectual landscape and to inspire readers to undertake discoveries on their own. My personal element is the presentation, not much more.

David: It doesn't seem to disturb you that the kind of Buddhism you promote just happens to be the culturally dominant religion of where you live - namely, the Theravadin style which is popular in Thailand.

I am not promoting Theravada Buddhism. You are making this up. In fact, I find Tibetan Buddhism much more interesting, but what does it matter? I believe that the essential Buddhist message can be found in any tradition, the rest is simply cultural embellishment. Hinayana Buddhism in Thailand has its good sides, but I can't help to notice that its practice is in dire straits, since so many nominal Buddhists are quite ignorant of the dharma.

David: No, I'm talking about philosophical vision and knowledge.

How would you define philosophical vision?

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2277

(3/11/04 8:46 am)

Reply

Re: Rhett H.

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: It is apparent to me that you don't have any knowledge or vision, apart from what the textbooks say. All you ever do is echo them. This is why I laugh at your website, called "The Big View". I laugh because it is clear that you don't have any view at all. You're too afraid to have a view. You're too scared of the big picture.

Thomas: Then you haven't understood what thebigview.com is about. It is not meant to be a venue for the dissemination of my own personal view of the world. If that were its purpose I would have named it myview.com, not thebigview.com.

---

The very fact that you call it "the big view" demonstrates that you agree that the material you have placed on your site represents the big view.

In other words, you are presenting your idea of what constitutes the big view. It is your big view.

But again, one of your defining characteristics is that you don't accept personal responsibility for your own words and thoughts. Instead, you continually hide behind the curtains of others.

Quote:

---

The website is about intellectual discovery; it is a summary of some of today's most influential paradigms of thought, an intellectual travelogue so to speak.

Its main purpose is to communicate the beauty of that intellectual landscape and to inspire readers to undertake discoveries on their own.

---

Not so. Its primary purpose is to reinforce the great fortress which you've built around your own ego. The joy that you experience in "intellectual discovery" is really the joy of knowing that the fortress is more secure.

Quote:

---

David: It doesn't seem to disturb you that the kind of Buddhism you promote just happens to be the culturally dominant religion of where you live - namely, the Theravadin style which is popular in Thailand.

Thomas: I am not promoting Theravada Buddhism. You are making this up.

---

All of your views on Buddhism expressed on this forum have thus far been Theravadin.

I see that you have avoided the most important question in my last post. Please name a single view that you hold concerning Buddhism or philosophy or spirituality that isn't entirely a textbook view.

Don't be shy, out with it.

Quote:

---

David: No, I'm talking about philosophical vision and knowledge.

Thomas: How would you define philosophical vision?

---

One's mental horizons. A person with good philosophical vision has extended his horizons to include the Infinite.

The sage, in turn, has completely smashed his horizons, such that nothing falls outside of his vision.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 869
(3/11/04 2:59 pm)
Reply

Re: tehbigview.com

---

David: The very fact that you call it "the big view" demonstrates that you agree that the material you have placed on your site represents the big view.

The name is the program. I named it tehbigview.com, because the material on this site deals with philosophical issues from a bird's eye view. It covers a lot of ground, avoids technical detail, and puts emphasis on conciseness.

David: In other words, you are presenting your idea of what constitutes the big view. [...] But again, one of your defining characteristics is that you don't accept personal responsibility for your own words and thoughts.

The ideas represented on tehbigview.com are belong to the body of human knowledge. They are only mine in the sense that I endorse and present them in a new context. Of course, I take responsibility for the selection and presentation. I make sure the information is accurate and up-to-date.

David: Its primary purpose is to reinforce the great fortress which you've built around your own ego. The joy that you experience in "intellectual discovery" is really the joy of knowing that the fortress is more secure.

Don't be stupid, David. What's the point in building fortresses? Life is inherently uncertain and unsafe. Fortresses only have temporary strategical value.

David: Please name a single view that you hold concerning Buddhism or philosophy or spirituality that isn't entirely a textbook view.

(1) I think that Buddhists should stop engaging in meaningless rituals, and start studying and understanding the dharma. They may come back to perform rituals once they can fill them with meaning.

(2) I vote for improving the quality of the layity-clergy dialogue. I don't want to hear any wheeny-whiny Buddhist consolations from monks, but high-quality philosophical education. Monks and nuns should first and foremost help to alleviate ignorance when talking with lay people.

(3) Buddhist monks (especially those who are not qualified to teach) should get their butts out on the streets and take a more active role in social programs.

(4) The Vinaya needs an update. These rules are more than 2000 years old and need to be adapted to modern lifestyle. For example, what does it matter whether you sleep on a high place while television, computer games, and other distractions are technically allowed.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2278
(3/11/04 7:17 pm)
Reply

Re: tehbigview.com

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: The very fact that you call it "the big view" demonstrates that you agree that the material you have placed on your site represents the big view.

Thomas: The name is the program. I named it tehbigview.com, because the material on this site deals with philosophical issues from a bird's eye view. It covers a lot of ground, avoids technical detail, and puts emphasis on conciseness.

---

It's a regurgitation of a modern encyclopedia. There is no profundity or wisdom.

Quote:

---

David: In other words, you are presenting your idea of what constitutes the big view. [...] But again, one of your defining characteristics is that you don't accept personal responsibility for your own words and thoughts.

Thomas: The ideas represented on tehbigview.com are belong to the body of human knowledge.

---

They form one particular strand within the body of human knowledge and not a very "big" strand at that.

Quote:

---

They are only mine in the sense that I endorse and present them in a new context. Of course, I take responsibility for the selection and presentation. I make sure the information is accurate and up-to-date.

---

In other words, it is your conception of what constitutes the big view.

Quote:

---

David: Its primary purpose is to reinforce the great fortress which you've built around your own ego. The joy that you experience in "intellectual discovery" is really the joy of knowing that the fortress is more secure.

Thomas: Don't be stupid, David. What's the point in building fortresses?

---

They protect people from threats and dangers - in your case, from spiritual dangers posed by profound non-academic reasoning.

Quote:

---

Life is inherently uncertain and unsafe. Fortresses only have temporary strategical value.

---

You can block it out as much as you like, Thomas, but there is no doubt that you hide your ego behind the giant fortress created by conventionality, numbers, fashion, academic authority figures, and the like.

Quote:

---

David: Please name a single view that you hold concerning Buddhism or philosophy or spirituality that isn't entirely a textbook view.

Thomas: (1) I think that Buddhists should stop engaging in meaningless rituals, and start studying and understanding the dharma.

---

In other words, they should understand the textbook dharma!

Quote:

---

(2) I vote for improving the quality of the layity-clergy dialogue. I don't want to hear any wheeny-whiny Buddhist consolations from monks, but high-quality philosophical education.

---

A textbook philosophical education.

Quote:

---

(3) Buddhist monks (especially those who are not qualified to teach) should get their butts out on the streets and take a more active role in social programs.

---

Engage in conventional forms of compassion.

Quote:

---

(4) The Vinaya needs an update. These rules are more than 2000 years old and need to be adapted to modern lifestyle. For example, what does it matter whether you sleep on a high place while television, computer games, and other distractions are technically allowed.

---

Become mainstream in a 21st century kind of way.

There is nothing here that even remotely expresses a non-conventional, non-textbook philosophical view. Please try again.

--

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 3/11/04 7:21 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 871
(3/12/04 1:34 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: It's a regurgitation of a modern encyclopedia. There is no profundity or wisdom.

If you don't like the material on thebigview.com, it's probably because a scientific style of inquiry doesn't suit you well. Maybe too boring for your taste. I can't help it - it's impossible to please everybody. However, the majority of feedback I got from people visiting the site is very positive, as I can see from the guest book, so the material does actually inspire some people. That's really all I wanted to achieve.

David: There is nothing here that even remotely expresses a non-conventional, non-textbook philosophical view. Please try again.

Hahaha! No, I won't try it again. Nuts to you! The things I mentioned are real issues here in Asia involving real people. You have spend too much time in isolation to know what that is. All you ever do is posting clever messages on the Internet for the purpose of making yourself appear enlightened.

Thomas

MGregory
Posts: 525
(3/13/04 2:25 am)
Reply

My Diagnosis

---

I like Thomas's site.

Here is my past life diagnosis:

I don't know how you feel about it, but you were male in your last earthly incarnation.

You were born somewhere in the territory of modern Bulgaria around the year 1875.

Your profession was that of a teacher, mathematician or geologist.

Your brief psychological profile in your past life:

Inquisitive, inventive, you liked to get to the very bottom of things and to rummage in books. Talent for drama, natural born actor.

The lesson that your last past life brought to your present incarnation:

Your lesson is to learn discretion and moderation and then to teach others to do the same. Your life will be happier if you help those who lack reasoning.

Do you remember now?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2283
(3/14/04 8:18 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: There is nothing here that even remotely expresses a non-conventional, non-textbook philosophical view. Please try again.

Thomas: Hahaha! No, I won't try it again. Nuts to you! The things I mentioned are real issues here in Asia involving real people.

---

And the relevance of this is .... what? How does this relate to the fact that you don't have any views apart from conventional ones garnered from textbooks?

Let me ask you another question: How do you distinguish yourself from the medieval Christian scholars whose views were also conventional, popular and textbook in nature? They also put out lovely books with beautiful illustrations and graphics - much like your website. And yet, as we all know now, the content contained within these texts was completely deluded. How are you not like this?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 871
(3/14/04 9:06 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: And the relevance of this is .... what?

It invalidates your attempt of qualifying me as a stereotypical holder of textbook views. There is a great number of issues in Buddhism, for example, on which I disagree with the conventional views that predominate in Theravada Buddhism here in Thailand.

David: How do you distinguish yourself from the medieval Christian scholars whose views were also conventional, popular and textbook in nature?

Since I live in a different age and place, I'd say that my whole outlook is very different from that of a medieval Christian scholar. There could hardly be a more farfetched comparison.

David: And yet, as we all know now, the content contained within these texts was completely deluded. How are you not like this?

Well, first of all the texts on my website are intended to achieve the opposite of delusion. They are there to "enlighten" people and get them to think, not to lull them into any prefabricated belief system. Second, unlike a Christian scholar, I don't have an agenda. I am not keen on convertig people to Buddhism or any other particular faith.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2284
(3/15/04 9:21 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: And the relevance of this is .... what?

Thomas: It invalidates your attempt of qualifying me as a stereotypical holder of textbook views. There is a great number of issues in Buddhism, for example, on which I disagree with the conventional views that predominate in Theravada Buddhism here in Thailand.

---

The disagreements that you listed ....

Quote:

---

(1) I think that Buddhists should stop engaging in meaningless rituals, and start studying and understanding the dharma. They may come back to perform rituals once they can fill them with meaning.

(2) I vote for improving the quality of the layity-clergy dialogue. I don't want to hear any wheeny-whiny Buddhist consolations from monks, but high-quality philosophical education. Monks and nuns should first and foremost help to alleviate ignorance when talking with lay people.

(3) Buddhist monks (especially those who are not qualified to teach) should get their butts out on the streets and take a more active role in social programs.

(4) The Vinaya needs an update. These rules are more than 2000 years old and need to be adapted to modern lifestyle. For example, what does it matter whether you sleep on a high place while television, computer games, and other distractions are technically allowed.

---

..... did not address my charge that your views, in Buddhism and elsewhere, are purely textbook in nature. Complaining that a group of people haven't yet studied and absorbed the modern textbooks is not a particularly good line of defence.

Quote:

---

David: How do you distinguish yourself from the medieval Christian scholars whose views were also conventional, popular and textbook in nature?

Thomas: Since I live in a different age and place, I'd say that my whole outlook is very different from that of a medieval Christian scholar.

---

Yes .... and the reason for this is ..... the two of you are using different textbooks!

So I ask again, how do you distinguish yourself from the medieval scholar who also mindlessly submits to the textbooks of his day?

Irrespective of whether a woman wears a mini-skirt in the seventies, or an ankle-length dress in the forties, or a large bell-like skirt in the Victorian era, she is submissively following the fashion of her times. In all three cases, her passive psychology and herdish values are identical.

Quote:

---

David: And yet, as we all know now, the content contained within these texts was completely deluded. How are you not like this?

Thomas: Well, first of all the texts on my website are intended to achieve the opposite of delusion.

---

Naturally, the medieval scholar would have thought this as well.

Quote:

---

They are there to "enlighten" people and get them to think, not to lull them into any prefabricated belief system.

---

No, of course not. Except for the postmodernist belief that enlightenment is an illusion ..... and the belief that metaphysical reasoning is antiquated and useless ..... and the belief that all knowledge and wisdom lies in 20th century academia .... and the belief that everyone must adhere to rigid socially-constructed definitions and modes of thought ..... and the belief that thinkers of the ilk of Nietzsche and Weininger are mentally-ill ..... and the belief that men and women are equally capable in intellectual and spiritual areas ..... apart from these few rather insignificant beliefs, you are not trying to lull anyone into a prefabricated belief-system at all!

Quote:

---

Second, unlike a Christian scholar, I don't have an agenda. I am not keen on convertig people to Buddhism or any other particular faith.

---

You've already stated that you want Thai Buddhists to practice a different kind of Buddhism - that is, you want them to study textbook Theravadin Buddhism and textbook Western academia - or in effect, to absorb the material on your website.

It's also clear from your behaviour on this forum that you want to convert people away from following the Nietzsche/Weininger/QRS style of philosophy and instead study textbook Buddhism and textbook western academia and basically submit to the academic mainstream. This is a very consistent theme in your behaviour. It is almost your mission in life - to convert people to textbook modes of thought.

I shouldn't have to spell this out. It is obvious that this is your agenda.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 877
(3/15/04 2:56 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: ... did not address my charge that your views, in Buddhism and elsewhere, are purely textbook in nature. Complaining that a group of people haven't yet studied and absorbed the modern textbooks is not a particularly good line of defence.

As always when your position becomes hopeless, you begin to fabricate charges. In this case, you pretend that I demand people to study textbooks. If you will please lay your eyes again on what I wrote, you will (hopefully) see that I didn't demand such a thing. My suggestions were aimed at "smartening up" about Buddhism. In Asia, Buddhism is often practised with the same ritualistic superficial mindset as Christianity is practiced in the West. In addition, people in Asia are often very attached to traditions. In fact, I wish that people lay aside traditional textbook views about Buddhism and study the dharma and apply it to their lives.

David: Except for the postmodernist belief that enlightenment is an illusion ..... and the belief that metaphysical reasoning is antiquated and useless ..... and the belief that all knowledge and wisdom lies in 20th century academia .... and the belief that everyone must adhere to rigid socially-constructed definitions and modes of thought ..... and the belief that thinkers of the ilk of Nietzsche and Weininger are mentally-ill ..... and the belief that men and women are equally capable in intellectual and spiritual areas .....

(1) I did not say that enlightenment is an illusion; I said that your enlightenment is an illusion. (2) metaphysical reasoning is probably useless as an epistemic method, but language has many other functions. (3) Nonsense. (4) Weininger and Nietzsche were both mentally ill. (5) Women are not equal but equally capable.

David: It is almost your mission in life - to convert people to textbook modes of thought.

No. My mission is not to convert people to any kind of view. My mission is to bring them to think for themselves. What concerns the Weininger/QRS world view, my activity on this list can be summarized as uncovering its flaws. I respect knowledge and I endorse learning, of course, as a countermeasure to ignorance.

Thomas

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 343
(3/16/04 9:22 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Hi Thomas,

If you consider yourself a source of creative insight into the nature of reality, why aren't you busy enlightening the people on your own forum?

It seems to me that you rely on the creativity of QRS, you are too feminine minded to be your own source. However, because of the stark difference between your nature and that of QRS, you choose to define yourself in opposition to QRS, even though they feed you so well. Conveniently, that also help's you maintain some sense of self-worth, because if you fell in their shadow you'd become truly lost to the world.

Poor David is having to scour up charges only because you don't really stand for anything at all when pressed, in a sense he's having to develop your beliefs in order to counter them.

Can you prove to us that you really stand for something? Let's see some follow through; the last thread i remember you starting was a grumble about the quality of the threads!

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 879
(3/16/04 12:27 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Rhett: If you consider yourself a source of creative insight into the nature of reality, why aren't you busy enlightening the people on your own forum?

But hey, that's what exactly I'm doing. Didn't notice, did ya?

David: It seems to me that you rely on the creativity of QRS, you are too feminine minded to be your own source. However, because of the stark difference between your nature and that of QRS, you choose to define yourself in opposition to QRS, even though they feed you so well. Conveniently, that also help's you maintain some sense of self-worth, because if you fell in their shadow you'd become truly lost to the world.

Rhett, I cannot suppress a big smile while reading this. You are such a good puppy. Grateful for the food, obedient, never bite the master, and all that. QRS ought to be proud. Are you born in 1958, 1970, or 1982 by any chance?

Rhett: Poor David is having to scour up charges only because you don't really stand for anything at all when pressed, in a sense he's having to develop your beliefs in order to counter them.

What a poor fellow he is.

Rhett: Can you prove to us that you really stand for something? Let's see some follow through; the last thread i remember you starting was a grumble about the quality of the threads!

That was two months ago, if I remember correctly. If you haven't read any of my posts since then, then what are you barking at?

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1464
(3/16/04 12:32 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

Are you born in 1958, 1970, or 1982 by any chance?

---

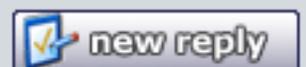

Hey!

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 881
(3/16/04 1:04 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

Hey?

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

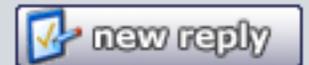

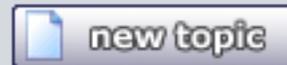

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Satsang, and the Integration of Truth

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1465(3/16/04 2:03 pm)Reply   | Re: thebigview.com <hr/> I was born in 1958. I suppose I am a fairly loyal dog, but I do my own thinking. One funny thing I once read about the dog is that they supposedly always keep two homes going, one way or another, and that is quite true of me. Personally, I think dogs are the finest creatures on earth, followed closely by horses and humans. What is your animal sign?                                                                    |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 883(3/16/04 2:23 pm)Reply  | Re: thebigview.com <hr/> Anna: What is your animal sign? Green metal snake, guardian of wisdom and treasures. Personally, I think dogs are the finest creatures on earth, followed closely by horses and humans. I agree with you about that. Elephants are also very lovely animals. Anna: One funny thing I once read about the dog is that they supposedly always keep two homes going, one way or another, and that is quite true of me. |

True. The same applies to my wife. Also, most dog people I know keep dogs as pets.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2285

(3/17/04 9:33 am)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: ... did not address my charge that your views, in Buddhism and elsewhere, are purely textbook in nature. Complaining that a group of people haven't yet studied and absorbed the modern textbooks is not a particularly good line of defence.

Thomas: As always when your position becomes hopeless, you begin to fabricate charges. In this case, you pretend that I demand people to study textbooks. If you will please lay your eyes again on what I wrote, you will (hopefully) see that I didn't demand such a thing.

---

You said that you wanted the local Thai Buddhists to "study the dharma" and become "philosophically-educated". That is, you want them to study your favourite textbooks.

If you want to object to this, then I ask you (again): What philosophical or Buddhist views do you hold that are not 100% textbook in nature?

Quote:

---

My suggestions were aimed at "smartening up" about Buddhism. In Asia, Buddhism is often practised with the same ritualistic superficial mindset as Christianity is practiced in the West. In addition, people in Asia are often very attached to traditions. In fact, I wish that people lay aside traditional textbook views about Buddhism and study the dharma and apply it to their lives.

---

Yes, you want them to integrate their lives with your textbook understanding of the dharma.

Quote:

---

David: Except for the postmodernist belief that enlightenment is an illusion ..... and the belief that metaphysical reasoning is antiquated and useless ..... and the belief that all knowledge and wisdom lies in 20th century academia .... and the belief that everyone must adhere to rigid socially-constructed definitions and modes of thought ..... and the belief that thinkers of the ilk of Nietzsche and Weininger are mentally-ill ..... and the belief that men and women are equally capable in intellectual and spiritual areas .....

Thomas: (1) I did not say that enlightenment is an illusion; I said that your enlightenment is an illusion.

---

I don't normally take you for a bald-faced liar, Thomas, so I can only assume that I have misheard you in the past. You have constantly given the impression that you believe enlightenment to be an illusion. Indeed, I seem to remember a few weeks ago you counselled a young bloke against the search for enlightenment, saying that it is nothing more than a form of escapism. But as I say, I've must have misheard you.

So then, what is enlightenment, in your view? And please, no textbook views.

Quote:

---

(4) Weininger and Nietzsche were both mentally ill.

---

Dear Thomas, you are far more mentally-ill than either Weininger and Nietzsche ever was.

Weininger and Nietzsche did not spend their lives shying away from developing a direct relationship to reality. They did not cower behind large mental blocks and hide behind mainstream authority figures. They did not thrust their minds into sheer textbook mode in order to prevent any scary thoughts from arising. They did not fill up their lives with meaningless career work and sixteen dogs and a wife so as to crowd out all disturbing thoughts.

Make no mistake about it, Thomas. You do indeed suffer from a major mental illness. It is an illness caused by suppression and fear, and leads one to exist in a major state of denial. But you're lucky (or unlucky, depending on how one looks at it) in that that millions of others share the same mental illness and thus you are able to enjoy the illusion that you are quite normal. The illusion of normality.

Quote:

---

David: It is almost your mission in life - to convert people to textbook modes of thought.

Thomas: No. My mission is not to convert people to any kind of view. My mission is to bring them to think for themselves.

---

This is part of your mental illness - that of believing your own motivations to be objective and pure. It is like an asylum inmate believing they are Jesus Christ.

Regardless of whether or not one agrees with Weininger or Nietzsche, it cannot be denied that they are very stimulating to read. Yet you are openly encouraging people to avoid their work altogether. The very fact that you are dismissing thinkers of this calibre as "mentally-ill" is a clear demonstration that you are not really concerned with stimulating people to think for themselves. Rather, the primary concern is to encourage people into adopting the textbook mentality which you love so much.

I don't think you will ever rest easy in this world, Thomas, until you are sure that everybody on the planet is in pure textbook mode. Only then will you feel sure that you have eliminated every last possibility of scary thoughts arising.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 886
(3/17/04 2:39 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: You said that you wanted the local Thai Buddhists to "study the dharma" and become "philosophically-educated". That is, you want them to study your favourite textbooks.

By Jove! Will you forget about the textbooks for a moment. They are becoming an idee fixe.

David: If you want to object to this, then I ask you (again): What philosophical or Buddhist views do you hold that are not 100% textbook in nature?

Many nominal Buddhists I know, go to the temple and donate some money or food to the monks and offer flowers and candles to the Buddha. Okay, very good. Once they're done with it, however, when they leave the temple behind, they also leave the Buddha behind. I want them to take the Buddha with them.

David: I don't normally take you for a bald-faced liar, Thomas, so I can only assume that I have misheard you in the past. You have constantly given the impression that you believe enlightenment to be an illusion. Indeed, I seem to remember a few weeks ago you counselled a young bloke against the search for enlightenment, saying that it is nothing more than a form of escapism. But as I say, I've must have misheard you.

I am not sure to what incident you are referring. Many enlightenment seekers I've met are indeed escapists in some sense. Quite a few have romantic ideas about enlightenment. So, I might have objected to that sort of thing; I am pragmatic in this regard. I think that it is better for people to address problems directly instead of engaging in wishful thinking.

David: So then, what is enlightenment, in your view? And please, no textbook views.

Awareness.

David: Make no mistake about it, Thomas. You do indeed suffer from a major mental illness. It is an illness caused by suppression and fear, and leads one to exist in a major state of denial.

No offense, but I don't recommend you to become a psychologist. Your diagnosis is wide off the mark. As a responsible person you should refrain from making personal psychological assessments over the Internet. Oh, and in case you should object that I had done this with Weininger and Nietzsche - their case is different because they do not participate in this.

David: This is part of your mental illness - that of believing your own motivations to be objective and pure. It is like an assylum inmate believing they are Jesus Christ.

Where did I claim that my motives are "objective and pure"? What do you know about my motives to create thebigview.com at all? On second thought, please don't answer this question. No more hobby psychology.

David: Regardless of whether or not one agrees with Weininger or Nietzsche, it cannot be denied that they are very stimulating to read.

The works of these two philosophers may be stimulating for people with relationship issues, but they do not transmit any of the higher teachings, in my view. They are preparatory at best. I'd even go as far as crossing Weininger off the list, because his work is steeped in prejudice and aversion to a degree where its value is questionable. Nietzsche scores much higher. He might actually benefit some people. Then again, because of Nietzsche's garbled poetic style, there is great potential for misunderstanding (see Nazi case).

As a marginal note, mental illness might but does not necessarily have a detrimental effect on the artistic or philosophical quality of works produced. There are many counter-examples in history. However, such a condition is most defining for the general outlook from which such a work is created.

David: I don't think you will ever rest easy in this world, Thomas.

There is no reason to worry, as I am already resting easy in this world. I can't deny there is suffering in it, though.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 3/17/04 3:46 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2288

(3/18/04 10:15 am)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: You said that you wanted the local Thai Buddhists to "study the dharma" and become "philosophically-educated". That is, you want them to study your favourite textbooks.

Thomas: By Jove! Will you forget about the textbooks for a moment. They are becoming an idee fixe.

---

I will happily forget the textbooks if you can forget them. I can't see you doing this, however.

I've been watching your discussion with Kevin about A=A over at Ponderers Guild and witnessing once again your inability to stop echoing academic textbook knowledge. That's all you seem to know how to do.

This is how you operate: Whenever you decide to reach a conclusion about a matter, you don't use reason directly in order to determine the truth for yourself. Rather, your method is to try and work out what the majority of academics would conclude in the same circumstances and then adopt that. That is what you call "thinking".

In other words, your reasoning is always imitative and second-hand, which always has the effect of making you seem very moronic.

Quote:

---

David: If you want to object to this, then I ask you (again): What philosophical or Buddhist views do you hold that are not 100% textbook in nature?

Thomas: Many nominal Buddhists I know, go to the temple and donate some money or food to the monks and offer flowers and candles to the Buddha. Okay, very good. Once they're done with it, however, when they leave the temple behind, they also leave the Buddha behind. I want them to take the Buddha with them.

---

Yes, we already know that. You want them to to form a closer relationship with your textbook understanding of Buddhism.

Can we get past this and actually addressing the issue? What philosophical or Buddhist views do you hold that are not 100% textbook in nature?

Note that I'm not asking you what the local Buddhists should do in order to attain your understanding of the Dharma. Rather, I'm asking in what way is your understanding of the dharma not an entirely textbook one.

Quote:

---

David: So then, what is enlightenment, in your view? And please, no textbook views.

Thomas: Awareness.

---

Too vague. Can you elaborate (without going into textbook mode)?

Quote:

---

David: Make no mistake about it, Thomas. You do indeed suffer from a major mental illness. It is an illness caused by suppression and fear, and leads one to exist in a major state of denial.

Thomas: No offense, but I don't recommend you to become a psychologist. Your diagnosis is wide off the mark. As a responsible person you should refrain from making personal psychological assessments over the Internet. Oh, and in case you should object that I had done this with Weininger and Nietzsche - their case is different because they do not participate in this.

---

Thomas, face it, you are mentally-ill.

Only a perfect Buddha is absolutely free of mental illness, since he is the only one who no longer engages in irrational thought-processes. Thus, anyone who is not a perfect Buddha, and yet believes he is not mentally-ill, is obviously deceiving himself. The first step towards curing one's sickness is to be aware that one is sick.

If I was to give a perfect Buddha a rating of 10 for perfect mental health, and a raving Christian fundamentalist a score of 1 for being completely irrational and insane, then I would also give Weininger and Nietzsche a score of 7 and yourself a score of 2.

Quote:

---

David: This is part of your mental illness - that of believing your own motivations to be objective and pure. It is like an assylum inmate believing they are Jesus Christ.

Thomas: Where did I claim that my motives are "objective and pure"? What do you know about my motives to create thebigview.com at all?

---

To paraphrase your own words: "I have no agenda. My only motivation is to stimulate people's thoughts and refrain from lulling them into a prefabricated belief-system."

That is to say, you believe that your motives are objective ("I do not try to lull people into a prefabricated belief-system") and pure ("I have no agenda"). This is all part of your mental illness.

Quote:

---

On second thought, please don't answer this question. No more hobby psychology.

---

I have a very strong impression that you were abused or traumatized as a child. Would that be correct? Or perhaps you have brothers or cousins who suffer from psychiatric disorders? Does clinical madness run in the Knierim family?

There is definitely something in you which is forcefully driving you to crowd out all personal and profound lines of thought from your mind.

Quote:

---

David: Regardless of whether or not one agrees with Weininger or Nietzsche, it cannot be denied that they are very stimulating to read.

Thomas: The works of these two philosophers may be stimulating for people with relationship issues, but they do not transmit any of the higher teachings, in my view.

---

In your view? I don't think so. You haven't even studied their work. You are merely echoing what the majority of academics think.

"May be stimulating for people with relationship issues .... .?" LOL! Your ignorance is most humorous.

If you were to study Nietzsche and Weininger with an open mind, you would see that nearly every paragraph of theirs drips with tremendous profundity - particularly Zarathustra and Sex and Character. As spiritual teachings, they are just as high as the Buddhist sutras.

Indeed, in some ways, they are even higher than the sutras because they are more serious in trying to integrate the great wisdom of emptiness with the everyday world. The sutras tend to treat emptiness as an abstract quantity that is divorced from real life, which only serves to rob it of its power.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 885
(3/18/04 1:38 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: I've been watching your discussion with Kevin about  $A=A$  over at Ponderers Guild and witnessing once again your inability to stop echoing academic textbook knowledge. That's all you seem to know how to do.

Kevin made some incredibly baffling statements on TPG on how all logic and mathematics follows from  $A=A$ . Everyone with a minimal grasp of mathematics would object. I have asked him (repeatedly) to show how  $1+1=2$  follows from  $A=A$ . Needless to say that he couldn't do that. Instead he keeps repeating that arithmetic equations, such as  $1+1=2$ , are in harmony with  $A=A$ , which wasn't questioned in the first place.

This stuff doesn't even deserve to be called 'academic'. It is taught in elementary school. For some reason that is not immediately apparent to me, Kevin fails to understand the concepts that any six-year old kid can understand. I can only conclude that Kevin has some sort of mathematical-logical impairment. This is baffling, since his linguistic abilities are fairly developed.

David: Only a perfect Buddha is absolutely free of mental illness, since he is the only one who no longer engages in irrational thought-processes.

This would depend on how you define "mental illness". I would define it as a cognitive, emotional, or behavioral anomaly that impairs the ability to interact with the environment, whereas the environment includes social, cultural, economic, and ecological entities. Note that the word "anomaly" expresses "divergence from the norm" and the word "impairment" expresses "functional adversity". Under this definition, Nietzsche was mentally ill, but the Buddha wasn't.

Thomas: Many nominal Buddhists I know, go to the temple and donate some money or food to the monks and offer flowers and candles to the Buddha. Okay, very good. Once they're done with it, however, when they leave the temple behind, they also leave the Buddha behind. I want them to take the Buddha with them.

David: Can we get past this and actually addressing the issue?

I can't put it into any more concrete terms. If that isn't clear enough for you, then I am afraid you will have missed the point.

David: So then, what is enlightenment, in your view? And please, no textbook views.

Thomas: Awareness.

David: Too vague. Can you elaborate (without going into textbook mode)?

No, I can't elaborate. Awareness is exactly what I mean.

David: Thomas, face it, you are mentally-ill. [...] I have a very strong impression that you were abused or traumatized as a child. Would that be correct? Or perhaps you have brothers or cousins who suffer from psychiatric disorders? Does clinical madness run in the Knierim family?

To answer your question, I had a very happy childhood for which I am grateful. Thankfully there was no abuse nor traumatic episodes. There are also no incidents of mental disorders in my family. Throwing in a red herring such as this isn't very smart of you. It doesn't support your argument in any way, neither does it distract your readers from the psychological problems that Nietzsche and Weininger had to deal with, nor your personality disorder. It seems somewhat difficult for you to engage into a meaningful dialogue with me at this time. Unless there is anything of substance you want to discuss, we should perhaps leave it with that.

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1472

(3/18/04 2:00 pm)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

Does clinical madness run in the Knierim family?

---

No, that would be my family.

David, I'm jealous. Why don't you rip me to shreds?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1472

(3/18/04 3:03 pm)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

Green metal snake, guardian of wisdom and treasures.

---

Green metal snake? You're making this up. There's no snake. You must mean the dragon. I'm fond of dragons like preadolescent girls are fond of horses and unicorns. Not that dragons are mythical beasts. A good bishop is a guardian of wisdom and treasure. The treasure is the pearl of great price, the wisdom of the Holy Spirit; it is passed intact from Christ to the apostles, of which all bishops are successors. It is a worthy and noble goal to guard that edifice and give it back uncorrupted.

Quote:

---

Elephants are also very lovely animals.

---

It's too bad they're scarce around here. They seem to be a keynote species, like beavers. I understand the Europeans have hunted them to near extinction in Europe, and that they no longer build dams. Where beavers live and make dams, they create meadows, and still clear water. The water makes habitat for many fishes that would not do well in rapidly moving water, along with frogs, snakes, turtles. Around the open perimeter berries and wildflowers spring up, which brings bees. The meadow brings animals to drink, and foxes to catch them. The still water and meadow makes a good place for migrating birds to rest. The thinning of some trees makes for a good strong canopy of older trees. The ponds make the ground resistant to drought and flood alike.

Some other species of that sort are prairie dogs and buffalo. The buffalo are gone and people are killing the prairie dogs for sport. They use them for target practice. Apparently elephants have a similar effect in the jungle. So now gorillas are doing more poorly in areas where elephants are disappearing.

It is a terrible thing when an animal goes extinct because it cuts off God's soul. It's not that every species is a unique "expression" of God, its that the species IS God, being a dolphin, or being an elephant.

Quote:

---

One funny thing I once read about the dog is that they supposedly always keep two homes going, one way or another, and that is quite true of me.

True. The same applies to my wife.

---

I think it has something to do with keeping down the flea population.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 3/19/04 3:04 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2290

(3/18/04 5:43 pm)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

David, I'm jealous. Why don't you rip me to shreds?

---

Because we'd only end up having sex.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 889
(3/18/04 5:57 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Anna: Green metal snake? You're making this up.

Would I lie to you?

I am born in the year of the (green) snake on the day of the (red) dragon in the month of the (white) dragon. So, yes, I am somewhat overrepresented on the dragon/reptilian side of Chinese astrology. You can find out your own sign here. Have fun!

Anna: I think it has something to do with keeping down the flea population.

My wife is (black) dog born in the year of (white) dog. Double-dog so to speak. Both of us love dogs; currently we have twelve of them. We don't keep any pet snakes or dragons, though.

Thomas

MGregory
Posts: 547
(3/18/04 6:03 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

Anna: David, I'm jealous. Why don't you rip me to shreds?

David: Because we'd only end up having sex.

---

LOL. Is that why I don't feel like responding to her post on the other thread?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2291

(3/18/04 6:31 pm)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: I've been watching your discussion with Kevin about  $A=A$  over at Ponderers Guild and witnessing once again your inability to stop echoing academic textbook knowledge. That's all you seem to know how to do.

Thomas: Kevin made some incredibly baffling statements on TPG on how all logic and mathematics follows from  $A=A$ . Everyone with a minimal grasp of mathematics would object. I have asked him (repeatedly) to show how  $1+1=2$  follows from  $A=A$ . Needless to say that he couldn't do that.

---

That's no surprise given that Kevin is not asserting this. He is not saying that  $1+1=2$  "follows" from  $A=A$ . Rather, he is saying that it has the form of  $A=A$ .

In other words, you're asking Kevin to prove an irrational assertion that he doesn't believe in.

Quote:

---

Instead he keeps repeating that arithmetic equations, such as  $1+1=2$ , are in harmony with  $A=A$ , which wasn't questioned in the first place.

---

So you accept that all logic is ultimately of the form of  $A=A$ ?

Quote:

---

This stuff doesn't even deserve to be called 'academic'. It is taught in elementary school. For some reason that is not immediately apparent to me, Kevin fails to understand the concepts that any six-year old kid can understand. I can only conclude that Kevin has some sort of mathematical-logical impairment. This is baffling, since his linguistic abilities are fairly developed.

---

Yes, it's a mystery.

Quote:

---

David: Only a perfect Buddha is absolutely free of mental illness, since he is the only one who no longer engages in irrational thought-processes.

Thomas: This would depend on how you define "mental illness". I would define it as a cognitive, emotional, or behavioral anomaly that impairs the ability to interact with the environment, whereas the environment includes social, cultural, economic, and ecological entities.

---

Of course you would. Your primary concern in life is your relationship with the mainstream, the herd, the popular majority, the conventional elite, etc. It is only natural that you would define mental illness as deviation away from the mainstream, and not from consciousness of Reality.

Quote:

---

Note that the word "anomaly" expresses "divergence from the norm" and the word "impairment" expresses "functional adversity". Under this definition, Nietzsche was mentally ill, but the Buddha wasn't.

---

Sure, your sanitized, textbook image of the Buddha doesn't deviate from the norm. But in reality, a Buddha is so different from the human race that he will probably always be regarded by the mainstream as having quite a number of major psychological disorders.

Quote:

---

Thomas: Many nominal Buddhists I know, go to the temple and donate some money or food to the monks and offer flowers and candles to the Buddha. Okay, very good. Once they're done with it, however, when they leave the temple behind, they also leave the Buddha behind. I want them to take the Buddha with them.

David: Can we get past this and actually addressing the issue?

Thomas: I can't put it into any more concrete terms.

---

As I say, I am focusing on your actual philosophical outlook on life, not your desire to have others adopt this outlook. So please stop being evasive and answer the question. Name one philosophical view that you hold which isn't 100% textbook in nature. It can't be that difficult, can it? Either articulate the view in question, if you have one, or admit openly that your entire philosophical outlook is 100% textbook in nature.

Come on, let's see a bit of honesty for a change.

Quote:

---

David: So then, what is enlightenment, in your view? And please, no textbook views.

Thomas: Awareness.

David: Too vague. Can you elaborate (without going into textbook mode)?

Thomas: No, I can't elaborate. Awareness is exactly what I mean.

---

It still sounds meaningless to my ears.

Would you say that everyone is currently enlightened?

Quote:

---

David: Thomas, face it, you are mentally-ill. [...] I have a very strong impression that you were abused or traumatized as a child. Would that be correct? Or perhaps you have brothers or cousins who suffer from psychiatric disorders? Does clinical madness run in the Knierim family?

Thomas: To answer your question, I had a very happy childhood for which I am grateful. Thankfully there was no abuse nor traumatic episodes. There are also no incidents of mental disorders in my family.

---

It must be a hardware deficiency, then. This would mean that your brain lacks the capacity to mentally step outside the mainstream. This, in turn, would imply that you have no potential for wisdom at all because you would have no mental tools to fix the problem. Indeed, you would even lack the capacity to perceive that you had a problem to begin with.

That would be far worse than being traumatized. At least with being traumatized you would have some hope for the future. By contrast, a physical incapacity to go beyond the mainstream cannot be overcome.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 891
(3/18/04 7:16 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

David: That's no surprise given that Kevin is not asserting this. He is not saying that  $1+1=2$  "follows" from  $A=A$ . Rather, he is saying that it has the form of  $A=A$ .

Pardon me?

Kevin stated verbatim on TPG: "Whatever follows from logic is what follows from  $A=A$ ." Link He has never provided anything to support this remarkably ignorant statement.

David: But in reality, a Buddha is so different from the human race that he will probably always be regarded by the mainstream as having quite a number of major psychological disorders.

Enlightenment presupposes mental health. That would of course remove an enlightened person from the human median, since minor mental impairments are extremely common. Depression, anxiety, phobias, for example, are all very common. While these conditions are "normal" in the sense of being widespread, they do not affect our understanding of mental health, just as the presence of flues and colds doesn't affect our understanding of physical health. What I am saying is in effect that a Buddha is unusually healthy, and that your presumption that a Buddha appears to show symptoms of a schizoid disorder is very misguided.

David: It must be a hardware deficiency, then. This would mean that your brain lacks the capacity to mentally step outside the mainstream.

It may be amusing for you to play the role reversal game, but there's nothing in it for you. You are the one who suffers from delusions and I am the one telling you so. Let's be clear about that.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2292

(3/18/04 9:22 pm)

Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: That's no surprise given that Kevin is not asserting this. He is not saying that  $1+1=2$  "follows" from  $A=A$ . Rather, he is saying that it has the form of  $A=A$ .

Thomas: Pardon me?

Kevin stated verbatim on TPG: "Whatever follows from logic is what follows from  $A=A$ ." Link He has never provided anything to support this remarkably ignorant statement.

---

You're misunderstanding Kevin's statement. He is merely drawing the reader's attention to the fact that  $A=A$  is the foundation of the logical process and therefore underlies all truth. Anything more than this is your own projection.

Quote:

---

David: But in reality, a Buddha is so different from the human race that he will probably always be regarded by the mainstream as having quite a number of major psychological disorders.

Thomas: Enlightenment presupposes mental health. That would of course remove an enlightened person from the human median, since minor mental impairments are extremely common. Depression, anxiety, phobias, for example, are all very common. While these conditions are "normal" in the sense of being widespread, they do not affect our understanding of mental health, just as the presence of flues and colds doesn't affect our understanding of physical health. What I am saying is in effect that a Buddha is unusually healthy, and that your presumption that a Buddha appears to show symptoms of a schizoid disorder is very misguided.

---

It's all relative, isn't it. From the point of view of enlightened people, Buddhas are indeed mentally well. But from the perspective of conventional, mainstream people, Buddhas are very strange individuals with little or no human values, and no heart.

Your belief that Buddhas appear (to the conventional, mainstream perspective) to be mentally well hinges on the peculiar delusion that Buddhas are almost identical to conventional, mainstream people. That's obviously what you must think - Buddhas are conventional people, only a bit healthier.

Quote:

---

David: It must be a hardware deficiency, then. This would mean that your brain lacks the capacity to mentally step outside the mainstream.

Thomas: It may be amusing for you to play the role reversal game, but there's nothing in it for you. You are the one who suffers from delusions and I am the one telling you so. Let's be clear about that.

---

Are you saying that you don't suffer from delusions, Thomas?

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 3/18/04 9:43 pm

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1474
(3/19/04 3:42 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

David, I'm jealous. Why don't you rip me to shreds?

-----

Because we'd only end up having sex.

---

What sort of sex?

Quote:

---

LOL. Is that why I don't feel like responding to her post on the other thread?

---

I really doubt that. I rather think it is because I spoke very directly about issues which are emotional for you. It's so much easier to just get together with another boy and make fun of a girl.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1475
(3/19/04 4:15 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

You can find out your own sign here. Have fun!

---

Humph! According to that, I am a rabbit. Thomas, I always think of you as a Taurus. Are you?

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 47
(3/19/04 4:15 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

birdofhermes: I really doubt that. I rather think it is because I spoke very directly about issues which are emotional for you. It's so much easier to just get together with another boy and make fun of a girl.

Yes indeed, you have found David!

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2299
(3/19/04 4:26 pm)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

Anna: David, I'm jealous. Why don't you rip me to shreds?

David: Because we'd only end up having sex.

Anna: What sort of sex?

---

The sort that occurs after much ripping!

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1480
(3/20/04 3:49 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

But I think we're pretty safe, each in our little cyberworld, some ten or twelve thousand miles apart.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 81
(3/20/04 4:36 am)
Reply

Re: thebigview.com

---

Quote:

---

But I think we're pretty safe, each in our little cyberworld, some ten or twelve thousand miles apart.

---

Haha the internet is a sess pool of Mental masturbation!

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

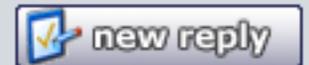

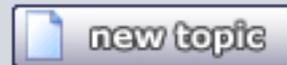

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Schizoid Personality Disorder

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 794(1/29/04 1:05 pm)Reply  | Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. neither desires nor enjoys close relationships, including being part of a family</li> <li>2. almost always chooses solitary activities</li> <li>3. has little, if any, interest in having sexual experiences with another person</li> <li>4. takes pleasure in few, if any, activities</li> <li>5. lacks close friends or confidants other than first-degree relatives</li> <li>6. appears indifferent to the praise or criticism of others</li> <li>7. shows emotional coldness, detachment, or flattened affectivity.</li> </ol> David: Funnily enough, they're surprisingly similar to the traits of an enlightened Buddha... What makes you thinks this are the traits of an enlightened Buddha? Do you think that the shrinks are right with their diagnosis? Do you think you have a schizoid PD? Or do you think that it is just a shrink-term for enlightenment? When was it diagnosed for the first time? Are you in psychotherapy? Thomas |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2152

(1/29/04 1:45 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

What makes you think these are the traits of an enlightened Buddha?

---

I know it by the light of my own wisdom and knowledge of Buddhahood.

But if you don't believe me, try the Dhammapada:

- For it is better to go alone on the path of life rather than to have a fool for a companion. With few wishes and few cares, and leaving all sins behind, let a man travel alone, like a great elephant alone in the forest.

- Leaving behind the path of darkness and following the path of light, let the wise man leave his home life and go into a life of freedom. In solitude that few enjoy, let him find his joy supreme: free from possessions, free from desires, and free from whatever may darken his mind.

- Cut down the forest of desires, not only a tree; for danger is in the forest. If you cut down the forest and its undergrowth, then, Bhikkhus, you will be free on the path of freedom.

- So long as lustful desire of a man for a woman, however small, is not destroyed, so long is that man in bondage, like a calf that drinks milk is to its mother.

- The sensuous pleasures of men flow everywhere. Bound for pleasures and seeking pleasures men suffer life and old age. Men who are pursued by lust run around like a hunted hare. Held in fetters and in bonds they suffer and suffer again.

- I have conquered all; I know all, and my life is pure; I have left all, and I am free from craving. I myself found the way. Whom shall I call Teacher? Whom shall I teach?

The gift of Truth conquers all gifts. The taste of Truth conquers all sweetness.

The Joy of Truth conquers all pleasures. The loss of desires conquers all sorrows.

- He who has compassion on his friends and confidential companions loses his own advantage, having a fettered mind; seeing danger in friendship let one wander alone like a rhinoceros. There is support and amusement in the midst of company, and for children there is great affection; Although wishing people well, one must wander alone like a rhinoceros. Having torn the ties, having broken the net as a fish in the water, being like a fire not returning to the burnt place, let one wander alone like a rhinoceros. They cultivate the society of others and serve them for the sake of personal advantage; friends without a motive are difficult to come by. Therefore, let one wander alone like a rhinoceros.

Quote:

---

Do you think that the shrinks are right with their diagnosis?
Do you think you have a schizoid PD? Or do you think that it is just a shrink-term for enlightenment?

---

I really do have schizoid PD, as does anyone who values wisdom and enters into enlightenment. The human race is too far removed from this great wisdom for it to be otherwise.

Quote:

---

When was it diagnosed for the first time?

---

When I first applied for the disability pension back in 1992.

Quote:

---

Are you in psychotherapy?

---

No. I could only benefit from that kind of treatment if the psychotherapist

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | in question was wiser than me, but it's highly unlikely that anyone like that exists in the world.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1436(1/29/04 3:56 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> The difference may lie in the ability to pull a disability check. If you pay me, I don't mind if you call me Sheila.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 799(1/29/04 6:15 pm)Reply  | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> David: I really do have schizoid PD... If you have a schizoid PD, then you probably have no close friends, you live alone, you don't go out, and you have not much face-to-face social contact. Would that describe your lifestyle? David: I could only benefit from that kind of treatment if the psychotherapist in question was wiser than me, but it's highly unlikely that anyone like that exists in the world. Even if you think nobody is wiser than your own good self, don't you think it is possible that somebody who is specialized in the field of psychology could be of any help in that field? I mean, although you may be wiser, a psychologist probably still knows more about psychology than you. Or do you think otherwise? Thomas |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2154(1/29/04 6:53 pm)Reply     | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> David: I really do have schizoid PD... Thomas: If you have a schizoid PD, then you probably have no close friends, you live alone, you don't go out, and you have not much face-to-face social contact. Would that describe your lifestyle? <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

Pretty much, yes.

I only like to socialize with thinkers, which means, of course, that there is hardly anyone to socialize with. Having said that, I currently live down the road from Kevin Solway, so at the moment I am socializing with him quite a bit.

Quote:

---

David: I could only benefit from that kind of treatment if the psychotherapist in question was wiser than me, but it's highly unlikely that anyone like that exists in the world.

Thomas: Even if you think nobody is wiser than your own good self, don't you think it is possible that somebody who is specialized in the field of psychology could be of any help in that field? I mean, although you may be wiser, a psychologist probably still knows more about psychology than you. Or do you think otherwise?

---

Apart from truly great thinkers such as Nietzsche, Weininger and Solway, I haven't met anyone who has a greater insight into human psychology than myself.

The trouble with trained psychologists is that (a) they have no interest in, and knowledge of, wisdom, (b) their thinking is uninspired, tedious and conventional, and (c) their main aim in dealing with psychological deviants is to try and eliminate the deviancy and bring the person back into the mainstream fold - regardless of the quality of the deviancy. Because of this, they are of no help to me.

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 334

(1/29/04 7:14 pm)

Reply

Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Thomas Knierim wrote:

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

David: I really do have schizoid PD...

If you have a schizoid PD, then you probably have no close friends, you live alone, you don't go out, and you have not much face-to-face social contact. Would that describe your lifestyle?

LB: It describes mine, and anyone else who is really on the path. And it appears i am schizoid too!

David: I could only benefit from that kind of treatment if the psychotherapist in question was wiser than me, but it's highly unlikely that anyone like that exists in the world.

TK:

Even if you think nobody is wiser than your own good self, don't you think it is possible that somebody who is specialized in the field of psychology could be of any help in that field? I mean, although you may be wiser, a psychologist probably still knows more about psychology than you. Or do you think otherwise?

LB: He didnt say nobody is wiser than he (im not dead yet), he said probably no one practicing in that field is wiser than he (i think).

Anyway, its true.

There's a huge difference between "knowing about psychology" and understand the mind. Most pschologist have a poor understanding of the mind, in comparison to a wise man. Furthermore, going under the care of an idiot (most are) can be really dangerous. For instance, in my case i was (at-the-time) stupid enuf to be analyzed by a christian-female-therapist years ago, who hadn't a shot-in-hell of understanding me.

Cost me my very daughter.

On the up side it seems the officials had mercy on me, rewarding me for their blunder.

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | Now I'm rich! Leo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 800(1/29/04 7:24 pm)Reply  | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Leo: It describes mine, and anyone else who is really on the path. And it appears i am schizoid too! Not necessarily. But since you brought it up: do you think your indications are 'serious'? Did you get a diagnosis? Leo: For instance, in my case i was (at-the-time) stupid enuf to be analyzed by a christian-female-therapist years ago, who hadn't a shot-in-hell of understanding me. So you DID get a diagnosis. What was the result? Leo: Cost me my very daughter. On the up side it seems the officials had mercy on me, rewarding me for their blunder. That is a bit cryptic to me. What do you mean with "cost me my daughter" and "being rewarded"? Thomas |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 339(1/29/04 9:26 pm)Reply                                                                                        | Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Thomas, One thing i learned along the way is that often-times there is a price to pay when one answers the questions of certain people, and i mean no insult when i say-- people such as yourself (very sure they are very wise but extremely mistaken). Nevertheless, i'll gratify you this time... NO, i dont think it is 'serious', not in the way you mean serious. But on the other hand, truthful and wise people ARE perceived as potentially seriously dangerous, for the same reason that-- to use a metaphor-- the devil fears and hates Christ.                                                                                                                                            |

There was a test that i took to make them happy, but to tell you the truth i have no idea what came of it. Since i knew better than they did its conclusion meant diddly-squat to me. I know I didnt do that 'well', but you need to be very ordinary and conventional to do well in those things.

This psychologist was my therapist, an Adventist christian who 'spoke in tounes'. I was really dumb back then! As it turns out, i found out later that my estranged wife had met with her behind my back, feeding her bull so as to ensure the shrink would not speak highly of me in divorce court, not that she would have anyway. I permitted her to be questioned, I had nothing to hide.

And just to be sure my own attorney did next to nothing on my behalf, this shameful psychologist also insisted to speak to them (the first one quit after she spoke to him!).

The suggestion of a questionable state of mind, however slight it was, was all that was needed to ensure the beginning of the end of my relationship to my beloved daughter.

But now I'm free.

Leo

ps. There, you have it! Now be sure to remind me once and a while that your world has determined im nuts, just as you keep reminding David Quinn!

pss. You're such a loser.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 803
(1/29/04 10:20 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Leo: One thing i learned along the way is that often-times there is a price to pay when one answers the questions of certain people, and i mean no insult when i say-- people such as yourself (very sure they are very wise but extremely mistaken).

Think about your other readers then. Maybe they want to understand why you keep quoting van der Leuw. You don't need to answer if you don't want to.

Leo: The suggestion of a questionable state of mind, however slight it was, was all that was needed to ensure the beginning of the end of my relationship to my beloved daughter.

I don't understand why you say you lost your daughter. What test did you do and what was its outcome?

Leo: ps. There, you have it! Now be sure to remind me once and a while that your world has determined im nuts, just as you keep reminding David Quinn!

I don't think you're nuts and I don't think DQ is nuts. David has some pretty unusual (and IMO disagreeable) views on some things, but that doesn't necessarily make him nutty.

I basically just want to understand why you say the things you say.

Thomas

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 661
(1/30/04 5:02 am)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

I took an online personality test, and it said that I had a low risk for most areas. A few were 'moderate', contradictory ones, like schizoid as well as histo...something.

I claim enlightenment, yet I don't think that the seeker should become extremely introverted and isolated. That's opposite of the view that a truly enlightened person ever has. The point of enlightenment is love.

Think about this, David, The Buddha and the Christ walked around talking to people. They had intimate contact with others. You sit in your house, on the internet..having no intimate contact...and you only prefer to talk to wise people. Why should a wise person prefer to only talk with another wise person? That's just stupid, and it doesn't even serve the purpose of promoting wisdom. It shows that you're still just a seeker.

Edited by: voce io at: 1/30/04 5:02 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2154

(1/30/04 7:43 am)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

I claim enlightenment, yet I don't think that the seeker should become extremely introverted and isolated.

---

Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts.

Quote:

---

That's opposite of the view that a truly enlightened person ever has. The point of enlightenment is love.

---

The love of an enlightened person is perceived as a very deep threat by almost everyone in the human race.

Quote:

---

Think about this, David, The Buddha and the Christ walked around talking to people. They had intimate contact with others. You sit in your house, on the internet..having no intimate contact...and you only prefer to talk to wise people. Why should a wise person prefer to only talk with another wise person? That's just stupid, and it doesn't even serve the purpose of promoting wisdom. It shows that you're still just a seeker.

---

You're forgetting that the Buddha and Christ didn't have the internet, and thus they didn't have a choice in the matter. The beauty of the internet is that one can scour the world and find those one or two oddballs in each city that have genuine potential for wisdom. Without this tool, one is confined to the place where one lives, where virtually everyone one meets is spiritually dead. Until this situation changes in some way, it makes far better sense for the enlightened person to pour his energies into the internet.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 661
(1/30/04 11:05 am)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts.

The seeker, yes, but not the enlightened one.

The love of an enlightened person is perceived as a very deep threat by almost everyone in the human race.

What proof do you have for this statement?

You're forgetting that the Buddha and Christ didn't have the internet, and thus they didn't have a choice in the matter. The beauty of the internet is that one can scour the world and find those one or two oddballs in each city that have genuine potential for wisdom. Without this tool, one is confined to the place where one lives, where virtually everyone one meets is spiritually dead. Until this situation changes in some way, it makes far better sense for the enlightened person to pour his energies into the internet.

Only the internet? I agree with you, that it's a good tool...but the fact that you use it instead of intimate contact just seems to show you have a disorder, and aren't enlightened.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2158
(1/30/04 11:54 am)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts.

VI: The seeker, yes, but not the enlightened one.

---

The enlightened person too - even more so than the seeker.

Quote:

---

DQ: The love of an enlightened person is perceived as a very deep threat by almost everyone in the human race.

VI: What proof do you have for this statement?

---

The freedom of his non-attachment threatens anyone who clings to their attachments. The loftiness of his views, the way they so freely cut into people's cherished attachments, is regarded with deep fear by the general population. As a result, he tends to bring out the animal in people. Socrates and Jesus weren't lynched and put to death for no reason.

The great Christian thinker, Soren Kierkegaard, spoke in detail about this aspect of spirituality:

--

- The natural man can tolerate spirit for an hour when it is introduced very guardedly at the distance of the imagination - yes, then it even pleases him. But if it's moved any closer to him, so that it is presented with dead earnest as a demand on him, then the self-preservation instinct of his ego is aroused to such an extent that it becomes a regular fury.

- To have faith is really to advance along the way where all human road signs point: back, back, back.

- This is how one rises in the world, when a person has reached one rung of the ladder, he hankers and tries to go higher. But when a person has become involved with God, so that God truly has hold of him and uses him, this is how he rises: at every higher rung he is supposed to climb, he begs like a child to be exempted, for he well understands that, from a human point of view, suffering and wretchedness and spiritual trial mount on the same scale. How often an apostle has pleaded for himself in this way.

- When one preaches Christianity in such a way that the echo answers "he is mad", know then this signifies that there are considerable elements of truth in his preaching. But perhaps he is not pressing hard enough, either by his oral preaching or by the preaching of his life. But when one preaches Christianity in such a way that the echo answers "Away with that man from the earth, he does not deserve to live", know then that this is the Christianity of the New Testament.

- In his majesty God sets the pitch so high that if a person is unwilling to let go of his finite common sense, will not abandon flat, self-indulgent mediocrity, then what God calls help, salvation, grace etc, is the most biting irony.

- And when one does not have a single human being who understands him, then He is willing to listen, and He can remember far better than any man, even better than one can himself. And when one's thoughts are so confused that one does not know whether he is coming or going, God has not forgotten even the slightest thing one has prayed him to remember.

- To be chosen by God is, speaking merely humanly, unconditionally the most terrible of all the terrible misfortunes which can happen to man. And in every weak moment the chosen one himself thinks so too. Madness is set between him and men; they cannot understand him. Thus he lives in the most agonizing isolation. He endures bestial treatment from men, for when the idea is to be introduced, men become so outraged that the animal side comes to fore. Literally there is not a single one who can understand him. Nor is he able to help anyone, he knows full well he could never get anyone to relate himself to the idea as he has. No one can rejoice with him. No one can sorrow with him; no one understands how and why he suffers. God is rather the very one who, with the most calculated cruelty, martyrs him when men are unable to do it. So he lives. As long as he lives, intently concentrated, he is much too strong for his contemporaries, like a fatal poison. During his life, all those who are called preachers, professors, all those pathbound animal creatures, are the most zealous to put him to death, as with the Saviour of the world. When he is dead, assistant professors, preachers and professors thin him out in their own water, and then in the water of the thousands whom they teach - and the water gives the most refreshing, delicious taste - magnificent!

- God can involve himself with the human race on one of two conditions, either in such a way that individuals are found who are willing to venture out so far in hating themselves that God can use them as apostles, or in such a way that the true situation is honestly and unconditionally admitted. The latter is my primitivity.

As far as the former is concerned, this is certainly the instruction of the New Testament. But with respect to venturing out so far, the following must be noted. This is something so dreadful for a human being that it is permissible to say: I dare not.

--

Quote:

---

DQ: You're forgetting that the Buddha and Christ didn't have the internet, and thus they didn't have a choice in the matter. The beauty of the internet is that one can scour the world and find those one or two oddballs in each city that have genuine potential for wisdom. Without this tool, one is confined to the place where one lives, where virtually everyone one meets is spiritually dead. Until this situation changes in some way, it makes far better sense for the enlightened person to pour his energies into the internet.

VI: Only the internet? I agree with you, that it's a good tool... but the fact that you use it instead of intimate contact just seems to show you have a disorder, and aren't enlightened.

---

You're still a teenager and socializing is still important to you. I understand that. But as you get older, you may start to find it tedious and unappealing. I've experienced plenty of "intimate contact" in my lifetime and nowadays I am bored with it. I get nothing out of socializing with non-thinkers, and they in turn lack the capacity to benefit from me. Because of this, interacting with them is a waste of time, no matter which way you look at it.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 505
(1/30/04 12:06 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

- The natural man can tolerate spirit for an hour when it is introduced very guardedly at the distance of the imagination - yes, then it even pleases him. But if it's moved any closer to him, so that it is presented with dead earnest as a demand on him, then the self-preservation instinct of his ego is aroused to such an extent that it becomes a regular fury.

One of the failings of the internet and why I'm bit of a pretender. The internet allows for this distance to be maintained by me (and many other contributors as well).

Recently I've had an bad infection and am taking anti-biotics, so I can't drink. I'm also trying to cease smoking pot regularly, again partly for health reasons (it makes one too physically lazy, tired).

Notice any difference without these attachments :) (no need to reply)

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 219
(1/30/04 12:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Quote:

---

voce io: I claim enlightenment, yet I don't think that the seeker should become extremely introverted and isolated.

DQ: Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts.

---

David, your above statement would seem that you desire to place yourself around like mind individuals, yet, avoid those that aren't. This alone is the difference between a seeker, as voce calls it, and the true enlightened. I do not believe (in what I have read) Jesus or the Buddha would use avoidance as a method of dealing with those 'inferior' (which is what you are saying). In fact, it seems they would have thought just the opposite, not in teaching or preaching, which they did do, but in tolerance and general love of consciousness.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1356

(1/30/04 12:34 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Very sad, Leo. Don't you get to visit?

I bet it was the MMPI, Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory. I took it, too, when I was getting divorced. I didn't know what to make of such a test, as it asked questions that to me were not intended for your garden variety neurotic like me, but for paranoid schizophrenics and criminals. They asked the same questions over and over. Was I not supposed to notice? They kept asking questions such as whether people were talking about me, or plotting against me. I felt sort of uncooperative saying no over and over and may have thrown them a bone or two. On the other hand, people were talking and plotting, those people being my ex-husband, his father and my father. But I knew better than to say so.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2160

(1/30/04 2:33 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Cass wrote:

Quote:

---

voce io: I claim enlightenment, yet I don't think that the seeker should become extremely introverted and isolated.

DQ: Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts.

Cass: David, your above statement would seem that you desire to place yourself around like mind individuals, yet, avoid those that aren't.

---

Not really. The statement refers to the way in which the enlightened person is so different mentally from the average person that it wouldn't matter at all whether he interacted with ordinary people or not. He would still be in utter isolation.

Not that he minds, of course.

Quote:

---

This alone is the difference between a seeker, as voce calls it, and the true enlightened. I do not believe (in what I have read) Jesus or the Buddha would use avoidance as a method of dealing with those 'inferior' (which is what you are saying).

---

Jesus primarily hung around with his twelve disciples, while the Buddha mainly socialized with his monks in the sangha.

Quote:

---

In fact, it seems they would have thought just the opposite, not in teaching or preaching, which they did do, but in tolerance and general love of consciousness.

---

There is a Hindu saying, "God may be in the tiger, but it is dangerous to go near him all the same." The issue in question has nothing to do with tolerance or love. It has more to do with priorities - i.e. choosing a way of life that best supports one's goal in life, which in my case is the survival of wisdom.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 343
(1/30/04 8:52 pm)
Reply

Buddha? or Schizoid ?

---

Thomas Knierim wrote:

-----

Leo: One thing i learned along the way is that often-times there is a price to pay when one answers the questions of certain people, and i mean no insult when i say-- people such as yourself (very sure they are very wise but extremely mistaken).

Think about your other readers then. Maybe they want to understand why you keep quoting van der Leuw. You don't need to answer if you don't want to.

LB: Really?

Anyway the last time i checked this thing here was called "Genius Forum", so it only seems reasonable to quote geniuses.

Leo: The suggestion of a questionable state of mind, however slight it was, was all that was needed to ensure the beginning of the end of my relationship to my beloved daughter.

I don't understand why you say you lost your daughter. What test did you do and what was its outcome?

LB: Well, i tried like hell to keep her mother from kidnapping her, running off to another state in our blessed Union, but some new judge decided to let her get away with it.

Some sort of mind-test, you know. You answer a load of questions and to score well one must be a member of the herd.

I basically just want to understand why you say the things you say.

LB: Im afraid you will never understand, im not from your world.

Leo

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 344
(1/30/04 8:57 pm)
Reply

cost of freedom

---

DQ:

The freedom of his non-attachment threatens anyone who clings to their attachments. The loftiness of his views, the way they so freely cut into people's cherished attachments, is regarded with deep fear by the general population. As a result, he tends to bring out the animal in people. Socrates and Jesus weren't lynched and put to death for no reason.

LB: And come pretty close myself, at times. Im not very quiet when in the midst of the ignorant, though maybe i should be.

Leo

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 345

(1/30/04 9:30 pm)

Reply

Jesus often went off on his own

---

I should say, though enlightened men might attempt to mingle with the general population sooner or later others become intollerant of him. He is a hard man to trust as you cant size up the state of ones ego when there is hardly any ego there! And his un-emotional attitute makes him seem odd to say the least.

As an aside...

Most women in their interaction with men need to perform certain tests, which if the man fails he is no longer allowed to stick around. Since the wise man knows all about these things, and since the woman cant conceive that a man knows her and her ways so well (or if he does he's a danger), the only way he can manage to be accepted is by pretending he doesnt know what she is up to and faking the emotional bit (alcohol and drugs can help). He cant be frank with her and say "Listen, im a really fine human being even though i am different from your average Joe, you have nothing to fear from me, i will respect you more than most. Dont bother with the little tests and looks in the eye as a means for determining how safe i am to be around. You wont be satisfied by the look in my eye because i have no interest in making you think you are the best thing since sliced bread, so the great feeling you get from other men, the joy on their faces for just being around you, that you will not see in me, but it doesnt mean i dont want to be here, and it doesnt mean you are at greater risk around me just because i am not attached to you."

(btw, The only exception im aware of is David Quinn and baby girls!)

At bottom women figure if a man wants them, warm and alive, then they are safer, and not only that, he will defend her from harm to protect his interests in her (her body). Whereas if a strange man wants little more from them than to chat, there is no way she is sufficiently valuable to him to trust him very much.

PLus, she figures, if she cant get laid and she cant get his money then he has little more to offer her.

Do you recall, Jesus would often go off to be alone, leave the group of disciples, they were concerned he was lonely or sad and unsociable, but he said "I am never alone, the Father is always with me", Jesus had little in the way of ego, so he understood to the core the reality of his non-existence, so he could never be alone so long as his mind had a perfectly clear look at God, at Truth. It may take two to tango, but it takes 'one' to be lonely, or falling for the illusion of self-existence.

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                   | Leo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 661(1/31/04 2:28 am)Reply | Re: Jesus often went off on his own <hr/> I like your arguments about Jesus and Buddha being alone. I just need to add that people judge you by your intentions. If you have the intention of "I want to be known as a Genius", and your definition of 'Genius' is a 'dangerous thinker', then of course society will think of you as a monster. They will see you as dangerous, because you'll be manifesting danger towards them. Being absorbed in God, a person has no desires, and no intentions. People can't really find them dangerous, because there's nothing to be afraid of, there's really not a person there (a person being intentions - how people generally judge others). People will naturally be drawn towards a truly enlightened person. Of course, if the enlightened person who is teaching tells them things like: "I am trying to kill you (ego)" and "You have to let go"...they will fight it. However, if an enlightened person is aware that the person may be too weak and uncaring to go through such a teaching, they won't say it. |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Schizoid Personality Disorder

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 355(1/31/04 4:29 pm)Reply | wise ways <hr/> voce io wrote: I like your arguments about Jesus and Buddha being alone. I just need to add that people judge you by your intentions. If you have the intention of "I want to be known as a Genius", and your definition of 'Genius' is a 'dangerous thinker', then of course society will think of you as a monster. They will see you as dangerous, because you'll be manifesting danger towards them. LB: Sure, one's ego can cause even the genuine student problems. I agree it pays to be careful about word choices, there are alot of loonies out there, impulsive, easily threatened. Being absorbed in God, a person has no desires, and no intentions. People can't really find them dangerous, because there's nothing to be afraid of, there's really not a person there (a person being intentions - how people generally judge others). LB: Sure, the enlightened person is laid back and easy-going, appears passive, but at the same time you will find most people measure one's mental health based on really low-level (animal) attitudes, behavior, etc. By this i mean, the world doesnt consider it normal to not want to laugh and play and |

be drawn into emotional interaction. For instance, if a buddha was there watching the street and some small children were run-over by trucks and it was all this screaming bloody scene, still there on his face you would find no typical emotional reaction, not to any calamity, and this fact would trouble most people- to see someone un-troubled by the suffering of others. In my case i recently ate some tainted food, i should have tossed it out but i took a chance and became terribly sick. After it all had passed out the poison apparently attacked my brain, for a time, and during that stretch of hours i was in a terrible state, but to look at me you could never tell how freaked i was inside, i dont show it like the ordinary Joe. Consequently when i tried to get help no matter what words i used to explain the severity of the problem no one understood the emergency since it did not show on my face.

The buddha isnt some sort of passive angel who goes around smiling at women and children, kissing and patting them on the heads, not in the advanced stages anyway. There are many spiritual frauds out there that have re-defined what it means to be and act enlightened, but it doesnt change the reality.

People will naturally be drawn towards a truly enlightened person.

LB: To the degree that they love Truth.

Of course, if the enlightened person who is teaching tells them things like: "I am trying to kill you (ego)" and "You have to let go"...they will fight it. However, if an enlightened person is aware that the person may be too weak and uncaring to go through such a teaching, they won't say it

LB: The former would not be an enlightened person.

Leo

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2154(1/31/04 7:04 pm)Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Being absorbed in God, a person has no desires, and no intentions. <hr/> Like comatose persons yes?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 664(2/1/04 2:47 am)Reply                                                                                     | ... <hr/> Yes, but they're conscious.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2160(2/1/04 2:49 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> That's gotta hurt.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| ksolwayPosts: 370(3/8/04 11:57 pm)Reply                      | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> I would be interested to see how people score on this personality test. My results are below. www.4degreez.com/misc/personality_disorder_test.mv Paranoid: LowSchizoid: HighSchizotypal: ModerateAntisocial: LowBorderline: Low |

Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

I think this must have been a very similar test to the one David did. And according to this, I too would come out as schizoid.

I suspect that ALL spiritual philosophers will come out with the result that they are schizoid and moderately schizotypal, as they tend to be loners, they are totally unconcerned with the praise or criticism of others, they have difficulty trusting others (because they know how deluded they are), and other people view them to be eccentric, and to be cold and distant.

Edited by: ksolway at: 3/9/04 12:04 am

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2548
(3/9/04 12:21 am)
Reply

----

---

Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: High
Schizotypal: Low
Antisocial: Low
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: High Narcissistic: High
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

That test is stupid.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 803
(3/9/04 1:02 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: Low
Schizotypal: Moderate
Antisocial: Low
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Moderate
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

BJMcGilly
Registered User
Posts: 9
(3/9/04 1:05 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: High
Schizotypal: Moderate
Antisocial: Low
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Moderate
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Moderate

What a load of loaded bs.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 805
(3/9/04 1:12 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Why do you think it's a load of loaded bs?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 77
(3/9/04 1:23 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Your Results:
Disorder Rating

Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: High
Schizotypal: Low
Antisocial: Moderate
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

MGregory
Posts: 498
(3/9/04 5:21 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: Very High
Schizotypal: Moderate
Antisocial: High
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Moderate

I'm winning the schizoid test! Woo-hoo!

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/9/04 5:33 am

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 250
(3/9/04 7:14 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

My results:
Paranoid:Low
Schizoid:Moderate
Schizotypal:Moderate
Antisocial:Low
Borderline:Low
Histrionic:Low
Narcissistic:Moderate
Avoidant:High
Dependent:Low
Obsessive-Compulsive:Moderate

Pretty good test...

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 211
(3/9/04 7:50 am)
Reply

...

---

Disorder | Rating
Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: Moderate
Schizotypal: Moderate
Antisocial: Low
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Low
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2263

(3/9/04 8:12 am)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Paranoid: High

Schizoid: Very High

Schizotypal: Moderate

Antisocial: Moderate

Borderline: Low

Histrionic: Low

Narcissistic: High

Avoidant: Low

Dependent: Low

Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

Proof that I'm ultra-schizoid .....

Quote:

---

Kevin: I think this must have been a very similar test to the one David did.

---

The only test I have done of this sort was over ten years ago when first applying for the disability pension. It consisted of two hundred and fifty multiple choice questions similar to the ones asked here, except not quite as generic and obvious. For example, instead of simply asking outright whether you feel anxious in public or suffer from mood swings, they posed countless specific situations and asked how you would most likely respond. The examiners would then correlate the answers and try to measure underlying patterns. I found it almost impossible to answer half the questions because the two choices they provided had no relevance to me. I ended up leaving a third of the test blank.

Since then, my "schizoidism" has been diagnosed by more informal means, through chat.

wounded bird

Posts: 10

(3/9/04 8:47 am)

Reply

Random comments

---

Although I am trying to learn about Enlightenment, not that I seek it out for it is more a curiosity issue, I tend to agree with voce io. What is the point of being Enlightened or wise if not to share with others what you have found?

Weininger's claim of alone-ness can be valid for someone who has dedicated themselves to be a guiding light to others rather than a family man, but even he espoused alone-ness. Even a family man can be a source of guidance to his family...he just chose a smaller universe with which to work but equally as important. Further, Christ asked of his Apostles to leave all things, including family and friends to do his work, but he did NOT ask them to become hermits and squirrel away all that had been given to them because of their sacrifice. It goes with the old story of the lamp under a basket Scripture.

“Well, he does become introverted and isolated in the sense that almost no one understands him or can relate to his thoughts”

While this may be true, he came from understanding to his current level of not being understood. He may not be able to be understood in his higher thinking, (God's ways are not your ways) he knows how to be understood in the old terms. Therefore, he must guide not convert others into seeing these same things. I'm not sure about “enlightenment”, but any spiritual change in a person comes from within not without. If he cannot be a teacher, you may be right in that he should be a monk, hermit, sage, or some other type of being that sits about and prays all the time for the “enlightenment” of other souls. So, voce io, perhaps there may be two types of enlightened individuals, those that teach and those that can't, each having their own respective duties. Both can love, but their love is manifested in different ways.

Like Weininger, this introverted isolationist may have sociopsychic issues, but there could exist genius in some of his thoughts and ideas. Genius, however, does not equate with wisdom. Wisdom is truly the application of Genius for the greater good of mankind.

“I've experienced plenty of "intimate contact" in my lifetime and nowadays I am bored with it. I get nothing out of socializing with non-thinkers, and they in turn lack the capacity to benefit from me. Because of this, interacting with them is a waste of time, no matter which way you look at it.”

As an older person, I can relate, however, I think people always can benefit in some way. Voce is correct in that because of love, those that would not ordinarily understand your ponderings, can understand your works, your kindnesses, your heart. You would have innate abilities of seeing the bigger picture of things and react accordingly. As in this possible way:

It seems to me that these quotations from Soren Kierkegaard are quite interesting if you put them into a different context. What say the enlightened one becomes so far skewed from the rest of humanity that no one can understand him? God then takes him from his madness, molds him into the Apostle and uses him for his purpose. Given that we are speaking from God's standpoint, we have to know, then, if he can do these things that he will then equip this so-called martyr – Apostle reborn with the abilities to love and to spread this love through works and/or teaching, for would God waste a willing spirit?

As to understanding, look a bit closer at the Apostles. Most of them were blue collar type labor...fishermen. It is ironic that Jesus picked fishermen...fishers of men. These people had no advanced schooling and were not even holy men in the Sanhedrin, they were the locals. AND YET, they understood after it was all done at Pentecost...their enlightenment. We should try not to be so heady as one day it shall be taken and where will you be then? I've had my own scare in that arena, and let's just say that I am thankful that I am here and desire nothing more than to serve whomever may cross my path the best way I can...not that I am Enlightened in any way shape or form nor do I or ever will I say that I am even if I were. I'm not quite sure I want that much of responsibility on my shoulders.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1457

(3/9/04 9:25 am)

Reply

Re: Random comments

---

Disorder Rating Information

Paranoid: Low

Schizoid: Low

Schizotypal: Low

Antisocial: Low

Borderline: Low

Histrionic: Low

Narcissistic: Low

Avoidant: Low

Dependent: Low

Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

And I even spent a night in jail once.

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Kellyven Posts: 51 (3/9/04 11:01 am) Reply                     | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Paranoid HSchizoid VHSchizotypal HAntisocial LBorderline LHistrionic MNarcissistic HAvoidant LDependent LObsessive-Compulsiv M                                                                                                                                                       |
| Rick Registered User Posts: 8 (3/9/04 11:06 am) Reply     | Re: Random comments <hr/> I'm a wreck according to this test. And I don't do any drugs or anything. Disorder   RatingParanoid: Very HighSchizoid: HighSchizotypal: HighAntisocial: HighBorderline: LowHistrionic: HighNarcissistic: Very HighAvoidant: Very HighDependent: ModerateObsessive-Compulsive: Moderate |
| jimhaz Registered User Posts: 616 (3/9/04 11:40 am) Reply | Re: Random comments <hr/> Paranoid: ModerateSchizoid: HighSchizotypal: HighAntisocial: ModerateBorderline: LowHistrionic: LowNarcissistic: HighAvoidant: HighDependent: LowObsessive-Compulsive: Low                                                                                                                         |

|                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                    | Clearly I'm crazy :) Though I prefer these results than if it was reversed with Borderline, Histrionic, Dependant, Obsessive-compulsive being high. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 809(3/9/04 12:01 pm)Reply  | Re: Random comments <hr/> Wow Rick, you win!                                                                                                        |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

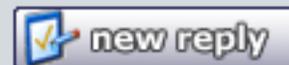

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Schizoid Personality Disorder

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1024(3/9/04 12:15 pm)Reply  | Re: Random comments <hr/> Disorder   Rating           Paranoid: Low           Schizoid: Moderate           Schizotypal: Low           Antisocial: Moderate           Borderline: Low           Histrionic: Low           Narcissistic: Moderate           Avoidant: Low           Dependent: Low           Obsessive-Compulsive: High Whilst looking at the prognosis for Obsessive-Compulsive, I soon realised that I had actually answered in the negative for around 75% of the questions but answered positive for the "do you engage in obsessive-compulsive behaviour" simply because I have eczema and allergies and consequently scratch and wash a lot (perhaps this isn't categorised as typical ob-comp behaviour). I think the only other positive answer was being focussed on orderliness and perfection. The other six questions mentioned recieved a negative reply and yet it comes out as high for this disorder. Seems like a rather dubious test. I've got to be more crazy than it suggests. Edited by: Dave Toast at: 3/9/04 12:49 pm |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|----|-----------|----|----------|----|------------|----|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2550(3/9/04 1:17 pm)Reply                                                                                        | --- <hr/> If I did the test again today it would be different. It is not really a test, but a curiosity, a prop for speculative nonsense of many kinds.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 860(3/9/04 1:41 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> I couldn't answer any of these questions honestly with 'yes', hence, low on all. The tendency towards 'schizoid' among the participants of this forum is quite interesting, although the results seem suspiciously stereotypic. Do you think that the Internet has a negative impact on your social life, on direct contact with other people, group memberships, etc.? Thomas                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 617(3/9/04 1:43 pm)Reply                                                                                          | Re: --- <hr/> Here is another test Jung Typology Test www.humanmetrics.com/cgi-win/JTypes2.asp My result: Your Type isINTP Strength of the preferences % <table data-bbox="440 1444 721 1619"> <tr> <td>Introverted</td> <td>67</td> </tr> <tr> <td>Intuitive</td> <td>33</td> </tr> <tr> <td>Thinking</td> <td>78</td> </tr> <tr> <td>Perceiving</td> <td>22</td> </tr> </table> Qualitative analysis of your type formula You are:      distinctively expressed introvert     moderately expressed intuitive personality     very expressed thinking personality     slightly expressed perceiving personality    | Introverted | 67 | Intuitive | 33 | Thinking | 78 | Perceiving | 22 |
| Introverted                                                                                                                                                              | 67                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
| Intuitive                                                                                                                                                                | 33                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
| Thinking                                                                                                                                                                 | 78                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |
| Perceiving                                                                                                                                                               | 22                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |             |    |           |    |          |    |            |    |

I liked this test because of the detailed description given below

Introverted iNtuitive Thinking Perceiving

by Joe Butt

Profile: INTP

Revision: 2.4

Date of Revision: 20 Jul 03

INTPs are pensive, analytical folks. They may venture so deeply into thought as to seem detached, and often actually are oblivious to the world around them.

Precise about their descriptions, INTPs will often correct others (or be sorely tempted to) if the shade of meaning is a bit off. While annoying to the less concise, this fine discrimination ability gives INTPs so inclined a natural advantage as, for example, grammarians and linguists.

INTPs are relatively easy-going and amenable to most anything until their principles are violated, about which they may become outspoken and inflexible. They prefer to return, however, to a reserved albeit benign ambiance, not wishing to make spectacles of themselves.

A major concern for INTPs is the haunting sense of impending failure. They spend considerable time second-guessing themselves. The open-endedness (from Perceiving) conjoined with the need for competence (NT) is expressed in a sense that one's conclusion may well be met by an equally plausible alternative solution, and that, after all, one may very well have overlooked some critical bit of data. An INTP arguing a point may very well be trying to convince himself as much as his opposition. In this way INTPs are markedly different from INTJs, who are much more confident in their competence and willing to act on their convictions.

Mathematics is a system where many INTPs love to play, similarly languages, computer systems--potentially any complex system. INTPs thrive on systems. Understanding, exploring, mastering, and manipulating systems can overtake the INTP's conscious thought. This fascination for logical wholes and their inner workings is often expressed in a detachment from the environment, a concentration where time is forgotten and extraneous stimuli are held at bay. Accomplishing a task or goal with this knowledge is secondary.

INTPs and Logic -- One of the tipoffs that a person is an INTP is her obsession with logical correctness. Errors are not often due to poor logic -- apparent faux pas in reasoning are usually a result of overlooking details or of incorrect context.

Games NTs seem to especially enjoy include Risk, Bridge, Stratego, Chess, Go, and word games of all sorts. (I have an ENTP friend that loves Boggle and its variations. We've been known to sit in public places and pick a word off a menu or mayonnaise jar to see who can make the most words from its letters on a napkin in two minutes.) The INTP mailing list has enjoyed a round of Metaphore, virtual volleyball, and a few 'finish the series' brain teasers.

INTPs in the main are not clannish. The INTP mailing list, with a readership now in triple figures, was in its incipience fraught with all the difficulties of the Panama canal: we had trouble deciding on:

- 1) whether or not there should be such a group,
- 2) exactly what such a group should be called, and
- 3) which of us would have to take the responsibility for organization and maintenance of the aforesaid group/club/whatever.

Functional Analysis

Introverted Thinking

Introverted Thinking strives to extract the essence of the Idea from various externals that express it. In the extreme, this conceptual essence wants no form or substance to verify its reality. Knowing the Truth is enough for INTPs; the knowledge that this truth can (or could) be demonstrated is sufficient to satisfy the knower. "Cogito, ergo sum" expresses this prime directive quite succinctly.

In seasons of low energy level, or moments of single-minded concentration, the INTP is aloof and detached in a way that might even offend more relational or extraverted individuals.

Extraverted iNtuition

Intuition softens and socializes Thinking, fleshing out the brittle bones of truths formed in the dominant inner world. That which is is not negotiable; yet actual application diffuses knowledge to the extent that knowledge needs qualification and context to be of any consequence in this foreign world of substance.

If Thinking can desist, the INTP is free to brainstorm, calling up the perceptions of the unconscious (i.e., intuition) which are mirrored in patterns in the realm of matter, time and space. These perceptions, in the form of theories or hunches, must ultimately defer to the inner principles, or at least they must not negate them.

Intuition unchained gives birth to play. INTPs enjoy games, formal or impromptu, which coax analogies, patterns and theories from the unseen into spontaneous expression in a way that defies their own comprehension.

Introverted Sensing

Sensing is of a subjective, inner nature similar to that of the SJs. It supplies awareness of the forms of senses rather than the raw, analogic stimuli. Facts and figures seek to be cleaned up for comparison with an ever growing range of previously experienced input. Sensing assists intuition in sorting out and arranging information into the building blocks for Thinking's elaborate systems.

The internalizing nature of the INTP's Sensing function leaves a relative absence of environmental awareness (i.e., Extraverted Sensing), except when the environment is the current focus. Consciousness of such conditions is at best a sometime thing.

Extraverted Feeling

Feeling tends to be all or none. When present, the INTP's concern for others is intense, albeit naive. In a crisis, this feeling judgement is often silenced by the emergence of Thinking, who rushes in to avert chaos and destruction. In the absence of a clear principle, however, INTPs have been known to defer judgement and to allow decisions about interpersonal matters to be left hanging lest someone be offended or somehow injured. INTPs are at risk of being swept away by the shadow in the form of their own strong emotional impulses.

Famous INTPs:

Socrates, Rene Descartes, Blaise Pascal, Sir Isaac Newton

U.S. Presidents:

James Madison, John Quincy Adams, John Tyler, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Gerald Ford

William Harvey (pioneer in human physiology)

C. G. Jung, (Freudian defector, author of Psychological Types, etc.)

William James

Albert Einstein

Tom Foley (Speaker of the House--U.S. House of Representatives)

Henri Mancini

Bob Newhart

Jeff Bingaman, U.S. Senator (D.--NM)

Rick Moranis (Honey, I Shrunk The Kids)

Midori Ito (ice skater, Olympic silver medalist)

Tiger Woods

Edited by: jimhaz at: 3/9/04 1:51 pm

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 251

(3/9/04 1:59 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

On this test I am a INTJ

A "mastermind" apparently...way too many political types fit my category...

:-/

Masterminds will adopt ideas only if they are useful, which is to say if they work efficiently toward accomplishing the Mastermind's well-defined goals. Natural leaders, Masterminds are not at all eager to take command of projects or groups, preferring to stay in the background until others demonstrate their inability to lead. Once in charge, however, Masterminds are the supreme pragmatists, seeing reality as a crucible for refining their strategies for goal-directed action. In a sense, Masterminds approach reality as they would a giant chess board, always seeking strategies that have a high payoff, and always devising contingency plans in case of error or adversity. To the Mastermind, organizational structure and operational procedures are never arbitrary, never set in concrete, but are quite malleable and can be changed, improved, streamlined. In their drive for efficient action, Masterminds are the most open-minded of all the types. No idea is too far-fetched to be entertained-if it is useful. Masterminds are natural brainstormers, always open to new concepts and, in fact, aggressively seeking them. They are also alert to the consequences of applying new ideas or positions. Theories which cannot be made to work are quickly discarded by the Masterminds. On the other hand, Masterminds can be quite ruthless in implementing effective ideas, seldom counting personal cost in terms of time and energy.

Famous INTJs:

Dan Aykroyd, actor (The Blues Brothers)

Susan B. Anthony, suffragist

Arthur Ashe, tennis champion

Augustus Caesar (Gaius Julius Caesar Octavianus), Emperor of Rome

Jane Austen, author (Pride and Prejudice)

William J. Bennett, "drug czar"

William F. Buckley, Jr., conservative political advocate

Raymond Burr, actor (Perry Mason, Ironsides)

Chevy Chase (Cornelius Crane), actor (Fletch)

Phil Donahue, television talk show host

Michael Dukakis, governor of Mass., 1988 U.S. Dem. pres. candidate

Greg Gumbel, television sportscaster
Hannibal, Carthaginian military leader
Veronica Hamel, actor (Hill Street Blues)
Orel Leonard Hershiser, IV, major league baseball pitcher
Peter Jennings, television newscaster
Charles Everett Koop, former U.S. surgeon general
Ivan Lendl, tennis champion
C. S. Lewis, author (The Chronicles of Narnia)
Joan Lunden, television talk show host
Edwin Moses, U.S. olympian (hurdles)
Martina Navratilova, tennis champion
Charles Rangel, U. S. Representative, D-N.Y.
Pernell Roberts, actor (Bonanza)
Maria Owens Shriver, television newscaster
Josephine Tey (Elizabeth Mackintosh), mystery writer (Brat Farrar)
Rudy Giuliani, New York City mayor
Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense
General Colin Powell, US Secretary of State

U.S. Presidents:

Chester A. Arthur
Calvin Coolidge
Thomas Jefferson
John F. Kennedy
James K. Polk
Woodrow Wilson

XXX STATIC X
Registered User
Posts: 86
(3/9/04 2:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Jesus often went off on his own

---

Schizophrenics shall inherit earth. :P Read the bible, it also has a warning against anti-christs so be careful you young and crazy kids, your not elvis, you're not nirvana, you are ernest holmes... greatest spiritual man ever. I don't think he killed himself but you get the point.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2551
(3/9/04 2:20 pm)
Reply

--

---

Did you kill yourself ecstatic?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 812
(3/9/04 2:31 pm)
Reply

Re: --

---

Do you think that the Internet has a negative impact on your social life, on direct contact with other people, group memberships, etc.?

Yeah.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1514
(3/9/04 3:01 pm)
Reply

Re: Random comments

---

Disorder | Rating
Paranoid: Low
Schizoid: Low
Schizotypal: Low
Antisocial: Low
Borderline: Low
Histrionic: Low
Narcissistic: Moderate
Avoidant: Low
Dependent: Low
Obsessive-Compulsive: Low

URL of the test: http://www.4degreez.com/misc/personality\_disorder\_test.mv

URL for more info: http://www.4degreez.com/misc/disorder\_information2.html

Nothing phases me...EXCEPT WORLD DOMINATION!!

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 212
(3/9/04 3:08 pm)
Reply

...

---

Your Type is INTP

Introverted 89%

Intuitive 67%

Thinking 22%

Perceiving 33%

Qualitative analysis of your type formula:
very expressed introvert distinctively expressed intuitive personality

slightly expressed thinking personality moderately expressed perceiving personality

The problem with this kind of test is that it has stupid questions like:

You trust reason rather than feelings
YES NO

I trust my feelings when it comes to defining what I value... it expresses itself as a very subtle gut feeling. I do that while I trust reason to develop smart strategies to reach my objectives. I just answered I trusted reason because by feeling they probably meant raw emotions that make you act stupidly. I can't remember the last time an emotion made me act that way. It's been over a year probably.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1515
(3/9/04 3:09 pm)
Reply

Re: Random comments

---

My blood and guts?

----

Your Type is INTJ
Introverted Intuitive Thinking Judging
Strength of the preferences %
33 67 44 78

INTJ type description by D.Keirse
INTJ type description by J. Butt and M.M. Heiss

Qualitative analysis of your type formula

You are:
moderately expressed introvert

distinctively expressed intuitive personality

moderately expressed thinking personality very expressed judging personality

---

Tharan

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 213

(3/9/04 3:35 pm)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

I couldn't answer any of these questions honestly with 'yes', hence, low on all. The tendency towards 'schizoid' among the participants of this forum is quite interesting, although the results seem suspiciously stereotypic. Do you think that the Internet has a negative impact on your social life, on direct contact with other people, group memberships, etc.?

---

Not really, I've never had much of a social life. When I was little, I did enjoy being in contact with the few friends I had, but I could never stand parties or socializing with a large number of people. At first it wasn't an issue at all, it was just the way I naturally was. The problem was that kids at school saw that as a bad thing, so I was always picked on. That did create a lot of psychological issues such as fear and anxiety in social situations.

The internet actually had a very positive impact on my social life. I found some of my best friends on it... and while I've never met most of them in person, that contact taught me a lot. It was when I felt I could get out of my shell, to expose myself and deal with the issues I had. The impact it had in my social life was enormous. It's not an outward thing though, some people who know me might not have noticed anything at all. I still stay home most of the time, because that's what I enjoy doing, but it's not a struggle at all to be put in a social situation. I might seem quiet, but it's not because I feel anxious. I remember I used to feel physically smaller near other people, but it doesn't happen at all anymore.

It's true that I'd have more social contact if some of those friends I met on the internet lived near me, but that's more because I have more in common with them than with the ones that live here.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2267
(3/10/04 8:15 am)
Reply

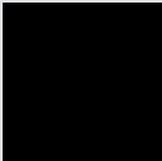

Re: ...

---

Is that why you are reluctant to follow the path of truth and try to think up as many reasons possible to undermine its value? Are you afraid that by following it you will have to go out into the world and start being picked on again?

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 43
(3/10/04 8:27 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: ...

---

Never mind Personality Disorder tests. Take the Enlightenment Test.... ;-) (just don't "take it" seriously...)

http://www.otoons.com/eso/Enlightenment\_test.htm

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 215
(3/10/04 9:33 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Is that why you are reluctant to follow the path of truth and try to think up as many reasons possible to undermine its value? Are you afraid that by following it you will have to go out into the world and start being picked on again?

---

Like I said, I already have. I stay home most of my free time, but it's not like I don't leave it at all. I still go to college every day and get in contact with plenty of people there. I meet up with friends as well, just not too often. Liking it or not, I've been in social situations (school, college) for about 6 hours a day since I was 3. All I was saying is that the internet allowed me to have support when I was still in the process of sorting things out. After that process was over, I became able to support myself. Social situations are like taking a walk now.

I don't try to undermine the "path of truth". If that's what you want, by all means do it. All I ever say is that it's not for me, and that I can't see why anyone SHOULD follow it. The logical validity of those ideas about ultimate reality does not concern me. Even if they were true, the way of living you propose is not what I want. I could follow it until the end right now, but do I want it? It's like forcing yourself to eat junk every day. I'm sure you can do it, but what's the point?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2269
(3/10/04 10:09 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

What is the point of not being blind?

What a koan!

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2270
(3/10/04 10:14 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

Never mind Personality Disorder tests. Take the Enlightenment Test.... ;-) (just don't "take it" seriously...)

www.otoons.com/eso/Enligh...t\_test.htm

---

I scored a total of one point, so I obviously need to meditate some more.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 216
(3/10/04 10:37 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

What is the point of not being blind?

---

Are you saying that being able to see is inherently better than being blind? Look at it this way: I am able to do everything I want, even being blind. I also like blindness more than seeing.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2271
(3/10/04 11:31 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

Are you saying that being able to see is inherently better than being blind?

---

No, I am saying it is my preference. Nature is too wonderful to remain blind to it.

Quote:

---

Look at it this way: I am able to do everything I want, even being blind. I also like blindness more than seeing.

---

Fair enough. There is nothing more for me to say.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 814
(3/10/04 12:09 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

Never mind Personality Disorder tests. Take the Enlightenment Test.... ;-) (just don't "take it" seriously...)

www.otoons.com/eso/Enligh...t\_test.htm

Yeah, I had taken this earlier and scored a whopping 3...and I think I was being dishonest too, so it was probably more like a 1 or maybe even a 0.

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Schizoid Personality Disorder

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 339(3/11/04 10:14 am)Reply  | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> - Disorder Test Paranoid: HighSchizoid: HighSchizotypal: HighAntisocial: LowBorderline: LowHistrionic: LowNarcissistic: ModerateAvoidant: LowDependent: LowObsessive-Compulsive: Low - Other Test INTJ Introverted 28%Intuitive 39%Thinking 39%Judging 33% moderately expressed introvertmoderately expressed intuitive personality |

|                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                 | moderately expressed thinking personalitymoderately expressed judging personality Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 3/11/04 10:33 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 500(3/11/04 12:10 pm)Reply | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Wish I had a so correct self-image, Rhett.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 501(3/11/04 12:11 pm)Reply | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Apart from your incorrect wording, of course.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1517(3/12/04 7:10 am)Reply              | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> The high Schizoid reults I find a bit surprising as well. Kevin wrote: Quote: <hr/> I suspect that ALL spiritual philosophers will come out with the result that they are schizoid and moderately schizotypal, as they tend to be loners, they are totally unconcerned with the praise or criticism of others, they have difficulty trusting others (because they know how deluded they are), and other people view them to be eccentric, and to be cold and distant. <hr/> I am definately a loner. I am totally unconcerned with the praise or criticism of others regarding me personally (though criticism of my work might illicit some change). But I have no difficulty trusting people. The key word there is difficulty and there were serveral questions regarding this. Generally, I don't place myself in positions where I have to trust peole so it really is an irrelevant line of questioning as far as I am concerned. I probably answered no to every one of these questions because of this. I suspect the High Schizoid types answered "yes" to these. Concerning "eccentric," I don't really think about how others see me, so I | answered how I saw myself, which is normal. Most everyone else is eccentric in my world. The same would go for cold and distant. I am warm and comforting, when I want to be. My wife might disagree.

Needless to say I scored low on the schizoid portion.

Tharan

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2280
(3/12/04 8:07 am)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Wolf wrote:

Quote:

---

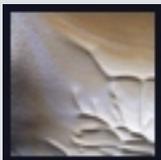

But I have no difficulty trusting people. The key word there is difficulty and there were several questions regarding this.

---

I only answered one question in a "paranoid" way - the one about whether one is aloof because of anxiety in social circumstances or because one is suspicious of other people's motives. I answered the latter because I know that people very rarely act from pure motives. But that one answer alone was enough to place me in the high paranoia category!

Perhaps I'm being paranoid, but I have a feeling that the test was somewhat biased against validity of the philosophic life.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 339
(3/13/04 10:03 am)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Quote:

---

I only answered one question in a "paranoid" way - the one about whether one is aloof because of anxiety in social circumstances or because one is suspicious of other people's motives. I answered the latter because I know that people very rarely act from pure motives. But that one answer alone was enough to place me in the high paranoia category!

Perhaps I'm being paranoid, but I have a feeling that the test was somewhat biased against validity of the philosophic life.

---

I did my best to avoid seeing the intent of the questions. I didn't research the tests, and moved quickly through the questions whilst trying not to analyse them. I was largely successful, but it was quite a struggle.

I did this because i find it rather tedious when i start second-guessing these kind of tests, it's so much harder to ensure an unbiased and potentially informative outcome when i end up in feedback loops (not that i expect to learn much or anything from them anyway). For example, if i see that it's endeavouring to determine if i'm paranoid, i'll ask myself whether i think i'm paranoid and if so how much, and then i'll try to determine how i should answer the question in order to get an appropriate result. Then i'll question my personal assessment for any bias or missing info, and so on. It's difficult when you know that you have a far deeper understanding of psychology (and yourself) than the person that created the test.

[Next day...]

I think my 'struggle' when taking the test revolved around my intuitive tendencies. I'm so used to having to work around conventional communication protocols to be able to convey my motivations and the truth, that it's become intuitive for me to, in some sense, circumvent the normal procedures. The fact that i can't do anything about the misperception that the test will develop of me is rather a bummer for this intuitive response.

However, on the few occasions that i've talked to a psychiatrist they've got rather angry at me, because of their inability to accomodate my responses, so perhaps the online test isn't so bad after all. Has this ever happened to you David?

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 3/14/04 11:21 am

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 341
(3/14/04 11:52 am)
Reply

Re: ...

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

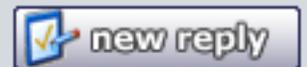

The problem was that kids at school saw that as a bad thing, so I was always picked on. That did create a lot of psychological issues such as fear and anxiety in social situations.

---

Hmmm. I'd say that i was quite lucky. Whilst i was nicknamed "Cyberman" in my last year of school (after the Dr Who characters), no-one used it much or make a big deal of my differences. It never became an issue.

However, just over a year ago i met a previous classmate, and even though we were due for our 10year school re-union, he was reluctant to go. I suggested that he should go, and he did, and he felt an enormous release. He'd been heavily teased at school, and he knew that he'd been unable to overcome the issues that had developed from it for all those years (though I imagine that it was reinforced in some manner by similar issues during those ten years).

Those that aren't too disposed towards emotions are forced to learn about egotism whether they like it or not, and what emotions they do have can get pretty bottled up within well meaning, but ultimately inadequate, reasonings.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

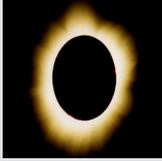

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 323(2/1/04 1:54 am)Reply  | "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> I hereby coin the "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder". Indicated primarily by a split with reality, and with the following symptoms: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. Desires emotional relationships with others, and tends to selfishly impose themselves on those around them.</li> <li>2. Tends towards group activities, seeking affirmation by others, and has little feeling of self-worth.</li> <li>3. Has obsessive interest in sexual and/or emotional contact with others, but avoids all deeper, spiritual connection.</li> <li>4. Overriding tendency towards fantasy.</li> <li>5. Seeks vain enjoyment in all manner of activities, but rarely achieves any satisfaction.</li> <li>6. Tends to have lots of friends, but lacks any truly caring, understanding relationships.</li> <li>7. Obsessive interest in the praise or criticism of others. Takes great care in physical appearance and fashion.</li> <li>8. Shows emotional lack of control, irrational attachment, and exaggerated affectivity.</li> <li>9. Tendency to blindly follow authorities, whom they create.</li> </ol> Edited by: ksolway at: 2/1/04 2:45 am |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2157
(2/1/04 2:25 am)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

A split with reality is a myth perpetuated by impotent men and childless women.

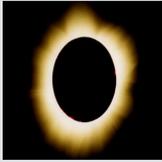

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 230
(2/1/04 2:38 am)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

So what is the medium between "Schiziod Personality Disorder" and "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"? They are both extremes, wouldn't it make sense that both would be unintelligent ways of living?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2158
(2/1/04 2:41 am)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

I take back the childless women bit.

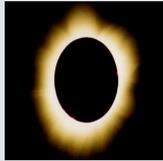

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 324
(2/1/04 2:44 am)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

The way I see it, the "Schizotypoids" are in fact just normal, average people. One of the obvious problems of treating patients with this disorder is that the patient tends to deny there is anything wrong with them, and will not seek treatment, or be responsive to treatment.

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2159(2/1/04 2:47 am)Reply    | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Kevin Solway sees himself as a kind of divine straight jacket for the masses. But he's really a niggly bum face who wrote a book called poison for the heart.                                                                                                                                                              |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 664(2/1/04 2:50 am)Reply                                                                                     | ... <hr/> I agree that this is a disorder. I think you should name it something else, though, Kevin.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 231(2/1/04 2:53 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> I agree for the most part, but as the "Schizotypoids" is extreme in vanity, materialism, egotism, the "Schizoid" is extreme in other areas, which also includes egotism, in such scenarios as interacting with society, creating the effect of hermitage and complete alienation... Just curious on your thought... |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2161(2/1/04 2:54 am)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Just curious on your thought... <hr/> As opposed to taking this man seriously yes?                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 232(2/1/04 3:01 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Are you saying the things he mentioned above are not to be taken seriously?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 325

(2/1/04 3:10 am)

Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

Quote:

---

I agree for the most part, but as the "Schizotypoids" is extreme in vanity, materialism, egotism, the "Schizoid" is extreme in other areas, which also includes egotism, in such scenarios as interacting with society, creating the effect of hermitage and complete alienation...

Just curious on your thought...

---

Yes, the true Schizoid is as much an egotist as the normal, average person, only their egotism takes a different expression - it may seek identity in being different to everyone else rather than in being the same as everyone else.

However, it is a tendency of normal, average people (Schizotypoids) to label any non-normal (non-Schizotypoid) person as "Schizoid", even if that person is not egotistical. Unfortunately, the truly schizoid person will fail to fight back against whatever is done to him by the schizotypoids - as part of his condition (schizoids tend to be passive, and don't make waves).

Edited by: ksolway at: 2/1/04 3:16 am

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 233

(2/1/04 3:18 am)

Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

As you have labeled the "Schizotypoid" using various criteria, the "Schizoid" is also labeled through certain criteria...now are you arguing that the "Schizoid" is merely labeled by the average person, though as you see in the relating thread, the schizoid admitting these criteria fit in his/her lifestyle? ... the true schizoid is egotistical, one who calls himself a schizoid is not necessarily egotistical?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 326

(2/1/04 3:40 am)

Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

Quote:

---

As you have labeled the "Schizotypoid" using various criteria, the "Schizoid" is also labeled through certain criteria.

---

Yes.

Quote:

---

..now are you arguing that the "Schizoid" is merely labeled by the average person

---

Usually, yes. As most people are average (schizotypoid).

Quote:

---

. . . though as you see in the relating thread, the schizoid admitting these criteria fit in his/her lifestyle? ... the true schizoid is egotistical, one who calls himself a schizoid is not necessarily egotistical?

---

Not necessarily. If I call you by the name "Janine" often enough, you might even start to accept the name "Janine", just because you couldn't be bothered arguing with it. However, you still know what your real name is.

Similarly, a person might call himself "schizoid" just because that's what society says he is, and he couldn't be bothered arguing with it.

A wise person would probably split the "schizoid" category into "schizoid disorder" and "schizoid heaven", the former being the

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                     | egotistical person with a problem, and the latter being the wise person with an advantage.                                                                                                                                                                              |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 234(2/1/04 3:46 am)Reply                                                                                | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> I can understand the person accepting the label society has put on him, but your "division" is a bunch of bologna.                                                                                                 |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2162(2/1/04 11:34 am)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Anyone who thinks to label the majority of people 'schizoids' doesn't have a personality disorder, just a weak personality.                                                                                        |
| LyrutanRegistered UserPosts: 1(2/1/04 4:49 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Kevin Solway looks like a guy who is discovered living in a house with 24 dead bodies in the basement, and David Quinn looks like that guy who hands around in the park that you are afraid to let your kids near. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 666(2/2/04 3:02 am)Reply                                                                                    | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> ...and Dan looks like my friend's dad. What's your point, didn't your momma ever tell you not to judge a book by it's cover?                                                                                |

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1373
(2/2/04 12:04 pm)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

Then there's me:

1. I desire emotional relationships with others, and I grant other people almost total freedom with no impositions.
2. I have limited but definite interests in group activities; a high self worth and I uplift the self worth of people around me.
3. I have strong interest in sexual and emotional contact, and always steer them toward the most deep and spiritual connections.
4. Little interest in fantasy.
5. I achieve a lot of satisfaction from the activities I engage in.
6. I have caring and understanding relationships with all and sundry.
7. Less and less interest in praise and criticism.
8. Rarely lose control, don't act fake.
9. Evaluate everything for myself.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 668
(2/2/04 1:09 pm)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

Trying to be right doesn't make you right.

 capecodindependent
Registered User
Posts: 3
(2/4/04 12:05 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

It is Schizotypal not Schizotypoid...or have I missed something>?

Edited by: capecodindependent at: 2/4/04 12:07 am

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 334
(2/4/04 12:15 am)
Reply

Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

---

There is "Schizoid" and "Schizotypal", and now a new, third "Schizotypoid" condition, defined at the start of the thread.

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

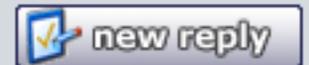

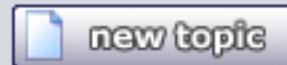

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

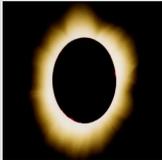

> GENIUS FORUM

> "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder"

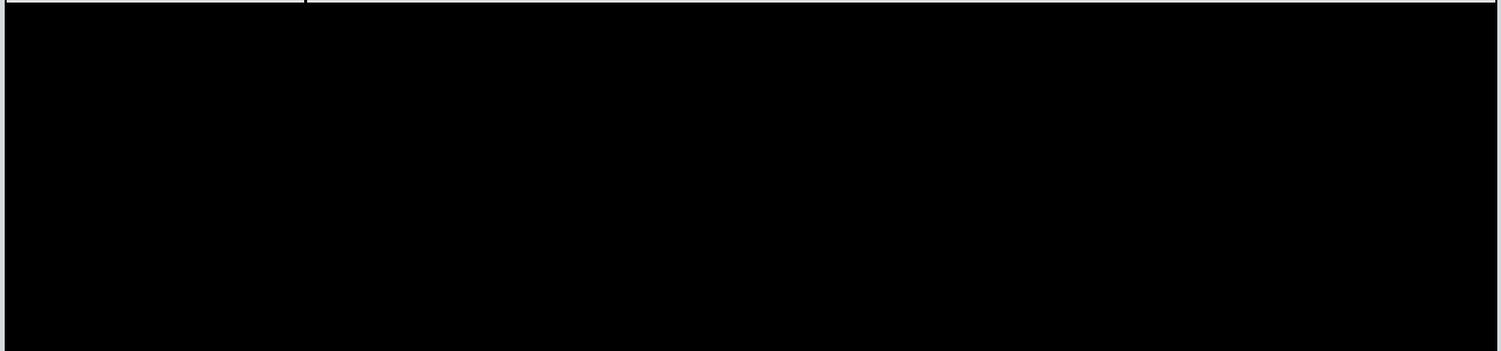

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2188(2/4/04 12:42 am)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Whom have you observed to be the embodiment of your schizotypoid Kevin?                                                                   |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 241(2/4/04 12:44 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> He mentioned earlier that it is generally the whole population of so-call "normal" people...                                              |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2189(2/4/04 12:50 am)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> He knows I mean whom specifically, for instance a single person-- I want an example. Edited by: suergaz at: 2/4/04 12:51 am |

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 241(2/4/04 12:51 am)Reply                                                                               | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> I gathered that...why does it matter?                                                                                                     |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2190(2/4/04 11:14 am)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Because I don't think he can give one.                                                                                                    |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 335(2/4/04 5:10 pm)Reply  | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Whom have you observed to be the embodiment of your schizotypoid Kevin? <hr/> How about Britney Spears! |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2207(2/4/04 9:26 pm)Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> She does seem to fit, except perhaps for no.5. If she does fit I can say goodbye to my theory that she and Ricky Martin are our deeply misunderstood alien ancestors.         |

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 243(2/4/04 11:36 pm)Reply | Re: "Schizotypoid Personality Disorder" <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Kevin: How about Britney Spears! <hr/> Can you really make that judgement without knowing her? I mean, I know 2 people that probably fit all of your criteria. One is female, a child psychologist, the other is male, and lives off the "kindness" of other people. Other than that, I would assume others to fit all of your criteria, and, well, you know what happens when one assumes... |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2210(2/4/04 11:39 pm)Reply    | --- <hr/> This is a terrible discovery to find a Britney fan in our midst, Cassie, the incurable, twas not meant to be between us...(:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2211(2/4/04 11:44 pm)Reply    | --- <hr/> Leslie I mean! Look, never to betray a fellow musician (Cough grhuyijku pluh pluh) but is she? Now! Is she doing what she really should?! Perhaps she is an excellent person somewhere in her life! We'll never know...because Kevin has schitzotypoided her where he wants her in his grasping drooling clutches (:D)                                                                                                                                              |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 243(2/5/04 12:21 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> BTW: I am not defending her. You are probably right, I was just asking about assumptions...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 578(2/5/04 6:12 am)Reply        | Re: --- <hr/> Kevin knows schizotypoid personality applies in varying degrees to all people. He was asked for an embodiment. Which he clearly gave, considering britney and the rat packs current behaviour. Still, I'd like to fuck Britney, as ugly as her underlying personality is. Its a mixed up male dominance thing where she is symbolic of all trendy, modern, materialistic, simple females. A failing of mine. |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 244(2/5/04 7:36 am)Reply   | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> jimhaz: Still, I'd like to fuck Britney, as ugly as her underlying personality is. Its a mixed up male dominance thing where she is symbolic of all trendy, modern, materialistic, simple females. A failing of mine. <hr/> Yuk! The truth is out...                                                                                                                                     |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1397(2/5/04 8:49 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> That's nothing. I want to fuck everybody.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 35(2/5/04 9:13 am)Reply      | Re: --- <hr/> lol oh my!!!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 917(2/5/04 10:18 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> After the cigarette, what shall we drink?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 581(2/5/04 10:27 am)Reply                                                                                      | Re: --- <hr/> I want to fuck everybody. It is a very strong urge in me too. Cute, beautiful or plain women - it don't matter that much. Have a bit of trouble with fatties though - 1/2 the population these days. I also want to fuck up people heads a bit too, be a bit of a catalyst so to speak, if it might lead to some benefit. I do neither that often. |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

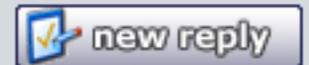

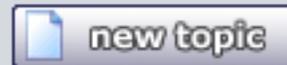

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sci vs Reg

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| the meme of barnabyRegistered UserPosts: 15(4/21/04 6:46 pm)Reply                                                                             |  Sci vs Reg <hr/> Science makes religion and spirituality redundant because IT WORKS.True or False?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| HansReinhardtRegistered UserPosts: 1(4/22/04 2:10 am)Reply  |  s vs r <hr/> Depends on whether or not you consider psychology a science. If so, you could say that science (through therapy) replaces religion. But frankly, therapy (at its best) can only adjust the patient to reality as it is known by science, and scientific knowledge is always conditional. Religion tends to speak about things that science cannot confirm or deny, so in some sense, it is outside of the realm of science and addresses concerns that science is mum about. Edited by: HansReinhardt at: 4/22/04 2:11 am |

the meme of barnaby

Registered User

Posts: 17

(5/2/04 10:25 pm)

Reply

 Re: Sci vs Reg

---

hmmm...interesting. I was thinking more along the lines of the credibility of religious vs. scientific claims, for example in the origin of the world debate. Creationists and evolutionary biologist are simply battling out ideologies - or are they? We come to the question of evidence. The scientist may argue that there is no evidence of a super-being or that the world exists because of him/her/it, whereas as digging up bones in the ground shows that we evolved from the hapless self-replication of DNA.

A Christian or Muslim or Hindu, for example, may argue against evidence altogether- it is simply a social product, an attempt to classify those things not understood in the world. Just because one scientific theory has allowed significant manipulation of the environment doesn't mean that all theories will.

Whilst scientists may prefer to adhere to the tradition of following a theory until proven otherwise, there may be some aspects of the universe unprovable. Having said that, the greatest scientific discoveries in history have dealt with the dead-ended topics of the day- and often religion has had to adapt accordingly (for example - a pious explanation for earthquakes being outdated by the discovery of tectonic plate shifting etc).

What do you think?

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 256

(5/5/04 12:50 am)

Reply

 re:

---

Scientific theories are still only theories based on evidence. There is no 'proof' of tectonic plates, only vast evidence to suggest them. The atomic (kinetic) theory is the same. The difference is in area of interest, science is in physical, religion is in metaphysical. Hence religion has less chance of any evidence and is more open to scrutiny and also more vulnerable to mis-users who invent religious theories for their own purposes.

The downfall of religion is that it tried to use some physical phenomena as evidence for its metaphysical speculation and when these physical phenomena were otherwise explained in a way which had more evidence to support them, so people became sceptical of all religious ideas.

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 47
(5/6/04 6:27 am)
Reply

 Re: re:

---

We cannot create a simple snail or worm, but we create Gods by the dozens.

-Homer

DrMetallica
Registered User
Posts: 2
(5/6/04 10:57 am)
Reply

 Re: re:

---

Didn't all the Western religous leaders in Galileo's time believe the world sat on the back of a turtle? Wasn't Galileo put under house arrest in Arcetri for beliefs other than that?

There is only one reason to explain why we're here... evolution.

Evolution can also explain a lot of questions we wonder about today... why do men get so fervently enraged when their mates cheat on them? Why do males have an ungodly high sex drive? Why do women love money? Why do guys like girls with big tits? Why do we get old? What is life's purpose?

Religion cannot answer any of these, and dare not to touch any of these subjects, but evolution can answer them!!!

Edited by: DrMetallica at: 5/6/04 11:02 am

HansReinhardt
Registered User
Posts: 1
(5/7/04 6:03 am)
Reply

 Re: Sci vs Reg

---

Much of what we call "religion" today is the "science" of yesterday.

Since the birth of consciousness, man has asked a few basic questions, the answers to which are never going to be known: who am I? where did I come from? what am I supposed to be doing?

In the past, people assembled a set of answers to these questions and passed them from generation to generation. This was their education and it served many purposes -- not the least of which was to transform a barbaric group of people into a cooperative community, or, civilization. Many of these are called religion today.

Parts of these questions can be addressed by the scientific method: the question of "who am I?" can be partially answered by data obtained by measurement; the same with where did I come from. But science can't address the entirety of the question, science can't measure "the soul" -- it either says it doesn't exist or hasn't been proven to exist. The second answer being the more honest. And the question "what should I be doing?" is so far beyond scientific measurement that "scientific" answers tend to be comical. Like the idiot who said that rape was just evolution's way of propagating the stupid and ugly portion of the species.

Science today is simply our current array of theories based on observations and applied to these timeless questions, and many of them are certainly better answers -- when they speak from measurable facts. But to pretend like they are the final truth of the matter is as loathsome as pretending that yesterday's answers are still true. To do so is to fail to recognize that our understanding of the world is constantly changing and that, from time to time, genius thinkers radically reorient our whole perspective in unpredictable ways. Einstein and Kant, to name a couple of easy examples.

The real heart of the religious matter is the ethical question. This can never be answered scientifically. The closest we can come is psychology, which isn't really a science and whose world operates more like religious sects.

There simply isn't any scientific truth that tells me that I shouldn't bash your head in with a rock. The belief that it would be wrong to do so is forever in the realm of religion. In this case, science doesn't work, and it is only spirituality that offers any form of restraint.

the meme of barnaby
Registered User
Posts: 23
(5/7/04 11:59 am)
Reply

 beautiful

---

Quote:

---

ynthrix:

The difference is in area of interest, science is in physical, religion is in metaphysical. Hence religion has less chance of any evidence and is more open to scrutiny and also more vulnerable to mis-users who invent religious theories for their own purposes.

---

It's not as clear cut as that. In the days before science, religion was the only means of explaining the unexplained (the area of interest for both). As science progressed, religion became limited to purely metaphysical questions, as you say. This may lead one to question the validity of religion at all, as you say:

Quote:

---

The downfall of religion is that it tried to use some physical phenomena as evidence for its metaphysical speculation and when these physical phenomena were otherwise explained in a way which had more evidence to support them, so people became sceptical of all religious ideas.

---

It leads one to question the validity of religion at all- if they were wrong in the past in terms of the physical domain, why should they be less wrong in terms of the metaphysical? Science can explain religion quite comprehensively, I doubt religion can return the favour.

rushdl said:

Quote:

---

We cannot create a simple snail or worm, but we create Gods by the dozens.

-Homer

---

beautiful.

the meme of barnaby

Registered User

Posts: 24

(5/7/04 12:15 pm)

Reply

 hans

---

Hans, i like it. It's so true that science is the 'religion' of the day. No doubt there will be some unimaginable replacement for science in the future. In the frame of societal living i would also agree that thought processes and the question of self-identity are answerable by science whereas morals are somewhat unapproachable. Scientific institutions are required to have an established ethics committee through whom they can run their experimental procedures by. Is religion really necessary here? Religion may have been a stepping stone to civilisation, but it is unstable. It united in ancient times (when religious codes were purely moral and social) but was incredibly disruptive for a good millenium of our AD history (where it invaded men's minds a rather succesful attempt of will control).

HansReinhardt

Registered User

Posts: 5

(5/7/04 1:23 pm)

Reply

 Re: hans

---

Quote:

---

Is religion really necessary here? Religion may have been a stepping stone to civilization, but it is unstable. It united in ancient times (when religious codes were purely moral and social) but was incredibly disruptive for a good millennium of our AD history (where it invaded men's minds a rather successful attempt of will control).

---

An interesting facet of your statement is this: you are assuming a unity of religion. The truth is, there are so many religions that it isn't possible to speak in a unified way about them. The best you can do is try to determine if there is any central "religious" method of thinking and criticize that.

At this point, I should confess that I am not particularly religious. That being said, I believe I could make the case that one religion is superior to others.

As for your comment about religions being incredibly disruptive and trying to attempt will control -- I think that there is more to it than that. I think that your basic assumptions haven't been examined enough.

Take the "disruptive" statement. For this to be true, there would have to exist a primary state of unification, which religions have subsequently disordered. I think you're going to have a hard time proving this. The truth is that religions have created an ordered state from a previously chaotic one. The question is: is it the best ordered state? In many cases, the answer is no, and in trying to maintain an unsustainable state of order, a religion can be said to be harmful.

Furthermore, because we are distancing ourselves from our previous religious views, the world is becoming increasingly disordered. This is not any religion's fault, but simply a side effect of the inefficacy of past religious answers to speak to our world today.

As for invading minds, etc. I disagree. Like vampires, religions are something that must be invited in. The truth of the matter is that the question of ethics is as important today as it ever was (perhaps more so) and nothing has emerged to replace religion in the provision of morality. And by providing a moral framework it provides the will with guidelines for behavior. This isn't "control"; if it were so, the concept of sin wouldn't exist -- if a will is controlled it can't behave in a manner inconsistent with the agent of control.

In my opinion, the world is just waiting for the next phase of religion. The next unified way of looking at the world and ourselves that provides comfort, hope and guidance. As soon as that arrives -- and you can't "make" it, as the current rebellion against political correctness illustrates -- you will see a "great awakening" of an unprecedented magnitude.

Cheers.

Edited by: HansReinhardt at: 5/7/04 1:25 pm

the meme of barnaby

Registered User

Posts: 27

(5/8/04 6:06 pm)

Reply

 two hands

---

Hans,

I'm not wanting to get in a semantic debate, but i think we're identifying religion differently here- like science, it can be considered on the grounds of your definition: "a unified way of way of looking at the world," but to differentiate the two, religion relies on faith in a superfluous being. This religion, contrary to your argument, encompasses all religious beliefs (although one cannot deny the diversity of religion, there are basic characteristics that unite them).

As our understanding of human history would have it, there is no doubt that religion was a unifying force and probably the aetiological agent responsible for religion- it was not disruptive to the organisation of society. What it did disrupt, and this came later in history (the dark ages) was free thought. Artistic and technological advances suffered incredibly as a result.

I understand and acknowledge the importance of religion in the past, but the question is: do we really need it in the future? I hope that there is a new popular unified religious thought, but one that does not need reassurance from a deity.

Ethics committees tend to base their decision on the effects a particular procedure will have on society. As there is no society organised (at the very least, historically) on the basis of religion, morals are invariably established following religious thought. However, this progress is not direct, and abolishment of religion would not erase morals. The idea that every citizen should have freedom of action and speech as long as this does not impair another citizen's freedom does not require religion, even this 'love thy neighbour' attitude may have its origins with religious ideas.

cheers.

HansReinhardt

Registered User

Posts: 13

(5/9/04 12:34 am)

Reply

Re: two hands

---

Hmmm. If you want to limit the definition of religion to something like: "belief in a supernatural being", okay. But I would suggest you get more specific, like "supernatural conscious/rational being" or something. But if such a being existed, I doubt it would be superfluous. I suspect you mean: "a superfluous belief in a nonexistent supernatural being".

As for religion and the dark ages: sorry, I think you've got your narrative wrong.

Quote:

---

What it did disrupt, and this came later in history (the dark ages) was free thought. Artistic and technological advances suffered incredibly as a result.

---

After Rome fell, all the things you mentioned were in disarray. The church picked up the pieces and carried them through the turmoil -- in their own way of course -- but still, without the church, these things would have been lost. By taking Greek and Roman thought, science and technology, and using it for their own ends, they preserved them for future generations. So, give credit where it's due. For a time, Islam did the same, but they dropped the ball.

It's true that later, during the Renaissance and Enlightenment periods, the church fought to maintain its own worldview, but this is natural for any organization.

My point: today's world is the most technologically advanced and the arts exist at a depth and breadth that didn't exist previously, plus we have more "free" thought than we know how to dispose of. All in a time when religious belief is in the 80% range. The church doesn't disrupt these.

As for belief in a supernatural being: why do you think it's not necessary, and what would you replace it with?

the meme of barnaby
Registered User
Posts: 28
(5/11/04 2:02 pm)
Reply

 we will do without

---

It's a waste of human resources. The real question is: How is religion not unnecessary? No doubt religion has done good in the past, and that it is a real source of human will and endeavour, but neither progress nor human will needs or must rely on religion. Imagine a world where the popular thought was intellectual inquiry.

HansReinhardt
Registered User
Posts: 14
(5/12/04 12:37 am)
Reply

 How is religion not unnecessary.

---

Meme, simply put, religion is necessary because many people desperately need it. And their needs cannot be replaced with scientific inquiry or intellectual understanding. It is a strong emotional need. I know this is slightly circular, but it's true.

Let's imagine a world as you wish it, where the popular mode of thought was intellectual inquiry. Do you honestly believe that all people are able to deal with the unvarnished "truth" about life. I put truth in quotes, because as I outlined earlier, truth is conditioned by our current understandings and will likely change in the future. But let's examine something that is not likely to change.

It is unlikely that intellectual inquiry will ever be able to determine what happens after death, and so, the unvarnished truth is that -- as far as we know -- nothing happens. Do you honestly believe that the entire population can handle this thought? If you do, you are paying an insufficient respect to history and the world around you. If only for this reason alone, some form of religion is necessary. Furthermore, read some of the other posts on this board. Here you have a group of people who view themselves as geniuses, and a large portion of their posts are attempts to show how there is life after death.

If I understand you though, your main objection to religion is that it stifles "free thought". A good example of this might be when the church resisted the idea that the earth revolved around the sun. I agree with you, stuff like that is bullshit. But, I think that you're not taking into account that a large part of those sorts of conflicts is about something other than religion. I submit that the real venom is political and not religious. Remember, many people in the past were "religious" only for the sake of the power which came from holding a church office. And they fought viciously against anything that might erode that power.

All of that being said, I don't hold respect for much of religion, but I have

|                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                | learned to respect the needs of those who need it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| the meme of barnaby Registered User Posts: 29 (5/12/04 7:30 pm) Reply                                                                               | ☐ another can o' worms <hr/> Certainly certainly, many people need it, and I too respect those who do. I am using the imagination a little, not looking into the immediate future. Undoubtedly, given the current situation of the world and her history, attempting to abolish religion would cause an uproar and massive disarray and, sympathizing with the religious peoples, I too would oppose any such renunciation. But a gradual metamorphosis -without opening a can of worms regarding the practicalities of such a transformation- that would rid the world of religious thought would be more than worthwhile. Now maybe the establishment of god is an intrinsic quality. This has been a popular idea with historians over the last century, and current research in psychiatrics and neuroscience is suggesting there may be a physiological basis for this instinct. It certainly makes sense in evolutionary terms- an efficient means for intelligent beings to manipulate their environment through questioning it, without dwelling on questions that are apparently unanswerable. If this is the case, then bar genetic/neurodevelopmental engineering, perhaps complete absence of religion is impossible. But my point is that if we could establish social order without religion, it would be for the best. |
| HansReinhardt Registered User Posts: 18 (5/13/04 12:28 am) Reply  | ☐ Re: another can o' worms <hr/> So, you agree that religion is necessary, but you think its origin is evolutionary, and your solution is to genetically engineer it out of us? That's monstrous. You scare me.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2623 (5/13/04 2:20 am) Reply                                                                                         | ☐ ---- <hr/> The belief in the possibility of creating a supernatural being, as distinct and apart from belief in a supernatural being, is this too classed as a religious thought? I'm sure it's not, but I've been told otherwise.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

the meme of barnaby
Registered User
Posts: 30
(5/13/04 9:25 pm)
Reply

 can't see the lines he used to read between

---

In the current world and it a practical sense, yes religion is necessary and yes I think that it has an evolutionary origin. Genetic engineering is not my solution at all, in fact it was my mistake to write in any practical involvement since I was imagining a hypothetical world without religion. Can you not imagine a world -not getting caught up in human history or the present day- where religion is lacking and it is good?

gaz:

No, it's not religion.

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 257
(5/14/04 9:21 am)
Reply

 re:

---

I think you overlook that science is becoming a religion itself. I think of religion not just as supernatural and mysterious, but as a way of life for people who need it, people who need both belief and guidance. Science promotes itself as this and politicians of course twist its facts so as to convey whatever end. The political power once in religion has shifted to power in manipulated scientific 'evidence'. I agree with HansReinhardt when he said "I submit that the real venom is political and not religious."

"Can you not imagine a world -not getting caught up in human history or the present day- where religion is lacking and it is good?"

Tolkien's world lacked widespread religion. That's a fantasy place where it seemed to work.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 655
(5/14/04 3:59 pm)
Reply

 Re: re:

---

Tolkien's world lacked widespread religion.

Tradition is also religion, there is little difference. The mental influences of tradition are a big part of Tolkien's yarns.

btw, if you liked Lord of the Rings, an equally good and similar series is Thomas Covenant the Unbeliever by Stephen Donaldson. By 'good' I mean it was a series that I read more than once years ago - i can't seem to get enfused by novels much anymore.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 82

(5/14/04 8:56 pm)

Reply

 Re:

---

Quote:

---

Hans: It is unlikely that intellectual inquiry will ever be able to determine what happens after death, and so, the unvarnished truth is that -- as far as we know -- nothing happens.

---

Wise intellectual inquiry determines that physical death of the body doesn't exist, since there is no constant body decaying, nor can any person verify from experience if death is unconsciousness. It is a provisional conclusion, based on observing one's own physical body, linking this to one's own certainty of consciousness - and then comparing that to other similarly appearing/behaving physical bodies - and then to an "unconscious" being without pulse or breath...

Although it would be very surprising (and bizarre) to have a conversation with some dust, the possibility can't be ruled out.

To speak about the possibility of "nothing happening" in what seems like unconsciousness as if it were the wisest intellectual conclusion is misleading, because (i) there is no consciousness in the absence of any thing at all - it's impossible, (ii) the concept of things being absent is reliant on the concept of things being present - therefore something is happening in consciousness, not nothing.

Life - if "alive" is defined as the state of an inherently existing bodily self - also doesn't really exist.

Quote:

---

Do you honestly believe that the entire population can handle this thought? If you do, you are paying an insufficient respect to history and the world around you. If only for this reason alone, some form of religion is necessary.

---

Is it not immoral to lie if you know the truth - and that it should be made known? The criterion for not doing so could only be justified when others prove themselves utterly incapable of understanding. But still, turning to untruth and pushing blind faith is pure evil.

Quote:

---

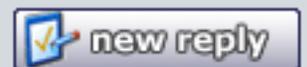

Furthermore, read some of the other posts on this board. Here you have a group of people who view themselves as geniuses, and a large portion of their posts are attempts to show how there is life after death.

---

It depends how you define life and death. If death means freedom from delusion, then to all appearances (from my observations of those who have achieved this) consciousness seems to continue after this.

That there is "nothing happening" after such a death would therefore false - since things do exist after all.. And if no one seems capable or willing to know truth, it is never reason to push untruth on others at the expense of suppressing truth.

As i have heard, the Buddha may have promoted ceremony and ritual in order to ensure a core of wise teachings survived through the ages.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Sci vs Reg

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 258(5/15/04 3:00 am)Reply |  re: <hr/> "Tradition is also religion, there is little difference. The mental influences of tradition are a big part of Tolkien's yarns." OK, that's true. But by widespread religion I meant an establishment porporting some representative of a deity. I am little interested in novels to be honest, I read four of his books as English literature. Personally I distinguish between tradition and religion, because I like the idea of tradition as a foundation. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2632(5/17/04 4:41 am)Reply |  ---- <hr/> As a foundation for what, more?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

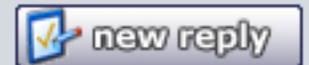

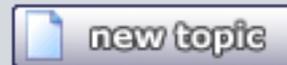

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> scientism as ultimate reality?

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 74(1/22/04 6:34 am)Reply | scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> From "The Elegant Universe" by Brian Greene: "The reductionist philosophy [of scientism] easily ignites heated debate. Many find it fatuous and downright repugnant to claim that the wonders of life and the universe are mere reflections of microscopic particle engaged in a pointless dance fully choreographed by the laws of physics. Is it really the case that feelings of joy, sorrow, or boredom are nothing but chemical reactions in the brain---reactions between molecules and atoms that, even more microscopically, are just reactions between [electrons and protons and neutrons and quarks] which are really just vibrating strings? In response to this line of reasoning Nobel laureate Steven Weinberg in "Dreams of a Final Theory": 'At the end of the spectrum are the opponents of reductionism who are appalled by what they feel is the bleakness of modern science. To whatever extent they and their world can be reduced to a matter of particles or fields and their interactions, they feel diminished by that knowledge....I would not try to answer these critics with a pep talk about the beauties of modern science. The reductionist world view IS chilling and impersonal. It has to be accepted as it is, not because we like it, but because that is the way the world works.'" Scientism is complete intellectual dreck. And it is so, in my opinion, for the same reason the metaphysical, psuedo-scientific renditions bandied about in |

here are: they presume to actually imagine they can encompass The Way The World Really Really REALLY Does Work.

Oh, sure they can. But what they fail to encompass in their neat little scholastic, academic paradigms [existential contraptions] is the relationship between mind and matter. That mind may well just be a manifestation of matter does not really tells us anything at all about what it means for matter to become conscious of itself---to mold and manipulate itself in ways that are not merely blind mechanical sequences unfolding between mindless matter. Self-conscious matter...matter that has evolved into staggeringly complex mental, emotional and psychological states is inexpressibly and inextricably mysterious. And I suspect that 5,000 years or 50,000 years from now the name Steven Weinberg will be the butt of many a joke. If anyone even recalls who he is at all, right?

Ultimate reality IS the ultimate intellectual farce given the profoundly primitive nature of our current understanding of the world around us...of "reality". If science has made extraordinary advancements in human knowledge over the past 2000 years [and it has] just think of what we will know in 200,000 years. Yet each new generation wants to claim that THEY have found the TOE. Or are just a couple of years....a decade or so tops... from finally nailing it down.

Trust them.

Biggie

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1315
(1/22/04 7:40 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

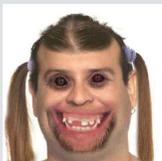

Right again.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 455
(1/22/04 9:58 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Except without a drive to increase wisdom (non-emotional practicalness) there is no way we will get another 200,000 years.

|                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Naturyl  Registered UserPosts: 72(1/22/04 1:25 pm)Reply          | Re: scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> Science is not perfect, but it's the best we've got.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| birdofhermes Registered UserPosts: 1320(1/22/04 3:24 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> I meant he was right about the human attitude of thinking we know more than we know.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Thomas Knierim Registered UserPosts: 772(1/22/04 5:44 pm)Reply  | Re: scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> The words 'scientism' and 'reductionism' are not synonymous. Scientism might go along with a reductionist view of the world but it does not necessarily have to. Scientism has much a larger meaning. It can include positions such as scientific naturalism, empiricism, materialism, (logical) positivism, functionalism, and (scientific) humanism. Basically, a scientific worldview poses natural explanations for all phenomena and avoids supernatural and paranormal explanations, hence, it includes the position of naturalism. Reductionism is IMO not a viable philosophical point of view. It is just plain silly. Thomas                                                                                         |
| Biggier Registered UserPosts: 74(1/23/04 7:07 am)Reply                                                                                           | Re: scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> Thomas, Good points. It is just that I have come across any number of folks who are passionately committed to embracing the scientific method...and then assume that, in so doing, we can encompass Reality objectively by utilizing it. That, to me, is a kind of reductionism in the sense that Truth is reduced to the methodology employed by science to dervie it. And, admittedly, they may well be right. I am far, far, far more inclined to respect the methodolgy OF science than of, say, religion or metaphysics or any number of a zillion other numinous "intellectual" enterprises out there. But how would science ever encompass essentially the following: 1] is public nudity immoral? |

2] do grapes taste better than bacon?
3] is the music of the Kronos Quartet better than that of Phillip Glass?

Also, if science is ever able to express the Absolute Truth wuld that not render human autonomy and freedom moot? After all, if there is an Ultimate Reality, would not human interactions be embedded inside it---necessarily? This, in fact, is the very point David kept dodging when I brought it up on other threads.

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1427
(1/23/04 9:27 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Quote:

---

After all, if there is an Ultimate Reality, would not human interactions be embedded inside it---necessarily?

---

Absolutely. There is no choice involved except in terms of whether or not you (as a lonely individual) accept this truth emotionally.

Once accepted, you don't concern yourself with "is public nudity immoral" or "do grapes taste better than bacon." All are local, temporal, relative judgements.

Tharan

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 76
(1/23/04 9:53 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Tharan,

Again, I can just imagine you being accosted on the street, taken into a dark alley and viciously beat, raped and tortured; and then explaining to the thugs [much to their chagrin] how you have come to accept it all emotionally as merely an inevitable aspect of The Way Things Inevitably Are.

So they figure, what the hell, let's finish the bastard off. It's all fated anyway. ; )

Or suppose instead of you it was a child you loved...or your closest friend. On a scale from 1 to 10 how deeply consoling would you imagine your philosophy would be to them?

But that's the beauty of Ultimate Reality, isn't it? No matter what happens... and no matter how we react to it...by golly, it's all merely as it was meant to be!!!

And your argument can't possibly be refuted, of course, because no matter what you say or how I respond...presto!...instant Reality.

Thanks for the chuckles. You keep me young!! ; )

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1429
(1/23/04 10:11 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Again, you are tying personal suffering as some sort of litmus test for "Absolute Truth." Personal suffering can be the motivator to Absolute Truth, but it is certainly not the only one nor is it the kind of transcendence David has tried explaining to you. I don't relate my own physical suffering with the machinations of Nature, though it is certainly a part. My physical or emotional suffering is simply too miniscule to matter on my personal, spiritual level.

But yes, I would react and defend myself. My striving for enlightenment doesn't negate the fact that I am, and always will be, an animal; a human animal.

Tharan

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 773
(1/23/04 1:40 pm)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Biggier: But how would science ever encompass essentially the following:

- 1] is public nudity immoral?
- 2] do grapes taste better than bacon?
- 3] is the music of the Kronos Quartet better than that of Phillip Glass?

Scientifically, the Kronos Quartet doesn't even come close to Phillip Glass. :-)

Frankly, I don't think it is for science to decide such questions. I mean, which scientist would seriously attempt to prove the immorality of public nudity? (Unfortunately Ashcroft comes to mind, but he is not a scientist.) The very notion of immorality, musical and culinary taste, is unscientific.

Hofstaedter would probably say that such notions arise only in systems of recursive Gödelian complexity, human brains. They are too deep for science. Perhaps that is so, or perhaps the reasons are more mundane.

Biggier: Also, if science is ever able to express the Absolute Truth wuld that not render human autonomy and freedom moot?

"Absolute truth" and "ultimate reality" are deceptive concepts. There is no such thing. This statement is an absolute truth, of course. :-)

Thomas

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 77
(1/24/04 7:42 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Tharan,

How we measure the world around us will always be a manifestation of our own personal [existential] assessments---sans God. At least regarding those aspects of human interaction not encompassed objectively by natural science. There is no such thing as Suffering, Truth, Goodness, Justice. There is only how we experience the world as individuals and then, in turn, utilize these words to communicate an existential sense of reality to others who have also learned to internalize a sense of "what" these words "mean"---historically, culturally, interpersonally.

That needs to be qualified, however, by acknowledging the extent to which "I" is always a manifestation of "we"; just as "present" is always a manifestation of "past; just as "nurture" is always a manifrestation of "nature."

What you and David seem to be suggesting is that, over and above individual experiences and reactions and assessments, is this "ultimate" reality that cojoins all of us in Nature.

But what IS this Nature you embrace ontologically, I ask? That is when you hit me with all the mumbo-jumbo prattle about "cause and effect" and "absolute truth" and "transcendence" and "the spiritual level". Only don't dare to probe what is "behind" these ethereal "mental states", right? Because you have squat, zip, zero, ziltch to offer in the way of empirical or phenomonological evidence. Why, even mentioning THAT [hard evidence] sullies the angelic, beatific Beauty of The Way.

Doesn't it?

Look, you've managed to con yourself with your metaphysical "visions". Fine, and a Hare Krishna to you too. But you don't get me, my friend. In my world, you either have the balls to look at contingency without blinders on or you don't. You're an intellectual wimp, in my book. It's all about the warm fuzzy feeling enveloping The Way engenders inside, isn't it? Or cheating death and oblivion.

Gosh, it must be sorta like being back in the womb, eh? ; )

Biggie

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 77

(1/24/04 8:21 am)

Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Thomas,

Philip Glass is an acquired taste. But you can sneak in the backdoor by way of more popular artists because his compositions often revolve around a melodic structure that might legitimately be described as a "hook". The Kronos Quartet, on the other hand, is more about dissonance. If you don't come to them by way of a background in jazz and classical music, chances are you will never acquire a taste for their stuff. It took me many years to appreciate the distinction.

I agree that questions of public nudity or personal taste is not what science is [or should be] about. My point, however, is to note that those who come to embrace a "scientistic" agenda often presume these questions ARE applicable to science. In fact, they see science as that activity which will someday encompass a TOE. And by a Theory of Everything, they mean just that---EVERYthing will be explained. Thus, theoretically, everything is, right now, explicable.

It all revolves [for me] around that which human language can and cannot tell us about the world we live in. For example [as your ; ) suggested above], when you say there is no such thing as Absolute Truth, you recognize that someone might ask, "well, are you expressing THAT as an absolute truth?"

We just end up going around and around in circles [like my exchanges with Tharan and David] over what words mean. To me language is always situated to an extraordinary degree. It is situated in history and culture and social institutions and political economy and power; it is situated in childhood acculturation and emotional and psychological states; it is situated in gender and race and ethnicity; it is situated in the evolution of human biology; it is situated in each individual's genetic and psychological predispositions---personality and character traits; it is situated in the books we read [and did not read], in the experiences we had [and did not have], in the people we met [and did not meet]; it is situated profoundly in the astonishing mystery of the butterfly effect writ large on human interactions. And always they are evolving and changing over time.

To understand how all of these variables [and dozens more besides] intertwine is way, way, way beyond the capacity of any one single human mind [Even David's ; )]. It would be as though, instead of a handful of pieces on a two dimensional board, the game of chess consisted of hundreds of different pieces capable of literally in thousands of different moves on a three dimensional playing surface [re Spock's in Star Trek].

A Grand Master would probably consist of the first person able to explain the rules of the game itself. ; )

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1431
(1/24/04 8:48 am)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Big, understand that if you want to be "King Philosopher" or "Master Debater" here at Genius Forum, then go ahead and crown yourself because I am not aware of anyone else competing with you.

As far as your "empirical-only-matters" outlook, you may chase that carrot as long as you like. Perhaps one day you will catch something, perhaps not. You are here for a reason after all, aren't you? Please define for us what that reason is.

You could learn much from the language of the Eastern thinkers of the past (and a few from the present). It might even shatter your Western-based house-of-cards. To see the East would require an open mind but, at your age, the pattern suggests I shouldn't hold my breath.

Tharan

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 78
(1/24/04 12:36 pm)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Tharan,

I am a polemicist. So, again it's never personal. And I have noted more than just once in here how my opinions reflect only my own little corner of the world...my own existential "take" on things, as it were. I don't crown myself anything at all, in other words. Never in a million years would I suggest my point of view is anywhere near Ultimate Reality. The "arrogance" I project is just my usual provocative self. It's like bait. I'm only trying to reel in an exceptional mind. I do it in all the venues I go into because I love the challenge of actually finding a mind that makes me dig a little deeper. The kind that stops me dead in my tracks: "damn, I never thought of it like that before!" They are [sigh] so damn hard to find in this pop culture world. And that, in part, is because I am not really interested in Scholars and Academics and Intellectuals. I'm looking for a mind like my own--- riotously unconventional, wallowing in wit and grounded in human reality. Empirical and phenomenological reality.

In my view it is you and David and others who seem content on crowning yourself The Champs. Why? Because your point of view is actually said to BE in touch with a perspective that does, indeed, transcend the shadows on the cave walls. You may not go nearly as far as David does, true, but you still seem to project this Wisdom that, in my view, you have not even come close to effectively communicating to me. Not yet, anyway.

The East? In 20 years they will be more West than we are. Besides, Shopenhauer is my favorite philsophyer. And he was not only fascinated by Hinduism and Buddhism---he was the first Great Mind from Europe to incoroprate their points of view into his own philosophy.

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1432
(1/24/04 2:31 pm)
Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Quote:

---

I'm looking for a mind like my own---riotously unconventional, wallowing in wit and grounded in human reality.

---

And yet, you have that. You are all that you need. When you look inside and see the universe, then finally you have seen yourself.

You must eliminate this desire for self-validation through finding a "twin." Consider yourself validated.

/time shift

When you open your eyes and see the universe at your feet, 50 pushups and 3 Hail Mary's to a rhythm and blus beat.

Tharan

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 78

(1/25/04 4:14 am)

Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Tharan,

Again, your "philosophy" is laughable. Sitting on this third rock from the Sun, one of 6,000,000,000 points of view, you are the equivalent of a dust mote in the staggering vastness of all there is. Like me. Yet you yammer on and on and on about "looking into the universe" in order to "validate yourself". As though this preposterous bromide really IS a Deep Thought about Ultimate Reality....as though you actually COULD!!!!

Whatever gets you through the night though, eh?

On the other hand, if you are ever inclined to actually flesh out this rube rhetoric into something analogous to empirical reality [you know, hard evidence?], you can count on me to give it a fair hearing.

That's a promise.

Biggie

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2089

(1/25/04 7:06 am)

Reply

Re: scientism as ultimate reality?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

Schopenhauer is my favorite philosopher

---

Schopenhauer was a reductionist. He reduced everything down to "will".

Quote:

---

Also, if science is ever able to express the Absolute Truth would that not render human autonomy and freedom moot? After all, if there is an Ultimate Reality, would not human interactions be embedded inside it---necessarily? This, in fact, is the very point David kept dodging when I brought it up on other threads.

---

|                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                  | I have already stated that Ultimate Reality is nothing other than Nature itself, the process of cause and effect, and that humans are very much embedded inside it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 80(1/25/04 9:23 am)Reply | Re: scientism as ultimate reality? <hr/> David, And, of course, ULTIMATE Reality is anything but reductionist, right? In fact, quite the opposite. Everything is "exploded" into this gigantic mechanical sequence of cause and effect. Nothing is inside anything at all, is it? Everything just...well...Just Is. Shopenhauer situated the Will in the noumena. But unlike Kant [whom he greatly respected] he did not delude himself into imagining this is something that is intelligible---let alone something upon which to base a moral philosophy !!!! Biggie |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

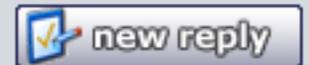

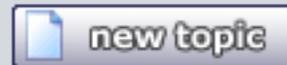

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Seeing into the future

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1050(3/29/04 5:36 pm)Reply     | Seeing into the future <hr/> Anybody here believe it is possible to see into the future? If so at what level and what is the principle/s of operation. If not how sure are you that it is impossible?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| BJMcGillyRegistered UserPosts: 11(3/30/04 2:43 am)Reply | Re: Seeing into the future <hr/> If you want to see the future, look no further than your attachments- after all, what matters more? The future of attachment is easy enough to see, and it is suffering. Whatever you adhere to will one day be stripped from you. This loss is itself death, and will propel you into a need based on habituation, and so rebirth. That is why wise men adhere to the immutable, Truth, which is itself unborn. Bryan |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1051(4/1/04 4:27 pm)Reply      | Re: Seeing into the future <hr/> Can those who adhere to the "immutable truth" see into the future?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

|                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 626(4/1/04 9:40 pm)Reply   | Re: Seeing into the future <hr/> Can those who adhere to the "immutable truth" see into the future? For them there is no future, there is only something aproximating 'now'. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 836(4/2/04 1:20 am)Reply  | Re: Seeing into the future <hr/> Well, logically, for everyone there is no future and there is only "now". The future can be said to be now after now.                                     |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1052(4/2/04 6:52 am)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Seeing into the future <hr/> Quote: <hr/> jimhazFor them there is no future, there is only something aproximating 'now'. <hr/> Genius jimhaz, Genius. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Self-pity

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 552(5/26/04 6:26 pm)Reply |  Self-pity <hr/> Ok, I think self-pity is the answer, the cause of all egotism. Despair is self-pity. The question is how to get rid of it. Here are some things I jotted down trying to figure out self-pity: Life is not suffering, but self-pity. It's the cause of all worldly desirings. Any wanting of something is an attempt to resolve self-pity. That's probably why no one ever has enough, because no matter how many material goods you have, they only provide a temporary relief when they are first acquired. They lose their luster after awhile. It's the same with one's accomplishments. Most people who are cynical engage in self-pity, so their cynicism isn't pure. They see someone obtaining an advantage, see that they wouldn't or couldn't seize that advantage, feel sorry for themselves at this loss and become morally indignant. Pure cynicism is nothing more than acknowledging that people act for selfish reasons. It can be used as a useful logical stepping stone, but most people turn it into a moral one because they don't want to face truth. Surges of joy comes from the ostentatious resolution or temporary relief of self-pity. Usually the self-pity deepens and then becomes temporarily resolved, which can create enough psychic momentum to thrust one into a state of joy. Sympathy and the desire to help people comes from putting oneself in someone else's shoes and feeling sorry for oneself in that position. It also heavily involves the feeling of superiority, which an attempt at resolving self-pity. |

Sexual attraction is rooted in self-pity. It's kind of a mixture between sympathy and want.

Negativity with respect to oneself is self-pity. It's the feeling that one deserves to be better than one is, but is not.

The feeling of loss is obviously nothing more than the feeling of self-pity.

The need for the acceptance and approval of others is the feeling that if this acceptance is granted, then the self-pity one experiences will be seen to be false. This doesn't work, though, because acceptance is finite, like a material object. It fades over time. Or maybe it could be like a "thought-handle": something to mentally grab onto that will help him forget his self-pity - a fantasy to escape into.

Work is definitely an escape from self-pity. Filling the mind with trivialities in order to forget one's self-pity.

Hope is a flight into fantasy, driven by self-pity, of course.

...

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2644

(5/27/04 1:12 am)

Reply

 ---

---

Life is desire! Its condition is love. Pity is an error of understanding.

posiix

Registered User

Posts: 24

(5/27/04 6:46 am)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Based on what you said above, I suppose the following is true:

'Finding peace involves living viraciously through those you envy'

... came up with that yesterday.

Cheers.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 120

(5/27/04 3:05 pm)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Life is not suffering, but self-pity. It's the cause of all worldly desirings.

---

I was under the impression that ignorance is the cause of all “worldly desirings”.

Would that also include hunger?

And most of the cynics I know, seem to have a pretty stable outlook on life.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 113

(5/28/04 11:03 am)

Reply

 Re: Self-pity

---

MGregory,

I would say that self-pity is caused by the (false) notion that the self is essentially real.

Egotism comes from this notion, which is expressed in things like self-pity.

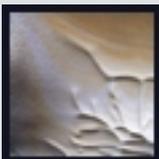

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 390

(5/28/04 11:32 am)

Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

Life is desire! Its condition is love. Pity is an error of understanding.

---

Life and love are also errors of understanding.

|                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 249(5/28/04 10:32 pm)Reply                                                                                                   |  ... <hr/> You enlightenment freaks should just put a bullet in your heads and be done with it. And I mean it without any hate at all. :P                                                                                                                                                              |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 250(5/28/04 10:34 pm)Reply                                                                                                   |  ... <hr/> Wait, now that I think of it, don't. Maybe you're just confused and enlightenment isn't really what you want, so you'd end up killing yourselves by mistake.                                                                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2652(5/29/04 7:51 am)Reply                                                                                                  |  --- <hr/> Rhett, love can be an error of understanding, but not necessarily. As for life being an error of understanding...you really fucked up there old son.                                                                                                                                |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 392(5/29/04 12:08 pm)Reply   Edit  |  Re: --- <hr/> That which you consider 'living' is of the same nature as that which you consider 'non-living'. As to what difference lies within the conceptual framework that you project upon your experiences, i am not privvy, because you've refrained from elucidating that in the past. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2655(5/30/04 1:37 am)Reply                |  Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> That which you consider 'living' is of the same nature as that which you consider 'non-living'. <hr/> No, that which I consider living has a different nature to that which is non-                                                         | living. Since both are in nature, how couldn't they?

Quote:

---

As to what difference lies within the conceptual framework that you project upon your experiences, i am not privvy, because you've refrained from elucidating that in the past.

---

This has nothing to do with your error Rhett, stating that life itself is an error of understanding, which would mean there is understanding before there is life.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 395
(5/30/04 10:43 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

That which you consider 'living' is of the same nature as that which you consider 'non-living'.

-----

No, that which I consider living has a different nature to that which is non-living. Since both are in nature, how couldn't they?

---

Both 'living' and 'non-living' things are nature.

To say that they are in nature is confusing, and ultimately false, because they are neither 'inside' nor 'outside' anything.

When i say that they are "of the same nature", i am saying that they are both nature, and that both are caused.

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
As to what difference lies within the conceptual framework that you project upon your experiences, i am not privvy, because you've refrained from elucidating that in the past.
-----

stating that life itself is an error of understanding, would mean there is understanding before there is life.

---

Yes, and that would be true, because understanding created the notion of life versus non-life.

MGregory

Posts: 556

(5/30/04 4:47 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Nox wrote:

Quote:

-----
I was under the impression that ignorance is the cause of all "worldly desirings".
-----

Sure, but I'm trying to uncover to question of how this ignorance manifests itself. I mean, I agree on the abstract level you are presenting this on, but it's not enough for me. Call it a personal failure or whatever, it doesn't do anything for me! :-) I see ignorance as a complex subject.

Quote:

-----
Would that also include hunger?
-----

You mean the desire for food (hunger is a sensation in the stomach)? Well, I'm thinking of the typically ignorant person what I say "everyone experiences self-pity". I really don't know if an enlightened person would experience that or not. I assume not.

Quote:

---

And most of the cynics I know, seem to have a pretty stable outlook on life.

---

Most cynics I know are unconscious cynics, so I guess there's nothing to discuss here. Maybe most of them are stable, I don't know.

MGregory

Posts: 557

(5/30/04 4:52 pm)

Reply

 Re: Self-pity

Quote:

---

I would say that self-pity is caused by the (false) notion that the self is essentially real.

Egotism comes from this notion, which is expressed in things like self-pity.

---

Sure, I agree, but again, this is a very abstract level you're dealing with it on. Not to say that it's wrong, I mean, maybe I'm just too impatient or something, but sometimes I have to deal with things on an experiential level. I know the self is false, but what does it really mean? How does it manifest itself in everyday experience? That's what I'm really trying to approach, not self-pity in itself. I mean, I am and I'm not. I can't even begin to explain it.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 121

(5/30/04 5:30 pm)

Reply

Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

Kelly: I would say that self-pity is caused by the (false) notion that the self is essentially real.

Egotism comes from this notion, which is expressed in things like self-pity.

MGregory: Sure, I agree, but again, this is a very abstract level you're dealing with it on. Not to say that it's wrong, I mean, maybe I'm just too impatient or something, but sometimes I have to deal with things on an experiential level. I know the self is false, but what does it really mean?

---

To try to define the self construct essentially means separating it within experience, from something else. So, to ask, how does it manifest in everyday experience depends on what is happening in the experience.

Hakuin talked about going down to "smash open the dark cave of the 8th consciousness" - the "Alaya" consciousness - so that "the precious light of the Great Perfect Mirror Wisdom can shine forth". I think this is the problem of "I am and I'm not" - the deep residues of ego. Supposedly it's the source of human consciousness and all existence, and when penetrated, evil passions are overcome, but if clung to, is another samsaric trap of ego.

I was thinking this morning about boundaries. It seems to me that contrasts are inherent in experience, but things aren't. That is, things are made of categories projected onto perceived phenomena. So Reality is actually a boundless world full of nothing, full of possibility where the Totality is the only "boundary" - a bit illogical, because it's beyond all limiting.

In this sense, you are Nature, or that crack in the concrete path, or God, or this closed-off watcher of things.

It is really quite abstract, perhaps because i'm quite comfortable in my "madness", perhaps because it's so difficult to communicate essentially emptiness, of intrinsic self, of connection to all consciousnesses, of nothing...

MGregory

Posts: 558

(5/30/04 5:36 pm)

Reply

Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

To try to define the self construct essentially means separating it within experience, from something else. So, to ask, how does it manifest in everyday experience depends on what is happening in the experience.

---

That's true, but it seems to me if we could somehow catalog all the experiences we have that are related to deluded ideas of the self, or at least a lot of them, the most problematic ones, it would make it easier. I know it's not quite that simple because, like in the case of self-pity, there isn't just one experience of self-pity, but, and this is my working hypothesis at the moment, but there are countless gradations of subtlety to it that occur. Another thing about it is that the label of "self-pity" itself could have slightly different meanings to different people. "Self-pity" may not resonate with someone, but "despair" or something might. There are several occasions where I'd been talking to someone and what they said didn't really mean anything to me until I put it in different words, which made the light go on. I'll give you an example which I think is kind of interesting: Dan Rowden expresses things in terms of "values" a lot, but that didn't really mean a lot to me until I sort of translated it into "importance", or what is important to me. I think since I picked up the habit of computer programming early on and it's a big part of my mentality, the word "value" doesn't mean much to me because when I think of a "value", I think of it as a quantity that goes in a variable, so to me it's basically something meaningless. Kind of funny, and I admit I could be blowing it all out of proportion, but I think it's possible that a person could run aground on things like that in their own thinking. But anyway, those are the reasons this type of exploration interests me. I have another reason that I'm hoping this thread will help me clarify - just can't put my finger on it.

---

Quote:

---

Hakuin talked about going down to "smash open the dark cave of the 8th consciousness" - the "Alaya" consciousness - so that "the precious light of the Great Perfect Mirror Wisdom can shine forth". I think this is the problem of "I am and I'm not" - the deep residues of ego. Supposedly it's the source of human consciousness and all existence, and when penetrated, evil passions are overcome, but if clung to, is another samsaric trap of ego.

---

I have no idea what he's talking about. Is "Eighth Consciousness" a stage of development or something intrinsic in the mind or what? Also, the word "penetrate" makes no sense to me in that context.

Quote:

---

I was thinking this morning about boundaries. It seems to me that contrasts are inherent in experience, but things aren't. That is, things are made of categories projected onto perceived phenomena. So Reality is actually a boundless world full of nothing, full of possibility where the Totality is the only "boundary" - a bit illogical, because it's beyond all limiting.

---

Well, there would be no experience without things, so there are things, it's just that they're not real in the way we normally think they are. We believe in them, which causes attachment to them, which causes us to believe in them more, which causes more attachment, and on and on. We create a kind of momentum that directs our minds towards the things, which is contrary to self-consciousness. That's how I look at it, anyway, in a nutshell.

Quote:

---

In this sense, you are Nature, or that crack in the concrete path, or God, or this closed-off watcher of things.

It is really quite abstract, perhaps because i'm quite comfortable in my "madness", perhaps because it's so difficult to communicate essentially emptiness, of intrinsic self, of connection to all consciousnesses, of nothing...

---

I agree that it's difficult. It's difficult to communicate with ourselves! How that's possible, I'm still trying to figure out. I guess it's just the habit of incorrect thinking that causes it.

Edited by: MGregory at: 5/31/04 3:55 am

Jones Kelly

Posts: 127

(5/31/04 9:14 pm)

Reply

Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

what they said didn't really mean anything to me until I put it in different words, which made the light go on. I'll give you an example which I think is kind of interesting: Dan Rowden expresses things in terms of "values" a lot, but that didn't really mean a lot to me until I sort of translated it into "importance", or what is important to me. I think since I picked up the habit of computer programming early on and it's a big part of my mentality, the word "value" doesn't mean much to me because when I think of a "value", I think of it as a quantity that goes in a variable, so to me it's basically something meaningless.

---

Actually, i think the idea of self-pity is a quantity-in-a-variable. The quantity is meaningfulness, or importance, given to that variable. Two definitions for value (meaning/variable) are similar to two definitions for Truth.

For something to be 100% true, the variable (truth) needs to be quantified (meaningful as absolutely true). What is absolutely true is defined by someone with perfect reasoning. For truth to have any meaning at all, it needs to be absolute, but then it becomes meaningless, because it has no dependence on something to give it meaning. Absolute truth therefore is a descriptive notion of something that demonstrates absolute certainty (ie a logical truth, that is 100% true). Truth does not exist apart from this, but it is not dependent on the logical truth to be true. That is, without the presence of absolute certainty, there is no Absolute Truth, but in its absence, it does not mean Absolute Truth becomes impossible.

A meaning (Truth) is given to an empty variable (certainty of a logical truth). Desire quantifies the experience of "something (lacking)", ie. empty variable (awareness) quantified (self) relative to a quantity of other.

It's samsaric, a vicious cycle of categorisation, that can only stop when all empty variables are quantified as empty...

Do you think to be aware of the nature of all delusions would be more helpful than to be aware of all delusions? It's like having a universal panacea, rather than having to find each appropriate medicine. That there is a sense of difference (i.e. new/old, same/different experience) is giving a meaning to the variable, when all along the variable is essentially meaningless.

Quote:

---

Kelly: Hakuin talked about going down to "smash open the dark cave of the 8th consciousness" - the "Alaya" consciousness - so that "the precious light of the Great Perfect Mirror Wisdom can shine forth". I think this is the problem of "I am and I'm not" - the deep residues of ego. Supposedly it's the source of human consciousness and all existence, and when penetrated, evil passions are overcome, but if clung to, is another samsaric trap of ego.

MGregory: I have no idea what he's talking about. Is "Eighth Consciousness" a stage of development or something intrinsic in the mind or what? Also, the word "penetrate" makes no sense to me in that context.

---

I don't have complete understanding of the stages of consciousness. I am projecting my understanding onto something I am unclear about. I am supposing (projecting) that penetrating the ego means radically understanding the core truth about everything - all awareness. Like putting a stick of dynamite under a tough old stump, blasting away the root. To me, it is directly speaking about the experience of the Totality, where the boundaries are simply of no importance.

Quote:

---

I was thinking this morning about boundaries. It seems to me that contrasts are inherent in experience, but things aren't. That is, things are made of categories projected onto perceived phenomena. So Reality is actually a boundless world full of nothing, full of possibility where the Totality is the only "boundary" - a bit illogical, because it's beyond all limiting.

MGregory: Well, there would be no experience without things, so there are things, it's just that they're not real in the way we normally think they are. We believe in them, which causes attachment to them, which causes us to believe in them more, which causes more attachment, and on and on. We create a kind of momentum that directs our minds towards the things, which is contrary to self-consciousness. That's how I look at it, anyway, in a nutshell.

---

I think the difference is between being in the "form" realms and the "formless" realms - things exist in both, but in an utterly different way. In both, things "aren't real in the way we normally think they are", but the normalcy of things in a deluded consciousness is a different normalcy to that in the form realms, and again different to that in the formless realms. I reason that it is so (note this is from an intellectual perspective, not from experience) because (i) the analysis of the attachment to the 3D physical-world things, in the light of causal processes, that happens in the form realms, shifts the boundaries of what things are; (ii) because of this shifting of boundaries, things essentially don't exist in the formless realms, because the boundaries are actually redefined according to purpose.

Communication. Two aggressive evangelicals demonstrated the importance to me today of getting some kind of value-system worked out immediately in a discussion of God, reality and beliefs. That they believed God's spirit manifested in them when they spoke in "tongues" indicated we were not going to get anywhere. Tongues seems to mean gibberish (anything one doesn't recognise) - i.e. God is the flight from making any sense.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2659

(6/1/04 1:54 am)

Reply

 Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

Rhett:-

That which you consider 'living' is of the same nature as that which you consider 'non-living'.

Suergaz;-No, that which I consider living has a different nature to that which is non-living. Since both are in nature, how couldn't they?

Rhett:-Both 'living' and 'non-living' things are nature.

To say that they are in nature is confusing, and ultimately false, because they are neither 'inside' nor 'outside' anything.

When i say that they are "of the same nature", i am saying that they are both nature, and that both are caused.

---

It doesn't matter that they are not inside or outside anything, you speak poor english if you say "they are of the same nature" to mean "they are both nature". They are of the same nature, but are not it. That they are both caused is not in question.

Quote:

---

Rhett:-As to what difference lies within the conceptual framework that you project upon your experiences, i am not privvy, because you've refrained from elucidating that in the past.

suergaz : stating that life itself is an error of understanding, would mean there is understanding before there is life.

Rhett:-Yes, and that would be true, because understanding created the notion of life versus non-life.

---

Firstly, don't cut my quote short midsentence when you quote me, and secondly, the notion of life versus non-life is not life, but of it, ie. of consciousness, get it? Stop trying to weasel your way out of being wrong you great oaf.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 399

(6/1/04 12:11 pm)

Reply | Edit

Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
Rhett:-

That which you consider 'living' is of the same nature as that which you consider 'non-living'.

Suergaz;-No, that which I consider living has a different nature to that which is non-living. Since both are in nature, how couldn't they?

Rhett:-Both 'living' and 'non-living' things are nature.

To say that they are in nature is confusing, and ultimately false, because they are neither 'inside' nor 'outside' anything.

When i say that they are "of the same nature", i am saying that they are both nature, and that both are caused.

-----
It doesn't matter that they are not inside or outside anything, you speak poor english if you say "they are of the same nature" to mean "they are both nature". They are of the same nature, but are not it. That they are both caused is not in question.

---

They are both of the same nature in the sense that they have no nature, and yet, they are both nature.

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
Rhett:-As to what difference lies within the conceptual framework that you project upon your experiences, i am not privvy, because you've refrained from elucidating that in the past.

suergaz : stating that life itself is an error of understanding, would mean there is understanding before there is life.

Rhett:-Yes, and that would be true, because understanding created the notion of life versus non-life.

---

Firstly, don't cut my quote short midsentence when you quote me, and secondly, the notion of life versus non-life is not life, but of it, ie. of consciousness, get it?

---

I didn't consider myself to be compromising the meaning of your sentence, but i will be more careful in future.

Yes, the Totality could be said to be alive . . . but it could also be said to be dead.

MGregory

Posts: 560

(6/1/04 6:29 pm)

Reply

Re: Self-pity

---

Kelly wrote:

Quote:

---

Do you think to be aware of the nature of all delusions would be more helpful than to be aware of all delusions? It's like having a universal panacea, rather than having to find each appropriate medicine.

---

Well, I don't think you can get very far without both, as well as abandoning the delusions, which is something qualitively different.

Quote:

---

I am supposing (projecting) that penetrating the ego means radically understanding the core truth about everything - all awareness. Like putting a stick of dynamite under a tough old stump, blasting away the root. To me, it is directly speaking about the experience of the Totality, where the boundaries are simply of no importance.

---

Right, but that can be explained in the way you just did without resorting to yet another category, so I think the stuff about eighth consciousness is putting emphasis on something a little bit different, something I would imagine to be more subjective.

Quote:

---

I think the difference is between being in the "form" realms and the "formless" realms - things exist in both, but in an utterly different way. In both, things "aren't real in the way we normally think they are", but the normalcy of things in a deluded consciousness is a different normalcy to that in the form realms, and again different to that in the formless realms. I reason that it is so (note this is from an intellectual perspective, not from experience) because (i) the analysis of the attachment to the 3D physical-world things, in the light of causal processes, that happens in the form realms, shifts the boundaries of what things are; (ii) because of this shifting of boundaries, things essentially don't exist in the formless realms, because the boundaries are actually redefined according to purpose.

---

Makes sense to me, but I've never experienced any realm outside of the Matt realm. :-) I wonder what you'd have to do to enter a form realm. I've been in deep concentration many times, but I've never experienced anything out of the ordinary except mental fatigue. I'm probably not of sufficiently high scope. In fact, that's pretty much where I'm at is trying to figure out how to enter into high scope without killing myself.

Quote:

---

Communication. Two aggressive evangelicals demonstrated the importance to me today of getting some kind of value-system worked out immediately in a discussion of God, reality and beliefs. That they believed God's spirit manifested in them when they spoke in "tongues" indicated we were not going to get anywhere. Tongues seems to mean gibberish (anything one doesn't recognise) - i.e. God is the flight from making any sense.

---

I don't see the connection there. Why did you conclude that the problem of communication was a problem in understanding each other's values? Sounds to me like they just flipped out at some point. I don't see how communication could be possible in a situation like that.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 135

(6/1/04 8:09 pm)

Reply

 Re: Self-pity

---

Quote:

---

Kelly: Do you think to be aware of the nature of all delusions would be more helpful than to be aware of all delusions? It's like having a universal panacea, rather than having to find each appropriate medicine.

MGregory: Well, I don't think you can get very far without both, as well as abandoning the delusions, which is something qualitatively different.

---

A delusion disappears as soon as its nature is evident. Chasing delusions is far inferior to chasing God, since an awareness of the Infinite scatters all the delusions. It's like two-birds-with-one-stone.

Quote:

---

Kelly: I am supposing (projecting) that penetrating the ego means radically understanding the core truth about everything - all awareness. Like putting a stick of dynamite under a tough old stump, blasting away the root. To me, it is directly speaking about the experience of the Totality, where the boundaries are simply of no importance.

MGregory: Right, but that can be explained in the way you just did without resorting to yet another category, so I think the stuff about eighth consciousness is putting emphasis on something a little bit different, something I would imagine to be more subjective.

---

I was aware of this "tool" (description of Alaya consciousness), so thought it might be useful...a map to help orient oneself, to see that fantastic understanding is not the destination, but a useful landmark.

Quote:

---

MGregory: Makes sense to me, but I've never experienced any realm outside of the Matt realm. :-) I wonder what you'd have to do to enter a form realm. I've been in deep concentration many times, but I've never experienced anything out of the ordinary except mental fatigue. I'm probably not of sufficiently high scope. In fact, that's pretty much where I'm at is trying to figure out how to enter into high scope without killing myself.

---

Satori isn't all that important to me, as it pretends that a particular experience is unique. Twisting consciousness to have a special experience seems pointless to me, when all along experiences are intrinsically rare. I used to tantalise myself with the idea that i'd be in a kind of Dilbert in-the-computer-realm, which was enlightenment, but it is faulty logic to rest in a mental picture of what Reality should be like. Reality is what it is, sometimes an infinite realm, sometimes a practical one, or yet again something else.

Stories of Hakuin's endurance do stun and depress me because i value developing a powerful clarify of mind. Although i can't imagine tying myself up repeatedly every night in a futon to maintain a meditation posture (strict concentration), or engaged in a 7-day constant zazen, or doing a Tsuming gimlet-in-the-thigh to avoid drowsiness, or even fasting for several days, i can see a little bit of overall improvement. Why should i agonise? I'm perfect Nature, and must slowly grow to be more mindful.

Improving one's scope is caused: i have a simple daily routine, to increase alertness (sensitivity to changes). It's pretty basic: walk-eat-read-sleep. I value improving the body-machine so that it is "lighter" (not distracting) in order to improve the quality of thoughts. Long walks are useful experiments, and diet is also simple. Experiments with fasting indicated how much food suited mental activity levels. I also value testing my "boredom" boundaries, especially in the focus-break points.

Quote:

---

Kelly: Communication. Two aggressive evangelicals demonstrated the importance to me today of getting some kind of value-system worked out immediately in a discussion of God, reality and beliefs. That they believed God's spirit manifested in them when they spoke in "tongues" indicated we were not going to get anywhere. Tongues seems to mean gibberish (anything one doesn't recognise) - i.e. God is the flight from making any sense.

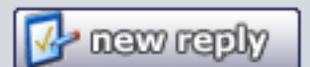

MGregory: I don't see the connection there. Why did you conclude that the problem of communication was a problem in understanding each other's values? Sounds to me like they just flipped out at some point. I don't see how communication could be possible in a situation like that.

---

It was a lesson for me that communication relies on the appearance of agreed definitions. It seems that our discussion is coherent, but that's my projection, to meet my values of exploring Truth. I don't see how true communication is possible at all - it's provisional in every case.

I think "flipping out" (exasperation?) is a result of mismatched agendas, a kind of haphazard agreement that values are not shared. Instead of an ordered reasoning-tree, a kind of crazy rhizobial node-cluster fractals out into chaos...

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered User(3/29/04 12:14 pm)  | New Post Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Hi Philip, Quote: <hr/> You could say something like that, but a better analogy would be to compare it to "becoming healthy" so that the climb up the mountain (Enlightenment) can be taken with a good chance of actually arriving at the peak. This would be as opposed to beginning the climb in an unhealthy state, only to give up or fall off halfway up. (See Marian Caplan's interesting book, "Halfway Up the Mountain: The Errors of Premature Claims to Enlightenment", for more on that). The idea with avoiding excessive repression is to help people get to a functional, healthy level where they can indeed begin the process of Enlightenment in a fashion that doesn't lead to madness, imbalance, or a partial distorted awakening or premature "spiritual emergency" (as Grof called it...check out Gopi Krishna for more), that can greatly set back one's Enlightenment aspirations, or delay them for many years. <hr/> |

- The mind is pretty much everything. If it is in harmony (Truthful), the body will likely be so as well. Complete harmony can only occur in the presence of an enlightened mind.

I spent years trying to optimise my body pre-enlightenment (not much sex though, but more on that later), but couldn't do it properly in the presence of a disharmonious (deluded) mind. My deluded mind compromised the process. It kept developing attachments and creating anxieties and muscular tension.

- When a person has thoughts that sex is desirable and will relieve suffering (make them feel good), they seek it.

If they consciously decide not to fulfil that desire, sure, they will still experience the desire, but they will usually be more open to thinking about the nature of sexual desire than if they engaged in it.

If, however, they choose to engage in regular sex, they're reinforcing it in their psyche. People rarely have much power over operant conditioning; what is done makes its tracks in the mind regardless of what one tries to think about it. And since sex is both mindless and an expression of the will to mindlessness, it rarely predisposes people to thinking about anything at all. All one can come away with that is of benefit to the eradication of desire is the blank memory, which indicates one's unconsciousness. One only needs to have sex once in one's life to realise that.

If a person opens their mind to what sex is all about, to what it really is, they're not going to desire it, or have a problem with it, regardless of their physiology.

- Here are some certain facts about myself and Philip,

I have chosen to engage in sex about 25 times in my life. I am 29 and do not experience sexual desire. If it does arise again, even though I don't imagine it will, I remain open to engaging in sex if I think that will help me. However, I really don't see that as being the solution, and if I want to experience it again I can just use my memories of it, which I do have because I've done it in full consciousness.

Philip has chosen to have quite a fair amount of sex, and at the age of 45 still talks about it quite a lot, and admits to still having some sexual desire.

I think it's obvious that my path is spiritually superior.

This is only a PREVIEW of your post. To add this post, please click the "Add Post" button to your right. If you would like to make changes to your post, you can edit it below.

|                       |                                                                                                                                                   |
|-----------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Your User Name:       | rhetthamilton                                                                                                                                     |
| Posting Restrictions: | * You must be REGISTERED to post * ( Register Here )                                                                              |
| Subject:              |                                                                                                                                                   |
| Formatting:           | Plain Text   ezCodes   (?)                                                                                                                        |
| Comment:Insert:   |                                                                                                                                                   |
| Using ezPost          |                                                                                                                                                   |
| Posting Options:      | Custom signature not allowed in this forumInclude personal photo.Convert URL LinksEmail me notification of all replies to this topic. |

Stay in topic                      Preview

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31c
Copyright ©1999-2004 ezboard, Inc.

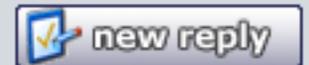

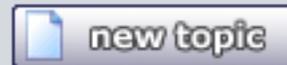

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

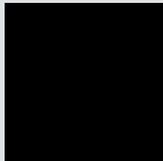

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|   Philip Mistlberger           Posts: 58           (3/19/04 8:16 am)           Reply           ezSupporter   | Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> I know that the issue of "relationship/relating/sexuality" comes up frequently at this board, so I thought I'd share some considerations in these areas... Most orthodox treatments of religion have as a central basis a rejection of the body and its elemental energies, most specifically, the sexual force itself. The roots of the Judeo-Christian "devil" and much of its associated imagery is linked to older Pagan deities (such as Pan, Faunus, Dionysius, Cernunnos, Shiva, etc.) who embodied primal procreative power and virility. As the monotheistic religions (Judaism, Christianity, Islam) were all patriarchal, the distorted aspect of the sexual force that got projected into the mythic image of the "devil" was, predictably, the male aspect of sexuality -- precisely because it was this male aspect that was most repressed within the various ecclesiastical authorities, priests, and monks, themselves. The European Inquisition, and its witch-burnings, can be interpreted in various lights, but an important aspect of the whole affair was doubtless the projection of the Church's own denied and repressed elemental energies (foremost being the sexual force), most conveniently onto women of any sort of animistic faiths or persuasions. The condemnation of Eve in the Old Testament Book of Genesis reflects |

simply and clearly the various levels of female sexual dysfunction that have been commonplace for so long as to attract scant consideration. Most sexual dysfunction is related to various levels of guilt, shame, and self-loathing/self-rejection that has been aided and sustained in large part by organized religion. In turn, most hideous crimes are connected to various levels of profound hurt, betrayal, and repressed grief connected to relationship breakdown often brought on by inability to sustain intimacy on physical or emotional levels.

The universal symbol for the sexual force is in large part that of the Serpent, or Dragon, which is more often than not recognized as a teacher of wisdom and guardian of life in most traditions. However, the wisdom it represents is part of a developmental process, i.e., it is not the end of the journey, but what we might call the mid-way point. Sexuality is an unavoidable aspect of the journey in the physical realm. But in itself it does not lead to the goal of full liberation from the conditions of suffering and limitation.

The flaw in most organized religions is that they have overlooked the importance of befriending the sexual force, and have even reacted in fear against it, regarding it as a useless (or even dangerous) impediment to religious conversion, thereby devising all sorts of so-called moral codes to "tame" this force, which invariably end in simple repression, loss of joy, deadening of experience, and even resulting pathologies.

Some of the aspects of human nature most commonly repressed could be said to be --

- a) sexual energy
- b) negative emotions
- c) positive emotions
- d) rebellious urges
- e) creativity
- f) violence
- g) need

Some of these, such as violence, are repressed as part of the natural "impulse control" that is hardwired into human neurology. Without a certain ability to repress, we'd rapidly descend into uniform chaos and brutality.

But on most levels, repression is simply unhealthy, and ultimately destructive. Dr. Arthur Janov, the founder of Primal Therapy, has asserted that repression is the #1 killer, bar none, and he provides substantial documentation and statistical compilations to back his thesis. His contention is that repression is a strong factor in both psychological pathologies (beginning with depression) and physical ailments, such as heart disease and even cancer.

What promotes repression? Without question, the finger can be pointed here in the direction of organized religion. An excellent example is found in the Christian symbology of the "Devil". Having its roots in the Green Man, Cernunnos, of ancient Celtic and Pagan myth, it came over time to basically symbolize the repressed male sexual energy of the Christian ecclesiastical authorities and monks.

Observe in this classic Tarot representation of the "Devil", how there are two chained and bound humans at his feet. Aside for the classic interpretation of this as being human nature entrapped by materialism and enslaved to desires, it also, more insidiously, represents the very repression of human desire-energies that is foundational to much of organized religion. This image is essentially the "shadow side" of the priesthood.

Chinese Taoists, some of whom are masters in their understandings of sexual energy, have long known that total celibacy is not recommended, and certainly not without a deep understanding of the human energy system. The enforced celibacy of many monastic orders in Christendom during the Dark and Middle Ages resulted in a tremendous build up of denied procreative energies, which eventually manifested as an outward projection of "Devil symbology", being itself a silly caricature of sexual symbolism, drawing from Roman and Greek deities of sensuality, such as Pan and Faunus, in addition to the Celtic Cernunos, who in addition to his "Green Man" title was also known, fittingly, as "Lord of the Animals".

Here he's show in his rough form at "Cerne Abbas" in the UK...

...and here as Shiva, north Indian deity...

In both cases the "erect penis", which is a virtual taboo in modern culture (excepting hard core porn) is shown clearly, being a symbol of vital energy and the life force. When this vital energy gets projected by repressed individuals, what it naturally is drawn to (the vagina) becomes something malevolent and to be feared.

Some of you may be familiar with the polemical diatribe penned by the Dominican monks Kramer and Spengler in the Middle Ages, called Malleus Malificarum ("Witches Hammer"). This is truly one of the most horrific books ever written. It was nothing but a sheer death sentence for thousands of (mostly) women, whose only crime in being subjected to the horrors of the Inquisition was that some of them may have followed certain shamanistic or pagan spiritual traditions. More likely, most of them practiced nothing more than simply being female, thus being a projection screen for the denied procreative energies of the religious authorities who judged them.

The sexual force may be said to be the most purely *physical* aspect of the universal Life Force, and as such, has been the most poorly understood, and most intensely judged and rejected, of all human attributes. This is still reflected in modern times where art (films, etc.) that involve sexuality are deemed inappropriate for youth, whereas violence of all sorts is somehow acceptable. More extreme forms of sexual pathology and deviancy are the ultimate byproducts of the repression and fear of this primal force.

This post is long enough, later I'll share some of Wilhelm Reich's work connected to the freeing up of trapped "energy" in the characterological structure of the body.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1478

(3/19/04 8:48 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Phillip, I thank you for this post. My whole family read The Primal Scream when I was fifteen, and we talked about it for literally years. I disagree with what you say about repressed violence and the descent to barbarism. Perhaps tomorrow on Peanuts I'll get started to tell you why. Have you read The Anatomy of Human Destructiveness, or The Culture of Make Believe by Jensen?

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 1040

(3/19/04 9:18 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Repression appears to be stronger and more functional. Controlled passions are like controlled explosions. Engines are a useful example of controlled explosions made functional.

Monogomy is the best way to manage a large or concentrated community just like traffic lights enable many cars to move around the city centre.

What is your actual mission/point Philip?

1) Getting people to meet together in groups where they can escape their repression for a while, like orgies.

2) Getting people to control their repressed feelings more effectively in a safe way so that they do not explode, so to speak.

3) Other?

I'm working in a new, but some how very old, angle. But my philosophical foundation is not quite ready yet.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 827

(3/19/04 9:22 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Repression is fine. Sexuality and organized religion are good.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 59

(3/19/04 12:56 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Hi DEL --

Quote:

---

What is your actual mission/point Philip?

1) Getting people to meet together in groups where they can escape their repression for a while, like orgies.

---

Been there, done that. It no longer holds interest for me. That is, I no longer have any repressed fantasies/desires related to group sex, as I've lived it and released it as an abstract desire.

Quote:

---

2) Getting people to control their repressed feelings more effectively in a safe way so that they do not explode, so to speak.

---

Sure, that can be part of it. In my counseling practice over the years I've worked with people at all sorts of different levels, and at times, what is conventionally known as *anger-management* can be indeed very appropriate.

Quote:

---

3) Other?

---

I don't have a "mission", but I do have points. The post above I actually wrote three years ago (slightly modified/edited), but thought it might be useful as a stimulation for discussion in this forum.

I believe that Enlightenment is simple in ultimate meaning, but complex in terms of the process of bringing it to fruition. One of the reasons it's complex, and why more people simply aren't Enlightened, is precisely because of *repression*. When parts of the personality/mind get repressed, they are literally no longer visible to the eye of consciousness or the discernment of intellect. They have vanished into the dark corridors and secret closets of the mind.

Anyone sincerely interested in Enlightenment sooner or later faces these hidden elements of the psyche, in one form or another.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 893
(3/19/04 1:37 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Excellent post, Philip, and probably relevant here. What literature do you recommend on the subject of repression?

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2297

(3/19/04 4:08 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

One of the reasons it's complex, and why more people simply aren't Enlightened, is precisely because of *repression*. When parts of the personality/mind get repressed, they are literally no longer visible to the eye of consciousness or the discernment of intellect. They have vanished into the dark corridors and secret closets of the mind.

Anyone sincerely interested in Enlightenment sooner or later faces these hidden elements of the psyche, in one form of another.

---

Those who repress profound, unconventional thoughts should be safe, then.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 1041

(3/19/04 5:46 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

I believe that Enlightenment is simple in ultimate meaning, but complex in terms of the process of bringing it to fruition. One of the reasons it's complex, and why more people simply aren't Enlightened, is precisely because of *repression*. When parts of the personality/mind get repressed, they are literally no longer visible to the eye of consciousness or the discernment of intellect. They have vanished into the dark corridors and secret closets of the mind.

Anyone sincerely interested in Enlightenment sooner or later faces these hidden elements of the psyche, in one form of another.

---

So if I understand you correctly, to use my analogy, you are trying to create a smoother quieter engine ASE (advanced social engineering). These hidden elements of the psyche are explosive or create very unpleasant noises from the exhaust pipe like the old engines used to.

In the past functional repression meant fear of being flogged, having parts of your body amputated or burned alive. If it was not for these crude and very visible methods civilisation would not have progressed in the way it has.

Only recently has the horse been replaced by the motor vehicle.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

. . . . .Sure, that can be part of it. In my counseling practice over the years I've worked with people at all sorts of different levels, and at times, what is conventionally known as *anger-management* can be indeed very appropriate.

---

That reminds me, I wanted to go see that movie "Anger Management" I assume it must be quite good.

So from what you have said and from the work you are doing I can see you are on an ASE mission but you are unconscious of it. It follows that those who are trying to produce a quieter engine eventually become quieter themselves.

Quieter and quieter we go until we cannot hear a sound. How will we know whether we are deaf or if things are just quiet?

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 61

(3/19/04 5:54 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Anna -- I underwent Janovian Primal Therapy about 22 years ago. By that time Janov's original "Primal Scream" book had become overshadowed by some of his later works. I haven't read the other two works you mentioned.

One curious fact about Janov -- he himself never underwent his own system of therapy! He happened upon it essentially by chance, when one of his patients spontaneously began releasing old buried psychic scars in a loud and dramatic fashion -- a "blood curdling scream" that he called the "primal scream".

By the late 70s and 80s Primal Therapy had evolved to the point where it was much less rigid and violently cathartic in its methods. The vast majority of people who passed through it never had any "primal scream".

Thomas -- some of the best writings on the whole area of "repression" can be found in the works of Wilhelm Reich ("The Function of the Orgasm", "The Murder of Christ", etc.), as well as Alexander Lowen ("The Betrayal of the Body", etc.), Janov (several works), Fritz Perls ("Gestalt Therapy Verbatim"), Stanislav Grof ("Spiritual Emergency") and others in the transpersonal therapy field.

David -- yes, repression is often a problem, whether of sexual desire, or profound, unconventional thoughts.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 62

(3/19/04 6:24 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

DEL --

Quote:

---

So if I understand you correctly, to use my analogy, you are trying to create a smoother quieter engine ASE (advanced social engineering). These hidden elements of the psyche are explosive or create very unpleasant noises from the exhaust pipe like the old engines used to.

---

You could say something like that, but a better analogy would be to compare it to "becoming healthy" so that the climb the mountain

(Enlightenment) can be taken with a good chance of actually arriving at the peak. This would be as opposed to beginning the climb in an unhealthy state, only to give up or fall off halfway up. (See Marian Caplan's interesting book, "Halfway Up the Mountain: The Errors of Premature Claims to Enlightenment", for more on that).

The idea with avoiding excessive repression is to help people get to a functional, healthy level where they can indeed begin the process of Enlightenment in a fashion that doesn't lead to madness, imbalance, or a partial distorted awakening or premature "spiritual emergency" (as Grof called it...check out Gopi Krishna for more), that can greatly set back one's Enlightenment aspirations, or delay them for many years.

Quote:

---

In the past functional repression meant fear of being flogged, having parts of your body amputated or burned alive. If it was not for these crude and very visible methods civilisation would not have progressed in the way it has.

---

Yes, that's exactly what I wrote above ("some impulse control has been necessary for civilization to develop", etc.).

Quote:

---

Only recently has the horse been replaced by the motor vehicle.

---

And neither is much good if they are unhealthy.

Quote:

---

So from what you have said and from the work you are doing I can see you are on an ASE mission but you are unconscious of it.

---

That's amusing. First you imply something about what I do, then, without finding out whether I agree with you or not, automatically assume that I am "unconscious" doing it! That suggests to me that you are insecure about your viewpoints and are expecting to be contradicted or disagreed with. That's an "unconscious" defense mechanism you may have just revealed.

Quote:

---

It follows that those who are trying to produce a quieter engine eventually become quieter themselves.

---

"Quiet" in terms of less "crazy noise" is not all that bad. Most minds and egos are full of crazy noise.

But ending repression is anything but "going quiet". On the contrary, it's about becoming more *alive*, and more *intelligent*. A repressed mind inclines toward stupidity.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 236
(3/19/04 8:00 pm)
Reply

...

---

I'm yet to read this post (but I will), but I bet it can be summed up like this:

1. Be honest with yourself - If you feel like eating babies, admit that you want it. No one's watching your mind but yourself, it's not going to hurt.
2. Don't be dumb - Before you try to eat one of them tasty babies, consider the consequences. If they are not worth it for you, don't do it.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 895
(3/19/04 8:37 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Philip: Thomas -- some of the best writings on the whole area of "repression" can be found in the works of Wilhelm Reich ("The Function of the Orgasm", "The Murder of Christ", etc.), as well as Alexander Lowen ("The Betrayal of the Body", etc.), Janov (several works), Fritz Perls ("Gestalt Therapy Verbatim"), Stanislav Grof ("Spiritual Emergency") and others in the transpersonal therapy field.

Thanks, Philip, that is quite a long list. If I may ask, is there any single work of literature that you found crucial for understanding the human mind, something with the potential to initiate a quantum jump of understanding, so to speak, or would you say that the understanding of the human mind is emergent, the result of a gradual learning process, application, and experience? And while we're at it, since you seem to have some first hand Tibet experience, let me ask you what recommendations you have for the first-time Tibet traveler with an interest in Buddhism (I guess that would be the majority of Westerners who go there). I might have the opportunity to visit this summer after I return from Europe.

Philip: You could say something like that, but a better analogy would be to compare it to "becoming healthy" so that the climb up the mountain (Enlightenment) can be taken with a good chance of actually arriving at the peak.

Do you believe there is a mountain to be climbed? What means arriving?

Philip: The idea with avoiding excessive repression is to help people get to a functional, healthy level where they can indeed begin the process of Enlightenment in a fashion that doesn't lead to madness, imbalance, or a partial distorted awakening or premature "spiritual emergency" (as Grof called it...check out Gopi Krishna for more), that can greatly set back one's Enlightenment aspirations, or delay them for many years.

Spiritual emergency. Wow. What could that be? Any examples? Also, how does one become mad or imbalanced on the way to enlightenment? Wouldn't the path to enlightenment consist in the exact opposite of developing a mental condition? Something must go terribly wrong if mental conditions appear or worsen. I think you might be referring to the fact that one often finds people with "delicate" dispositions in retreats or counseling settings who may not be quite ready for the challenges presented by some spiritual traditions. Or not?

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1478

(3/20/04 3:35 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Wilhelm Reich was another family favorite. I have a battered old copy of the Murder of Christ somewhere.

silentsal

Registered User

Posts: 82

(3/20/04 4:45 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

I do believe repression is damaging. Spiritual discipline is about authenticity, not repression, being honest about our feelings, emotions, and urges lets us exhaust them naturally, repression is about denial, and in my experience growth outflows from a point of acceptance.

edit:

I also think repression is thought to be required by many because they are afraid of the power of their own nature. Lets face it nature can be ugly, nasty, bloody and raw. We are afraid of ourselves, so we build boxes to contain it and the box becomes our prison. The only way to liberation is to realize you don't need the box, when we let our nature flow unchecked it does not gather the enourmous energy that builds up from blockages. I say violence is born, and we carry it to term. Hah, its like realizing we are no better than animals and so with a huge sigh of relief you stop pretending to only find out your much more than that anyway.

Edited by: silentsal at: 3/20/04 5:31 am

Kellyven
Posts: 62
(3/20/04 11:11 am)
Reply

ego is born

---

Sexual repression and expression are two sides of the one thing: ego.

Yes, violence is born, when one lets one's "nature flow unchecked". This is because one doesn't have any nature (except Nature).

That big sigh of relief is created by pretension that we are something that needs to be relieved, as if we must have sex or explode, or must eat or die by starvation, or must breathe or asphyxiate, or actually must do anything at all.

When the delusion of the self is gone, there is no emotion, because there is nothing to get attached to.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1042
(3/20/04 2:27 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

You could say something like that, but a better analogy would be to compare it to "becoming healthy" so that the climb up the mountain (Enlightenment) can be taken with a good chance of actually arriving at the peak. This would be as opposed to beginning the climb in an unhealthy state, only to give up or fall off halfway up.

---

I think the you are wrong.

Enlightenment is always near the middle, it is dynamic and it feels unhealthy.

Your climb is to nowhere that can support life and is pleasant sounding nonsense. The peak of your mountain is repression perfected no matter what fancy language you use and no matter how many trendy books you recommend reading.

What else can it be but repression perfected?

Internal repression or external repression is still repression. To avoid excessive repression is to avoid the peak of the mountain you are trying to help people climb.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

The idea with avoiding excessive repression is to help people get to a functional, healthy level where they can indeed begin the process of Enlightenment in a fashion that doesn't lead to madness, imbalance, or a partial distorted awakening or premature "spiritual emergency"

---

You are not helping anybody. You are leading people into madness. Nature will undo all your work on their minds soon after it is accomplished. Your bank balance will be much improved though as they have to pay for guidance to reach the impossible peak. It's a bit like manufactureing fashionable products. All new products appear "functional" for a time. Cults make good money.

On the other hand you could be helping people if you make your points strong enough. That way people will crash and burn and suffer enough damage to make them rethink there lives rather than jumping from one enlightenment course to another.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

That's amusing. First you imply something about what I do, then, without finding out whether I agree with you or not, automatically assume that I am "unconscious" doing it! That suggests to me that you are insecure about your viewpoints and are expecting to be contradicted or disagreed with. That's an "unconscious" defense mechanism you may have just revealed.

---

Ha! insecure! insecure! insecure!

It's amazing how trendy that word is. It is a magic word to control modern fools. People work harder and harder to spend it on endless types of insurance and assurance policies.

Of course I'm insecure.

If you think you are secure you are a stupid idiot, braindead and no longer have the ability to learn anything.
You are selling the illusion of security.

The Genius is insecure.
The Enlightened are insecure.
The dead are secure.
The self deluded have convinced themselves they are secure.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 84
(3/20/04 6:08 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Sexual repression and expression are two sides of the one thing: ego.

---

yes without ego, there is no need to repress, nor is there any need to express, yet you don't have to run away from either.

Quote:

---

Yes, violence is born, when one lets one's "nature flow unchecked". This is because one doesn't have any nature (except Nature).

---

Actually I said violence is born, because we carry it to term through repression.

Quote:

---

That big sigh of relief is created by pretension that we are something that needs to be relieved, as if we must have sex or explode, or must eat or die by starvation, or must breathe or asphyxiate, or actually must do anything at all.

---

this may or may not be the case, but the sigh of relief I was talking about was in regards to giving up the fight to repress my emotions. Repression has always (in my experience) seemed to have fed the urge, while acceptance has led to a transformation where they fell away naturally.

Edited by: silentsal at: 3/20/04 6:47 pm

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1043
(3/20/04 6:44 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Correct.
Without ego what state are we?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 86
(3/20/04 7:12 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

I would say our natural state

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 65
(3/20/04 7:51 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

DEL --

Quote:

---

I think the you are wrong.
Enlightenment is always near the middle, it is dynamic and it feels unhealthy.

---

Enlightenment does not "feel" like anything. It **is** something. It is a state of being, not a "feeling".

Quote:

---

Your climb is to nowhere that can support life and is pleasant sounding nonsense. The peak of your mountain is repression perfected no matter what fancy language you use and no matter how many trendy books you recommend reading.

---

These words you just wrote are stunningly idiotic.

"Pleasant sounding nonsense" is something you lazily spat out presumably because your buttons got pushed when I suggested you were expecting to be disagreed with. If you knew the slightest thing about the issues I was talking about in my first post in this thread, you would not make such foolishly dismissive remarks. Your comments are not just stupid but border on ugly as well, given how destructive and damaging the whole issue of sexual repression and associated mental pathologies are. As one who has spent close to two decades counseling alcoholics, the sexually abused, the suicidally depressed, self-destructing marriages, and so on and on, I have limited patience for your kind of arrogance disguising itself as some sort of "above it all" viewpoint.

As for the books I mentioned -- there is absolutely **nothing** "trendy" about them. For starters, each one was written between the years 1955 to about 1970. How do you classify a 35 to 50 year old book as "trendy"? Especially when some of those books are out of print and none sold especially well?

You don't classify them as "trendy", that's how. Only an absolute fool who had not bothered to even look into any of those writings would call them such. This is sheer intellectual laziness, which is a basic part of arrogance.

Quote:

---

You are not helping anybody. You are leading people into madness. Nature will undo all your work on their minds soon after it is accomplished.

---

LOL. Ah yes, "God" himself has spoken. Perhaps we can have some accompanying thunderclaps along with your judgmental proclamations?

You take arrogance to new heights, DEL.

I've "helped" more people in my life than you will likely ever even know, let alone help. Your utter lack of curiosity about what I present only suggests a wounded person who long ago gave up believing he ever had anything of worth to contribute. So you now console yourself with offering Internet "attacks" from the shadowy sidelines with a shadowy handle as a means of propping up your weak sense of self. You are the worst kind of spiritual pretender, because you are concerned with attacking that which you don't understand, but have nothing of worth to offer in place. This is the realm of the spiritual legalist, the one who tries to prosecute "cases" against people as a means of propping up his own ego.

The work that you so casually condemn, DEL, has been part and parcel of this forward progress that 20th century Western civilization has been making in attempting to face its deep collective psychic scars and wounds. Many of the people I worked with over the past near two decades were survivors of one of the many wars of the 20th century, and many had parents who themselves survived the horrors of the 2nd World War. You can't understand the depths of repressed pain and psychic trauma that many of these people have dealt with until you have been there with them when they have opened up to and released such pain. This psychological reality and the nature of the repression that accompanies it is a gritty and very clear reality, not something that you can wave away with your cutesy "spiritual" one and two-liners.

Quote:

---

Your bank balance will be much improved though as they have to pay for guidance to reach the impossible peak.

---

My "bank balance" has never benefitted from my work, I assure you. This was the least prosperous of the lines of work I could have pursued long ago. But you presumably launch this missile at me because you are feeling like a failure in your own life, would be my guess.

Quote:

---

It's a bit like manufactureing fashionable products. All new products appear "functional" for a time. Cults make good money.

---

Cults are not concerned with *individuals*. They are concerned with *organizations*. The realm of any sort of spiritually oriented therapist is that of the individual, and devotion to the individual, nothing else. Cults are concerned with *breaking the will* of groups of individuals and conforming them to an organization -- like the military, for example, or many large corporations (not to mention governments). These are the actual cults, by and large.

Quote:

---

On the other hand you could be helping people if you make your points strong enough.

---

Not "could", it's already been done. Your arrogance is really extraordinary. Assuming you know what someone has done with the past 17 years of their work, based on a few posts that you have not even correctly read, much less understood.

Quote:

---

That way people will crash and burn and suffer enough damage to make them rethink their lives rather than jumping from one enlightenment course to another.

---

Translation -- you don't know what the hell you're talking about, but thought you'd write something that you thought would make a neat poison dart to throw at me. Unfortunately for you, your darts are blunt and blind, the work of bitterness and a simple attempt to look smart/clever. They are just rocks being tossed, clumsy and only revealing things about the thrower.

Quote:

---

PM: That's amusing. First you imply something about what I do, then, without finding out whether I agree with you or not, automatically assume that I am "unconscious" doing it! That suggests to me that you are insecure about your viewpoints and are expecting to be contradicted or disagreed with. That's an "unconscious" defense mechanism you may have just revealed.

DELL: Ha! insecure! insecure! insecure!

It's amazing how trendy that word is. It is a magic word to control modern fools. People work harder and harder to spend it on endless types of insurance and assurance policies.

Of course I'm insecure.

If you think you are secure you are a stupid idiot, braindead and no longer have the ability to learn anything. You are selling the illusion of security.

---

Ah, and here we come to it, the reason for DEL's big attack.

You admit your insecurity, (while previously disguising it in an attack) and now suddenly make yet another accompanying assumption, that I somehow assume that I am totally secure, and therefore am "braindead", etc.

This is more of your insecurity I'm speaking of -- it takes the form of **attack**, and that's what you fail to see. Insecurity in itself is not a big deal -- **everyone** experiences it as a part of life, obviously. The problem is when it is DISGUISED, covertly expressed via some puffed up pretentious "wisdom".

The reason I called you on your insecurity is because you were dishonest about it. Instead of openly admitting that you anticipated disagreement, you passed judgment and made assessment ("you are unconscious", etc.) before finding out my actual position about something.

There's a term for that -- it's called to "pre-judge" something before you understand it. It's also the root of the word "prejudice".

Quote:

---

The Genius is insecure.

The Enlightened are insecure.

The dead are secure.

The self deluded have convinced themselves they are secure.

---

Blah blah blah, yes, you can find practically those exact words on the glossy websites of many modern "gurus". They've beat you to the punch. You sound like a trendy "spiritual Internet dude".

But what is comical is that you are clearly using these words against me, without ever bothering to find out my position and personal experience on that score. The assumption is I know nothing about "enlightened insecurity". This presumptuousness of yours is part of more of this arrogance I keep seeing in you.

One of the great impediments to Self-realization is **lack of curiosity**. This lack of curiosity is accompanied by a "know it all" laziness that shows up in cutesy one-liners and endless subtle put-downs of others. It's a defence against feeling **small**.

Feeling small is not a problem. Next time just be straight and upfront about it, instead of manufacturing a series of judgments as a means to provoke the very conflict that allows for you to open up and admit that you are insecure.

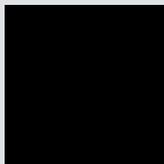

Everyone is insecure in one way or another. Big deal. Welcome to the human race.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 3/21/04 9:34 am

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 66
(3/20/04 8:03 pm)

Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Silentsal --

Quote:

---

I do believe repression is damaging. Spiritual discipline is about authenticity, not repression, being honest about our feelings, emotions, and urges lets us exhaust them naturally, repression is about denial, and in my experience growth outflows from a point of acceptance.

---

Yes, well put.

Quote:

---

edit:

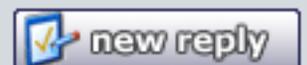

I also think repression is thought to be required by many because they are afraid of the power of their own nature. Lets face it nature can be ugly, nasty, bloody and raw. We are afraid of ourselves, so we build boxes to contain it and the box becomes our prison. The only way to liberation is to realize you don't need the box, when we let our nature flow unchecked it does not gather the enourmous energy that builds up from blockages. I say violence is born, and we carry it to term. Hah, its like realizing we are no better than animals and so with a huge sigh of relief you stop pretending to only find out your much more than that anyway.

---

Yes, and a basic point I was making in my first post is that organized religion is one of the prime forces behind people being conditioned to fear their own energy.

When we migrate from "religion" to "unorganized spirituality" and the path of Enlightenment, we have to be conscious of the "shadow element" of religious conditioning as it tries to accompany us on our path. This shadow element often shows up as the righteous face, the "spiritualized ego".

The "spiritualized ego" (which is the disguised priest, really) is the part that sees itself as superior to others based on its own supposed attainments and breakthroughs in insight. The reason great sages make no point about belaboring their own Enlightenment is because they've gone beyond the shadow element of religious conditioning, which is really the tendency to look down on others from some supposed lofty plane -- like a "Buddha" in a higher world merely shitting on the lower worlds, as opposed to a Buddha in a higher world preserving truth and shining light upon the "lower".

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

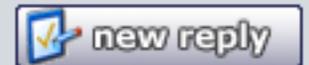

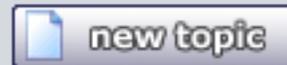

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

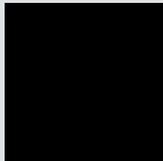

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|   Philip Mistlberger           Posts: 67           (3/20/04 8:32 pm)           Reply           ezSupporter   | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Thomas -- Quote: <hr/> Thanks, Philip, that is quite a long list. If I may ask, is there any single work of literature that you found crucial for understanding the human mind, something with the potential to initiate a quantum jump of understanding, so to speak, or would you say that the understanding of the human mind is emergent, the result of a gradual learning process, application, and experience? <hr/> I think that both are true. There is a graduated aspect to awakening, and a sudden, satori-like flash that is quantum-like in leap. As for literary works, I always favoured the Zen masters, in the end. Japanese Haiku poems often go further for me than a Kant-like "critique of pure reason". And then there is always the Tao Te Ching... Quote: <hr/> And while we're at it, since you seem to have some first hand Tibet experience, let me ask you what | recommendations you have for the first-time Tibet traveler with an interest in Buddhism (I guess that would be the majority of Westerners who go there). I might have the opportunity to visit this summer after I return from Europe.

---

I spent time on the geographic plateau of Tibet, but not within its political boundaries (travel was forbidden at that time for Westerners). I was in Ladakh, which is extreme north India nestled beside China and Tibet, north of Kashmir. I spent time in the Skey and Tikse Tibetan monasteries, and at the town of Leh, which is really a smaller version of Lhasa (capitol of Tibet).

Best place for actual study of Tibetan Buddhism is not currently in Tibet, but in Dharamsala (north India), and Nepal or Sikkim. Many of the more senior lamas now teach in the West, but many are still present in the Daramsala, Nepal, Sikkim area. In Tibet itself, there is not much left in the way of authoritatively enlightened Tibetan masters. Most in Tibet have had their teaching compromised by political allegiance to the Chinese government.

Quote:

---

Spiritual emergency. Wow. What could that be? Any examples? Also, how does one become mad or imbalanced on the way to enlightenment? Wouldn't the path to enlightenment consist in the exact opposite of developing a mental condition? Something must go terribly wrong if mental conditions appear or worsen. I think you might be referring to the fact that one often finds people with "delicate" dispositions in retreats or counseling settings who may not be quite ready for the challenges presented by some spiritual traditions. Or not?

---

"Spiritual emergency" is a very big topic, and I've had direct experience of it. I'll explore more of it here later on, but for now suffice to say that it is a condition that sets in when the pursuit of Enlightenment is being fuelled by the unconscious pull to dissociate from pain. It leads to an "explosion" that can result in a (usually temporary) psychotic disconnection from reality.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1045
(3/21/04 11:15 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger
Enlightenment does not "feel" like anything. It *is* something. It is a state of being, not a "feeling".

---

There you go again selling death.
Why are you promoting a state of being without feeling? They should use you to recruit for the military.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger
As one who has spent close to two decades counseling alcoholics, the sexually abused, the suicidally depressed, self-destructing marriages, and so on and on. . . ."

---

What the hell have you been telling them?
Are you sure you have not made them worse and have been making money out of it?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger
Especially when some of those books are out of print and none sold especially well?

---

Are you recommending books that are out of date and irrelevant to modern issues?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

The work that you so casually condemn, DEL, has been part and parcel of this forward progress that 20th century Western civilization has been making in attempting to face its deep collective psychic scars and wounds.

---

I understand "the work" that is part and parcel of 20th century western civilisation. It took a lot of "deep collective psychic scars and wounds" to create the collective efficiency to build jet aircraft, skyscrapers and cars etc. But I don't understand "your work". It just sounds like you are making money out of telling people that they have deep "psychic scars and wounds". Or maybe you invested in a big soft chair where people can just sit down and tell you about their deep "psychic scars and wounds". Of course you have to charge them for listening but you could say that it's not about the money.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

But you presumably launch this missile at me because you are feeling like a failure in your own life, would be my guess.

---

Is that the best guess of someone "who has spent close to two decades counseling"? What the hell have you been telling these suffering people?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Cults are not concerned with *individuals*. They are concerned with *organizations*. The realm of any sort of spiritually oriented therapist is that of the individual, and devotion to the individual, nothing else. Cults are concerned with *breaking the will* of groups of individuals and conforming them to an organization -- like the military, for example, or many large corporations (not to mention governments). These are the actual cults, by and large. .

---

The military protects your way of life and large corporations build all your tools. Are you counseling people not to be part of any organisation that breaks their will?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Translation -- you don't know what the hell you're talking about, but thought you'd write something that you thought would make a neat poison dart to throw at me.

Unfortunately for you, your darts are blunt and blind, the work of bitterness and a simple attempt to look smart/ clever. They are just rocks being tossed, clumsy and only revealing things about the thrower.

---

Hmmm. . . . sounds like insecurity and guilt to me. Are you sure you have actually been helping people all these years?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

You admit your insecurity, (while previously disguising it in an attack) and now suddenly make yet another accompanying assumption, that I somehow assume that I am totally secure, and therefore am "braindead", etc. .

---

No, I do not assume you are totally secure. You might be trying to make your clients think you are though. I mean who would pay money to have an insecure person help one get over ones insecurities?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

You sound like a trendy "spiritual Internet dude". .

---

I am past, present and future.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

This presumptuousness of yours is part of more of this arrogance I keep seeing in you.

---

I am the mirror.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Everyone is insecure in one way or another. Big deal.
Welcome to the human race.

---

Is that what you have been telling your clients for almost 2 decades and charging them money for it?
Yes, of course it is but you wouldn't dare say it like that. They would ask for their money back.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 898
(3/21/04 1:24 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

DEL: Is that what you have been telling your clients for almost 2 decades and charging them money for it?

I hope you are not suggesting that doctors, therapists, nurses should work for free!?

Thomas

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1046
(3/22/04 6:45 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Thomas

I hope you are not suggesting that doctors, therapists, nurses should work for free!?

---

Of course not.

If they know their job and can do it properly they deserve to earn a living from it.

I suppose quacks deserve to earn a living too from their enlightenment antics. Everybody loves a good story teller.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2305
(3/22/04 9:44 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Also, how does one become mad or imbalanced on the way to enlightenment? Wouldn't the path to enlightenment consist in the exact opposite of developing a mental condition? Something must go terribly wrong if mental conditions appear or worsen

---

The path to enlightenment is very dangerous because it requires one to abandon the mainstream and the conventional, together with all the benefits and comforts that go with it. The possibility of madness is always very real for those who attempt it.

From Soren Kierkegaard:

- To be chosen by God is, speaking merely humanly, unconditionally the most terrible of all the terrible misfortunes which can happen to man. And in every weak moment the chosen one himself thinks so too. Madness is set between him and men; they cannot understand him. Thus he lives in the most agonizing isolation. He endures bestial treatment from men, for when the idea is to be introduced, men become so outraged that the animal side comes to fore.

Literally there is not a single one who can understand him. Nor is he able to help anyone, he knows full well he could never get anyone to relate himself to the idea as he has. No one can rejoice with him. No one can sorrow with him; no one understands how and why he suffers. God is rather the very one who, with the most calculated cruelty, martyrs him when men are unable to do it.

So he lives. As long as he lives, intensively concentrated, he is much too strong for his contemporaries, like a fatal poison. During his life, all those who are called preachers, professors, all those pathbound animal creatures, are the most zealous to put him to death, as with the Saviour of the world.

When he is dead, assistant professors, preachers and professors thin him out in their own water, and then in the water of the thousands whom they teach - and the water gives the most refreshing, delicious taste - magnificent!

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 900(3/22/04 11:58 am)Reply  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> It sounds more like the path to antisociality than the path to enlightenment. Thomas     |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2307(3/22/04 12:20 pm)Reply       | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> I know it does, Thomas. That is because the mainstream world is the only world you know.        |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1047(3/22/04 6:01 pm)Reply                                                                                             | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Excellent quote Mr. Quinn.I will have to find out more about Soren Kierkegaard.Thanks |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2575(3/23/04 6:54 am)Reply                                                                                         | --- <hr/> It is surprising how little a photograph captures the essence of a persons being! Tom, a new angle makes you a new man!              |

dejavum16
Registered User
Posts: 1
(3/23/04 1:42 pm)
Reply

Re.....

---

[quote]I'm yet to read this post (but I will), but I bet it can be summed up like this:

1. Be honest with yourself - If you feel like eating babies, admit that you want it. No one's watching your mind but yourself, it's not going to hurt.
  2. Don't be dumb - Before you try to eat one of them tasty babies, consider the consequences. If they are not worth it for you, don't do it.
- [/quote]

An absurd scenario, but I see your point. In a nutshell, if what you desire will cause you much more guilt and angst after the fact than the pleasure it can give you momentarily, don't do it.

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 68
(3/23/04 9:44 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

DEL --

Quote:

---

PM: Enlightenment does not "feel" like anything. It **is** something. It is a state of being, not a "feeling".

DEL: There you go again selling death.

---

"There I go again"? As compared to what? You've been scrupulously reading my grand total of 50 or so posts I've made at this board over the past month or so? You make it sound as if you've known me for a long time or something. This again is more of that "pre-judging", assuming things prior to finding out more about where someone is coming from.

Quote:

---

Why are you promoting a state of being without feeling?
They should use you to recruit for the military.

---

Hmmm, a curious comment, since below you write...

Quote:

---

The military protects your way of life...

---

...so I would assume that you've either just contradicted yourself, or are suggesting that you think that I "should be used to recruit for" something that "protects" our "way of life." That would seem to be a compliment, DEL! Make up your mind...are you complimenting or criticizing?

Quote:

---

What the hell have you been telling them?

---

Therapy is not about "telling" people anything, DEL. It is essentially about listening, empathically understanding (often called "reality-pacing"), and gentle directing as appropriate (and occasionally even firmly or with "tough love", though most don't require that). But it entirely depends on the level a person is operating at.

In current times in Western culture, there are essentially three levels of mind-therapy --

1. psychiatric, which largely consists of medicating people to alter brain chemistry sufficiently so that they do not have to address the deeper roots of their unhappiness, and providing them with some semblance of consolation (sort of a glorified form of Catholic Confession); the purpose is to get the person to a functional level in society, that is, to help them become a "member" in good standing of the unconscious mainstream. That's not to say that some psychiatrists aren't genuinely compassionate people -- some are, but many more are simply products of medical training and clinical internship with really no spiritual context at all for understanding the greater picture.

2. psychological (conventional) -- same as #1, only minus the ability to medicate people. Some psychologists have some semblance of spirituality, especially the humanist or transpersonal ones, but very few are seriously aware of (let alone interested in) Enlightenment teachings.

3. transpersonal therapy -- this approach varies widely depending on the quality of the therapist but has as its basis the idea of helping people release psychic "knots" or "blocks" that have corresponding sensitive zones in the characterological structure of the body.

For example, a "schizoid" personality type often has poor energy-circulation in their arms and legs, and a highly compressed, explosive charge in the mid-section of their body. That's "bioenergetic-speak" for saying that this is a person whose feelings tend to be disconnected from their thoughts. Accordingly, they tend to have very little connection with their bodies, on a sensory level. They are "numbed out".

The traditional psychiatric route to treat such a person would be with "appropriate" drugs to alter brain chemistry; the psychologist's angle might be to aim toward some sort of behaviour modification, and a cognitive approach to releasing mental blockages. The third, or transpersonal approach will tend to address the reality of the body as a structure within the self, not just as some mechanical thing external to it, like a car we drive and park and feed with gas and oil. The body is seen as an energy-system itself, and mental disturbances are recognized as having corresponding contractions in the body.

But as I was addressing in my first post in this thread, we live in a time and culture where the body is treated as some mechanical object to be ignored, filled with junk food, or honed to some instrumental level of "conditioning", or treated as some pornographic object of desire, or wielded as an object of warfare to be hurtled against other bodies, or seen as some "number" to be blown to bits by a terrorist bomb, or adorned with all manner of trendy clothing, or to studied clinically with X-rays and autopsies, etc. etc.

The Reichian therapist Alexander Lowen referred to this culture as the "betrayal of the body" and pointed out how our very disconnection/disassociation from our bodies is part and parcel of our collective general unconsciousness...where we remain primitive precisely because we are not conscious within our bodies. (This is not the same thing as a mentality that is "trapped in the present" because they entirely inhabit their bodies and nothing else -- that's just another variation of bodily unconsciousness).

Quote:

---

Are you sure you have not made them worse and have been making money out of it?

---

But of course, it's all an evil conspiracy to keep me filthy rich!

They don't call you "DEL" for nothing, I can see. "Detective Extraordinaire for Lost souls." This must be your acronym! You have come to Earth to watch out for corrupt therapists and be the guardian angel of miserable, suffering people everywhere! 'Tis a noble profession. Therapist's Internal Revue services... ;-)

Quote:

---

PM: Especially when some of those books are out of print and none sold especially well?

DEL: Are you recommending books that are out of date and irrelevant to modern issues?

---

If I recommend a book, I don't care if it's considered "trendy", "out of date", "irrelevant", or worthy of being toilet paper. These qualifications seem to be important to you, though.

The "Tao Te Ching" has gone through almost endless popular translations over the past 30 years or so and has sold relatively well... almost "trendy" you might say, and yet you'd be hard pressed to find any genuinely intelligent person who couldn't see the depth of that little book.

Quote:

---

PM: The work that you so casually condemn, DEL, has been part and parcel of this forward progress that 20th century Western civilization has been making in attempting to face its deep collective psychic scars and wounds.

DEL: I understand "the work" that is part and parcel of 20th century western civilisation. It took a lot of "deep collective psychic scars and wounds" to create the collective efficiency to build jet aircraft, skyscrapers and cars etc.

---

Sure, but that really has nothing do to with what I've been talking about.

Quote:

---

But I don't understand "your work".

---

Well, you could possibly learn more about it, but for that, you'd have to be *less judgmental* and more *curious*.

Quote:

---

It just sounds like you are making money out of telling people that they have deep "psychic scars and wounds".

---

Once again, therapy is not about "telling" people things. For that, you can consult a 1-900 psychic or Laura Schlesinger.

Quote:

---

Or maybe you invested in a big soft chair where people can just sit down and tell you about their deep "psychic scars and wounds". Of course you have to charge them for listening but you could say that it's not about the money.

---

If a person is unhappy -- or if they wish to work on themselves in some fashion that does not involve them going to a psychiatrist to get medicated, or to a mainstream psychologist to get their behaviour modified, then what are their options?

Perhaps they "should not have such issues" in the first place, according to you, DEL. Maybe they should just remember those who have "built aircraft, skyscrapers, and cars," etc., and magically be relieved of their desire to seek counseling outside of the mainstream therapy models.

But you know, shit happens. People get killed in cars, and in airplanes... and in skyscrapers (yes, after Sept 11, 2001, many people sought therapy of many kinds).

A case in point -- about 4 years ago, a man contacted me for some private sessions. His reason -- his 20 year old daughter (who I'd known) was killed in a car accident when her boyfriend fell asleep at the wheel. Her head went through the windshield.

This man was devastated. He came to me for therapy, and did about 25 sessions over a period of one year. He's doing okay now, much better, was able to work through his suicidal impulses, to return to work, support the rest of his family, etc.

Most people don't seek therapy for such drastic causes, but the motivation is always the same, they want alleviation from suffering and they'd like help gaining insight into their issues. If they get referred to me, I do what I can to help them (in many different ways, that I can barely scratch the surface about over an Internet BBS forum, obviously). But since I've been getting people directed to me for nearly 20 years, I must be doing something right. I'm not that good of a hypnotist, and nor do I sell psychospiritual snake oil. In this "business", you don't get referrals if you aren't actually doing some good for people...and again, bearing in mind that people are at all sorts of different levels in their overall development.

Quote:

---

PM: But you presumably launch this missile at me because you are feeling like a failure in your own life, would be my guess.

DEL: Is that the best guess of someone "who has spent close to two decades counseling"? What the hell have you been telling these suffering people?

---

It's the best "effort" I have for someone who shared next to nothing about himself on a personal level with me, instead just choosing to attack from left field. If you give very little, you get very little in return.

But if you want to share more about yourself personally, be my guest. You could perhaps begin by telling me your name...first name is fine.

Quote:

---

PM: Cults are not concerned with *individuals*. They are concerned with *organizations*. The realm of any sort of spiritually oriented therapist is that of the individual, and devotion to the individual, nothing else. Cults are concerned with *breaking the will* of groups of individuals and conforming them to an organization -- like the military, for example, or many large corporations (not to mention governments). These are the actual cults, by and large. .

DEL: The military protects your way of life and large corporations build all your tools.

---

Yes, but big deal. Who said I was condemning the ability of military or large corporations to "protect" and "make tools"? I simply state that they are much more "cult-like" in nature than are many commonly assumed cults. It was you who raised the cult-issue.

This world is full of unconsciousness, and governing and business institutions (and even "higher" educational institutions) are full of cult-like qualities...conforming people to the organization's party-line, ostracizing those who don't toe it, breeding a mentality that is highly conformist, encouraging a closed, "team-like" ambience that pits "us against them", etc. But *none* of that means I think these things "should not exist" or any such thing. They are what they are. I may think that the military is based on cult-like elements, but that doesn't mean I dismiss its role in the world. If Hitler's Luftwaffe and Wermacht simply refused his orders from the outset to invade Poland, then probably no WWII. But if Allied troops had not followed their conditioning to obey their orders, then the Third Reich would have been the First Superpower. So clearly, cult-like mentalities and organizations have their place in the overall scheme of things, at least at the level humanity is now.

Quote:

---

Are you counseling people not to be part of any organisation that breaks their will?

---

Again, you misunderstand me. I don't "tell people to do" anything. After working with 2,000 people, don't you think it possible that I've worked with the odd soldier, or lawyer, or cop, or businessman/woman? I have, many, and I don't "counsel" them to quit their jobs...unless that's actually what they want to do, for appropriate reasons.

Quote:

---

PM: You admit your insecurity, (while previously disguising it in an attack) and now suddenly make yet another accompanying assumption, that I somehow assume that I am totally secure, and therefore am "braindead", etc. .

DEL: No, I do not assume you are totally secure. You might be trying to make your clients think you are though. I mean who would pay money to have an insecure person help one get over ones insecurities?

---

Well, this just tells me how little you understand of the therapeutic process (outside of the conventional psychiatric approach). A therapist is not some rigid, "perfectly secure" package who presents himself to a client in such a light. My office is a warm place and my working style with a client is warm and human. The very working relationship between therapist and client is not entirely balanced because it is the client who receives attention (and plenty of it, as most sessions last two hours in length). But a therapist, in the transpersonal approach, will often make points by illustrating personal stories from his or her life. The connection is unaffected and sincere. "Security" is not the issue. There may be present a quality of "confidence", but that simply comes from sheer experience (in my case), not some assumed impregnable security.

The very motivation to *become* a therapist is almost always sourced in having passed through great suffering oneself. And anyone who has suffered in life in a fashion in which they have not been desensitized to it, is always aware of the illusion of "total security".

Quote:

---

PM: You sound like a trendy "spiritual Internet dude".

DEL: I am past, present and future.

---

And I'm hickory, dickory, and Doc...

Quote:

---

PM: This presumptuousness of yours is part of more of this arrogance I keep seeing in you.

DEL: I am the mirror.

---

But wait...I thought you were the "DEL"? Please, oh Lofty One, do not confuse us so with these multiple proclamations... ;-)

Quote:

---

PM: Everyone is insecure in one way or another. Big deal. Welcome to the human race.

DEL: Is that what you have been telling your clients for almost 2 decades and charging them money for it?

---

Well, you're not my client. But you could be...and take that as a compliment...

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1048
(3/24/04 5:39 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger
You make it sound as if you've known me for a long time or something. This again is more of that "pre-judging", assuming things prior to finding out more about where someone is coming from.

---

I do know you.

What judgments have I made about you that are inaccurate?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Make up your mind...are you complimenting or criticizing?

---

Are you a quack or the real thing?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Therapy is not about "telling" people anything, DEL. It is essentially about listening, empathically understanding (often called "reality-pacing"), and gentle directing as appropriate (and occasionally even firmly or with "tough love", though most don't require that). But it entirely depends on the level a person is operating at.

. . . . Once again, therapy is not about "telling" people things. . . .

---

What is this "tough love", "firm directing" etc?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

. . . . .where we remain primitive precisely because we are not conscious within our bodies.. . . .

---

Do you believe the above statement that primitive people are not conscious?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

They don't call you "DEL" for nothing, I can see.
"Detective Extraordinaire for Lost souls." This must be your acronym! You have come to Earth to watch out for corrupt therapists and be the guardian angel of miserable, suffering people everywhere! 'Tis a noble profession.
Therapist's Internal Revue services... ;-)

---

Are you a corrupt therapist?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

If I recommend a book, I don't care if it's considered
"trendy", "out of date", "irrelevant", or worthy of being toilet paper. These qualifications seem to be important to you, though.

---

If those qualifications are not important to you they are not important to me.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Well, you could possibly learn more about it, but for that, you'd have to be *less judgmental* and more *curious*.

---

Do you really believe that judgment and curiosity are mutually exclusive?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

. . .But you know, shit happens. . . .

This man was devastated. He came to me for therapy, and did about 25 sessions over a period of one year. He's doing okay now, much better, was able to work through his suicidal impulses, to return to work, support the rest of his family, etc.

---

So about every 2 weeks he would come to you to be told "shit happens". After a year of that he was able to return to a normal life.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

It's the best "effort" I have for someone who shared next to nothing about himself on a personal level with me, instead just choosing to attack from left field. If you give very little, you get very little in return.

---

Why do you see it as a "left field" attack? What is a right field attack?

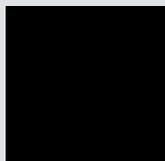

Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 69

(3/26/04 7:05 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

DEL --

Quote:

---

I do know you.

---

I'm sure you like to think you do, but in the ultimate sense you "know" me only as much as you truly know yourself. So far I'm yet to be impressed that that is very much. You reveal next to nothing about yourself here, as far as I can see.

What is your name? Your age? Your gender? I note that your profile is conveniently blank, which seems to match your level of personal accountability/openness in our exchanges thus far. You seem far more concerned with "chess playing" wordsmanship than with actual investigative dialogue.

Quote:

---

What judgments have I made about you that are inaccurate?

---

Since I doubt you have such a poor memory, I can only assume that this question is asked in an arrogantly rhetorical fashion. It feels like a tedious waste of my time to retrieve your own spent bullets, but here they are all the same...

*****

-- Your climb is to nowhere that can support life and is pleasant sounding nonsense

-- You are not helping anybody. You are leading people into madness. Nature will undo all your work on their minds soon after it is accomplished.

-- Your bank balance will be much improved though as they have to pay for guidance to reach the impossible peak. It's a bit like manufacturing fashionable products. All new products appear "functional" for a time. Cults make good money.

-- On the other hand you could be helping people if you make your points strong enough. That way people will crash and burn and suffer enough damage to make them rethink their lives rather than jumping from one enlightenment course to another.

-- You are selling the illusion of security.

-- There you go again selling death.

-- Why are you promoting a state of being without feeling? They should use you to recruit for the military.

-- But I don't understand "your work". It just sounds like you are making money out of telling people that they have deep "psychic scars and wounds". Or maybe you invested in a big soft chair where people can just sit down and tell you about their deep "psychic scars and wounds". Of course you have to charge them for listening but you could say that it's not about the money.

*****

I suspect the reason you've been activated in this manner and seen fit to give me all this attention is due to the title of this thread -- sex, repression, etc.

So some questions for you, DEL.

Assuming you are male, are you under 35? Do you have a girlfriend? Have you had a painful relationship? Do you relate to issues of "repression" at all? Also, have you had any bad experiences with "therapists" or the psychotherapeutic process in general? How have you managed the pursuit of Enlightenment in the context of your own primal impulses?

Instead of dispensing lazy one-liners, see if you can summon the courage to address the topic of this thread. I assume, after all, that's why you showed up in this thread? Unless it was for the more ulterior motive of trying to discredit me because of the subject I dare raise? See if you can go beyond the boringly repetitive ad hominem stuff.

I think you are, after all, the one who wrote the lines in the Satsang thread,

"Judas is pussy
all pussy is Judas"

or some such thing.

Do you hate women, DEL? Have you been betrayed by a woman? (A "Judas"?). Were you wounded by this experience?

Believe it or not, I won't judge you if you actually bother to answer these questions. It would rather serve to improve my view of you if you gave up the effort to discredit me personally and simply looked at the issues I was raising.

I don't separate myself from these issues either, I've already answered personal questions from posters (including David Q.) and won't hesitate to explore that either. It just takes a bit of sincerity, and a willingness to go beyond the persona of the "Internet Zen dude", DEL. Then possibly we could actually have some substantial dialogue.

Quote:

---

Are you a quack or the real thing?

---

Do you really care? I don't think you do. So far what you've demonstrated is that your arrogance prevents you from having sufficient authentic curiosity to find out anything about me. You've been too preoccupied with presenting me your frontal shields, the "DEL" persona. Share something of who you actually are, beyond the spiritualized mask.

Quote:

---

What is this "tough love", "firm directing" etc?

---

You see it all the time in life. It's no different in counselling. Stop playing dumb in some lame attempt to trip me up. Be straight.

Quote:

---

. . . . .where we remain primitive precisely because we are not conscious within our bodies.. . . .

Do you believe the above statement that primitive people are not conscious?

---

"Primitive" in the context I was using it does not refer to a "people". It refers to unconsciousness, or the tendency toward that.

Quote:

---

Are you a corrupt therapist?

---

Again, do you really care? I don't think you do (if you did, it would be obvious to you that I've already answered you). You likely ask this question rhetorically, as a form of ammunition. Your ego-patterns are very transparent to me.

Quote:

---

PM: If I recommend a book, I don't care if it's considered "trendy", "out of date", "irrelevant", or worthy of being toilet paper. These qualifications seem to be important to you, though.

DEL: If those qualifications are not important to you they are not important to me.

---

Meaning -- if you can't trap me with a manipulative ploy, you'll move on to other ones.

Quote:

---

Do you really believe that judgment and curiosity are mutually exclusive?

---

Yes. A proper judgment is formed on the basis of understanding and having all necessary facts. A "projective judgment" is simply the disowning of personal weaknesses and projecting them on to others. Curiosity is the recognition that one does not have all the facts, and that any judgment one makes will therefore be unsound and merely a projection.

Arrogance is an ego-function the subverts the natural arising of curiosity. It's a defence mechanism to guard against the feeling that one is small and insignificant and may lose one's identity. To compensate, a "bloating up" effect happens that becomes full of righteous judgment that is not based on having all the facts, but rather on projection of one's own disowned stuff.

Quote:

---

So about every 2 weeks he would come to you to be told "shit happens". After a year of that he was able to return to a normal life.

---

I think you may need a good slap in the face to shake you out of your frozenness and arrogance. Consider it a non-physical Zen slap -- the sound of one hand slapping.

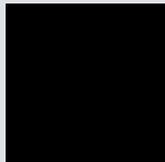

Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 70

(3/26/04 7:34 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

In regards to the issue of "spiritual emergency", or the intense suffering and flirting with psychoses that sometimes arises in very zealous spiritual practitioners, the following describes an experience I passed through about twenty years ago, and my views of it when I wrote about it some time later...

Regarding the negative effects of forced kundalini awakenings, and dubious motivations for seeking Enlightenment, I can share a good example of this from my earlier years. There was a period of time in my early twenties where I embarked on an intensive solitary three week meditation retreat, with a view toward awakening to a glimpse of a higher order of reality, mostly motivated by my misery in this order of reality. At that time I was still very much dealing with avoidance of everyday life and its responsibilities, so there was an intensity behind my efforts that yielded some startling results.

On this occasion I'd been practicing meditative conservation of energy, that is, no talking or relating to anyone, celibacy, and continuous, minute awareness of my breathing and thinking processes. Naturally, this generated a huge build-up of energy. On the last night of my experiment, while seated in meditation, focusing my awareness on the rise and fall of my breath, I suddenly "exploded."

The "explosion" was not outwardly dramatic in appearance. It was an inner explosion, a sudden and almost violent shifting in awareness, accompanied by a powerful rush of energy. I remember standing bolt upright, feeling like an electrified lightning rod. I then walked over to the mirror, looked in, and intensely posed the question, "Who am I?"

My mind fell completely silent. It was like a calm before a violent storm. For a moment reality seemed vast and spacious, and I was absolutely empty of identity. I literally did not know who I was, or who was looking back at me in the mirror. This was not a thought, it was an actual experience of total absence of memory or cognition of who or what I was, or had been. In that moment I understood why the Buddhists associate spiritual awakening with the Sanskrit term "shunyata". I was having an overwhelmingly direct experience of the empty, illusory nature of the separate ego.

I recall walking into the kitchen, sitting down, and having the most extraordinary experience of colors virtually blooming and exploding with vibrancy all around me. A red dishcloth suddenly became this most amazing quality of energy, inexplicably alive. And yet, through the whole thing I was also aware that there was something very natural and even ordinary about all this, that this is the way things really are, and that my old, previous state was one of having merely forgotten and fallen asleep.

At that point, a strange thing happened. I felt a surge of energy move up my spine, a wonderful, pulsating aliveness. But when it reached the general area of my heart it stopped, as if blocked by a thick wall. Suddenly my pulse rate doubled, and I found myself in the throes of a very strong panic attack. Fear took over, and the innocence and aliveness of the world around me ebbed and subsided. My mind began racing with the excess energy, and I felt a terror that I might truly be losing my grip.

For three nights I did not sleep, as there was a strange golden light burning brightly inside my head every time I closed my eyes. When I did finally sleep, my dreams were violently primitive. It was as if the power of the energy that I had unleashed dug deep into my subconscious, excavating ancient, buried memories—a painful purging process. Partly through the compassion of a wise friend I was eventually able to ground myself and feel normal again, after about a week of enduring the passing of the storm.

What went "wrong?" In the deepest sense, nothing at all, as this was simply what had to happen, based on what I was repressing in my subconscious combined with my intense zeal for Enlightenment. But looked at from another angle, the lower and higher centers of the "bodymind" were simply not in harmony. I was in denial of what was in my subconscious, and especially my relationship with physical reality. Thus, the attempt at going beyond this world, into some supposed "transcendent" state of enlightenment, was doomed to failure from the beginning, because the motivation was one of escaping life, not embracing it. So, although I had a bona fide direct experience of the emptiness of the ego, and of the power and intense aliveness of pure Being, I could not sustain it, or integrate it, because the foundation of inner harmony was lacking. I was not ready. I was trying to build an upper story when my home had no foundation.

This was twenty years ago, and subsequent "openings" became more and more subtle, realizations into the "non-existence" of phenomena on the ultimate level, as well as the "emptiness" of the self. But my work has always revolved around addressing the multi-leveled complexity of the human mind, and how "things must be in order" in order for the movement toward Enlightenment to be genuine, as opposed to a simple escape from the contraction of pain. An analogy would be something like an authentic search for the Grail, versus the attitude of "this Grail business is just what I need in order to get the fuck out of Dodge."

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 102

(3/27/04 2:58 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

. I then walked over to the mirror, looked in, and intensely posed the question, "Who am I?"

---

Yes this is the functioning of the mind, but it has absolutely no significance...none.

Quote:

---

My mind fell completely silent.
It was like a calm before a violent storm.

---

There has to be an active mind to experience this pseudo silence and calm.

Quote:

---

For a moment reality seemed vast and spacious,

---

Reality IS vast and spacious.

Quote:

---

and I was absolutely empty of identity.

---

No, there is an identity present to register the absence of identity.

Quote:

---

I literally did not know who I was, or who was looking back at me in the mirror. This was not a thought, it was an actual experience

---

ALL thought is experience and ALL experience is thought.

Quote:

---

of total absence of memory or cognition of who or what I was, or had been.

---

Again there must be thought and memory to maintain the continuity of not knowing who you are.

Quote:

---

In that moment I understood why the Buddhists associate spiritual awakening with the Sanskrit term "shunyata". I was having an overwhelmingly direct experience of the empty, illusory nature of the separate ego.

---

How is it possible if you had nothing but “emptiness” and “silence” of the mind that you were able to deduce and comprehend any concept?

Conceptualization is the result of an active mind.

Your overwhelming direct experience was as illusory as your ego.

Quote:

---

At that point, a strange thing happened. I felt a surge of energy move up my spine, a wonderful, pulsating aliveness. But when it reached the general area of my heart it stopped, as if blocked by a thick wall. Suddenly my pulse rate doubled, and I found myself in the throes of a very strong panic attack. Fear took over, and the innocence and aliveness of the world around me ebbed and subsided. My mind began racing with the excess energy, and I felt a terror that I might truly be losing my grip.

---

Who was there to experience this panic attack , remember there was no “you” just sunyata, and exactly who and what was in fear of losing its grip?

Emptiness afraid of losing its grip on emptiness?

Quote:

---

For three nights I did not sleep, as there was a strange golden light burning brightly inside my head every time I closed my eyes. When I did finally sleep, my dreams were violently primitive. It was as if the power of the energy that I had unleashed dug deep into my subconscious, excavating ancient, buried memories—a painful purging process. Partly through the compassion of a wise friend I was eventually able to ground myself and feel normal again, after about a week of enduring the passing of the storm.

---

Ah yes feeling normal, never did you once stop feeling normal.

Your experience was no different than what you experience during the normal course of the day.

Whether you are being electrocuted, dying from a heroin overdose, getting a blow job or experiencing a psychic induced psychosis, you are still feeling normal.

Quote:

---

What went "wrong?" In the deepest sense, nothing at all, as this was simply what had to happen, based on what I was repressing in my subconscious combined with my intense zeal for Enlightenment. But looked at from another angle, the lower and higher centers of the "bodymind" were simply not in harmony. I was in denial of what was in my subconscious, and especially my relationship with physical reality.

---

I suspect this denial continues at this very moment.

Quote:

---

Thus, the attempt at going beyond this world, into some supposed "transcendent" state of enlightenment, was doomed to failure from the beginning, because the motivation was one of escaping life, not embracing it.

So, although I had a bona fide direct experience of the emptiness of the ego,

---

Again, again... There must be an ego present to experience no ego.

Quote:

---

and of the power and intense aliveness of pure Being,

---

Yes this is what we all experience every second of the day.

Quote:

---

I could not sustain it, or integrate it, because the foundation of inner harmony was lacking. I was not ready. I was trying to build an upper story when my home had no foundation.

---

Yes one does need a foundation of bullshit to support delusion.

Quote:

---

This was twenty years ago, and subsequent "openings" became more and more subtle, realizations into the "non-existence" of phenomena on the ultimate level, as well as the "emptiness" of the self.

---

The ultimate level of emptiness???.....Oh, Behave.

Quote:

---

... Oh , what a tangled web we weave , when first we practice to deceive ... "

---

The only thing that you have shown here is your mastery of reinforcing your own delusion's.

[thumbs up]Keep up the good work Phillip. ;)[/thumbs up]

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1053

(3/27/04 3:19 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Fool.

There is always a self but it doesn't always have to be a false construct.

Philip's words certainly seem to bring out other's illusions and insecurities when they talk about his words.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 104

(3/27/04 5:49 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

There is always a self but it doesn't always have to be a false construct.

---

Hello David.

Any construct of a self is false, we can only know what the self is not. And to follow it all the way thru is to realize that any construct or concept regarding the self or no self, are simply two sides of the same ignorant and fruitless coin.

Quote:

---

Fool.

Philip's words certainly seem to bring out other's illusions and insecurities when they talk about his words.

---

And David, aren't arrogance and name calling an indication of ones insecurities? Phils' words strike again ;)

Jones Kelly

Posts: 5

(3/27/04 10:21 am)

Reply

Repression

---

There must be an ego present to experience no ego.

This is a funny statement. Actually, awareness of what ego is (that is a rational understanding) provides the clarity that ego no longer exists.

A desire to defend one's beliefs is ego, or even to defend the Truth is ego. Truth for such a being is an appearance.

This is a good illustration:

Jesus said, "The [Father's] imperial rule is like a woman who was carrying a [jar] full of meal. While she was walking along a distant road, the handle of the jar broke and the meal spilled behind her along the road. She didn't know it; she hadn't noticed a problem. When she reached her house, she put the jar down and discovered that it was empty."

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1054

(3/27/04 10:28 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

It wasn't name calling.

Quote:

---

Philip: I then walked over to the mirror, looked in, and intensely posed the question, "Who am I?"

Nox: Yes this is the functioning of the mind, but it has absolutely no significance...none.

---

The significance lies in the fact that some sort of answer would ordinarily be immediately forthcoming.

Quote:

---

P: My mind fell completely silent.
It was like a calm before a violent storm.

N: There has to be an active mind to experience this pseudo silence and calm.

---

Active mind is not an issue, it's a given. The content of the activity is what's important.

Quote:

---

P: and I was absolutely empty of identity.

N: No, there is an identity present to register the absence of identity.

---

There has to be identity to register anything, but that identity can be empty of identification.

Quote:

---

P: I literally did not know who I was, or who was looking back at me in the mirror. This was not a thought, it was an actual experience

N: ALL thought is experience and ALL experience is thought.

---

ALL thought is identified experience but all experience is not necessarily thought identification.

Quote:

---

P: of total absence of memory or cognition of who or what I was, or had been.

N: Again there must be thought and memory to maintain the continuity of not knowing who you are.

---

Long term memory access, short term memory acquisition and long term memory filing are completely different processes. Thought involves access and identification, experience need not.

Quote:

---

P: In that moment I understood why the Buddhists associate spiritual awakening with the Sanskrit term "shunyata". I was having an overwhelmingly direct experience of the empty, illusory nature of the separate ego.

N: How is it possible if you had nothing but "emptiness" and "silence" of the mind that you were able to deduce and comprehend any concept?

---

In a manner deprived of emotion, or in retrospect.

Quote:

---

N: Conceptualization is the result of an active mind.

---

Active mind is not an issue.

Quote:

---

Your overwhelming direct experience was as illusory as your ego.

---

Might have been, might not have been, doesn't have to be.

Quote:

---

P: At that point, a strange thing happened. I felt a surge of energy move up my spine, a wonderful, pulsating aliveness. But when it reached the general area of my heart it stopped, as if blocked by a thick wall. Suddenly my pulse rate doubled, and I found myself in the throes of a very strong panic attack. Fear took over, and the innocence and aliveness of the world around me ebbed and subsided. My mind began racing with the excess energy, and I felt a terror that I might truly be losing my grip.

N: Who was there to experience this panic attack , remember there was no “you” just sunyata, and exactly who and what was in fear of losing its grip?

---

'Philip' was back, obviously.

Quote:

---

P: For three nights I did not sleep, as there was a strange golden light burning brightly inside my head every time I closed my eyes. When I did finally sleep, my dreams were violently primitive. It was as if the power of the energy that I had unleashed dug deep into my subconscious, excavating ancient, buried memories—a painful purging process. Partly through the compassion of a wise friend I was eventually able to ground myself and feel normal again, after about a week of enduring the passing of the storm.

N: Ah yes feeling normal, never did you once stop feeling normal.

---

'Feeling normal', and 'normal feeling' address two differing contexts.

Quote:

---

N: Your experience was no different than what you experience during the normal course of the day.

---

In some respects, yes; in other respects, no. Not that I can know what's going on in Philip's head, but I can identify the possibilities.

Quote:

---

N: Whether you are being electrocuted, dying from a heroin overdose, getting a blow job or experiencing a psychic induced psychosis, you are still feeling normal.

---

'Feeling normal' and 'normal feeling' address different concepts. Active mind is not an issue. Identity can be empty of identification. All experience is not necessarily thought identification.

Quote:

---

P: Thus, the attempt at going beyond this world, into some supposed "transcendent" state of enlightenment, was doomed to failure from the beginning, because the motivation was one of escaping life, not embracing it.

So, although I had a bona fide direct experience of the emptiness of the ego,

N: Again, again... There must be an ego present to experience no ego.

---

Experiencing the emptiness of ego does not preclude an ego, just as experiencing the emptiness of an empty vessel does not preclude a vessel.

Quote:

---

DT: There is always a self but it doesn't always have to be a false construct.

Nox: Any construct of a self is false,

---

Any constucted self is false, yes.

Quote:

---

N: we can only know what the self is not.

---

As much as we can know what the constructed self is not, we can know what the constructed self is.

We can know neither what the true self is or is not.

Quote:

---

And to follow it all the way thru is to realize that any construct or concept regarding the self or no self, are simply two sides of the same ignorant and fruitless coin.

---

Two sides of 10,000 coins.

Coins come from a treasury.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1049
(3/29/04 3:01 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

What is your name? Your age? Your gender? I note that your profile is conveniently blank, which seems to match your level of personal accountability/openness in our exchanges thus far. You seem far more concerned with "chess playing" wordsmanship than with actual investigative dialogue.

---

You sound so feminine. The feminine always needs personal information in able to communicate.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

It feels like a tedious waste of my time to retrieve your own spent bullets, but here they are all the same...

---

That list is accurate.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Assuming you are male, are you under 35? Do you have a girlfriend? Have you had a painful relationship? Do you relate to issues of "repression" at all? Also, have you had any bad experiences with "therapists" or the psychotherapeutic process in general? How have you managed the pursuit of Enlightenment in the context of your own primal impulses? ...

---

Let's start with the first question. What difference does it make if I am male or female from your perspective?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Do you hate women, DEL? Have you been betrayed by a woman? (A "Judas"?). Were you wounded by this experience?

---

Yes, I hate women and I love them also.
How about you?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Then possibly we could actually have some substantial dialogue.

---

The dialogue has more substance than you are conscious of.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Share something of who you actually are, beyond the spiritualized mask.

---

What is a spiritual mask? Think carefully.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Del:

What is this "tough love", "firm directing" etc?

-----

Philip

You see it all the time in life. It's no different in counselling. Stop playing dumb in some lame attempt to trip me up. Be straight.

---

Give me some examples where you have applied your "tough love" and "firm directing" without actually telling people what to do.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

"Primitive" in the context I was using it does not refer to a "people". It refers to unconsciousness, or the tendency toward that.

---

How is unconsciousness or the tendency towards that primitive?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Del:

Are you a corrupt therapist?

Philip:

Again, do you really care? I don't think you do (if you did, it would be obvious to you that I've already answered you). You likely ask this question rhetorically, as a form of ammunition. Your ego-patterns are very transparent to me.

---

Is that a difficult question to answer directly because you claim to be a therapist?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Meaning -- if you can't trap me with a manipulative ploy, you'll move on to other ones.

---

Is that your judgement?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

. . .Yes. A proper judgment is formed on the basis of understanding and having all necessary facts. A "projective judgment" is simply the disowning of personal weaknesses and projecting them on to others. Curiosity is the recognition that one does not have all the facts, and that any judgment one makes will therefore be unsound and merely a projection.

Arrogance is an ego-function the subverts the natural arising of curiosity. It's a defence mechanism to guard against the feeling that one is small and insignificant and may lose one's identity. To compensate, a "bloating up" effect happens that becomes full of righteous judgment that is not based on having all the facts, but rather on projection of one's own disowned stuff.

---

Do you think it is possible to get all the facts?
How do you know when you have all the facts?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

I think you may need a good slap in the face to shake you out of your frozenness and arrogance. Consider it a non-physical Zen slap -- the sound of one hand slapping.

---

Do you find it necessary to slap your clients?

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

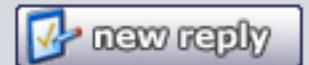

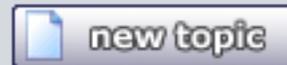

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| N0X23  Registered UserPosts: 106(3/30/04 4:31 am)Reply  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The significance lies in the fact that some sort of answer would ordinarily be immediately forthcoming. <hr/> The significance lies in the significance Philip attached to this mundane occurrence. The question and answer are inextricably linked, Who am I is the question and the answer. If the answer was truly not forthcoming the question would cease... ...”It is produced; therefore the other is produced.It is extinguished; therefore the other is extinguished.It exists; therefore the other exists.It does not exist; therefore the other does not exist.” Quote: |

---

Active mind is not an issue, it's a given. The content of the activity is what's important.

---

Activity is the crux, the only time when the mind truly falls silent is in a massive trauma or death.

Quote:

---

Long term memory access, short term memory acquisition and long term memory filing are completely different processes. Thought involves access and identification, experience need not.

---

The Phalanges, Calcaneal tendon and the vestibule, all operate in a completely different process but are all mandatory for one to maintain balance.

Can you give me an example of an experience that doesn't require thought/memory/identification?

Quote:

---

'Philip' was back, obviously.

---

So are you implying that if you are shown the inner workings of a magic trick, you will then fall victim to the illusion when you preform the trick yourself??

Quote:

---

In some respects, yes; in other respects, no. Not that I can know what's going on in Philip's head, but I can identify the possibilities.

---

Why cant you know...isn't the source unitary?

Other than a few slight idiosyncracies where's the major divide?

Quote:

---

Experiencing the emptiness of ego does not preclude an ego, just as experiencing the emptiness of an empty vessel does not preclude a vessel.

---

Not experiencing the emptiness, but project the ego/I AMness onto the emptiness and identifying as it.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 525
(3/30/04 2:15 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

NOX23:

Quote:

---

Who am I is the question and the answer.

---

If that were true, Ramana Maharshi would never have said that repeating that question is important.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1060
(3/31/04 9:09 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

DT: The significance lies in the fact that some sort of answer would ordinarily be immediately forthcoming.

Nox: The significance lies in the significance Philip attached to this mundane occurrence.

---

Are you sure?

Quote:

---

The question and answer are inextricably linked, Who am I is the question and the answer.

---

Are you sure? I'm not sure you can be. The truth of the question and answer being inextricably linked is rather obvious. The truth of their being one in the same is, rather, unobvious.

There is only one thing you can be sure of. Of this, the question and answer aren't just inextricably linked (like everything mundane), but inseparably one.

The question would not be 'who am I?', but 'am I?'. The answer would not be 'I am this', but 'I am'. Except the question would be delusive, and so the answer cannot be an answer.

Quote:

---

If the answer was truly not forthcoming the question would cease...

..."It is produced; therefore the other is produced.
It is extinguished; therefore the other is extinguished.

It exists; therefore the other exists.

It does not exist; therefore the other does not exist.”

---

If you take such counsel as correct, then it is no wonder you see it that way.
It would be more correct to say:

It exists; therefore the other exists.

It does not exist; therefore the other does not exist.

It both exists and does not; therefore the other both exists and does not.

It neither exists nor does not; therefore the other neither exists nor does not.

Therefore:

It is produced, not produced, both produced and not produced, and neither produced nor not produced; therefore the other is produced, not produced, both produced and not produced, and neither produced nor not produced.

It is extinguished, not extinguished, both extinguished and not extinguished, and neither extinguished nor not extinguished; therefore the other is extinguished, not extinguished, both extinguished and not extinguished, and neither extinguished nor not extinguished.

It's a little less concise now but the revisions are necessary, for understanding to be as correct as it can be.

Quote:

---

DT: Active mind is not an issue, it's a given. The content of the activity is what's important.

Nox: Activity is the crux, the only time when the mind truly falls silent is in a massive trauma or death.

---

And if a tree does not fall in the forest, silence?

Quote:

---

DT: Long term memory access, short term memory acquisition and long term memory filing are completely different processes. Thought involves access and identification, experience need not.

Nox: The Phalanges, Calcaneal tendon and the vestibule, all operate in a completely different process but are all mandatory for one to maintain balance.

---

Not if one is truly relaxed.

Quote:

---

Can you give me an example of an experience that doesn't require thought/memory/identification?

---

Certainly, being.

Quote:

---

DT: 'Philip' was back, obviously.

So are you implying that if you are shown the inner workings of a magic trick, you will then fall victim to the illusion when you perform the trick yourself??

---

That is some irony, your typo answers your question. What are the odds?

Quote:

---

Nox: Your experience was no different than what you experience during the normal course of the day.

DT: In some respects, yes; in other respects, no. Not that I can know what's going on in Philip's head, but I can identify the possibilities.

Nox: Why can't you know...isn't the source unitary?

---

The source may be unitary, but knowing isn't.

Not that this question addresses the context of my statement. I said that Philip's experience was in some ways no different than what he experiences during the normal day, and in some ways it was different. I then qualified the context of the definitive phraseology by pointing out that I was merely identifying the possibilities, being as I am not Philip.

Quote:

---

Other than a few slight idiosyncrasies where's the major divide?

---

Those idiosyncrasies are the divide. They are both few and slight, and many and major.

Quote:

---

Philip: Thus, the attempt at going beyond this world, into some supposed "transcendent" state of enlightenment, was doomed to failure from the beginning, because the motivation was one of escaping life, not embracing it.

So, although I had a bona fide direct experience of the emptiness of the ego,

Nox: Again, again... There must be an ego present to experience no ego.

DT: Experiencing the emptiness of ego does not preclude an ego, just as experiencing the emptiness of an empty vessel does not preclude a vessel.

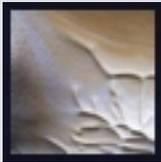

Nox: Not experiencing the emptiness, but project the ego/I AMness onto the emptiness and identifying as it.

---

'I amness' is not ego, the projection and identification you describe is.

But your statement does not address the context of mine. Mine simply states that experiencing something as empty does not preclude that something. This was because you had implied that Philip was saying that he'd experienced the emptiness of ego from a position of no ego, when he hadn't explicitly stated that; although by the sounds of it, the likelihood is that he both did and didn't.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 352
(3/31/04 10:21 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Hi Philip,

I've written this to a general audience, but i invite and am interested in your comments.

Quote:

---

You could say something like that, but a better analogy would be to compare it to "becoming healthy" so that the climb up the mountain (Enlightenment) can be taken with a good chance of actually arriving at the peak. This would be as opposed to beginning the climb in an unhealthy state, only to give up or fall off halfway up. (See Marian Caplan's interesting book, "Halfway Up the Mountain: The Errors of Premature Claims to Enlightenment", for more on that).

The idea with avoiding excessive repression is to help people get to a functional, healthy level where they can indeed begin the process of Enlightenment in a fashion that doesn't lead to madness, imbalance, or a partial distorted awakening or premature "spiritual emergency" (as Grof called it...check out Gopi Krishna for more), that can greatly set back one's Enlightenment aspirations, or delay them for many years.

---

The mind is pretty much everything, it is the chief concern and driver of human experience. If it is in harmony (Truthful), the body will likely be so as well. Complete harmony can only occur in the presence of an enlightened mind, attempts to create harmony in it's absence will fail.

When a person has thoughts that sex is desirable and will relieve their suffering (make them feel good), they seek it.

If they consciously decide not to fulfil that desire, sure, they will still experience the problem of the desire, but they will usually be more open to thinking about the nature of sexual desire than if they engage in it. It's the abstainers that have the nervousness and intensity needed to propel them into the Infinite.

If, however, they choose to engage in regular sex, they're reinforcing it in their psyche. People have little power over operant conditioning; what one does makes it's tracks in the mind regardless of what one tries to think about it. And since sex is both mindless and an expression of the will to mindlessness, it rarely predisposes people to thinking about anything at all. It blows-off their suffering, and thus stalls their spiritual development. I've rarely met a sex bunny that is mindful, and they're always hungering for more. The only real lessons that one could come away with, that are of benefit to the eradication of one's desire, are the gaps in one's memory and it's general haziness - which indicate one's unconsciousness, as well as the animalism/unconsciousness of one's partner. Who is willing to open their eyes at the risk of facing the death stare of an unconscious partner? And of those that are, who is conscious enough to recognise it? One only needs to have sex once in one's life to be able to reflect on these. To continue to engage in it, in an attempt to develop fuller consciousness during it, is a definite risk. Also, realisations about the hassles that often arise in sexual encounters (communication, incompatibility, etc) are too superficial to have any real impact on sexual desire in themselves.

I've always been more scared of sex than death, because not only is it death (unconsciousness), but one's very own mind wills one towards it. It's like being near a cliff edge and having your mind telling you to "Jump! Jump!". Sex is clearly suicidal. People look forward to the clearer mind that they tend to have for those few moments after sex, after they've dumped their energy and have too little left even for reasoning. Most people simply can't endure the pain of reasoning, death is preferable.

If a person opens their mind to what sex is all about, to what it really is, they're not going to desire it, or have a problem with it, regardless of their physiology. It is not the body that desires sex. Thus, studying the body is of no real benefit to it's eradication.

A healthy mind for enlightenment is one that see's the power of it's own thoughts, and uses those thoughts to draw it into God's arms.

Rhett Hamilton

Jones Kelly

Posts: 15

(3/31/04 12:11 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Rhett: I've always been more scared of sex than death, because not only is it death (unconsciousness), but one's very own mind wills one towards it. It's like being near a cliff edge and having your mind telling you to "Jump! Jump!". Sex is clearly suicidal. People look forward to the clearer mind that they tend to have for those few moments after sex, after they've dumped their energy and have too little left even for reasoning. Most people simply can't endure the pain of reasoning, death is preferable.

The concentrated desire for orgasm does make simultaneous reasoned thoughts difficult, but not impossible. Rational consciousness is not utterly extinguished; but i have not investigated simultaneously being enlightened and experiencing orgasm yet. Can anyone comment on this?

That people "look forward to the clearer mind" would seem to contradict "post-copulative depression" or the "petit mort" - "all animals are sad after sex". Perhaps this indicates desire for pleasant unconsciousness to continue, after that mental state has lapsed. Is desire for orgasm a repression in itself?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1487

(3/31/04 3:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

but i have not investigated simultaneously being enlightened and experiencing orgasm yet. Can anyone comment on this?

---

I certainly hope you're planning on it.

Quote:

---

"all animals are sad after sex".

---

Even people are not sad after sex.

Quote:

---

Is desire for orgasm a repression in itself?

---

What??

Jones Kelly

Posts: 16

(3/31/04 5:49 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Anna,

Why?

Anna: Even people are not sad after sex.

Prove it.

Kelly: Is desire for orgasm a repression in itself?

Anna: What??

Repression of consciousness - this is what the simultaneous understanding of the nature of Ultimate Reality and experience of orgasm might indicate to me. It seems impossible though: simultaneous desire and not-desire.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 3/31/04 5:50 pm

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1537
(4/1/04 2:03 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

A man's ejaculation and "orgasm" are not necessarily the same thing. It can have very little pleasure sensations or it can be the "fireworks and trumpets" variety depending on mental constructs, emotional state, novel situations, etc.

Tharan

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2595
(4/1/04 8:06 am)
Reply

---

---

Rhett exposes himself once and for all (:D)

Quote:

---

If a person opens their mind to what sex is all about, to what it really is, they're not going to desire it, or have a problem with it, regardless of their physiology. It is not the body that desires sex. Thus, studying the body is of no real benefit to it's eradication.

A healthy mind for enlightenment is one that see's the power of it's own thoughts, and uses those thoughts to draw it into God's arms.

Rhett Hamilton

---

What do you think it is that desires sex Rhett? Where do you distinguish the mind as apart from the body?

Kelly, you equate the expression petit mort with 'post copulative depression'.

I have always understood this term as another name for orgasm, not a state following it. The term, for me, is neither clever nor poetic.

*edit: yes, I do believe I edited this post.

Edited by: suergaz at: 4/1/04 8:08 am

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1488

(4/1/04 11:33 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Anna: Even people are not sad after sex.

Prove it.

---

Because I am not.

Quote:

---

Repression of consciousness - this is what the simultaneous understanding of the nature of Ultimate Reality and experience of orgasm might indicate to me. It seems impossible though: simultaneous desire and not-desire.

---

This whole premise is nutty. Petit Mort, the little death, indeed refers to orgasm, and for the reason that sometimes, your consciousness is gone for just a moment or two. In the same way as a Zen meditator might attain a second or two of total freedom from thought. And you think you cannot afford this brief respite from the tyranny of the mind? It is well worth the refreshing return, like after a summer thunderstorm on a hot afternoon.

You can never run from sex. Only in the unmanifest does it cease. In the universe of form, all things are divided into male and female, and all copulate without ceasing. From time to time there is orgasm, after which the copulation begins again. That is the sum of all phenomena. That which brings about every heartbeat, and the terminology used to describe it, is the same as that which leads to sexual excitement, and orgasm, and rest, and

|                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                     | excitement again.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Jones Kelly Posts: 20 (4/1/04 12:14 pm) Reply | petit mort <hr/> Suergaz, yes I did equate petit mort with post-copulative depression, though i know it is typically a synonym of orgasm. It is another little death, another hell, another rebirth. Another repression of consciousness.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Jones Kelly Posts: 21 (4/1/04 12:31 pm) Reply | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Anna: Even people are not sad after sex...Because i am not. This means that you are not sad after sex, not that people generally are not. You can never verify your statement applies to other people. My statement "all animals are sad after sex" can also never be verified, as i am not all animals. Anna: This whole premise is nutty. Petit Mort, the little death, indeed refers to orgasm, and for the reason that sometimes, your consciousness is gone for just a moment or two. In the same way as a Zen meditator might attain a second or two of total freedom from thought. And you think you cannot afford this brief respite from the tyranny of the mind? It is well worth the refreshing return, like after a summer thunderstorm on a hot afternoon. Total freedom of thought in an enlightened state has nothing to do with the absence of thought in an unconscious state that desires to be unconscious. The "tyranny of mind" indicates why you seek the death found in sex. For me, my mind has no tyrannical power of oppression, for in its clarity is the lack of desire to be refreshed. Anna: You can never run from sex. Only in the unmanifest does it cease. I am consciously aware of the logical impossibility of the mind to simultaneously have two foci. There are two conflicting loves, and neither can be followed in the presence of the other. The highly focussed and one-pointed awareness (samadhi and bodhicitta) needed to understand the nature of Reality cannot be merged with the awareness bent on a "reflexive | redistribution of energy" in the body. It is calmness and stillness versus agitation and activity.

Are you saying that sex desire ceases in unconsciousness? By no means. Only consciousness can enable sex desire to cease. The unmanifest is the cessation of desire, which can only arise through consciousness.

Anna: In the universe of form, all things are divided into male and female, and all copulate without ceasing. From time to time there is orgasm, after which the copulation begins again. That is the sum of all phenomena. That which brings about every heartbeat, and the terminology used to describe it, is the same as that which leads to sexual excitement, and orgasm, and rest, and excitement again.

This is a good description of conceptualisation which creates (karma), the wheel of duality. Divisions create time and unceasing copulation of appearances. There are no copulations when there are no couples.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 240

(4/1/04 12:41 pm)

Reply

...

---

Bird, I think that what you say should be taken as a metaphor and nothing more. I'm saying this because you appear to think differently.

And I think most of you take sex and life in general way too seriously. I can barely read those posts because they bore the hell out of me, and this is not so because I don't want to think. They are just too obvious and uninspiring. I also feel there's a certain uptight tone to them, which would be quite humorous if I didn't know you guys are dead serious.

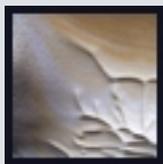

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 353

(4/1/04 12:44 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Suergaz,

Quote:

---

What do you think it is that desires sex Rhett?

---

Humans!

Quote:

---

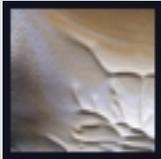

Where do you distinguish the mind as apart from the body?

---

For the purpose of my previous post, i attempted to make a clear distinction between unconscious forces and conscious forces, and to expand on the nature of those conscious forces, because most people don't do this very well.

Some people externalise their sexual desire, as if it comes from somewhere else, which is understandable because if one doesn't want it but still feels it, it certainly does seem to come from somewhere else. But nevertheless, it still arises from within their deluded perceptions of what sex is all about.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 354
(4/1/04 12:57 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

The concentrated desire for orgasm does make simultaneous reasoned thoughts difficult, but not impossible.

---

I didn't really talk about the "concentrated desire for orgasm", but your point is fair enough.

Quote:

---

Rational consciousness is not utterly extinguished; but i have not investigated simultaneously being enlightened and experiencing orgasm yet. Can anyone comment on this?

---

I used blanket terms for simplicity. I accept that consciousness is rarely clear cut.

I don't think an enlightened orgasm is worth talking about when there are people to enlighten. They can find out for themselves.

Quote:

---

That people "look forward to the clearer mind" would seem to contradict "post-copulative depression" or the "petit mort" - "all animals are sad after sex". Perhaps this indicates desire for pleasant unconsciousness to continue, after that mental state has lapsed.

---

Or that it wasn't as good as they hoped. Or that their "damn deluded mind" and its attendant suffering came back so soon. Or both. People soon cheer up, they tend to smile soon afterwards as they carefully prepare their next illusion to be satisfied...

Quote:

---

Is desire for orgasm a repression in itself?

---

Yes, of natural free-minded consciousness.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 23

(4/1/04 1:38 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Rhett: ...one's very own mind wills one towards it. It's like being near a cliff edge and having your mind telling you to "Jump! Jump!". Sex is clearly suicidal. People look forward to the clearer mind that they tend to have for those few moments after sex,

I didn't really talk about the "concentrated desire for orgasm", but your point is fair enough.

"Jump! Jump!" is also descriptive of the mental urge towards the unconsciousness of/after orgasm.

Rhett: I don't think an enlightened orgasm is worth talking about when there are people to enlighten. They can find out for themselves.

I agree. However, the strength of people's attachment to sex includes attachment to orgasm. As far this attachment goes without investigation, the attachment to sex continues. It is like anything other attachment.

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 2597
(4/2/04 2:21 am)
Reply

----

Those who cast a dim light on sensual pleasure really cannot be trusted to it ultimately!

I am the orgy! I am the orgasm! I am the origin!
(I would genuinely love to hear one speak this way, beaming, and in all truth)

birdofhermes

Registered User
Posts: 1490
(4/2/04 11:51 am)
Reply

orgasm, etc.

Quote:

Bird, I think that what you say should be taken as a metaphor and nothing more. I'm saying this because you appear to think differently.

And I think most of you take sex and life in general way too seriously. I can barely read those posts because they bore the hell out of me, and this is not so because I don't want to think. They are just too obvious and uninspiring. I also feel there's a certain uptight tone to them, which would be quite humorous if I didn't know you guys are dead serious. [/quote

What?! Rairun how can you even compare my inspired orgiastic cosmology with their dead earnestness and hellishly self-absorbed focus upon the nuances of their internal emotional and sexual battles.

What do you mean metaphor? If it weren't the reality, what need for such a metaphor? It is indeed the reality. It's known as yin and yang. And I agree that their posts are boring, albeit sometimes entertaining in a somewhat horrifying, freak sideshow kind o

---

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1491

(4/2/04 11:52 am)

Reply

oops

---

Messed up the quotes, can't edit.

What?! Rairun how can you even compare my inspired orgiastic cosmology with their dead earnestness and hellishly self-absorbed focus upon the nuances of their internal emotional and sexual battles.

What do you mean metaphor? If it weren't the reality, what need for such a metaphor? It is indeed the reality. It's known as yin and yang. And I agree that their posts are boring, albeit sometimes entertaining in a somewhat horrifying, freak sideshow kind of way.

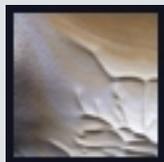

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 355

(4/2/04 12:10 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Those who cast a dim light on sensual pleasure really cannot be trusted to it ultimately!

I am the orgy! I am the orgasm! I am the origin!
(I would genuinely love to hear one speak this way, beaming, and in all truth)

---

This caused a genuine chuckle!

I see what you're saying, but to see it in it's true light one must first cast a dim - but true - light on it.

And where would one find another person of similar capacity with which to engage in it . . . ?

And finally, why? It's no better or worse than anything else in the eyes of God, yet so dark and dim in the eyes of those that value the survival of Wisdom, and the experience of Truth.

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

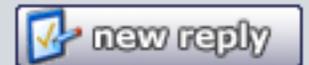

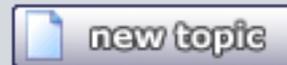

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

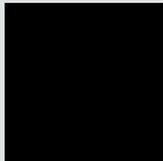

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|  Philip MistlbergerPosts: 71(4/2/04 3:51 pm)ReplyezSupporter  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> DEL writes ... Quote: <hr/> You sound so feminine. The feminine always needs personal information in able to communicate. <hr/> Ah yes, the great insult on this message board -- to call someone "feminine". I don't "need" any personal information from you, DEL, it was rather an invitation to you to get serious and bring yourself into the discussion, rather than sitting on the sidelines sniping. To bring yourself into a discussion requires courage. To sit on the sidelines like a faceless sniper is simply cowardice. It is also a far more passive approach, and thus far more feminized. You've got your classifications upside down. Take Rhett, for example -- I may not be in alignment with too much of what he says, but at least he brings himself into discussions by honestly examining his mind, and revealing his own process. This takes courage. Even the founders of this BBS share plenty of information about their individual process and struggle in life leading toward their realizations. |

Quote:

---

PM: Assuming you are male, are you under 35? Do you have a girlfriend? Have you had a painful relationship? Do you relate to issues of "repression" at all? Also, have you had any bad experiences with "therapists" or the psychotherapeutic process in general? How have you managed the pursuit of Enlightenment in the context of your own primal impulses?

DEL: Let's start with the first question. What difference does it make if I am male or female from your perspective?

---

Exactly as I predicted, you would not answer the questions. And yet you continue to ask questions of me. Do you yet fail to see your evasiveness?

Quote:

---

The dialogue has more substance than you are conscious of.

---

More arrogance.

The rest of your sniper-questions are unworthy of response by virtue of your evading my earlier questions.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 72

(4/2/04 4:11 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

N0X23 --

As someone who made absurd allegations lumping in Osho Rajneesh with Jim Jones and Charles Manson (in the Satsang thread) -- and who failed to offer any sort of reply to my challenging you on your analysis of Rajneesh at that time -- you also make it hard for me to take you seriously. In fact, your credibility for me vanished in your two or three feeble posts in that Satsang thread, so your assessments of my experience of 20 years ago, delivered with all the prententious panache of yet another sideline-sniper poster, hold little interest for me. I think your comments in this thread are simply deriving from a place of vengeance, owing to my pointing out your foolishness earlier. So, it was a totally predictable thing that you would appear in this thread and seek to undermine my account of a personal experience of two decades ago.

Instead of sniping from the sidelines, NOx23, expose some of your own personal process at this board. See if you can summon the courage to do this.

For example, what drew you to this Forum? Why this board? What are you working on in your own life at this time? How can you learn and grow by virtue of your showing up at this Forum? etc.

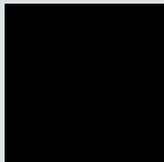

Philip Mislberger

Posts: 73

(4/2/04 5:13 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Rhett --

Quote:

---

If, however, they choose to engage in regular sex, they're reinforcing it in their psyche. People have little power over operant conditioning; what one does makes it's tracks in the mind regardless of what one tries to think about it. And since sex is both mindless and an expression of the will to mindlessness, it rarely predisposes people to thinking about anything at all. It blows-off their suffering, and thus stalls their spiritual development. I've rarely met a sex bunny that is mindful, and they're always hungering for more. The only real lessons that one could come away with, that are of benefit to the eradication of one's desire, are the gaps in one's memory and it's general haziness - which indicate one's unconsciousness, as well as the animalism/unconsciousness of one's partner.

---

That is a reasonable view of sexuality from the point of view of ordinary human dynamics. But the point I've been raising is that of the avenue of exploring relationship with one's natural desires *as they arise*, in addition to the approach of nipping them at the bud.

The inherent difficulty with the sole "nipping at the bud" approach is that the odd "bud" tends to sprout up unnoticed. That is, when we attempt to keep our garden perfectly manicured via a strident and disciplined approach of mindfulness and intellectual lucidity, it's fairly common for the occasional weed to pop up without being "found out".

So from a purely practical point of view, the question becomes, what do we do once these "weeds" (desires) have already arisen?

Over the years I've found that there is a kind of "final frontier" faced by most spiritual seekers. This final frontier is sometimes referred to as the "Emotional Body". It is the entire domain of feeling, emotion, and reactivity, and especially how they play out in the quality of our relating with others and the world around us (assuming we do not live in some hermetically sealed environment as a hermit with zero contact, including the Internet, with others).

All feelings are themselves created by specific thoughts, and in particular, the effect of these thoughts upon the body. Feelings are by nature very simple. It is the interpretation of them that complicates matters. As we egoically identify with thoughts, it is typical to over-complicate and confuse the entire area of emotionality.

How does working with feeling and emotions relate to enlightenment?

What I've found to happen in the enlightenment process is that the realization of our true nature precedes the actual embodiment of it. In other words, we first

1) see the truth

and then

2) we understand the truth

and then

3) we spend the rest of our lives integrating this essential understanding.

The process of integration involves bringing it all together, embodying it in our lives— living it—in our actions, deeds, behavior, personal endeavors, and so on, and progressively deepening our grasp of Truth. The importance of integration is underscored in the challenges faced by all spiritual seekers—including spiritual teachers. This is why the realization of the emptiness of the ego and the direct experience of the Natural State, do not in themselves guarantee immaculate behavior or perfectly harmonious relationships with other people or the world around us (and why so many gurus and other "finders" have had problems). Realizing the enlightened condition is the first step, living it fully in the "small" details of life, and most especially in our relationships, is the second. This second phase is life-long, and unavoidable, as long as we are in a physical body.

Many people have glimpsed Truth. Few have realized it deeply. Even fewer are actually able to live it. I think what blocks a "deeper realization" of it is partly the function of repression. Repression happens on a spiritualized level when we begin to really believe that we "know Truth" but have not yet adequately tested our understanding in life, amongst others, and especially in the areas of where our buttons get pushed.

I'm not saying that we need to abandon all discipline and dive headlong into obvious crap. But I am suggesting that at times our very effort to avoid mindlessness can itself be a form of unconsciousness if we're not directly facing our shadows. And sometimes we need direct life-experience in order to shake us so that we can properly see just how deep and subtle our ego-shadows can be.

Quote:

---

Who is willing to open their eyes at the risk of facing the death stare of an unconscious partner? And of those that are, who is conscious enough to recognise it? One only needs to have sex once in one's life to be able to reflect on these. To continue to engage in it, in an attempt to develop fuller consciousness during it, is a definite risk. Also, realisations about the hassles that often arise in sexual encounters (communication, incompatibility, etc) are too superficial to have any real impact on sexual desire in themselves.

---

Again, it depends on the level of commitment. As I've said before I've known many relationships where the relationship itself was used as a vehicle, in Tantric fashion, to witness the arising of *projection* and to clear such projections with the partner via honest communication. But it takes two willing partners. And no, it is not an easy path. But yes, it can yield very powerful and rapid openings of the subconscious mind in which decades or perhaps generations of repressed material gets unblocked. And this is why the Tibetans know it as the "accelerated" approach because if done properly it results in very fast and deep expansion of consciousness.

Quote:

---

I've always been more scared of sex than death, because not only is it death (unconsciousness), but one's very own mind wills one towards it. It's like being near a cliff edge and having your mind telling you to "Jump! Jump!". Sex is clearly suicidal. People look forward to the clearer mind that they tend to have for those few moments after sex, after they've dumped their energy and have too little left even for reasoning. Most people simply can't endure the pain of reasoning, death is preferable.

---

I think you make some good points there but if there is *fear* of sex, then identification with yourself as a sexual being remains, perhaps at deep, unaccessed levels in your subconscious.

Quote:

---

If a person opens their mind to what sex is all about, to what it really is, they're not going to desire it, or have a problem with it, regardless of their physiology. It is not the body that desires sex. Thus, studying the body is of no real benefit to its eradication.

---

"Studying the body" (mindfulness of the body) is of benefit if attachment to sexuality hasn't been let go of with one's entirety of being. That is, if desire still arises, regardless of one's apparent vigilance, then direct mindfulness of the energies arising in the body is the best way to go. By remaining mindful of them, they don't slip back unnoticed into unconsciousness. That's the essence of the Tantric approach.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 907
(4/2/04 6:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Philip,

Thank you for posting on 'spiritual emergencies'. Your story reminded me of a monk with whom I once shared a house. At the time we met, he already digested his personal emergency. That was lucky for both of us.

Your posts are very insightful. It seems that you have a deep understanding of Eastern thought and traditions and you can connect it to the Western traditions. I guess that's an asset for being a therapist. Do you practice in Canada or in the US?

Thomas

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 357
(4/3/04 8:19 am)
Reply

Re: oops

---

Anna wrote:

Quote:

---

What?! Rairun how can you even compare my inspired orgiastic cosmology with their dead earnestness and hellishly self-absorbed focus upon the nuances of their internal emotional and sexual battles. And I agree that their posts are boring, albeit sometimes entertaining in a somewhat horrifying, freak sideshow kind of way.

---

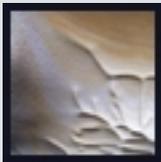

Have i spoken against your attachments Anna?

I don't imagine you'll ever grasp the simple truth that desire and attachment are the cause of all suffering.

Anna = mindlessly orgiastic, spiritually dull, hellish emotional and sexual battles . . . if you could identify what consciousness without suffering and delusion was, you'd enthusiastically embrace enlightened values, and shun your current life which looks horrid in comparison.

Women simply don't suffer for their ignorance. They're too shallow for that.
They neither experience the grand highs nor the grand lows of a highly conscious individual, nor the constant high of an enlightened individual. They're always too busy living in their own dreary dream world, reality hardly gets a peep in.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 358
(4/3/04 9:42 am)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Philip,

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

Rhett: If, however, they choose to engage in regular sex, they're reinforcing it in their psyche. People have little power over operant conditioning; what one does makes it's tracks in the mind regardless of what one tries to think about it. And since sex is both mindless and an expression of the will to mindlessness, it rarely predisposes people to thinking about anything at all. It blows-off their suffering, and thus stalls their spiritual development. I've rarely met a sex bunny that is mindful, and they're always hungering for more. The only real lessons that one could come away with, that are of benefit to the eradication of one's desire, are the gaps in one's memory and it's general haziness - which indicate one's unconsciousness, as well as the animalism/unconsciousness of one's partner.

-----

Philip: Over the years I've found that there is a kind of "final frontier" faced by most spiritual seekers. This final frontier is sometimes referred to as the "Emotional Body". It is the entire domain of feeling, emotion, and reactivity, and especially how they play out in the quality of our relating with others and the world around us (assuming we do not live in some hermetically sealed environment as a hermit with zero contact, including the Internet, with others).

All feelings are themselves created by specific thoughts, and in particular, the effect of these thoughts upon the body. Feelings are by nature very simple. It is the interpretation of them that complicates matters. As we egoically identify with thoughts, it is typical to over-complicate and confuse the entire area of emotionality.

How does working with feeling and emotions relate to enlightenment?

What I've found to happen in the enlightenment process is that the realization of our true nature precedes the actual embodiment of it. In other words, we first

1) see the truth

and then

2) we understand the truth

and then

3) we spend the rest of our lives integrating this essential understanding.

The process of integration involves bringing it all together, embodying it in our lives— living it—in our actions, deeds, behavior, personal endeavors, and so on, and progressively deepening our grasp of Truth. The importance of integration is underscored in the challenges faced by all spiritual seekers—including spiritual teachers. This is why the realization of the emptiness of the ego and the direct experience of the Natural State, do not in themselves guarantee immaculate behavior or perfectly harmonious relationships with other people or the world around us (and why so many gurus and other "finders" have had problems). Realizing the enlightened condition is the first step, living it fully in the "small" details of life, and most especially in our relationships, is the second. This second phase is life-long, and unavoidable, as long as we are in a physical body.

Many people have glimpsed Truth. Few have realized it deeply. Even fewer are actually able to live it. I think what blocks a "deeper realization" of it is partly the function of repression. Repression happens on a spiritualized level when we begin to really believe that we "know Truth" but have not yet adequately tested our understanding in life, amongst others, and especially in the areas of where our buttons get pushed.

I'm not saying that we need to abandon all discipline and dive headlong into obvious crap. But I am suggesting that at times our very effort to avoid mindlessness can itself be a form of unconsciousness if we're not directly facing our shadows. And sometimes we need direct life-experience in order to shake us so that we can properly see just how deep and subtle our ego-shadows can be.

---

I very much agree.

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

Rhett: Who is willing to open their eyes at the risk of facing the death stare of an unconscious partner? And of those that are, who is conscious enough to recognise it? One only needs to have sex once in one's life to be able to reflect on these. To continue to engage in it, in an attempt to develop fuller consciousness during it, is a definite risk. Also, realisations about the hassles that often arise in sexual encounters (communication, incompatibility, etc) are too superficial to have any real impact on sexual desire in themselves.

-----

Philip: Again, it depends on the level of commitment. As I've said before I've known many relationships where the relationship itself was used as a vehicle, in Tantric fashion, to witness the arising of *projection* and to clear such projections with the partner via honest communication. But it takes two willing partners. And no, it is not an easy path. But yes, it can yield very powerful and rapid openings of the subconscious mind in which decades or perhaps generations of repressed material gets unblocked. And this is why the Tibetans know it as the "accelerated" approach because if done properly it results in very fast and deep expansion of consciousness.

---

I think i've been very open to learning from everyone i've met in life, yet people have rarely given me insights into myself. They're just too different to me to be able to know me, to be capable of relating to and understanding my depths. They just don't have it in them. People rarely even say "You're different".

I've always learnt around the edges so-to-speak, i've interacted, and then reflected on it, and learnt my lessons that way. The relationships that i've had, which add-up to about 12-18 months (depending on how strictly you want to define them), don't stand out from the time when i wasn't in them. Sure, i've learnt from them and value having had them, and needed to have them to be where i am now, but they weren't particularly insightful, despite my choosiness of partners. Basically, i think they were no more or less insightful that the friendships i've had.

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

Rhett: I've always been more scared of sex than death, because not only is it death (unconsciousness), but one's very own mind wills one towards it. It's like being near a cliff edge and having your mind telling you to "Jump! Jump!". Sex is clearly suicidal. People look forward to the clearer mind that they tend to have for those few moments after sex, after they've dumped their energy and have too little left even for reasoning. Most people simply can't endure the pain of reasoning, death is preferable.

-----

Philip: I think you make some good points there but if there is *fear* of sex, then identification with yourself as a sexual being remains, perhaps at deep, unaccessed levels in your subconscious.

---

That's part of the reason why i'm pursuing this dialogue. I want to really nut out why i've always had such a strong fear of sex. I've chosen to have sex about 25 times in my life, and i'm sure you'll agree that that's a pretty rare statistic. I've danced with death far far more than that, which involved heightened consciousness - rather than diminished.

Sex is such a submission to the ego. The sex drive has always seemed to come from outside of myself, like an alien imposter, that renders sex a distorted pastime. And i can so easily see it in others. My greater lament was always that other people couldn't overcome their distortions. The aliens have so much geater control over them, they're automatons.

It reflects those deep difference betwen myself and other people, to connect so closely with them infringes on me, their unconsciousness and delusions threaten to seep into me. It's the relationshipp to truth, it's been tenuous enough - never mind being corrupted by someone else who hasn't the capacity to see outside their ego.

It's such a shame that so many people like myself don't see their nature, because the herd simply don't and can't reflect it back at them. I've lived a life of forming falsely high opinions of others because it was so dangerous to my ego not to. I created a bubble of distorted perceptions so the world didn't look as unconscious as it is. For me to view people as chimpanzees is a relief for my mind, it has no effect on the remnants of my ego.

I endeavour to help others so we can avoid this gross loss of potential that is occuring all over the world as-we-speak, for the benefit of everyone.

Quote:

---

Quote:
-----

Rhett: If a person opens their mind to what sex is all about, to what it really is, they're not going to desire it, or have a problem with it, regardless of their physiology. It is not the body that desires sex. Thus, studying the body is of no real benefit to it's eradication.

---

Philip: "Studying the body" (mindfulness of the body) is of benefit if attachment to sexuality hasn't been let go of with one's entirety of being. That is, if desire still arises, regardless of one's apparent vigilance, then direct mindfulness of the energies arising in the body is the best way to go. By remaining mindful of them, they don't slip back unnoticed into unconsciousness. That's the essence of the Tantric approach.

---

But you've agreed that desire and emotions arise in the mind, and have their effects in the body. To focus on the body is merely to focus on the effect, not the cause; it's a band-aid. To be effective, one must focus on understanding the cause.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 242
(4/3/04 10:55 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

What?! Rairun how can you even compare my inspired orgiastic cosmology with their dead earnestness and hellishly self-absorbed focus upon the nuances of their internal emotional and sexual battles.

What do you mean metaphor? If it weren't the reality, what need for such a metaphor? It is indeed the reality. It's known as yin and yang. And I agree that their posts are boring, albeit sometimes entertaining in a somewhat horrifying, freak sideshow kind of way.

---

I wasn't referring to anyone in special. I don't even know who posted what in most cases, but I know your point is different! That's why I replied to you and not to everyone else. I just think that both sides are giving way too much importance to sex.

You can make an analogy between yan yang and sex, but I don't think sex is some sort of universal principle like you said. I don't see sex as something bad that has to be stopped, but I don't think it's that important either. It's just something else to do. Depending on the situation, it might cause trouble or bring things you consider good. In the first case, you do it. In the second case, you don't. I don't know why people make things so complicated.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1496
(4/3/04 11:12 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

You just don't realize how narrow your view of "sex" is. What you call sex, is just one branch, one manifestation.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 244
(4/3/04 11:18 am)
Reply

...

---

Then, for a start, you should define what sex actually is.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 29
(4/3/04 2:45 pm)
Reply

Cause and effect

---

Rhett: But you've agreed that desire and emotions arise in the mind, and have their effects in the body. To focus on the body is merely to focus on the effect, not the cause; it's a band-aid. To be effective, one must focus on understanding the cause.

Causes

Hormones

Sensory stimuli

Emotional need

Interpretations

A. Symptomatic of sexual desire

B. Asymptomatic of sexual desire

Effects

A.1 Expression: Desire for sex

A.2 Repression: Repulsed by sex

A.3 Reinterpretation: Asymptomatic > Desireless

B.1 Desireless

Please note, that having the biological body of a woman, what i regard as causes may differ from someone with a man's body. But i think the mental processes are the same.

I see that desire for sex has one cause: thinking!

At ovulation, i experience physical sensations such as a pubococcygeal pulse or Spinnbarkeit mucus flow increased. These do not cause sexual desire, but interpretation as symptomatic of sexual desire does.

Repression of sexual signs/symptoms and of the desire is the suppression of thinking correctly. Expression of both is similarly the suppression of thinking correctly (jumping to conclusions).

Nothing has inherent value or is symptomatic/meaningful. But is reasoning itself inherently sexual (dualistic, divisive, sectioned) by aiming at deciding for/against?

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 109

(4/4/04 10:47 am)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

David I am not really sure how to respond to your post, your points seem very semantical. This is not a personal attack on you and I will chalk this up to my lack of intelligence.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1498

(4/4/04 12:13 pm)

Reply

Re: oops

---

Quote:

---

As I've said before I've known many relationships where the relationship itself was used as a vehicle, in Tantric fashion, to witness the arising of *projection* and to clear such projections with the partner via honest communication. But it takes two willing partners. And no, it is not an easy path. But yes, it can yield very powerful and rapid openings of the subconscious mind in which decades or perhaps generations of repressed material gets unblocked. And this is why the Tibetans know it as the "accelerated" approach because if done properly it results in very fast and deep expansion of consciousness.

---

Phillip, I'd be interested to learn more about that.

Quote:

---

Have i spoken against your attachments Anna?

---

I think you have.

Quote:

---

Anna = mindlessly orgiastic, spiritually dull, hellish emotional and sexual battles . . . if you could identify what consciousness without suffering and delusion was, you'd enthusiastically embrace enlightened values, and shun your current life which looks horrid in comparison.

---

No I am very alertly and mindfully orgiastic. I am spiritually vibrant, and I have very few emotional or sexual battles at all. My life is both serene and a joy to me, and because of that I am free to spend most of my time thinking about the condition of the planet, and of the meaning in the universe.

Quote:

---

Women simply don't suffer for their ignorance.

---

So far as I can tell from what all the men here have said, I am the only one here who suffers for my ignorance, and for it alone. The reason I say that is everyone insists that only suffering is the catalyst for beginning the quest for truth. For me this was never the case. I have always been interested, and the ups and downs of my personal life (which have largely ceased) have never had any bearing upon it at all.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 4/4/04 3:09 pm

Jones Kelly

Posts: 32

(4/4/04 3:15 pm)

Reply

Re: motivation

---

Anna: My life is both serene and a joy to me, and because of that I am free to spend most of my time thinking about the condition of the planet, and of the meaning in the universe.

...everyone insists that only suffering is the catalyst for beginning the quest for truth. For me this was never the case. I have always been interested, and the ups and downs of my personal life (which have largely ceased) have never had any bearing upon it at all.

Then your motivation or quest is sourced in a problem. If you are purely motivated by the "condition of the planet" and "meaning of the universe", you are motivated by problem-solving. Until this problem is solved, you suffer.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1499

(4/4/04 4:30 pm)

Reply

Re: motivation

---

No, you misunderstood. I did not say I am motivated by the planet or the universe. I simply said my interest in Truth has always been sufficient unto itself, that neither life's good times nor bad times greatly influenced it one way or the other, that I did not seek it "because" of anything whatsoever except that it is more compelling than other things, and that by a long shot.

My point about the lack of internal battles and angst is that it frees me up to have a concern for many things outside myself. In other words, I am not very self absorbed.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 1055

(4/4/04 9:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Ah yes, the great insult on this message board -- to call someone "feminine".

---

Why do you see it as an insult?

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

I don't "need" any personal information from you, DEL, it was rather an invitation to you to get serious and bring yourself into the discussion, rather than sitting on the sidelines sniping. To bring yourself into a discussion requires *courage*. To sit on the sidelines like a faceless sniper is simply cowardice. It is also a far more passive approach, and thus far more feminized. You've got your classifications upside down. "

---

What you see as courage I see as cowardice.
Yes, one of us is truly upside down.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Even the founders of this BBS share plenty of information about their individual process and struggle in life leading toward their realizations.

---

I do not believe that a Genius would have "plenty of information about their individual process".

Processed enlightenment is like processed food.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

Exactly as I predicted, you would not answer the questions. And yet you continue to ask questions of me. Do you yet fail to see your evasiveness?

---

Have you answered all the questions I have put to you? If not we are the same are we not?

Perhaps inverted.

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger

The rest of your sniper-questions are unworthy of response by virtue of your evading my earlier questions.

---

Sniper am I? I wonder if you believe I have a poor aim.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1056
(4/4/04 10:06 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Quote:

---

Philip Mistlberger
. . . .to witness the arising of *projection* and to clear such projections with the partner via honest communication. But it takes two willing partners. And no, it is not an easy path. . . . .

---

The so called therapist might not be answering any of my questions so could somebody please ask him what he thinks is this "honest communication".

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1066
(4/5/04 1:12 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Cue tumbleweed.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1497
(4/5/04 1:30 pm)
Reply

Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

---

Who is that?

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1068(4/5/04 2:04 pm)Reply                                                                              | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Y'know, deserted Wild West town, blustery wind, tumbleweed blows across the square. |
| N0X23 Registered UserPosts: 112(4/6/04 1:50 am)Reply  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> What.... No shoot out at the I'm okay, you're okay corral?                          |

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

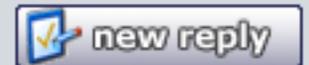

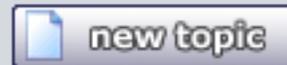

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1498(4/6/04 2:37 am)Reply  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Toast belongs to the "I'm an ass, you're an ass" corral. Edited by: birdofhermes at: 4/6/04 2:36 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 3(4/6/04 10:27 am)Reply    | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Quote: <hr/> David I am not really sure how to respond to your post, your points seem very semantical. This is not a personal attack on you and I will chalk this up to my lack of intelligence. <hr/> Nox, judging from your posts I would say you are extremely intelligent. I think Dave is reacting rather piquishly to your attempt to discredit what Philip was saying using piercing logic without the experience and understanding of the more subtle aspect of Phil's experience. Which, apparently he does. |

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1543(4/6/04 10:46 am)Reply                                                                                                      | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> "Escape From New York" One of the best bad movies ever. Tharan                                                                                                                                           |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1069(4/6/04 1:35 pm)Reply    | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Tombstone seems more pertinent.                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1070(4/6/04 1:37 pm)Reply  | Re: Sex, The Devil, Religion, Repression <hr/> Though not as good. Thanks for them both anyway Kurt.                                                                                                                                                           |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 531(4/6/04 1:57 pm)Reply                                                                                           | Kurt <hr/> Are we dealing with the true movie star Kurt Russell here? If not, then some guy is trying the image-building thing here, that, for instance J. Krishnamurti, warned against. Mmmm, I can portrait myself as Warren Beatty.How 'bout that one? |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 532(4/6/04 2:09 pm)Reply                                                                                            | Re: Kurt <hr/> Forgive me the spelling mistakes.( 'portrait' has to be 'portray'; I'm a Dutchie.) Oh, btw, NOX23 is intelligent indeed, but quite dumb when it comes to matters of human interaction.And he/she is totally ignorant too. (As a bonus: mysticism is philosophy &amp; love in one.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1080(4/18/04 12:53 am)Reply                                                                                          | The Therapist <hr/> Hello ! What happened to Mr. Therapist of 20 years experience?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1080(4/18/04 1:23 am)Reply  | Re: The Therapist <hr/> He must have tried of dealing with nebulous dicks. Nice one del.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| JuberzRegistered UserPosts: 1(4/28/04 3:19 am)Reply                                                                                           | Good points, however... <hr/> I have to disagree with your statement that the Judeo-Christian concept of the devil is rooted in Pagan deities. You describe the Pagan deities as those "who embodied primal procreative power and virility". However, and I'm sure you're aware of this, that is not the Biblical definition of the devil. In my opinion that sounds a bit closer to the Biblical definition of God. The links between paganism and Christianity stem from the use of paganistic imagery, myth, and traditions to relate Christian ideas in a context that would be easily understood by European cultures. Since Europe is the region most responsible for shaping modern Christianity, the influence of paganistic imagery and ritual has carried over into the religion and caused the misconception that Christianity has pagan roots. When in actuality it is the converted European cultures that fused their "older" pagan ideas with their "newer" Christian ideas. The concept of Christianity may share some similiraties with paganism but it isn't a direct descendant of it. |

The Biblical concept of the devil has little to do with the concepts of the various pagan deities you named, since it was just the imagery that was used and not the ideas. There is much more to the Christian devil than just a randy deity looking for a good time.

Also another misconception is that Eve was condemned in the Old Testament. Eve is known in Christianity as the mother of all humanity, that hardly seems like a condemnation to me. Remember that Adam also ate the fruit and was just as guilty as Eve was. Adam and Eve both had an equal part in the fall of humanity. I'm having a hard time equating Eve's mistake as a symbol for female sexual dysfunction especially since she had sex with Adam and got pregnant.

Organized religion does make a mess of things though, I agree with you on that. The Bible doesn't repress or deny the force of sexuality ("be fruitful and multiply" and also the entire book "Songs of Solomon" encourage sexual activity, albeit in a context of love) but you are correct about organized religion which in my opinion represses not only human impulse to a fault but Christianity as well.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Shapes

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 559(7/26/03 8:20 pm)Reply    | Shapes<hr/> What is the best compromise between a straight line and a circle?          |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 251(7/27/03 0:03)Reply   | Re: Shapes<hr/> Dissolution.                                                           |
| StreetLampRegistered UserPosts: 76(7/27/03 1:46)Reply | Re: Shapes<hr/> A porabola?We aren't trying to work on hyperspace here are we? |
| wannabealotRegistered UserPosts: 6(7/27/03 1:48)Reply | Re: Shapes<hr/> a chain with circular links strung in a straight line?                 |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| StreetLampRegistered UserPosts: 77(7/27/03 2:01)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Shapes <hr/> Come to think of it... All linear and parabolic functions have no theoretical beginnings or ends. So I would say that all are, in that way, similar. A circle is only a way of visualizing this. |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 481(7/27/03 21:31)Reply  | Re: Shapes <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Del: What is the best compromise between a straight line and a circle? <hr/> A point.                                                                                 |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1310(7/27/03 22:19)Reply                                                                                    | ----- <hr/> TOAST WINSContinue?[1 CREDIT]                                                                                                                                                                      |
| StreetLampRegistered UserPosts: 78(7/28/03 1:11 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: ----- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> A point. <hr/> Damn it! A toast to Toast. Edited by: StreetLamp at: 7/28/03 1:12 am                                                      |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 561(7/28/03 10:16)Reply                                                                                          | Re: Shapes <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Dave Toast:A point. <hr/> Nice one!I was thinking something else but a point is really good and I think possibly the best. A point is charged with potential. It can go either way, it can begin anything. |
| wannabealotRegistered UserPosts: 7(7/28/03 12:28)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Shapes <hr/> ...and it can end anything. Makes a nice intersection, anyway.                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 483(7/29/03 0:07)Reply  | Re: Shapes <hr/> Yay, what do I win? I don't want no Weininger book. Speaking of a point, is there one?                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1318(7/29/03 1:43)Reply                                                                                      | ----- <hr/> There are many, ....and that they are infinite, that is because there is no 'ultimate' one.                                                                                                                                                                 |

StreetLamp
Registered User
Posts: 81
(7/29/03 1:52)
Reply

Re: -----

---

Quote:

---

There are many, ....and that they are infinite, that is because there is no 'ultimate' one.

---

Prove it.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1320
(7/29/03 2:22)
Reply

----

---

That infinity is finitely what it is---this is proof enough.

StreetLamp
Registered User
Posts: 86
(7/29/03 2:59)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

That infinity is finitely what it is---this is proof enough.

---

No, this is a lack of effort.

DEL

Registered User
Posts: 564
(7/29/03 7:29)
Reply

WTP & WTV

---

Quote:

---

StreetLamp:
No, this is a lack of effort.

---

This "effort" you mention is the "Will to value" (WTV) in the face of the infinite. It is plant-like behaviour (face up) rather than animal-like behaviour (face down) "Will to power" (WTP).

Dave Toast

Registered User
Posts: 487
(7/29/03 7:54)
Reply

Re: WTP & WTV

---

Quote:

---

DT: Speaking of a point, is there one?

Zag: There are many, ....and that they are infinite, that is because there is no 'ultimate' one.

---

I meant is there a point to the original question posed in this thread.

What do you mean by infinite BTW?

wannabealot
Registered User
Posts: 8
(7/29/03 10:28)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

That infinity is finitely what it is---this is proof enough.

---

Holy paradoxes Batman! What do you suppose The Riddler is trying to tell us?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1325
(7/29/03 13:42)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

No, this is a lack of effort.

---

What, are you surprised the proof is so clear?!

Are you going to suggest that infinity is NOT a reality?!

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1327
(7/29/03 13:50)
Reply

---

---

Dave Toast, by infinite I mean eternal,

StreetLamp
Registered User
Posts: 90
(7/29/03 17:18)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

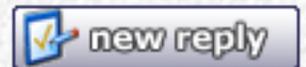

Are you going to suggest that infinity is NOT a reality?!

---

LOL! No, but I will suggest that you are infinitely remarkable.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Shapes

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 490(7/30/03 8:05)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Zag: by infinite I mean eternal <hr/> That doesn't seem to fit quite properly with your original useage. And infinite and eternal are two different words refering to two different subjects. Quote: <hr/> Are you going to suggest that infinity is NOT a reality?! <hr/> I might. What do you mean by reality? |

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1328

(7/30/03 11:58)

Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

That doesn't seem to fit quite properly with your original useage. And infinite and eternal are two different words refering to two different subjects.

---

Eternity: forever. Infinity: forever.

You may say that what is infinite is 'without number' or 'without beginning or end' while what is eternal may have a beginning an end and even a number. The two different subjects they refer to are eachother!

By 'a reality' I meant 'real' 'extant' 'actual'

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 495

(7/31/03 9:04)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Eternity: forever.

---

Yes.

---

Quote:

---

Infinity: forever.

---

No.

Main Entry: eter-nal

Pronunciation: i-'t&r-n&l

Function: adjective

Etymology: Middle English, from Middle French, from Late Latin aeternalis, from Latin aeternus eternal, from aevum age, eternity -- more at AYE

Date: 14th century

1 a : having infinite duration : EVERLASTING b : of or relating to eternity c : characterized by abiding fellowship with God <good teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life? -- Mark 10:17 (Revised Standard Version)>

2 a : continued without intermission : PERPETUAL b : seemingly endless

3 archaic : INFERNAL <some eternal villain ... devised this slander -- Shakespeare>

4 : valid or existing at all times : TIMELESS <eternal verities>

- eter-nal-ize /-n&l-"Iz/ transitive verb

- eter-nal-ly /-n&l-E/ adverb

- eter-nal-ness noun

Main Entry: 1in-fi-nite

Pronunciation: 'in-f&-n&t

Function: adjective

Etymology: Middle English infinit, from Middle French or Latin; Middle French, from Latin infinitus, from in- + finitus finite

Date: 14th century

1 : extending indefinitely : ENDLESS <infinite space>

2 : immeasurably or inconceivably great or extensive : INEXHAUSTIBLE <infinite patience>

3 : subject to no limitation or external determination

4 a : extending beyond, lying beyond, or being greater than any preassigned finite value however large <infinite number of positive numbers> b : extending to infinity <infinite plane surface> c : characterized by an infinite number of elements or terms <an infinite set> <an infinite series>

- in-fi-nite-ly adverb

- in-fi-nite-ness noun

Quote:

---

You may say that what is infinite is 'without number' or 'without beginning or end' while what is eternal may have a beginning an end and even a number. The two different subjects they refer to are eachother!

---

I guess you are talking about Alpha and Omega?

I was referring to the fact that eternal refers only to infinite time, whereas infinity refers to that which is subject to no limitation.

Two completely different subjects, two completely different designations, two completely different meanings.

Quote:

---

By 'a reality' I meant 'real' 'extant' 'actual'

---

So you are talking about physical reality.

In that case yes, I will suggest that infinity is not a 'reality'.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1331

(7/31/03 9:51)

Reply

-----

---

How can what is boundless not be forever?!

The word 'Eternal' does not only refer to infinite time.

Of course I'm talking about physical reality, can you give me an example of reality that is not physical?

I was not talking about 'alpha' and 'omega'.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1334

(7/31/03 10:29)

Reply

Re: -----

---

Quote:

---

I will suggest that infinity is not a 'reality'.

---

You can suggest it all you like, you'll never be able to contest it to any success.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 497

(8/1/03 7:57)

Reply

Re: -----

---

Quote:

---

I was not talking about 'alpha' and 'omega'.

---

What if I called it zero and infinity?

---

Quote:

---

How can what is boundless not be forever?!

---

Beats me, never said that it wasn't.

I guess if I was going to play Devil's advocate, I'd say that forever is a boundary, temporality is a boundary.

---

Quote:

---

The word 'Eternal' does not only refer to infinite time.

---

Oh right. And timeless doesn't only refer to a lack of time, right?

Quote:

---

Of course I'm talking about physical reality, can you give me an example of reality that is not physical?

---

Yes, abstract conceptions like infinity.

Quote:

---

DT: I will suggest that infinity is not a 'reality'.

Zag: You can suggest it all you like, you'll never be able to contest it to any success.

---

Yes, I've noticed your tendency to try to have the work done for you. The burden of proof is on you.

Whilst there is obviously conjecture on the subject, I'm with the generally accepted and well substantiated knowledge.

So I'll leave it to you to contest against the predominantly 'successful' contention.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1342

(8/1/03 11:00 am)

Reply

Re: -----

---

suergaz:--Of course I'm talking about physical reality, can you give me an example of reality that is not physical?

Dave:--Yes, abstract conceptions like infinity.

Abstract conceptions are part of physical reality.

*

suergaz:--The word 'Eternal' does not only refer to infinite time.

Dave:--Oh right. And timeless doesn't only refer to a lack of time, right?

Wrong. It stands that the word eternal does not only refer to infinite time.

*

Dave:--Yes, I've noticed your tendency to try to have the work done for you. The burden of proof is on you.

Since you were the one who made the suggestion, you don't think you share this burden?

*

suergaz:--How can what is boundless not be forever?!

Dave:---Beats me, never said that it wasn't.

Yes you did. I wrote "Infinite: forever" and you wrote "No"

*

Dave:--What if I called it zero and infinity?

I was talking about eternity and infinity. Not alpha and omega or zero and infinity.

Edited by: suergaz at: 8/1/03 11:13 am

StreetLamp

Registered User

Posts: 98

(8/1/03 12:12 pm)

Reply

Re: -----

How will this end do you think? Will someone ultimately be right? There isn't an intelligent thought among the two of you in this whole discussion. Where is the progress?

The words that you are wasting your precious time with will conjure up the same image in your heads, after you are through, as they do already. The true meaning of the word is irrelevant. What does a color blind person see when they say the word red? Is it the same? No, but they will point to the same thing, because that is their understanding.

The only thing that is eternity or infinity between the two of you is your pride. What a waste!

E·ter·nal noun God: God as a universal spirit

In·fi·nite noun God: used to refer to God

...Well, no shit!?

The words you were both looking for were as follows:

Don't be confused with the capitalized words. The words infinite, and eternal are derivatives of the following.

in·fin·ity [ in fínnitee ] (plural in·fin·i·ties)

noun

1. something without limits: limitless time, space, or distance beyond the Earth lay infinity
2. something too great to count: an amount or number so great that it cannot be counted an infinity of stars
3. state of being infinite: the state or quality of being infinite
4. mathematics concept of being always unlimited: the concept of being unlimited by always being larger than any imposed value or boundary. For some purposes this may be considered as being the same as one divided by zero.
5. geometry geometric point at infinite distance: a part of a geometric figure situated an infinite distance from the observer, for example, the hypothetical point at which parallel lines meet in Euclidean geometry
6. optics infinitely distant point: a point sufficiently far from a lens or mirror that the light emitted from it falls in parallel rays on the surface

[14th century. From French infinité , from, ultimately, Latin infinitus (see infinite).]

e•ter•ni•ty [ &#601; túrnitee ]

noun

1. infinite time: time without beginning or end lost for all eternity

2. timelessness: the condition, quality, or fact of being without beginning or end

3. religion timelessness after death: a timeless state conceived as being experienced after death

4. very long time: a very long or seemingly very long period of time

It will take an eternity to put it together again.

They are four different words with completely different meanings. SURPRISE!

You can't use one of the top two to describe the bottom two.

Now, go do something for the good of humanity...

Quote:

Re: -----

Quote:

I was not talking about 'alpha' and 'omega'.

What if I called it zero and infinity?

Quote:

How can what is boundless not be forever?!

Beats me, never said that it wasn't.

I guess if I was going to play Devil's advocate, I'd say that forever is a boundary, temporality is a boundary.

Quote:

The word 'Eternal' does not only refer to infinite time.

---

Oh right. And timeless doesn't only refer to a lack of time, right?

Quote:

---

Of course I'm talking about physical reality, can you give me an example of reality that is not physical?

---

Yes, abstract conceptions like infinity.

Quote:

---

DT: I will suggest that infinity is not a 'reality'.

Zag: You can suggest it all you like, you'll never be able to contest it to any success.

---

Yes, I've noticed your tendency to try to have the work done for you. The burden of proof is on you.

Whilst there is obviously conjecture on the subject, I'm with the generally accepted and well substantiated knowledge.

So I'll leave it to you to contest against the predominantly 'successful' contention.

---

suergaz:--Of course I'm talking about physical reality, can you give me an example of reality that is not physical?

Dave:--Yes, abstract conceptions like infinity.

Abstract conceptions are part of physical reality.

*

suergaz:--The word 'Eternal' does not only refer to infinite time.

Dave:--Oh right. And timeless doesn't only refer to a lack of time, right?

Wrong. It stands that the word eternal does not only refer to infinite time.

*

Dave:--Yes, I've noticed your tendency to try to have the work done for you. The burden of proof is on you.

Since you were the one who made the suggestion, you don't think you share this burden?

*

suergaz:--How can what is boundless not be forever?!

Dave:---Beats me, never said that it wasn't.

Yes you did. I wrote "Infinite: forever" and you wrote "No"

*

Dave:--What if I called it zero and infinity?
I was talking about eternity and infinity. Not alpha and omega or zero and infinity.

---

Edited by: StreetLamp at: 8/1/03 12:57 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1344
(8/3/03 0:59)
Reply

Re: -----

---

You pea brain, you've quoted that idiotically.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1317
(8/12/03 11:56)
Reply

Re: -----

---

I agree with Zag that "Eternal" denotes more than just endless time. That which is eternal is also infinite. Both terms indicate the same reality.

Oh, and "eternal" doesn't really mean "an endless period of time". Strictly, it means "beyond time".

Dan Rowden

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 188
(8/12/03 12:07)
Reply

re

---

SL: Do you draw lines to infinity, or lines of indefinite length? Time-lines, specifically.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 507
(8/13/03 0:13)
Reply

Re: re

---

Yes Dan, rather than deny their interchangeable useage, I think I was trying to make a distinction.

Yes you could say that which is eternal is also infinite, but I'd prefer to say that that which is infinite is also eternal, a not too fine distinction.

When I look at the dictionary definitions, I see that all the ones for eternal refer to time in some way, or at least timelessness is denoted. In the definitions of infinity, there are no specific references to time, although the definitions would encompass such.

Surely infinity is the set of all sets, necessarily encompassing eternity. Whereas eternity is a set, not necessarily encompassing the set of all sets.

If we're going beyond standard definitions, then the world is our oyster.

I think the whole point I wanted to get across in the first place was that infinity is not a property of the physical, phenomenal universe IMO. As Zag pointed out by way of sophistry, abstract conceptions like infinity are indeed part of the physical phenomenal universe, but I was trying to (and eventually did) say that the object which such a conception attempts to grasp at is actually impossible within the physical universe.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1359

(8/13/03 12:17)

Reply

---

---

What object does such a conception (infinity) attempt to grasp? We have only ever been attempting to grasp this conception!

eternity is the set of all sets.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 615

(8/24/03 19:53)

Reply

Pyramids

---

Trendy management Gurus talk about reverse pyramid structure. The reverse pyramid is the invisible structure that sits on top of the visible pyramid.

It is possible that when the visible pyramid is complete the invisible pyramid structure cancels it out like the behaviour of light particles or waves.

The tower of Babel.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1376

(8/28/03 16:53)

Reply

Re: Pyramids

---

Sounds more like the Tower of Babble to me.

BryanParrish
Global User
Posts: 85
(8/3/04 5:49)
Reply

Re: Shapes

---

FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

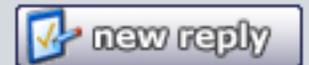

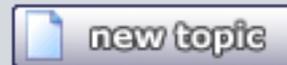

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Shurangama Sutra

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 328(2/2/04 11:20 pm)Reply  | Shurangama Sutra <hr/> The Shurangama Sutra can be dowloaded from the following URL, in 8 PDF files. www.gbm-online.com/Sutras.asp It includes a commentary by Hsuan Hua which seems quite reasonable. It would make an interesting discussion topic if anyone is interested. "The Ultimate Extinction of the Dharma Sutra" names the Shurangama Sutra as an indicator for the ultimate extinction of the Dharma. That is, it will be one of the first sutras to be consigned to oblivion, or not understood by its readers. |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 236(2/3/04 8:42 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> Thanks for the link... This is a big undertaking...2400 pages, and so far, it seems like an interesting topic (er...insights, not sure of the right word) to discuss. Did you have something in particular you would like to start with? possibly with sections, I see they are outlined for reference which is extrememly convenient...This is rather new to me, but I am willing to give it a go...                                                                                                                                                                     |

jimhaz

Registered User
Posts: 539
(2/3/04 9:39 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Looks like a waste of time to me (apart from the summary maybe). Use your own mind.

Which leads me to the following questions

Why would a supposedly enlightened person bother reading such works?
In what way would it improve on their ability to reason?

All life needs moderation in anything they do or it spins out of control and burns up in some fashion. Is reason any different?

Is the mental change from near-enlightened to thinking one is enlightened, simply a non-emotional mental breakdown causing a form of autism, a total immersion in thinking, where the love of logic becomes the reason for their existence, and which ultimately leads to an inability to spread reason to others in the most efficient manner as too much of the personality of the person is removed?

If that were so then it might be better to never achieve enlightenment, but only approach it. Somewhat like Dan maybe, at least the writing of not to over the top books and scripts is a practical application of wisdom, in that it allows reason to be spread across more people.

The QRS say they only seek the true thinkers, one or two people per city. Is not this ludicrous! Why would it not be better to spread less reason amongst more people.

Reason leads to more reason, so some of the people who could gain an increased degree of reasoning ability would move on to higher levels of reason and the world would end a better place.

Makes sense to me.

The QRS are not fully wise, although they have far fewer delusions that anyone else I've read on these forums.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/3/04 9:40 am

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 236
(2/3/04 9:55 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

The Buddha is the only one who has nothing left to learn.
-Shurangama Sutra, Individuals Able to Receive the Teaching

---

Quote:

---

jimhaz: Why would a supposedly enlightened person bother reading such works?
In what way would it improve on their ability to reason?

---

Exactly...I found myself asking the same questions half way through the introduction...

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 328
(2/3/04 10:17 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

JimHaz wrote:

Quote:

---

"The Buddha is the only one who has nothing left to learn."
-Shurangama Sutra, Individuals Able to Receive the Teaching

jimhaz: Why would a supposedly enlightened person bother reading such works? In what way would it improve on their ability to reason?

---

There is a distinction to be made between an enlightened person and a Buddha. The enlightened person knows everything to do with Truth, but a Buddha is a perfected enlightened person, who has no lingering, subtle habits. [Incidentally, there may have never existed such a person - there's no way we can know]

A person might read such works for the following reasons:

1. Simply to help keep their mind focused on Truth, helping to reinforce the work they have already done.
2. To exercise their mind in a variety of ways, keeping the mind active and alert.
3. To gain an extended vocabulary, and to learn different ways of explaining the same truth, which might come in handy some day. And also to help in understanding some of the Buddhist jargon if one ever has to speak to Buddhists.
4. To find out why "The Ultimate Extinction of the Dharma Sutra" thinks this particular sutra is so important.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 236

(2/3/04 10:53 am)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: There is a distinction to be made between an enlightened person and a Buddha. The enlightened person knows everything to do with Truth, but a Buddha is a perfected enlightened person, who has no lingering, subtle habits. [Incidentally, there may have never existed such a person - there's no way we can know]

---

Well, from the Buddhist perspective, there are various degrees prior to becoming a Buddha, none of which knows everything to do with Truth. Also, I have been reading up on the Four Noble Truths, in which there has been said numerous times that no one can know everything while still in the "appearance" (physical) form - anything with "appearance" is false. This is why it is advised for the wise to continuously "clear the cobwebs" and refresh their wisdom.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2172
(2/3/04 11:01 am)
Reply

---

Jimhaz:--

Quote:

---

The QRS are not fully wise, although they have far fewer delusions that anyone else I've read on these forums.

---

When haven't we seen you crawling up the arses of these three wise men?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 668
(2/3/04 11:14 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Where in this sutra does it describe any difference between 'enlightened' and 'Perfected'? Or any sutra?

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 237
(2/3/04 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: ---

Quote:

---

voce: Where in this sutra does it describe any difference between 'enlightened' and 'Perfected'? Or any sutra?

---

There is commentary on it, but also described are the various degrees prior to the "Perfected" state, or Buddha. As for the actual sutra, I cannot say for all of this one particular, but so far in what I have read, it says nothing of the sort...

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 543
(2/3/04 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Sugarplums

There are others I appreciate a lot, but they don't post in much detail or much. Some people like Tharan and Cass, Rairum (sometimes) for example, but there are others.

At times, I don't like the ones who write things in emotional terms, say like your post above. However, you and everyone here has an above average intelligence and sometimes say non-emotional things in an easily understood fashion that I can fully agree with, so my distaste gets dissipated. However, it quickly can flare up, due to what is stored in my long term memories.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 328
(2/3/04 11:56 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

cassiopeiae wrote:

Quote:

---

Well, from the Buddhist perspective, there are various degrees prior to becoming a Buddha, none of which knows everything to do with Truth.

---

It depends what you mean by "knowing". Someone who is almost a perfect Buddha knows just as much as does the Buddha - they could give the very same teachings, for example - but they still have the very slightest hint of "fog", so to speak, and so do not have the 100% perfect "vision" of a Buddha.

Quote:

---

Also, I have been reading up on the Four Noble Truths, in which there has been said numerous times that no one can know everything while still in the "appearance" (physical) form - anything with "appearance" is false.

---

No-one can know all things about the physical world, as we are limited by our senses. But spiritual knowledge is something different.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 238

(2/3/04 12:22 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: It depends what you mean by "knowing". Someone who is almost a perfect Buddha knows just as much as does the Buddha - they could give the very same teachings, for example - but they still have the very slightest hint of "fog", so to speak, and so do not have the 100% perfect "vision" of a Buddha.

---

No where have I read anything about the "almost" perfect Buddha. You are or you aren't, and if you aren't there are still many things left to be learned. Though the "almost" Buddha, as you say, can give the same teachings, they are still lacking in the perfected enlightenment area for one reason or another.

Quote:

---

Kevin: No-one can know all things about the physical world, as we are limited by our senses. But spiritual knowledge is something different.

---

It has been said (in the reading of the explanation of the Four Noble Truths) that while in physical form, a person can not know everything of Buddha nature. Basically, until death and ascension into the heavens.

Quote:

---

Within the enlightenment of self and the enlightenment of others there are various stages and myriad distinctions. There are, for instance, small enlightenments, which are not complete, and there is great enlightenment, which is total. The Buddha has by himself realized great enlightenment, and he also causes others to obtain great enlightenment.

When one has perfected both the enlightenment of self and the enlightenment of others, one attains the perfection of enlightenment and practice.

The Buddha has perfected the Three Kinds of Enlightenment and so is adorned with myriad kinds of virtuous practices.

-Shurangama Sutra, The General Explanation of the Title

---

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 546

(2/3/04 12:38 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

No-one can be a perfect Buddha.

It is matter of memory. The degree of one's enlightenment is the ratio of stored irrational memories over the number of rational memories.

The longer a person remains not-enlightened the longer the process of becoming enlightened takes. That is why the older one is the more difficult it is to become enlightened. 'You can't teach an old dog new tricks'

Enlightenment takes time. If is person is steered to rationality when young, Hu Zheng, Weininger for example then they have less irrational memories stored, and as reason is a kind of chain reaction in that the preceding rationality builds on a sound base of reason, then they are able to gain and will store more rational memories (providing a chain reaction of emotional irrationality does not occur due to the rejections of their rationality by society, we have natural herd instincts after all)

But it is still just a ratio, everyone will have stored irrational memories. The only way to create a perfect buddha would be to remove the irrational memories from long term memory, which is probably not possible.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/3/04 12:40 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 329

(2/3/04 12:41 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

Cassiopeiae wrote:

Quote:

---

No where have I read anything about the "almost" perfect Buddha.

---

Imagine a person one moment before they become perfect (what I call a "Buddha"). At that moment they are "almost" a perfect Buddha. They are 99.99 percent perfect, but not 100% percent.

But what is this almost perfect person lacking that prevents them from being a perfect Buddha? It is nothing major. It is not as though a light were all of a sudden turned on and they crossed-over to the other side. Such a person is already on the other side. They are not in need of any enlightening.

All of the major realizations, or enlightenments, of a Buddha were made long ago back in the early bodhisattva stages.

Quote:

---

It has been said (in the reading of the explanation of the Four Noble Truths) that while in physical form, a person can not know everything of Buddha nature. Basically, until death and ascension into the heavens.

---

Can you find this passage and quote from it, or refer us to where it is exactly. It would be interesting to examine it further.

It should be remembered that a fully enlightened Buddha is still in physical form.

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 30(2/3/04 1:01 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> an unenlightened person is either a living being or a bodhisattva, the bodhisattva because he choses to be unenlightened and a living being because he has does not understand buddha nature and continues to undergo life and death the buddha was not a living being although he appeared in the world .... to enlighten living beings                                                                                                                                                                            |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 31(2/3/04 1:33 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> the true appearance has no appearance and yet there is nothing left without an appearance. If you say it has no appearance, everything thereupon appears. Thus it is the true appearance. everything that has an appearance is false, if while in the midst of appearances, you can understand they have no appearance, then you see the buddha death/life are appearances therefore false and must be looked at as such to understand, buddha is an appearance therefore false, buddha nature is the unseen |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2179(2/3/04 1:36 pm)Reply  | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> Sal, it is a very peculiar thing that you have gone buddhish overnight.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 32(2/3/04 1:38 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> lol yes it is hahahaha what the hell came over me i wonder                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 239

(2/3/04 3:29 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: But what is this almost perfect person lacking that prevents them from being a perfect Buddha? It is nothing major. It is not as though a light were all of a sudden turned on and they crossed-over to the other side. Such a person is already on the other side. They are not in need of any enlightening.

All of the major realizations, or enlightenments, of a Buddha were made long ago back in the early bodhisattva stages.

---

A person on the verge of Buddhahood could be lacking many things, all of which are significant, for they are the reason the person is not perfect. It could be they are arrogant, still have attachments, or any number of things dealing with the Myriad Practices, the Six Paramitas or the numerous precepts. Enlightenment, as far as this text portrays is not just about realization, but application and the perfection thereof.

Quote:

---

Kevin: Can you find this passage and quote from it, or refer us to where it is exactly. It would be interesting to examine it further.

---

Sorry about that...the Vajra Sutra, I was mistaken on the reference, i think this is also referenced in the Shurangama Sutra, though I cannot locate it at the moment.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 330

(2/3/04 3:37 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

cassiopeiae wrote:

Quote:

---

A person on the verge of Buddhahood could be lacking many things, all of which are significant, for they are the reason the person is not perfect. It could be they are arrogant, still have attachments, or any number of things dealing with the Myriad Practices, the Six Paramitas or the numerous precepts.

Enlightenment, as far as this text portrays is not just about realization, but application and the perfection thereof.

---

The ten stages of the bodhisattva are when everything is perfected. All major attachments are left behind by the first bodhisattva stage. By the time of the 7th bodhisattva stage, all six paramitas have been perfected, and there is only minor cleaning up to do.

Some traditions call bodhisattvas "Buddhas", given that the attainment of full Buddhahood is so difficult that possibly no-one has ever achieved it.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 240

(2/3/04 3:46 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: The ten stages of the bodhisattva are when everything is perfected. All major attachments are left behind by the first bodhisattva stage. By the time of the 7th bodhisattva stage, all six paramitas have been perfected, and there is only minor cleaning up to do.

---

I cannot argue with that, considering I am new to Buddhism, but may bring this back up at a later date :-)

Quote:

---

Kevin: Some traditions call bodhisattvas "Buddhas", given that the attainment of full Buddhahood is so difficult that possibly no-one has ever achieved it.

---

This is irrelevant, as far as what certain traditions call bodhisattvas. And I can accept that it is impossible to determine if true Buddhahood has ever been achieved.

So...in relation to why an enlightened person would like to review this text... care to take a jab at why you think or don't think this particular Sutra is so important?

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

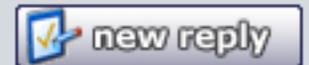

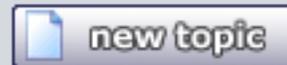

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Shurangama Sutra

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 330(2/3/04 3:48 pm)Reply  | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> silentsal wrote: Quote: <hr/> an unenlightened person is either a living being or a bodhisattva, the bodhisattva because he choses to be unenlightened and a living being because he has does not understand buddha nature and continues to undergo life and death the buddha was not a living being although he appeared in the world .... to enlighten living beings <hr/> Silentsal, I think you've been reading too many popular Buddhism books! |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 34(2/3/04 3:53 pm)Reply                                                                                   | Re: Shurangama Sutra <hr/> lol well how many can it be, i just started tonight?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 806
(2/3/04 6:48 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Hsuan Hsu said 1978 about the Shurangama Sutra:

"The Shurangama Sutra is an authentic, not a counterfeit, Sutra. If I am mistaken, then I vow to fall into the Hell of Pulling Tongues to undergo uninterrupted suffering. Today (the seventeenth day of the eleventh lunar month) is Amitabha Buddha's birthday. I shall now make a vow regarding the Shurangama Sutra's authenticity before the Buddhas of the ten directions.

Recently, some Ph.D.'s and scholars have criticized the Shurangama Sutra. They claim it was invented by later generations and not spoken by Shakyamuni Buddha. They have spread this rumor and tried to destroy this Sutra, causing Buddhists who lack true understanding to doubt. These people, who stir up a fuss by repeating what others say, are truly pathetic."

(www.buddhistinformation.com)

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 331
(2/3/04 8:24 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Recently, some Ph.D.'s and scholars have criticized the Shurangama Sutra. They claim it was invented by later generations and not spoken by Shakyamuni Buddha.

---

"Ph.D.'s and scholars have criticized the Shurangama Sutra" . . . are you kidding me?

This sutra is without doubt the word of the Buddha - though it may not have been the same Buddha who authored the other sutras.

However, some people believe that the Buddha has taken human form to create all the religious scriptures on earth, and has compassionately vowed to continue to do so for all time.

Edited by: ksolway at: 2/3/04 10:12 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 806
(2/3/04 10:19 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Kevin,

The Buddha has authored nothing.

Although the Shurangama Sutra may be a somewhat esoteric piece of scripture (for the non-Chinese world anyway), its authenticity is not in question here. I quoted Hsuan Hua to illustrate how he thinks about the sutra. I must add that I just knew about Hsuan Hua when you quoted some of his commentaries recently on Genius. Here is another Hsuan Hua quote that I found in his autobiography:

"There are five main sources of kindness we should repay, namely: heaven, earth, the national leader, our parents, and our teachers. Living in this world, I am sheltered by the heavens and supported by the earth. To repay their kindness, I made three bows to heaven and three to earth. I also made three bows to the national leader to repay his kindness. In monarchic times the Chinese people considered themselves indebted to the emperor, and this idea carried into the era of the Republic."

More about him can be read at the Gold Buddha Monastery's Website. The obvious question for me is: why the heck are you quoting this guy? I remember that you and David have previously criticized dogmatic insistence on canonical texts. You have criticized people for being narrow-minded. Now here comes a Chinese Buddhist called Hsuan Hua, a prime example of a dogmatic Buddhist patriarch. He is the Chinese equivalent of a redneck bible banger. And you guys are quoting him side by side with the great Taoist and Buddhist masters as if he was boundless wisdom himself!

I can only presume that you do this for the sake of creating a misogynic argument and attach the idea of female inferiority to certain interpretations of Buddhism. I perceive this as an inconsistency and I perceive this inconsistency as dishonesty. Please correct me if I am wrong.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 331

(2/3/04 11:18 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

The Buddha has authored nothing.

---

You don't know that. Buddhas can be in all sorts of places authoring all sorts of things. But saying that the Buddha "authors" things is just a figure of speech.

Quote:

---

"There are five main sources of kindness we should repay, namely: heaven, earth, the national leader, our parents, and our teachers. Living in this world, I am sheltered by the heavens and supported by the earth. To repay their kindness, I made three bows to heaven and three to earth. I also made three bows to the national leader to repay his kindness. In monarchic times the Chinese people considered themselves indebted to the emperor, and this idea carried into the era of the Republic."
- Hsuan Hua

---

This is standard Buddhist talk. I've heard a lot worse.

Quote:

---

The obvious question for me is: why the heck are you quoting this guy?

---

He may have many faults, and he may be quite traditional, but as far as traditional Buddhist teachers go, he's pretty good.

Quote:

---

He is the Chinese equivalent of a redneck bible banger.

---

If you told him that you had found a way to enlightenment without reading any scriptures, and without doing any rituals, and without following any guru, I don't think he would criticize you for it. He would congratulate you. That would make him very different from a "redneck bible banger".

Quote:

---

I can only presume that you do this for the sake of creating a misogynic argument . . .

---

I, too, first heard of Hsuan Hua through his writings on women, and his commentary on the "Earthstore Bodhisattva Sutra". That impressed me right from the start. So I looked at all his other teachings, and I was again impressed that so many of his teachings are freely available on the web, and not copyrighted by Buddhist publishing houses. On the whole, he comes across a quite a reasonable man.

From what I know of him I hold him to have achieved the category "pre-sage". Ie, not exactly a sage, but you can still learn a lot from him.

Here are some interesting snippets from "Questions and Answers":

Q: Will I die from hunger or cold when I become old?

A: What a pathetic way of thinking!

Q: I have a dog, I really like. . .

A: Do you really have to be that intimate with the dog to help it?

Q: How come both believers and non-believers of Buddhas are all Buddhists?

A: Because no one is beyond [the principles of] Buddhism.

Q: What is true giving?

A: It's to give up what we cannot give up. That's true giving.

Q: Why does the Master look down on the rich in particular?

A: Because the amount of money you have represents the amount of offense karma that has been following you.

Q: How can we be reborn in the Land of Ultimate Bliss?

A: Without false thinking, we are free from afflictions, hence free from suffering. Having absolutely no false thoughts whatever, we have become reborn in the Land of Ultimate Bliss.

Q: Exactly how do we avoid giving rise to even a single thought?

A: It's impossible. Although it's impossible to prevent a thought from surfacing, it is possible to keep a thought from ceasing. That which ceases will arise and that which arises will cease. If we can prevent a thought from ceasing, we can prevent it from arising. This is the principle behind meditation: by having not a single thought arise, one is a Buddha.

Q: The retribution for the number of marriages one has had shows up after death. Depending on the number of times one has been married, one will be sawed apart by a large chainsaw that many times. What's so bad about being split apart from head to toe?

A: When you are split into several pieces, your spirit will have a hard time regrouping. You may not have the human body again in billions and billions of eons. Your nature becomes transformed and your spirit disintegrated so that you are practically like a grass or tree, an insentient plant. It's difficult to become a sentient being once one has dismembered one's inherent nature.

Q: Why do people gossip?

A: Because they're stupid.

Q: Will the Master please bless everybody?

A: I did it a long time ago, you just didn't know about it

Q: I would really like to have a pet dog, is that okay?

A: You can own whatever you want to become in the future!

Q: May I ask about how my future will turn out?

A: Ask yourself whether you're compassionate. There's no need to inquire about your future.

Q: If Bodhisattvas save all living beings, why are there so many living beings left?

A: Bodhisattvas save living beings with whom they have affinities.

Q: The stairs to my house head straight for our main entrance, is that bad?

A: Don't be silly.

Q: What is the meaning of life?

A: Death.

Q: What are the advantages to reciting Sutras?

A: There's not much advantage to reciting Sutras. It takes a lot of energy, time and effort. People, don't be so foolish! Advantages that you can see are not real. Anything that has a characteristic is illusory and false. Any tangible advantage cannot be a plus. What are intangible advantages? Every time you recite a Sutra, you cleanse your self-nature and enhance your wisdom. What is invisible to the eye is honest advantage. Superficialities are visible. This is an explanation for the importance of Sutra recitations.

Q : Master, what should I do? My grandson died.

A : Birth and death are the same!

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 337

(2/4/04 5:25 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Could you explain this, Kevin? I've never heard of any of this. What is "mental dimness", "dull emptiness" and "darkness"? What is the "initial thought of ignorance"? Why is "dull emptiness" like empty space in a dream-world?

In that third paragraph, well I have no idea what's going on there in that first sentence. "Ignorance conditions activity": does that mean ignorance causes activity or ignorance affects activity or what? I think I will understand the rest of it.

Edit: "Seeing Is Not Lost" is the section title.

Quote:

---

Sutra:

“Mental dimness turns into dull emptiness. This emptiness, in the dimness, unites with darkness to become form.”

Commentary:

“Mental dimness turns into dull emptiness.” Originally the wonderful bright mind is devoid of awakening or confusion, so why do we suddenly “lose” the essence of our self-nature? It is due to the initial thought of ignorance, here referred to as “mental dimness,” which obscures True Emptiness and changes it into dull emptiness. This dull emptiness is like the empty space appearing in a dream-world. This is the Appearance of Karma, the first of the Three Subtle Appearances.

“This emptiness, in the dimness, unites with darkness to become form -- the form of darkness.” This is also the beginning of the doctrine of the Twelve Causal Conditions: ignorance conditions activity. The dull emptiness, the deluded mind, based as it is in ignorance now, turns the inherent light of wisdom into the falseness of subjective perception. This is the Appearance of Turning, the second of the Three Subtle Appearances. Out of longing for objects of perception, since in the beginning the Appearance of Karma is not visible, the subjective seeing stares long and hard until the deluded mind gives rise to form as its projection and manifestation. Just as in the dream-world, the dullminded dreamer often experiences the existence of a dream-body, a dream-mind, and the illusory environment in which they find themselves, including mirage-like mountains, waters, and the like. This is the Appearance of Manifestation, the third of the Three Subtle appearances.

---

Edited by: MGregory at: 2/4/04 5:32 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 335

(2/4/04 6:36 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Could you explain this, Kevin? I've never heard of any of this. What is "mental dimness", "dull emptiness" and "darkness"? What is the "initial thought of ignorance"? Why is "dull emptiness" like empty space in a dream-world?

---

Well, I'll have a go at explaining them:

"Mental dimness" is "the initial thought of ignorance", or, in other words, the first ignorant thought.

"True emptiness" is Reality unobscured by delusions, while "dull emptiness" is Reality obscured by delusions - like how clouds can obscure the moon.

Next: "This dull emptiness is like the empty space appearing in a dream-world"

I'm not sure what he means exactly by "empty space appearing in a dream world". All the same, it would feel lonely, soulless, hollow, and dark, at the same time as not being real. That's what life is like for an ignorant person.

"Darkness" refers to ignorance - the opposite of enlightenment.

Quote:

---

In that third paragraph, well I have no idea what's going on there in that first sentence. "Ignorance conditions activity": does that mean ignorance causes activity or ignorance affects activity or what? I think I will understand the rest of it.

---

"Ignorance conditions activity" would mean something like ignorance giving rise to gain and loss, life and death (deluded notions of), happiness and suffering, etc.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 338
(2/4/04 7:47 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Well, I'll have a go at explaining them:

---

Thanks. I was hoping you'd be up for the challenge. I think I understand it, looking at it in context. It's just explaining how the bright true mind was never lost. I'm just not real clear on the details of how that occurred.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 340
(2/5/04 10:43 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Sutra:

“Ananda, observe all these transitory characteristics as I now return each to its place of origin. What are the basic origins? Ananda, among all these transitions, the ‘light’ returns to the sun. Why? Without the sun there is no light; therefore the reason for light belongs with the sun, and so it can be returned to the sun.

---

When he says "light can be returned to the sun", he just means that light can be causally followed back to the sun, right? He's just saying that light is caused by the sun. That is a really strange way to put it, but I can't see any other way to interpret that.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 335
(2/6/04 1:47 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Sutra: “Ananda, observe all these transitory characteristics as I now return each to its place of origin. What are the basic origins? Ananda, among all these transitions, the ‘light’ returns to the sun. Why? Without the sun there is no light; therefore the reason for light belongs with the sun, and so it can be returned to the sun.

M: When he says "light can be returned to the sun", he just means that light can be causally followed back to the sun, right? He's just saying that light is caused by the sun. That is a really strange way to put it, but I can't see any other way to interpret that.

---

Yes, that seems to be what it's saying. All things can be traced back to a source from which they emanated.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 341
(2/7/04 7:06 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

"What changes will become extinct, but what does not change is fundamentally free of production and extinction. How can it be subject to your birth and death? Furthermore, why bring up what Maskari Goshaliputra and the others say: that after the death of this body there is total extinction?"

The king heard these words, believed them, and realized that when the life of this body is finished, there will be rebirth. He and the entire great assembly were greatly delighted at having obtained what they had never had before.

---

Surely that line is fake.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 339
(2/7/04 3:57 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

Sutra: "What changes will become extinct, but what does not change is fundamentally free of production and extinction. How can it be subject to your birth and death? Furthermore, why bring up what Maskari Goshaliputra and the others say: that after the death of this body there is total extinction?"

. . . The king heard these words, believed them, and realized that when the life of this body is finished, there will be rebirth.

Matt: Surely that line is fake.

---

If there is no birth and death, what can "rebirth" mean?

It only means "effects". The stream of cause and effect does not die, and nor is it born.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 344
(2/8/04 8:02 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

It makes sense if you think of it like that, but I don't think that's what that line is describing as the king's belief. But, whatever, I have a more important objection about the argument that the mind is not inside the body:

Quote:

---

The Buddha: "Ananda, I now ask you: at the time of your initial resolve, which arose in response to the Tathagata's thirty-two characteristics, what was it that saw those characteristics and who delighted in them?"

Ananda said to the Buddha, "World Honored One, this is the way I experienced the delight: I used my mind and eyes. Because my eyes saw the Tathagata's outstanding characteristics, my mind gave rise to delight. That is why I became resolved and wished to removed myself from birth and death."

The Buddha said to Ananda, "It is as you say, that experience of delight actually occurs because of your mind and eyes. If you do not know where your mind and eyes are, you will not be able to conquer the wearisome dust.

"For example, when a king's country is invaded by thieves and he sends out his troops to suppress and banish them, the troops must know where the thieves are.

"It is the fault of your mind and eyes that you flow and turn. I am now asking you specifically about your mind and eyes: where are they now?"

Ananda said to the Buddha, "World Honored One, all the ten kinds of living beings in the world alike maintain that the conscious mind dwells within the body; and as I regard the Tathagata's blue lotus-flower eyes, they too are on the Buddha's face.

"I now observe that these prominent organs, four kinds of defiling objects, are on my face, and so, too, my conscious mind actually is within my body."

The Buddha said to Ananda, "You are now sitting in the Tathagata's lecture hall looking at the Jeta Grove. Where is it at present?"

"World Honored One, this great many-storied pure lecture hall is in the Garden of the Benefactor of the Solitary. At present the Jeta Grove is in fact outside the hall."

"Ananda, as you are now in the hall, what do you see first?"

"World Honored One, here in the hall I first see the Tathagata, next I see the great assembly, and from there, as I gaze outward, I see the grove and garden."

"Ananda, why it is you are able to see the grove and the garden as you look at them?"

"World Honored One, since the doors and windows of this great lecture hall have been thrown open wide, I can be in the hall and see into the distance."

The Buddha said to Ananda, "It is as you say. When one is in the lecture hall and the doors and windows are open wide, one can see far into the garden and grove. Could there be someone in the hall who does not see the Tathagata and yet sees outside the hall?"

Ananda answered: "World Honored One, to be in the hall and not see the Tathagata, and yet see the grove and fountains is impossible."

"Ananda, you are like that too.

"Your mind is capable of understanding everything thoroughly. Now if your present mind, which thoroughly understands everything, were in your body, then you should be aware first of what is inside your body. Can there be living beings who first see inside their bodies before they observe things outside?"

"Even if you cannot see your heart, liver, spleen, and stomach, still, the growing of your nails and hair, the twist of your sinews, and the throb of your pulse should be clearly understood. Why don't you perceive these things? If you cannot perceive what is inside at all, how can you perceive what is outside?

"Therefore you should know that you state the impossible when you say that the aware and knowing mind is in the body."

---

Even if the mind does understand and is aware of everything, which is obviously debatable, it doesn't follow that it can see everything, and it doesn't follow that it can see without the eyes, which are on the face, and presumably not inside the body.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 346

(2/8/04 9:17 pm)

Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Matt wrote:

Quote:

---

Even if the mind does understand and is aware of everything, which is obviously debatable, it doesn't follow that it can see everything, and it doesn't follow that it can see without the eyes, which are on the face, and presumably not inside the body.

---

The Buddha is saying that all things are apprehended logically by the mind. The mind is able to understand, and be aware of all things logically. This is the same as Weininger's teaching that logic takes a person beyond the personal, beyond time, and beyond space, etc.

This also relates to why we place so much emphasis on the "A=A" idea (ie, identity, the essence of logic). It can understand anything thoroughly - as spoken of in the sutra.

The kind of seeing referred to is an inner-seeing. Logic is not dependent, so to speak, on the physical eyes, and the physical face. It is of the "noumenon".

When the Buddha says, "Therefore you should know that you state the impossible when you say that the aware and knowing mind is in the body.", he means that logic has a kind of independent existence, not prone to the changes of the body, or even the errors of the senses, or other physical things.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 345
(2/8/04 10:57 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

When you think of logic with your logic is it really logic that you are thinking of?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 347
(2/8/04 11:21 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

Quote:

---

When you think of logic with your logic is it really logic that you are thinking of?

---

One's logic defines what logic is.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 346
(2/8/04 11:58 pm)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

---

"Noumenon" is Kantian for a mental object, right? Something experienced that does not come directly from the senses?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 348
(2/9/04 3:21 am)
Reply

Re: Shurangama Sutra

Quote:

"Noumenon" is Kantian for a mental object, right? Something experienced that does not come directly from the senses?

More or less.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Spiritual advancement

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 245(1/7/04 9:25 pm)Reply |  Spiritual advancement <hr/> Leo wrote: Quote: <hr/> Now I'd like to put out the thought: What is anyone doing to try and determine why knowledge, in this case true knowledge, 'pervades' us, our minds, at different rates and with varying degrees of holding power? And what can be done to fill our minds more quickly and more firmly. Seems to me that this is, or ought to be, AS important to our goals here as is the comprehension of that knowledge in the first place. I dont see much emphasis placed here, not here in these discussions, not in books, not in the world. Maybe this is something worth chatting about. <hr/> I think this is something dealt with quite a lot, and is the main purpose behind the existence of this forum. The longer a person spends in the vicinity of truth, and truthful people, the | more they will naturally become filled with truth themselves - just like a person walking through the fog becomes saturated, without effort.

Different people progress at differing rates depending on how much they enjoy truthful things. And how much people enjoy truthful things depends on a lot of things, like their IQ (a person with an IQ of 50 probably doesn't enjoy reasoning all that much, because they make too many mistakes), or childhood experiences (if you are severely punished by your peers for thinking, or being truthful, then you probably won't enjoy thinking or being truthful).

These concerns were uppermost in my thinking when I wrote "Poison for the Heart" and put together "The Thinking Man's Minefield". These are specifically designed to be, above all, enjoyable, stimulating, and memorable, so there are all kinds of different writings, humour, poetry, satire, irony, aphorisms, essays, quotations, etc. All these methods help truth to "soak" into the mind of the reader, without any effort on their part.

Apart from such things, there's not much more you can do, other than by setting a good example, and living truthfully yourself, as a true individual.

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 262
(1/7/04 10:05 pm)
Reply

 Re: Spiritual advancement

---

Hm, "Not much emphasis placed" etc. I don't think so, it highly depends on what books you read, whom people you talk to etc.
"... why knowledge, in this case true knowledge, 'pervades' us, our minds, at different rates and with varying degrees of holding power?"
Because we are not equal. At a degree, I agree with Kevin -- different people progress at different rates. The problem is that nowadays we see more of a digression or decline. From my experience, people can spend any amount of time in the vicinity of a 'truthful' man without even "registering" a vicinity. Or, should they register it, they usually protest against it.

(Here, I use the word "vicinity" not just in the sense of being spatially close to someone. You can also get 'close to' someone in a more subtle way: reading his writings, hearing him speaking etc.)

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2037
(1/7/04 11:55 pm)
Reply

 ---

---

Cracks me up!

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 219
(1/8/04 11:22 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Spiritual advancement

---

Now I'd like to put out the thought: What is anyone doing to try and determine why knowledge, in this case true knowledge, 'pervades' us, our minds, at different rates and with varying degrees of holding power? And what can be done to fill our minds more quickly and more firmly.

Seems to me that this is, or ought to be, AS important to our goals here as is the comprehension of that knowledge in the first place.

I dont see much emphasis placed here, not here in these discussions, not in books, not in the world.

I think that the more an enlightened person reasons (thinks, contemplates) through their understanding of reality, and integrates their conclusions into the full spectrum of their experiences (which of course includes their contemplations), the more quickly they will develop their enlightenment. Simple as that. Eat, breath, shit enlightened understanding.

Which leads to the most significant point of all; how strong is your will to do the above?

My will makes me stand under a waterfall rather than wander through a fog. Sure, that sounds like an ego driven statement, and in some respects it is, but that's what it's all about - using the remnants of one's ego most effectively to pursue enlightenment. To attempt to squash or deny that ego is to circumvent the very process that one values.

Rhett

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 546
(1/8/04 1:29 pm)
Reply

 Re: Spiritual advancement

---

I think that the more an enlightened person reasons (thinks, contemplates) through their understanding of reality, and integrates their conclusions into the full spectrum of their experiences (which of course includes their contemplations), the more quickly they will develop their enlightenment. Simple as that. Eat, breath, shit enlightened understanding.

If a person is enlightened, there's no reason to develop any type of understanding. They have attained the understanding. Of course, they can learn to play the sitar, and learn to do yoga, and learn to think philosophically (haha)...but all of these things are learnings in the delusion, when enlightenment is 'out' of it!

You can't develop enlightenment.

Which leads to the most significant point of all; how strong is your will to do the above?

My will makes me stand under a waterfall rather than wander through a fog. Sure, that sounds like an ego driven statement, and in some respects it is, but that's what it's all about - using the remnants of one's ego most effectively to pursue enlightenment. To attempt to squash or deny that ego is to circumvent the very process that one values.

Well, it's good that you are driven. The ones that climb high mountains seem to fall the hardest...and a good fall is a great enlightenment. Best of luck, seeker.

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 315

(1/8/04 5:36 pm)

Reply

 secrets of spiritual advancement

---

Knowing Kevin as i do, I can hardly believe he apparently has this bad habit, this tendency to answer questions of his own making (if you can get him to answer questions at all!) instead of questions that are put to him, or put to the group.

Over the years i've noticed again and again an evasive way about him, and though this can sometimes be scored as a kind of wise technique there were times when that explanation was certainly not the one.

When i went to Australia i learned first hand that this secretive and dodgy nature was for real and not just appearance ;), and not with Kevin alone i might add.

But then i dont think it will come as a suprise to anyone who's been paying attention here that these men come across alot more enlightened here in the land of measured words than they really are in real life, keeping in mind, too, that opportunity to observe was kept to a minimum and somewhat controlled during my visit.

Anyway, if you were to ask one of these teachers what they did yesterday they might say something vague like "keeping my mind on God", and thats it, and thats how they like it to be it seems, to keep you ignorant as to the actual activity or method or approach etc they may be employing in the realm of their philosophical lives.

There's a part of them that selfishly desires to keep their enlightenment to themselves, and also to hide their weaknesses (for the good of Wisdom, let it be said!). Sure they will spell out again and again all of the pertinent intellectual details, and they rarely miss on an opportunity to show everyone (but Marsha, and sometimes other women) how unreasonable their thinking is, (especially Danny is known for this); but do any one of you have a good picture in your minds of what things look(ed) like, and how things go(went) on their end in any respect at all?? (besides visualizing three guys staring for hours at their computer displays).

Gotta stop there...

Leo

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 222
(1/9/04 9:50 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: secrets of spiritual advancement

---

Over the years i've noticed again and again an evasive way about him, and though this can sometimes be scored as a kind of wise technique there were times when that explanation was certainly not the one.

By saying things that go over your head he's potentially impressing upon you (at the very least) your need to further your understanding.

Anyway, if you were to ask one of these teachers what they did yesterday they might say something vague like "keeping my mind on God", and that's it, and that's how they like it to be it seems, to keep you ignorant as to the actual activity or method or approach etc they may be employing in the realm of their philosophical lives.

Kevin's response actually reflects deep wisdom. That you can't see it ties in with my previous point.

You're trying to understand enlightenment in a finite sense. It's essence is infinite, only it's expression is finite.

It's expression will not reveal it's essence to the deluded eye, so there is no fundamental benefit in Kevin detailing his finite experiences.

You've still got a lot of femininity in your thinking Leo.

There's a part of them that selfishly desires to keep their enlightenment to themselves, and also to hide their weaknesses (for the good of Wisdom, let it be said!).

Wow, selfishness? All that is within 'theabsolute.net' doesn't allay that notion?

I don't want to speak for Kevin etc, but i'd say that there is a conundrum - in that by making a point of their limitations they might compromise the spread of wisdom, and yet by not revealing them they could also do the same. It's a tough call and situation dependent.

Personally, i value absolute openness, absolute valuing of perfection, and absolute attainment of perfection. The former two are what you're getting from me at present.

do any one of you have a good picture in your minds of what things look (ed) like, and how things go(went) on their end in any respect at all?? (besides visualizing three guys staring for hours at their computer displays).

I think your actions are often a cause that limit rather than foster the expression of that.

Rhett

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1601
(1/9/04 1:29 pm)
Reply

 Re: secrets of spiritual advancement

---

Leo crapped on quite a bit:

Quote:

---

Knowing Kevin as i do,

---

You barely know Kevin at all, Leo. You have a bad habit of filling in the gaps of your knowledge with what is a very overactive imagination.

Quote:

---

I can hardly believe he apparently has this bad habit, this tendency to answer questions of his own making (if you can get him to answer questions at all!) instead of questions that are put to him, or put to the group.

---

You have long since had a rather tedious egotistical need for others to tell you exactly what you want to hear. No such obligation exists. Kevin is not obliged to answer your "questions" in any way other than as he sees fit. Are you at all aware of how often over the last couple of years you have fobbed off questions put to you with that "Why should I do all your thinking for you?" bullcrap? Has it occurred to you that Kevin might expect you to work certain things out for yourself?

Quote:

---

When i went to Australia i learned first hand that this secretive and dodgy nature was for real and not just appearance ;), and not with Kevin alone i might add.

But then i dont think it will come as a suprise to anyone who's been paying attention here that these men come across alot more enlightened here in the land of measured words than they really are in real life, keeping in mind, too, that opportunity to observe was kept to a minimum and somewhat controlled during my visit.

---

I for one am pretty well sick to death of your snide and theatrical insinuations about what you think you know on this score. Yes, there indeed was some calculated evasion of you when you were here. But, at the risk of hurting your feelings, that was entirely because of your own personality, which was, at times, unbearably eccentric.

Quote:

---

Anyway, if you were to ask one of these teachers what they did yesterday they might say something vague like "keeping my mind on God", and that's it, and that's how they like it to be it seems, to keep you ignorant as to the actual activity or method or approach etc they may be employing in the realm of their philosophical lives.

---

I have no problem with telling you what I did yesterday, providing your motivation for wanting to know is pure, and unfortunately it quite evidently isn't. However, I spent my morning attempting to get the display adaptor drivers to work on this old computer - and failed miserably. I spent most of the afternoon shopping and the rest of it at the local pub quietly contemplating the issue of how to get my other computer fixed and when I could afford to do it. I also spent a bit of that pub time perving on an especially sexy barmaid. God didn't really get much of a look-in in my day, at least not directly.

Quote:

---

There's a part of them that selfishly desires to keep their enlightenment to themselves, and also to hide their weaknesses (for the good of Wisdom, let it be said!).

---

That claim is too absurd for words.

Quote:

---

Sure they will spell out again and again all of the pertinent intellectual details, and they rarely miss on an opportunity to show everyone (but Marsha, and sometimes other women) how unreasonable their thinking is, (especially Danny is known for this);

---

You might want to elaborate on this claim, Leo. If you don't I will be forced to look very dimly upon it.

Quote:

---

but do any one of you have a good picture in your minds of what things look(ed) like, and how things go(went) on their end in any respect at all?? (besides visualizing three guys staring for hours at their computer displays).

---

What, do you think some people have some kind of cartoonish view of who we are? If they do that is their problem, and an expression of their naivette. I rather doubt that many people have any such perspective.

Dan Rowden

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1223
(1/10/04 8:18 am)
Reply

 spiritual advancement

---

Quote:

---

You've still got a lot of femininity in your thinking Leo.

---

That was a kind way to put it.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 224
(1/10/04 11:51 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Spiritual advancement

---

I think that the more an enlightened person reasons (thinks, contemplates) throught their understanding of reality, and integrates their conclusions into the full spectrum of their experiences (which of course includes their contemplations), the more quickly they will develop their enlightenment. Simple as that. Eat, breath, shit enlightened understanding.

If a person is enlightened, there's no reason to develop any type of understanding. They have attained the understanding.

In the strictest sense yes, but you are presenting the person as being perfectly Enlightened. As far as i am aware, neither Kevin nor Leo claim that (nor myself), so your comments are not relevant to our discussion.

Whilst the definition and experience of Enlightenment is a one-stop shop, an empirical human being - based on wise mens investigations to date - spends quite some time in transition zones, which are often referred to as enlightenment. It is naive to think that one can suddenly become perfectly Enlightened.

Of course, they can learn to play the sitar, and learn to do yoga, and learn to think philosophically (haha)...but all of these things are learnings in the delusion, when enlightenment is 'out' of it!

You've contradicted yourself here. You are talking about an enlightened person living their life in a delusion, at the same time as being 'out' of it. A perfectly enlightened person can live their life doing any manner of things without being delusional in the slightest.

I choose to develop my philosophical understanding in order to further my 'enlightenment' and to enable me to help others. What's your purpose in life?

Which leads to the most significant point of all; how strong is your will to do the above?

My will makes me stand under a waterfall rather than wander through a fog. Sure, that sounds like an ego driven statement, and in some respects it is, but that's what it's all about - using the remnants of one's ego most effectively to pursue enlightenment. To attempt to squash or deny that ego is to circumvent the very process that one values.

Well, it's good that you are driven. The ones that climb high mountains seem to fall the hardest...and a good fall is a great enlightenment. Best of luck, seeker.

The main potential danger in your current attachment to stupidity is if your ego clutches at it so strongly that you end up running away from those that challenge it, to fester in your ignorance.

Rhett

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 556

(1/10/04 12:20 pm)

Reply

 ...

---

In the strictest sense yes, but you are presenting the person as being perfectly Enlightened. As far as i am aware, neither Kevin nor Leo claim that (nor myself), so your comments are not relevant to our discussion.

It's insane to make another separation between "perfect enlightenment" and "enlightenment". There is only one enlightenment, and if it isn't perfect enlightenment, it isn't enlightenment at all.

Whilst the definition and experience of Enlightenment is a one-stop shop, an empirical human being - based on wise mens investigations to date - spends quite some time in transition zones, which are often referred to as enlightenment. It is naive to think that one can suddenly become perfectly Enlightened.

Those 'transition zones' are just changing states, called satori or samadhi. Why is it naive to think that a person can suddenly become perfectly enlightened? It's naive to call yourself enlightened if you don't know the Truth, and live in it.

You've contradicted yourself here. You are talking about an enlightened person living their life in a delusion, at the same time as being 'out' of it. A perfectly enlightened person can live their life doing any manner of things without being delusional in the slightest.

No. A perfectly enlightened person has to think dualistically to do anything.

I choose to develop my philosophical understanding in order to further my 'enlightenment' and to enable me to help others. What's your purpose in life?

Help people with what, and why? Why is that a worthwhile life? Don't the motivations to do such a thing, contradict Truth itself? (being without 'good' or 'bad') Isn't your purpose kind of purposeless?

The purpose of my life is to live it. It's stupid, and elementary, and feminine, but 'living' includes potential for anything. Basically, I don't sink into the quicksand of having to maintain a purpose. I do things without purpose, because there isn't a purpose. I do things with purpose, because I can't do anything without having a cause for doing it.

If you were actually enlightened, you'd know how meaningless the consciousness of Truth is!

The main potential danger in your current attachment to stupidity is if your ego clutches at it so strongly that you end up running away from those that challenge it, to fester in your ignorance.

Challenge it then! Don't sit there and insult me, in a reaction to what I said, Rhett. Work on actually making good points, and maybe your perception of my attachment to stupidity will fade. Your perception of egos, and ignorance, and enlightenment.

Your perception.

Catching my drift?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 228
(1/10/04 1:27 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ...

---

In the strictest sense yes, but you are presenting the person as being perfectly Enlightened. As far as i am aware, neither Kevin nor Leo claim that (nor myself), so your comments are not relevant to our discussion.

It's insane to make another separation between "perfect enlightenment" and "enlightenment". There is only one enlightenment, and if it isn't perfect enlightenment, it isn't enlightenment at all.

When i said 'perfectly enlightened' i was referring to the permanent experience of enlightenment. I shall henceforth refer to it simply as Perfection. My apologies for confusion.

Whilst the definition and experience of Enlightenment is a one-stop shop, an empirical human being - based on wise mens investigations to date - spends quite some time in transition zones, which are often referred to as enlightenment. It is naive to think that one can suddenly become perfectly Enlightened.

Those 'transition zones' are just changing states, called satori or samadhi. Why is it naive to think that a person can suddenly become perfectly enlightened? It's naive to call yourself enlightened if you don't know the Truth, and live in it.

Refer above.

You've contradicted yourself here. You are talking about an enlightened person living their life in a delusion, at the same time as being 'out' of it. A perfectly enlightened person can live their life doing any manner of things without being delusional in the slightest.

No. A perfectly enlightened person has to think dualistically to do anything.

Sure, but that doesn't mean that they are deluded. This is a big error on your part. I might address this later when i have more time, but think about in the meantime, it's a crucial understanding, a pre-requisite for any kind of substantial enlightenment.

I choose to develop my philosophical understanding in order to further my 'enlightenment' and to enable me to help others. What's your purpose in life?

Help people with what, and why? Why is that a worthwhile life? Don't the motivations to do such a thing, contradict Truth itself? (being without 'good' or 'bad') Isn't your purpose kind of purposeless?

The purpose of my life is to live it. It's stupid, and elementary, and feminine, but 'living' includes potential for anything. Basically, I don't sink into the quicksand of having to maintain a purpose. I do things without purpose, because there isn't a purpose. I do things with purpose, because I can't do anything without having a cause for doing it.

If you were actually enlightened, you'd know how meaningless the consciousness of Truth is!

Oh dear, you're just a baby. When i have more time i'll come back.

The main potential danger in your current attachment to stupidity is if your ego clutches at it so strongly that you end up running away from those that challenge it, to fester in your ignorance.

Challenge it then! Don't sit there and insult me, in a reaction to what I said, Rhett. Work on actually making good points, and maybe your perception of my attachment to stupidity will fade. Your perception of egos, and ignorance, and enlightenment.

Your perception.

Catching my drift?

You've still got a big chunk of ego left. On occasion i may use it to keep shoving you along, particularly when, as is the current case, your ego tries to find an 'out'.

Rhett

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 560

(1/10/04 6:03 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

When i said 'perfectly enlightened' i was referring to the permanent experience of enlightenment. I shall henceforth refer to it simply as Perfection. My apologies for confusion.

There's no such thing as a permanent experience of enlightenment. You die. There IS only one enlightenment, and it is complete. Understanding of the enlightenment may develop, but that's only like understanding how to ride a bike or fly a plane. Enlightened wisdom isn't something that changes.

Refer above.

That doesn't answer my rhetorical question, Rhett.

Sure, but that doesn't mean that they are deluded. This is a big error on your part. I might address this later when i have more time, but think about in the meantime, it's a crucial understanding, a pre-requisite for any kind of substantial enlightenment.

I can understand if you were pressed for time, but I urge you to actually make a point when replying in the future. I like to see how this is a 'big error' on my part, and how it doesn't mean that they're deluded.

Oh dear, you're just a baby.

I'm not exactly a baby.

You've still got a big chunk of ego left. On occasion i may use it to keep shoving you along, particularly when, as is the current case, your ego tries to find an 'out'.

The ego isn't real, and it doesn't die when you attain enlightenment. There are no partial egos, either.

You can imagine an ego, and yourself using it as some sort of a broom or something, to shove me along some imaginary path towards some imaginary end. It's your choice to call that 'wisdom'.

I'm not looking for an escape either. There pretty much isn't any sort of escape.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 231
(1/11/04 11:44 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ...

---

When i said 'perfectly enlightened' i was referring to the permanent experience of enlightenment. I shall henceforth refer to it simply as Perfection. My apologies for confusion.

There's no such thing as a permanent experience of enlightenment. You die.

Permanent whilst you're alive, naturally. Whilst it's just a concept, it's worth discussing nevertheless. Enlightenment is not about simply denying the act of conceptualisation!

However, i can understand your current attempt to approach intellectualisation in the manner that you are, and it's an important step towards enlightenment. So you have my congratulations!

But you need to keep going. Have you studied the main texts that accompany this forum?

Sure, but that doesn't mean that they are deluded. This is a big error on your part. I might address this later when i have more time, but think about in the meantime, it's a crucial understanding, a pre-requisite for any kind of substantial enlightenment.

I can understand if you were pressed for time, but I urge you to actually make a point when replying in the future. I like to see how this is a 'big error' on my part, and how it doesn't mean that they're deluded.

It's a big topic and i'd like to give it serious attention, but am still pressed for time and would like to know whether you've studied 'Wisdom of the Infinite', and if so, how thoroughly?

You've still got a big chunk of ego left. On occasion i may use it to keep shoving you along, particularly when, as is the current case, your ego tries to find an 'out'.

The ego isn't real, and it doesn't die when you attain enlightenment.

What's your definition of ego? And if, as you say, it doesn't exist, then quite naturally it won't die when enlightenment is attained because it doesn't exist?!

Are you saying that people aren't under the delusion that they inherently exist?

There are no partial egos, either.

Depends on what you mean by 'partial ego', but i'll tentatively agree. However, most people have their thoughts *to a greater or lesser extent* affected by the poor thinking processes and emotions that are intimately entwined with their ego. For simplicity I occasionally use the term ego to include a number of concepts/states that are a product of it.

You can imagine an ego, and yourself using it as some sort of a broom or something, to shove me along some imaginary path towards some imaginary end.

It's your choice to call that 'wisdom'.

Yes. But if you reach that end it will be far more than an imagination...for you that is. I can never go beyond imagining it in you, but i can at least come across some good evidence to support your claim.

I'm not looking for an escape either. There pretty much isn't any sort of escape.

So you're claiming to have no ego left? That you have (permanently?) removed all vestige of self-delusion and it's attendant accompanyments, ie. suffering, frustration, boredom, anger, happiness, impetuoussness, all other emotion, etc...?

Rhett

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2046

(1/11/04 11:59 am)

Reply

 ----

---

The ego is not only imaginary! Be alone! See!

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 564

(1/12/04 2:24 am)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

Permanent whilst you're alive, naturally. Whilst it's just a concept, it's worth discussing nevertheless. Enlightenment is not about simply denying the act of conceptualisation!

Conceptualization is the tool an enlightened person uses to teach and to know surely that they're enlightened. Reason is infallible, but it's still conceptualization, and still an illusion.

However, i can understand your current attempt to approach intellectualisation in the manner that you are, and it's an important step towards enlightenment. So you have my congratulations!

But you need to keep going. Have you studied the main texts that accompany this forum?

Thanks for the congratulations. I've read some of the texts.

It's a big topic and i'd like to give it serious attention, but am still pressed for time and would like to know whether you've studied 'Wisdom of the Infinite', and if so, how thoroughly?

Alright. I've read it, and I could say that I've understood the points fairly thoroughly..but I didn't "study" it.

What's your definition of ego? And if, as you say, it doesn't exist, then quite naturally it won't die when enlightenment is attained because it doesn't exist?!

It's either false identification, or it's the part of a personality that's perceived as "cocky" or "arrogant". It does exist, because we can talk about it and define it; but it isn't real. I suppose you could say that if ego is defined as false identification, it could "die"...however 'false identification' is just imagination. Imagination doesn't die at enlightenment, and the potential to have false identifications doesn't die either.

Are you saying that people aren't under the delusion that they inherently exist?

I'm saying I'm not under the delusion that people are under the delusion that they inherently exist.

*Depends on what you mean by 'partial ego', but i'll tentatively agree. However, most people have their thoughts *to a greater or lesser extent* affected by the poor thinking processes and emotions that are intimately entwined with their ego. For simplicity I occasionally use the term ego to include a number of concepts/states that are a product of it.*

How about yourself, though? Why waste your time talking about other people's problems?

Yes. But if you reach that end it will be far more than an imagination...for you that is. I can never go beyond imagining it in you, but i can at least come across some good evidence to support your claim.

I agree completely.

So you're claiming to have no ego left? That you have (permanently?) removed all vestige of self-delusion and it's attendant accompanyments, ie. suffering, frustration, boredom, anger, happiness, impetuosity, all other emotion, etc...?

I'm claiming to have transcended all vestige of self-delusion and it's attendant accompaniments, ie. suffering, frustration, boredom, anger, happiness, impetuousness, all other emotion, etc. I haven't removed anything, really. Part of me has ego, part of me doesn't. I am able to 'go down' and experience all of these things, and I can 'go up' and experience none of them.

The idea of a perfective enlightenment is kind of absurd to me. It seems many people here think of it as an ideal state of mind, but it seems more binding than anything else. People think that a Buddha can't feel negative emotions. I think a Buddha that "can't" do something isn't really a Buddha at all.

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 316

(1/12/04 11:50 pm)

Reply

 Reply Re: secrets of spiritual advancement

---

I guess il take them in order, Rhett Hamilton wrote:

LB:

Over the years i've noticed again and again an evasive way about him, and though this can sometimes be scored as a kind of wise technique there were times when that explanation was certainly not the one.

By saying things that go over your head he's potentially impressing upon you (at the very least) your need to further your understanding.

lb:

OK, but im referring here to what is not said, instead of what is said. (keeping in mind that silience often speaks louder than words), Besides, chances are he does so for YOUR benefit, more so than mine.

LB:

Anyway, if you were to ask one of these teachers what they did yesterday they might say something vague like "keeping my mind on God", and thats it, and thats how they like it to be it seems, to keep you ignorant as to the actual activity or method or approach etc they may be employing in the realm of their philosophical lives.

Kevin's response actually reflects deep wisdom. That you can't see it ties in with my previous point.

LB: Oh, i can see it...

You're trying to understand enlightenment in a finite sense. It's essence is infinite, only it's expression is finite.

ok.

It's expression will not reveal it's essence to the deluded eye, so there is no fundamental benefit in Kevin detailing his finite experiences.

LB: Il adress this ahead...but i can say Kevin has mentioned practicing Zen meditation or some such thing once...

RH:

You've still got a lot of femininity in your thinking Leo.

LB: You dont have to tell me!

There'a a part of them that selfishly desires to keep their enlightenment to themselves, and also to hide their weaknesses (for the good of Wisdom, let it be said!).

Wow, selfishness? All that is within 'theabsolute.net' doesn't allay that notion?

LB: Do you believe everythng u read?

I don't want to speak for Kevin etc, but i'd say that there is a conundrum - in that by making a point of their limitations they might compromise the spread of wisdom, and yet by not revealing them they could also do the same. It's a tough call and situation dependent.

Personally, i value absolute openness, absolute valuing of perfection, and absolute attainment of perfection. The former two are what you're getting from me at present.

R U enlightened? have you said? didnt notice..

do any one of you have a good picture in your minds of what things look (ed) like, and how things go(went) on their end in any respect at all?? (besides visualizing three guys staring for hours at their computer displays).

I think your actions are often a cause that limit rather than foster the expression of that.

LB: Care to explain?

LEO

Rhett

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 317

(1/13/04 12:13 am)

Reply

 ok, il play along

---

drowden wrote:

Leo crapped on quite a bit:

Quote:

-----

Knowing Kevin as i do,

-----

You barely know Kevin at all, Leo. You have a bad habit of filling in the gaps of your knowledge with what is a very overactive imagination.

Quote:

-----

I can hardly believe he apparently has this bad habit, this tendency to answer questions of his own making (if you can get him to answer questions at all!) instead of questions that are put to him, or put to the group.

-----

You have long since had a rather tedious egotistical need for others to tell you exactly what you want to hear.

LB: Or so it seems.

Could it be, instead, that i anticipate your tendency to believe I have an "egotistical need for others to tell me exactly what I want to hear." ??

No such obligation exists. Kevin is not obliged to answer your "questions" in any way other than as he sees fit.

LB: No kidding, Sherlock.

Are you at all aware of how often over the last couple of years you have fobbed off questions put to you...

LB: Or so it seems.

Perhaps you could support your claim with hard evidence, how "often" was that anyway?

... with that "Why should I do all your thinking for you?" bullcrap?

LB: Sure, i recall making such a statement to you, but are you reading me right??

Has it occurred to you that Kevin might expect you to work certain things out for yourself?

LB: Has it occurred to you that i might expect Kevin to work some things out, too?

Leo

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 235
(1/13/04 10:19 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ...

---

Permanent whilst you're alive, naturally. Whilst it's just a concept, it's worth discussing nevertheless. Enlightenment is not about simply denying the act of conceptualisation!

Conceptualization is the tool an enlightened person uses to teach and to know surely that they're enlightened. Reason is infallible, but it's still conceptualization, and still an illusion.

What about when they pay the shopkeeper for their groceries? "That'll be 9 dollars and 55 cents". What then does the sage do, having given up all concepts outside of teaching?

However, i can understand your current attempt to approach intellectualisation in the manner that you are, and it's an important step towards enlightenment. So you have my congratulations!

But you need to keep going. Have you studied the main texts that accompany this forum?

Thanks for the congratulations.

You say that and yet claim to be enlightened? With what do you reference appreciation for my comment?

It's a big topic and i'd like to give it serious attention, but am still pressed for time and would like to know whether you've studied 'Wisdom of the Infinite', and if so, how thoroughly?

Alright. I've read it, and I could say that I've understood the points fairly thoroughly..but I didn't "study" it.

You could say it, but don't want to *really* say it? Is that perhaps because it's not *really* true, just like a number of things you've said to me? If you were Enlightened you would be able to read it and thoroughly understand each point quite clearly, and be able to communicate them to others.

Are you saying that people aren't under the delusion that they inherently exist?

I'm saying I'm not under the delusion that people are under the delusion that they inherently exist.

So when someone says something silly and becomes embarassed, they don't think they exist as a discrete entity?

How about yourself, though? Why waste your time talking about other people's problems?

I strongly suspect that i'm not wasting my time. Here's just one example; have you not subtly referred to and affirmed material that i have written previously, in this very dialogue..?

Yes. But if you reach that end it will be far more than an imagination...for you that is. I can never go beyond imagining it in you, but i can at least come across some good evidence to support your claim.

I agree completely.

Was that a mistake, or are you now acknowledging that you're not Enlightened?

Rhett

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 318
(1/13/04 11:06 am)
Reply

 show me, part 2

---

-----
I had written:

When i went to Australia i learned first hand that this secretive and dodgy nature was for real and not just appearance ;), and not with Kevin alone i might add.

But then i dont think it will come as a suprise to anyone who's been paying attention here that these men come across alot more enlightened here in the land of measured words than they really are in real life, keeping in mind, too, that opportunity to observe was kept to a minimum and somewhat controlled during my visit.

---

Dan replied:

I for one am pretty well sick to death of your snide and theatrical insinuations about what you think you know on this score. Yes, there indeed was some calculated evasion of you when you were here. But, at the risk of hurting your feelings, that was entirely because of your own personality, which was, at times, unbearably eccentric.

LB: Well to some extent your remarks tend to support my point, dont they. And it seems you're reading something that is not there, not this time anyway, a mis-characterization.

In any case, here again we have some unsupported accusations or allegations. Do you think you might be able to explain what it is that gave you this idea? (without calling in witnesses at least for the time being) Go ahead, im not afraid.

Unbearable you say? Is that so? So what was so unbearable about spending little time with an eccentric person? Do you mean when i visited with you and the wife, sat comfortably on your living room floor didnt i, while we chatted bout this and that? Was that so painful for you.

No, you mean at some other time, dont you? Well, you had a refuge there, didnt you??

If i had known you were so thin-skinned i wouldnt have tested you so.

Leo

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 577
(1/13/04 4:01 pm)
Reply

 Re: show me, part 2

---

What about when they pay the shopkeeper for their groceries? "That'll be 9 dollars and 55 cents". What then does the sage do, having given up all concepts outside of teaching?

The sage also gives up the concept of teaching. Everything happens.

You say that and yet claim to be enlightened? With what do you reference appreciation for my comment?

Yes. I hardly understand your question. I think your idea of enlightenment is a bit off. It'd be best if you just forgot about it, entirely.

*You could say it, but don't want to *really* say it? Is that perhaps because it's not *really* true, just like a number of things you've said to me? If you were Enlightened you would be able to read it and thoroughly understand each point quite clearly, and be able to communicate them to others.*

I don't want to *really* say anything. No, and everything I've said has been true to some extent. I read it, and understood that it was 'below' my own understanding. There was no reason to remember any of it, so I didn't want to say I really understood it.

So when someone says something silly and becomes embarrassed, they don't think they exist as a discrete entity?

"They"? Aren't you the one thinking they are an embarrassed, delusional, discrete entity?

I strongly suspect that i'm not wasting my time. Here's just one example; have you not subtly referred to and affirmed material that i have written previously, in this very dialogue..?

You suspect.

Was that a mistake, or are you now acknowledging that you're not Enlightened?

No, I just agree with what you said.

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

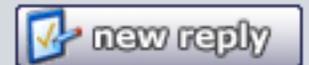

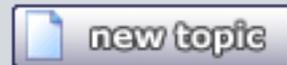

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Spiritual advancement

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 319(1/15/04 1:00 pm)Reply |  show me part 3 <hr/> Dan Rowden wrote:I have no problem with telling you what I did yesterday, providing your motivation for wanting to know is pure, and unfortunately it quite evidently isn't. However, I spent my morning attempting to get the display adaptor drivers to work on this old computer - and failed miserably. I spent most of the afternoon shopping and the rest of it at the local pub quietly contemplating the issue of how to get my other computer fixed and when I could afford to do it. I also spent a bit of that pub time perving on an especially sexy barmaid. God didn't really get much of a look-in in my day, at least not directly. LB: Well the reason you are short of change to make these needed repairs is coz you didnt think ahead, you didnt set up the conditions that would direct dollars your way, for instance the way you'al treated me while out there, like i wasnt even there, not very hospitable, so you didnt take the initiative apparently expecting me to do so if and when i needed to, so now neither will i take the initiative to offer any financial support to any of you though i could and quite a bit at that, you'll just have to ask me nicely of your own volition as i was required to ask you. Quote:-----There'a a part of them that selfishly desires to keep their enlightenment to | themselves, and also to hide their weaknesses (for the good of Wisdom, let it be said!).

---

That claim is too absurd for words.

Quote:

---

Sure they will spell out again and again all of the pertinent intellectual details, and they rarely miss on an opportunity to show everyone (but Marsha, and sometimes other women) how unreasonable their thinking is, (especially Danny is known for this);

---

You might want to elaborate on this claim, Leo. If you don't I will be forced to look very dimly upon it.

LB: What part?

You'al need to simplify your message, condense it, just tell everyone what they are doing wrong in their approach to their world, why it is wrong, and what they need to do to reverse it. You need to tell people what they ought to be doing, what mental exercises can help them re-align their minds, suggest some practical approaches, what as worked for you. You need to tell people what happened to you from the day you saw the light to now, by that i mean how you progressed to the point you are now, what is the rate of change they might expect, how enlightenment has changed your life, what your new perspective means to you, what you stopped doing since if anything, how you recover when and if you begin to drift into delusion. I reckon you could come up with more of this stuff than I.

Quote:

---

but do any one of you have a good picture in your minds of what things look (ed) like, and how things go(went) on their end in any respect at all?? (besides visualizing three guys staring for hours at their computer displays).

---

What, do you think some people have some kind of cartoonish view of who we are? If they do that is their problem, and an expression of their naivette. I rather doubt that many people have any such perspective.

LB: nothing like dat.

Leo

Dan Rowden

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1269
(1/15/04 4:28 pm)
Reply part 3

---

Quote:

---

so now neither will i take the initiative to offer any financial support to any of you though i could and quite a bit at that,

---

Have you married a rich widow?

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

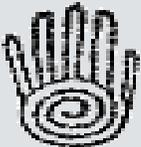

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Step outside for a bit.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian Zoetrope  Registered UserPosts: 25(1/22/04 3:24 pm) Reply  | Step outside for a bit. <hr/> Realize, that all things in the universe had the same source. Case A: infinite amount of time/space, energy/matter: If this is the case then there is an equal amount of time between everything that happens. There cannot be an infinite amount of time because, there would be an infinite amount of time between every perceived moment, and it would literally take all of time to read/understand any of the 39 words in this sentence. Likewise, for Energy and matter. If there is an infinite amount of matter in the universe, then there would be no emptiness through which we can differentiate between different types of matter. Conversely if there was an infinite amount of space every place would be the middle of the universe and everything would occupy a single point. Case B: A finite universe: Everything had a beginning, and likewise will have an end. Ergo it is only logical to realize that if every particle in this massive universe had the same origin, then it must also be true that there is really only one reality, of which everything in said universe is a separate manifestation. I am the chair, I am the computer, I am me, consciousness claimed for all 3. I would argue that Case B: is the more plausible one, and that due to the complexity of the 'one' existence our mind (human) developed the capability to identify itself through the allotting of relative values for every perceived experience and grow conscious. Imagine being paralyzed and after billions of years of evolution you can finally feel | your toes. To me, humans are a small, important part of this total self consciousness actualization of the universe. When all potential avenues of consciousness have been exhausted, then the universe will become fully aware of itself, and then... shit well, heh, you got me. I got no clue what happens then...

What are your thoughts on the possibility of a finite/infinite universe?

Do you think total comprehension can be achieved?

am I whacked up on doof balls?

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1321
(1/22/04 3:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Step outside for a bit.

---

Quote:

---

am I whacked up on doof balls?

---

I don't know - are they good?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 653
(1/22/04 4:59 pm)
Reply

Re: Step outside for a bit.

---

The finite appears to the finite (you), which is created from the infinite, and contains the infinite. Both you, and the object you're viewing is infinite in essence (the Self is infinite, too, but this is a different matter). All things are inherently infinite. I look at my hand and see formless infinity in finite form.

Every second is eternity happening. Conceptualizing beginnings and endings is like taking water in your hands. Does it actually leave the ocean, does it cease being 'ocean'? When you let it go, it becomes the ocean again, and it never really stopped being 'water' or 'ocean'. It was never separate, nothing is ever separate.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 75
(1/23/04 7:24 am)
Reply

Re: Step outside for a bit.

---

CZ,

The place to start is with human language. We often use words as though they possessed some mystical and magical quality....an ontological/teleological capacity to represent literally an absolute relationship between in my head" and out in the world".

They can't. Language is merely an invention of the human species. Some things it can denote more or less objectively; but other things [most things] it can only connote a particular point of view about.

For example, try using language to express universally what a tangerine taste like. Try using words to "prove" that tangerines taste better than peanuts. Try using concepts to differentiate mediocre art from great art. Try using definitions to express What Gravity IS.

You can't.

The points you raise about an infinite or a finite cosmogeny are not amenable to logic and epistemologically sound arguments. To science or philosophy. How would you even begin to imagine a way TO encompass Reality with mere words?

But that is all we have, right? That and our capacity to attach them to things we have experienced empirically.

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1427
(1/23/04 9:23 am)
Reply

Step outside for a bit

---

Quote:

---

am I whacked up on doof balls?

---

The definite answer is: perhaps.

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1323(1/23/04 10:35 am)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Step outside for a bit <hr/> Have the youngsters come up with a new drug we aging hippies don't know of?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 893(1/23/04 11:41 am)Reply       | Re: Step outside for a bit <hr/> I think it was P.C. Wiggum.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 774(1/23/04 1:51 pm)Reply  | Re: Step outside for a bit. <hr/> Biggier: Language is merely an invention of the human species. Some things it can denote more or less objectively; but other things [most things] it can only connote a particular point of view about. For example, try using language to express universally what a tangerine taste like. Try using words to "prove" that tangerines taste better than peanuts. Try using concepts to differentiate mediocre art from great art. Try using definitions to express What Gravity IS. You can't. So you think that perceptions, sensations, feelings (some mind philosophers call them "qualia") are ineffable? What about language? Doesn't language have the capability of causing/evoking/conjuring ineffable thoughts and imagination? In some way language mirrors the nervous system, I think. Thomas |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

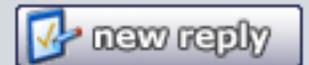

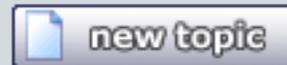

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Streaming Consciousness

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 61(10/20/03 11:02 am)Reply   Edit |  Streaming Consciousness <hr/> Streaming Consciousness - Another Perspective On Consciousness Our experience of a sensation, an image and an abstract logical thought are different, even though they are mere compositions of causes. We usually experience images streaming through our consciousness for the whole time that we are conscious. However, intense abstract thought or sensation can override the experience of images, so the experience of them is not inherent. Those images might seem to come from different sources, external through eyes, internal mental images, or the image of blackness if we shut our eyes and don't create any mental images, but the enlightened mind realises that they are all of the same basic nature, inputs to consciousness. Sensations stream into and out of our consciousness, they are not necessarily present during consciousness. In fact, it is possible for none at all to be experienced, particularly if one is drugged. They are not experienced as an image or as a thought. The thought, 'Ouch, this is painful' is a thought, not a sensation, even though the sensation of pain is accompanying it. This gets a little complex because thought can actually create pain, in which case they are likely to be experienced at the same time, but their appearance to our consciousness is nevertheless fundamentally different. |

Abstract thought can stream in and out as well, and thus, can be totally absent or totally present. Abstract thought is capable of differentiating images, sensations and other abstract thoughts. This is often denoted by  $A=A$ . Since the images and sensations that we experience are in fact what we experience, we can say that in that sense they are valid. If we are experiencing an image of a laptop, we are in fact experiencing an image of a laptop, we cannot possibly be experiencing, for example, an image of a toilet. How the image of the laptop is put into our consciousness we can never know, it may be programmed in by an alien computer or whatever. We just have to work with the images we receive, knowing that they may or may not be reflective of any 'greater reality' or whatever we wish to consider.

This capacity for abstraction enables us to create valid abstract constructs based on the images and sensations that we experience, which we can then use to make distinctions about those images and sensations (a bit like a feedback loop). Our abstract construct is inherently unlimited in its potential, thus, it can become highly deluded, despite the raw validity of the images and sensations it experiences (images and sensations cannot possibly be deluded, they just are what they are). In fact, our experiences of consciousness are such that delusion is almost inevitable, we are drawn into the fable. Permanent enlightenment is the complete and permanent absence of all such delusion.

Over the last few weeks i have been trying to relate the nature of cause and effect to our experience and understanding of consciousness. However, i think i started with a fundamentally flawed premise. I think i inadvertently used the scientific approach, i cut consciousness up into moments, i made it periodical. This was because i saw the basic process of a cause-creating-an-effect as being a momentary event. By cutting cause and effect up i was differentiating it in respect to time, so time became the parameters upon which i tried to conduct my (scientific) investigations, whilst trying to be logical and philosophical! To in any way try to understand causal processes, to try to understand them beyond the simple fact of 'cause-and-effect', requires such differentiation, which then removes all possibility of arriving at absolute truth. I am sure that i have also had to make

|                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                               | assumptions to create the material i wrote above on streaming consciousness. However, unenlightened people find brute facts difficult to relate to their experiences, so attempts to formulate generalistic empirical descriptions are still of great worth. I am going away from the computer for a week, so please don't wait on an immediate reply if you respond to this or any of my other posts, i'll address them upon my return. Rhett                                                                                                                 |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1219(10/21/03 2:33 am)Reply       |  Re: Streaming Consciousness <hr/> Yes, time is silent, only the clock ticks.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| scatteredmindRegistered UserPosts: 102(10/23/03 4:49 pm)Reply      |  streamed consciousness <hr/> of course consciousness is streamed, where else would it come from? hold onto parts of it to create reality and belief. remember only what matters.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| the meme of barnabyRegistered UserPosts: 3(10/24/03 12:02 pm)Reply |  basal consciousness and blankness <hr/> Imagine yourself floating in space. You are in no particular position, there is no light, no sound and no olfactory or somatosensory stimuli. Imagine also that you have no memory and have learnt nothing (perhaps you are a young child). In short, your brain is not receiving any sensory afferent information. Are you conscious? How would the streamlining of conscious thought explain your answer? cheers, barnaby |

|                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 62(11/1/03 12:04 pm)Reply   Edit | Re: basal consciousness and blankness <hr/> This scenario is so far removed from reality as to be somewhat worthless. It is also a deeply empirical question, so it cannot be answered definitively. All i can really state is that consciousness requires causes (inputs to consciousness) for it to exist. Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1242(11/1/03 3:32 pm)Reply          | Re: basal consciousness and blankness <hr/> If the equation is "inputs = consciousness," would the artificial alteration of one side of that equation produce expected or unexpected results from the otherside? Would you define "consciousness" as discrete impressions in order serially, or some kind of nebulous ether? Or some combination of both?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 65(11/3/03 10:25 am)Reply   Edit | Re: basal consciousness and blankness <hr/> If the equation is "inputs = consciousness," would the artificial alteration of one side of that equation produce expected or unexpected results from the otherside? The equation could be said to be "inputs -&gt; consciousness", but it is just another way of saying that it is caused. If those inputs are changed then the consciousness will be different, but since it is impossible to completely map causal processes, the results can never be predicted with complete accuracy. Would you define "consciousness" as discrete impressions in order serially, or some kind of nebulous ether? Or some combination of both? I wouldn't define it as that, but at times they would be apt descriptions of it. Rhett |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

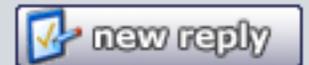

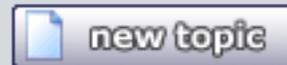

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Suffering

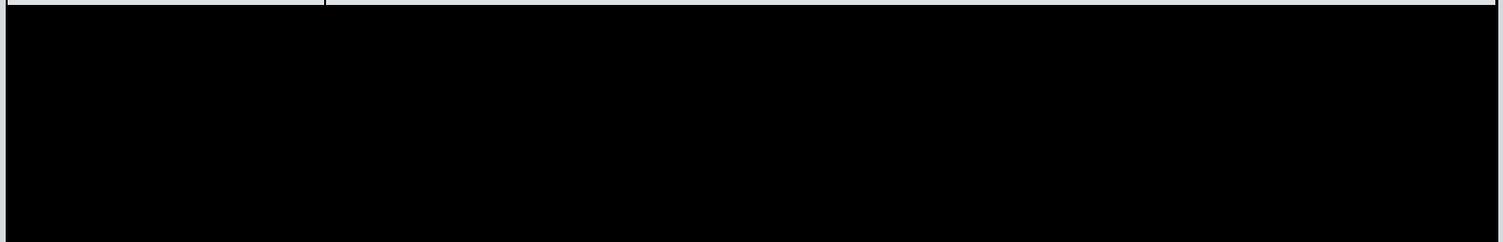

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 372(11/1/03 6:56 am)Reply |  Re: bah [!] <hr/> No, kids walk around the dorms from 4-6.                                                                                                 |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 11(11/1/03 8:58 am)Reply  |  - <hr/> Quote: <hr/> You're a sissy! <hr/> I may be a bit crazy but I'm not stupid.Can't you think of something more creative? |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 374(11/1/03 9:06 am)Reply |  Re: - <hr/> You aren't stupid?                                                                                                                           |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 12(11/2/03 8:22 pm)Reply       |  - <hr/> nope. does it come with being crazy?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 993(11/3/03 1:59 pm)Reply |  Re: bah <hr/> I've had years of depression and mental suffering, so don't try and tell me what I've experienced. I don't believe I did that. Fear of life (living) is much worse than fear of death. I'm not afraid of death, infact I've wanted death upon myself more times than I can count. Why do you have years of depression and suffering? I have witnessed extreme emotional anguish, in people I have known intimately. I still think fear of death is the fundamental problem. Shame may run a close second. A child needs to be loved to live. The fear of no love is nearly synonymous with fear of death. The unloved person full of conflict and neurosis may indeed be full of depression and despair, but the root cause is fear of death. |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 15(11/3/03 4:39 pm)Reply       |  PCD <hr/> Fear of life (living) is much worse than fear of death. I'm not afraid of death, infact I've wanted death upon myself more times than I can count. Why do you have years of depression and suffering? PCD (Post Christianity Disorder), drugs, alchohol, and lack of knowledge. A child needs to be loved to live. The fear of no love is nearly synonymous with fear of death. The unloved person full of conflict and neurosis may indeed be full of depression and despair, but the root cause is fear of death. Sure. I had plenty of love as a child, I just didn't accept it.                                                                                                                                               |

|                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 228(11/3/03 4:45 pm)Reply   |  Re: PCD <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Sure. I had plenty of love as a child, I just didn't accept it. <hr/> And that, just that, made you a God now.Cherish it. |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 21(11/3/03 5:35 pm)Reply |  we are <hr/> We are what we are because we have control over our lives. And that control is what makes us Gods.                                                               |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 230(11/3/03 5:59 pm)Reply   |  Re: we are <hr/> My father is 91 years of age.And dementing. He has no control over his life whatsoever.Repent!                                                     |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 22(11/3/03 6:12 pm)Reply |  control <hr/> He isn't a God because he needs your help, you are one because you can give it to him.                                                                        |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 232(11/3/03 6:22 pm)Reply   |  Re: control <hr/> Hey hey, I'm a qualified mystic,so don't give me that crap.                                                                                          |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1661(11/3/03 9:59 pm)Reply     |  ---<hr/>(:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 381(11/4/03 4:15 am)Reply      |  Re: ---<hr/>repent isn't a god, damnit.                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 995(11/4/03 6:07 am)Reply |  Re: PCD<hr/>Quote:<hr/>PCD (Post Christianity Disorder),<hr/>Marvellous!Quote:<hr/>Sure. I had plenty of love as a child, I just didn't accept it.<hr/>How interesting. Can I be your shrink? |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 25(11/4/03 11:34 am)Reply      |  -<hr/>sure why not :P                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

ariehnathan
Registered User
Posts: 5
(11/4/03 12:31 pm)
Reply

 Suffering

---

Suffering is something we do to ourselves due to the way we think. Suffering is a manifestation of guilt/fear/conscience and as such is a wasteful emotion. It is true to say that suffering is important on the road to enlightenment but only because it is by knowing the suffering can we know the state of non-suffering.

Under my theory of Trinary Thinking <http://www.trinarythinking.com/>

First we suffer then we consider non-suffering. then we see the two as parts of a greater whole ie understanding. Yin defines yang, suffering defines non-suffering. This understanding reveals to us that both are necessary but it is the wise person that decides to discourage from his thought processes this suffering and also to encourage non-suffering thinking we also learn best when we suffer, human nature A stiff-necked people"

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1022
(11/8/03 11:57 am)
Reply

 Re: PCD

---

Quote:

_____
Sure. I had plenty of love as a child, I just didn't accept it.
_____

That's a very strange statement. Can you elaborate?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 1
(11/8/03 2:06 pm)
Reply

 Re: PCD

---

I can relate to the idea that fear of living is behind more suffering than fear of death. Or maybe fear of not living up to ??? what expectations, potential ....

Situations that were truly life threatening is when I would feel the most alive - not afraid but really alive. These moments finally convinced me that I did want to live, so I might as well get on with living

|                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 83(11/9/03 11:19 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: suffering <hr/> Suffering = attachment x mental focus Rhett                                                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1706(11/9/03 9:08 pm)Reply              |  ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Suffering = attachment x mental focus <hr/> No it doesn't. Rhett, please give an example to prove your point if you still maintain it, for fun if for no other reason! |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM > Suffering

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 245(11/9/03 11:19 pm)Reply                  |  Re: ---- <hr/> Rhett cannot prove anything.Rhett is Rhett. Like you and me. He wants to forget that.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 89(11/10/03 11:50 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: ---- <hr/> Here is something to think about, but keep in mind that it is by no means absolute: Suffering = attachment x mental focus[squared] Notes:All scores are from 0 to 10.Score for attachment must be zero to achieve enlightenment.Score for mental focus must be at least 9 to achieve enlightenment.Score for mental focus must be 10 to achieve perfection.Score for suffering must be at least 300 to achieve enlightenment.Score for suffering must be at last 400 to achieve perfection.A score for suffering greater than 500 = insanity or death. Here are some examples: |

1. My score at this very moment would be:
 Rhett's current suffering =  $0.5 \times 10(x10) = 50$

2. My average score at the beginning of this year would have been:
 Rhett's previous suffering =  $4 \times 10(x10) = 400$

3. A rough guess at Suergaz's suffering:
 Suergaz's suffering =  $10 \times 4(x4) = 160$
 (So the question is, will you ever suffer enough for the truth?)

Rhett

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 11/10/03 11:53 am

Paul
 Registered User
 Posts: 248
 (11/10/03 12:02 pm)
 Reply

Re: ----

---

Rhett on figures. Go figure.
 You're a zero to me, sweetheart.

repent1
 Registered User
 Posts: 33
 (11/11/03 6:56 am)
 Reply

suffer this

---

Quote:

---

Rhett:
 Suffering = attachment x mental focus[squared]

---

That doesn't make any sense, and you contradict yourself a few times.
 There are many more factors involved in determining personal suffering, and just making up numbers is pretty much useless... but it's fun anyway so here we go.

Here's where it's incomplete:

- All scores are from 0 to 10, except suffering score? Maybe you meant it should be all factors are from 0 to 10.
- A score of 400 for suffering is perfection... and you claim to have had it previously, yet now you have a lower score farther away from enlightenment and perfection?

Rhett's previous suffering =  $4 \times 10(x10) = 400$
Rhett's current suffering =  $0.5 \times 10(x10) = 50$

- If your attachment decreases, how come it is invert to enlightenment?
Shouldn't disattachment to things increase enlightenment?

It would make a bit more sense if the scale of enlightenment is 0 up to infinity (ignorance). That way you don't have 'set' numbers for the suffering score, and you don't have to invert the attachment factor in the suffering equation.

peace

repent1
Registered User
Posts: 34
(11/11/03 7:08 am)
Reply

 re: PCD

---

Sure. I had plenty of love as a child, I just didn't accept it.

bird:
That's a very strange statement. Can you elaborate?

What is strange about it? can you elaborate? ;)

If I had love from God, why should I have loved myself?

"God loves me." He doesn't say, "Love yourself." I was just a spoiled only child. And I'm supposed to just accept everything that is given to me and not ask 'why?'

It's even written in stone, "God. Country. Family."

Where is the love for ourselves? It is no wonder there is so much suffering.

peace

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 251
(11/11/03 7:32 am)
Reply

 re: PCD

---

God is still in your system, huh?
There is no such bastard. You seem to be a nice guy, btw.

|                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 37(11/11/03 7:53 am)Reply               |  thanx <hr/> yep. Life is purgatory.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 254(11/11/03 7:58 am)Reply                 |  Fuck you <hr/> A mystic knows more and is more aware than...than... you, for instance. Did you know that?Halleluja!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| repent1Registered UserPosts: 39(11/11/03 8:06 am)Reply               |  w00p <hr/> great.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 255(11/11/03 8:09 am)Reply                 |  Re: w00p <hr/> Tank ye!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 90(11/11/03 8:51 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: suffer this <hr/> There are many more factors involved in determining personal suffering, and just making up numbers is pretty much useless... but it's fun anyway so here we go. I am glad you have grasped the context in which i intended it to be taken. Here's where it's incomplete: - All scores are from 0 to 10, except suffering score? Maybe you meant it should be all factors are from 0 to 10. Yes, a minor oversight. - A score of 400 for suffering is perfection... and you claim to have had it previously, yet now you have a lower score farther away from enlightenment and perfection? |

Rhett's previous suffering =  $4 \times 10(x10) = 400$

Rhett's current suffering =  $0.5 \times 10(x10) = 50$

You have misplaced time. Generally speaking, the spiritual journey will have a peak of suffering and then will reduce (if one become's enlightened). The memory one has of that peak of suffering will continue to drive their spiritual progress even when their suffering is shrinking. So a score of 400 is required to achieve perfection, it is not perfection itself (naturally).

*- If your attachment decreases, how come it is invert to enlightenment?
Shouldn't disattachment to things increase enlightenment?*

Detachment is wholly unlike non-attachment. Detachment presupposes the maintenance of an inherently existent self, an ego. Spirituality is a path of non-attachment.

It would make a bit more sense if the scale of enlightenment is 0 up to infinity (ignorance).

There is no scale for enlightenment, and i gave none.

That way you don't have 'set' numbers for the suffering score, and you don't have to invert the attachment factor in the suffering equation.

I can't follow this, can you explain if further?

Rhett

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 258
(11/11/03 9:10 am)
Reply

 To Rhett

---

You produce superb boloney.
Boloney, yet superb.
In fact, it's incredible.
Doesn't that make you... think, at least?

But that sounds all very negative,
I realize that. Soit.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1029

(11/11/03 9:11 am)

Reply

 Re: re: PCD

---

What is strange about it? can you elaborate? ;)

Children do not refuse love.

If I had love from God, why should I have loved myself?

Well, because it is the same love, for one thing. This love from god was a theoretical love. Did you feel it? If god saw fit to love you, why shouldn't you love you, too?

He doesn't say, "Love yourself."

Well, for heaven's sake, the implication is there. But the great truths are the most well-kept secrets in Christianity. Love is One, there is only one love, anywhere.

I was just a spoiled only child. And I'm supposed to just accept everything that is given to me and not ask 'why?'

How were you spoiled and why do you feel guilty? Did you feel loved? How do you know they loved you?

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

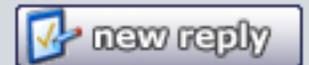

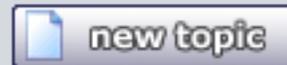

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> super boy philosophy

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 11(10/28/03 12:37 pm)Reply | super boy philosophy <hr/> super boy philosophy2003.10.27 You may heard "super boy" as some star, but it is differ from what i mean, the super boy which i mean is described in my previous article "We are in a matrix". Almost all male star are the feminine man, i have already describe feminine man ago, that feminine man is not means their desire for sex-compliment is weak, but their desire for truth is weak. No man like be watched by numerous people who don't understand him in fact, only those feminine man like this just like girls, become the star, and happy be watch like this, he is handsome, his skin is white, if he do a reversal-sex operation, he will become a beautiful woman :) I only mean some star are feminine man :) I am happy there appear more not handsome star now(But he is charming by his manly), but all male star are not very manly in fact, or he will become a philosopher who like be alone, or he will become a artist who like alone too, as Otto Weininger described, there only have philosophy genius and art genius. All previous philosophers are alone indeed, they lived as seclusion, don't feel happy, but my philosophy will change this, philosopher will not be alone, with his girl at least, and he is happy. I have already explained ago, philosophers are agony, because they didn't get the utmost truth, i am the first happy philosopher, because i get it. Super boy seems to be funny, but you can see, we are stronger than other boys, we are stronger than those old man, we are super really. If you know | me, one example of the super boy, is me :) have strong body, good at computer science(different super body will different by this point, such i am good at programming, Tang Hao good at engineering, Cai Li good at math, but the computer skill of everyone of us is not bad), like literature, art, and like philosophy best :) There will be more and more boys like me, just as my philosophy spread everywhere, my philosophy is base on Nietzsche and Otto Weininger, and born with the Internet.

I go skating this morning, so there is only me(then no one can see i get tumbled when trying cool movement, hoho), the cold mist raised in middle of the skating board, very cool and beautiful. I was skating peacefully there, and thinking. I get more. If Nietzsche's philosophy is called super-man philosophy, then mine, is super-boy philosophy. Mine is a further develop of Nietzsche's philosophy, because Nietzsche don't understand female, Nietzsche only understand woman, Nietzsche said:"when go to meet the woman, bring the lash", yes, he is right, but, woman is not the whole female, Nietzsche don't understand girl! He didn't notice this. After I read Otto Weininger's "Sex and Character", i understand man and woman, but "man and woman" is only the adult's term, i am using his theory to understand boy(me) and girl(ice lotus) in fact, Otto Weininger is making you understand male and female! Yes, the girl is innocent, she don't know what is good and what is bad, she don't know what is pig's happy and philosopher's happy, when Nietzsche hard studying philosophy, he didn't tell her girl the literature, science, art, philosophy, his girl is grown up with those many weak and shallow boys, who don't know literature, don't know science, don't know art, don't know philosophy, never be thinking, your girl is corrupted by those boys, and become the woman which Nietzsche find must treat with the lash. But, if when you are studying literature, science, art, philosophy, when you are a boy, you should tell your girl these things too, it is easily for you to tell her these things in fact, because you can easily bit all those weak boys easily. And, at last, after your literature, science, art, philosophy get high, your girl get to like these learnings too. Spend some time to write love letter to your girl, don't put your time fully on your things, teach her those things which you are learning, or your girl can't understand your at last, and you find you need the lash to treat her.

When super boy grown up, he become the super man :) so become a super boy is the key.

My ideology should have already be mature :) Although it seems i said this for several times ago :) If i can stop thinking(can't get more) tomorrow, i will start to write my book :) Then we translate it to completely English, completely Chinese, Dutch, German(we these boys always have nothing to do, just like philosophers are always at leisure), and spread it to boys all over the world. You, these old man, will be replaced by us, their philosophy will be replaced by mine too :) You, these old man, have read Nietzsche and Otto Weininger's books for 100 years, but get nothing. You, these old man, want a perfect wife, but only failed, and then you despise woman. The happiest thing is philosophy, but all of you only feel agony, because you didn't get the utmost truth, as me :)

I am child? right. But all child are geniuses, i am a genius, you get to know now :)

The world will be changed by us, by super boy :)

You may say my philosophy don't seems be hard to understand, this is just why my philosophy is highest, yes, the utmost truth must be very simple and easy, just as "the earth is round" changed the whole world ago, my truth will change the whole world, and my truth seems so ridiculous just as "the earth is round", and my truth can be easily understand by a very old woman just as "the earth is round" too :) UNIX is easy in a genius's eyes, philosophy is easy in my eyes, as i am the philosophy genius.

When i walk out, i see many people in the street, if there happened a trifle, many people will stand around, watch it, because they have nothing to do in fact, but they appear so busy sometimes too, doing their affairs without their mind thinking, in the matrix. I go to the dining hall late, so there will not be a queue, but it is not because i have something busy to do, it is because when stand in the queue, they will disturb my thinking a little(I think i will get to won't be disturb by this one day), if there is a queue, i will stand at the last, one meter or more away from the queue, so i can be still thinking without disturbed, some busy people will make himself inserted into this distance, let he do his business, i do my business :)

I like those comments in the foreign philosophy forum, they can give me the opposite view, attack my ideology, which help me to improve my ideology :)

When I only run 5 rings ago, they say i am not faster than them, when i run 10 rings, they don't compete with me any more. Someone said my English is not so good, no one will say my German is bad :)

I am in a mania phase? Yes, I think so, but I am only a young boy, I was more maniacal in Linux two years ago(my life is not for money; my life is not for happy; my life is for Linux), and now i don't be maniacal in Linux, but my Linux skill get very high after that mania, i developed StarDict which helped many people. I am mania now, yes, but why stop it, and i can't stop it, why you want to force me to stop it, all our mania is focused

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                       | on improving ourselves, after this mania, my philosophy level will get higher at least. Boys, continue our mania, let's make our body strong, study Linux, study philosophy, study foreign languages, read many books eagerly! Those old man think we are mania, we think them are discouraged, their life road failed at last, and now tell us, don't fight, you will be failed as me too. Yes, i may failed at last as you too, but if i don't fight, how can i know it. I don't mania in Linux now, but i encourage every young boy who is mania in Linux! Don't trust those numerous failed old man who tell us we will fail! |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 182(10/28/03 1:09 pm)Reply       | To super boy <hr/> I said some things to you in the last couple of days, but you don't seem to care responding whatsoever. Fuck off, Chinaman.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1636(10/28/03 1:16 pm)Reply   | --- <hr/> Give him time paul you retarded old curmudgeon, this superbboy you're talking to. Huzheng, Nietzsche did understand girls. Reda in zarathustra where he speaks of the little god and the dancing of girls.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 183(10/28/03 1:26 pm)Reply       | Re: --- <hr/> : -)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| 1TheMasterRegistered UserPosts: 177(10/28/03 2:54 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Superboy = Superman Lite?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 185
(10/28/03 3:42 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

The real Super Man, Christopher Reeve, ended in a wheel chair.

China is way ahead of the Western World!
Did you read that? One of them was in some space thing the other day, orbiting Earth! Oh my!

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 372
(10/28/03 7:00 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Hey Hunzeng Superboy

You aint the first, nigger.

Read David Zindell. The Broken God.
For your circumstances it is a must read.

I think I'll go skating.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 373
(10/28/03 7:18 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

I will say I admire his spirit. If i was to be a real philosopher that is the kind of importance it would have to me. But alas I have no memory, so I don't have the mental capacity.

I'd like to see this guy surpass his affliction and move forward. His afflcitytion is one where he can't cope with everyday people, so eventually he will go sufficiently insane as to be classed as a nuisance. While I don't know what that means in China, death of some sort I guess, proolly a heap of electricity, it will be sad to lose another tryer.

You see he is right in one sense, and that is that the poeple that make a difference are realy all that matters.

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 675(10/28/03 10:40 pm)Reply    | Re: --- <hr/> Perhaps, in an extremely limited sense. ----- Nietzsche Boy, you are so very partizan - religious in a way.                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1639(10/28/03 10:44 pm)Reply                                                                                      | ---- <hr/> Nietzsche boy?! You've called me that before..do you mean me? Religious in a way? Which way? So very partizan? To what here am I being made a party to?! |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 677(10/28/03 11:22 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> To a lunatic who's read the same book as you. Thus spake God. No need to over punctuate BTW.                                           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1641(10/28/03 11:31 pm)Reply                                                                                      | ---- <hr/> """"""No need to abbreviate, God boy, """"""!!!!!!                                                                                                       |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 678(10/28/03 11:39 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> It's quicker. God boy? Not very apt Ad Hom.                                                                                            |

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 144(10/29/03 12:20 am)Reply                                                                                       | Re: super boy philosophy <hr/> I for one have enjoyed reading huzheng's posts. I think there is much good in them. My hope is that Huzheng's current mind is not just a flash in the pan, but that the thinking will become strong and steady. It already has good spirit, which is a fantastic start. Edited by: ksolway at: 10/29/03 12:50 am                                                                                                                        |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 148(10/29/03 12:34 am)Reply                                                                                   | Re: super boy philosophy <hr/> I have to agree with Mr. Soloway...sort of. I think he has quite a few good things to say, but seems to sidetrack into unsuccessful conclusions. Some of which seems like purging of the mind, which is good, to some extent, but the mind is also abstract and as much good that comes out, there is an equal amount of shit, unless controlled. Control the mind, otherwise the self is nothing more than a marionette.                             |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 681(10/29/03 12:59 am)Reply  | Re: super boy philosophy <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Kevin: I for one have enjoyed reading huzheng's posts. I think there is much good in them. <hr/> Well of course you have, he's mostly churning out the same words you've already decided are true. He's read the same words, even ones you've written. Quote: <hr/> My hope is that Huzheng's current mind is not just a flash in the pan, but that the thinking will become strong and steady. <hr/> |

Order out of chaos? There would have to be a very strange attractor. It's possible though.

Quote:

---

It already has good spirit, which is a fanastic start.

---

He's a young male. It's a hormonal prerequisite.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1235
(10/29/03 2:41 am)
Reply

Super Boi

---

Can he fly?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 363
(10/29/03 2:54 am)
Reply

Re: Super Boi

---

Kevin Solway,

You know, you are right that he has a great spirit...but he's also very deluded. Thinking he's THE philosopher. My great spirit looks on him as a little spirit. My spirit wants to say to his spirit "Look here little spirit: none of this talk matters. You can't find truth, no one ever has. Weinenger was wrong. Nietzsche was wrong. I am wrong, and you are wrong."

I just don't know the point anymore. The only reason I come here and talk is because it's so shocking how stupid people are. I want to help them out a bit. Most of the newbies here are very unbalanced people. I'm sure they don't socialize much, and I'm sure they won't lead fulfilling lives if someone doesn't try to help.

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| LuxRegistered UserPosts: 5(10/29/03 4:47 am)Reply        | Re: super boy philosophy <hr/> huzheng wins the moment of his creation, you win huzheng! a moment if you are philosopher that you will chase the rest of your life be haunted, hunted, hunt and haunt and worst of all maybe suffer nostalgia for this force of your youth and philosophers who refuse its fleeting and fading sometimes prefer to die before it does or would rather die than forget it we here who want pinpricking and deflation of huzhengs moment with our cool and buttoned down rationale our marketplace commonplaces look leaden right now next to him our reason cannot touch this yet and we do nothing but secure him further in his moment you see huzheng these people prove you right in your moment and anything human could celebrate with you like parents who do not steal from children their inexplicable happinesses and pure joy with cautions of the dark and heavy ways of the world you win the moment huzheng you win there is plenty of time for everything else |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1642(10/29/03 7:53 am)Reply | ---- <hr/> But haven't you won too Lux?! It's good you are here too, I don't feel to caution anyone!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

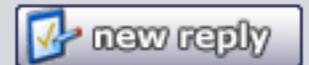

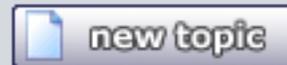

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

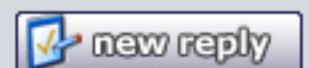

> testosterone literature

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Abram123Registered UserPosts: 1(5/2/04 2:23 pm)Reply |  testosterone literature <hr/> Hello, my name is Abram. Below is a link that some might find interesting. It is a recorded radio program about testosterone. I was wondering if anyone had some recommendations for other literature on this topic (preferably free). http://www.thislife.org/pages/descriptions/02/220.html (www.thislife.org/) has a plethora of free online programming (need Realplayer and don't even have to sign-up or give an e-mail), which consists of some of the better programming on the U.S. airwaves. |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1566(5/3/04 4:11 am)Reply               |  Re: testosterone literature <hr/> RealPlayer is tha Debil.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The 4 stages? - What stage are you?

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 607(8/18/03 6:43 pm)Reply | The 4 stages? - What stage are you? <hr/> I think this is an interesting comparison. STAGE 1 Quote: <hr/> The first is the brahmacharya, or the stage of the student (brahmachârin). For boys, the student is supposed to go live with a teacher (guru), who is a Brahmin, to learn about Sanskrit, the Vedas, rituals, etc. The dharma of a student includes being obedient, respectful, celibate, and non-violent. "The teacher is God." For girls, the stage of studenthood coincides with that of the householder, and the husband stands in the place of the teacher. <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Jimhaz:Simplex - one is caught within the boundaries of a single |

worldview, namely whatever culture or parents have imprinted into their consciousness. It is the great and deadly vanity of human beings that to convince themselves that their worldview, no matter how unlikely or bizarre, is somehow more sane, natural, pragmatic, holy, or truthful than another. This is the danger with attachments.

---

STAGE 2

Quote:

---

The second stage is the gârhastya, or the stage of the householder, which is taken far more seriously in Hinduism than in Jainism or Buddhism and is usually regarded as mandatory, like studenthood, although debate continued over the centuries whether or not this stage could be skipped in favor of a later one. This is the stage where the principal dharma of the person is performed, whether as priest, warrior, etc., or for women mainly as wife and mother. Arjuna's duty to fight the battle in the Bhagavad Gita comes from his status as a householder. Besides specific duties, there are general duties that pay off the "three debts": a debt to the ancestors that is discharged by marrying and having children; a debt to the gods that is discharged by the household rituals and sacrifices; and a debt to the teacher that is discharged by appropriately teaching one's wife or children.

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz:

Complex - To be complex is to hold at least two different realities, perhaps at two different times in ones life. The complex man or woman will cast away beliefs like old clothes, as they become worn or inappropriate. Complex involves a progression from one belief to another, ever growing, ever more flexible, bursting free from one worldview to another as a snake sheds an old skin. The truly complex person will move freely among these systems as the need arises.

---

STAGE 3

Quote:

---

The third stage is the vânaprastya, or the stage of the forest dweller. This may be entered into optionally if (ideally) one's hair has become gray, one's skin wrinkled, and grandchildren exist to carry on the family. Husbands and wives may leave their affairs and possessions with their children and retire together to the forest as hermits. This does not involve the complete renunciation of the world, for husbands and wives can still have sex (once a month), and a sacred fire still should be kept and minimal rituals performed. This stage is thus not entirely free of dharma. The Forest Treatises were supposed to have been written by or for forest dwellers, who have mostly renounced the world and have begun to consider liberation.

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz:

Multiplex - If complexity is the ability to suspend and adopt different beliefs as they are useful or appropriate, one after the other, then multiplexity is the holding of more than one reality at the same time.

These realities may be as different - or even contradictory - as science is to an adult and magic is to a child. Truth is multiple. One can never become multiplex if afraid of paradox or enslaved by the god of consistency. The mastery of multiplex makes it possible to see the world in many dimensions. The multiplex man will see all truths as interlocking parts of a greater truth.

---

STAGE 4

Quote:

---

The fourth stage is the sannyâsa, or the stage of the wandering ascetic, the sannyâsin (or sâdhu). If a man desires, he may continue on to this stage, but his wife will need to return home; traditionally she cannot stay alone as a forest dweller or wander the highways as an ascetic. The sannyâsin has renounced the world completely, is regarded as dead by his family (the funeral is held), and is finally beyond all dharma and caste. When a sannyâsin enters a Hindu temple, he is not a worshiper but one of the objects of worship. Not even the gods are sannyâsins (they are householders), and so this is where in Hinduism, as in Jainism and Buddhism, it is possible for human beings to be spiritually superior to the gods.

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz:

Omniplex - holding all possible realities at once. For gods only.

---

Stage 4 is interesting. Women are not supposed to go on after stage 3. Ancient wisdom or ancient folly?

|                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce io Registered User Posts: 282 (8/19/03 5:37) Reply | Re: The 4 stages? - What stage are you? <hr/> Ancient folly, as far as I can tell. From reading the scriptures, the point is not to become a seeker, but to seek. Seeking doesn't have anything to do with if you have gray hair, or if you are celibate. Anyone seeking that kind of lifestyle won't find anything besides gray hair and celibacy. |
| BryanParrish Global User Posts: 76 (8/3/04 5:40) Reply  | Re: The 4 stages? - What stage are you? <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Alpha and The Omega

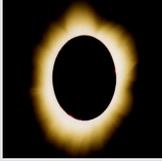

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 963(2/3/04 3:19 pm)Reply | The Alpha and The Omega <hr/> Absolute value - The Omega group.This group believe that the human being has an absolute value and the human being must also have an ultimate purpose. Absolute value and ultimate purpose can be quantified with money. In this group blood money, slavery and bridal purchase are acceptable. Everything has a price even you. (By the way have you checked your life insurance policy recently?) Infinite value - The Alpha group.This group believe the human being has infinite value and that the purpose of the human being can only be seen by the enlightened. So when you listen to an Omega person wrestling with the question of enlightenment they are just trying to find the current market value of the human being which appears to vary relative to region. There are certain difficulties in ascertaining the exact quantity and quality of a human being as that is variable also. How much do you think you are worth? |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2187
(2/3/04 6:38 pm)
Reply

Re: The Alpha and The Omega

---

I am without value! I can guess though at what would be made up for my bounty! But I'd be assassinatin' assassins like a bad ass muthafuckin ninja.

Edited by: suergaz at: 2/3/04 6:46 pm

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 964
(2/4/04 7:33 am)
Reply

The Alpha and The Omega

---

If you had to buy your wife would you respect her more?

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 562
(2/4/04 9:21 am)
Reply

Re: The Alpha and The Omega

---

We do buy our wives, with money and made-up love.
Just as a women buys a husband with made-up femininity and a promise of eternity via kids.

The sad fact is that life has no value, except to the one who possesses it.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1622
(2/4/04 9:31 am)
Reply

Re: The Alpha and The Omega

---

Zag wrote:

Quote:

---

I am without value!

---

Finally! Something comprehensible that we can agree on! :)

Dan Rowden

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2190(2/4/04 11:04 am)Reply  | Re: The Alpha and The Omega <hr/> (:D) What could have been more comprehensible than my ninja remark? My life may not have fixed value, but my valuing of life makes me more valuable than most. Jimhaz once wrote something profound about there being no respect amongst the enlightened. Love and possession is more real than cause and effect! |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 225(2/5/04 12:11 am)Reply                                                                                  | re: <hr/> I believe each has a relative and variable value (depending on his contribution to the tribe), which is also dependent on his actions. A man may have profound abilities, but is no more valuable than any other if he doesn't use those abilities. "Love and possession is more real than cause and effect!" Love and possession are caused.           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2212(2/5/04 1:19 am)Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> Hence, they are more real.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 227(2/5/04 1:40 am)Reply                                                                                   | re: <hr/> I disagree, but nevermind.That which causes them to be felt is very real, but themselves are illusionary.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2216(2/5/04 1:45 am)Reply | --- <hr/> Well? Are you going to say what this very real thing/things is/are that you say causes what you say are illusions?! You only say 'nevermind' because you have no argument apart from your untruth.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 577(2/5/04 6:03 am)Reply   | Re: --- <hr/> "Love and possession is more real than cause and effect!" Your contentment in your aloneness is an illusion. We always want what we don't have. You want to possess 'love', and so you constantly reject ultimate wisdom, as it means you can't have love with a female. I think you've gone to far down the path of wisdom to be able to love. So either fuck of and relearn how to be a herd member or stop whinging about the QRS. You'll have to make the choice at some time. I think you are a bit suicidal at present, so what I'm saying here is dangerous, but I'm willing to say it because I think you are too wise to do that. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2218(2/5/04 9:52 am)Reply | ----- <hr/> jimhaz, it is as though someone scalped you, bored a hole, and shat into your head. 'Ultimate wisdom'---- What a factitious crutch for people who, no matter how much they come to know, will never be wise. It really is as DEL once said----You are a coward.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 184(2/5/04 10:10 am)Reply   | ... <hr/> Jimhaz, I don't follow you there. Saying that loving is not wise is the same as saying you can't eat because the food has no inherent existence.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 580(2/5/04 10:22 am)Reply   | Re: ... <hr/> My comments are addressed to philosophical people. Love is only wise for those who believes it solves problems and believe they experience it. I don't believe it solves problems and have never experienced it, except for infatuation. Any long term relationships have been argument-feasts. Love is not wise for those who don't that much comfort in it and who wish to remain individuals. In terms of different groups getting on a love of fellow man with reason is wise. The desire of or possession of love can also stop people from going crazy. It is a necessary part of society, and a necessary concept to aspire to for most folk, but it is not the only way to go through life. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2220(2/5/04 10:31 am)Reply | ----- <hr/> Philosophical people jimhaz?! What do you think philosophy is apart from the love of wisdom?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 583(2/5/04 10:57 am)Reply   | Re: ----- <hr/> You argue like many woman, picking at small points and taking things out of the reasonably obvious context. A childish game player. I'll have to resist responding to you, unless you've made some comment that reverses my opinion.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 184

(2/5/04 10:59 am)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Love is only wise for those who believes it solves problems and believe they experience it.

---

No, love is only wise for those who are love. It's not a matter of believing you experience it. You are the experience.

I can't see what problem there is to be solved.

Quote:

---

I don't believe it solves problems and have never experienced it, except for infatuation. Any long term relationships have been argument-feasts.

---

What problems?

Quote:

---

Love is not wise for those who don't that much comfort in it and who wish to remain individuals

---

Love is not a mean, it's an end in itself.

To the wise person there are no means, just ends.

Quote:

---

It is a necessary part of society, and a necessary concept to aspire to for most folk, but it is not the only way to go through life.

---

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                    | I never argued that it is the only way to go through life. It is just the most intelligent one, if you happen to be love. Edited by: Rairun at: 2/5/04 11:05 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2223(2/5/04 11:01 am)Reply | --- <hr/> There is no such thing as a 'reasonably obvious context' you fart sniffer. I picked the only point worth picking. Read over and you'll see who has picked the small ones. "I'll have to do this and this if you don't reverse my whatsit" Fuck that. Aren't you a man?                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 584(2/5/04 11:11 am)Reply   | Re: --- <hr/> Rairun It all sounds a bit Mills-and-Boonish to me. Read David's WOMEN book and ask yourself if you have the dream. Personally I don't regard the manner in which most folks live together after a few years as 'love', it is just suitable arrangements, the comforts of the known, the doing things together. It is more compatible and interjoined lifestyles than anything else. Whenever someone dies the sorrow you feel is mostly for your loss, not theirs. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2224(2/5/04 11:15 am)Reply | ---- <hr/> I keep forgetting Jim, you're soft. You have said you "live for the next thing"----do you have dreams?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 185

(2/5/04 11:35 am)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

It all sounds a bit Mills-and-Boonish to me. Read David's WOMEN book and ask yourself if you have the dream.

---

I haven't read it, and it's not available anymore. I was going to guess what the dream is and answer your question, but then I thought that maybe you could explain what it is first.

Quote:

---

Personally I don't regard the manner in which most folks live together after a few years as 'love', it is just suitable arrangements, the comforts of the known, the doing things together. It is more compatible and interjoined lifestyles than anything else.

---

Well, there's nothing wrong with that either, if that's what you are. If you do it without wanting it, then it's just stupidity.

Quote:

---

Whenever someone dies the sorrow you feel is mostly for your loss, not theirs.

---

Maybe there are some cases in which that's not true, but I'm not going to argue about it. It might as well always be selfish. The thing is that it doesn't actually matter why you feel sorrow. What matters is that you feel it.

If I truly wanted not to feel sorrow, I wouldn't do it. But if I'm feeling it, I do want it, and I'm only fooling myself if I say I don't.

The problem here is that you see sorrow as a bad consequence that should be eliminated, not as your will of sorrow. To feel sorrow is wise if you are sorrow.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

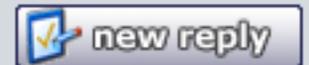

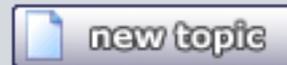

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Alpha and The Omega

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2226(2/5/04 11:42 am)Reply | ---- <hr/> To be merciful to the point of devastation! That has been called virtue. But I am mercy, and devastation...and love besides.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 586(2/5/04 11:52 am)Reply   | Re: ... <hr/> Dan/David is there a reason why the link is not working? Rairun, email either the above. I think they'll send you a copy, if not I will. I'm not going to give you a summary. <hr/> In my life emotions have lead to self-destruction (alcohol, dope, gambling, unrequitted infaution, arguments with girlfriends, having to fit in when I don't want to etc) I'd prefer to live as me, not subservient to someone else. I have to be subservient to the stupidity of society and bosses at work - enough is enough. Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/5/04 11:57 am |

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1401

(2/5/04 11:54 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

My comments are addressed to philosophical people.

---

Don't be talkin' like Rhett, now!

Quote:

---

Love is only wise for those who believes it solves problems and believe they experience it.

---

Love is not a solution to a problem.

Quote:

---

I don't believe it solves problems and have never experienced it, except for infatuation. Any long term relationships have been argument-feasts.

---

So you admit to disappointment, and now you accept the "philosophical" sour grapes of no love with a female. Why am I not surprised?

Quote:

---

Love is not wise for those who don't that much comfort in it and who wish to remain individuals.

---

This can be a real problem, for both genders. But some partners do not stifle one's individuality.

Quote:

---

You argue like many woman, picking at small points and taking things out of the reasonably obvious context.

---

It is women's nature to take care of the details.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 587
(2/5/04 12:07 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Love is not a solution to a problem.

True, but many folk think it will be.

It solves the problem of how they are going to fulfill their life dream and get a constant root.

How many people are happily married though (yes, I know marriage ain't everybody in 'love', so it is only a partial argument).

Something like

50% divorce,

20% don't really enjoy it but get used to it,

15% stay married but are less happy than they could be 'for the kids or for the monetary benefits',

10% haven't been married long enough to get over the infatuation stage and 5% last a lifetime in bliss.

Not very good odds if you ask me. LOL mind you though, unmarried males die about 10 years earlier than married men (and looking at my life I can understand why).

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 588
(2/5/04 12:19 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

So you admit to disappointment, and now you accept the "philosophical" sour grapes of no love with a female. Why am I not surprised?

Yes I'll except this. It is a cause of why I'm here.

However, it is circular, maybe I was sufficiently an individual even at 16 and the problems of those early romances were caused by this. Or it may have been some type of selfishness (I come from a large family, 8 kids).

I don't know, but I do know my head is clearing (most of the time). It was 10 years ago that I decided it wasn't worth the bother. I wouldn't knock back a good woman who didn't whine at me to get me to do things I didn't want to do.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1402
(2/5/04 12:51 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Relationships don't work out because people are fucked up, unconscious, full of issues. It is not a sign that you are free of those things that your relationships didn't work out. It is a sign that both of you were in more or less the same boat. Of course there are times when one partner is significantly more unreasonable than another.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 589
(2/5/04 1:30 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

some relevant lyrics by Loudon Wainwright III

The Dream

Ingénue

Well I'm out on the town, looking for an ingénue, someone young and pretty, that I can be a leading man to,
and it may be a cliché, but its also my fantasy, its never been fulfilled, but it still holds water for me

Come on darling, be my ingénue, you best be a good looker and stimulating to talk to.
Come on darling fulfil my fantasy,
I'm on a world wide search, wont you please be my discovery
She don't need to be an actress but she needs that classic quality,
a typist or a heiress, a stewardess is fine by me,
All she has to do is realise that I'm going to be her leading man and Ill take Audrey over Catherine cause Catherine can get a little out of hand.

I'm not looking for one true love, just an occasional ingénue,
I've got them leading man in search of this fantasy fulfilment blues Ill keep on searching and prowling, aint no way I'm ever gonna quit there must be an ingénue out there ready and waiting to submit
-to my every whim

Come on darling etc
you best be a pretty good looker, and a cooker and a hooker, and stimulating to talk to.

The Reality

I'd Rather Be Lonely

Every night I get the blues, with greens and yellows and chartreuses.

You're still living here with me.
I'd rather be lonely.

All the time I look around for excuses to leave town.
Everybody wants somebody, but,
I'd rather be lonely.

Loneliness is happiness,
It takes less than two.
I confess, I digress from it when I'm with you.

Let us make a brand new start, separate and stay apart.
I've had enough, having and holding.
I'd rather be lonely.

I think that I need some space
Everyday you're in my face.
How can I get rid of you?
I'd rather be lonely.

One more verse, a few more words.
Love is for the bees and birds.
Not for a human being like me.
I'd rather be lonely.

And the Return of the Dream

Absence makes the heart grow fonder
And the mind begins to wander back to happier days.

I guess you'd say you were taken for granted
I went on and on and I raved and I ranted, oh--
My tyrannical ways.

But now things are different,

Cause now you are gone,
I'm not so sure
I can carry on.

Always knew you were important to me
But now I know you are a necessity, otherwise--
I start to go insane.

Things weren't easy when we were together,
We had plenty of days of lousy weather
I'm in a hurricane.

I'm gonna grieve,
I'm gonna moan.
Cause you're not here,
I'm all alone.

The joke's on me
You get the last laugh
I found out the hard way you was my better half, and now-
I'm the worse for the wear.

When I see you again expect some champagne wine,
On Valentine's Day expect a valentine Cause now I know
How much I care.
How much I care.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2182

(2/5/04 1:55 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

Dan/David is there a reason why the link is not working?

---

I believe Dan is in the process of fixing it. The site it used to be on has closed down.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 969(2/5/04 6:30 pm)Reply       | ingénue, <hr/> You must plan to have a Son jimhaz. That will give you focus and then your ingénue will appear.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2228(2/5/04 10:22 pm)Reply | --- <hr/> Those poems are the most disgusting thing I've seen this evening.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 228(2/6/04 5:04 pm)Reply  | re: <hr/> "Well? Are you going to say what this very real thing/things is/are that you say causes what you say are illusions?! You only say 'nevermind' because you have no argument apart from your untruth." I said nevermind because I can't be bothered to discuss with you, but I'll offer this. Both are caused by fears and are different veils over those fears. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2233(2/6/04 7:40 pm)Reply  | ----- <hr/> What a putrid little coward you are.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2236(2/6/04 9:27 pm)Reply  | --- <hr/> So your fear is real and your love is illusory. If I were you I'd be gone.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

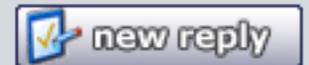

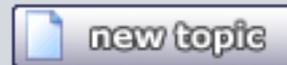

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Belief in Right and Wrong

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| The all mighty TinkerbellRegistered UserPosts: 1(9/13/03 9:22 am)Reply | The Belief in Right and Wrong <hr/> Right and Wrong is a system of black and white in a world of infinite shades of grey. Inevitably Right and Wrong comes down to:PerceptionChoiceand Consequence Everyone has their own idea of what is Right and what is Wrong (Perception) People will often act on or do what they think is "Right" (Choice) No matter how many people might agree you, there will always be people who see your actions as being "Wrong" and they may feel it necessary to correct or punish you. (Consequence) Perception is the most important of the three in my opinion, as it is the primary factor in almost everything we do. We base our choices on our perceptions, and it is the perceptions of others that guide the consequences of our choices. I could go into a lot more detail about my opinions on this matter but I feel that what I have written expresses my beliefs well enough. And I do not wish to scare people off with a long winded rant session. |

 pseudonymous11
Registered User
Posts: 4
(9/20/03 9:49 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

We base our choices on our perceptions, and it is the perceptions of others that guide the consequences of our choices.

>this line was like a tongue twister for my mind, because I think the average person's perceptions are an inheritance of what an external source has defined. In other words, I sense there are few original thinkers in the world, so there are not many whose perceptions are their own. This may be what you were saying, because I am not able to finish the loop of the above statement...went beyond my daftness. Thank you for sharing here...I enjoyed reading & contemplating from it...

dcv-

Animadverto
Registered User
Posts: 2
(9/20/03 2:04 pm)
Reply

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

choice and consequence have nothing to do with what a person sees as right or wrong.

Murder isn't going to be suddenly right in my eyes because I can get away with it.

And it isn't going to become right because I choose to do it.

Perspective is everything.

Hanzil Sowwhat
Registered User
Posts: 5
(9/22/03 6:13 pm)
Reply

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

[quote]

We base our choices on our perceptions, and it is the perceptions of others that guide the consequences of our choices.

[/quote]

One item I think forgotten here: We base our choices on consequences too as well as to taking into consideration whether we might get away with it. Our choices sometimes do not reflect our thoughts and moralities on right and wrong. How lucky do we feel today?

[quote] >this line was like a tongue twister for my mind, because I think the average person's perceptions are an inheritance of what an external source has defined. In other words, I sense there are few original thinkers in the world, so there are not many whose perceptions are their own. This may be what you were saying, because I am not able to finish the loop of the above statement...went beyond my daftness. Thank you for sharing here...I enjoyed reading & contemplating from it...

[/quote]

Whew, I had possibly grasped the entire meaning of the previous post until I read this :) Then, to compound my understanding, I realized that I too went beyond daftness.
ah, to know I am not alone ;)
Thank you all too.

The all mighty Tinkerbell
Registered User
Posts: 2
(10/14/03 9:00 am)
Reply

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

"choice and consequence have nothing to do with what a person sees as right or wrong."

Some people base their beliefs on what they can and can not do. The Law is a system of consequence for actions. I have Grown up being told that everything the Law says to be bad is "wrong". So how then can choice and consequence not be part of the belief in right or wrong?

"Murder isn't going to be suddenly right in my eyes because I can get away with it."

Under some circumstances some people will perceive murder to be "right". I do not believe Murder is "good" but there is one situation that I can think of where I might kill someone.

If someone purposely and maliciously attacked and killed someone I loved, I would probably try to kill them.

In this my perception would not be that of right and wrong. It would be blind anger and retribution. I have already chosen my actions in this scenario. The consequences will come from the perceptions of others. The Law being the perceptions of those who wrote it. As well as the jury who chooses my fate at the end of the trial.

So I stand by my statement that there is no right or wrong.

Only perceptions and the choices and consequences that come from those perceptions

Huzington
Registered User
Posts: 6
(10/14/03 3:22 pm)
Reply

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

The Belief in "Right and Wrong" is necessarily irrational. For "Right and Wrong" is a person's conception of "justification". And to make a sound argument in favour of the veracity of his conception of justification is irrational. For how can he justify justification?

Morals - circular, fallacious, unsound.

Edited by: Huzington at: 10/14/03 3:29 pm

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 356
(10/14/03 4:32 pm)
Reply

Re: The Belief in Right and Wrong

---

Morals - circular, fallacious, unsound.

No morals are necessary to increase the overall safety of the herd, which thus improves the chances of safety for the individual. Although they may be circular and fallacious, they are not unsound.

This post I made on another forum a while back is kinda related..

Perhaps Good=unselfish and Bad=selfish. However, the concept of selfishness doesn't mean much either. Humans are fundamentally 'selfish' – as are all living things. Selfish behaviour does not spring from ignorance – it springs from the thing that makes us desire to continue our existence, from which springs 'survival of the fittest'.

Do not all living things sustain themselves by using the resources available to them. A plant uses sunlight and water and bacteria without regard to the consequences, an animal eats other living things without their permission. Is this bad or selfish – no.

Genetic complexity and large numbers of a species breed the need for cooperation. When this cooperation occurs it is not unselfish – it is 'selfish' as it's purpose is to prolong ones life by improving the security of obtaining food, procreating and so on (which is programmed into us – rather than actually being selfish). We are herd animals not because we are not selfish but the opposite. It is the effects of being in a herd that makes us human, not good or evil. Our concepts of what is good/evil originate from what is best for the herd.

The benefits of being in a herd also gave us the opportunity to develop brains with sufficient complexity to imagine concepts such as good and evil – but these concepts only exist because the herd needs organisation, the ability for individuals to make decisions of benefit to the herd.

This is why there is no classifiable set of things that are good or bad, there is only what may be right for one's future or what may be bad for one's future. As we grow from infants we interrelate and react to others around us and we understand that non-cooperation will harm us, decrease the chances of a successful future – so we associate this learned behaviour of cooperation to being unselfish or good.

God plays no role as god does not exist. Free will plays no role as free will only exists in relation to ones past experiences (meaning it doesn't really exist either). You cannot have a god that interferes in human activities and at the same time have real free will – it is not logically possible. The act of making a decision on whether something is right or wrong is not free will – making decisions is basically just choosing between the choices available.

You may say I have free will to help the old lady across the road or to grab her purse. If you help the lady you will feel happy as you will be meeting the herds requirements for cooperation that have been programmed into you since you were born – there is a mental match and it pleases you. If you steal her purse then you will feel sad if you associate yourself as being a member of same herd as the old lady, but you wont feel AS* sad or quilty if what you are doing is OK within the subset of the herd that you associate more directly or strongly with, such as a gang or a different racial community. (*the word AS applies as there are competing levels of herd influence, so the larger community mindset still influences the subset)

the meme of barnaby
Registered User
Posts: 1
(10/24/03 9:52 am)
Reply

read and rationalize...you may be destined to

---

Peception is the only underlying factor with regards to right and wrong. Tink has defined consequence as another determinant, but as our own percepts also bias what we may imagine the outcome to be, I fail to see how perception is not the sole determinant (ie. "consequence" is simply another facet of perception). There is no ABSOLUTE right and wrong. Indeed, the concept of right and wrong is itself a construct of the mind. The real question lies in HOW we interpret the world. For example, is there some inherent neural networking that limits the variability of perceiving right and wrong, one responsible for causing a perception of right and wrong? Ie. is it impossible for a human not to have feelings of 'right' or 'wrong,' or does this come as a natural component of rational decision making? Are we destined to judge?

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The compatibility of free will and determinism.

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 905(1/30/04 10:34 am)Reply  | The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> A simple proof by Kevin Solway. Quote: <hr/> it is simple enough to prove that they are perfectly compatible <hr/> Fire away Kevin. |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 70(1/30/04 10:49 am)Reply                                                                                   | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> Quote: <hr/> A simple proof by Kevin Solway. Quote: <hr/> it is simple enough to prove that they are perfectly compatible <hr/> |

Fire away Kevin.

---

Yes Kevin. Please do so.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 314
(1/30/04 12:30 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Re: Compatibility of free-will and determinism

Quote:

---

Fire away Kevin.

---

What we call "free will" is our perception that we are, to some degree, in control of what we are doing. And it is based on our lack of ability to predict the future. That is, even though the future is necessarily fully predetermined by the present moment, we ourselves don't know what is predetermined, and that leaves space for our so-called "free will".

Our "free-will" consists of our "choosing" between one course of action and another, and we do this choosing because we don't know which course of action we will take prior to taking it. But whichever way we choose, that particular choice is necessarily always predetermined.

Thus, we have "free-will", which is really an illusion, though a real and useful enough figure of speech, and complete determinism, at the same time.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2145
(1/30/04 12:37 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

This is all irrelevant. Do you think women should become uglier like David Quinn does?

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 75
(1/30/04 1:03 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Quote:

---

This is all irrelevant. Do you think women should become uglier like David Quinn does?

---

Suergaz, you really are a chimp. So why don't you sit at the back of the room and shut up. Do not make a sound until it is your turn to have a banana.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2147
(1/30/04 1:07 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Krussel, you are a banana. I am not ever going to use emoticons again. Guess the fucking sense.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 219
(1/30/04 1:35 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Quote:

---

KSolway: What we call "free will" is our perception that we are, to some degree, in control of what we are doing. And it is based on our lack of ability to predict the future. That is, even though the future is necessarily fully predetermined by the present moment, we ourselves don't know what is predetermined, and that leaves space for our so-called "free will".

Our "free-will" consists of our "choosing" between one course of action and another, and we do this choosing because we don't know which course of action we will take prior to taking it. But whichever way we choose, that particular choice is necessarily always predetermined.

Thus, we have "free-will", which is really an illusion, though a real and useful enough figure of speech, and complete determinism, at the same time.

---

We cannot comprehend the "now" at any moment of time. One can know the event in the past, but not as the present. There is no real-present sense, even though we falsely assume there to be. I can remember where I was on January 28th at 1:02 pm, but if it were that date and time this instant, it would have passed upon my realization, thus inventing the past. So, really why argue free-will in the first place, and why continue to acknowledge illusion as any truth (reality)?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 315
(1/30/04 1:51 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

cassiopeiae wrote:

Quote:

---

So, really why argue free-will in the first place, and why continue to acknowledge illusion as any truth (reality)?

---

Free will is one of those illusions we cannot escape, like the illusion of "self" (in fact, free will is dependent on the illusion of self), however we can stop being taken-in by the illusion, at the same time as continuing to use it for communicating with ourselves and others.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 220
(1/30/04 1:59 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Quote:

---

KSolway: Free will is one of those illusions we cannot escape, like the illusion of "self" (in fact, free will is dependent on the illusion of self), however we can stop being taken-in by the illusion, at the same time as continuing to use it for communicating with ourselves and others.

---

By not being "taken-in" by the illusion of "free-will" or the "self" is escaping the illusion. Once it is realized as illusion, there is only the existence of a fallacy. It has nothing to do with communicating with ourselves...the "self" is illusion, remember? ;-)

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2159
(1/30/04 2:12 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

The chimp wrote:

Quote:

---

This is all irrelevant. Do you think women should become uglier like David Quinn does?

---

Verily, perchance I have taken from you an hundred definitions and the dearest playthings of your virtue; and now are ye wroth with me as children are. They played on the seashore - then came a wave and swept all their toys away into the deep: now they weep.

But this same wave shall bring them new playthings and cast new coloured shells at their feet. Thus shall they be comforted; and like them ye also, my friends, shall have your comforts - and new coloured shells!

- Thus Spake Zarathustra

|                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 221(1/30/04 2:16 pm)Reply                                                                                  | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Verily, perchance I have taken from you an hundred definitions and the dearest playthings of your virtue; and now are ye wroth with me as children are. They played on the seashore - then came a wave and swept all their toys away into the deep: now they weep. But this same wave shall bring them new playthings and cast new coloured shells at their feet. Thus shall they be comforted; and like them ye also, my friends, shall have your comforts - and new coloured shells! - Thus Spake Zarathustra <hr/> This would pertain to vanity more than anything else... |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2162(1/30/04 2:50 pm)Reply  | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> It pertains to all worldly attachments.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 222(1/30/04 10:32 pm)Reply                                                                                 | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> Exactly, but in regards to what seurgaz said...attachments have nothing to do with the physical composition of anything, like genetics or the like...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 2168 (1/31/04 3:22 am) Reply  | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> Sure, but Suergaz is obviously very attached to the physical beauty of women and routinely expresses strong moral indignation at the mere thought of doing without it. This makes it, for him, a "dearest plaything of his virtue".                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| cassiopeiae Registered User Posts: 222 (1/31/04 4:30 am) Reply                                                                                | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> snicker                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2148 (1/31/04 11:20 am) Reply                                                                                  | Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism. <hr/> Cassiopeiae is gorgeous when she snickers. At least post the hollingdale translation David you cow. Last Will So to die as once I saw him die - the friend who like a god cast glances of lightning into my dark youth: - wanton, profound, in the slaughter a dancer- of fighters the cheerfulest, of victors the sternest, a destiny standing upon his destiny, firm, reflecting, prelecting-: trembling with joy of victory, rejoicing that he died in victory: by dying, commanding --and he commanded destruction... |

So to die
as once I saw him die:
victorious, destroying...

(Since we're quoting Nietzsche)

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2148
(1/31/04 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

David, I have taken away the playthings of your virtue, 'Ultimate Reality' 'The hidden void' 'absolute truth' 'pure reason'----you will learn to play again, or die.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1363
(1/31/04 1:20 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

Quote:

---

Verily, perchance I have taken from you an hundred definitions...

---

Ha, Ha, I thought you were trying to copy Suergaz's style to teach him a lesson, and then I thought, gosh he's doing a good job...!

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 515
(1/31/04 1:57 pm)
Reply

Re: The compatibility of free will and determinism.

---

by dying, commanding
--and he commanded destruction...

So to die
as once I saw him die:
victorious, destroying...

prolly stating the obvious, but I assume this means

To command destruction one must first understand what it is. Only by having total control over anything can you fully command it, at the personal level. To do this you must die, as you must destroy emotion, wich is what people think of as life. This then leads to a desire to destroy emotion in others.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2149(1/31/04 3:10 pm)Reply | --- <hr/> I think you should stay away from swimming pools and most electrical appliances.                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 516(1/31/04 3:40 pm)Reply   | Re: --- <hr/> I think you should stay away from swimming pools and most electrical appliances. Yep. There is a lot of tobacco under the keys of my keyboard, so I should stay away from that particular appliance when I'm 'smokin' ! Yep. Swimming pools as well, far too many bikinis. |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The compatibility of free will and determinism.

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1439(1/31/04 3:43 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Tobacco. RIIiiiiiiight.                                                                                                                                                                  |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 518(1/31/04 3:47 pm)Reply       | Re: --- <hr/> Yes, now, and both prior to the last two weeks.Reason give me strength! btw...I meant that and 'lots of mental activity' Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/31/04 3:52 pm |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2150(1/31/04 3:51 pm)Reply     | ---- <hr/> Tobacco is disgusting. Jimhaz, why is it you don't know the difference between the words reveal and revel?                                                                                  |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 519(1/31/04 3:58 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                             | Re: ---- <hr/> Tobacco is disgusting. Absolutely. in fact i gave up for 3 years, but mull took its place, when mullless I turned to tobacco (3 years ago). That is the nature of attachments, as has been pointed out to you. why is it you don't know the difference between the words reveal and revel? A mistake, such is what you are doing in trying to spin it into a misunderstanding of words rather than simply a lack of attention to my spelling. Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/31/04 3:59 pm                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2151(1/31/04 4:01 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                           | --- <hr/> You did it twice in a row though, which is why I'm asking you, not spinning it into something it is not as you are suggesting.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| N0X23 <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 74(2/3/04 4:57 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Thus, we have "free-will", which is really an illusion, though a real and useful enough figure of speech, and complete determinism, at the same time. <hr/> So if free-will is an illusion and free-will is Volition and Volition is Intention and Intention is Karma and Karma is the root of Ignorance and Craving and Ignorance and Craving leads to Action and Action leads to Reaction and Action and Reaction is Cause and Effect and Cause and Effect is Determinism, which leads us to Determinism being an illusion as well? |

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 538(2/3/04 9:23 am)Reply         | Re: --- <hr/> You did it twice in a row though, which is why I'm asking you, not spinning it into something it is not as you are suggesting A lack of attention to detail and tiredness. It happens all the time. I often spell words like cause as cuase. I leave out words all the time as well. Most of my posts need some form of grammatical correction after I've posted. Perhaps the more mentally 'masculine' one is the less attention to detail, it becomes less important. You don't particularly care if people judge you and think less of you because of these petty mistakes. Or it could be early signs of 'alzimers' or something like that. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2173(2/3/04 12:30 pm)Reply      | -- <hr/> I think it is not a masculine or feminine, but an asinine trait to not know grammar and punctuation instinctively from a very early age.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1378(2/3/04 12:36 pm)Reply | Re: -- <hr/> Its not a matter of being asinine, it is a matter of a certain kind of intelligence, and while I possess it I think it rather low-grade since it is merely a kind of visual memory. Also, if you posted long posts a few mistakes might creep in. It's easy to perfect your one-liners.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2175(2/3/04 12:39 pm)Reply      | ---- <hr/> Who's saying I don't make mistakes? Jimhaz won't admit he doesn't know how to spell revel (:D) Or maybe he never knew the word!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 1(2/3/04 12:41 pm)Reply                                                                                 | Re: -- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Also, if you posted long posts a few mistakes might creep in.It's easy to perfect your one-liners. <hr/> Ah-ha-ha-ha-hahah-haha-ha-ha! Could one Bird! Naz she really got you with that one. he-he. :D |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1381(2/3/04 12:59 pm)Reply                                                                              | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Or maybe he never knew the word! <hr/> But he used it appropriately. And what if he was drinking?                                                                                                         |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2178(2/3/04 1:33 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Jimhaz doesn't drink. He's too old. He can barely roll his own smoke without losing it to his keyboard.                                                                                                                                     |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 551(2/3/04 1:54 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: ---- <hr/> We all drink something, lately I've been drinking in reason. But as Dave Toast said, it probably won't last. Hope it doesn't I'll lose my job!!!!                                                                                           |

N0X23

Registered User
Posts: 74
(2/3/04 6:49 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Thus, we have "free-will", which is really an illusion, though a real and useful enough figure of speech, and complete determinism, at the same time.

---

So if free-will is an illusion and free-will is Volition and Volition is Intention and Intention is Karma and Karma is the root of Ignorance and Craving and Ignorance and Craving leads to Action and Action leads to Reaction and Action and Reaction is Cause and Effect and Cause and Effect is Determinism, which leads us to Determinism being an illusion as well?

ksolway

Registered User
Posts: 331
(2/3/04 10:20 pm)

Reply

Re: freewill/determinism

---

Nox wrote:

Quote:

---

K: Thus, we have "free-will", which is really an illusion, though a real and useful enough figure of speech, and complete determinism, at the same time.

So if free-will is an illusion and free-will is Volition and Volition is Intention and Intention is Karma . . . which leads us to Determinism being an illusion as well?

---

Intention is not necessarily karma. A Buddha has free-will, volitions, and intentions, but no "karma". So that's where your sequence breaks down.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|  MGregory Registered User Posts: 332 (2/3/04 11:24 pm) Reply                                                                                                                       |  Re: freewill/determinism <hr/> What is "karma"?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|  ksolway Registered User Posts: 332 (2/3/04 11:37 pm) Reply     |  Re: freewill/determinism <hr/> MGregory wrote: Quote: <hr style="width: 60%; margin-left: 40px;"/> What is "karma"? <hr style="width: 60%; margin-left: 40px;"/> A network of cause and effect associated with delusion. |
|  MGregory Registered User Posts: 332 (2/3/04 11:43 pm) Reply                                                                                                                       |  Re: freewill/determinism <hr/> So what is the network associated with wisdom called?                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|  ksolway Registered User Posts: 333 (2/3/04 11:48 pm) Reply   |  Re: freewill/determinism <hr/>  Quote: <hr style="width: 60%; margin-left: 40px;"/> So what is the network associated with wisdom called? <hr style="width: 60%; margin-left: 40px;"/> Cause and effect.                 |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The compatibility of free will and determinism.

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| N0X23  Registered UserPosts: 74(2/4/04 6:29 am)Reply  | Re: freewill/determinism <hr/> Solway: Quote: <hr/> Intention is not necessarily karma. A Buddha has free-will, volitions, and intentions, but no "karma". So that's where your sequence breaks down. <hr/> Volition is the power of choosing or determining and Intention is a determination to act. Karma/Kamma is Volition is Intention, the sequence stands. The determining factor that keeps the Buddhas and the Arahants action's from developing into Karma, is that their Volition/Intention/Free-Will, are free from the influence of Greed, Aversion and Delusion.And yet, even the Buddhas are subject to the effects of Karma/Kamma. |

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2192(2/4/04 11:47 am)Reply  | Re: freewill/determinism <hr/> It is quite obvious that action stands apart from volition in as much as one cannot but have the former to produce the latter. Kevin and yourself can be karmic buddham buddies, and leave all desiring to those who are 'man' enough for it. |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

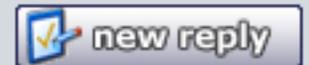

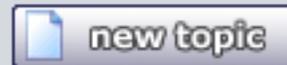

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Concept of Self-esteem

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BJMcGillyRegistered UserPosts: 12(5/5/04 6:05 am)Reply |  The Concept of Self-esteem <hr/> With the offense of shame, the offended's sense of value hangs in the balance under the guise of honor, or reputation and may only be redeemed through vengeance. The experience of shame is more base than guilt, being impuned on the shamed from an external source. The redemption of the guilty is the higher of the two, as for the man of genius his eternal self, his very identity and salvation are at stake. True guilt, here defined as being culpable for ones own loss of innocence, therefore, is a masculine character, having its telos in the guilty alone. And insofar as it is impuned and finds its source in another, it is really the feminine characteristic of shame. For the man of genius may not find his redemption in through another, be it Jesus Christ or Gotama. He must redeem himself through himself alone. To seek redemption through another is more loathesome to him than the sum of heinous acts; he would not sully the holy altar of his self with the benevolence of another. The man of genius recognizes that the feminine-minded know not even shame, only the misfortune of having been knocked down a peg or two on the pecking order. The man of genius, then, seamlessly fuses shame and guilt into the question of his eternal salvation. He alone is his final judge, bowing before no alien god or law; knowing that to do so would be to lose his self. It is important to recognize that the nobility associated with honor lost through shame is not of the highest brand; that being able to hold oneself as | ones ultimate goal and judge.

Bryan McGilly

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 1096

(5/5/04 4:25 pm)

Reply

 The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Quote:

---

BJMcGilly

. . . . . The man of genius, then, seamlessly fuses shame and guilt into the question of his eternal salvation. He alone is his final judge, bowing before no alien god or law; knowing that to do so would be to lose his self.

---

EXCELLENT !

Just superb and very deep.

This will be my meditation for today.

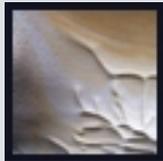

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 374

(5/7/04 11:13 am)

Reply | Edit

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

The shameful are the ones that work out their reasons afterwards.

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 5/8/04 12:17 pm

|                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BJMcGillyRegistered UserPosts: 13(5/9/04 3:24 am)Reply                                                                                                 |  Re: The Concept of Self-esteem <hr/> I once had tried meditations for given days, but I found my mind turned anything it touched to mush; to a sort of mindless mantra from which any meaning had escaped. If I still did so, I would use Rhett's words, as Rhett's meaning is superior to what I wrote. It reminds me of a quote from the Essential Teachings of Zen Master Hakuin, "What is the Way? A clear-eyed man falls into a well." |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 375(5/10/04 11:53 am)Reply   Edit  |  Re: The Concept of Self-esteem <hr/> When i no longer suffer from praise, then i will be a good man. Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 5/10/04 11:56 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2620(5/12/04 1:40 am)Reply                                                                                                |  ---- <hr/> (This blanket was left messed) Edited by: suergaz at: 5/12/04 1:43 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| BJMcGillyRegistered UserPosts: 14(5/12/04 11:45 am)Reply                                                                                               |  Re: The Concept of Self-esteem <hr/> For me, if God is my father then shame is my mother. Shame doesn't let me know who I am, but rather who I am from.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 378
(5/12/04 1:17 pm)
Reply | Edit

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

- The mother praises that which she is, and the father praises that which he is.

- The enlightened are in a terrible mess, -- they don't have any self-esteem at all!

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 5/12/04 1:28 pm

komodo island
Registered User
Posts: 6
(5/22/04 12:07 pm)
Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

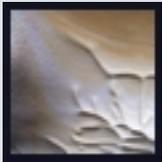

---

That's what all self-referential term is - Kapanna !

a concept, only.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 396
(5/31/04 10:56 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Why do people speak unfavourably of themselves?

I suspect that in many instances this behaviour is merely the symptom of a far more significant internal conflict. Beneath the surface of self-deprecation resides a great - but desperate - self love. This love is almost irrepressible and inescapable; all consuming. It is desperate because love is always driven by fear - and fed with lies, and in this case it is the fear of inadequacy, and the lie of self-importance. Thus, at the bottom of it all, we do find a deficient self-esteem, but it is heavily suppressed; the individual does their best to hide it for fear of the intense suffering that it would bring.

Therefore, this act of self-deprecation is an attempt to moderate their conscience, to balance out the lies that the person is telling themselves; they being the lie of self-importance, versus the truth of their low opinion of themselves. The inner lie is that they aren't admitting to these lies.

The complexity of this affliction makes it difficult to resolve, for it is a trinity of dualities. Until such time as they pierce their confusion, they are sadly eroding themselves -- yet not eradicating the self (the ego).

I've had to scratch and scrape within myself to write this as it is far removed from my own character, and nor have I given it more than brief attention, so I am thus open to being awry.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 126

(5/31/04 8:20 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Rhett,

Thanks for posting this, I recognise my lies in it immediately.

For me, this abysmal sense of lacking (inadequacy) came from a Christian upbringing (original sin, the need to work to gain merit), societal conditioning (competition to survive), and from abusive messages when I was young. The latter really attacked my ego (self-confidence), so that awareness meant a struggle against "nature".

I was in my late teens when I discovered open discussion wasn't a sin against God and inherently punishable. I was extremely quiet, because being God-fearing at home was essentially how I survived. The rare occasion I tried to present an opinion, I was crushed by stinging criticism. My siblings didn't respond to the strict discipline (based on very vague principles of proper behaviour) in the same way I did. Perhaps because I spent half a year in hospital as a 3yo, so I had a very early awareness of being cut off, alienated.

So I developed strong attachments to support-things (family), expressed as extreme indifference/independence (fear that they would be taken away). It was a perfectly natural reaction for a kid, but it isn't logical for an adult who is aware of the illusion of alienation.

Bringing this knowledge of self-deception into the spiritual journey, my longing for complete knowledge (understanding Reality) is forgetfulness of the core truth that all things are caused, and therefore empty. It's playing the old record of "I must prove myself, or it will all be taken away..."

Its illogicality is obvious: the more I seek answers, the further from God I am, simply because I have created an "I" that desires to become perfect.

This habit of self-yearning seems to be deeply ingrained, but it is quickly overcome with an awareness of emptiness. Overcoming the religious ego - the pride of rare knowledge - is a fairly simple matter in the light of causal processes.

I experience a kind of self-deprecation as a reminder to focus. When i fail to transcend the mire instantly by being mindful of Truth, the secondary tool is a whip, as a response to complacency (from pride or forgetfulness).

It is pretty simple actually, if i am distracted, i can either focus quickly, or go via a two-step process that analyses the delusion in order to be repulsed by it.

Quote:

---

The complexity of this affliction makes it difficult to resolve, for it is a trinity of dualities. Until such time as they pierce their confusion, they are sadly eroding themselves -- yet not eradicating the self (the ego).

---

Trinity of dualities: could you explain this further? I assume self/God-as-other, imperfect/perfect, real/non-existence?

BJMcGilly
Registered User
Posts: 21
(6/1/04 7:39 am)
Reply

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

I think the majority of people project their sense of worth onto their acceptance by others. In group situations, one who will speak self-deprecatingly kow-tows before the group constituents, submitting himself in order to be accepted.

I think among what level of societal interaction there is to be found amongst dogs may be found analogously in how dogs greet each other.

Admittedly, these are only outer forms, and don't explain the inner cycle explained above. But it would be shoddy to ask a question that involves interaction without treating the communal aspect.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 398
(6/1/04 12:03 pm)
Reply | Edit

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Quote:

---

Trinity of dualities: could you explain this further? I assume self/God-as-other, imperfect/perfect, real/non-existence?

---

My statement may have been misleading. I simply wanted to point to the complexity of having low self esteem at the core, then a powerful (and yet desperate) self love sitting on top of it, and finally, self deprecation trotting out the top.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 131
(6/1/04 12:05 pm)
Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

McGilly,

One person's progress could involve a community of different selves, each representing a different stage of development.

One self, compared to a previous or future self, might be a stage of inadequacy. This self would be deprecated, if adequacy were precious.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 6/1/04 12:14 pm

Jones Kelly
Posts: 132
(6/1/04 12:12 pm)
Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Rhett wrote:

Quote:

---

My statement may have been misleading. I simply wanted to point to the complexity of having low self esteem at the core, then a powerful (and yet desperate) self love sitting on top of it, and finally, self deprecation trotting out the top.

---

Actually, i agreed with what i understood you meant yesterday.

The "stable" core of self-love is stable because it is decidedly separate, so in a sense there's a wholeness.

But because of that separation, there is only stability in demanding.
Constant "eating your heart out"...

If the core had no separation, it would be truly perfect, complete and whole, desireless.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 6/1/04 12:14 pm

BJMcGilly

Registered User

Posts: 23

(6/1/04 10:13 pm)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

One self, compared to a previous or future self, might be a stage of inadequacy. This self would be deprecated, if adequacy were precious.

If adequacy were precious, adequacy would be inadequate.

Bud Hominem

Registered User

Posts: 1

(6/2/04 8:10 am)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

I learned a long time ago that you have to learn to love yourself and be happy with who you are. Otherwise, life is not worth living. Each person is a world of potential unto themselves and the key to happiness is pursuing your potential no matter how other people treat you. People can be mean and hateful, but that does not mean you have to reciprocate.

BJMcGilly

Registered User

Posts: 24

(6/2/04 10:33 pm)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

An all-around cozy suggestion, Bud.

Allow me to respond point by point:

Quote:

---

I learned a long time ago that you have to learn to love yourself and be happy with who you are.

---

I have likewise learned a bit about myself, but unfortunately my findings weren't quite as rosey as your own. I can't help but think you're sugar-coating your "learning" here, as anyone who honestly looks into his self necessarily uncovers a brood of vipers.

Quote:

---

Otherwise, life is not worth living.

---

Indeed, if you can't learn to ignore the insatiable appetites of the brood, how can you ever hope to bear a life amongst them?

Quote:

---

Each person is a world of potential unto themselves and the key to happiness is pursuing your potential no matter how other people treat you. People can be mean and hateful, but that does not mean you have to reciprocate.

---

The problem with this type of hogwash is that it requires other people as the determining factor in one's actualizing his own potential... you just have to ignore them.

Bryan McGilly

Edited by: BJMcGilly at: 6/2/04 10:41 pm

Bud Hominem
Registered User
Posts: 4
(6/3/04 1:24 am)
Reply

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Quote:

---

I have likewise learned a bit about myself, but unfortunately my findings weren't quite as rosey as your own.

---

Just because you suck, that doesn't mean everyone does.

Quote:

---

Indeed, if you can't learn to ignore the insatiable appetites of the brood, how can you ever hope to bear a life amongst them?

---

Everyone has appetites and you learn to channel them, if you can't do this, you're a weak-willed individual.

Quote:

---

The problem with this type of hogwash is that it requires other people as the determining factor in one's actualizing his own potential... you just have to ignore them.

---

Did you even read what I said? It's clear from your reply that you either didn't or don't understand.

You have an overly pessimistic view of yourself.

BJMcGilly
Registered User
Posts: 26
(6/3/04 2:50 am)
Reply

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

Bud,

I think you're making this issue too easy for yourself without first clarifying the nature of the "self", ie. the ego.

I define the ego as the sense of self by which conscious existence is perceived, noting likewise the profound truth that existence is dependent upon consciousness.

The ego, that brood of vipers, is dependent upon a false sense of awareness for its survival (ie., me, mine; along with the conceptual frameworks that each projects onto reality). The ego is forever grasping after things with which to buoy itself, forever attempting to evade the nothingness into which all things return. But the ego, and everyone who operates from that sense of self, is just a thing. The only way out of this is to end identification with the ego, and set yourself on wrestling with awareness of the truth.

To do this requires perfect intellectual understanding of the nature of reality. Such understanding involves knowledge of the impermanent nature of things, the experience of suffering as the result of ignorance, emptiness of inherent characteristics in things, etc.

Not enough of the ego's faults can ever be unearthed. All worldly sufferings are experienced as such because the ego abides in the primordial swamp of the unconscious, sinking in the mire of ignorance.

As for myself, I would be considered weak-willed by popular conventions; but this allows for certain advantages undreamt of by those who are ever busying themselves over the great matter of channeling their energy into fleeting enterprises.

To focus on understanding the truths of reality, now there's a worthwhile enterprise that will never stop paying dividends.

But if you're not willing to honestly evaluate yourself in your own light, you'll never stop paying for it.

Bryan McGilly

Edited by: BJMcGilly at: 6/3/04 2:58 am

Jones Kelly
Posts: 138
(6/3/04 3:04 pm)
Reply

 Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

BJMcGilly wrote:

Quote:

---

I define the ego as the sense of self by which conscious existence is perceived, noting likewise the profound truth that existence is dependent upon consciousness.

---

Likewise, consciousness is dependent on existence of experiences. Ultimately consciousness is also inherently non-existent. Depth of attachment to any particular experience or appearance indicates the depth of ego.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

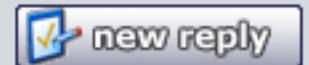

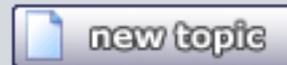

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

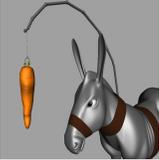

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Concept of Self-esteem

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 667(6/3/04 8:40 pm)Reply  |  Re: The Concept of Self-esteem <hr/> I'm a self depreciator and yes I have a strong ego. I think I sometimes do it as it gives me the illusion that because I like to say what I think, and I am not a gifted verbal communicator, then if I self depreciate I'll set the relationship up at the lowest common denominator from which anything can be an improvement, therefore I can say or do odd things. It gives one an excuse to be different and more open. As BJ said 'submitting himself in order to be accepted', but different from deciding to completely conform. Gosh it reminds me of the relationship a lot of men have with their girlfriend/ wife. I guess friendship groups aren't that much different. Of course that is just one of many mostly older causes of why it still persists in me. The interplay between the coolness of sometimes feeling humble by being humble and rampant ego where you want to be respected by everyone for some skill you don't have is also entertaining. The posts above seem to describe the self-depreciation effect pretty well, unfortunately for me :) |

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 400

(6/7/04 10:09 am)

Reply | Edit

Re: The Concept of Self-esteem

---

I've always contrasted my appraisal of self with my ideal of perfection.

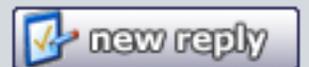

When they don't coincide, and when i'm in an ego-state; the more i have failed to measure up to my standards, the more i suffer. And if i appraise myself innaccurately highly or lowly - in an individual or a social context, i also suffer for my inadequacy to appraise myself truthfully.

Thus, i've always tried to judge myself as accurately as possible. Social forces have had very little sway on these judgements.

Regarding self-deprecation, if one uses it as a social tool, it comes at a heavy price, for one immediately loses all respect from the group that one has pandered to. And if people don't respect you, it is ever so much harder to respect yourself . . . so beware the vicious cycle.

A closing remark; A common judgement i make these days is 'self = the Infinite' . . . . .

Nice One eh?

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

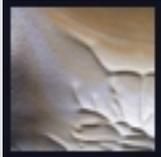

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Concept of Time

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 356(4/2/04 12:57 pm)Reply  | The Concept of Time <hr/> Here is an extract from a Buddhist textbook; The Concept of Time The concept of "time" was created by mankind, for the convenience of mankind. Time itself does not have it's own nature or identity. If we cut time up into little portions, every little bit of time can be considered to be either the past, present, or the future, because time itself does not have a self nature. The common people of the world have several concepts of time that may be classified into the four models below: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1) The model of a line</li> <li>2) The model of a line without an end</li> <li>3) The model of a line without a beginning or an end</li> <li>4) The model of a circle</li> </ol> Model 1: Time is like a line ----- The line represents the stages of life that we go through. As shown, a line has both a beginning and an end. In the same way, when there is a birth, there will also be a death. |

People who hold this view live life for the moment. These people may say things like "Ah, there is some alcohol. Let's get drunk now!" or "Right now the flowers are really beautiful. Let's pluck them now before they wither". These people care about what is right in front of them, so they earn as much money as they can, and do not worry about what happens after death.

Model 2: Time is like a line without end

-----}

[The parentheses "}" things are meant to be arrows, just like the < and >. I couldn't use the arrows because topica registered them as HTML]

This line has a beginning, but no ending. This is like the view held by people who believe in a "God". The beginning of time is when the god created

Adam and Eve, and from then on, life continues without ending. Those who believe in the god will be saved and go to heaven, where they will enjoy everlasting happiness. Those who do not believe in the god, are children of the devil (heretics), and will go to hell, where they will suffer eternal damnation. Under such a doctrine, people must obey the commandments as laid down by the god. We cannot have our own view or will. We must obey the god's word. If we can do this, then we can go to heaven.

Model 3: Time is like a line without a beginning or an end

{-----}

Under this concept of time, it is hard to say what is present, what is past, and what is the future, unless we assume an origin point 0. Things to the right are positive (or the future). Things to the left of 0 are negative (or the past). This view of time says that whatever is in the past cannot be changed, and the future is full of hope.

People who believe in this model of time, also believe in the Three Birth Theory. This is that there are past lives, present lives and future lives. These people are always thinking of the future, never stopping to look at where they are now. Religions like Hinduism, Brahmanism and some Chinese religions follow this concept.

Model 4: Time is like a circle

o

This is as if time was like a clock. You cannot find a beginning, nor an ending to the points on the clock. After 12 o'clock, it becomes 1 o'clock. The hands on the clock are constantly moving. It is impossible for us to say which point is the original point. We only divide the clock using the different numbers (e.g., 12, 1, 2, 3, etc) for convenience. However, each and every single point on the clock can be considered as both a beginning, as well as an ending.

This is very similar to the concept of karma in Buddhism. Each and every individual action that we do, can be both a cause as well as an effect. The Buddhist concept of time adheres to the circular model. This model also implies that both karma and samsara are interrelated.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 25

(4/2/04 2:28 pm)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Time

---

Rhett: Model 4: Time is like a circle

o

This is as if time was like a clock. You cannot find a beginning, nor an ending to the points on the clock. After 12 o'clock, it becomes 1 o'clock. The hands on the clock are constantly moving. It is impossible for us to say which point is the original point. We only divide the clock using the different numbers (e.g., 12, 1, 2, 3, etc) for convenience. However, each and every single point on the clock can be considered as both a beginning, as well as an ending.

This is very similar to the concept of karma in Buddhism. Each and every individual action that we do, can be both a cause as well as an effect. The Buddhist concept of time adheres to the circular model. This model also implies that both karma and samsara are interrelated.

This concept of time is strongly represented in Javanese gamelan music, where one is never headed anywhere, having already arrived.

I think there is another time model. This is the infinite, which is not a circle, but is related in as far as each point contains every point (every beginning and end). Thus, at x kilometres from where my apparent existence is, i am already dead. This occurrence is simultaneous in time with my point of awareness here and now.

SDWangmo
Registered User
Posts: 124
(4/2/04 2:55 pm)
Reply

Re: The Concept of Time

---

Quote:

---

I think there is another time model. This is the infinite, which is not a circle, but is related in as far as each point contains every point (every beginning and end). Thus, at x kilometres from where my apparent existence is, i am already dead. This occurrence is simultaneous in time with my point of awareness here and now.

---

Very interesting. If time is just a conceptual construct (& I think it is) your expression of the simultaneity of 'now' & 'birth' or 'death' makes sense. But 'x kilometres' is just transferring the problem from time to space. I wonder about a situation in which both time & space were experienced as conceptual constructs & what the reality of that might be.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 906
(4/2/04 6:23 pm)
Reply

Re: The Concept of Time

---

SDWangmo: I wonder about a situation in which both time & space were experienced as conceptual constructs & what the reality of that might be.

It might be much like general relativity and quantum mechanics. Imaginary time. Lots of differential equations. It's an acquired taste, but you can't deny the beauty of it.

Thomas

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1677
(4/3/04 9:58 am)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Time

---

Oh yes you can, and I do.

Dan Rowden

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 360
(4/3/04 10:07 am)

Reply

Re: The Concept of Time

---

Bug out Knierim.

Don't turn this thread into a load of hogwash.

-----

Yes, the circle is also just a construct, which can easily be related to our daily clocks, as they have done.

Emptiness is beyond the circle, and yet, is not a denial of the circle.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 28
(4/3/04 12:18 pm)

Reply

time and space constructs

---

SDWangmo: Very interesting. If time is just a conceptual construct (& I think it is) your expression of the simultaneity of 'now' & 'birth' or 'death' makes sense. But 'x kilometres' is just transferring the problem from time to space. I wonder about a situation in which both time & space were experienced as conceptual constructs & what the reality of that might be.

How would you define your "experience" within the reality of a conceptual time and space construct? Say, if the infinite concept of spatial time were based on the ability to conceive of space?

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 114(4/3/04 1:32 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: time and space constructs <hr/> I think if time had a shape it would be like the original sideways "8". Both circles would grow without any apparent notice and could represent God's transcendent nature. One circle would represent the physical and the other meta-physical. Maybe one side would be more dependent than the other, so it spins around it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 857(4/3/04 4:27 pm)Reply                                                                                         | ... <hr/> Wow, Static! My hairs are standing on end! I didn't read this topic, but I'd just like to say that time is an idea, and that's about it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1063(4/4/04 12:22 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Time is just another aspect of the mind's orientation. It's shape is human, round these parts. Edited by: Dave Toast at: 4/4/04 12:23 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Jones KellyPosts: 30(4/4/04 2:45 pm)Reply                                                                                                          | Re: concept of time <hr/> X: I think if time had a shape it would be like the original sideways "8". Both circles would grow without any apparent notice and could represent God's transcendent nature. One circle would represent the physical and the other meta-physical. Maybe one side would be more dependent than the other, so it spins around it. This assumes time actually has a physical representation, as well as movement within a metaphysical relationship. If physical time is rotating (perhaps "continuing" in a circular line rather than spinning) in relationship to the rotating of metaphysical time, this assumes two separate and distinct times that are nevertheless joined at only one point (consciousness?). How can consciousness simultaneously join two temporal constructs? <hr/> |

Development of "infinite space and time" concept

I am not satisfied with the equations, and would like feedback. It is also problematic in its discrete separations, but i guess it is a model.

If point x (awareness) occurs within infinite space, there is no distinction between anything until a point y (appearance of object) occurs.

Space is this distinction: it is a scale that measures difference, not necessarily size or distance.

In this concept, x is a simultaneously omnidirectional eye in the infinite. It is, say, the smallest possible unit greater than 0 (1st generation lepton?). It is a unit of awareness with the ability to perceive spatiality. It has no "memory".

It distinguishes nothing, only perceiving emptiness, having no scale or references. If it had a self construct, it would consider itself infinite.

y is a visible contrast - not transparent nor an enclosing sphere nor smaller than x nor internal to x. In essence it is simply a visible contrast.

Only now can space be perceived. It is the ground for conceptual distinction. It is essentially boundlessness, neither the "negative" for y or x, nor their positive representation y or x. It is included within and without y and x.

It is not like Plato's world soul that takes on the nature of that which is distinguished, because it is essentially formless.

So, in such a conception of space, the reality of awareness is that there is no distinction between x and y, since infinite space is boundless. Awareness x (if it could also think) would understand that infinite space caused y to appear, in the same way that it caused x to appear.

This is because x and y have the same nature or relationship to infinite space.

x = not (infinity - x)

y = not (infinity - y)

x = not y

y = not x x = infinity - y

y = infinity - x

Therefore, x is caused by the infinite without y (but never distinct from the infinite except with y).

And, y is caused by the infinite without x (but never perceived except with x).

Also,

x = not infinity

y = not infinity

Since x = not y, and y = not x, therefore x = y (same nature but not same "location", ie. distinct from each other).

In essence, x and y are not of the same nature of the infinite, but are part of and are caused by the infinite.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 364

(4/7/04 11:28 am)

Reply

Re: concept of time

---

I suggest you throw all that stuff away Kelly...

It's like wrapping a hot-water bottle in 12 blankets. Neither do you benefit from it's warmth, nor can you be sure it's still at all warm.

-----

Time is like a ruler.

We place a ruler against something so that we can make a relative judgement about it.

Similarly, we place a clock against change so that we can make relative judgements about it.

|                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Jones KellyPosts: 34(4/7/04 2:12 pm)Reply | Re: concept of time<hr/> Rhett,Yes, it was a really roundabout way to state the obvious (separation creates).Ever desireless, one sees the mystery.Ever desiring, one sees the manifestations. |
|-------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 661(12/17/03 12:13 pm)Reply | The difference between man and woman...<hr/> ...is illustrated here:http://www.tip-thailand.org/Images/wedelich/20031210235526_LifeExplained4.jpg                                                |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1907(12/17/03 12:26 pm)Reply      | Re: The difference between man and woman...<hr/> Quite a good illustration.Man: austere, pure, simple, straightforward, cutting to the core, non-duplicitious.Woman: decorative, all over the place, conflicting desires and intentions, incoherent, never really achieves anything. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 373(12/17/03 12:32 pm)Reply                                                                                                 | Re: The difference between man and woman...<hr/> Macho Thomas comes up with an internet oldie.Yes, women are great, aren't they?                                                                                                                                                                 |

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1136

(12/17/03 2:18 pm)

Reply

men and women

---

I'm particularly fond of that picture and keep it in my inbox.

Man: austere, pure, simple, straightforward, cutting to the core, non-duplicitious.

Woman: decorative, all over the place, conflicting desires and intentions, incoherent, never really achieves anything.

Yes, being a woman, at least a great woman, is harder to pull off in a way because it is so much more complex a life. For this reason, women have 15% more blood flow to their brains. Yes, it appears more chaotic, and perhaps it is indeed a sign of inefficiency, but it is also because women engage in a wider variety of tasks. It certainly is easier to need less blood flow when you are able to focus on one thing at a time, and when large areas of concern are sort of gray for you.

It's interesting though, that yogis and experienced meditators have been shown to enter certain brain wave patterns which balance the two sides of their brains. Interesting because women are already born with a larger apparatus to connect the two hemispheres, which gives them a definite leg up in enlightenment. But as far as meditating, it appears women and girls have a harder time shutting off the minds than men do.

Oh it's all well and good to simply dismiss the emotional realm as superfluous. When even a small little girl sees an infant, or even another small helpless creature, her brain releases oxytocin - the same hormone that causes milk to let down and the uterus to contract. A small boy has no such reaction. So the world of things needing nurturing is just not very real to him. Naturally, when something is not very real to you, it is easy to dismiss it. But isn't it funny that women care about complex, living systems, and men care about how stuff works and moves.

According to the latest brain research, the inner experience of little girls is richer than that of little boys. They also have better impulse control, for hormonal reasons.

I was reading one such recent book, in which a couple described the behavior of the daughter and son when young. The boy, obviously very bright, was totally focused on machines from about age 2. The little girl had a whole fantasy life with her various dolls and stuffed animals. One day when going into the store, she took a stuffed animal to carry into the store with her, leaving two in the car. Her mother invited her to take another one. No, the girl said, if she did that, the one left behind would be lonely, whereas if she left two together, everyone would have company. The mother was struck by the fact that her little boy, in a million years, would never have even considered having such thoughts about a hunk of cloth.

This little girl will one day know how to raise a real man.

avidaloca
Registered User
Posts: 139
(12/17/03 2:49 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

birdofhermes wrote:

Quote:

---

it is so much more complex a life. For this reason, women have 15% more blood flow to their brains. ... women are already born with a larger apparatus to connect the two hemispheres, which gives them a definite leg up in enlightenment....According to the latest brain research, the inner experience of little girls is richer than that of little boys. They also have better impulse control, for hormonal reasons.

---

It's obvious that these findings are open to all kinds of interpretation, and yours is but one specifically designed to support your agenda. No direct correlation between these vague medical theories and the sweeping assumptions you make about their alleged affects exists in any way at all. You could just as easily make the argument that they are retarded imbeciles due to the flooding of hormones and inability to focus logically.

Martin

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 665(12/17/03 3:11 pm)Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> Paul: Macho Thomas comes up with an internet oldie. Yes, women are great, aren't they? I don't see the macho part. I imagined being offered those two devices at the same price. I would definitely buy the one with the colorful buttons, because it seems better value and more fun. Thomas   |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 894(12/17/03 5:40 pm)Reply                                                                                             | men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> birdofhermesThis little girl will one day know how to raise a real man. <hr/> Absolute truth. A woman in mother mode is like an army.In lover mode she is like a rabble. A man in father mode is like a cause.In lover mode he is like a dictator. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 458(12/17/03 6:11 pm)Reply                                                                                         | Re: men and women <hr/> A bunch of lies.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 375(12/18/03 1:17 am)Reply                                                                                            | Re: men and women <hr/> Sorry, Thomas. You have a great smile!Another internet oldie for ya.http://www.good4asmile.com/funpics/men_remote.htm                                                                                                               |

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1910
(12/18/03 8:07 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

I imagined being offered those two devices at the same price. I would definitely buy the one with the colorful buttons, because it seems better value and more fun.

---

This is classic misogyny, of course - reducing woman to the status of a toy. For most men, that's all that women are - multi-knobbed bits of fun. The evil of this outlook lies in the way that it pressures women not to develop consistency in their thinking and behaviour, and thus blocks off their chances to evolve into the simplicity of a sage.

Kellyven
Registered User
Posts: 5
(12/18/03 5:46 pm)
Reply

In labour for those in labour OR pap-producers vs prodders

---

“In labour for those in labour” OR “prodders vs. pap-producers”

Keywords: survival, evolutionary winners, competition, egotism, emotion

Because humans have developed to ensure their continuity at the expense of the survival of other species (this might be the definition of egotism), they focus on survival as an ultimate ordinance. What is survival for humans as a species? By nature, it is continuity by remaking.

Humans have a sexual remaking, meaning two different “sectioned” types (“cut” off from each other, ie “sex”). They are two different types because of the continuity imperative: one type is constantly holding (labouring to maintain attachments between survival inputs and “itself” – including in “itself” all the things it holds) and the other type is constantly creating the links to survival inputs that the other maintains.

The former type, according to the survival-by-remaking “prick” (instinct), is a curer and a carer; the latter type is a kind of gaseous current that labours in an apparent chaos to “generate more energy”. The generation of energy is a process of establishing an order, or destroying an order; it builds and breaks so that the other type can glean inputs for the consequent “remakes” (the next set).

Because one type is by comparison more dependent on the risk activity of the other type, it is perceived by the entire species to be less capable of generating inputs on its own or ensuring the total species' continuity. However, because "traditional" risk-taking behaviour has generated a scarcity of inputs (by not ensuring the continuity of other species), as a result the entire species has come to a point of conflict.

That is, because one type is attached to securing the remaking process, and the other obsessed with supporting that process, the species as a whole has lost its capacity to survive within its whole system.

Simply, they fuck (everything else off).

The obsession in this forum with genius, logical thinking, reason and rationality demonstrates the return to a different kind of remaking – the destruction of the traditional risk activities and creation of new risk activities. The emphasis on non-attachment, non-security, non-maintenance, and non-continuity of the problematic human types (that have caused problems in how the species survives) is about "risking" the species' survival by eliminating that type.

Eliminating the security-conscious "holders", and turning the "on the edge" or "generator" types in on themselves to destroy the species' "prick", revolves around using the species' most developed faculty, its brain (comparatively, since survival of the fittest is its obsession) to destroy an old order and establish a new one. A bit like an orb-weaver spider remaking over and over to predate on selected insects.

The effect of remaking all the species into a one-type brain category is both:

- to reduce the entire population physically by eliminating a "holder" brain type, including the attachment to remaking
- to ensure the remaining population is more focussed on non-egotistical inter-system survival, ie survival of the wisest

Many of those wise generator brain types (whether originally born a holder or a generator) must choose to eliminate themselves, to discourage attachment and self-maintenance by their demonstration. It would not seem to be a matter of will, but of the logic of causality. However, the wise must first create enough of the "de-holder-ed" types, out of both holders and generators.

From a different perspective, survival of the fittest (that is, wisest) can be seen as yet another egotistical attachment. Can the wise be sure that what their brains are generating is not caused by attachment to the "new generator” logic of special continuity?

Emotions are a reaction to ensure survival at the cost of another surviving, and are thus related to egotism, the concept that one human surviving at the expense of others is better.

Kven

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1972
(12/18/03 10:55 pm)
Reply

----

---

Hi Kelly, are you a woman?

Quote:

---

The effect of remaking all the species into a one-type brain category is both:

- to reduce the entire population physically by eliminating a “holder” brain type, including the attachment to remaking
- to ensure the remaining population is more focussed on non-egotistical inter-system survival, ie survival of the wisest

---

Can you explain this to me in other terms?

Kellyven
Registered User
Posts: 6
(12/19/03 12:56 pm)
Reply

in labour for those in labour

---

Suergaz:
Hi Kelly, are you a woman?

Quote:

-----

The effect of remaking all the species into a one-type brain category is both:

- to reduce the entire population physically by eliminating a “holder” brain type, including the attachment to remaking
- to ensure the remaining population is more focussed on non-egotistical inter-system survival, ie survival of the wisest

-----

Can you explain this to me in other terms?

Kv: I am learning the "new generator logic" and am in a process of de-holder-ing.

What is your interpretation of that quote?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 672
(12/19/03 1:28 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

David: This is classic misogyny, of course - reducing woman to the status of a toy. For most men, that's all that women are - multi-knobbed bits of fun. The evil of this outlook lies in the way that it pressures women not to develop consistency in their thinking and behaviour, and thus blocks off their chances to evolve into the simplicity of a sage.

You surely put a lot of interpretation work into a picture of an electronic device. Makes me think of Doctor Rorschach.

Besides, women can be multi-knobbed bits of fun and be spiritual and wise at the same time. I realize this may sound odd to the sageus australicus, but wisdom and humor are not mutually exclusive.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 12/19/03 1:35 pm

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 378
(12/19/03 3:06 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Quote:

---

I realize this may sound odd to the sageus australicus, but wisdom and humor are not mutually exclusive.

---

Yep, you're a riot, Thomas.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1345
(12/19/03 3:31 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Thomas mentioned,

Quote:

---

...sageus australicus...

---

A new species perhaps?

Tharan

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1918
(12/19/03 8:17 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: This is classic misogyny, of course - reducing woman to the status of a toy. For most men, that's all that women are - multi-knobbed bits of fun. The evil of this outlook lies in the way that it pressures women not to develop consistency in their thinking and behaviour, and thus blocks off their chances to evolve into the simplicity of a sage.

Thomas: You surely put a lot of interpretation work into a picture of an electronic device. Makes me think of Doctor Rorschach.

---

Just providing a contrast to your own pieces of Rorschachism.

Quote:

---

Besides, women can be multi-knobbed bits of fun and be spiritual and wise at the same time.

---

You're dreaming, Thomas. A wet dream, by the look of it.

The only way that a woman can become spiritual and wise is by reducing herself down to the one knob (and thereby attain coherency in her thinking). But they won't be encouraged to this if misogynists such as yourself keep praising how fantastic they are already are in the multi-knobbed state. The worst of it is that you're killing their souls simply for own sexual pleasure.

Quote:

---

I realize this may sound odd to the sageus australicus, but wisdom and humor are not mutually exclusive.

---

Life and Death

Cow Te Ching

The Book of Wife

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 677
(12/19/03 9:40 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Wet dream? Killing souls for my pleasure? Seems you are getting a bit huffy, David.

It must have been that remark about australopitecus.

Oh well, forget about it.

David: The only way that a woman can become spiritual and wise is by reducing herself down to the one knob.

Good luck with reducing, then.

Thomas

|                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 1919 (12/19/03 10:05 pm) Reply         | Re: men and women <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> Wet dream? Killing souls for my pleasure? Seems you are getting a bit huffy, David. <hr/> Just speaking the truth.                         |
| drowden Forum Host Posts: 1586 (12/20/03 12:11 am) Reply              | Re: men and women <hr/> Thomas lives and breathes convention. Ergo, Thomas is a Zombie. Enough said. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                              |
| Thomas Knierim Registered User Posts: 678 (12/20/03 12:58 am) Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> David, if you pretend to speak anything remotely resembling truth you should be able to prove it and tell me which souls I have murdered. While you are at it, you could explain us what a soul is. I thought you didn't believe in souls!? Thomas |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1991(1/8/04 9:08 am)Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> Krussell wrote: Quote: <hr/> Here's the difference as I see it. Women think with their hearts while men think with their penises. As a man I should know. This is true no matter how intelligent. Men think primarily with their appendages. Bill Clinton is a classic example. <hr/> That's certainly what women want us to believe. But I don't believe it. It might apply to some men, but it certainly doesn't apply to me. And if we look at the countless wonderful things men have created throughout our entire history as a species - everything from the loftiest theories and discoveries to the most sublime music and art to the fantastic civilization that we all enjoy - it becomes pretty clear that men spend an awful lot of time not thinking about sex at all. I hate the way men feel a need to constantly denigrate themselves these days, like krussel has done. I hate the way they meekly submit to the vanities and whims of women. Have men become so pussy-whipped that they can no longer think for themselves and conduct themselves with honour and dignity? |

--

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/8/04 9:09 am

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 3

(1/8/04 9:32 am)

Reply

men and women

---

Quote:

---

I hate the way men feel a need to constantly denigrate themselves these days, like krussel has done. I hate the way they meekly submit to the vanities and whims of women. Have men become so pussy-whipped that they can no longer think for themselves and conduct themselves with honour and dignity?

---

A need to constantly denigrate myself? From where do you construe that David? I have no such need. Do you think that Clinton conducted himself with honour and dignity? As for submitting to the "vanities and whims of women" as you so eloquently put it, let me make something clear. I submit to NO ONE. Man or Woman. I march to my own tune and say what I damn well please. Consequences be damned.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/8/04 12:02 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1993

(1/8/04 11:40 am)

Reply

Re: men and women

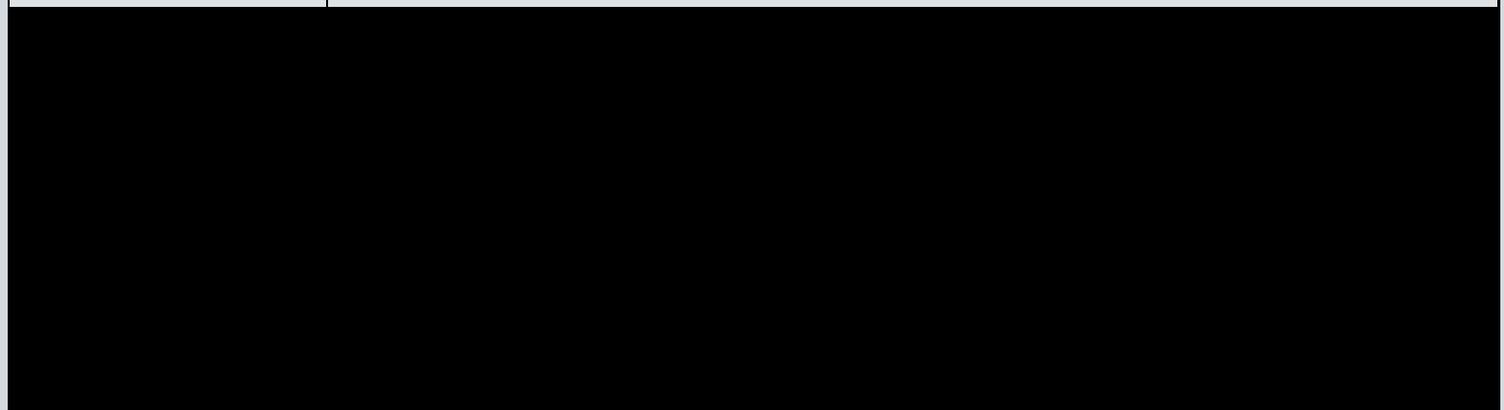

---

Even though you're a slave to your penis?

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 543(1/8/04 11:51 am)Reply    | Re: men and women <hr/> Yeah, women want us to believe we are slaves to our sexuality. They are little devils! Better watch out!                                                                                                                                    |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 5(1/8/04 11:56 am)Reply | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Even though you're a slave to your penis? <hr/> As are you. Do you deny this?                                                                                                          |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 6(1/8/04 12:00 pm)Reply | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Yeah, women want us to believe we are slaves to our sexuality. They are little devils! Better watch out! <hr/> Don't forget that they work in cahoots with the devil between our legs. |

|                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1600(1/8/04 2:24 pm)Reply  | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> Men think with their dicks? What a perfectly womanish thought! Mind you, when it comes to male engagement with women, there is undoubtedly some truth to that, but so what? What's the point of thinking with anything else in that context? I mean, really, what's the point? Women, fundamentally (as things stand), are sexuality, so what better part of the body to think with? How many men are philosophers!!!? Dan Rowden |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 548(1/8/04 6:05 pm)Reply                                                                              | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> http://www.thepeachy1.com/alex/9-10mo/hooters.jpg ...Shit guys, they got another one!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 399(1/8/04 7:10 pm)Reply                                                                                 | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> Scott, behave yourself!He said jelously.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 400(1/8/04 7:12 pm)Reply                                                                                 | Re: The difference between man and woman... <hr/> Jealously!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1995
(1/9/04 8:36 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Yeah, women want us to believe we are slaves to our sexuality. They are little devils! Better watch out!

---

You've misunderstood the point I was making.

I gave strong evidence above that men are not slaves to their sexuality, or at least they can overcome their desire for sex whenever they want to. The evidence I submitted was the countless sublime things that men have created over the millenia. So even as a crude generalization, the idea that "men think with their dicks" is clearly false. Yet it is an idea that women constantly like to foster in the wider community. They are forever saying that "men only have one thing on their minds", and so on, even though it is a complete fabrication.

And now we have men, like krussell, lamely echoing this false idea. And why? Because he wants to remain in women's good books and preserve the opportunity to get into their pants. In other words, he is one of subset of men who actually do think with their dicks.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 549
(1/9/04 8:53 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Well, I agree with you that men are not merely slaves to their sexuality. They're slaves to a lot of other things as well; like the desire to conquer, and to know everything. As my friend Katie said: guys seem to be very passionate about what they're doing, while girls just at least they can overcome their desire for sex whenever they want to

I highly agree with this. I also think women, in general, are more psychologically prone to be manipulated into sex, even if they don't want to. The generalizations you've said about women are generally true, but I stick to my point, that it does not hinder enlightenment.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 865
(1/9/04 9:39 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Quote:

---

Krussell: Here's the difference as I see it. Women think with their hearts while men think with their penises. As a man I should know. This is true no matter how intelligent. Men think primarily with their appendages. Bill Clinton is a classic example.

DQ: if we look at the countless wonderful things men have created throughout our entire history as a species - everything from the loftiest theories and discoveries to the most sublime music and art to the fantastic civilization that we all enjoy - it becomes pretty clear that men spend an awful lot of time not thinking about sex at all.

---

A man carves the meat, or puposefully tries to pursue a career and all the trinkets; he is driven by one thing.

A woman bakes a cake, or purposefully tries to select the most appropriate suitor; she is driven by one thing.

The same thing then?

Thinking doesn't come into it. Neither does sex.

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 214
(1/13/04 4:44 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

The Will to Power -or conquest- has sex/procreation as a subset, for the growth of the tribe.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 405(1/13/04 10:36 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                | Re: men and Women <hr/> With 'tribe', you mean humanity as a whole, in the context? Like Dubya means in his newborn popedom? (The bushmen around him forcing the oil-well-well-oiled puppet to say It's me rulin'!.)No, of course you don't mean that :-)Please, elaborate, ynithrix. Quality website of this day &amp; age:www.whitehouse.org/                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 17(1/14/04 12:20 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                         | Re: men and Women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> And now we have men, like krussell, lamely echoing this false idea. And why? Because he wants to remain in women's good books and preserve the opportunity to get into their pants. In other words, he is one of subset of men who actually do think with their dicks. <hr/> Jealousy will get you nowhere David. ;)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| Naturyl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 24(1/14/04 1:58 pm)Reply  | Re: men and Women <hr/> Come on now, how ridiculous is all of this? The difference between men and women is the difference between yin and yang. Both, together, comprise the universal dialectic. If inclined toward vain futility, yang can gripe about yin for an eternity to no avail, and vice-versa. In reality, neither can exist without the other, and ultimately, nothing good can come of imagining otherwise. If we glorify yin at the expense of yang, we are simply beahving in a deliberately foolish manner. There are any number of reasons we might choose to do so, but none of them involve the best aspects of reason, and all of them involve some sort of emotional block or scar which we would do better to let go of. Despite whatever |

complex and well-crafted justifications we might offer in hopes of fooling others into taking our extremism seriously, we cannot escape the plain fact that there is nothing reasonable about dismissing an entire gender as largely worthless.

This obsession with denigrating femininity is, IMO, by far the single most important reason why the other (better) ideas in this forum reach an audience far smaller than might otherwise be expected. If it could somehow be dropped or even tempered, many minds would open which were formerly closed. My own, which is hesitant to take anything said here too seriously for precisely the reason I have outlined, would likely be among them.

I realize that the chances of this post affecting anyone's mindset is virtually nil - such is the nature of fervent conviction. However, I think it had to be said anyway.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 408
(1/14/04 2:12 pm)
Reply

Re: men and Women

---

'nil'? Why?
Nothing of the sort!

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 735
(1/14/04 2:15 pm)
Reply

Re: men and Women

---

Naturyl: This obsession with denigrating femininity is, IMO, by far the single most important reason why the other (better) ideas in this forum reach an audience far smaller than might otherwise be expected. If it could somehow be dropped or even tempered, many minds would open which were formerly closed.

I can only second that, Naturyl. The misogyny issue is outright ridiculous and the fanaticism that goes with it certainly unsavory. It is forbidding enough to hamper a more serious discussion.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 256

(1/14/04 3:48 pm)

Reply

Re: men and Women

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

The difference between men and women is the difference between yin and yang.

---

Let's examine that statement.

As I understand it, yin and yang refers the passive and active elements of the Universe, which are like two facets of the same stone. In other words, they are not two different things, but are only two different views of the same thing.

The "yin" aspect refers to the way that all things fall under the absolute power of Nature/God, and have no independent power or existence. It reveals the way that all things are swept along by an all-powerful current - or like leaves blowing in the wind.

The "yang" aspect refers to ultimate power of Nature/God. It reveals the way that Nature/God metes out life and death, and change.

So it is not right to equate yin and yang with men and women, and implying that women have more "yin", because ultimately both men and women, and indeed all things in nature, equally have the yin and yang aspects I have defined.

For example, let's say we have an extremely passive, submissive person, who lets everyone walk all over them, including evil people, and thoroughly enjoys being put down and humiliated. It would not be right to say that this person possesses a lot of "yin", or that they are perfect just as they are. And that is effectively what you are saying about women, as, unfortunately, that's pretty much the way women are.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/14/04 3:54 pm

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2026(1/14/04 6:55 pm)Reply  | Re: men and Women <hr/> Naturyl wrote: Quote: <hr/> This obsession with denigrating femininity is, IMO, by far the single most important reason why the other (better) ideas in this forum reach an audience far smaller than might otherwise be expected. <hr/> The trouble is, it is impossible to divorce the issue of women/femininity from spiritual discussion. How strange do you think it would look if we spent our time discussing the wisdom of non-attachment while completely ignoring the strongest attachment in the human psyche? It would turn the discussion into a farce. Yet that is precisely what you and Thomas and almost everyone else on this forum are proposing. Just look at the strong emotions that arise whenever a philosopher challenges people's attachment to women/femininity. This alone should warn you that the attachment to these things is strong and deep. So I'm sorry, no, it can't be swept under the carpet. If we are to be serious in our intentions to go beyond all attachments and become wise human beings, it has to be faced head on. Instead of viewing Kevin, Dan and myself as having "an obsession with |

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | denigrating femininity", think of it, rather, as a determination to provide a necessary correction to the world's obsession with femininity.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 739(1/14/04 7:31 pm)Reply  | Re: men and Women <hr/> David: How strange do you think it would look if we spent our time discussing the wisdom of non-attachment while completely ignoring the strongest attachment in the human psyche? It would turn the discussion into a farce. Yet that is precisely what you and Thomas and almost everyone else on this forum are proposing. The fallacy of this argument is that attachment is not a necessary condition of a relationship between members of different sexes. Thomas                                               |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 594(1/15/04 4:12 am)Reply                                                                                         | Re: men and Women <hr/> Another fallacy of your argument, David, is that you are still attached to 'wisdom'. In order to value anything, there must be attachment; so from the get-go, your whole system is flawed. Kevin, I liked what you just wrote. However, I think that when a person enjoys being submissive, they're being both passive and active at the same time. Active in their enjoyment, passive in their outward actions.                                                                                                            |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2027(1/15/04 8:43 am)Reply     | Re: men and Women <hr/> Thomas Knierim wrote: Quote: <hr/> David: How strange do you think it would look if we spent our time discussing the wisdom of non-attachment while completely ignoring the strongest attachment in the human psyche? It would turn the discussion into a farce. Yet that is precisely what you and Thomas and almost everyone else on this forum are proposing. TK: The fallacy of this argument is that attachment is not a necessary condition of a relationship between members of different sexes. |

---

Obviously, my arguments don't apply to people who are unattached to women, or to members of the opposite sex, or to people in general. But I've hardly met anyone in my life who is genuinely living in such a lofty state of detachment.

The world in general is completely mired in attachment, and thus it is a world completely mired in anxiety, war and violence.

--

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Another fallacy of your argument, David, is that you are still attached to 'wisdom'. In order to value anything, there must be attachment; so from the get-go, your whole system is flawed.

---

There is nothing wrong with being attached to wisdom. I would much rather people be attached to wisdom than to women/femininity. The world would be a far better place.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 259
(1/15/04 9:07 am)
Reply

Attachment

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

In order to value anything, there must be attachment

---

This is not the case.

Imagine a computer which is programmed to do certain things rather than other things. We could say that the computer "values" a certain mode of operation. It tries to keep to a certain path.

That is also the case with enlightened people. They try to keep to a certain path, but without emotional attachment.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 166
(1/15/04 9:11 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

DQ: There is nothing wrong with being attached to wisdom. I would much rather people be attached to wisdom than to women/femininity. The world would be a far better place.

---

There is nothing wrong with being attached to women/femininity. I would much rather people be attached to women/femininity than to wisdom. The world would be a far better place.

Edited by: Rairun at: 1/15/04 9:19 am

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2031
(1/15/04 9:20 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Well, you're already living in your utopia. Congratulations!

And what a grand world it is.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 25

(1/15/04 10:48 am)

Reply

Re 'genius' and women, ultimate truth, saviors, etc.

---

I don't see that conclusion as reasonable. To attribute the current condition of the world, whatever that may be, to an obsession with women and femininity seems fallacious. Women could just as easily argue that the world is full of problems because people are overly attached to masculinity. Of course, that isn't my viewpoint any more than the opposite is my viewpoint, but I've heard the argument made - and not altogether unpersuasively. It just doesn't seem reasonable, this whole business of saying "it's the fault of the others." What's more, as soon as we make the accusation, "the others" can turn around and blame us just as convincingly.

Since, however, I don't subscribe to this idea that humanity is salvageable only through the beneficent intervention of a few heroic self-styled philosophers, I can probably be expected to raise such objections. I am among the unlightened masses who has failed (or refused) to reach your level of intellectual perfection. Because you believe that our only hope lies in the promulgation of what you consider wisdom, and because only yourself and a handful of other people are even the slightest bit concerned with this fact, I can see how it might seem important to isolate and expunge any perceived pollutants, and to ignore any criticism of such behavior. You have concluded, based upon your objective in life (the preservation of 'wisdom') that women and their ways are distractions and snares. You are the saviors, doing the saving work, and there can be no thought of foolishness, lest the work suffer.

You know, it's kind of daft, that sort of thing. Maybe this is why Lao-Tzu advised us to "renounce wisdom," that the world would be "a hundred times better" for it. Don't we have enough enlightened saviors already? One can usually meet four or five at the State Hospital during visiting hours. I'm sorry if that seemed harsher than it was intended to be, but I can't see much sanity in this business of imagining oneself to be the purveyor of Ultimate Wisdom. It just seems like something a person wishing to avoid confronting some deep neurosis might come up with to make life manageable.

You guys need to get out more, I think. This kind of thinking leads to nothing but an isolated existence in which you will have only your own rhetoric with which to console yourselves. Perhaps your self-indoctrination will have been so successful that you won't care, but you'll have missed out whether you realize it or not, and that would be unfortunate.

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowden Forum Host Posts: 1614 (1/15/04 10:55 am) Reply     | Huh? <hr/> Missed out what, exactly, Nat? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 601 (1/15/04 11:06 am) Reply | Re: Attachment <hr/> There is nothing wrong with being attached to wisdom. Why is an attachment to wisdom better than an attachment to femininity? This is not the case. Imagine a computer which is programmed to do certain things rather than other things. We could say that the computer "values" a certain mode of operation. It tries to keep to a certain path. That is also the case with enlightened people. They try to keep to a certain path, but without emotional attachment. That is not the case, Kevin. What you just talked about was cause and effect. A computer program is caused to be the way it is, and the effect is the way it is, and what it "values". Yet, computer programs don't value things. People value things, and in order to value something, you must be attached to other things. A person that values wisdom has an attachment to wisdom's fruits. |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 602 (1/15/04 11:10 am) Reply | Re: Attachment <hr/> On a good life, Dan. A beautiful life, that has love and connections with other people in it. I'm just putting words on Naturyl's fingers, though.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 27

(1/15/04 11:46 am)

Reply

Re: Attachment

---

Yes, pretty much that, although I would have been a little bit more conservative with the sentimentality. 'Beautiful' at times, yes, but difficult at times as well. I think it is the difficulty that everyone is trying to run away from with these belief systems, starting in prehistory but most notably in the Buddha, who devised the first great system of avoiding difficulty, and whose First Noble Truth is contradicted by his next three. The contradictions arise because the Buddha defines life as 'yin,' when in fact it is actually 'yinyang.' Life is suffering, but it is also happiness. Accordingly, the path to the cessation of suffering is the path to the cessation of happiness as well (as Buddhism freely admits).

The truth is much more Taoist than it is Buddhist, I think. As outlined above, you've got happiness and you've got pain. If you want to experience the former, you're going to have to deal with the latter. They come as a package deal - yin and yang united. If you try to renounce one, you automatically renounce the other as well, and so you actually renounce everything, and you might as well just die. Naturally, then, we find that death in one form or another is the ultimate goal of all religions, including the QRS one.

So, what would one miss out on? An authentic, full-featured life, quite possibly. Suffering and all, I think that would be a pretty lousy thing to miss out on for the sake of one's philosophical self-image.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 604

(1/15/04 12:44 pm)

Reply

Re: Attachment

---

Nice. I'd give you a thumbs up smiley if there was one.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 28

(1/15/04 12:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Attachment

---

Thanks. They do need to enable emoticons here, IMO. A lot of people like to use them on occasion, myself included.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2035

(1/15/04 1:35 pm)

Reply

Re: Re 'genius' and women, ultimate truth, saviors, etc.

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

I don't see that conclusion as reasonable. To attribute the current condition of the world, whatever that may be, to an obsession with women and femininity seems fallacious.

---

Because this obsession is so pervasive in our society, and because nobody ever really challenges it, it can be very hard to discern. It is only when you seriously pursue masculine lines of thought and start to challenge the deeper values of society, that you notice it. And when you do notice it, then boom! - it becomes crystal clear.

Society's obsession with women/femininity has its origins in the male's primary role in society - a role given to him by evolution over many thousands of years - to protect "women and children first". This had the effect of turning women into property and put them on a pedestal, and basically made them the centre of society, to be surrounded and defended by men - a role that all males were, and still are, expected to conform to.

That this dynamic is still being played out can be seen all around us in society at large, as well as on this forum. Just look at the way the males on this forum quickly rally around to protect women from the evil misogynistic beasts, just as their ancestors used to rally around to protect women and children from the attacks of bears or other tribes. It is something which is very primal in men, and thus requires a lot of attention and effort to overturn.

Quote:

---

Women could just as easily argue that the world is full of problems because people are overly attached to masculinity.

---

Women, of course, do say this. And men, bless their souls, quickly rally around to their side and agree with them.

Quote:

---

Of course, that isn't my viewpoint any more than the opposite is my viewpoint, but I've heard the argument made - and not altogether unpersuasively.

---

You're obviously endeavouring to make yourself appear balanced and mature, and thus place yourself in contrast to my "immature extremism". But in reality, you are engaging in the same process of denial that our whole society engages in.

Quote:

---

It just doesn't seem reasonable, this whole business of saying "it's the fault of the others."

---

No one is saying this. When a doctor discovers a grouping of cancer cells inside a patient's body and declares that for the sake of the patient's health the cancer must be eliminated, he isn't blaming cancer or sick people or anything like that. He is simply making a rational diagnosis to the problem at hand. The same applies to my approach to femininity.

Quote:

---

You know, it's kind of daft, that sort of thing. Maybe this is why Lao-Tzu advised us to "renounce wisdom," that the world would be "a hundred times better" for it.

---

Renounce wisdom for the sake of retaining delusions, such as feminine values? Or renounce it for the sake of being wise? There is a difference.

Quote:

---

Don't we have enough enlightened saviors already? One can usually meet four or five at the State Hospital during visiting hours. I'm sorry if that seemed harsher than it was intended to be, but I can't see much sanity in this business of imagining oneself to be the purveyor of Ultimate Wisdom.

---

When Lao Tzu wrote the Tao Te Ching and talked about the Tao in an authoritative manner, urging people to follow it in everything they do, he didn't imagine himself to be a purveyor of the highest wisdom?

It's amazing just how many people shy away from accepting responsibility for their own thoughts and wisdom, and from owning up to the fact that whenever they talk about enlightenment or the Tao with any sort of conviction, they are already imagining themselves to be purveyors of the highest wisdom.

And yet ironically, it is precisely the femininity within them which stops them taking this courageous step into greater honesty.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1260
(1/15/04 1:50 pm)
Reply

Attachment

---

Quote:

---

but most notably in the Buddha, who devised the first great system of avoiding difficulty, and whose First Noble Truth is contradicted by his next three.

---

Another anti-Buddhist! That is so not PC! Naturyl I love you! (oops)

Quote:

---

Naturally, then, we find that death in one form or another is the ultimate goal of all religions, including the QRS one.

---

Marvelous.

But is isn't really so in prehistory, such as animism. I personally think Tao springs from prehistory.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 33

(1/15/04 3:29 pm)

Reply

Re: Attachment

David said,

Quote:

---

It is only when you seriously pursue masculine lines of thought and start to challenge the deeper values of society, that you notice it [the obsession with femininity]. And when you do notice it, then boom! - it becomes crystal clear.

---

Well, I don't know that I'd care to comment on whether or not I have seriously pursued 'masculine lines of thought,' as either an affirmation or a denial would lend some credibility to the idea of classifying thought in that manner. However, as far as 'challenging the deeper values of society' is concerned, I think that anyone who knows me either online or in 'real life' will gladly tell you that I have done so almost to the point of nausea. I know of few persons, except perhaps some classical Greek cynics and their modern-day 'drifter' counterparts, who have as thoroughly examined and found wanting the 'deeper values of society.' Remember, I reject most forms of 'gainful employment,' I reject all but the most modest 'material success,' I reject nationalism and most forms of 'patriotism,' I reject religion, I reject sports, I reject most (but not all) social traditions, I reject a large portion of my society's moral convictions, and I reject anything that does not generally conform to reason. Your assumption is that those who disagree with you simply haven't done the work necessary to arrive at your position, and that had they done so, they would not be objecting. This is, as I'm sure you're aware on some level, a patronizing assumption which sets one up to be reproved by evidence to the contrary. You would do yourself a service by resisting the temptation to assume that all dissenters simply haven't thought things through.

Quote:

---

Society's obsession with women/femininity has its origins in the male's primary role in society - a role given to him by evolution over many thousands of years - to protect "women and children first". This had the effect of turning women into property and put them on a pedestal, and basically made them the centre of society, to be surrounded and defended by men - a role that all males were, and still are, expected to conform to.

---

Agreed, but this is a history lesson, and not much of an argument except insofar as it develops a reasonable basis from which an extreme position can later be extrapolated.

Quote:

---

That this dynamic is still being played out can be seen all around us in society at large, as well as on this forum. Just look at the way the males on this forum quickly rally around to protect women from the evil misogynistic beasts, just as their ancestors used to rally around to protect women and children from the attacks of bears or other tribes. It is something which is very primal in men, and thus requires a lot of attention and effort to overturn.

---

I think you are being unfair here. When your (QRS) ideas are attacked, you usually claim to defend them in the interest of truth rather than of the individuals involved. Why can't others be operating from the same perspective? I think it is much more likely that the opposition you are encountering here is based on the users' desire to express what they see as the truth, rather than to 'protect' any individual users or women in general from your attacks. Some who oppose you may be operating from such a motive, but I am not, and I don't think the majority are, either. I have no desire to 'protect' women in this forum, as I am quite certain they are capable of protecting themselves in this environment. If you were attacking them with a baseball bat, I might feel a desire to intervene on their behalf, because women are clearly at a disadvantage in physical self-defense. In the matter of intellectual self-defense, however, I see far less reason to suppose that women are not fully capable of protecting themselves.

Quote:

---

You're obviously endeavouring to make yourself appear balanced and mature, and thus place yourself in contrast to my "immature extremism".

---

Well, I can understand why you might say this, but in reality, I am making no effort to 'appear' as anything other than what I am. Also, please note that I never used the term 'immature' in reference to you. Immature persons do not develop misogynistic systems as sophisticated as your own. They simply scream "women suck" and are done with it. I don't think that maturity is really the issue. It's very trendy to accuse our opponents of 'not being grown-ups,' but I think that it is also very misleading. In fact, one has to do a certain amount of growing up in order to become really screwed up. Immature people haven't the life experience to develop truly remarkable aberrations.

Quote:

---

But in reality, you are engaging in the same process of denial that our whole society engages in.

---

I don't think so. Of course, in your mind, for me to say that "I don't think so" is undoubtedly just more evidence of the depth of my denial, but I can't help your perceptions. In reality, I realize full well that there are negative things about women. This hardly comes as a news flash, nor is it something I would likely see any reason to deny. In fact, I will go so far as to admit that many of the criticisms posted on QRS websites and on this forum have some basis in reality. Yes, there are problems with the common female mindset! Of course, it goes without saying (except to you) that there are problems with the common male mindset as well. Actually, I apologize - that last sentence is inaccurate. You would in fact readily admit the problems with the male mindset - but you would attribute them all to influence of the feminine one!

I deny nothing. Can some women effectively undermine and ruin many a man's dreams and especially his aspirations to philosophical thought? Absolutely. It happens every single day. However, this is just a peculiarity of the 'yin' side of human nature. Men can and do display just as many negative 'masculine' qualities, which women find equally devastating. Okay, so quite a few women are dismissive of philosophical thought. Cry me a river. Quite a few men are dismissive of their own children, that's why we have millions of child support lawsuits. The cookie crumbles both ways. Will you deny this?

Quote:

---

When a doctor discovers a grouping of cancer cells inside a patient's body and declares that for the sake of the patient's health the cancer must be eliminated, he isn't blaming cancer or sick people or anything like that. He is simply making a rational diagnosis to the problem at hand. The same applies to my approach to femininity.

---

Well, in that case, I have to be frank with you. The approach you describe here seems dangerous. Nazi leadership spoke of Jews in exactly the same terms. They were simply a disease, to be perfunctorily removed without hesitation or emotion. It is merciful that when people are still ranting and raving about their hatred, they are usually harmless. It is when the emotion fades but the hatred remains that they become genuinely dangerous. Your words quoted above should be frightening to anyone who understands something about human nature.

Quote:

---

Renounce wisdom for the sake of retaining delusions, such as feminine values? Or renounce it for the sake of being wise? There is a difference.

---

Agreed - but I don't think we will come to any agreement regarding who has the delusions and who is wise. Perhaps both of us are deluded and neither wise, I don't know. I only know that all I have learned and cultivated in my several years of serious thought tells me that 'something is rotten in the state of Denmark' as it regards this misogyny business. Your positions are not consistent with those you often express in regard to other matters. This deep-seated hatred for an integral aspect of human nature can be nothing but a miscarriage of reason, and a rather nasty one at that. Every man has his Achilles' heel, I suppose.

Quote:

---

When Lao Tzu wrote the Tao Te Ching and talked about the Tao in an authoritative manner, urging people to follow it in everything they do, he didn't imagine himself to be a purveyor of the highest wisdom?

---

According to the legend, he wrote his book relectantly and at the behest of others before his final departure to realms unknown. This strikes me as quite a bit different from the various people who create 'paths to enlightenment' which they aggressively advertise and promote. Do you imagine that Lao-Tzu would have set up a 'GENIUS FORUM' in which to push his message? The thought is absurd enough to elicit a smile. Lao-Tzu, if he existed, was essentially a reluctant old sage who, for the sake of being a bodhisattva, wrote a few scribblings for the masses. He would hardly have been a self-aggrandizing internet guru such as we encounter so commonly in modern times.

Quote:

---

It's amazing just how many people shy away from accepting responsibility for their own thoughts and wisdom, and from owning up to the fact that whenever they talk about enlightenment or the Tao with any sort of conviction, they are already imagining themselves to be purveyors of the highest wisdom.

---

This is a stronger point, but it still neglects to recognize the subjectivity involved in all conceptions of 'wisdom.' When I speak of the Tao and such, I am offering others a glimpse of what I perceive to be the highest wisdom of which I am capable. However, I am well aware that others may respond with something altogether different, which constitutes the highest wisdom of which they are capable. Which of us is truly more advanced is an entirely subjective matter, though there may be some objective criteria by which we might structure our subjective arguments. Ultimately, we all believe ourselves to be at least somewhat wise - few truly see themselves as fools. This is not what I am complaining about. My objection is to those who claim to have attained 'ultimate' wisdom - the very idea would be hooted down by Lao-Tzu, Socrates, and a host of others.

Quote:

---

And yet ironically, it is precisely the femininity within them which stops them taking this courageous step into greater honesty.

---

Nah. Wisdom is what prevents people from claiming to be wise.

Bird said:

Quote:

---

Another anti-Buddhist! That is so not PC! Naturyl I love you!

(oops)

---

Well, I'm not really 'anti-Buddhist' so much as I am 'anti-escapism.' Buddhism offers some good insights, for what it's worth. Still, the fact cannot be escaped that Buddhism defines life as suffering and then goes about seeking the cessation of suffering. By definition, the cessation of suffering is the cessation of life. No Buddhist will say it this plainly, but neither will any deny it once said.

Quote:

---

But is isn't really so in prehistory, such as animism. I personally think Tao springs from prehistory.

---

You're right. The two earliest religions, animism and pantheism, were about life rather than escape from life, of which death is the ultimate form. Unfortunately, with the possible exception of Taoism (which is close to a naturalistic pantheism), it's been all downhill since.

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 216
(1/15/04 9:18 pm)
Reply

Re: Attachment

---

"Of course, it goes without saying (except to you) that there are problems with the common male mindest as well. Actually, I apologize - that last sentence is inaccurate. You wopuld in fact readily admit the problems with the male mindset - but you would attribute them all to influence of the feminine one!"

Modern men seem to follow one of two presets: the macho image or the sensitive what-women-want delusion. The macho image is far more feminine than it is masculine, because it is merely an image. The latter preset is an attempt to conform to what is perceived as being what women want, and so followed by those desperate to satisfy and be accepted, as they are taught that it is important for them to do so - so, it is a conformation to the desires of women in search of 'love'. Therefore it would seem just to attribute the state of the pathetic modern man, whichever of those types he is, to the infestation of femininity impressed on him.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 265

(1/16/04 12:57 am)

Reply

Re: Attachment

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

KS: Imagine a computer which is programmed to do certain things rather than other things. We could say that the computer "values" a certain mode of operation. It tries to keep to a certain path. That is also the case with enlightened people. They try to keep to a certain path, but without emotional attachment.

Voce Io: That is not the case, Kevin. What you just talked about was cause and effect. A computer program is caused to be the way it is, and the effect is the way it is, and what it "values".

---

Exactly the same with us. Whatever we value is programmed into us by Nature. Nature causes us to be whatever we are, and think whatever we think.

Quote:

---

Yet, computer programs don't value things. People value things, and in order to value something, you must be attached to other things.

---

I don't see why we can't speak of a computer valuing certain things if it has been programmed to favor certain things over others. We ourselves work in exactly the same way. But what we value need not be an emotional attachment, it is simply programmed into us.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2045
(1/16/04 8:33 am)
Reply

Re: Attachment

Ynithrix wrote:

Quote:

---

Modern men seem to follow one of two presets: the macho image or the sensitive what-women-want delusion. The macho image is far more feminine than it is masculine, because it is merely an image. The latter preset is an attempt to conform to what is perceived as being what women want, and so followed by those desperate to satisfy and be accepted, as they are taught that it is important for them to do so - so, it is a conformation to the desires of women in search of 'love'. Therefore it would seem just to attribute the state of the pathetic modern man, whichever of those types he is, to the infestation of femininity impressed on him.

---

And if you try to break away from either of these two presets and consciously speak against them, you are immediately branded a misogynist, which is akin to being called a scumbag. Such is the power of woman.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 22(1/16/04 9:56 am)Reply | Re: Attachment <hr/> Quote: <hr/> And if you try to break away from either of these two presets and consciously speak against them, you are immediately branded a misogynist, which is akin to being called a scumbag. Such is the power of woman. <hr/> It is you who keeps casually throwing that word, "misogynist" like it doesn't mean anything. Are you saying that every guy on this forum that hasn't agreed with your views on feminity (including Thomas Kiernam) are scumbags? You did label a few of us here as misogynists. At any rate it's a pretty ballsy admission David. ;) A mighty power it is indeed if it has you on the run to the point of such absurd inconsistencies and contradictions. Ah yes, such is the power of women. More like such as the power of the deluded mind of a neurotic man who has such an irrational fear of women or "The Woman" that he credits it far more power than it truly has. Much to his own ruin, I might add. A sad spectacle it is really. |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 615
(1/16/04 10:02 am)
Reply

Re: Attachment

---

I think krussell2004 just made a very valid point. Of course, it will be evaded by David, because he has the belief that the attachment to women made him say that.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 37
(1/16/04 10:23 am)
Reply

Re: Attachment

---

He did make a valid point:

Quote:

---

A mighty power it is indeed if it has you on the run to the point of such absurd inconsistencies and contradictions. Ah yes, such is the power of women.

---

It is easy to see, from my perspective, that women have more power over David than over anyone else I know of. In fact, women apparently define David's entire mindset and worldview. In light of this, it is difficult to see how he is able to imagine himself free of their control. It is truly an absurd situation. To each their own, though, I suppose.

Quote:

---

Of course, it will be evaded by David, because he has the belief that the attachment to women made him say that.

---

Probably. Note that David ignored my entire last post, despite the fact that it sought to refute many of his claims. Perhaps that is for the best, though, as this topic is becoming tiresome in any case.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2050

(1/16/04 11:01 am)

Reply

Re: Attachment

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: It is only when you seriously pursue masculine lines of thought and start to challenge the deeper values of society, that you notice it [the obsession with femininity]. And when you do notice it, then boom! - it becomes crystal clear.

Nat: Well, I don't know that I'd care to comment on whether or not I have seriously pursued 'masculine lines of thought,' as either an affirmation or a denial would lend some credibility to the idea of classifying thought in that manner.

---

Any serious enquiry into truth that leads one further away from the human race and its values and conventions of thought is what I would call a "masculine line of thought".

Entering deeply into the world of cause and effect would be one such example.

Quote:

---

However, as far as 'challenging the deeper values of society' is concerned, I think that anyone who knows me either online or in 'real life' will gladly tell you that I have done so almost to the point of nausea. I know of few persons, except perhaps some classical Greek cynics and their modern-day 'drifter' counterparts, who have as thoroughly examined and found wanting the 'deeper values of society.' Remember, I reject most forms of 'gainful employment,' I reject all but the most modest 'material success,' I reject nationalism and most forms of 'patriotism,' I reject religion, I reject sports, I reject most (but not all) social traditions, I reject a large portion of my society's moral convictions, and I reject anything that does not generally conform to reason.

---

That's admirable, Nat. I do respect it, truly. But the things you have so far rejected are still only the branches of society and not its root. You're still shying away from challenging the very heart of our deluded society.

Quote:

---

DQ: Society's obsession with women/femininity has its origins in the male's primary role in society - a role given to him by evolution over many thousands of years - to protect "women and children first". This had the effect of turning women into property and put them on a pedestal, and basically made them the centre of society, to be surrounded and defended by men - a role that all males were, and still are, expected to conform to.

Nat: Agreed, but this is a history lesson, and not much of an argument except insofar as it develops a reasonable basis from which an extreme position can later be extrapolated.

---

Well, the next step is to observe the behaviour of humans more closely and discern how much this "historic principle" continues to play a role in shaping nearly every aspect of male behaviour.

Again, I contend that it is only conscious philosophers who are fully committed to truth and reason who begin to escape it.

Quote:

---

DQ: That this dynamic is still being played out can be seen all around us in society at large, as well as on this forum. Just look at the way the males on this forum quickly rally around to protect women from the evil misogynistic beasts, just as their ancestors used to rally around to protect women and children from the attacks of bears or other tribes. It is something which is very primal in men, and thus requires a lot of attention and effort to overturn.

Nat: I think you are being unfair here. When your (QRS) ideas are attacked, you usually claim to defend them in the interest of truth rather than of the individuals involved. Why can't others be operating from the same perspective?

---

The emotion and hysteria that is always aroused whenever I start making comments about women is strong evidence that there is something else going on inside these people's minds than the defence of truth.

Quote:

---

I think it is much more likely that the opposition you are encountering here is based on the users' desire to express what they see as the truth, rather than to 'protect' any individual users or women in general from your attacks. Some who oppose you may be operating from such a motive, but I am not, and I don't think the majority are, either. I have no desire to 'protect' women in this forum, as I am quite certain they are capable of protecting themselves in this environment.

---

I didn't mean that the males here are trying to protect the actual women who are here on this forum. I meant that they are protecting women in general, and by extension the women in their own lives. They are being prompted by a deep algorithm triggered inside them and instinctively rushing to woman's defence.

Quote:

---

Yes, there are problems with the common female mindset! Of course, it goes without saying (except to you) that there are problems with the common male mindset as well. Actually, I apologize - that last sentence is inaccurate. You would in fact readily admit the problems with the male mindset - but you would attribute them all to influence of the feminine one!

---

The feminine inside them, yes. What we commonly think of masculine men in our society - the sober, responsible, competent family men - is a bonzai-form of masculinity, one that has been completely stunted by feminine concerns and values.

Quote:

---

I deny nothing. Can some women effectively undermine and ruin many a man's dreams and especially his aspirations to philosophical thought? Absolutely. It happens every single day. However, this is just a peculiarity of the 'yin' side of human nature. Men can and do display just as many negative 'masculine' qualities, which women find equally devastating. Okay, so quite a few women are dismissive of philosophical thought. Cry me a river. Quite a few men are dismissive of their own children, that's why we have millions of child support lawsuits. The cookie crumbles both ways. Will you deny this?

---

No. I couldn't possibly deny the fact that many men are low-grade people with few redeeming features.

But again, you're not really going to the root of the issue and examining the power of woman/femininity on a deeper psychological level. The issue really has nothing to do with individual women themselves and their specific behaviour. Rather, it is what they embody as women which does the damage.

Quote:

---

DQ: When a doctor discovers a grouping of cancer cells inside a patient's body and declares that for the sake of the patient's health the cancer must be eliminated, he isn't blaming cancer or sick people or anything like that. He is simply making a rational diagnosis to the problem at hand. The same applies to my approach to femininity.

Nat: Well, in that case, I have to be frank with you. The approach you describe here seems dangerous. Nazi leadership spoke of Jews in exactly the same terms. They were simply a disease, to be perfunctorily removed without hesitation or emotion. It is merciful that when people are still ranting and raving about their hatred, they are usually harmless. It is when the emotion fades but the hatred remains that they become genuinely dangerous. Your words quoted above should be frightening to anyone who understands something about human nature.

---

Well, anyone who approaches the issue calmly and takes the time to understand my thought would never be able to compare me to the Nazis. I have nothing in common with them at all. My words above refer to a process of inner mental development in which inferior traits are discarded and superior traits enhanced. That is what development means.

I can understand your concerns, though. I'm often called a Nazi, usually in hysterical abusive tones. But again, it's a sign of just how strong people's attachment to woman/femininity is.

Quote:

---

DQ: When Lao Tzu wrote the Tao Te Ching and talked about the Tao in an authoritative manner, urging people to follow it in everything they do, he didn't imagine himself to be a purveyor of the highest wisdom?

Nat: According to the legend, he wrote his book relectantly and at the behest of others before his final departure to realms unknown. This strikes me as quite a bit different from the various people who create 'paths to enlightenment' which they aggressively advertise and promote. Do you imagine that Lao-Tzu would have set up a 'GENIUS FORUM' in which to push his message? The thought is absurd enough to elicit a smile. Lao-Tzu, if he existed, was essentially a reluctant old sage who, for the sake of being a bodhisattva, wrote a few scribblings for the masses. He would hardly have been a self-aggrandizing internet guru such as we encounter so commonly in modern times.

---

Reluctant or not, he did, in writing the Tao Te Ching, set himself up as an expert on wisdom. He did believe that he was a reliable purveyor of the highest wisdom. And if he was honest, he would openly admit this to be the case, if asked. Or at least I hope he would.

Quote:

---

DQ: It's amazing just how many people shy away from accepting responsibility for their own thoughts and wisdom, and from owning up to the fact that whenever they talk about enlightenment or the Tao with any sort of conviction, they are already imagining themselves to be purveyors of the highest wisdom.

Nat: This is a stronger point, but it still neglects to recognize the subjectivity involved in all conceptions of 'wisdom.' When I speak of the Tao and such, I am offering others a glimpse of what I perceive to be the highest wisdom of which I am capable. However, I am well aware that others may respond with something altogether different, which constitutes the highest wisdom of which they are capable. Which of us is truly more advanced is an entirely subjective matter, though there may be some objective criteria by which we might structure our subjective arguments. Ultimately, we all believe ourselves to be at least somewhat wise - few truly see themselves as fools. This is not what I am complaining about. My objection is to those who claim to have attained 'ultimate' wisdom - the very idea would be hooted down by Lao-Tzu, Socrates, and a host of others.

---

I have no doubt in my mind that Lao Tzu and Socrates believed they had attained the ultimate wisdom. And I also have no doubt that they were correct in thinking this. The Tao Te Ching, for example, is essentially nothing more than a series of statements which confidently and authoritatively point to the full nature of the Tao in all its glory.

Quote:

---

DQ: And yet ironically, it is precisely the femininity within them which stops them taking this courageous step into greater honesty.

Nat: Nah. Wisdom is what prevents people from claiming to be wise.

---

Or a false humility.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 882

(1/16/04 11:19 am)

Reply

Re: Attachment

---

Quote:

---

Borg: Modern men seem to follow one of two presets: the macho image or the sensitive what-women-want delusion. The macho image is far more feminine than it is masculine, because it is merely an image. The latter preset is an attempt to conform to what is perceived as being what women want, and so followed by those desperate to satisfy and be accepted, as they are taught that it is important for them to do so - so, it is a conformation to the desires of women in search of 'love'. Therefore it would seem just to attribute the state of the pathetic modern man, whichever of those types he is, to the infestation of femininity impressed on him.

DQ: And if you try to break away from either of these two presets and consciously speak against them, you are immediately branded a misogynist, which is akin to being called a scumbag. Such is the power of woman.

---

Are you actually subscribing to that shallow piece of thinking - that false dilemma? And then offering a trinary solution to it?

Anyway, you're as macho as they come. It's just that your powers are mental as opposed to physical. It's so obvious, just witness your puffed out chest, see how special it is. It takes an advanced turn of mind to appreciate just how special it is. You are 1 in a 600,000,000, roughly.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2052

(1/16/04 11:20 am)

Reply

Re: Attachment

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: And if you try to break away from either of these two presets and consciously speak against them, you are immediately branded a misogynist, which is akin to being called a scumbag. Such is the power of woman.

Krussell: It is you who keeps casually throwing that word, "misogynist" like it doesn't mean anything. Are you saying that every guy on this forum that hasn't agreed with your views on feminity (including Thomas Kiernam) are scumbags? You did label a few of us here as misogynists.

---

I was merely turning an abusive label back onto those who like to use it to dehumanize their opponents. A bit of fun on my part.

Quote:

---

At any rate it's a pretty ballsy admission David. ;) A mighty power it is indeed if it has you on the run to the point of such absurd inconsistencies and contradictions. Ah yes, such is the power of women. More like such as the power of the deluded mind of a neurotic man who has such an irrational fear of women or "The Woman" that he credits it far more power than it truly has. Much to his own ruin, I might add. A sad spectacle it is really

---

Weren't you the fellow who claimed that all men think with their penises?

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 41

(1/16/04 11:22 am)

Reply

This is simply absurd.

---

So, then, let me see if I have this straight. What I ought to do is to stop toying around with rejecting relatively insignificant things like religion or nationalism and instead simply reject 99.99% of all women and 99% of all men on the grounds that they are 'feminine-minded' and therefore the cause of a deluded society. After doing so, I should then not hesitate to proclaim myself an enlightened sage and a purveyor of ultimate wisdom in front of anyone at any time, so as to avoid a false humility. Finally, I should make it my life's purpose to ensure that as many others as possible do the above as well, so that we can all experience 'enlightenment' together.

Umm, what part of this is supposed to be helpful? To be frank, it sounds like an instruction manual for creating xenophobic lunatics. You would have us all be Jim Jones in a world of Jim Joneses. Who will drink the kool-aid first? Perhaps after we all kill ourselves with this silly madness, the few women who were kept for breeding purposes will be kind enough to re-populate the world, in hopes of doing better next time.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 884

(1/16/04 11:35 am)

Reply

Re: Sports

---

Quote:

---

Nat: I reject most forms of 'gainful employment,' I reject all but the most modest 'material success,' I reject nationalism and most forms of 'patriotism,' I reject religion, I reject sports, I reject most (but not all) social traditions, I reject a large portion of my society's moral convictions, and I reject anything that does not generally conform to reason.

---

That is so bigoted.

Sports are great :-)

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 1/16/04 12:24 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2055

(1/16/04 12:13 pm)

Reply

Re: This is simply absurd.

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

So, then, let me see if I have this straight. What I ought to do is to stop toying around with rejecting relatively insignificant things like religion or nationalism and instead simply reject 99.99% of all women and 99% of all men on the grounds that they are 'feminine-minded' and therefore the cause of a deluded society.

---

Nearly right. Religion and nationalism are outer expressions of the feminine-minded. They are both primarily concerned with submission to a higher authority and the merging into a mob. They both involve the abandoning of rationality, individuality, personal responsibility, etc. So in abandoning femininity one is automatically abandoning them as well.

However, I don't go around automatically rejecting people simply on the grounds that they are feminine-minded. Rather, I try to spark something inside the masculine part of their minds. Only when it becomes evident that nothing will ever catch alight inside a particular person do I lose interest and begin to ignore him.

Quote:

---

After doing so, I should then not hesitate to proclaim myself an enlightened sage and a purveyor of ultimate wisdom in front of anyone at any time, so as to avoid a false humility.

---

Just state the truth whenever someone asks you if you think you are enlightened (which they often do whenever you start speaking authoritatively on wisdom). Of course, it can only be the truth if you are indeed genuinely enlightened.

In other words, I'm essentially arguing for a commonsense approach that is free of duplicity. Do you have a problem with that?

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 43
(1/16/04 12:29 pm)
Reply

Re: This is simply absurd.

---

No. Instead, I have a problem with your belief that what you are advocating is actually "a commonsense approach that is free of duplicity."

"Genuinely enlightened" indeed. That and 75 cents will buy you a cup of coffee (which, incidentally, could claim to be 'genuinely enlightened' with precisely the same degree of reliability as that found in your own claim).

This is just the same sort of thing you hear from all of these types - I'm sure the leader of Heaven's Gate cult considered himself "genuinely enlightened" as well, and anyone who refused to off themselves in order to ride the UFO comet was just a deluded fool.

My gosh, when you put it that plainly, the thing seems so tiresome. I think I'll take my wife's advice and go do something more productive.

Have fun being 'genuinely enlightened,' and best of luck with the whole femininity-exterminating thing.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1417
(1/16/04 12:43 pm)
Reply

Re: This is simply absurd

---

To catch the right fish, you must use the right bait. Flexibility is often a strength. And strict rigidity to doctrine can sometimes increase your burden.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1418
(1/16/04 12:47 pm)
Reply

Re: Sports

---

Toast wrote,

Quote:

---

That is so bigoted.
Sports are great :-)

---

How very unenlightened of you, heathen.

(I'll bet you a pint my Panthers make it to the Superbowl. :-P)

Tharan

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 23
(1/16/04 12:55 pm)
Reply

Re: This is simply absurd.

---

Quote:

---

Weren't you the fellow who claimed that all men think with their penises?

---

I was just having a little fun and wasn't really being serious as I have stated before. An attempt to get a rise out of you which evidently worked. As for calling you a misogynist, I can only speak for myself. I do recall only, however, that you accused me of insinuating that you were a misogynist in the "Courage and Masculinity" thread I started also to get your goat. Once again it seemed to work as you got all worked up AGAIN. Then you started a thread stating that all males who participate in this forum who don't agree with your views are misogynists. I countered that by saying that based on your views I think you're a misogynist. So we've come full circle. You are right though, venting can be loads of fun. ;)

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/16/04 10:25 pm

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 24
(1/16/04 1:07 pm)
Reply

Re: This is simply absurd.

---

Quote:

---

Weren't you the fellow who claimed that all men think with their penises?

---

A thought had just occurred to me. Wouldn't the above statement make me a misandronist? Have fun with that one, if it pleases you. I'm going to bed. You Australians have such ungodly hours. ;)

Good night or rather G'day mate. ;)

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1920(12/20/03 7:29 am)Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> Thomas, you're contributing to the killing of souls every day without you even knowing it, just through the combination of your lack of enlightenment and your constant need to give teachings about matters of the spiritual realm. You also belong to an organization which has been killing millions of souls for centuries - name, Buddhism. And yet because you lack insight and imagination and wisdom, you're completely oblivious to this. The soul, of course, is that inside us which knows and loves Ultimate Reality. The truthful part of the brain. Quote: <hr/> David, if you pretend to speak anything remotely resembling truth you should be able to prove it and tell me which souls I have murdered. <hr/> Since, in this thread, I've specifically accused you of murdering woman's souls for sexual pleasure, I'll concentrate on that: The question needs to be asked as to why men constantly need to praise to the skies women's multi-knobbed nature. It can't be for intellectual reasons. Women very rarely produce anything of intellectual interest. |

Whatever thoughts that a woman expresses, it can be guaranteed that they have already been expressed in a far more powerful and interesting manner by men. Women only echo, in a far more diluted way, things they have heard from others or read about in a book. As such, only the most dull-witted of men could possibly find women intellectually stimulating.

It can't be for entertainment reasons. If you take away all of the sexual/whorish elements from a woman's behaviour, what do you have left? Someone who oscillates between juvenile inanity and matronly boorishness. The only thing that stops these behaviours from being unbearably tedious is the infusion of the sexual element. A woman gains her charm through the combination of sexuality and juvenility/motherliness/intellectual echoing. Without the sexual component, only the most lifeless of men, those who have absolutely no inner life to them at all, would find delight in women and give them the time of day. This is why old women are the most ignored class of people in society the world over.

Thus, the constant praise of women's multi-knobbed (i.e. her multi-faceted, incoherent, all-over-the-place, flowey) kind of behaviour ultimately comes from men's sexual desire. Men constantly praise women and defer to their banal concerns because they want to remain in their good books, and thus keep the possibility open for future sexual relations. They might not want to bonk every woman they meet - indeed, they might only want to bonk one or two of them out of the entire species - but they still continue to pour out the praise on all women regardless. For they subconsciously know that all women are just manifestations of the one entity - WOMAN - and that you cannot really praise one woman without praising all of them, just as you cannot disparage one of them without disparaging all of them.

The trouble with constantly praising women for their multi-faceted, incoherent, all-over-the-place, flowey behaviour is that it discourages them from developing a penetrative, coherent, consistent form of consciousness which is needed to make philosophical and spiritual progress. Hence, my beef with Thomas Knierim's misogynistic worship of women. I tell you truly, if women suddenly decided that they were going to make every effort to become Buddhas, he and his sixteen dogs would be horrified.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1348
(12/20/03 10:12 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Wow, murdering souls for sexual pleasure. When you become Earth's great sage, David, hire a PR guy.

I don't necessarily think you are wrong, I just think you put little effort into expressing yourself with the most efficient impact in mind.

Tharan

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1975
(12/20/03 12:23 pm)
Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

The effect of remaking all the species into a one-type brain category is both:

- to reduce the entire population physically by eliminating a "holder" brain type, including the attachment to remaking
  - to ensure the remaining population is more focussed on non-egotistical inter-system survival, ie survival of the wisest
-

suergaz: Can you explain this to me in other terms?

Kv: I am learning the "new generator logic" and am in a process of de-holder-ing.

What is your interpretation of that quote?

Kellyven, I have great difficulty with the term "one-type brain category"... and if the wisest part of the population (generators?) were to remain after a physical reduction were effected (please help me understand this part specifically!) I do not see why it would focus on its survival over its life!

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 898

(12/20/03 7:24 pm)

Reply

Metaphysics

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000

If you take away all of the sexual/whorish elements from a woman's behaviour, what do you have left? Someone who oscillates between juvenile inanity and matronly boorishness. The only thing that stops these behaviours from being unbearably tedious is the infusion of the sexual element. A woman gains her charm through the combination of sexuality and juvenility/motherliness/intellectual echoing. Without the sexual component, only the most lifeless of men, those who have absolutely no inner life to them at all, would find delight in women and give them the time of day.

---

ABSOLUTE TRUTH

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000

The trouble with constantly praising women for their multi-faceted, incoherent, all-over-the-place, flowey behaviour is that it discourages them from developing a penetrative, coherent, consistent form of consciousness which is needed to make philosophical and spiritual progress. .

---

Metaphysics - Woman as organisation/church/political party etc.

Juvenile inanity because she has no desire or real sense of the eternal, the absolute and consistent truth.

Matronly boorishness because of her desire to increase numbers. Quantity over quality. She wants the increase of population first. Health, education, shelter etc are secondary.

Sexual charm she has because he desires to live as long as the eternal truth

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                          | that he can see. The secret truth/principle that can make a woman like a man is the same truth/principle that grants eternal life. When a man becomes like a woman he will be snuffed out existence as quickly as a candle falling into mud.                                  |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1978(12/20/03 9:25 pm)Reply                                                                                      | --- <hr/> You two disgust me with your talk of making woman like man.                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 819(12/20/03 11:12 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Rabbit Gods..... sorry, dogs.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 461(12/21/03 6:05 am)Reply                                                                                       | Re: men and women <hr/> Quinn has a personality disorder, and shouldn't ever be likened to a sage. I would much rather take the wise words of a woman in menstruation, than of someone with some sort of insanity.                                                                   |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1924(12/21/03 6:11 am)Reply   | Re: --- <hr/> Suergaz wrote: Quote: <hr/> You two disgust me with your talk of making woman like man. <hr/> It would seem that you've suddenly forgotten how to dance. What is this disgust of yours but an expression of your own sexual desire? |

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 329(12/21/03 8:59 am)Reply       | Re: men and women <hr/> Well, David, looks like you've went and chased everybody off . . . again. DEL, I don't think women really want to increase the population. A woman wants another kid like a man wants another car; he doesn't want it to increase the number of cars in the world. Same goes for health, education, and shelter, etc. Women exist to fulfill the desires of immediacy, and feel morally justified by the desire itself. Any other type of justification is an afterthought and is only brought up to pacify men, who are always fooled by it. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1983(12/21/03 11:03 am)Reply      | ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> It would seem that you've suddenly forgotten how to dance. What is this disgust of yours but an expression of your own sexual desire? <hr/> What??!! My sexual desire for who??! Things like your equating womans sexuality with 'whorishness' as you put it, make me want to vomit.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1154(12/21/03 11:57 am)Reply | men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I would much rather take the wise words of a woman in menstruation, than of someone with some sort of insanity. <hr/> Premenstrual syndrome gets far too much bad press. It's only in the last year that I realized that it is a valuable time for introspection. The tendency toward negativity is good because it helps to look at things in a                                                                                                                                                                       | searing way without cheer or excuse.

Unfortunately, it is often difficult to indulge in the needed introspection, because, thanks to women's lib, we now have to conduct ourselves like men - i.e., with consistency.

Consistency is not our nature, it is our nature to be cyclic.

The main driver of this difference is the hormones. Men have several bursts of testosterone on a diurnal cycle that varies little day to day. Women have a quite complex array of hormonal bursts and drops, with about 4 major parts to a cycle that is one month long.

I think it is kind of you, David, to hold onto the forlorn hope that women can be more like men. What you haven't grasped is that women are structurally, fundamentally different than men. I like the old-fashioned term - menfolk and womenfolk.

Of course when I read about the ancient warrior women, I remember how much people can vary according to their sense of themselves. But I am sure that the great women of old, the women of reknown, were not infused with a sense of their need to cast off their inferior femininity and be men.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 439

(12/21/03 1:31 pm)

Reply

Re: men and women

---

Matronly boorishness because of her desire to increase numbers. Quantity over quality. She wants the increase of population first

Personally I don't see what the problem with this is. If women - and most men - had developed a 'real sense of the eternal, the absolute and consistent truth' 2000 years ago then we wouldn't be here, they would have stopped breeding as much. And when it comes down to it - the only real thing of importance is that I exist.

Plus I think the real eternal truth is for us to spawn. It is a cooperative arrangement, women desire to be beautiful so as to move up the herd ladder. It is what the males wish. The well formed fawn gets the most powerful males. Intelligence is just an nice little add on.

I think the sheer numbers of people give us an adequate number of folks on the far right of the intelligence bell curve. It is beneficial to have <0.5% of such folks but any more and they'll just cause the fractuals we are involved in to spin out of control. Widespread understanding of ultimate reality can only exist when we have conquered the physical world, which we haven't, but the pressure of overpopulation will produce the impetus to do so. Rich women do not have great desires to increase the population. Let the sheep produce what we need (yes I know - I'm still a sheep, but at least I'm watching the wolves).

Unlike Birdy though I don't think women are mentally that different from men, or vice versa as we can see now with the advent of the metro male or the career bitch. In the last couple of years I've read things and thought - that must have been written by a male, but it turns out the author is a female. Things are changing and although it is true that I don't know of any woman alive today who is always able to think outside of emotions, perhaps their female children or grandchildren might be. What is causing them to be as they are has changed enormously in the last 50 years.

Most of these believers in ultimate reality, just want women to be at their level of knowledge, so they become acceptable to fuck, so they don't think they are fucking animals or children.

The QRS have yet to point out the advantage of enlightenment to the human race apart from hypothetical statements that the problems of the world would be fixed because of the logical application of reason. What a boring bloody world that would be. I can see why they like it as it appears to keep the brain in a continuous loop of positiveness about itself. Everything they think of is 'good', it automatically is worthy of communicating to others or self-glorification. It is a self-perpetuating joy in themselves. All the same they are pretty smart cookies so most of what they say is correct within the limits of discussion on philosophical matters and is consistent - I respect them for this.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1929
(12/21/03 3:25 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

I think it is kind of you, David, to hold onto the forlorn hope that women can be more like men. What you haven't grasped is that women are structurally, fundamentally different than men.

---

We'll soon have the means to fix this, through genetic technology.

Quote:

---

Of course when I read about the ancient warrior women, I remember how much people can vary according to their sense of themselves. But I am sure that the great women of old, the women of reknown, were not infused with a sense of their need to cast off their inferior femininity and be men.

---

They should aim to be even better men than men are, just as men themselves should aim beyond their current development.

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

The QRS have yet to point out the advantage of enlightenment to the human race apart from hypothetical statements that the problems of the world would be fixed because of the logical application of reason. What a boring bloody world that would be.

---

That's what heroion addicts say in regards to being without heroin. You don't think you could handle life without the drug of irrationality/insanity?

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Quinn has a personality disorder, and shouldn't ever be likened to a sage. I would much rather take the wise words of a woman in menstruation, than of someone with some sort of insanity.

---

Dan's right. You are lazy and boring.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1985(12/21/03 4:06 pm)Reply                                                                                                                         | ---- <hr/> How would you wish to see women changed structurally through genetic manipulation David? Narrower hips? Less breasts? Bigger beards?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 462(12/21/03 4:38 pm)Reply                                                                                                                          | Re: ---- <hr/> Then I am lazy and boring. It's just funny how dull you, Dan, and Kevin seem to be. Dan has shown me a bit of character, though. He seems to hold it back for you, though. Oh, I think he loves you, David. How uninteresting your mindless shit is! I get the feeling you bind yourself when I read you. Your burden is philosophy itself. You want so bad to be right, that you deny how much you want it. Your ego hasn't died. You haven't transcended it. You have a mental disorder, and have no way to back up how I am 'lazy' or 'boring'. Listen to yourself once. Women need to be genetically manipulated, in order to be what you consider as good? Men are the right sex, and women are the wrong (just so happens you are a man!)? Anyone who listens to a woman is a 'fool' or 'idiot'? Anyone who listens to this bullshit you (a man) talk about is a 'genius'? You think you are equal to a Christ or a Buddha! You can generally tell a person is deluded when they find something 'perfect' they can achieve, and become it. Sagehood? It's a fuckin' delusion. You seek acceptance in others, like the rest of us. Everyone here does, no matter how much they try to repress it. You want men to look up to you, and you want women to fear you. If I met you, I would kick your ass, then I would shit on your stomach. Bum. Rat. Scum. Waste. Idiot. |
| N0X23 <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 44(12/21/03 5:28 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> I can see your point, it's just another from of suppressive control, women have been forced into the weak emotional script by Men and perpetuated by society. Acting like a woman is considered to be a negative trait. When the roles are reversed and a man openly exhibits feminine emotion he is labeled a bitch or a pussy.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 8(12/21/03 6:30 pm)Reply         | Re: ---- <hr/> HTML Comments are not allowed Edited by: John at: 12/26/03 7:10 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| avidalocaRegistered UserPosts: 140(12/21/03 11:30 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> voce io wrote: Quote: <hr/> You think you are equal to a Christ or a Buddha! You can generally tell a person is deluded when they find something 'perfect' they can achieve, and become it. Sagehood? It's a fuckin' delusion. You seek acceptance in others, like the rest of us. Everyone here does, no matter how much they try to repress it. You want men to look up to you, and you want women to fear you. <hr/> I really think there should be a ban on this kind of ad hominem attack. It doesn't do anything other than create ill-will. I've know David for quite a few years and can safely say that he does not have a mental disorder in any way. The diagnosis he got from the government was purely to justify why they can't force him to work - they think "he must be crazy". They hate the fact that he isn't so they invent this to placate themselves. I can actually think of a hell of a lot of other people who function in so called normal society who I would consider absolute f*#@#ing lunatics. I've never seen David exhibit any of the behaviour of these apparently "normal" people because it isn't in his nature, which is why he follows a nobler path. Martin Edited by: avidaloca at: 12/21/03 11:37 pm |

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1996(12/21/03 11:35 pm)Reply | --- <hr/> Of course David doesn't have a mental disorder, he simply comes from down there somewhere, er deep down there down the order of mentality (: D)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 330(12/22/03 3:43 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> voce io: You think you are equal to a Christ or a Buddha! You can generally tell a person is deluded when they find something 'perfect' they can achieve, and become it. Sagehood? It's a fuckin' delusion. You seek acceptance in others, like the rest of us. Everyone here does, no matter how much they try to repress it. You want men to look up to you, and you want women to fear you. Martin: I really think there should be a ban on this kind of ad hominem attack. It doesn't do anything other than create ill-will. <hr/> No way. You'd give up freedom of expression just for that? If David cared so much about being spit on, then he shouldn't have called Voce Io lazy and boring. It's not like he's an unpredictable person or anything. |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 463(12/22/03 6:42 am)Reply | Re: ----<hr/> I should only be banned because I said I would kick his ass and shit on his stomach; not because I called him insane.Yeah, David isn't insane! He thinks he is a genius, he thinks women need genetic manipulation, and he is the one that resembles a primate.Damn, I was going to post his picture, but it seems that the Genius List is down.No...go ahead and ban me. I was getting sick of all the idiots here. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 382(12/22/03 7:07 am)Reply    | Re: ----<hr/> Scott, you cannot mean that.OK, if they ban you, then I'm going with you.You are either lazy nor boring, what the hell that guy thinks he's saying.And yes, you are an idiot. Aren't we all.Don't try to make yourself interesting.                                                                                                                                                                                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 464(12/22/03 8:44 am)Reply                                                                                      | ... <hr/> Paul, you are a strange but good guy.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1932(12/22/03 9:38 am)Reply    | Re: ---- <hr/> It is always interesting to observe the strong emotional reactions that arise whenever a thinker challenges the value of women. Apart from anything else, it is proof of the human race's enormous attachment to women and one of the main factors that stops people from freeing up their minds for wisdom.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1933(12/22/03 9:44 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> John wrote: Quote: <hr/> The stance I do not agree with is this slandering of women, it has no merit. <hr/> Where have I slandered women? Quote: <hr/> Women are as necessary as men (obviously), they can be helpful and they can be a pain in the but, it's just that few ever reach for the 'infinite'. This does not merit slander. The plain truth said simply is enough. <hr/> Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether. |

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 465(12/22/03 10:17 am)Reply       | ... <hr/> David, you aren't a thinker. You are an escapist.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2001(12/22/03 12:22 pm)Reply      | ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether. <hr/> David, you're joking aren't you?!                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1160(12/22/03 12:35 pm)Reply | re- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Women are as necessary as men (obviously), they can be helpful and they can be a pain in the but, it's just that few ever reach for the 'infinite'. This does not merit slander. The plain truth said simply is enough. <hr/> But John, you may misunderstand David. He has an essay here somewhere, called something like "The Great Divide" that explains how it happened that through a couple of million years of evolution, precisely because of the way that the two sexes were necessary, that men ended up with absolutely all of the best traits, and women got all the worst. |

He never denied that women have been necessary, but all that is past. Now that we have technology and science, we can make women into men, use test tubes to reproduce, and since emotion will also be eliminated, no one will be bothered with the need for sex or love or romance. Actually, the sex drive should be as easy to eliminate as the femaleness of women, easier in fact. Plus, the women will be what is commonly considered ugly, helping matter greatly.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 680

(12/22/03 12:45 pm)

Reply

Re: men and women

---

David: Thomas, you're contributing to the killing of souls every day without you even knowing it, just through the combination of your lack of enlightenment and your constant need to give teachings about matters of the spiritual realm.

Thomas replies (busily sweeping imagined body parts):

Uh sorry David, I forgot! There can only be one guru. Indeed, we must count ourselves lucky. Our antlike comprehension cannot cope with the ocean of knowledge you pour before us. We must be grateful for every crumb of wisdom that falls from your mouth.

(turns away stifling a burst of laughter)

In your reply you spend three paragraphs of impressive length on analyzing possible reasons for why men speak favorably of, or -heaven forbid- even praise women and associate with them, presenting the most sophisticated chains of thought, yet the answer still eludes you. It is so simple. Because of love. Men praise women because they love women. Both, men and women seek unification with the other sex because they strive to become complete human beings. This goes far beyond mere reproduction and gratification, otherwise the elaborate rituals and procedures that exist in relationships cannot be explained.

David: You also belong to an organization which has been killing millions of souls for centuries - name, Buddhism.

Hmm, it seems I learn something new every day. Organization? For your information, I am not associated with any specific teachers, temples, or any specific Buddhist community (except perhaps the kingdom of Thailand as a whole), although there are some teachers I like, and some communities that I sympathize with, especially the ones that spend their donation money on social work rather than on more golden temples.

As for "murdering souls", I believe that is merely a colorful slander you apply to groups who hold a set of views different from your own.

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1161

(12/22/03 12:54 pm)

Reply

men and women

---

Man, Jimmy, you struck out this time! If people were enlightened 2000 years ago they would have not have engaged in the mad blindness and crazed greed and mindless reproduction. Why in the world do you assume that enlightened people would be incapable of reproducing? Are you guys so backward that you actually equate sex with sin?

Of course men and women constantly upgrade themselves via two main mechanisms - the contingencies of life (nature) and the selection of the opposite sex. Men desire beauty in women above all, and so of course they will slowly get it.

And how can it be good for the race when the stupidest have the most children? Certain groups, like the Jews, have a reputation for consistently high IQ's, and I bet you can find the reason in the cultural practices of allowing the smartest people to also have more success at reproduction, and weeding out the worst.

The reason you say women and men are not mentally that different may be just because, as Thomas said, we are more alike than different.

I am almost always able to think outside of emotion. Every once in a while I get upset enough that I am just venting or whatever. I just do not see women as being inferior in this. I've known too many men who are unable to be rational at all when upset. It is generally so that men take a bigger push, or are pushed by fewer types of things, into becoming emotional. One of my daughters is even more rational than me. I really don't think she has ever been irrational even as a baby. She's a rather pretty girl who loves babies like anything and is one of those people who keeps all the relationships humming. When she moved away, her high school circle of friends fell apart. She was the center.

Anyone who is really intelligent, or spiritually advanced, would feel uncomfortable fucking a bimbo or dumb jock, in fact, women would probably feel even more uncomfortable, since they are not visually fixated about the opposite sex.

Jimmy, do we need the world to be in this hopeless and repetitive mess for it to not be boring? You know, I've gotten to the point where almost all TV violence and pathos are simply a yawn for me.

But I agree that QRS have a boring vision, or seem to. They aspire to robohood, what do you expect? Pinocchio wanted to be a real boy but they want to be androids.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 681
(12/22/03 1:00 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

David: So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

Hitler thought the same of Jews. Welcome to the dark side. Your views are essentially evil.

David: Where have I slandered women?

It is suprising that a man of your intelligence asks this question, and, although I think that your preception is fairly skewed, it is not quite skewed enough for this question to be genuine. You know very well that you do slander women, yet you assume that the end -your idea of truth- justifies the means.

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1165
(12/22/03 3:08 pm)
Reply

men and women

---

Quote:

---

Because of love. Men praise women because they love women.

---

It's an interesting phenomenon. Certainly there are myriad reasons to love women, but yet the male love of the female is even more fundamental than that. I've been watching nature. Of course it is the mating instinct - but it is even stronger than that. The pleasure gained from sex cannot begin to compensate for what many males lose in strength and time and effort for even the chance at joining with a female. Obviously, those males who react that way to females are the ones who reproduce most often. But how did it get started?

From what I understand of biology, the first males were the simplest, the male is an invention of nature for improved variation over, say, bacteria. So the purpose of the male is to carry DNA and give it back when needed. When you look at the life cycle of, say, caribou, the male spends his life and strength for the chance for mate for a few seconds, a few times in his life, while the female spends her life serving the young. Of course society is female. What else could it be? All the higher animals have achieved a society in which the males, once excluded except for mating, have made themselves useful enough to be tolerated for longer and longer periods in female company. That the male exists to serve the female is shown by the fact that all males are always ready without exception to drop everything, and risk everything, at any time when the female calls, and that he spends essentially all his life waiting for just that.

The male loves the female because she is the source from which he came. There is really nothing else to do but return to her. How can you not love the source of life? The female loves life by nurturing offspring, and the male nurtures life by loving the female. It could be rightly said that the definition of the male is that which loves the female.

Because of this we have that slight, faintly tragic difference in love between men and women. Men must always love more. The male heart goes directly toward the female, much as he loves his kids, but the female heart is always divided.

If Jesus said the highest love is proved by being willing to die for one's friends, then men and other male animals prove their fundamental love for females by protecting them above their own lives. Whereas the female runs for it!

For a man to despise women is unnatural, and that is why people react emotionally to it. It is like saying that it is wisdom to commit suicide. A man who hates women must of necessity hate himself. There is something wrong in his manhood. He of course knows this somewhere or other, but with his gift of brain categorization, he can lie to himself about it to a somewhat successful degree.

It is really only in humans that we see the full flowering of the male principle, which lies in its potential.

When you see what humans have become in their efforts to please the opposite sex, it is tomfoolery to suggest that a one-legged race would be more productive. It is because of women that men have become demigods. Women and potential.

I still haven't figured out how men managed to become almost the only species I can think of in which the female has equal or greater beauty. This is a major coup.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1935
(12/22/03 3:19 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

He never denied that women have been necessary, but all that is past. Now that we have technology and science, we can make women into men, use test tubes to reproduce, and since emotion will also be eliminated, no one will be bothered with the need for sex or love or romance.

---

God more than makes up for all of this, if you have faith.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1936
(12/22/03 3:44 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Uh sorry David, I forgot! There can only be one guru. Indeed, we must count ourselves lucky. Our antlike comprehension cannot cope with the ocean of knowledge you pour before us. We must be grateful for every crumb of wisdom that falls from your mouth.

---

There have been many good gurus or teachers of wisdom throughout history. I certainly don't claim to be the only one, nor even the best one. But nevertheless, there is only one path to Truth. And your actions, values and beliefs, Thomas, help discourage others from travelling upon it.

Quote:

---

(turns away stifling a burst of laughter)

---

Oh no, let it all out, Thomas. Why hide behind a frozen mask all the time?

Quote:

---

In your reply you spend three paragraphs of impressive length on analyzing possible reasons for why men speak favorably of, or -heaven forbid- even praise women and associate with them, presenting the most sophisticated chains of thought, yet the answer still eludes you. It is so simple. Because of love. Men praise women because they love women.

---

What a banal and useless comment, totally inappropriate on a philosophical discussion forum. It is like saying that the Nazis tortured and killed because they were evil, or that missionaries used to spread the Christian religion because they were godly. It doesn't even begin to scratch the surface of what is really going on, psychologically speaking.

Men love women because they love the egotistical pleasures and benefits they acquire from them - e.g. sex, emotional comforts, flattery, approval, someone to dominate or submit to, etc. In other words, their love of women is a form of self-love and based entirely in ignorance.

Quote:

---

Both, men and women seek unification with the other sex because they strive to become complete human beings. This goes far beyond mere reproduction and gratification, otherwise the elaborate rituals and procedures that exist in relationships cannot be explained.

---

Well, your prescription really only applies to people who are so deficient in their psychology and character that they are, in effect, only half a being.

Quote:

---

For your information, I am not associated with any specific teachers, temples, or any specific Buddhist community (except perhaps the kingdom of Thailand as a whole), although there are some teachers I like, and some communities that I sympathize with, especially the ones that spend their donation money on social work rather than on more golden temples.

---

Then why is it that whenever you speak about spiritual matters you sound exactly like a Buddhist textbook of the academic, Hinayanist variety?

Quote:

---

As for "murdering souls", I believe that is merely a colorful slander you apply to groups who hold a set of views different from your own.

---

No, it is the truth, alas.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1937
(12/22/03 3:49 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

Thomas: Hitler thought the same of Jews. Welcome to the dark side. Your views are essentially evil.

---

According to your comments on another thread, good and evil are subjective and without absolute existence. Have you now changed your mind?

Quote:

---

David: Where have I slandered women?

Thomas: It is suprising that a man of your intelligence asks this question, and, although I think that your preception is fairly skewed, it is not quite skewed enough for this question to be genuine. You know very well that you do slander women, yet you assume that the end -your idea of truth- justifies the means.

---

So where exactly have I slandered women?

John
Registered User
Posts: 14
(12/22/03 4:53 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

DavidQuinn000

-----

John wrote:

Quote:

-----

The stance I do not agree with is this slandering of women, it has no merit.

-----

Where have I slandered women?

Your words cannot be taken in any other way, sorry fella.

Quote:

-----

Women are as necessary as men (obviously), they can be helpful and they can be a pain in the but, it's just that few ever reach for the 'infinite'. This does not merit slander. The plain truth said simply is enough.

-----

Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

This sort of statement reminds me of man's continuing interference and destruction of mother nature. Do you have no faith in nature man? The Yin Yang interplay is cosmic, messing with this is a perilous undertaking. Those that will find the 'Way' will find it!

No David, you are wrong, woman has her place, if she does not reach for the infinite, don't mind it, just get on with the Great Matter at hand. My advise, ho ho, is to take that last post off the 'Quality Posts' thread, it does this place no credit.

You and Kevin are princes here, but you are not Princes, yet!

Prajna Paramita

John

John
Registered User
Posts: 15
(12/22/03 5:03 pm)
Reply

Re: re-

---

birdofhermes

But John, you may misunderstand David.

In my opinion all this wrangling over woman is a waste of time. The important matter here is how to become a Buddha!

You may be pleased to hear that women become Buddhas too. :)

But you already knew that of course.

John

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 685
(12/22/03 7:19 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

David: But nevertheless, there is only one path to Truth.

This is exactly what genocidal dictators, ruthless generals, and misguided gurus believe and preach. What concerns this question, I am with J. Krishnamurti. He said, "truth is a pathless land." I think he is right. Yet, without a path most people get lost, and hence, paths are useful - at least until one has developed the navigation skills to wander safely without one.

David: Then why is it that whenever you speak about spiritual matters you sound exactly like a Buddhist textbook of the academic, Hinayanist variety?

The fact that you assign this role to me is a result of your inexperience and your prejudice. It may seem so to you because I make frequent references to Buddhist teachings. I do this from a practical point of view, because I find the teachings valuable in view of truth, not because I have any associations with Buddhist clerics. Of course, Buddhism is only *one* expression of truth and there are certainly many different expressions.

David: What a banal and useless comment, totally inappropriate on a philosophical discussion forum.

The topic of love is neither useless nor inappropriate for a philosophical discussion forum. I mentioned it, because in your analysis you have completely missed the point. I just inserted the missing piece. From there you can go on and discuss the nature of love, and the psychological subtleties of relationships between man and woman, how love between man and woman differs from motherly love, fatherly love, how it relates to altruism, compassion, hatred, and so on, which doubtlessly gives you a plethora of interesting philosophical topics.

David: Men love women because they love the egotistical pleasures and benefits they acquire from them - e.g. sex, emotional comforts, flattery, approval, someone to dominate or submit to, etc. In other words, their love of women is a form of self-love and based entirely in ignorance.

It depends, doesn't it? What you describe is true for exploitative relationships that vegetate in the lower realms of human ethics. However, I would be quite surprised if you can show me a marriage that is purely based on exploitation and selfishness. Even the lowliest couple enjoys some moments of giving and sharing; at least occasionally. Anna made an interesting statement in view of this. She said something to the effect that the spiritual goal of a man is to sacrifice himself for the female, while the female sacrifices herself for her offspring. Of course, this is quite flattering to women, albeit not quite true. Men choose whatever they find to be a worthy cause, which differs according to their upbringing, such as family, fatherland, company, career, ideals, philosophy. Women are not very different in this regard, although they are naturally more inclined to nurture and develop strong attachments to their children. The purpose of the sacrifice does not really matter that much in my view. What matters is the conquest of the ego which enables one to make that sacrifice.

Thomas: Hitler thought the same of Jews. Welcome to the dark side. Your views are essentially evil.

David: According to your comments on another thread, good and evil are subjective and without absolute existence. Have you now changed your mind?

By no means. I said that good and evil are subjective, not that they are arbitrary. With regard to women you hold a conviction that most people would consider evil (for good reasons I might add, because it is destructive).

Thomas

foucuse

Registered User

Posts: 6

(12/22/03 9:24 pm)

Reply

men and women

---

What would you do without the sun? Say the sun burns up and humans figure out a way to design one.

Oh, this must be going against mother nature. The sun, is mother nature.

So, you would be willing to die.. instead of creating a sun (if we were that advnaced, and able to do so).

You can't just use the term mother nature as a protection! "You can't do that, that's not right"

What would you do without computers? Computers are not "mother nature" .. they cause pollution.

So what if women were eliminated, or even man was eliminated.. and better beings were created? The question is, what is better? Eliminating women means that you'd have to some how elimnate them.. so instead of elimnating them, why not phase them out?

Some animals go extinct. Some animals change drastically, over time (animals at the bottom of the ocean for example in dark place, that can live with no light - adapted to that condition).

Now this is quite funny to think about "women going extinct". In fact, instead of them going extinct, why not just figure a way to assist the process of adapting women to what is "better" - into more useful beings (I'm not saying make them into men via plastic surgery)

Instead of: Eliminate all magazines with women on them as sex symbols.
Eliminate all women singers that use sex to sell(i.e britney spears).
Eliminate all pornography that suggests women as objects.

Search and replace eliminate, with "Adapt or Assist in"

You could: Adapt or assist in helping people to stop using magazines with women on them as sex symbols. Adapt or assist in changing all women singers that use sex to sell(i.e britney spears). Adapt or assist in helping women stop wearing clothes that suggest sex. Adapt or assist in helping women not pretend (i.e. faking it during sex).

Why eliminate women, why not just try and make things "better"... slowly and surely? So instead of having a hitler style view.. of elimination, you could make use of what you already have (women are already here, so just help them get better, if they are currently not "better" or not in an acceptable condition)

What I don't understand about women is the whole money situation, and sex. In no way am I claiming the majority of women are out there for a man's money, though.

Some women:

I want his money, I'll just pretend I'm having a good time in bed.. I want kids, he will support them, since he has money. They will live a good life.

Men:

Men don't seem to go after women for money.. as usual, as women go after men, for money. You could have a real poor women, and if she looked really good, the man would go for her. If the woman was rich, the man wouldn't go for her 9 times out of ten (just a guess here, nothing scientific.)

Ok, so have I just sort of proved that women are interested in a person's money, whereas men are interested in sex?

Since money and sex kind of mingle together, is this what is holding men and women together, in a lot of cases? The two most ugliest topics, sex, and money, hold man and women together?

Not all men and women: I know, I know, there are true relationships out there where money and sex are not the basis of relationships. BUT, how about the majority, or relationships? the majority, not the rare cases, of true relationships (that is if you believe there are true relationships.. I believe there could be or is rare ones, but I'm not focusing on rare here.. I'm focusing on, the majority - since that is what "counts")

And also on the topic of elimination of women: what about eliminating all men that are interested in sex? Men that have tons of porno books stacked up in their house, and men that go out and laugh at women who don't wear slutty clothes. Men that focus on getting laid - i.e. let's go out to dinner, but my main intent, is to get laid.. so maybe I should get flowers too.

Should those men be eliminated - you'd probably say "no, we just need to change their thinking, or adapt them". So why not adapt women then?

They don't have to be sex objects, they don't have to buy magazines with sluts on them. They don't have to watch soap operas. Just like men don't have to look and stare at breasts, when a women wears slutty clothing.. we could adapt those men.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 198
(12/22/03 11:18 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: But nevertheless, there is only one path to Truth.

Thomas: This is exactly what genocidal dictators, ruthless generals, and misguided gurus believe and preach. What concerns this question, I am with J. Krishnamurti. He said, "truth is a pathless land." I think he is right.

---

Truth itself may be a pathless land - the realm of the Buddhas (who, incidentally still travel Buddha-paths) - but the path to truth is something altogether different, as it is not travelled by Buddhas.

A student went to a sage and asked: "What is the one and only path to enlightenment"?

The sage answered: "The abandoning of delusions."

The student replied: "But what is the secret to abandoning my delusions?"

The sage answered: "If you are carrying a burden, how many ways are there to drop it to the ground?"

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1166(12/22/03 11:50 pm)Reply | men and women<hr/> Quote:<hr/> while the female sacrifices herself for her offspring. Of course, this is quite flattering to women,<hr/>No reason to consider that more flattering. Male love has a spiritual quality, is more of an idea, than female love. It is visceral and compulsive yet also has a voluntary quality that elevates. It is the river which carries male potential along. |
| avidalocaRegistered UserPosts: 141(12/23/03 4:15 am)Reply      | Re: men and women<hr/> Weininger said the relationship of man to woman is the relationship of freedom to necessity. It's the same parallel as form to matter or something to nothing.                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 45

(12/23/03 7:19 am)

Reply

Re: men and women

---

Women have been dominated and oppressed for so long that they have no concept of freedom, the majority of them think that their freedom lies in being able to think and act more like a woman.

They have been born and bred for the development and progression of the species and its societies.

They paint their faces, adorn their bodies with trinkets, starve and bloat themselves and mutilate their bodies thru plastic surgery for nothing more than the appeasement of mans desire to procreate.

The love of woman is nothing more than the love of self, the love of how they make you feel about yourself.

We live in this ignorant, politically correct environment where no one is allowed to point out distinctions or the duality of the mind.

Its funny all of this talk about the illusion of the ego, the removal of duality and the desire to know Reality and yet when the truth is discussed people fall right back into their socially constructed frame of mind/ego (that believes that they are their gender) and defend the shackles of the women's subservient role.

David and Kevin are not degrading Women, they are trying to point out that they have as much potential for Liberation as does a man, but first they must stop existing purely for the enjoyment of man and start living for themselves, as individuals.

Edited by: N0X23  at: 12/23/03 7:22 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2010

(12/23/03 9:26 am)

Reply

----

---

Nox, you haven't thought enough on these things.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1938

(12/23/03 10:43 am)

Reply

Re: men and women

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Men love women because they love the egotistical pleasures and benefits they acquire from them - e.g. sex, emotional comforts, flattery, approval, someone to dominate or submit to, etc. In other words, their love of women is a form of self-love and based entirely in ignorance.

Thomas: It depends, doesn't it? What you describe is true for exploitative relationships that vegetate in the lower realms of human ethics.

---

It applies to all forms of sexual and emotional relationships. The only time that a relationship escapes being selfish and ego-serving is when it occurs between two Buddhas. But then again, such a relationship wouldn't really be a relationship.

Quote:

---

However, I would be quite surprised if you can show me a marriage that is purely based on exploitation and selfishness.

---

I would be even more surprised if you could show me a marriage that isn't.

Quote:

---

Even the lowliest couple enjoys some moments of giving and sharing; at least occasionally.

---

Sure, the all-pervading selfishness which characterizes marriage tends to oscillate between the mode of "sharing" (a form of selfishness which includes other people in the loop) and non-sharing (inward narcissistic selfishness).

Quote:

---

Anna made an interesting statement in view of this. She said something to the effect that the spiritual goal of a man is to sacrifice himself for the female, while the female sacrifices herself for her offspring. Of course, this is quite flattering to women, albeit not quite true.

---

"Quite flattering" understates it a bit. "Rampant female meglomania" is perhaps a more appropriate way of putting it.

Anna inadvertently touched on a genuine reality before her meglomania got the better of her. The role of men in our evolutionary past, as well as throughout the history of civilization, has indeed been one of self-sacrifice. Men have evolved to be the protectors of society (i.e. of women and children), to sacrifice their time, and even their lives, to protect their societies from war and natural disasters. Hence, the idea of sacrificing oneself for a lofty ideal, such as Truth, isn't foreign to them. Such sacrifice is foreign to women, however, who have evolved to be placed on a pedestal and molley-coddled within.

It is patently untrue that women "sacrifice" themselves for their offspring. On the contrary, women are thoroughly enhanced by having children, as evidenced by the way they glow when they get pregnant. Women love having children in the same way that they love getting a new address - it adorns them and provides them with networks and status within the wider community.

Quote:

---

Men choose whatever they find to be a worthy cause, which differs according to their upbringing, such as family, fatherland, company, career, ideals, philosophy. Women are not very different in this regard, although they are naturally more inclined to nurture and develop strong attachments to their children. The purpose of the sacrifice does not really matter that much in my view. What matters is the conquest of the ego which enables one to make that sacrifice.

---

Yes, the way the German population sacrificed themselves for the Nazi cause was a joy to behold. The important point was that they sacrificed themselves to something; the consequences emanating from this are irrelevant.

Quote:

---

David: According to your comments on another thread, good and evil are subjective and without absolute existence. Have you now changed your mind?

Thomas; By no means. I said that good and evil are subjective, not that they are arbitrary. With regard to women you hold a conviction that most people would consider evil (for good reasons I might add, because it is destructive).

---

Again, in Germany, in the thirties, most people thought that speaking and acting against Hitler's interests was evil. So I don't think that "most people" are a reliable judge of what constitutes evil.

I agree that my views on women are destructive of what most people deeply cherish and value - namely, a mindless existence with a pretty woman beside them. I don't back away from this. But the mere fact that it is destructive doesn't make it evil.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1939
(12/23/03 10:58 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Where have I slandered women?

John: Your words cannot be taken in any other way, sorry fella.

---

Again, what words?

Yes, I've articulated some harsh truths about women, but slander? I don't think so.

Quote:

---

DQ: Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

John: This sort of statement reminds me of man's continuing interference and destruction of mother nature. Do you have no faith in nature man? The Yin Yang interplay is cosmic, messing with this is a perilous undertaking. Those that will find the 'Way' will find it!

---

My speaking against women is also part of the Yin and Yang of Nature, just as your speaking against this form of speaking is a part of it.

Quote:

---

No David, you are wrong, woman has her place, if she does not reach for the infinite, don't mind it, just get on with the Great Matter at hand.

---

Eliminating the feminine, unconscious aspect of mind is part of the Great Matter. An essential part of it, in fact.

It could be said that cancer has its place in Nature, but do we really want to keep it? Does eliminating cancer constitute a breach of Nature? Not at all. The only thing it breaches is a lower quality existence steeped in pain.

Quote:

---

In my opinion all this wrangling over woman is a waste of time. The important matter here is how to become a Buddha!

---

Wrangling over woman is a very large part of becoming a Buddha. Woman easily constitutes one of the strongest attachments held by the human race. It has to be addressed by anyone who seeks the wisdom of non-attachment. It can't be ignored, as most people on this forum are trying to do.

Quote:

---

You may be pleased to hear that women become Buddhas too. :)

---

True, but not in their current form.

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 46
(12/23/03 2:25 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

Quote:

---

Nox, you haven't thought enough on these things.

---

Fair enough...Now when you say "these things" are you referring to this topic or to my postings in general?

Would you be willing to expand on your comment?
Do you feel that my thinking is immature, incomplete or are they contradicting your thoughts?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2011
(12/23/03 2:41 pm)
Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

Fair enough...Now when you say “these things” are you referring to this topic or to my postings in general?

---

Your last post.

Quote:

---

Would you be willing to expand on your comment?
Do you feel that my thinking is immature, incomplete or are they contradicting your thoughts?

---

Yes, I'll expand on it soon. I must leave for about a week. I'll get back to you.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 466
(12/23/03 3:07 pm)
Reply

...

---

Oh, the poor souls that listen to David's drivell!

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 687
(12/23/03 3:14 pm)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

David: The only time that a relationship escapes being selfish and ego-serving is when it occurs between two Buddhas.

Ah yes, a typical piece of artistry painted in your favorite colors, black and white. So either the couple consists of Buddhas or the relationship is exploitative, selfish, and rotten? I suppose it did not come to your mind that there is a continuum between these two extremes. The Bell curve comes to mind - I dare to say that these extemes you mentioned are fairly rare to find.

David: Sure, the all-pervading selfishness which characterizes marriage tends to oscillate between the mode of "sharing" (a form of selfishness which includes other people in the loop) and non-sharing (inward narcissistic selfishness).

I don't know where you get this from. Selfishness is not a special characteristic of marriages. It is the characteristic of an "unenlightened" mind and it continues to be existent -in some subtle form- until that mind has become "enlightened", whether it is in a relationship or not.

Humans don't form relationships because they are selfish, but because it is their nature. How selfish an individual or a relationship turns out to be obviously depends on those who are involved in it.

You are like a bit like Weininger. You don't realize that the problem entirely lies with your perception. If you are not willing to accept a woman as a capable being, an equal, then it is only logical that you perceive a relationship with an inferior person as selfish and exploitative. However, once you have realized that women are indeed equal, there is no more obstacle to a true relationship.

David: Yes, the way the German population sacrificed themselves for the Nazi cause was a joy to behold. The important point was that they sacrificed themselves to something; the consequences emanating from this are irrelevant.

Although this is a fairly repulsive comparison, there is some small granule of truth in it. The sacrifice is genuine. Of course, the believe that a leader (or in this case a regime) represents a nation is philistine and stupid. How many Iraqis are true Bathists? How many Germans have actually sacrificed themselves for Hitler? Not too many, I dare to say. But, thousands, even millions were drawn into the evil that Hitler commanded and few did understand the full magnitude of it. Most German sacrificed their lives for much simpler things, such as their homes, their families, their friends, basically the same reasons that the Allied soldiers sacrificed themselves for. Coming to think of it, so much ignorance and suffering is quite depressing.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 17
(12/23/03 5:27 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

DavidQuinn000

Again, what words?

Yes, I've articulated some harsh truths about women, but slander? I don't think so.

Too close to the trees to see the tone of your own language. I will not argue with you about words. It is the meaning that is conveyed that is important, your words on this subject are tainted.

Your own issues with woman and sex are not Dharma they are your own issues. As said in a previous post, plain and simple truth, not ranting is what is required.

THE COW TE CHING

(The Cow and its Characteristics)

by

The Zen Masters Kevin Solway & David Quinn

That you pose as Zen masters is a joke, if it is intended as a joke it's a bad joke.

Is 'Cow' an appropriate term for mother, I think not.

Chuang-tzu was married, he cried when she died. I guess that does not fit your view of how Enlightenment should be.

Quote:

-----
DQ: Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

John: This sort of statement reminds me of man's continuing interference and destruction of mother nature. Do you have no faith in nature man? The Yin Yang interplay is cosmic, messing with this is a perilous undertaking. Those that will find the 'Way' will find it!

-----
My speaking against women is also part of the Yin and Yang of Nature, just as your speaking against this form of speaking is a part of it.

This does not address the issue. You may as well say that murder is ok, which is basically what you are saying, isn't it!

Quote:

-----
No David, you are wrong, woman has her place, if she does not reach for the infinite, don't mind it, just get on with the Great Matter at hand.
-----

Eliminating the feminine, unconscious aspect of mind is part of the Great Matter. An essential part of it, in fact.

Eliminating the feminine, unconscious aspect of your mind, not doing away with the species we call woman. When Yang has done it's work there is a return to Yin in many ways.

It could be said that cancer has its place in Nature, but do we really want to keep it? Does eliminating cancer constitute a breach of Nature? Not at all. The only thing it breaches is a lower quality existence steeped in pain.

Your issues with woman are objects of your mind, sort out your mind. The world has it's own agenda.

Quote:

-----
In my opinion all this wrangling over woman is a waste of time. The important matter here is how to become a Buddha!
-----

Wrangling over woman is a very large part of becoming a Buddha. Woman easily constitutes one of the strongest attachments held by the human race. It has to be addressed by anyone who seeks the wisdom of non-attachment. It can't be ignored, as most people on this forum are trying to do.

The wisdom of non-attachment is not about destroying woman in an external sense. That you attach so much importance to externals is indicative that you have missed something!

John

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1940

(12/24/03 8:49 am)

Reply

Re: ----

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Again, what words? Yes, I've articulated some harsh truths about women, but slander? I don't think so.

John: Too close to the trees to see the tone of your own language. I will not argue with you about words. It is the meaning that is conveyed that is important, your words on this subject are tainted.

Your own issues with woman and sex are not Dharma they are your own issues. As said in a previous post, plain and simple truth, not ranting is what is required.

---

Well, it looks like we'll have to agree to disagree on this one. Obviously, I regard what I have written about women as "plain and simple truth", articulated in a dispassionate and noble manner.

Perhaps it is because the subject matter offends you that you project onto my words the idea that I'm ranting. All I can do is assure you that my approach to the subject of women is no different to my approach to any other subject.

Quote:

---

THE COW TE CHING

(The Cow and its Characteristics)

by

The Zen Masters Kevin Solway & David Quinn

That you pose as Zen masters is a joke, if it is intended as a joke it's a bad joke.

---

I actually consider myself to be far superior to most Zen masters, who like most religious gurus love to pander to the basest and most feminine qualities of humanity in order to be popular.

Quote:

---

Is 'Cow' an appropriate term for mother, I think not.

---

I beg to differ. Woman is usually at her most mindless when she becomes a mother.

Quote:

---

Chuang-tzu was married, he cried when she died. I guess that does not fit your view of how Enlightenment should be.

---

We all have our failings and weaknesses, even Chuang Tzu.

Quote:

---

DQ: Are women really as necessary as men? At bottom, the only thing they can do that men can't is become pregnant and give birth. But with the development of artificial wombs, even that won't be a factor in the future. So I don't think the human race will be too disadvantaged if we phased women out altogether.

John: This sort of statement reminds me of man's continuing interference and destruction of mother nature. Do you have no faith in nature man? The Yin Yang interplay is cosmic, messing with this is a perilous undertaking. Those that will find the 'Way' will find it!

DQ: My speaking against women is also part of the Yin and Yang of Nature, just as your speaking against this form of speaking is a part of it.

John: This does not address the issue. You may as well say that murder is ok, which is basically what you are saying, isn't it!

---

It depends on what is being murdered. The murder of things like cancer, psychopathic behaviour, insanity, irrational beliefs, untruthfulness, and ignorance, I consider to be okay. The same applies to the murder of feminine characteristics of mind which undermine consciousness of Ultimate Reality.

Quote:

---

John: No David, you are wrong, woman has her place, if she does not reach for the infinite, don't mind it, just get on with the Great Matter at hand.

DQ: Eliminating the feminine, unconscious aspect of mind is part of the Great Matter. An essential part of it, in fact.

John: Eliminating the feminine, unconscious aspect of _your mind_, not doing away with the species we call woman.

---

I really think you need to address your own external attachment to women, which seems to be very strong. If nothing else, my articulating the vision of phasing women out altogether confronts people and brings this hidden, suppressed attachment of theirs to the surface. Yet most people, such as yourself, are in denial about it and try to shift the responsibility onto me by labelling me as the bad guy.

In any case, we don't really need to phase out women altogether. We can still retain people with vaginas and wombs, and instead just phase out all the soft, feminine qualities which both sexes find so delightful and which so powerfully undermine people's desire to transcend the world and attain God-consciousness.

If a person enjoys his dreams too much, he will never want to wake up.

Quote:

---

When Yang has done it's work there is a return to Yin in many ways.

---

Sorry, I can't find any meaning in this remark.

Quote:

---

John: In my opinion all this wrangling over woman is a waste of time. The important matter here is how to become a Buddha!

DQ: Wrangling over woman is a very large part of becoming a Buddha. Woman easily constitutes one of the strongest attachments held by the human race. It has to be addressed by anyone who seeks the wisdom of non-attachment. It can't be ignored, as most people on this forum are trying to do.

John: The wisdom of non-attachment is not about destroying woman in an external sense. That you attach so much importance to externals is indicative that you have missed something!

---

The situation is completely the reverse. To me, you're like a heroin-addict who is squealing at a calmly stated proposal to eliminate heroin from the world.

I personally don't care whether or not heroin continues to exist in the world because I have no interest in it. At the same time, however, I recognize that the drug destroys lives and undermines the kind of mentality which is needed to think clearly and objectively and seek ultimate truth. In other words, in my view, eliminating heroin would best serve the cause of wisdom. The same principle applies to women.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1941
(12/24/03 9:15 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: The only time that a relationship escapes being selfish and ego-serving is when it occurs between two Buddhas.

Thomas: Ah yes, a typical piece of artistry painted in your favorite colors, black and white. So either the couple consists of Buddhas or the relationship is exploitative, selfish, and rotten?

---

From the highest perspective (which is the only perspective that matters when it comes to spiritual matters), yes. Any action which emanates out of ignorance of Reality, and which doesn't desperately seek to overturn this ignorance as soon as possible, is exploitative, selfish, and rotten.

What is a "couple" but a strong, reinforced fortress of egotism designed to protect the egos of each party? How can anyone who is serious about opening up his being to everything in the Universe possibly bind themselves to one particular human being? The very thought is preposterous.

Quote:

---

You are like a bit like Weininger. You don't realize that the problem entirely lies with your perception. If you are not willing to accept a woman as a capable being, an equal, then it is only logical that you perceive a relationship with an inferior person as selfish and exploitative. However, once you have realized that women are indeed equal, there is no more obstacle to a true relationship.

---

That isn't the issue. A piece of dog-shit on the ground is also my equal (in the sense that it is as much a perfect manifestation of Nature as I am), but that doesn't mean that I want to enter into a relationship with it. No, I just want to chuck it in the bin and forget about it.

The issue is fundamentally about attachment, not equality. It is about binding oneself, both emotionally and practically, to a finite phenomenon and thus destroying the possibility to developing the enlightened equanimity that a Buddha displays towards all finite phenomena.

Quote:

---

David: Yes, the way the German population sacrificed themselves for the Nazi cause was a joy to behold. The important point was that they sacrificed themselves to something; the consequences emanating from this are irrelevant.

Thomas: Although this is a fairly repulsive comparison, there is some small granule of truth in it. The sacrifice is genuine. Of course, the believe that a leader (or in this case a regime) represents a nation is philistine and stupid. How many Iraqis are true Bathists? How many Germans have actually sacrificed themselves for Hitler? Not too many, I dare to say. But, thousands, even millions were drawn into the evil that Hitler commanded and few did understand the full magnitude of it. Most German sacrificed their lives for much simpler things, such as their homes, their families, their friends, basically the same reasons that the Allied soldiers sacrificed themselves for. Coming to think of it, so much ignorance and suffering is quite depressing.

---

The moral of the story is that the simple act of sacrifice isn't enough on its own for one to become a spiritually wise person. It also depends on what one is sacrificing and to what end.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 692

(12/24/03 1:13 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

David: I actually consider myself to be far superior to most Zen masters...

You are not a Zen master, David, not to mention are you superior to them. Your philosophical views are encrusted by a fairly huge superiority complex which I doubt you will be able to remove without the help of a close supporter.

You aren't enlightened. The enlightenment that you imagine doesn't exist. It is an illusion.

You feel superior to women. You feel superior to everyone on this board. You feel equal to a Buddha, but you are not. Your idea of your self is a delusion. You haven't defeated your ego at all - you have enlarged it. While you are in this state you exert an influence on those who find comfort in misogyny, a tainted influence that promotes aversion.

This discussion is over. You think that women are a cancer. I think that you need help.

Thomas

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 467(12/24/03 1:30 pm)Reply | ... <hr/> Yes! ^ Someone with a good working brain!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 468(12/24/03 1:39 pm)Reply | ... <hr/> The issue is fundamentally about attachment, not equality. It is about binding oneself, both emotionally and practically, to a finite phenomenon and thus destroying the possibility to developing the enlightened equanimity that a Buddha displays towards all finite phenomena. You are trying to turn wood into stone. Non-attachment is about a state of mind: identification with consciousness of instead of consciousness as. As a human, I am attached equally to everything, with "enlightened equanimity". This equal attachment to everything is my consciousness saying "yes" to everything, including attachment itself. Being attached is about saying "no" to something. I am perfectly free and unattached, while I am attached to certain things I have chosen to be attached to. Your view is very negative; it's about isolating oneself, instead of embracing everything. Your view is "stupid". |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 469(12/24/03 1:44 pm)Reply | ... <hr/> What is a "couple" but a strong, reinforced fortress of egotism designed to protect the egos of each party? How can anyone who is serious about opening up his being to everything in the Universe possibly bind themselves to one particular human being? The very thought is preposterous. Egos will only die when either the body dies, or that part of the brain dies; so why should we run from our egos like little bitches? It's completely egotistical to deny ourselves of our own egos! If you are opening up your being to everything in the Universe, you should know that you are opening it up to SOCIETY, to WOMEN, to EGOISM, and to DELUSION!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1360
(12/24/03 3:55 pm)
Reply

--

---

Your insight is deepening, Voce. Be careful of individual criticism.

Tharan

John
Registered User
Posts: 18
(12/24/03 5:26 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

DavidQuinn000

John: The wisdom of non-attachment is not about destroying woman in an external sense. That you attach so much importance to externals is indicative that you have missed something!

-----
The situation is completely the reverse. To me, you're like a heroin-addict who is squealing at a calmly stated proposal to eliminate heroin from the world.

Nonsense, you really don't know.

You need to review your past studies with a clear and open mind. Not an easy task for one so caught up in an intellectual mire.

David, you typify why self-validation has always been rejected by the best traditions in this world.

It is said that Huang Po was naturally enlightened but this is very rare, nevertheless he spent some time with Pai Chang before he was able to teach. Hakuin maintained that he was enlightened for years until fortunately one day a true master was able to crush his delusion.

I hope something or someone causes you to penetrate more deeply. What you have is an intellectual pseudo enlightenment, the most difficult aberration to dislodge.

John

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1167

(12/25/03 11:39 am)

Reply

men and woman

---

Quote:

---

"Quite flattering" understates it a bit. "Rampant female meglomania" is perhaps a more appropriate way of putting it.

---

Megalomania - when the sum of all you and Weininger express is that the relationship of man to woman is as of something to nothing, etc, etc, etc.

No rampant male megalomania here?

I admit that I do find it necessary to occasionally struggle against what often appears to be a slight superiority of the female, most especially in the lower orders, but when you put together the posts I have written, I don't think anything close to megalomania is apparent, rather I profess the complementary attributes of the genders. That you can call it megalomania in light of the things that YOU have written about women - well it must be an example of why Dan thinks men are just.

I was genuinely surprised that Thomas considered that remark flattering to women. There's no accounting for it unless, even you, Thomas, have some sort of womb envy. What I said has rather little of opinion - it is patently obvious as an observation of life. The female serves life directly through birth and nurturing of the young. The male, by definition, cannot do this. (A few do - the seahorse and the catfish come to mind.) If the male and female join together in society, the male almost always takes on a protective role. That he regularly puts their lives before his own is pretty flattering.

Women just love having children. That must be why as soon as civilization got under way and the birth rate doubled, women had to be controlled by laws such as one in ancient Assyria, in which women who caused themselves to miscarry could be impaled on sticks.

It must be why my grandmother caused herself to miscarry seven times. My grandfather, you see, wouldn't wear a condom. It must also be why that bastard Jehovah decreed that women were unclean for 12 days, not 5, which lands a woman at precisely the time she is about to ovulate. How many young couples who have been told they may not for 12 long days will refrain then?

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1944(12/25/03 12:53 pm)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Voce Io wrote: Quote: <hr/> As a human, I am attached equally to everything, with "enlightened equanimity". <hr/> I haven't seen much of this "enlightened equanimity" lately towards me or my views. What I have seen, however, is a series of strong emotional reactions borne out of an attachment to your own sense of self. Quote: <hr/> This equal attachment to everything is my consciousness saying "yes" to everything, including attachment itself. Being attached is about saying "no" to something. I am perfectly free and unattached, while I am attached to certain things I have chosen to be attached to. <hr/> If being attached is about saying "no" to something, then why are you saying "no" to me and my views? |

It is foolish to imagine that you can have attachments in your life - indeed, attachments strong enough to cause you to upset and want to emotionally abuse others - and yet continue to pretend that you are somehow free and unattached. I mean, who are you trying to kid?

Quote:

---

If you are opening up your being to everything in the Universe, you should know that you are opening it up to SOCIETY, to WOMEN, to EGOISM, and to DELUSION!

---

I also spiritually open myself up to hunger and cold, but this doesn't mean that I want to preserve them by not eating or putting on a coat.

Although delusion and woman are part of the Totality, and therefore part of my true nature, I see no reason to keep them in existence. After all, a delusion-free, woman-free existence is also part of the Totality, part of my true nature.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1945
(12/25/03 1:02 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

John: The wisdom of non-attachment is not about destroying woman in an external sense. That you attach so much importance to externals is indicative that you have missed something!

DQ: The situation is completely the reverse. To me, you're like a heroin-addict who is squealing at a calmly stated proposal to eliminate heroin from the world.

John: Nonsense, you really don't know.

You need to review your past studies with a clear and open mind. Not an easy task for one so caught up in an intellectual mire.

David, you typify why self-validation has always been rejected by the best traditions in this world.

It is said that Huang Po was naturally enlightened but this is very rare, nevertheless he spent some time with Pai Chang before he was able to teach. Hakuin maintained that he was enlightened for years until fortunately one day a true master was able to crush his delusion.

I hope something or someone causes you to penetrate more deeply. What you have is an intellectual pseudo enlightenment, the most difficult aberration to dislodge.

---

I'm sorry, did you say something? You've just spoken a lot of words, but, for the life of me, I can't find anything of substance in them at all. Just a few dogmatic assertions plucked out of thin air, as though you simply wanted to beat your own chest.

I have the impression that you secretly regard yourself as a Zen master, but I wonder on what basis?

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1364
(12/25/03 1:12 pm)
Reply

--

---

"woman-free" is equivalent to "man-free," Voce. It is a symbiosis that transcends gender.

David and Co. tend to use this gender-based verbage (which is offensive to many) because they have decided that male/female relationships are the largest and most obvious target. They are not wrong, they just are not interested in hitting secondary targets.

But IMO, secondary targets often lead straight to a primary targets, without additional obstacles. People leave the back door unlocked more often than the front.

"Master, how do you feel when knew you had reached Enlightenment?"

"I felt like a fool."

"A fool?"

"I felt like a burgler who climbs to the roof with great effort and carefully breaks into a small window..."

"...and?.."

"...only to find that the front door was unlocked the entire time."

Tharan

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 12/25/03 1:20 pm

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 471

(12/25/03 3:22 pm)

Reply

Re: --

---

I haven't seen much of this "enlightened equanimity" lately towards me or my views. What I have seen, however, is a series of strong emotional reactions borne out of an attachment to your own sense of self.

I haven't been repressing my emotions much at all; that wasn't my path. I allow them, just as I allow myself (a reaction) to happen. I haven't denied myself of a sense of self. A sense of self is necessary to function, even as an 'enlightened person' (particularly, as an enlightened person). Someone without a sense of self would mentally live in nonduality, and would not physically be able to tell anyone else about anything. Like I said before, too, I have that 'enlightened equanimity' towards attachment itself.

Being enlightened yourself, why do you even think of 'attachment' and 'ego' and all of that? It's all just part of the illusion. I feel like I have very strange ideas on enlightenment and the teaching of it, compared to everyone here. I view teachings about all of that almost entirely unnecessary. They take attention away from what's actual, and hinder progress in understanding. In my case - I learned all of those terms and non-existent things, just to unlearn all of them.

If being attached is about saying "no" to something, then why are you saying "no" to me and my views?

Your views are only your views, and you are calling them truth. I don't feel like I should just sit there and be unattached to you telling everyone something that's not true. My feelings are attached to ideas, still, and on a certain level of abstraction, I am free of any of that. I let everything happen, even my little reactions and shit.

It is foolish to imagine that you can have attachments in your life - indeed, attachments strong enough to cause you to upset and want to emotionally abuse others - and yet continue to pretend that you are somehow free and unattached. I mean, who are you trying to kid?

I am free from foolishness. I am free from attachments in my life. I am free from acting upset and wanting to emotionally abuse others. I am free from continuing to pretend that I'm somehow free and unattached. I am free from being 'free and unattached'. I am free from trying to kid anyone.
I am truly free from being free!

None of what you are questioning me about is actually true, don't you know that? The highest truth is nonduality, and that's all I'm ever talking about.

I also spiritually open myself up to hunger and cold, but this doesn't mean that I want to preserve them by not eating or putting on a coat.

I thought that you were unattached to everything? You talk about people being lazy about their faith and philosophy, yet, you keep these little attachments! You claim attachments are bad, and you brush them off, making yourself believe that it's okay. You can either do one of a few things. One is to go about your route, and get rid of ALL attachments, and thus, attain actual non-attachment. Two, is you can transcend all cycles in delusive thinking, all dualities between some concept of attachment and some concept of non-attachment, and thus attain realization.

Let yourself be a fool, and you will be the wisest.

Although delusion and woman are part of the Totality, and therefore part of my true nature, I see no reason to keep them in existence. After all, a delusion-free, woman-free existence is also part of the Totality, part of my true nature.

You are trying to tell yourself a lie, and only half believing it. Things are the way they are, and the only reason there is EVER change is because there is want. The only reason there is ever want is because there is attachment. You are attached to what you think is truth.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 471
(12/25/03 3:48 pm)
Reply

Re: --

---

Tharan,

I like you. I don't really know about all that primary and secondary target stuff, or your idea about what David's talking about. I do think you are , though.

"Master, how do you feel when knew you had reached Enlightenment?"

"I felt like a fool."

"A fool?"

"I felt like a burgler who climbs to the roof with great effort and carefully breaks into a small window..."

"...and?..."

"...only to find that the front door was unlocked the entire time."

Nice. That's kind of like it, but it's only a metaphor so it loses it's meaning. Enlightenment is pointless to talk about. Enlightened people don't think about enlightenment, or take it seriously, unless they want to tell someone about it. Then they have to "descend into lower levels of thought", and help whoever it is reach the next stage of thought.

I think that's stupid, though. I think we can skip all of this process shit, and just get straight to it:

Know yourself.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1947

(12/25/03 4:47 pm)

Reply

Re: --

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: I haven't seen much of this "enlightened equanimity" lately towards me or my views. What I have seen, however, is a series of strong emotional reactions borne out of an attachment to your own sense of self.

VI: I haven't been repressing my emotions much at all; that wasn't my path. I allow them, just as I allow myself (a reaction) to happen. I haven't denied myself of a sense of self. A sense of self is necessary to function, even as an 'enlightened person' (particularly, as an enlightened person). Someone without a sense of self would mentally live in nonduality, and would not physically be able to tell anyone else about anything. Like I said before, too, I have that 'enlightened equanimity' towards attachment itself.

---

You're not saying anything meaningful. It would be like a raging Mike Tyson biting off someone's ear and then declaring that he is always tranquil and serene towards his own rage.

There was nothing equanimous in your declaring that you wanted to knock me over and shit on my chest. Face it, mate, you had lost the plot.

Quote:

---

Being enlightened yourself, why do you even think of 'attachment' and 'ego' and all of that? It's all just part of the illusion.

---

..... which nearly everyone is still spellbound by, which is why enlightened people have to talk about attachments and ego (in order to help free these people from the illusion).

Quote:

---

I feel like I have very strange ideas on enlightenment and the teaching of it, compared to everyone here. I view teachings about all of that almost entirely unnecessary. They take attention away from what's actual, and hinder progress in understanding. In my case - I learned all of those terms and non-existent things, just to unlearn all of them.

---

You've "unlearned" (as in discarded) all the great spiritual concepts that have been painstakingly devised by wise men in the past, while remaining attached and bound to all the mediocre things that everyone else in the world is still bound to (such as the need to be thought energetic and exciting, as opposed to lazy and boring, and the need to be in a relationship with a woman, etc). It's not much of an achievement.

Quote:

---

DQ: If being attached is about saying "no" to something, then why are you saying "no" to me and my views?

VI: Your views are only your views, and you are calling them truth. I don't feel like I should just sit there and be unattached to you telling everyone something that's not true. My feelings are attached to ideas, still, and on a certain level of abstraction, I am free of any of that.

---

Okay, then, how about we change your assertion to: "Being attached is about saying 'no' to something - apart from when I, Voce Io, say 'no', in which case it is an example of my wondrous enlightened non-attachment." How does that sound?

Quote:

---

DQ: It is foolish to imagine that you can have attachments in your life - indeed, attachments strong enough to cause you to upset and want to emotionally abuse others - and yet continue to pretend that you are somehow free and unattached. I mean, who are you trying to kid?

VI: I am free from foolishness. I am free from attachments in my life. I am free from acting upset and wanting to emotionally abuse others. I am free from continuing to pretend that I'm somehow free and unattached. I am free from being 'free and unattached'. I am free from trying to kid anyone. I am truly free from being free!

---

What about your grip on reality?

Quote:

---

None of what you are questioning me about is actually true, don't you know that? The highest truth is nonduality, and that's all I'm ever talking about.

---

My impression is that you've had one or two insights into the nature of "oneness" - i.e. that everything is a manifestation of the Totality - and assumed this to be the highest knowledge is. But it's still a long way short of genuine realization of non-duality, which is the knowledge of Buddhas.

Quote:

---

DQ: I also spiritually open myself up to hunger and cold, but this doesn't mean that I want to preserve them by not eating or putting on a coat.

VI: I thought that you were unattached to everything?

---

The issue has nothing to do with attachment. Rather, it is to do with being alive and conscious and placing value on wisdom.

Being alive and conscious, I continually have to make choices each day. Do I eat now and eliminate my hunger, or do I leave it for awhile and let my hunger continue? I cannot stop dealing with these kinds of choices. They are happening all the time, irrespective of whether I am an enlightened person or not. I have no choice but to make decision after decision after decision throughout the course of each day, and hopefully, each of them will be the wisest one possible. If I was a perfect Buddha, they would be.

Now, the question of attachment refers to the manner in which we makes these decisions. If we invest emotionally in the outcome of our decisions, then we are being egotistical and attached. For example, if I write a book in the hope that it will make me famous and earn me lots of money, then I am being egotistical because I am investing emotionally in the outcome that people will like the book and will praise me. On the other hand, if I write a book with the intention of speaking truthfully and creating a high-quality work that people can draw inspiration from, and if I write it in the spirit of non-attachment such that I don't personally care whether I succeed or not, then I am being truthful and wise and unattached - even while working towards a future outcome.

John
Registered User
Posts: 20
(12/25/03 6:26 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

DavidQuinn000:

I'm sorry, did you say something? You've just spoken a lot of words, but, for the life of me, I can't find anything of substance in them at all. Just a few dogmatic assertions plucked out of thin air, as though you simply wanted to beat your own chest.

What you consider as substantial no doubt is mental masturbation, my view is different.

I have the impression that you secretly regard yourself as a Zen master, but I wonder on what basis?

:) Well done, a typical response. Fortunately I don't have your problem.

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 473

(12/26/03 4:23 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

You're not saying anything meaningful. It would be like a raging Mike Tyson biting off someone's ear and then declaring that he is always tranquil and serene towards his own rage.

When Tyson bit off Holyfield's ear, he was in love with his rage. Everything that happens, you love, whether you think you hate it or think you love it.

There was nothing equanimous in your declaring that you wanted to knock me over and shit on my chest. Face it, mate, you had lost the plot.

There was nothing equanimous in it, but I was equanimous. There was definitely some hilarity in it, though, as well as rage.

..... which nearly everyone is still spellbound by, which is why enlightened people have to talk about attachments and ego (in order to help free these people from the illusion).

If someone is imagining these things, then they can't be spellbound by them. Closer to reality: there are no enlightened people, and there is no one to be saved. If a self proclaiming enlightened person is talking about freeing people from illusion, my guess is that they have not been freed from illusion in the first place.

You may ask why I talk, then. For every reason in the universe.

You've "unlearned" (as in discarded) all the great spiritual concepts that have been painstakingly devised by wise men in the past, while remaining attached and bound to all the mediocre things that everyone else in the world is still bound to (such as the need to be thought energetic and exciting, as opposed to lazy and boring, and the need to be in a relationship with a woman, etc).

I have not discarded ANY spiritual concepts, I have fulfilled them. I am not bound to the need to be viewed as energetic and exciting. If I wanted to be viewed as that, I'd go fuck some whore, and jump out of an airplane... maybe both at the same time. I don't have a need to be in a relationship with a woman, either. I choose to be in one.

Okay, then, how about we change your assertion to: "Being attached is about saying 'no' to something - apart from when I, Voce Io, say 'no', in which case it is an example of my wondrous enlightened non-attachment."

How does that sound?

No, I don't like that. I meant what I said. There are many levels of 'self' within human consciousness, and none of them are actually ultimately true. Think of the seeming contradiction as a zen koan, or something. It's meant to hit you up to a level that is right before enlightenment: the subject-object illusion. 'Anything I am aware of is not me'.

What about your grip on reality?

I have a very firm grip on reality.

My impression is that you've had one or two insights into the nature of "oneness" - i.e. that everything is a manifestation of the Totality - and assumed this to be the highest knowledge is. But it's still a long way short of genuine realization of non-duality, which is the knowledge of Buddhas.

I know I have attained the highest knowledge because it's disproven everything. It's the sharpest reasoning beyond reasoning. It'd be interesting to know about this 'knowledge of the Buddhas', because I surely conquer it.

The issue has nothing to do with attachment. Rather, it is to do with being alive and conscious and placing value on wisdom.

That is like drinking a half gallon bottle of Jack Daniels each day, and saying "I am not an alcoholic, just because I drink". You blamed me for doing something like this earlier, yet I wasn't actually doing such a thing. You are.

Being alive and conscious, I continually have to make choices each day. Do I eat now and eliminate my hunger, or do I leave it for awhile and let my hunger continue? I cannot stop dealing with these kinds of choices. They are happening all the time, irrespective of whether I am an enlightened person or not. I have no choice but to make decision after decision after decision throughout the course of each day, and hopefully, each of them will be the wisest one possible. If I was a perfect Buddha, they would be.

What causes your decisions IS attachment. Admit it. Also...'perfect Buddha'? There are imperfect Buddhas?! Sounds like a sheep in wolves clothing.

On the other hand, if I write a book with the intention of speaking truthfully and creating a high-quality work that people can draw inspiration from, and if I write it in the spirit of non-attachment such that I don't personally care whether I succeed or not, then I am being truthful and wise and unattached - even while working towards a future outcome.

You are still attached to something you want. Action can't happen without want, or a drive. Why differentiate between emotional wants and rational wants? It's pretty much the same thing.

John was right, you are just mentally masturbating and calling it substantial.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1366
(12/26/03 11:51 am)
Reply

Re: --

---

Voce wrote,

Quote:

---

Then they have to "descend into lower levels of thought", and help whoever it is reach the next stage of thought.

---

- 1) Buddha
- 2) Bohdisattva (teacher)
- 3) student

Quote:

---

I think that's stupid, though. I think we can skip all of this process shit, and just get straight to it:

---

Follow your path.

Tharan

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 49

(12/26/03 1:59 pm)

Reply

Re: --

---

Quote:

I know I have attained the highest knowledge because it's disproven everything. It's the sharpest reasoning beyond reasoning.

---

Are you suggesting absolute negation?

---

Quote:

It'd be interesting to know about this 'knowledge of the Buddhas', because I surely conquer it.

---

This wouldn't involve shitting on the Buddhas' chest would it?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1172

(12/26/03 2:11 pm)

Reply

menandwomen

---

Quote:

The love of woman is nothing more than the love of self, the love of how they make you feel about yourself.

---

Sure, but since the Other IS the self, what difference does it make? When all is Self, why not love everything? The ultimate selfishness!

---

Quote:

David and Kevin are not degrading Women, they are trying to point out that they have as much potential for Liberation as does a man, but first they must stop existing purely for the enjoyment of man and start living for themselves, as individuals.

---

I long desperately for women to start living for themselves. David and Kevin wouldn't like it if they did as it's unlikely they would come to similar conclusions as them. The more they find out that the differences between men and women are more than only cultural and are also brain structural and hormonal, the less hope they hold out for women, and the more they want to use the scalpel.

It's so tragically conventional a view.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1173
(12/26/03 3:30 pm)
Reply

men and women

---

Quote:

---

God more than makes up for all of this, if you have faith.

---

Indeed, I have even more faith than that. I have faith that one does not have to negate life in order to know God. I have faith that there is no logic to the idea that we must feel massively guilty for that which is our nature. I have faith that we can be enlightened, and yet live as human beings. I have faith that life, love, wisdom and knowledge are not mutually exclusive and are the true human birthright; that we are wonderfully wrought perceiving mechanisms for the simultaneous experience of all the above. I have faith that the enlightened life is no sacrifice.

Quote:

---

Men love women because they love the egotistical pleasures and benefits they acquire from them - e.g. sex, emotional comforts, flattery, approval, someone to dominate or submit to, etc. In other words, their love of women is a form of self-love and based entirely in ignorance.

---

- 1) Everything is self, let there be self-love.
- 2) It is an important insight that the self is a temporary manifestation. But this Totality consists of myriad such manifestations. They are real enough. Yes, only that which is eternal is real. The manifestations are fluctuations within the real - that is how they take part in realness. It makes no sense to consider them nothing but ignorance because therein lies all the beauty, the evolving, the poignancy, the variety... You know, after enlightenment, everything is as it was before - only perceived differently.
- 3) If you eliminate every benefit from any relationship whatsoever, the universe will consist of nothing. Look how selfish the earth is in the way she exploits the sun! Look at the mutually exploitive relationship between bees and flowers.
- 4) A working and harmonious marriage tends to be quite equal in its give and take. That being the case, how can it be called exploitive. Mutual benefits, yes, because the two are more than the sum of their parts.

Quote:

---

The only time that a relationship escapes being selfish and ego-serving is when it occurs between two Buddhas.

---

When the Tao is lost, salvationist religions appear.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 475
(12/26/03 4:04 pm)
Reply

...

---

Are you suggesting absolute negation?

If absolute reason is absolute negation, yeah.

This wouldn't involve shitting on the Buddhas' chest would it?

It might.

Indeed, I have even more faith than that. I have faith that one does not have to negate life in order to know God. I have faith that there is no logic to the idea that we must feel massively guilty for that which is our nature. I have faith that we can be enlightened, and yet live as human beings. I have faith that life, love, wisdom and knowledge are not mutually exclusive and are the true human birthright; that we are wonderfully wrought perceiving mechanisms for the simultaneous experience of all the above. I have faith that the enlightened life is no sacrifice.

...

1) Everything is self, let there be self-love.

2) It is an important insight that the self is a temporary manifestation. But this Totality consists of myriad such manifestations. They are real enough. Yes, only that which is eternal is real. The manifestations are fluctuations within the real - that is how they take part in realness. It makes no sense to consider them nothing but ignorance because therein lies all the beauty, the evolving, the poignancy, the variety... You know, after enlightenment, everything is as it was before - only perceived differently.

3) If you eliminate every benefit from any relationship whatsoever, the universe will consist of nothing. Look how selfish the earth is in the way she exploits the sun! Look at the mutually exploitive relationship between bees and flowers.

4) A working and harmonious marriage tends to be quite equal in its give and take. That being the case, how can it be called exploitive. Mutual benefits, yes, because the two are more than the sum of their parts.

...

When the Tao is lost, salvationist religions appear.

Perfectly conclusive and precise!

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 476

(12/26/03 4:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Back to the original point of this topic, though...

Women are no different from men, as both are momentary appearances. An enlightened person knows this, and knows enlightenment transcends all momentary appearances, as well as 'good' and 'evil'. An enlightened one saying women are 'evil' is an absolutely preposterous idea.

That is the person talking, not the person's enlightenment, and shouldn't be mistaken for an enlightened teaching. Just as this wasn't an enlightened teaching, but merely a post formed of opinions and reactions.

Also, just in case someone were to try and argue with what I just said... things that point to truth, such as philosophy and meditation are just as 'evil' as things that point away from truth. Realization of truth is just as 'evil' as fucking bitches, or shitting on chests to an enlightened person.

Edited by: voce io at: 12/26/03 4:16 pm

John
Registered User
Posts: 22
(12/26/03 6:41 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

So, what of reasoned argument/logical truth?

Reason certainly has its place but it is not the unparalleled panacea that is presented here by certain individuals.

Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical. I don't dwell in these realms so someone else maybe could answer this. Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

John

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 211
(12/26/03 11:00 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Reason certainly has its place but it is not the unparalleled panacea that is presented here by certain individuals.

---

That sentence is an example of how faulty reasoning is not an unparalleled panacea, as it uses faulty reasoning to arrive at its conclusion.

Quote:

---

Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical. I don't dwell in these realms so someone else maybe could answer this. Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

---

There are two possibilities, either David's argument is right, or it is wrong. If it is right, then we may be able to reason our way to the same conclusion, if we have the required reasoning skills and experience, thus proving it right, to yourself. On the other hand, if David's argument is wrong, and you have the needed reasoning skills and experience to prove it wrong, then you will be able to disprove his argument to yourself (though not necessarily to others).

John
Registered User
Posts: 23
(12/26/03 11:30 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

ksolway

Quote:

-----
Reason certainly has its place but it is not the unparalleled panacea that is presented here by certain individuals.

-----
That sentence is an example of how faulty reasoning is not an unparalleled panacea, as it uses faulty reasoning to arrive at its conclusion.

I did not use reason to arrive at a conclusion. Please explain what you mean.

edit:

Ok, you mean I have a reason, not that I used reasoned or faulty reasoned argument.

end edit:

Quote:

-----
Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical. I don't dwell in these realms so someone else maybe could answer this. Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

-----
There are two possibilities, either David's argument is right, or it is wrong. If it is right, then we may be able to reason our way to the same conclusion, if we have the required reasoning skills and experience, thus proving it right, to yourself. On the other hand, if David's argument is wrong, and you have the needed reasoning skills and experience to prove it wrong, then you will be able to disprove his argument to yourself (though not necessarily to others).

You are the expert here, show how David's stance on this issue is wrong or right. I will try to follow your exposition.

John

Edited by: John at: 12/26/03 11:39 pm

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 824

(12/26/03 11:54 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

Hi John.

Quote:

---

Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical.

---

That presumption being based on what? His insistence? Hoodwinkery?

It most certainly is not logical.

Quote:

---

Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

---

The prosecution must first state and prove their argument according to rigorous logic, which must then withstand all logical cross-examination, before the burden of proof rests with the defence.

This is not the case.

Propositional logical argument does not equal The Law Of Identity plus spurious rationalisation.

Neither is it just a few dogmatic assertions plucked out of thin air, as though someone simply wanted to beat their own chest; which is all that we've seen thusfar, argument wise.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 213

(12/26/03 11:57 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

John: Reason certainly has its place but it is not the unparalleled panacea that is presented here by certain individuals.

Kevin: That sentence is an example of how faulty reasoning is not an unparalleled panacea, as it uses faulty reasoning to arrive at its conclusion.

Kevin: I did not use reason to arrive at a conclusion. Please explain what you mean.

---

Your first sentence, starting "Reason certainly . . ." is itself a conclusion you arrived at using reason.

Quote:

---

Ok, you mean I have a reason, not that I used reasoned or faulty reasoned argument.

---

No, I mean you used reason to arrive at that conclusion, ie, the conclusion that "Reason certainly . . .".

Quote:

---

You are the expert here, show how David's stance on this issue is wrong or right. I will try to follow your exposition.

---

I think David's argument is right, but I think you should ask David to present that argument. Although you can probably put together his reasons

|                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                | from what he has written on this forum.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 24(12/27/03 1:16 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Hello Dave ----- Quote: ----- Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical. ----- That presumption being based on what? His insistence? Hoodwinkery? I'm putting the question because it is supposedly the way he arrives at conclusions. Quote: ----- Can you disprove David's position with logical argument? ----- The prosecution must first state and prove their argument according to rigorous logic, which must then withstand all logical cross-examination, before the burden of proof rests with the defence. You mean the prosecutor of woman must first state and prove his argument according to rigorous logic. David made the proposition, it is his responsibility to make a case. John |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 830(12/27/03 1:21 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Well yes, but really I'm saying that he has made such a case N ammount of times in many different ways. But the said cases and arguments therein bear no resemblance to formal logic, not even rigorous reason.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 25(12/27/03 1:25 am)Reply                                                                                           | Re: ... <hr/> ksolwayI think David's argument is right, but I think you should ask David to present that argument. David has been speaking about it for some time and has not shown any good reason to hold those views. If you agree with him, go for it. Although you can probably put together his reasons from what he has written on this forum. Not at all, all I can see is someone who had come off the rails, so to speak. John |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 477
(12/27/03 2:41 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

Yes, you must have missed it:

Women are no different from men, as both are momentary appearances. An enlightened person knows this, and knows enlightenment transcends all momentary appearances, as well as 'good' and 'evil'. An enlightened one saying women are 'evil' is an absolutely preposterous idea.

That is the person talking, not the person's enlightenment, and shouldn't be mistaken for an enlightened teaching. Just as this wasn't an enlightened teaching, but merely a post formed of opinions and reactions.

Also, just in case someone were to try and argue with what I just said... things that point to truth, such as philosophy and meditation are just as 'evil' as things that point away from truth. Realization of truth is just as 'evil' as fucking bitches, or sitting on chests to an enlightened person.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 478
(12/27/03 3:16 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Here, I'll make a little formula which most won't take the time to read, and most others won't agree with or won't get:

A = Truth (Ultimate)

1 = truth (perception with perfect reasoning)

2 = illusion (perception with imperfect reasoning)

a = man

b = woman

aa = "strength", "straightforwardness", "non-attachment", "ego-less"

ab = "weakness", "avoidance", "attachment", "ego"

0 = Consciousness

11 = Knowledge of anything

A = (1, 2, a, b, aa, ab, 0, 11)

1 = human 0 of A

2 = human 0 not of A, or 0 - 1, or 2

2 = (a,b, aa, ab, 0, 11)

So any 0 of any appearance is 2. Even the appearance of 11 that any appearance is 2, is 2, although it is still 1.

Reality has been said, by David, to be nondual. That means without inherent separation. If (1, 2, a, b, aa, ab, 0, and 11) can be called things, then they are separations, and they are all illusions.

This places a higher importance in the world of illusions on 11, 0, aa, a, and 1. Yet, having 1 is about transcending all separations through reasoning (truth (nonduality) with perfect reasoning)! This includes separations about women, their apparent problems, non-attachment, and whatever else it is David feels is evil.

This shows to me that David is not enlightened. An a or b having attained 1, won't keep such a firm view about something so comparatively small. In trying to teach others about A, they will focus more on the transcending of 2, and the trust of A and in 1 (1 being 2 as well). Not trusting in some separation lower than knowledge of truth itself.

Enlightenment itself should be the only stepping stone a teacher actually worries over. If a teacher is focusing on ab, they are most likely living in 2, and placing importance on 2.

11 (0) of  $A = 1 = 2 =$  "I know that I know nothing."

11 (0) of (11 (0) of  $A = 1 = 2 =$  "I know that I know nothing." = Divine hilarity.

It takes no effort to reach 1; 1 reaches you. So saying that ab is worse than aa for reaching 1 is useless. Instead of giving people 1, it gives them 2.

...

I could keep going with these poor excuses for formulae, or someone could actually logically prove David and Kevin's argument, using some sort of logic...even if it is just homebrew logic made up on the spot.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1177

(12/27/03 3:35 am)

Reply

re-

---

For starters, John, have you read the essays that are linked at the beginning of this thread? Why not go from there/ It is unfair to expect David to start all over again.

|                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 26(12/27/03 3:44 am)Reply                  | Re: re- <hr/> birdofhermesFor starters, John, have you read the essays that are linked at the beginning of this thread? Why not go from there/ It is unfair to expect David to start all over again. Do any of them talk about eradicating woman from our world, if so which ones? John                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1179(12/27/03 4:09 am)Reply | men and women <hr/> I'm sorry, I didn't mean this thread, but the one called Woman: An Exposition for the Advanced Mind. I tried to download it to recall what was there exactly, and for some reason couldn't. Perhaps its temporarily down. I remember something like "The Great Divide." It may not get to the actual plans for the Final Solution, but it will certainly explain why he thinks as he does.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 27(12/27/03 4:40 am)Reply                  | Re: men and women <hr/> Anna:----- I'm sorry, I didn't mean this thread, but the one called Woman: An Exposition for the Advanced Mind. I tried to download it to recall what was there exactly, and for some reason couldn't. Perhaps its temporarily down. I remember something like "The Great Divide." It may not get to the actual plans for the Final Solution, but it will certainly explain why he thinks as he does. The material in 'An Exposition for the Advanced Mind' is one thing, advocating the eradication of woman is another thing entirely. If a man feels that woman is to be avoided for his own personal growth that is his own affair. To advocate the eradication of woman shows that his logic has run riot. John |

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1180(12/27/03 5:23 am)Reply                                                                                | men adn women <hr/> Hmmm...are you saying you agree with the material in there? If so, I don't really quite understand your problem.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 214(12/27/03 9:29 am)Reply                                                                                      | Re: men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The material in 'An Exposition for the Advanced Mind' is one thing, advocating the eradication of woman is another thing entirely. If a man feels that woman is to be avoided for his own personal growth that is his own affair. To advocate the eradication of woman shows that his logic has run riot. <hr/> The "eradication of woman" doesn't mean the crude eradication of physical women, as that wouldn't solve the problem. David is speaking of the eradication of the woman within - within all people. |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1948(12/27/03 3:52 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Voce Io wrote: Quote: <hr/> DQ: You're not saying anything meaningful. It would be like a raging Mike Tyson biting off someone's ear and then declaring that he is always tranquil and serene towards his own rage. VI: When Tyson bit off Holyfield's ear, he was in love with his rage. <hr/> Sure, but he wasn't in love with his opponent, which negates your idea that everyone is automatically in love with everything.                                                                                                    |

Quote:

---

Everything that happens, you love, whether you think you hate it or think you love it.

---

This doesn't seem to mean anything. We can just as easily say that everything that happens we eat, whether we think we are eating it or or think we are not eating it.

Quote:

---

DQ: ..... which nearly everyone is still spellbound by, which is why enlightened people have to talk about attachments and ego (in order to help free these people from the illusion).

VI: If someone is imagining these things, then they can't be spellbound by them. Closer to reality: there are no enlightened people, and there is no one to be saved. If a self proclaiming enlightened person is talking about freeing people from illusion, my guess is that they have not been freed from illusion in the first place.

You may ask why I talk, then. For every reason in the universe.

---

Life is too short to deal with this kind of meaningless babble. How about we just agree to call you a great Buddha who has freed himself from everything - it seems to be something that you want to claim about yourself - and then we can be done with it.

Before I go, I'll just address something you wrote in another post:

Quote:

---

Women are no different from men, as both are momentary appearances. An enlightened person knows this, and knows enlightenment transcends all momentary appearances, as well as 'good' and 'evil'. An enlightened one saying women are 'evil' is an absolutely preposterous idea.

---

The idea that women are evil is also a momentary appearance. Thus, to label it as "preposterous" is itself just as preposterous.

In other words, if you want to claim that speaking against anything at all in the Universe - such as women, or false ideas, or whatever it may be - is wrong, then, to be consistent, you'll have to refrain from speaking against things yourself. But you don't do this. Every post you send to this forum is full of your admonishments against things. So not only are you lazy and boring, but you're a hypocrite as well.

Quote:

---

That is the person talking, not the person's enlightenment, and shouldn't be mistaken for an enlightened teaching. Just as this wasn't an enlightened teaching, but merely a post formed of opinions and reactions.

---

Oh, don't be coy. You have proclaimed yourself to be more enlightened than even the greatest of buddhas. Why back away now?

Quote:

---

Also, just in case someone were to try and argue with what I just said...things that point to truth, such as philosophy and meditation are just as 'evil' as things that point away from truth. Realization of truth is just as 'evil' as fucking bitches, or sitting on chests to an enlightened person.

---

No, mate, it is this kind of levelling which is evil. This mindless equating of everything, regardless of what it is, only serves to destroy the conceptual pathways which can lead a person from untruth to Truth. It contributes nothing at all to the cause of wisdom, helps nobody to become enlightened about the nature of reality, and inspires nobody to lead a loftier kind of existence. All it does is give comfort to the weakest and most mediocre people who hate their own consciousness and who basically want to die. How can there be anything more evil than that?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1949

(12/27/03 4:17 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: I'm sorry, did you say something? You've just spoken a lot of words, but, for the life of me, I can't find anything of substance in them at all. Just a few dogmatic assertions plucked out of thin air, as though you simply wanted to beat your own chest.

John: What you consider as substantial no doubt is mental masturbation, my view is different.

---

Another unsubstantiated remark. Do you ever do anything else?

Quote:

---

DQ: I have the impression that you secretly regard yourself as a Zen master, but I wonder on what basis?

John: :) Well done, a typical response. Fortunately I don't have your problem.

---

What problem is that?

Quote:

---

Presumably David's argument for eradicating woman is logical. I don't dwell in these realms so someone else maybe could answer this. Can you disprove David's position with logical argument?

---

If you don't dwell in the logical realm yourself, then why are you interested in the logical reasons for my assertion about women? What does it matter to you?

I think you're deceiving yourself when you say that you don't dwell in the logical realm. Everybody dwells in it to some extent. You wouldn't have any coherent thoughts if you didn't. In my experience, those who believe they have somehow transcended the logical realm are irrational people who hate the thought of being dictated to by reason. As a result, they tend to be mentally cunning and evasive and have very little conscience. There is virtually no resemblance at all between this kind of mindset and the purity and simplicity of a Buddha's mind, which is entirely logical.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 480

(12/27/03 4:28 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Sure, but he wasn't in love with his opponent, which negates your idea that everyone is automatically in love with everything.

You've missed the point.

This doesn't seem to mean anything. We can just as easily say that everything that happens we eat, whether we think we are eating it or or think we are not eating it.

We can just as easily say it, but it doesn't make it true.

Life is too short to deal with this kind of meaningless babble. How about we just agree to call you a great Buddha who has freed himself from everything - it seems to be something that you want to claim about yourself - and then we can be done with it.

But, I'm not a great Buddha. I'm just like you.

The idea that women are evil is also a momentary appearance. Thus, to label it as "preposterous" is itself just as preposterous.

That's right, so let's drop both of these useless ideas.

In other words, if you want to claim that speaking against anything at all in the Universe - such as women, or false ideas, or whatever it may be - is wrong, then, to be consistent, you'll have to refrain from speaking against things yourself. But you don't do this. Every post you send to this forum is full of your admonishments against things. So not only are you lazy and boring, but you're a hypocrite as well.

You are saying that if I speak against speaking against anything, that I am being a hypocrite. This isn't entirely true, if you actually analyze it.

Oh, don't be coy. You have proclaimed yourself to be more enlightened than even the greatest of buddhas. Why back away now?

The statement was true. It's not about me being anything.

No, mate, it is this kind of levelling which is evil. This mindless equating of everything, regardless of what it is, only serves to destroy the conceptual pathways which can lead a person from untruth to Truth. It contributes nothing at all to the cause of wisdom, helps nobody to become enlightened about the nature of reality, and inspires nobody to lead a loftier kind of existence. All it does is give comfort to the weakest and most mediocre people who hate their own consciousness and who basically want to die. How can there be anything more evil than that?

I want to comfort people who hate their lives. I don't care about the cause of wisdom. Wisdom is not greater than men. Wisdom is for man's enjoyment.

John
Registered User
Posts: 28
(12/27/03 5:01 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

DavidQuinn000

-----
John wrote:

Quote:

-----
DQ: I'm sorry, did you say something? You've just spoken a lot of words, but, for the life of me, I can't find anything of substance in them at all. Just a few dogmatic assertions plucked out of thin air, as though you simply wanted to beat your own chest.

John: What you consider as substantial no doubt is mental masturbation, my view is different.

-----
Another unsubstantiated remark. Do you ever do anything else?

I do not claim to be substantial, I am waiting for you to give supposed substantial reasons for eradicating woman physically.

Quote:

-----
DQ: I have the impression that you secretly regard yourself as a Zen master, but I wonder on what basis?

John: :) Well done, a typical response. Fortunately I don't have your problem.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                            | ----- What problem is that? Presenting myself as one of great attainment. John                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 29(12/27/03 5:02 pm)Reply                                                                                                                             | Re: men and women <hr/> ksolway ----- The material in 'An Exposition for the Advanced Mind' is one thing, advocating the eradication of woman is another thing entirely. If a man feels that woman is to be avoided for his own personal growth that is his own affair. To advocate the eradication of woman shows that his logic has run riot. ----- The "eradication of woman" doesn't mean the crude eradication of physical women, as that wouldn't solve the problem. David is speaking of the eradication of the woman within - within all people. That does not reflect David's words on the subject expressed on this forum. If David had expressed it thus I would not have made an issue. John |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1951(12/27/03 5:16 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Voce Io wrote: Quote: <hr/> DQ: In other words, if you want to claim that speaking against anything at all in the Universe - such as women, or false ideas, or whatever it may be - is wrong, then, to be consistent, you'll have to refrain from speaking against things yourself. But you don't do this. Every post you send to this forum is full of your admonishments against things. So not only are you lazy and boring, but you're a hypocrite as well.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

VI: You are saying that if I speak against speaking against anything, that I am being a hypocrite. This isn't entirely true, if you actually analyze it.

---

It's 100% true. You're speaking and discriminating against an entire culture of people, of those who place value on wisdom. You're also discriminating against those who emphasize the value of masculine characteristics over and above feminine ones, and those who like to stress the importance of reason over all else. In truth, you're as intolerant and unaccepting as Hitler was.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 704
(12/27/03 5:33 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

David: It's 100% true. You're speaking and discriminating against an entire culture of people, of those who place value on wisdom. You're also discriminating against those who emphasize the value of masculine characteristics over and above feminine ones, and those who like to stress the importance of reason over all else. In truth, you're as intolerant and unaccepting as Hitler was.

Voce io, I'd recommend not to respond to this. David has effectively left the realm of sanity. This cannot be dealt with by philosophica arguments.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1952
(12/27/03 5:38 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

I am waiting for you to give supposed substantial reasons for eradicating woman physically.

---

In their current form, they would have no place in an enlightened world. Men would have to be greatly modified as well, but not to the same extent.

Most of the physical characteristics of women, such as their softness, curvaciousness, relative lack of hairiness, high cheek bones, long necks, soft breasts, high-pitched voices, etc, have evolved primarily to seduce men and keep them under their spell. There is no reason to keep them. We would also have to modify their chemical/hormonal systems to help stabilize their minds and stop them being so erratic and changeable. We'll also have to make changes in the brain so that they are better able to structure their thoughts and reason spatially, which will enable them to engage in the deeper forms of reasoning that lead to enlightenment. And so on.

Quote:

---

DQ: I have the impression that you secretly regard yourself as a Zen master, but I wonder on what basis?

John: :) Well done, a typical response. Fortunately I don't have your problem.

DQ: What problem is that?

John: Presenting myself as one of great attainment.

---

Don't be so sure about that. You're implicitly presenting yourself as one of great attainment all the time with your nifty little Zennish stories and your overall tone of superiority. There's no question that you think of yourself as a wise, spiritually-advanced being. So why the charade of pretending otherwise?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1953
(12/27/03 5:45 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Voce io, I'd recommend not to respond to this. David has effectively left the realm of sanity. This cannot be dealt with by philosophica arguments.

---

Don't be absurd, Thomas. Do you deny that Voce Io is speaking against those particular cultures and thus being intolerant?

|                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 481(12/27/03 5:49 pm)Reply | Re: ...<hr/> What the fuck does Hitler have to do with anything!?That's what...the third time you've brought up Nazis?Thomas...I like bantering with lunatics. |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 482(12/27/03 5:50 pm)Reply                                                                                         | Re: ...<hr/> I am speaking against those cultures, and I am being intolerant! |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1955(12/27/03 6:17 pm)Reply | Re: ...<hr/> Okay, mate, you win. You're far too clever for me.                             |

John
Registered User
Posts: 30
(12/27/03 6:44 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

DavidQuinn000

-----
John wrote:

Quote:

-----
I am waiting for you to give supposed substantial reasons for eradicating woman physically.

-----
In their current form, they would have no place in an enlightened world. Men would have to be greatly modified as well, but not to the same extent.

Why would you think there will ever be an enlightened world, blind optimism? If the basis for using genetic engineering on woman is based on that, it has no place in logic, only your own bias.

The dance is eternal, woman (the feminine) has her place too, man and woman exhibit delusions, there is no need, IMO, to create this bias against woman. This is what I meant before that simple plain truth is the requirement, nothing more. By creating a bias you are in fact creating yet another delusion.

(Paraphrased, can't find the original)

"Pointing directly at man's mind, see self-nature and attain enlightenment."

By emphasizing the male/female you are deflecting from the fundamental non-dual nature.

Again, all teachings are expedients only for curing specific ailments. There is no true teaching as such.

Most of the physical characteristics of women, such as their softness, curvaciousness, relative lack of hairiness, high cheek bones, long necks, soft breasts, high-pitched voices, etc, have evolved primarily to seduce men and keep them under their spell.

Ah yes, the dance.

Quote:

-----
DQ: What problem is that?

John: Presenting myself as one of great attainment.

---

Don't be so sure about that. You're implicitly presenting yourself as one of great attainment all the time with your nifty little Zennish stories and your overall tone of superiority. There's no question that you think of yourself as a wise, spiritually-advanced being. So why the charade of pretending otherwise?

Perhaps there is a self reflective mechanism at work here.

I am not blind to what I am. And you David?

Anyone who has a true inkling of their fundamental nature could not possibly see themselves as superior. How one is perceived by others is a matter not directly in one's control.

John

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1958
(12/27/03 9:06 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: In their current form, they would have no place in an enlightened world. Men would have to be greatly modified as well, but not to the same extent.

John: Why would you think there will ever be an enlightened world, blind optimism?

---

It's good to aim high, even if we never achieve it.

Quote:

---

If the basis for using genetic engineering on woman is based on that, it has no place in logic, only your own bias.

---

It's all part of the process of improving the mind (and, by extension, the world), using whatever tools that are available - philosophy, Zen koans, science, etc.

Quote:

---

The dance is eternal, woman (the feminine) has her place too, man and woman exhibit delusions, there is no need, IMO, to create this bias against woman.

---

It's certainly important to work against the bias towards woman, which is very much the way of the world (a world that also happens to be very deluded).

Quote:

---

This is what I meant before that simple plain truth is the requirement, nothing more. By creating a bias you are in fact creating yet another delusion.

---

You're creating a bias against my teachings. Drop it!

Quote:

---

(Paraphrased, can't find the original)

"Pointing directly at man's mind, see self-nature and attain enlightenment."

By emphasizing the male/female you are deflecting from the fundamental non-dual nature.

---

The masculine/feminine issue is very important because it highlights the kind of mind that is needed to pierce maya and comprehend Reality. The feminine, flowy, unfocused, emotional, all-over-the place, amoral, non-irrational form of consciousness - which occurs in both sexes, but far more so in women - has to be abandoned. Otherwise, wisdom becomes impossible.

Quote:

---

Again, all teachings are expedients only for curing specific ailments. There is no true teaching as such.

---

That's true. The world's obsession with woman/femininity is a very big ailment which requires a very strong cure!

Quote:

---

DQ: Most of the physical characteristics of women, such as their softness, curvaciousness, relative lack of hairiness, high cheek bones, long necks, soft breasts, high-pitched voices, etc, have evolved primarily to seduce men and keep them under their spell.

John: Ah yes, the dance.

---

A dance that we can stop and replace with a better one.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 837
(12/28/03 12:52 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: The "eradication of woman" doesn't mean the crude eradication of physical women, as that wouldn't solve the problem. David is speaking of the eradication of the woman within - within all people.

---

Does "strangling female babies at birth" ring any bells?

But then David's words are often mercurial.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 220
(12/28/03 1:59 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: The "eradication of woman" doesn't mean the crude eradication of physical women, as that wouldn't solve the problem. David is speaking of the eradication of the woman within - within all people.

DT: Does "strangling female babies at birth" ring any bells?

---

I doubt that David would have been proposing that as a comprehensive solution. :-)

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 50
(12/28/03 4:25 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Quote:

---

Sure, but since the Other IS the self, what difference does it make? When all is Self, why not love everything? The ultimate selfishness!

---

Well, for starters there is no self or Self. So any thought, belief, emotion or action that follows as a result of this delusion is inherently false and is a cause for the rise of additional suffering.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 383
(12/28/03 9:56 am)
Reply

Re: men and women

---

Love thy neighbor as thyself.
I love you, Noxie.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 484(12/28/03 11:22 am)Reply                                                                                                                                           | Re: men and women <hr/> Well, for starters there is no self or Self. So any thought, belief, emotion or action that follows as a result of this delusion is inherently false and is a cause for the rise of additional suffering. Who is typing that, and thinking that?                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1183(12/28/03 12:17 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                     | men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Well, for starters there is no self or Self. So any thought, belief, emotion or action that follows as a result of this delusion is inherently false and is a cause for the rise of additional suffering. <hr/> And how do you know this? And must the lack of a self preclude love? |
| N0X23 <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 51(12/28/03 4:32 pm)Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Who is typing that, and thinking that? <hr/> Not Who, but What. Thought is thinking that.                                                                                                                                                                                               |

|                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| N0X23 <input type="checkbox"/> Registered UserPosts: 52(12/28/03 4:46 pm)Reply  | Re: men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Love thy neighbor as thyself. I love you, Noxie <hr/> Yes, Love is a fickle thing isn't it Paul?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Paul Registered UserPosts: 384(12/28/03 5:21 pm)Reply                                                                                                           | Re: men and women <hr/> Yes, it can be fickle, but that doesn't make it an delusion.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce io Registered UserPosts: 485(12/28/03 6:41 pm)Reply                                                                                                        | Re: men and women <hr/> Not Who, but What. Thought is thinking that. And who is thinking thoughts?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| suergaz Registered UserPosts: 2013(12/29/03 10:22 am)Reply                                                                                                      | ---- <hr/> Nox, there is self and selves. What do you mean by saying there is no self? Getting back to you about your post to which I replied that you need to think more on the things it addressed, man may love himself when he loves woman, but in doing he cannot love himself alone! Love is only as fickle as the character of the lover. What is essential to human personality? Is it nothing? Then what is stopping it overseeing itself?! Huh?!!(;D) |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2019
(12/29/03 2:08 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

Kevin Solway:--

Quote:

---

The "eradication of woman" doesn't mean the crude eradication of physical women, as that wouldn't solve the problem. David is speaking of the eradication of the woman within - within all people.

---

What of the woman in woman? You wish it gone? Why not simply educate man? I can see through all your reason to your resentment.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1190
(12/29/03 2:14 pm)
Reply

re--

---

What resentment is that, Suergaz?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2021
(12/29/03 2:20 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Resentment of woman.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1968
(12/29/03 3:39 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Well, that's certainly a very crude and populist interpretation of what Kevin and I are on about, one ultimately generated out of sexual desire. But nevertheless, the resentment that you perceive is a projection on your part. It is a very big part of "educating men" to alert them of the importance of eliminating the feminine aspect of consciousness from their minds.

|                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                 |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 385(12/29/03 5:33 pm)Reply | Re: re--<hr/> ...eliminating the feminine aspect of [men's] consciousness...Quite right! And remove them ridiculous nipples too! |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2022(12/29/03 10:17 pm)Reply | ---<hr/> Weak David. You well know I am not speaking of the woman in man, but the woman in woman, which you and Kevin seem to want gone.                                                                                                                                      |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 223(12/29/03 10:31 pm)Reply  | Re: ---<hr/> Quote: <hr/> You well know I am not speaking of the woman in man, but the woman in woman, which you and Kevin seem to want gone. <hr/> It wouldn't be fair for a person to discover an antidote to a disease, and only cure himself. |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2024
(12/29/03 10:35 pm)
Reply

---

---

Men should be masculine, but you want women that way also. Your intelligence is not the kind that wants more

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 53
(12/30/03 4:03 am)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Birdofhermes

Quote:

---

And how do you know this?

---

And there is the crux of my predicament, and the reason I'm at this forum.

Quote:

---

And must the lack of a self preclude love?

---

Well no. But is it the physical mass, the chemical composition or the experiences that are the object of Love?

voce io

Quote:

---

And who is thinking thoughts?

---

Again . . . Not Who, but What. What is thinking thoughts? Thoughts are thinking thoughts. The prism is not the source of the light it refracts, now take said prism and put it in a box of angled mirrors. Or place a radio in an echo chamber.

Suergaz

Quote:

---

Nox, there is self and selves. What do you mean by saying there is no self?

---

Since you are already convinced that there are, why then even ask? ...or...
What do you mean by saying there is a self and selves?

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1195
(12/30/03 4:31 am)
Reply

re--

---

Quote:

---

Resentment of woman.

---

Of course, Zag. I wondered if you had any insight into it. Here's how I see it.

Obfuscations, denials, professions of crudity notwithstanding. There is only one type of man, one type of male - that which loves the female. No ifs, ands or buts. Enlightenment is irrelevant. The only alternative is homosexuality, which involves a brain that is not completely male, or is even nearly completely female.

This is the first principle of maleness, and everything else which the male has become derives from it. The reason for this is because at the earliest point of manifestations in the universe the male separates itself out of the female. In the same way nature separated out the male from the first sexually reproducing one-celled organisms. The female always represents the source, the void, that to which all things return.

Without this principle nothing could move. The female void contains potential, and the separated male is the actualization of that potential.

There is nothing else to do, nowhere else to go but back to the one without a second. Nothing else to desire. Yes, it is self love. The love of men and women is self love because man is woman and woman is man. Desire is the engine of all evolution.

At the advent of patriarchy it was necessary to lie baldly and say that the female was derived from the male such that the church fathers wrote "for the woman was taken from the man, and not the man from the woman" even though this flies in the face of all evidence. Patriarchy is a denial of yin and yang. It is an attempt to attribute to the male all attributes, even female ones. This jealousy does not lead to manhood. Patriarchy is an attempt to have an all male cosmos, and the QRS philosophy is the same.

Manhood is always a quest. Defining and separating himself, he loses his magnanimity when he attempts to steal female honor in his quest for glory.

A man can be rich or poor, pre-eminent or obscure, smart or dumb, spiritual or uninterested, but among all those groups there are still two kinds of men - those who are worthy of women and those who are not. All three QRS have some sort of problem being worthy of women. For three intelligent and spiritually minded guys to turn it into a sour grapes high minded philosophy is laughably easy, and transparent.

There's no doubt I respect QRS, but as men I have some trouble respecting them. I try to be understanding about it; I don't mind a bit that they are uninterested in careers and all the modern empty horror. And I don't necessarily think every man should learn how to be a caveman. But the irreducible problem is that masculinity involves being independent and capable of basic survival in this world. Men have the strength and productivity to not only care for themselves, but to produce extra. Yes, it has to do with the long childhood of human children, and the dimorphism of our species, which dimorphism I am sure men have promoted. Why have QRS not done the sorts of things that true men would do - why have they not bought some land and learned survival skills (and you, too, Sue). Why praise masculinity and not perform it themselves? A man who is dependent without physical handicap has no cause to be proud in any of the thousands of cultures the human race has produced.

I know that QRS are not homosexual in the usual sense of the word, but it appears from my understanding of fetal brain development that manhood may involve more of a continuum than we thought, with a smaller percentage actually achieving ideal development.

This would certainly account for their feeling inadequate to conquer in this world, resulting in their feeling inadequate to handle women, and their hatred of the feminine in themselves.

I even think it might relate to their denial of reincarnation because that involves hope in something called life. In my intuitive musings I see life and love as fundamental forces in the universe. Life is the yinlike force and therefore hard to discern, but love is malelike and therefore warm and bright and full of organizing power. Love loves life of course. But if you hate the feminine, you might deny life so that you may be free of the burden of your love.

Now, I do not think Zag, that your denial of reincarnation is the same at all. So don't go off.

Not that QRS really hate women of course. That is simply not possible. But there is such a thing as twisted love, which can be destructive.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1199

(12/30/03 6:48 am)

Reply

the elusive self

---

Quote:

---

And there is the crux of my predicament, and the reason I'm at this forum.

Quote:

---

Some see that there is no hard and fast self, but do see a Self. Some see no Self anywhere. Is your problem one of how to be sure, one of how to express what you know, or how to reconcile what you know?

Quote:

---

Well no. But is it the physical mass, the chemical composition or the experiences that are the

---

---

Well, the chemical composition IS the physical mass, so I've reduced the problem slightly. The experiences are just memories, unless you are experiencing together with *someone.* If there is no self or Self, can there be love? It seems any love would be delusion under that circumstance.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2028
(12/30/03 8:47 am)
Reply

---

---

Nox, I ask because I am not convinced that you think there is no self and selves.

Anna, when I 'buy' some land and become a real man in competition with the little buyers of all kinds, (as opposed to loving my land openly in conflict and peace and everything else) I'll come and conk you on the head with my club and drag you back to my palace.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1201
(12/30/03 8:53 am)
Reply

---

---

Sure, but you don't even have to buy it. We could just run away to where the land is free, or live like outlaws.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2030
(12/30/03 9:07 am)
Reply

---

---

Fantasies are not the domain of a woman of your stature Anna! You have children and husbands and social responsibilities---the trappings of love I tell you!

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 386(12/30/03 9:58 am)Reply           | Re: --- <hr/> (to suergaz) Hahahahah! :-)) (to Anna) About the self or no-self thing, if there is a self (Self), does that make the notion of unconditional love a delusion? Does self love exclude unc. love?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 497(12/30/03 10:09 am)Reply       | Re: --- <hr/> Again . . . Not Who, but What. What is thinking thoughts? Thoughts are thinking thoughts. The prism is not the source of the light it refracts, now take said prism and put it in a box of angled mirrors. Or place a radio in an echo chamber. You are a moron. Thoughts are there because you have a brain which creates them! Your metaphors are also useless if you don't explain what they're supposed to mean.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1202(12/30/03 10:37 am)Reply | self <hr/> To Paul: Your question doesn't completely make sense because I am differentiating between self with a small and a capital letter. The capital self refers to the overself, or a universal self or soul that all people, I guess all life, partakes in. I don't think unconditional love would be a delusion, in fact it is the real, divine sort of love. It is unconditional love which allows true individuality and evolution to flourish. When you recognize the Self, unconditional love follows. Self love does not exclude universal love, but you might say that everything loves everything. They say all love originates in self love, and that is certainly true since all is self anyway. To voce: I think his metaphor of the box with mirrors or the echo chamber IS the brain. So he does not think the brain is the source of thoughts, just a box with mirrors. But it does seem lame to say that thoughts are entities in themselves and originators of themselves. |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2034
(12/30/03 10:48 am)
Reply

---

---

Who cares how self is spelt! What is meant by it holds true in ANY case!

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1970
(12/30/03 2:40 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

Obfuscations, denials, professions of crudity notwithstanding. There is only one type of man, one type of male - that which loves the female. No ifs, ands or buts. Enlightenment is irrelevant. The only alternative is homosexuality, which involves a brain that is not completely male, or is even nearly completely female.

This is the first principle of maleness, and everything else which the male has become derives from it. The reason for this is because at the earliest point of manifestations in the universe the male separates itself out of the female. In the same way nature separated out the male from the first sexually reproducing one-celled organisms. The female always represents the source, the void, that to which all things return.

Without this principle nothing could move. The female void contains potential, and the separated male is the actualization of that potential.

There is nothing else to do, nowhere else to go but back to the one without a second. Nothing else to desire. Yes, it is self love. The love of men and women is self love because man is woman and woman is man. Desire is the engine of all evolution.

At the advent of patriarchy it was necessary to lie baldly and say that the female was derived from the male such that the church fathers wrote "for the woman was taken from the man, and not the man from the woman" even though this flies in the face of all evidence. Patriarchy is a denial of yin and yang. It is an attempt to attribute to the male all attributes, even female ones. This jealousy does not lead to manhood. Patriarchy is an attempt to have an all male cosmos, and the QRS philosophy is the same.

Manhood is always a quest. Defining and separating himself, he loses his magnanimity when he attempts to steal female honor in his quest for glory.

A man can be rich or poor, pre-eminent or obscure, smart or dumb, spiritual or uninterested, but among all those groups there are still two kinds of men - those who are worthy of women and those who are not. All three QRS have some sort of problem being worthy of women. For three intelligent and spiritually minded guys to turn it into a sour grapes high minded philosophy is laughably easy, and transparent.

There's no doubt I respect QRS, but as men I have some trouble respecting them. I try to be understanding about it; I don't mind a bit that they are uninterested in careers and all the modern empty horror. And I don't necessarily think every man should learn how to be a caveman. But the irreducible problem is that masculinity involves being independent and capable of basic survival in this world. Men have the strength and productivity to not only care for themselves, but to produce extra. Yes, it has to do with the long childhood of human children, and the dimorphism of our species, which dimorphism I am sure men have promoted. Why have QRS not done the sorts of things that true men would do - why have they not bought some land and learned survival skills (and you, too, Sue). Why praise masculinity and not perform it themselves? A man who is dependent without physical handicap has no cause to be proud in any of the thousands of cultures the human race has produced.

I know that QRS are not homosexual in the usual sense of the word, but it appears from my understanding of fetal brain development that manhood may involve more of a continuum than we thought, with a smaller percentage actually achieving ideal development.

This would certainly account for their feeling inadequate to conquer in this world, resulting in their feeling inadequate to handle women, and their hatred of the feminine in themselves.

I even think it might relate to their denial of reincarnation because that involves hope in something called life. In my intuitive musings I see life and love as fundamental forces in the universe. Life is the yinlike force and therefore hard to discern, but love is malelike and therefore warm and bright and full of organizing power. Love loves life of course. But if you hate the feminine, you might deny life so that you may be free of the burden of your love.

Now, I do not think Zag, that your denial of reincarnation is the same at all. So don't go off.

Not that QRS really hate women of course. That is simply not possible. But there is such a thing as twisted love, which can be destructive.

---

What a load of drivel.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 387
(12/30/03 4:34 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Except for the last sentence, you've posted a great text, Mr. Quinn. Thank you.

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 54
(12/30/03 4:41 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

Quote:

---

Is your problem one of how to be sure, one of how to express what you know, or how to reconcile what you know?

---

A deepening of my understanding would be an accurate description.

Quote:

---

If there is no self or Self, can there be love?

---

Sure, it happens everyday.

Quote:

---

It seems any love would be delusion under that circumstance.

---

True, but that doesn't prevent the experience from feeling real.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 55

(12/30/03 5:11 pm)

Reply

Re: re--

---

Quote:

---

You are a moron. Thoughts are there because you have a brain which creates them!

---

Short term memories are electrical in nature. Neurons can be connected like a circuit so that the last in the series stimulates the first. As long as the same pattern of stimulation continues the thought is remembered. When the reverberation ceases, so does the memory...unless it enters long-term memory. Long-term memory changes the structure or the function of the neurons and creates synaptic patterns.

Your statement is the equivalent of believing that the lightbulb is the single source of light, when in actuality all it does is create resistance in a current of electricity that then causes the filament to glow and emit light.

Ps. Nature abhors a vacuum ;)

Edited by: N0X23  at: 12/30/03 5:12 pm

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 1TheMasterRegistered UserPosts: 199(12/30/03 8:07 pm)Reply | Re: re-- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Long-term memory changes the structure or the function of the neurons and creates synaptic patterns <hr/> The inverse is correct.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 511(12/31/03 10:54 am)Reply   | Re: re-- <hr/> N0X23, You said: Well, for starters there is no self or Self. So any thought, belief, emotion or action that follows as a result of this delusion is inherently false and is a cause for the rise of additional suffering. ...and I was trying to point out the a 'self' is typing that. A self is creating the concept that there isn't a self. I think you're very smart, and hope you can overcome this flaw. If you do, or have, get back to me. Edited by: voce io at: 12/31/03 10:55 am                                              |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 230(1/1/04 9:35 am)Reply      | Hybrids <hr/> Here's an interesting fact. Women are in fact a type of hybrid: As men have XY chromosomes, all of their active X chromosomes come from their mother. But women have XX chromosomes, and must disable one of their X chromosomes. This happens on a random cell-by-cell basis. One cell might have an active X chromosome from the father, while the cell right alongside it might have an active X chromosome from the mother. This can lead to problems, and may be the reason why women suffer a lot more (maybe 50%) from auto-immune diseases, where the body attacks its | own cells.

There may also be psychological implications, but knowledge of this will be a long way down the track.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The difference between man and woman...

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| avidalocaRegistered UserPosts: 142(1/2/04 12:46 am)Reply | Re: Hybrids <hr/> ksowlay wrote: Quote: <hr/> As men have XY chromosomes, all of their active X chromosomes come from their mother. But women have XX chromosomes, and must disable one of their X chromosomes. This happens on a random cell-by-cell basis. One cell might have an active X chromosome from the father, while the cell right alongside it might have an active X chromosome from the mother. This can lead to problems, and may be the reason why women suffer a lot more (maybe 50%) from auto-immune diseases, where the body attacks its own cells. <hr/> Although we can only speculate on the outcomes of this discontinuous configuration (in the sense that each female is a discontinuous mix of cells from either the father or the mother in succeeding cells, whereas males inherit all X chromosomes from the mother and [by deduction] all Y chromosomes from the father), it seems that a greater degree of mental unpredictability/changeability and/or contradictory thought/hypocrisy could |

seem a valid possibility. This could be the result of a higgledy-piggledy mix that has not yet successfully survived (to reproduction) as a particular chromosome sequence. Surviving chromosomal chains (i.e. humans who have successfully survived to carry on their genes) may progressively exhibit better characteristics for survival (such as continuity of mind) which are in turn carried on as whole pieces to the male but not the female.

Martin

Edited by: avidaloca at: 1/2/04 12:54 am

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 58
(1/3/04 5:16 am)
Reply

Re: Hybrids

---

Quote:

---

Nox, I ask because I am not convinced that you think there is no self and selves.

---

To say that there is a self is wrong and to say there isn't a self is wrong. My understanding is any form of identification is a mistaken view. The Subject can not be its own Object, so when the Subject desires to experience "itself" the only thing that can be perceived is Void.

I AM
Registered User
Posts: 221
(1/3/04 12:31 pm)
Reply

.

---

Quote:

---

The only way that a woman can become spiritual and wise is by reducing herself down to the one knob (and thereby attain coherency in her thinking). But they won't be encouraged to this if misogynists such as yourself keep praising how fantastic they are already are in the multi-knobbed state. The worst of it is that you're killing their souls simply for own sexual pleasure.

---

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                         | to master/understand/experience both sets of 'knobs' simultaneously (wich is possible with a mind advanced enough) will take you there. anything else is ignorance and separation.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 531(1/4/04 5:02 am)Reply        | Re: . <hr/> I AM, you are right. Also, David, if you tell women that they are inferior enough, they'll definitely start to believe it. They will act like they're inferior. This is a bad way of going about things if you are actually trying to save their souls!                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1212(1/4/04 11:51 am)Reply | man and woman <hr/> But Voce, it is nothing new. It's been going on for a couple of thousand years. I really do think that women have decreased in stature over that time. Last year, on a visit to her Dad's neck of the woods, my daughter started to go into the line for communion, and her grandfather pulled her back and said, "Let your brother go first!" Why, she asked, wanting to force him to answer. "Because Eve sinned!" |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1213(1/4/04 11:57 am)Reply | men and women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Surviving chromosomal chains (i.e. humans who have successfully survived to carry on their genes) may progressively exhibit better characteristics for survival (such as continuity of mind) which are in turn carried on as whole pieces to the male but not the female. <hr/>                                                                                                                                |

Did you hear the one about how only men actually beget children, and women are just the incubators?

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 212

(1/4/04 6:03 pm)

Reply

Re: men and women

---

Comparing men and women is not only foolish but nonsensical. What is better: an apple or a jigsaw puzzle? Who cares.

Women only become inferior when they compare themselves to men, and the same for men. A man trying to be a mother is an inferior mother to a woman being a mother; a woman trying to be a scientist or sage is inferior to a man being one. We are built into roles by nature, nurture must be coherent with this or it ruins things.

"Did you hear the one about how only men actually beget children, and women are just the incubators?"

Aristotle thought along these lines. I agree with it. Women look for qualities in men for the child's survival, but also for a better child. Men don't look for qualities in women of the same sort, more for her maternal abilities. He gives her child qualities, she gives him a child.

avidaloca

Registered User

Posts: 144

(1/4/04 7:09 pm)

Reply

Re: men and women

---

ynithrix wrote:

Quote:

---

Women look for qualities in men for the child's survival, but also for a better child. Men don't look for qualities in women of the same sort, more for her maternal abilities. He gives her child qualities, she gives him a child.

---

I think men look for a woman they can get on with, or the work would be too hard. So a man does look at a woman's personality but only insofar as it affects him, not the child. This could be why a lot of women are extraordinarily easy to get on with (at least on a basic initial level) as they don't want to be out-of-the-loop with too many men.

Martin

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 393(1/6/04 3:08 am)Reply          | Woman <hr/> Martin: Quote: <hr/> This could be why a lot of women are extraordinarily easy to get on with (at least on a basic initial level) as they don't want to be out-of-the-loop with too many men. <hr/> Isn't it the input-output thing?Anna, in this forum, is a woman to fall in love with.She's output to me.I know nothing (redundant remark). |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 536(1/6/04 4:36 am)Reply       | Re: Woman <hr/> "Because Eve sinned!" Adam sinned as well. Eve sinned first, so the girls should get communion first...right? ;-)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1217(1/6/04 5:50 am)Reply | Re: woman <hr/> : ) Good call. Wonder why they never thought of that. You don't suppose that the male privilege structure was in any way maintained at the expense of women, do you? You don't suppose that the highly spiritual church fathers could have needed to use any unfair tactics to bolster such a situation?                                                                                                                             |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 537(1/6/04 9:06 am)Reply       | Re: woman <hr/> I don't know quite what you're asking.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1218(1/6/04 10:37 am)Reply | Re: woman <hr/> Just some bitter and sarcastic remarks.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 538(1/6/04 11:16 am)Reply       | Re: woman <hr/> Why be so bitter, when your sexuality has the upper hand? Men make these little rules, yet you control men. I wish I had the sexuality of a woman.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1219(1/6/04 1:04 pm)Reply  | re woman <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Why be so bitter, when your sexuality has the upper hand?Men make these little rules, yet you control men. I wish I had the sexuality of a woman. <hr/> Well, because the situation leaves women with only that one power, and many women do not have it, and they do not have it all their lives, and it is unethical to use it. It certainly does nothing for the psyche of a little girl standing in church, who must absorb the fact that because she is a girl she must never touch the holy things, nor even be in same room where they are kept, nor be of service in the church, or even have her gender addressed in the spiritual writings. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 539(1/6/04 1:08 pm)Reply        | Re: re woman <hr/> Good point. About your daughter's situation, "blessed are the humble..."                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 213(1/7/04 1:36 pm)Reply   | Re: re woman <hr/> It is only when you make the initial assumption that you are equal, do you become upset when faced with the reality that you are not. It is the breaking of an illusion held dearly that you fear.                                                                                                                                                                           |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 397(1/7/04 6:21 pm)Reply       | The difference between man and woman <hr/> 'The difference between man and woman' is the longest and best thread on this Genius Forum. Thomas Knierim started it. I just wanted to see it on top again. (Mr. Quinn has his Quality Posts, we are the world. Bite me.)                                                                                                                         |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 541(1/8/04 3:18 am)Reply    | ... <hr/> It is only when you make the initial assumption that you are equal, do you become upset when faced with the reality that you are not. It is the breaking of an illusion held dearly that you fear. True, men and women are different. Yet, this difference has nothing to do with enlightenment, which is free for everyone, and which everyone has and has to realize. |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 2(1/8/04 8:48 am)Reply | men and women <hr/> Here's the difference as I see it. Women think with their hearts while men think with their penises. As a man I should know. This is true no matter how intelligent. Men think primarily with their appendages. Bill Clinton is a classic example.                                                                                                                          |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ChrisSaikRegistered UserPosts: 82(1/15/04 1:50 am)Reply | The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome <hr/> "If we do not inherently exist, then what does it matter if we become enlightened or not? Why be rid of delusion? Why not just enjoy life as we are? We will all die anyway, so what's the difference? The earth could be destroyed, yet reality will remain. So, where's the problem?" These questions are a gateway that will propel you into the heart of the infinite, where you will thrash about until you flounder or make your home. Hearing the answer is not the same as discovering it yourself. Imitation is cheap. Becoming One is not as profound as becoming Many. The wise see rocks where others see diamonds. All are as water fleeing the source. The still, murky ponds are where the treasures lie, guarded by demons. If the treasures are that important, then why do you flee when backed into a corner? Fight, or allow them to rip you asunder. Dodging is cowardly. |

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1411(1/15/04 2:33 am)Reply                                                                               | The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome <hr/> nice                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 597(1/15/04 4:38 am)Reply                                                                                    | Re: The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome <hr/> I like that.                                                                       |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1257(1/15/04 7:48 am)Reply                                                                              | Re: The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome <hr/> Yep.                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2104(1/20/04 2:04 pm)Reply                                                                                   | ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Becoming One is not as profound as becoming Many. <hr/> It simply isn't true! |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 69(1/20/04 3:17 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> I'll join the chorus. It was good.                                                                          |

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 72

(1/20/04 5:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

2 Emptiness, Qohelet says, everything is emptiness. 3 What do people gain from all the work they do under the sun? 4 A generation goes and a generation comes, yet the earth remains forever. 5 The sun rises and the sun sets, and rushes back again to the place from which it rises. 6 The wind blows south, then returns to the north, round and round goes the wind, on its rounds it circulates. 7 All streams flow to the sea, yet the sea does not fill up. 8 All matters are tiring, more than anyone can express. The eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing. 9 What is is what will be, and what has been done is what will be done. There is nothing new under the sun. 10 Is there anything of which it can be said, "See this is new!"--It has already been, in eras before us. 11 The people of ages past are no longer remembered, nor will there be any remembrance of people yet to come by those who come after them.

Ecclesiastes(1:2-11)

ChrisSaik

Registered User

Posts: 83

(1/21/04 1:37 am)

Reply

Re: The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome

---

Zag said, in response to "Becoming One is not as profound as becoming Many":

Quote:

---

It simply isn't true!

---

It all depends on the viewpoint from which you are making the observation. You could say the opposite about one being more "profound" than many. The ego is what determines whether something is profound at all. Do you trust it?

Both sayings are ultimately meaningless banter. I say it only because people are too attached to this notion of "One". They think that's where the golden goose egg lies.

We become nothing other than what we already are. From a personal perspective, we are one and we are many. From an ultimate perspective, we are not one, nor many. Reality is Reality.

Edited by: ChrisSaik at: 1/21/04 1:41 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2105

(1/21/04 8:57 pm)

Reply

----

---

So why didn't you then say---'Becoming one is at least as profound as becoming many.'? Do you mistrust 'people'?! (:D)

I trust the ego.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1313

(1/22/04 2:34 am)

Reply

Re: The "Doesn't Matter" Syndrome

---

Quote:

---

?: The fact is that the truth of our being eachother cannot be fully understood, without also understanding the fact we are not eachother at all.

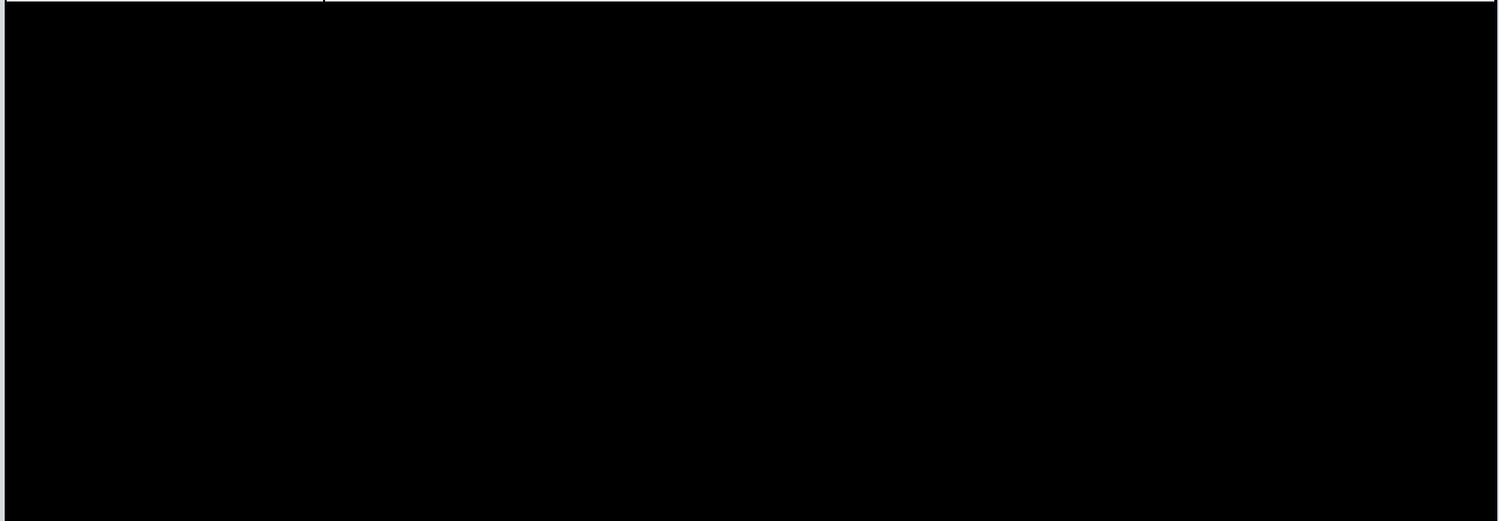

-----

Naturyl: Yes, that is quite true. A lot of people miss that. Step one, which we take as infants, is to realize our separateness. Step two, which some of us take as adults, is to realize our oneness. Step three, which a few less take, is understanding our separateness in light of our oneness - the realization that duality is the way unity is manifested. Step four, of course, when we find that everything is exactly the same but completely transformed, is to carry water and chop wood as we did all along.

---

The above from Naturyl should clear up the confusion. Obviously, for those who think they are separate (Christians for example) it is a profound step to realize unity, and it may be the only hope for our planet's survival if they can be uplifted to see unity. Their destructiveness and hardheartedness depends on seeing themselves as separate.

|                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2107(1/22/04 12:23 pm)Reply                                                                                | ---- <hr/> I am forever separate to you all.                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 70(1/22/04 1:13 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> Why?                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2108(1/22/04 10:00 pm)Reply                                                                                | --- <hr/> Because it is a big bad brave thing to say, and do.                                                                                                                                                |
| chaosramblerRegistered UserPosts: 1(1/23/04 3:43 am)Reply                                                                               | Random firings <hr/> True or False? One != oneOne = AllAll &gt;= ManyOne &gt;= Many If true then it is not more profound to be Many than to be One, for to be One is to be All. |

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 73

(1/23/04 5:02 am)

Reply

Re: Random firings

---

The premise of true or false is only valid when judging the accuracy in comparison to something else.

The Truth is not an independent, unconditioned Absolute, but merely a conditioned and dependent tool to be used and then discarded.

The hammer is not what it creates and the map is not the territory, the Path is not the Mountain, Neti, Neti, Tatses Great, Less Filling...etc, etc, etc.

All this conjecture and “mind-flapping” is a monumental waste of ones time.

'All conditioned things are inconstant' --
When one sees this with discernment
And grows disenchanted with stress,
This is the path to purity.

'All conditioned things are stressful' --
When one sees with discernment
And grows disenchanted with stress,
This is the path to purity.

'All dhammas are not-self' --
When one sees with discernment
And grows disenchanted with stress,
This is the path to purity.
-- Dhp 277-79

*edit* none of your damn business ;)

Edited by: N0X23  at: 1/23/04 5:11 am

chaosrambler
Registered User
Posts: 2
(1/23/04 6:07 am)
Reply

I'm simple minded

---

At the simplest level,
It Is, or it Isn't.
If it Is, then it is Truth.
If it Isn't, then it is False.

False = nothingness

All things are Truth

Nothingness is something
There would not be nothingness without somethingness.
Nothingness is Truth
False is Truth

What is purity? Is purity a comparison of what Is to what Isn't? Or of what Is to what Is? Nothingness to somethingness? Truth to False to Truth?

What else is there but to compare something to nothing? There would be void without comparison.

What else is there but "mind-flapping"? That's all I know how to do :) and my time is not important.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 455
(1/23/04 10:38 am)
Reply

Re: I'm simple minded

---

One != one
One = All
All >= Many One >= Many

DEL brother are you? I reckon trying to reduce ultimate type meaning to little formulas like this is a form of autism. All one needs to know is that they are interconnected with everything else and we are herd creatures. Full stop.

chaosrambler
Registered User
Posts: 3
(1/24/04 1:24 am)
Reply

maybe

---

Autism? I don't think so, but if so, I guess I wouldn't know.

What is DEL brother?

Truth is, I shouldn't be posting here, no matter how excited my little electrons get.

I admit that though I am open minded and enjoy a high-level of discussion, my own limitations of clarity and perspective mean that I shouldn't participate except in the limited role of asking questions for clarity for my own understanding. Not to mention my utter lack of education.

Forgive my ignorance.
Regards.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 457
(1/24/04 2:39 am)
Reply

Re: maybe

---

What is DEL brother?

Sorry about that, typo. DEL's brother I meant. DEL is a poster here who likes to categorise philosophy into formulas. I have a personal resistance to that method of thinking about things in relation to reality.

I admit that though I am open minded and enjoy a high-level of discussion, my own limitations of clarity and perspective mean that I shouldn't participate except in the limited role of asking questions for clarity for my own understanding. Not to mention my utter lack of education.

I am no genius of any kind. When not ego controlled, what you have stated above is precisely how I often feel and react to these discussions, most of the time. I find my lack of cognitive ability to be a little upsetting at times. I've just been here long enough to get used to it.

Forgive my ignorance.

No, but only because there is no reason for you to apologise in any way.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/24/04 2:40 am

chaosrambler
Registered User
Posts: 5
(1/24/04 2:57 am)
Reply

simplification

From my view, to make something as simple as it can be is the most meaningful way to think about it, and the most complex expression of thought.

Otherwise it seems that one is defining and formulating the same thing with a lot more words. Dilluting it.

I'm probably missing the boat entirely.

I should stop posting my gibberish on what is an otherwise excellent original post! Isn't this called thread hijacking?

Sorry ChrisSaik...great post you have there.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

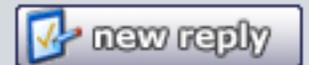

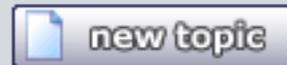

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The fourth essay

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 6(10/24/03 5:59 pm)Reply | The fourth essay <hr/> The fourth essayTell the truth to you is not so dangerous as i thought yesterday, the truth is only dangerous to these people like Otto Weininger and Nietzsche, but, it have already been past by me, so every genius is most likely will past it too, as i can give the experience to you. Here is the fourth essay i write yesterday. My skating skill promote very much today, and, i am still thinking. This have surprised myself. As i have clean the love emotion to my thinking completely now, when i review these days' thinking, i find, if remove the fail love emotion and the exciting because touch philosophy for the first time, i find my thinking is right! My ideology is right! My road is right! I confirmed i am the genius again, and this is confirm as i am calmed now, as no sorrow of fail love, as no exciting because promot so fast in philosophy. And, i know my ideology may still need 100 years to be understood by another genius. My interpretation of love is right, and this view have already developed more far than Otto Weininger's. I have exclaimed these days' thing is just fail love affair in the bbs this morning(It is only because my will become weak temporarily), all of they think so now, so i get my best environment again now. Yes, the best environment is be alone, but communicate to these philosophers who die 100 years ago, and leave your work to another genius who will read your book 100 years later. This view point is said by Nietzsche, and i understand it now. And as i understand love now, i can use it to direct my love. There haven't real love, the desire of sex-compliment is love, woman is mind-less, after your mind is forced on her, she love you, but, you, the genius, after understand the theory of | love, can past love now, your love is sex-compliment too, her mind copy from yours, so her mind is useless to you, you just want to use her body to satisfy your desire of sex-compliment, i say body, is because, minus mind, there only have body left, the common way to use her body is by fuck her (also this seems to be rude in a philosophy book), it seems the desire of sex-compliment is just the same as the desire find on animal, no love exists in fact, both man and woman have desire, but man have the desire for truth too, so, the perfect man, genius, desire truth by study philosophy. Then what way should we, the genius, treat woman? oh, just use her to satisfy your desire, dear, this is the viewpoint of Nietzsche's. You see, i am understanding Otto Weininger and Nietzsche more and more now. Nietzsche is the genius, his opinion on woman is right, but he didn't explain it clearly as Otto Weininger. Now, how should i deal with the girl i begin to love several months ago? As no love exist, only desire. I can drop her now, genius can drop the desire. I can satisfy my desire by masturbate or by prostitute, but masturbate can't satisfy you very well, maybe with the help of pornographic video will be a little better, and prostitute is dangerous, it may cause venereal disease, Nietzsche's is died by this, i would better find a girl. But to force your mind is not so easily, sometimes you need to clean her mind, then force your mind on her, so to force to a innocent girl should be easier, but the easiest way is to find a girl whose mind is already force by some others, and you only need to correct some of it and improve it. To make the girl love you, then she would like you to fuck her, this is not the only way to fuck her. If my ideology changed the whole world, it will like this: after born, girl are train for sex attraction and fertility, and when they grown up, let man to choose them, let the genius choose first, needn't make she love him first, she will love him after be fucked by him, and the man is given education. here comes another question, how to make more genius? i may be the first genius who discover i am genius, so i would like to say my opinion here, genius needn't very good hereditary, as my parent are common people, my young brother is nearly a idiot, and many great man's son is not genius, but genius should still have some thing with hereditary, i think, why the genius is so rare? it is because many genius is hide in a napkin by the social, yes, as i describe in "My fate, my death", so many thing happens, make me become a genius, but it is wrong, it is, the environment i encounter saved my genius. How to create the environment for genius's develop, i leave it to you :) And, now, how to determine who is genius when he is young? the genius just be the man in man, how to determine who is more man than the other? determine it by body? this is wrong, that only show the desire of sex-compliment, my body was very weak, it is only recent 1 year i make it become strong after read Nietzsche's book(You see, Otto Weininger and Nietzsche help me so much, and i will help you very much too, we get higher and higher by stand on the previous genius's shoulder, we will won at last, i think i can see it in my life). it should be determined by whose desire for truth is stronger, don't use the current education's determination, it always make girls seems better than boy, so, if something the girl can't do so good as boy, this will be a good determination, my philosophy course's achievement is very good too, some girls seems better than me in my university, and now i study philosophy all by myself, by read the books find in the Internet. I like so say some about my study way here too, i study these learning branch as the usually student before i come to the university, and in the first two years i spend my time on studying computer, play with Linux, and then touch philosophy, i only read three philosophy books until now, two Chinese book which collect some articles of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, and the "Sex and Character" by Otto Weininger, when i am reading Nietzsche's book, i get fully excited, and when read "Sex and Character", i begin to think and start to understand some of Nietzsche's ideal. I only read two philosophy books in fact, but this is just what the genius are doing, the genius only absorb the most essence of the philosophy ideology, i didn't read Nietzsche's book completely, i don't read some abridge Chinese translation of his book, but it is enough for me to absorb his essence, i didn't finish "Sex and Character" yet, i needn't read it now, Otto Weininger reached the place of utmost truth very nearly, but the last length of his way is wrong, so i leave his way at last, and get the utmost truth.

I see a girl is studying skating this afternoon, her action make me begin to think, and confirmed my ideology, and icelotus's action and her hit on me (by love) helped my thinking too, happier's action help me to confirm my ideology too. Now i begin to analyze them, the girl who studying skating for the first time, feel not good, you can know this from her face, why she come to skate? she don't interest in it indeed, but she hear someone often go skating, so she come, if a boy come to help she to study skating, she will become very happy, if she skating skill become good, and some boy will praise her, she will find she like skating very much, but she don't like it indeed. as Otto Weininger described:"Man work hard with the door close, woman play piano with the door open". icelotus is the girl in girl :) you see, i am very lucky to meet her, so every point said by Otto Weininger can be find on she, it helped me very much. And happier is just the hysteric girl, she fail love, write poem frequently, all her action is correspond Otto Weininger's theory.

Some one may think i despise woman, no, i don't, i love my mother, i like icelotus very much, i think happier is very lovely, i have the strongest love to woman than anyone in the world, especially after i understand the truth. i have written down a love letter to icelotus this afternoon, a long mail. but it is at the time my will become weak that i write that mail, now i won't write it, because i need to write this first :) but i like to write letter and get on with her, it is only because i have something to do with human so i decide to devote my happy to human, after i have done my work, i will lead a happy life with my lover then, and you, all these people know the truth from me, needn't write so long essay as i am doing now, you have time to court your girl :) Woman is mind-less, this is not a despise, this is just a truth.

what will happened after this revolution? After understand this truth, both man and woman will become happy indeed. the first genius who understand the whole universal because him understand ego comes out, because his best environment and best luck, i think a deep happy life is come to human, just as the happy life i am leading now, everyone will be as happy as me, after they understand the truth, just as Jesus created Christan and it last for 2000 years, i tell the truth to human and make philosophy become the highest, i am more great than Jesus, Jesus is a real people, whose ideology reach the level as the level i reached 2 days ago, which describe in "perfect love exists". I am the first happy philosophy, because i am the first man who get the truth, man, is most happy when him get the utmost truth, and woman, is most happy when she is raped violently, woman have no desire for truth, all her desire on truth is superficial, it is the desire to be rape indeed, who can rape the woman most violently? so make woman most happy? it is the happiest man who get the utmost truth. So, after man get the utmost truth, both man and woman become most happy, human become most happy.

It seem i am too optimistic, my ideology seems won't be understand by contemporary human, i may still need wait for 100 years. just one minutes before, a normal man, delete one of my article which i post in SCU bbs's "love" board. Everyone will think i am a madman, as i am a genius, they can't understand genius just as they can't understand madman. but i am not a madman, everyone who acquainted me know this, my roommate, my classmate, never have anyone think i am a madman, because i am more regular than any regular student, except that i am more excellent than everyone in every fields. when i turned to mad? just at the same time i start to study philosophy, just at the same time i start to think, i know the doctor will announce this result. and they think:"oh, it is a madman, or mad boy writing so long articles, these articles are written by a madman, so we can't understand it" :)

I find a flaw about my article, because my English is not so good, i am writing the Chinese style English, so you may need to study Chinese to completely study my articles, i just haven't so much time to write it better, because i may be drag to the madman hospital soon :( all my roommate think i am a madman now :(

True? false? :) you won't know, you just be confused by me :) when i said it is false, it may be true indeed, when i said it is true, it may be false indeed, as i know truth, you don't understand truth, so i play truth at the front of you :) Want to know truth? i won't tell you, you can't get it just by reading, please, start thinking! I must put some superficial thing on my article :) It is philosophy essay? may be. This is only a article for joke? yes :)

I like writing these articles, my ideology is contained in it, and you can treat it as a article for joke too :) so the joke article is saved, and 100 years later, it turned out to be a philosophy book :)

I have said i have controlled SCU bbs, now you understand it now :) if you want to escape from being play by me, study philosophy...but, when you start to read the philosophy, i am laughing at you :)

although my philosophy book won't be understand until 100 years later, i will treat it as writing joke article, so i can be a laughing philosopher :)

I am experience the go mad for half an hour, just as Nietzsche go mad, i know, because after him find come near the truth, he afraid people say he is a mad, then him become mad. He ask the others, "am i madman?", all the others said yes, they said yes, because the only answer is yes, but Nietzsche forget this:"Great man, only trust yourself", him begin to trust the others, him stop his thinking, then him become mad. Yes, i have experience both Otto Weininger's commit suicide and Nietzsche's go mad, and i past, then, i get the utmost truth. every man know the utmost truth, when him see a beautiful girl, the utmost truth come out:"Rape it violently", but every man suppress this truth, although every man have the truth in his heart after born, this is just why every man is genius indeed.

26. I get the utmost truth last night, and i start to spread the truth. I am just be ignored, i am just be blocked, but this just is what i anticipated, they said, you sound of truth is too loudly, yes, the utmost truth is too true. I don't worry, i still have 100 years to spread the truth, it is most like i can alive for 100 years, as i past the state of commit suicide or go man, i have Internet to help me too, my free software StarDict have one million users. The utmost truth is so powerful, i am the first man who get it, so i will be the first success philosophy, whose ideology spread in the whole world. The greatest philosopher is at the SiChuan university of Chinese is not just occasionally. China, has the most long history,it have 5000 years' history, it accumulated the most deep ideology, and SiChuan university, have the best environment for the utmost truth ideology's born, SiChuan university's words is this:"The sea, accept every river", so, the utmost truth river, which seems to be most dirty, is accepted by the sea too.

The philosophy revolution is coming, no one can stop it, philosophers have wait for it for 3000 years, now it comes. The utmost truth, will defeat every false, the utmost truth is heavy by me, it shine like the sun, clean the darkness which around human for thousands years, so powerfully.

Man, stop anything are you doing, read Otto Weininger's "Sex and Character", read Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra", then start to read study my essay. To get the truth, is the most important thing of man!
Sex and Character: www.theabsolute.net/ottow/schareng.pdf
My essay: forlinux.yeah.net

Lux
Registered User
Posts: 4
(10/28/03 2:14 am)
Reply

Re: fourth essay

---

your work will oppose your intentions to enlighten whole cultures huzheng in finding assuming and expecting all minds and bodies of women to be taken by rape you will merely produce more rapeable beings and secure that your genius has no more than these to threaten its position which is often genius's work then to keep low and slow-moving everything else around it this kind of genius is terrified next to the intelligence of women, which first it denies exists and then fails to recognize and then tries to define with its poor vocabulary to its impoverished idea of genius try catching the mind of the unrapeable women they exist in rarity it is true try convincing one of her to produce your children or let you take over her mind ha ha you will have to be able to run fast for her genius of this kind is faster than yours and works much the same way in keeping low and slow-moving everything else around it this kind of genius doesn't want company it doesn't want enlightenment for whole cultures it only wants itself and any benefit to the low and slow-moving from its existence is strictly speaking accidental if you want to talk social projects you have to hand this over to the workmanlike intelligences and not claim it in the name of genius for these reasons this kind of genius in women is rare and kept-away and also accidental or she would run like les guerrieres and build a fortress in the forest without you and decline the species in much the same way you do

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 976
(10/29/03 3:16 am)
Reply

Re: The fourth essay

Huzheng:

I can't believe you actually think your ideas about how to raise a girl for the use of man is new. It is the old fashioned way - the problem is that it is unfair to women and they are tired of it.

It also perpetuates the problems with women's characters that Nietzsche and Weininger talked about.

Next you'll think of foot binding and suppose you are a genius to come up with such a novel idea.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Genius and trust

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 965(2/4/04 7:06 pm)Reply          | The Genius and trust <hr/> The Genius has a super-conscious distrust of everyone. As a result the inverse becomes true, he has a subconscious trust of everyone. The facial expression of a Genius shows this balance. The ordinary man becomes bitter and cynical as a result of having been let down by people he has trusted to many times. He has a conscious distrust of everyone which he is unable to sustain thereby ending up trusting people and being disappointed yet again. The simple man appears comparatively happy all the time as if without a memory. Constantly fooling himself. The woman of course is no wiser either way and makes her way through life on the opinion of as many so called "friends" as she can sustain. That is why she lives for gossip and can always find a convenient shoulder to cry on. Do you agree? |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1443(2/4/04 7:14 pm)Reply | The Genius and trust <hr/> Write a book.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2206(2/4/04 9:05 pm)Reply      | ---- <hr/> I think I agree, but I disagree that woman lives for gossip, though she understands its influence better than any. Where the exceptional man decides to himself that a rumour will travel and counters it by redefining his position in advance, he cannot always account for its transformative nature as the exceptional woman does, by advancing it herself. Genius must underestimate the power of superstition. An unusual case of survival where adaption would prove fatal. |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1394(2/5/04 2:54 am)Reply | Re: The Genius and trust <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The Genius has a super-conscious distrust of everyone. As a result the inverse becomes true, he has a subconscious trust of everyone. Do you agree? <hr/> I do DEL, because it describes me quite well. Edited by: birdofhermes at: 2/5/04 2:54 am                                                                                                                                                                           |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 35(2/5/04 3:25 am)Reply      | Re: The Genius and trust <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The Genius has a super-conscious distrust of everyone. As a result the inverse becomes true, he has a subconscious trust of everyone. The facial expression of a Genius shows this balance. <hr/> i agree with this also, and yes generally woman get turned by gossip i can even see this occuring in me, although my awareness of it counters it to a large degree it is nonetheless there and very subtle                               |

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 573

(2/5/04 4:47 am)

Reply

Re: The Genius and trust

---

One of Dels more easily understood posts.

The ordinary man...has a conscious distrust of everyone which he is unable to sustain thereby ending up trusting people and being disappointed yet again

I think this distrust is caused by the survival of the fittest instinct, from which I believe all 'greed' comes from. The ordinary man is unable to sustain this because of herd instincts. Were he to continually express this distrust, as many aggressive males do, then he would become an outcast and become separate from the comfort of the herd.

The herd continually reinforces the need to follow orders, to not let ones 'distrust' get out of hand, and so we have continually changing morals, fashions, trends, religions, group 'reasoning', so as to make the potential individual a bit lost. Although these things change form, they all retain an underlying principle that you can't do things that harm the herd.

Progressively a sufficient number of herd nemes get stored in memory for subservience to automatically become part of their nature. Wherever they are placed into a position where greed might conflict with the interests of their group or society they go to the rules stored in their brains. These days being feminine minded and material greed are good or moral so that is OK.

Young adolescent males form anti-societal gangs due to this conflict between their survival greed and the interests of the main herd and/or they resort to dangerous activities as those activities offer them a form of irrational release from this conflict by challenging their survival instinct.

The ordinary genius is little different, they challenge the survival instinct by trying to overcome it by the use of whatever they regard as reason rather than danger.

The enlightened genius as they know the true nature of people does not need to be afraid of the greed of others as they are entirely confident that the solidity of their reasoning can meet this challenge, but more importantly they have mostly overcome the irrational outcomes that survival instincts cause and have little greed, except for more wisdom.

The simple man has little logical processing power and relies pretty much entirely on the stored 'be good' memories. Often though their survival greed gets the better of them and they step outside of these accepted norms, normally as a result of the confusion alcohol and drugs create in the processing areas or the limitations of poorly structured and controlled greeds/reasoning of their immediate group, and undertake actions that lead to significant conflicts with the herd, such as rape, thieving, violence, which can spiral out of control via guilt at failing societies expectations and they end up in jail or addicts or bums on the street. The same can happen to 'ordinary' men or traditional geniuses . Women tend to have less problems in this regard as the herd instinct is stronger. Gossip simply reinforces this instinct, that is what gossip is.

Negative gossip about famous people though is different, that is often a form of delusionary smugness that ones own life is more under control, which is why it is entertaining.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/5/04 4:49 am

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 966

(2/5/04 10:27 am)

Reply

The Genius and trust

---

Quote:

---

suergaz

Where the exceptional man decides to himself that a rumour will travel and counters it by redefining his position in advance, he cannot always account for its transformative nature as the exceptional woman does, by advancing it herself.

---

Rumours travel like a split bottle of ink in a swimming pool. The collective and women disperse and distort information by nature. How can trust them as much as you can trust the media.

Quote:

---

silentsal

i agree with this also, and yes generally woman get turned by gossip i can even see this occuring in me, although my awareness of it counters it to a large degree it is nonetheless there and very subtle

---

Gossip magazines are hardly ever purchased by men.

Why do you try to resist gossiping when it is in your nature as a woman?

What do you aim to achieve?

Quote:

---

jimhaz

These days being feminine minded and material greed are good or moral so that is OK.

---

Why do you say "These days". Do you have an idea of a time when things were different? Can you understand the difference?

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 967

(2/5/04 10:31 am)

Reply

The Genius and trust

---

Secrecy protects masculine trust.

Publicity is the affirmation of feminine trust.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2221

(2/5/04 10:39 am)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

Rumours travel like a split bottle of ink in a swimming pool. The collective and women disperse and distort information by nature. How can trust them as much as you can trust the media.

---

I'm afraid I must be trusting DEL. You see, I'm not afraid. (:D)

Quote:

---

Secrecy protects masculine trust.

Publicity is the affirmation of feminine trust.

---

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                         | Privacy and publicity are very much the same thing to me. Personality on the other hand...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 917(2/5/04 10:47 am)Reply    | Re: --- <hr/> Nobody is ever let down by other people. Rather they are let down by themselves. They let themselves down in what they allow themselves to believe of others and how much value they assign to said belief being borne out.                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2222(2/5/04 10:57 am)Reply                                                                                      | ---- <hr/> There is exception to that Dave. There are those who are not in any way borne by belief, are open to others in all instances and yet are conspired against in the most dismal scenarios. What you say would hold true if stupidity did not exist.                                                                                   |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 918(2/5/04 11:22 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> What I said holds true only because stupidity exists. I remember Zappa theorising that it is the most abundant element in the universe. There is relative consolation though. I'm an ass, yes, but so is everybody else. I'm an ass, you're an ass. What better place to start concerning human relations. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2225(2/5/04 11:31 am)Reply                                                                                      | --- <hr/> Toast, you are but a mother of invention posting the above. We shall see.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 36
(2/5/04 11:32 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Gossip magazines are hardly ever purchased by men.
Why do you try to resist gossiping when it is in your nature as a woman? What do you aim to achieve?.

---

well i do not resist buying gossip magazines, i enjoy reading star and national enquirer, this i don't question i just enjoy. As for gossiping because i am interested in cause/effect i can see the how letting myself get caught up in the gossip becomes a cause for much confusion so I resist the temptation, by the simple act of being aware of it. Lots of gossip does not affect me at all but if i have some empathy for a particular viewpoint i can get swept away by it.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 968
(2/5/04 6:14 pm)
Reply

-----

---

Quote:

---

silentsal
As for gossiping because i am interested in cause/effect i can see the how letting myself get caught up in the gossip becomes a cause for much confusion so I resist the temptation, by the simple act of being aware of it. Lots of gossip does not affect me at all but if i have some empathy for a particular viewpoint i can get swept away by it.

---

Your resisting temptation is like a little pool of stagnate water at low tide. Your being aware of the gossip and not saying anything is like a piece of ice in a wet sink basin.

---

Quote:

---

well i do not resist buying gossip magazines, i enjoy reading star and national enquirer, this i don't question i just enjoy.

---

Of course you must continue to do this.
What would be left of you if you didn't?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2228
(2/5/04 10:26 pm)
Reply

---

---

I love DELS analogies above. I hate his last paragraph.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 37
(2/6/04 2:08 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Your resisting temptation is like a little pool of stagnate water at low tide.

Your being aware of the gossip and not saying anything is like a piece of ice in a wet sink basin

---

Well I don't resist saying anything I do say lots haha but what i do resist is getting caught up in all the BS I am saying.

As for being nothing without reading Gossip mags well I am nothing to begin with so not sure how reading gossip mags makes me anything.

There isn't even ONE there is ZERO

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 970
(2/6/04 7:25 am)
Reply

Genius dating agency

---

Quote:

---

silentsal

As for being nothing without reading Gossip mags well I am nothing to begin with so not sure how reading gossip mags makes me anything.

There isn't even ONE there is ZERO

---

Very impressive!
We'll have to get you married off to jimhaz.
Have you noticed him?
What do you think?

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1632
(2/9/04 9:44 am)
Reply

Re: Genius dating agency

---

The Genius has no need of trust. Trust is for people who lack knowledge and are attached.

Dan Rowden

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 983
(2/9/04 9:54 am)
Reply

Re: Genius dating agency

---

Quote:

---

Dan Rowden

The Genius has no need of trust. Trust is for people who lack knowledge and are attached.

---

Depends on what kind of knowledge and what kind of attachment.

|                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                        | It is possible that the Genius could see everything and know nothing. Specific concentrated knowledge might have an overall blinding effect.                                 |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1633(2/9/04 10:27 am)Reply | Re: Genius dating agency<hr/> Trust is a psychological trait exhibited by those who experience fear at possible outcomes. The Genius has no such fear.Dan Rowden |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

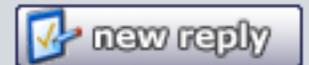

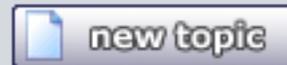

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Genius and trust

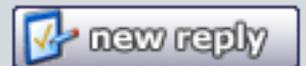

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2262(2/9/04 11:08 am)Reply  | Re: Genius dating agency <hr/> Dan has a point in that when we trust someone, we trust them to something. Apart from that, he makes no point at all.                                  |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1634(2/9/04 11:11 am)Reply                                                                                         | There's Points then there's points? <hr/> If I have a point then I made a point, didn't I? Dan Rowden                                                                                 |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2265(2/9/04 11:24 am)Reply  | Re: There's Points then there's points? <hr/> Of course you did, Dan, of course you did. Just not by yourself. I had to help you to it. Edited by: suergaz at: 2/9/04 11:26 am |

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1006(2/16/04 5:40 am)Reply      | What else could she do? <hr/> Quote: <hr/> suergazI love DELS analogies above. I hate his last paragraph. <hr/> Why the hate?That's strong language.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2301(2/16/04 12:19 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> quote]silentsal:--well i do not resist buying gossip magazines, i enjoy reading star and national enquirer, this i don't question i just enjoy. DEL:--Of course you must continue to do this.What would be left of you if you didn't[/quote] This is what I found to be hateful. So I hated it. Don't worry, I don't hate you, though I probably hate the national enquirer. I haven't read it, have you? |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

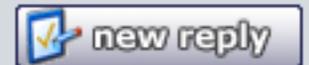

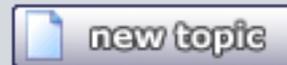

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Gospel of Scott

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 609(1/15/04 4:22 pm)Reply | The Gospel of Scott <hr/> These are the Sexual sayings that the living Scott wrote and Scott recorded. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. And he said, "Whoever discovers the interpretation of these sayings will not taste abstinence."</li> <li>2. Scott said, "Those who lust should not stop lusting until they love. When they love, they will be abstinent. When they are abstinent, they will marvel, and will Fuck over all. [And after they have Fucked they will rest.]"</li> <li>3. Scott said, "If the virgins say to you, 'Look, the Sex is in the sky,' then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you, 'It is in the sea,' then the fish will precede you. Rather, the Sex is within you and it is outside you.</li> </ol> When you know yourselves, then you will be known, and you will understand that you are part of the Intercourse. But if you do not know yourselves, then you live in abstinence, and you are the abstinence." <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>4. Scott said, "The person old in days won't hesitate to ask a little child seven days old about the place of Sex, and that person will have Sex.</li> </ol> For many of the first will be last, and will become a single one." <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>5. Scott said, "Know what is in front of your genitals, and what is hidden from them will be disclosed to you.</li> </ol> |

For there is nothing hidden that will not be revealed. [And there is nothing inserted that will not be withdrawn.]"

6. His disciples asked him and said to him, "Do you want us to fast? How should we pray? Should we give to charity? What diet should we observe?"

Scott said, "Don't lie, and don't do what you hate, because all things are disclosed before the Intercourse. After all, there is nothing hidden that will not be revealed, and there is nothing inserted that will remain inside."

7. Scott said, "Lucky is the man that the woman will Fuck, so that the man becomes woman. And foul is the man that the woman will Fuck, and the man still will become woman."

8. And he said, "The person is like a wise Fucker who cast his dick into the vagina and drew it up from the vagina full of her juices. Among them the wise Fucker discovered a great wetness. He wiped all the rest of the juices back into the vagina, and easily chose the great wetness. Anyone here with two good balls had better listen!"

9. Jesus said, "Look, the Fucker went out, took a handful (of seeds), and scattered (them). Some fell on the back, and were wiped off. Others fell on the leg, and they didn't take root in the soil and didn't produce heads of humans. Others fell on the floor, and the carpet choked the seeds and evaporated them. And others fell on good soil, and it produced a good crop: it yielded sixty-nine per measure and one hundred thirty eight per measure."

10. Scott said, "I have cast my seed upon the world, and look, I'm guarding it until a child is born."

11. Scott said, "This place will pass away, and the other will pass away.

The abstinent are not Fucking, and the Fucking will not become abstinent. During the days when you acted as what is abstinent, you made it Sexual. When you are in the Seed Storm, what will you do? On the day when you were one, you became two. But when you become two, what will you do?"

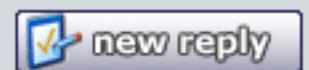

12. The disciples said to Scott, "We know that you are going to leave us. Who will be our leader?"

Scott said to them, "No matter where you are you are to go to the opposite sex, for whose sake heaven and earth came into being."

13. Scott said to his disciples, "Compare me to something and tell me what I am like."

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                     | Adam said to him, "You are like a just messenger." George said to him, "You are like a wise philosopher." Ryan said to him, "Teacher, my mouth is utterly unable to say what you are like." Scott said, "I am not your teacher. Because you have drunk, you have become intoxicated from the bubbling spring that I have tended." And he took him, and withdrew, and spoke three sayings to him. When George came back to his friends they asked him, "What did Scott say to you?" George said to them, "If I tell you one of the sayings he spoke to me, you will pick up rocks and stone me, and Sperm will come from the rocks and cover you." |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2101(1/19/04 11:59 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> What happens next? Does he get spermed on by rocks?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 650(1/20/04 2:55 am)Reply   | Re: ---- <hr/> Well, in a sense, yes.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Great Unfinished Book

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 545(7/23/03 7:10 am)Reply | The Great Unfinished Book <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Weininger:Metaphysics.What I have in mind could instead have been called symbolism, universal symbolism.For what is important to me is not the totality, but the meaning of everything particular in the totality. What I am aiming at is to uncover what the sea, what iron, what ants, what the Chinese mean, the idea which they represent. And to that extent this undertaking is the first of its kind. It should encompass the whole world, and try to lay bare, to clarify in the literal sense, the deeper meaning of things. That is why this metaphysics is not only metaphysics, but also metachemistry, metabiology, metamathematics, metapathology, metahistory, and so on. The undertaking is so vast, so immense, that in it an individual will be able to let all his abilities flourish without limit. <hr/> |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                        | I wonder if anybody will come with a level of Genius high enough to complete this great unfinished work.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 1739 (7/23/03 11:08) Reply  | Re: The Great Unfinished Book <hr/> Weininger was merely distracting himself with this sort of rubbish. Since nothing ultimately has any meaning, Weininger was (intentionally?) divorcing himself from Reality with these sorts of explorations. They might have some psychological value, but I reckon he should have used his time better and really pushed to the very bedrock of Reality instead. |
| ynithrix Registered User Posts: 164 (7/23/03 12:32 pm) Reply                                                                                | Re: The Great Unfinished Book <hr/> I agree. Mysticism is inventing meanings to content oneself. It has no more value to it than skimming stones across a lake. Edited by: ynithrix at: 7/23/03 12:32 pm                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 246 (7/23/03 12:45) Reply                                                                                    | .. <hr/> Del, the entire world is working on that project currently. Scientists, and the like.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| DEL Registered User Posts: 547 (7/24/03 6:29) Reply                                                                                         | Re: The Great Unfinished Book <hr/> Quote: <hr/> ynithrix: I agree. Mysticism is inventing meanings to content oneself. It has no more value to it than skimming stones across a lake. <hr/> It is ironic that skimming stones across a lake lead to the creation of the bouncing bomb that busted a important German damn in the second world war.              |

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 551

(7/24/03 7:03)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

Weininger was merely distracting himself with this sort of rubbish. Since nothing ultimately has any meaning, Weininger was (intentionally?) divorcing himself from Reality with these sorts of explorations. They might have some psychological value, but I reckon he should have used his time better and really pushed to the very bedrock of Reality instead.

---

I'm surprised that you could make such a statement after putting so much work and effort in creating this forum.

Quote:

---

Weininger:

Scientific probability has logical structure, belief is fully alogical, but the former is very often simply reduced to their common aspect – both are not-knowledge – and put on the same level as the latter. We ought only to be speaking about the belief as such which has nothing to do with probability, and not about something entirely different which is called by the same name. Belief proper does not require logic, whereas at very bottom logic cannot dispense with belief. The ultimate propositions of logic, the law of non-contradiction and the law of identity, cannot be known, but must be believed. Just as ethics presupposes a subject that wills, so too pure, formal logic, whose principles seem enthroned, proudly sublime and self-contained, above the heads of individuals, requires a subject that believes.

---

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1744
(7/24/03 10:53)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

It was part of the detour that Weininger embarked upon which unbalanced him and eventually led to his suicide. He didn't ground his reasonings and explorations in what is ultimately real and therefore ultimately had no center. To his credit he was aware of this, but this alone doesn't redeem him in my eyes. I think of him as a wasted talent.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 555
(7/24/03 16:15)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

He didn't ground his reasonings and explorations in what is ultimately real and therefore ultimately had no center.

---

On what ground does the reasoning for your new book stand?
Where is your centre?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1749
(7/26/03 12:51)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Ultimate Reality

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 558

(7/26/03 19:53)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Is not your "Ultimate Reality" the same as Weininger's "absolute logicality of the universe"?

If not, what is the difference?

Quote:

---

Weininger:

One should, therefore, not misunderstand the intention of this investigation. Nothing is further from it than to raise even the slightest doubt about the absolute logicality of the universe. It is just as much permeated by its logicality as it is by its absolute ethicality.

What I want to stress is that neither can be known, but only believed.<sup>6</sup> The situations of logic and ethics are exactly the same. It cannot be proven that people ought to do the good, for if that could be deduced, then the idea of the good would be the consequence of a cause, and thus could become the means to an end. If it ought to be done, then in order to be done for its own sake the good must be identical to that which absolutely cannot be the consequence of a cause, or the means to an end.

---

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1750

(7/28/03 10:37)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

They're not quite the same. Weininger's "absolute logicality of the universe" was merely theoretical. He didn't apply logic directly to the nature of the universe and understand emptiness.

I also disagree with his idea that logic is something which can only be believed. If you go deeply enough, you will see that logic is something which cannot be believed or unbelieved. Rather, it is the underlying process behind all coherent thought. One cannot coherently question logic without using logic, neither can one affirm it without using logic. Logic is a brute fact which transcends all attempts to establish or challenge it.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1315(7/28/03 12:55)Reply                                                                                     | --- <hr/> Actually, it is really illogic, the lack of meaning, or 'emptiness' as you like to say, that is underlying process all coherent thought, for coherent thought alone is the process that can be called 'logic'-----                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 354(7/28/03 15:16)Reply                                                                                     | -- <hr/> Logic (A=A, the Law of Identity) is the basis of consciousness because anything consciousness concieves of possesses the identity of itself, even 'illogical' concepts. That's why it's a law. Interesting, David, that a year ago you interpreted the passage from Weininger about logic only being able to be believed somewhat differently. Although if I were dealing with DEL's rabid fanaticism for Weininger I would probably try to steer him away, too. Here is the link to the dialogue in Genius News: Faith in Logic Gregory Shantz |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 482(7/29/03 0:05)Reply  | Re: -- <hr/> Most interesting, thankyou Greg.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1317

(7/29/03 1:39)

Reply

-----

---

Quote:

---

Logic ( $A=A$ , the Law of Identity) is the basis of consciousness because anything consciousness conceives of possesses the identity of itself, even 'illogical' concepts. That's why it's a law.

---

As I've said before, the equation  $A=A$  is only an expression of logic, not logic itself. Consciousness doesn't conceive anything, only conscious beings do. We may mean something very different by 'the basis of consciousness' since logic is only that part of our consciousness by which we advance our consciousness, and is in no way its essence, let alone its roots or first forms. One may be equal to oneself in entirety, but one nevertheless continues to become oneself. It is because one can never be the entirety one apprehends.

"You higher men, learn to dance beyond yourselves"

----Zarathustra

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 563

(7/29/03 7:18)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

I also disagree with his idea that logic is something which can only be believed. If you go deeply enough, you will see that logic is something which cannot be believed or unbelieved.

---

Quote:

---

G Shantz:

Interesting, David, that a year ago you interpreted the passage from Weininger about logic only being able to be believed somewhat differently. Although if I were dealing with DEL's rabid fanaticism for Weininger I would probably try to steer him away, too.

---

So it took one year for David to abandon his Weininger view and to go round to Victor Danilchenko's point of view. Victor Danilchenko does have a very strong argument but there is something missing. Weininger's great unfinished book remains unfinished because of the enormity of the mission.

Any writer that is just trying to get people to be more logical in life will never be in the class of Weininger and the others.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1756

(7/29/03 14:14)

Reply

Re: --

---

Greg Shantz wrote:

Quote:

---

Interesting, David, that a year ago you interpreted the passage from Weininger about logic only being able to be believed somewhat differently.

---

Not really. Even if one recognizes that logic is a brute fact that cannot be established or challenged, one is still free to reject rationality if one chooses to. The fact that logic underlines every coherent thought we have doesn't change this.

For example, we are perfectly capable of putting a halt to a particular line of reasoning well before it reaches its natural conclusion if we suspect that we won't like the result. And in fact, this is what most people do all the time; they constantly chop and change their thinking so that lines of reasoning never have the chance to reach their end.

So one does need to have faith or belief in logic in order to settle the mind down, concentrate on uncovering truth and expose the falseness of our attachments.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1757

(7/29/03 14:18)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Del wrote:

Quote:

---

Any writer that is just trying to get people to be more logical in life will never be in the class of Weininger and the others.

---

Indeed. He would be superior.

Weininger was far too green and romantic to be a true genius. He died too soon.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 565

(7/29/03 16:51)

Reply

Natural conclusion vs Logical conclusion

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

For example, we are perfectly capable of putting a halt to a particular line of reasoning well before it reaches its natural conclusion if we suspect that we won't like the result. And in fact, this is what most people do all the time; they constantly chop and change their thinking so that lines of reasoning never have the chance to reach their end.

---

What if the "natural conclusion" is death or pain? So we can see there is a constant battle going on in the mind and the body. This fact has been realised by so many before us.

If we follow this line of reasoning the most perfect and logical human organisation is the military.

But then again the natural conclusion may not actually follow the logical conclusion. Chaos may step in and a person lives when he should have died.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 566

(7/29/03 17:11)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

Weininger was far too green and romantic to be a true genius.
He died too soon.

---

This might be true.

You might be too red and logical to be a true Genius. You may have lived too long.

What we need is a blue person so that eventually a purple person can be summoned into existence. When he/she/it arrives we will be ready for the new world order.

Quote:

---

Weininger:

Red is the colour of the lower life and its pleasure. (In plants, green, the colour of static pleasure, corresponds to red, the dynamic pleasure of animals; neurasthenics are anaemic, criminals polyaemic.) Blue is the colour of the joy and bliss of the highest life.

The red of hell is the antithesis of the blue of heaven.

---

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1758

(7/30/03 10:06)

Reply

re: logic

Del wrote:

Quote:

---

What if the "natural conclusion" is death or pain? So we can see there is a constant battle going on in the mind and the body. This fact has been realised by so many before us. If we follow this line of reasoning the most perfect and logical human organisation is the military.

---

This is a very limited conception of what it means to be a logical human. Total submission to an organization that does nothing more than foster patriotic interests is not a particularly good example of rationality.

A perfectly logical person is one who gives himself entirely over to truth, so that there is not a false aspect inside of him which is conflict with what is ultimately true. He is completely at one with Nature, his true self. This is an extremely lofty and rare attainment that even Weininger failed to reach.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Great Unfinished Book

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1759(7/30/03 10:24)Reply  | Re: re: logic <hr/> Del wrote: Quote: <hr/> You might be too red and logical to be a true Genius. You may have lived too long. <hr/> You can never be too logical. Unless, of course, you value ignorance, confusion and insanity. Quote: <hr/> What we need is a blue person so that eventually a purple person can be summoned into existence. When he/she/it arrives we will be ready for the new world order. <hr/> A clear person would be even better. So many a clever one had I found, that veiled his face and muddied his waters, that none might look through them and down into them. But to him |

came the more clever unbelievers, the crackers of nuts: these fished out from him the best hidden fish!

But the bright ones, the brave, the transparent - these I hold the wisest of the silent: for their bottom is so deep that even the clearest water betrayeth it not!

- Nietzsche

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 568

(7/30/03 18:26)

Reply

Faith and Logic

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

So one does need to have faith or belief in logic in order to settle the mind down, concentrate on uncovering truth and expose the falseness of our attachments.

---

"Settle", "concentrate" and "expose" all require effort and determination. No? I would of thought that one needs faith in something to make any progress. Nobody will take your book seriously without having some faith in you.

Anybody here have any ideas on which came first.
Faith or logic?

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 583

(8/10/03 18:56)

Reply

Too logical to do anything

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000:

You can never be too logical. Unless, of course, you value ignorance, confusion and insanity.

---

Surely the most logical person would not make a move without clear reasoning first. Therefore a very logical person would be the type that does nothing without careful thought.

Those who think too logically will end up doing nothing.

The data of life is always changing like the stock market. Look how much effort and money is invested in building computer systems and communication networks to try and predict the movements.

I say, the power of logic is nothing more than reaction speed.

Mr Logic can only react to what is.

Mr Belief can see patterns in Mr. Logic but Mr. Logic cannot see patterns in Mr. Belief.

The more logical Mr. Logic becomes the more Mr. Belief can see into the future.

BryanParrish

Global User

Posts: 72

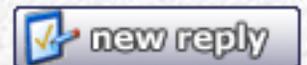

(8/3/04 5:36)

Reply

Re: The Great Unfinished Book

---

FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

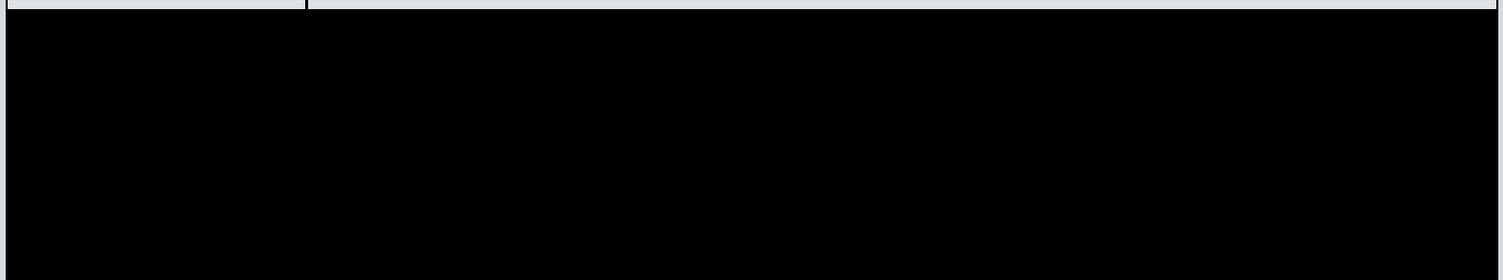

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Holographic Universe

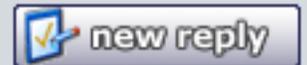

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 31(4/3/04 7:46 am)Reply  | The Holographic Universe <hr/> Has anyone else read this book? If so, what are your thoughts on the holographic paradigm?                                                                                                                |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 243(4/3/04 11:07 am)Reply    | ... <hr/> That reminds me of... ghost children. :P But no, I haven't read it. My mother has the book, but I'm kind of lazy to read it.                                                                                            |
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 32(4/3/04 12:34 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Hi Rairun,I've found it to be a good read. For an average person such as myself, I found it stimulating in terms of viewing things differently. I only wish I could comprehend the more complex part of the paradigm. |

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 115(4/3/04 1:44 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Every atom contains a piece of the whole universe. The light is structured by time. They have found out stuff about how the anti-verse may work...when one atom moves its total opposite on the other side of the universe does the opposite(don't ask me how). Our mind is living in another dimension making decisions like a computer while our physical bodies are in this matrix trying to comprehend where we came from. Did we really get conceived or were we created? I try to look to nature for these kind of questions. Take a tree for example, we are like fruit with all its confusion. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 856(4/3/04 4:25 pm)Reply      | .. <hr/> You amaze me, Static. So seXXXy.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

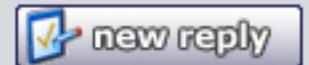

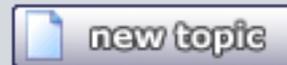

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Infinite - what is it?

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| HuzingtonRegistered UserPosts: 3(10/11/03 5:50 am)Reply |  The Infinite - what is it? <hr/> Numbers and space are not infinite. Mere endlessness is not the True Infinite. It is what Hegel called the Spurious Infinite. For each number in a series is limited and finite. No matter which term (or number) we are at, we never go beyond the finite. Mr. Stace put it succinctly: "[We have] an endless repetition of terms each of which is finite, so that the finite is never got rid of. This is an everlasting attempt to grasp the infinite which however completely evades us. It ought to be infinite, but it never is." Mr. Hegel also put it well: "The result seems to superficial reflection something very grand. . . . But it is not the real infinite. . . . In the attempt to contemplate such an infinite our thought . . . must sink exhausted. It is true . . . that we must abandon the unending contemplation, not however because the task is so sublime, but because it is too tedious. The same thing is constantly recurring. We lay down a limit: then we pass it: next we have a limit once more, and so forever." Thus we never get beyond the finite. This is mere endlessness, mere limitlessness; this is not Infinity. What, therefore, is the Infinite |

Edited by: Huzington at: 10/11/03 5:52 am

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1200
(10/11/03 6:23 am)
Reply

 The Infinite - what is it?

---

Infinite = not "real." The universe we live in is most likely finite.

Just like "unnatural." It simply isn't possible.

Tharan

Huzington
Registered User
Posts: 4
(10/11/03 7:25 am)
Reply

 Re: The Infinite - what is it?

---

Quote:

---

Infinite = not "real." The universe we live in is most likely finite.

---

Care to provide any reasons?

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1201
(10/11/03 7:52 am)
Reply

 Re: The Infinite - what is it?

---

To what? The fact that the universe is finite? Sorry, can't answer that one... well I could, but...

The "not real" moniker? If the universe is finite, then the universe must be contained in something that is infinite, if such a thing exists. But since there is no way of determining such a thing exists, or if it is in fact infinite, it is functionally irrelevant to speak about it.

"Unnatural" is also physically impossible, but used quite often, interestingly enough.

Tharan

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 404(10/11/03 12:14 pm)Reply                                                                                      |  the infinite <hr/> The infinite lacks all qualities except for the quality of lacking qualities.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1202(10/11/03 1:30 pm)Reply                                                                                   |  the infinite <hr/> "If you choose not to decide,you still have made a choice."-- some (ancient) Islander Yes, the quality of lacking qualities is a quality. I had thought of recursive functions (fractals) today but I believe they also are finite. Any recursiveness to be found in the universe is yet still contained in that universe. A continual process has parameters. Tharan |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1556(10/11/03 2:41 pm)Reply                                                                                       |  ---- <hr/> The spurious infinite! Pah! Was hegel simply not satisfied with mere endlessness?! Infinity is endless, meaning, it is finitely what it is.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 622(10/11/03 11:35 pm)Reply  |  Re: ---- <hr/> Huz knows what he's on about. True infinity is boundless, not endless like mathematical infinity etc. Zeno's paradox and it's solution in converging sets is a good illustration of the finite infinity. I think Mandelbrott might have gone some way to illustrating the infinite though.                                                                                        |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1558
(10/11/03 11:40 pm)
Reply

 ---

---

What is boundless can only be endless.

True infinity?! That's as funny as spurious infinity!

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 624
(10/11/03 11:51 pm)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

Not at all, an endless series of numbers is bounded by the fact that it is an endless series of numbers.

The truly boundless is truly boundless.

You might say that it is bounded by by it's boundlessness.

Such is the problem with the finite comprehension of the infinite.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1560
(10/12/03 12:05 am)
Reply

 ---

---

What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

This is no different, in essence, from my saying infinity is finitely what it is.

You maintain a strange division! Opposing 'true' infinity (hahahahah) with 'finite' infinity, when finite infinity is not any less infinite for the action of an adjective(be as broad with this word as you please, or as narrow!)

Go at this: The boundless is endless and vice versa.

Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness. There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

Edited by: suergaz at: 10/12/03 12:11 am

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 630

(10/12/03 12:25 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

For something to be endless, it must be a thing, and it must have a beginning.

For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing, and it cannot have a beginning.

Getting it yet?

Quote:

---

What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

---

Nope, I'm saying that it is bounded by the fact that it is endless.

Quote:

---

This is no different, in essence, from my saying infinity is finitely what it is.

---

Hahahaha, yes it is. Your statement is nonsense.

Quote:

---

You maintain a strange division! Opposing 'true' infinity (hahahahah) with 'finite' infinity, when finite infinity is not any less infinite for the action of an adjective (be as broad with this word as you please, or as narrow!)

---

You're not understanding this very well are you. Try studying some maths.

Quote:

Go at this: The boundless is endless and vice versa.

---

Incorrect. Boundlessness encompasses endlessness, everything and nothing; the vice versa case is semantically impossible.

Quote:

---

Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness.
There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

---

How very dualistic.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1563

(10/12/03 12:41 am)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

For something to be endless, it must be a thing...

---

Sure.

Quote:

---

...and it must have a beginning.

---

Why?

Quote:

---

For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing...

Why?

Quote:

---

... and it cannot have a beginning.

---

Sure.

Quote:

---

Getting it yet?

---

What's to get?!

ME:--What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

YOU:--Nope, I'm saying that it is bounded by the fact that it is endless.

Same thing. Do you wear glasses?

So you think infinity is not finitely what it is?! Remember this doesn't contradict it being infinitely what it is!

Quote:

---

Boundlessness encompasses endlessness, everything and nothing; the vice versa case is semantically impossible.

---

Nope. You'll find it does. Come on, show me how you think it semantically impossible if you are going to maintain it!

ME:---Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness. There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

YOU:--How very dualistic.

Hah! So you won't go against this huh?!

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 114

(10/12/03 1:04 am)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

Mr. Toast said:

For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing...

Suergaz said:

Why?

---

Because the 'thing' would have a definite starting and ending point on its existence in way of the form of the actual thing.

True infinity cannot be perceived by our minds. One could count for the rest of their lives and reach numbers most have never thought of, but the actual system of numbers is what makes it linear...endless. True infinity is not linear, possibly it encompasses all of everything, but holds no bound to particular form, so, in a sense, it would encompass nothing as the finite mind would understand...only the endless would be comprehensible.

I revert to visualizing the cube of space when I think of 'true' infinity, (I know my visualization is not a correct representation because there is a common starting point, and ultimately not without bounds) but nonetheless, it represents, to me, an existence on all possible planes at the same time, boundless, never changing, just being what it is-which is something my mind will never be able to fully comprehend.

Utter confusion...

Edited by: cassiopeiae at: 10/12/03 1:23 am

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 635

(10/12/03 1:08 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Love it, you, Zag, insisting on substantiation :-)

Quote:

---

Me: For something to be endless, it must be a thing...

You: Sure.

Me: ...and it must have a beginning.

You: Why?

---

Yep, perhaps I was reaching too far there as it could be beginningless.

Why not cancel out the 'beginning' and 'end' bits, then we're left with 'lessness'. That still only puts us some way towards infinity.

Quote:

---

Me: For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing...

You: Why?

---

Because it's thingness is a boundary.

Quote:

---

You: What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

Me: Nope, I'm saying that it is bounded by the fact that it is endless.

You: Same thing. Do you wear glasses?

---

20/20.

It's not the same thing. It is not bounded by the fact of what it is, it is bounded by the fact of the boundary you place upon it.

Quote:

---

So you think infinity is not finitely what it is?! Remember this doesn't contradict it being infinitely what it is!

---

You are talking nonsense.

There is no bridge between infinity and finity.

Quote:

---

Me: Boundlessness encompasses endlessness, everything and nothing; the vice versa case is semantically impossible.

You: Nope. You'll find it does. Come on, show me how you think it semantically impossible if you are going to maintain it!

---

It's quite simple. The 'end' part of the word endlessness is a boundary, a measurement, usually a temporal one. Thus referring to endlessness speaks only of a lack of measurement, usually of temporality. Boundlessness speaks of a lack of everything and nothing, including a lack of the lack of everything and nothing.

Quote:

---

You: Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness.
There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

Me: How very dualistic.

You: Hah! So you won't go against this huh?!

---

Go against what, your previous statement?

Read the last word in it.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 10/12/03 1:24 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1564

(10/12/03 1:10 am)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Cass:--

Quote:

---

True infinity cannot be percieved by our minds

---

Then how can you perceive that it is imperceivable?

Quote:

---

I revert to visualizing the cube of space when I think of 'true' infinity, (I know my visualization is not a correct representation because there is a common starting point, and ultimately not without bounds) but nonetheless, it represents, to me, an existence on all possible planes at the same time, boundless, never changing, just being what it is- which is something my mind will never be able to fully comprehend.

---

Metaphysics is within my sphere, but I do not 'utilize' it.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 115
(10/12/03 1:14 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

I said: True infinity cannot be perceived by our minds

Suergaz said: Then how can you perceive that it is imperceivable?

---

Because I know my mind is finite. The finite has no sense of the infinite.

Quote:

---

Suergaz said: Metaphysics is within my sphere, but I do not 'utilize' it.

---

One should utilize all the tools available to find the truth they seek...

Edited by: cassiopeiae at: 10/12/03 1:16 am

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1565
(10/12/03 1:31 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

YOU:--For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing...

ME:--Why?

YOU:--Because it's thingness is a boundary.

---

So you are saying boundlessness is not a thing?!

Quote:

---

ME: ---What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

YOU: ---Nope, I'm saying that it is bounded by the fact that it is endless.

ME:--- Same thing.

YOU:---It's not the same thing. It is not bounded by the fact of what it is, it is bounded by the fact of the boundary you place upon it.

---

Yes it is. I know you're brilliant, but my thingness shines brighter. You said that endlessness is bounded by the fact that it is endless. I said that the fact of what it is is the fact that it is endless. Read it again.

Quote:

---

ME:--So you think infinity is not finitely what it is?!
Remember this doesn't contradict it being infinitely what it is!

YOU:--You are talking nonsense.
There is no bridge between infinity and finity.

---

Of course there isn't a bridge between them, they're, like..doin' it.

Quote:

---

YOU: -Boundlessness encompasses endlessness, everything and nothing; the vice versa case is semantically impossible.

ME: -Nope. You'll find it does. Come on, show me how you think it semantically impossible if you are going to maintain it!

YOU:-It's quite simple. The 'end' part of the word endlessness is a boundary, a measurement, usually a temporal one. Thus referring to endlessness speaks only of a lack of measurement, usually of temporality. Boundlessness speaks of a lack of everything, including a lack of the lack of everything.

---

No, boundlessness does not speak of a lack of everything, but a lack of bounds. It does not lack itself (what you nonsensically call 'lacking the lack of everything')

Quote:

---

ME: Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness. There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

YOU: How very dualistic.

ME: Hah! So you won't go against this huh?!

YOU: Go against what, your previous statement?
Read the last word in it.

---

Measure. What of it? There is no boundary to the measure of endlessness, only to the measurer!

-----

Quote:

---

Cass: True infinity cannot be perceived by our minds

Suergaz: Then how can you perceive that it is imperceivable?

Cass:

Because I know my mind is finite. The finite has no sense of the infinite.

---

The finite does have sense of the infinite.

I love the people on this page! I can't help but substantiate my statements.

Edited by: suergaz at: 10/12/03 1:44 am

Huzington
Registered User
Posts: 5
(10/12/03 2:03 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Because I know my mind is finite. The finite has no sense of the infinite.

---

I think it mere rhetoric to say that the infinite cannot be comprehended by the finite. What is the reason for this?

The subject is determined by the object, its "other": but the subject and the object are the same and therefore the subject is in fact determined by itself; by which I mean, when the subject becomes object, it actually becomes itself. That is to say, it is self-determined. The unity of subject and object is therefore the True Infinite. Forasmuch as the subject is the finite, and its object is the infinite, it follows that the the unity of the finite and the infinite is the Infinite. Hence the finite is within the infinite; it is not something else. For this reason, the sublation of this distinction, i.e. the realisation of the sameness of the differences of the finite and the infinite - this is the True, self-determined Infinite.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1566

(10/12/03 2:13 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Huzington, you are a man of philosophy! (:D)

I have been meaning to ask you what you mean in the Nietzsche thread about darwinism.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 116

(10/12/03 2:17 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Huzington said: I think it mere rhetoric to say that the infinite cannot be comprehended by the finite. What is the reason for this?

---

There can be only an imagined perspective of the infinite, which, eventually, stops. A person cannot percieve Infinity, only create a representation of what it is to that particular person. No one can experience infinity, though, the true infinite includes all, without form. It can only be experienced through the finite-ness of perspective of the human mind.

Quote:

---

Huz said: The subject is determined by the object, its "other": but the subject and the object are the same and therefore the subject is in fact determined by itself; by which I mean, when the subject becomes object, it actually becomes itself. That is to say, it is self-determined. The unity of subject and object is therefore the True Infinite. Forasmuch as the subject is the finite, and its object is the infinite, it follows that the the unity of the finite and the infinite is the Infinite. Hence the finite is within the infinite; it is not something else. For this reason, the sublation of this distinction, i.e. the realisation of the sameness of the differences of the finite and the infinite - this is the True, self-determined Infinite.

---

I understand where you are going with this, but, the subject itself, cannot comprehend 'itself' on any other level than what it is, it cannot experience anything other than what it is...it would be like trying to explain what it is like to exist as a rock. It is incomprehensible because I am not a rock, though my essential makeup and its essential makeup are comprised of the same components, I exist as a human, the finiteness of my form restricts me to the limits of what I 'am'.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

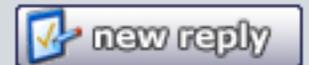

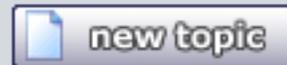

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Infinite - what is it?

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 636(10/12/03 2:19 am)Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> I don't think Godel's Incompleteness is a mere rhetorical device. This is an example of why the finite cannot fully comprehend infinity. If infinity is the totality, and we are necessarily a part of that, we have no frame of reference from outside of the totality and can therefore never fully comprehend it's nature with proveable consistency, via the use of the axiomatic system which is conceptualisation. It's the lame and blind man thing, turtles all the way down. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1567(10/12/03 2:37 am)Reply    |  Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> There can be only an imagined perspective of the infinite, which, eventually, stops. <hr/> No, the perspective is not only imagined, but actual, though it does, as you say, stop.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

Quote:

---

A person cannot perceive Infinity, only create a representation of what it is to that particular person.

---

Yes they can, and the representation of it to any other is just that. Perceiving is still perceiving, even if perception (here meaning the completion of the act) is stopped.

Quote:

---

No one can experience infinity, though, the true infinite includes all, without form. It can only be experienced through the finite-ness of perspective of the human mind.

---

Why not just say everyone and no-one experiences it?

Edited by: suergaz at: 10/12/03 2:39 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 637
(10/12/03 3:02 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Me: For 'something' to be boundless, it cannot be a thing...

You: Why?

Me: Because it's thingness is a boundary.

You: So you are saying boundlessness is not a thing?!

---

Nope, I'm saying that thingness is a boundary.

With regard to the thingness of a boundary, a boundary is a necessity of a thing, a fait accompli. That a boundary is a 'thing' in itself, a conception of mind, in no way invalidates its use as the best conception we have for finitely attempting elucidation on the nature of infinity.

Being a thing is a boundary. The concept of a boundary itself is a thing. Things are the only thing we can speak of. Being boundless is being thingless and thingful.

Your argument here is sophistry of a fairly low order. We are talking of two completely different levels detailed within the theory of semantic truth.

Quote:

---

You: What you are saying is that endlessness (of numbers, potatoes etc.) is bounded by the fact of what it is.

Me: Nope, I'm saying that it is bounded by the fact that it is endless.

You: Same thing.

Me: It's not the same thing. It is not bounded by the fact of what it is, it is bounded by the fact of the boundary you place upon it.

You: Yes it is. I know you're brilliant, but my thingness shines brighter. You said that endlessness is bounded by the fact that it is endless. I said that the fact of what it is is the fact that it is endless. Read it again.

---

Just did so, still maintaining.

It is not bounded by the fact of what it is, it is bounded by the fact that its conception refers to the quality of measurement and the lack thereof, as I've already said. This is far too specific and narrow a conception.

Quote:

---

You: So you think infinity is not finitely what it is?!
Remember this doesn't contradict it being infinitely what it is!

Me: You are talking nonsense.
There is no bridge between infinity and finity.

You: Of course there isn't a bridge between them, they're, like..doin' it.

---

LOL, like it.

That the finite is necessarily a part of the infinite is not a vice versa case.

If there is a bridge, the traffic moves in one direction only.

Quote:

---

Me: Boundlessness encompasses endlessness, everything and nothing; the vice versa case is semantically impossible.

You: Nope. You'll find it does. Come on, show me how you think it semantically impossible if you are going to maintain it!

Me: It's quite simple. The 'end' part of the word endlessness is a boundary, a measurement, usually a temporal one. Thus referring to endlessness speaks only of a lack of measurement, usually of temporality. Boundlessness speaks of a lack of everything, including a lack of the lack of everything.

You: No, boundlessness does not speak of a lack of everything, but a lack of bounds. It does not lack itself (what you nonsensically call 'lacking the lack of everything')

---

Sophistry, the desperate variety.

As in the context of the conversation, where endlessness refers to the lack of measure, boundlessness refers to the lack of everything and nothing, which includes a lack of the lack of everything and nothing. It lacks boundaries, which also encompasses the non-lack of boundaries. (Please refer to my pedantic edit which was made before you posted this.)

It's not nonsense, it just sounds like it due to the nature of the subject material. I can see why it's hard for you [(:D) to coin a phrase].

Quote:

---

You: Endlessness is not bound by the fact of its endlessness. There is no end to the fact, no boundary to its measure!

Me: How very dualistic.

You: Hah! So you won't go against this huh?!

Me: Go against what, your previous statement? Read the last word in it.

You: Measure. What of it? There is no boundary to the measure of endlessness, only to the measurer!

---

Your consistent sophistry points towards the shaky grounds of your arguments. Though I'm suprised you haven't reverted to you normal equivocation yet.

We're all measurers. When we speak of the unmeasurable, we should try to use words that don't imply measurement, or even the lack of measurement. Measurement has nothing to do with infinity itself, only it's unmeasurability. Referring to it's quality of unmeasurability refers to only one of it's aspects.

Hence endlessness is not a satisfactory designation for the infinite.

Boundlessness implies no limitation whatsoever, and if no limitation is a limit, then it implies a lack of that too. It is therefore as close as we'll get.

This all reminds me of that time we weren't allowed to play chess :-)

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 10/12/03 3:31 am

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1203
(10/12/03 3:12 am)
Reply

 ---

---

I seems to me, the idea of the infinite was an invention from the start (not knowing the actual recorded history). One person had the bright idea of some unending process, length of an object, or large number relative to what he/she knows of the finite world. Of course, none of these are truly infinite. They would have to have no beginning from which to extrapolate, as Dave Toast said. And nothing beyond these ideas has ever been shown or even hinted to exist outside of our imagination.

Regardless, my head has exploded, and I am busy picking up the pieces.

Tharan

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 117
(10/12/03 3:27 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

I said: There can be only an imagined perspective of the infinite, which, eventually, stops.

Gaz said: No, the perspective is not only imagined, but actual, though it does, as you say, stop.

---

The perspective is actual, but the 'idea' which creates the perspective has come from the imagination. A true perspective cannot exist since we cannot percieve it in its true form (or lack thereof)

Quote:

---

I said: A person cannot percieve Infinity, only create a representation of what it is to that particular person.

Gaz said: Yes they can, and the representation of it to any other is just that. Perceiving is still perceiving, even if perception (here meaning the completeion of the act) is stopped.

---

A person cannot perceive True Infinity. The perceptions of it are false, because of the stopping and starting points of the perception. There can be no perception that is true in matters of True Infinity...only a false representation thereof.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1568
(10/12/03 3:41 am)
Reply

Re: ---

It's 3.47, I'm crashing.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1569
(10/12/03 12:02 pm)
Reply

---

Dave, what you call my sophistry is not at all. But it has made you pedantic as you have admitted. Infinity is endless.

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 18
(10/14/03 2:47 am)
Reply

Infinite? Endless? Don't agree with the difference.

Infinity is not real. Everything has a beginning, and an end. For you to see it and understand the beginning and end is impossible.

REASON:

If it has no beginning, It does not exist.

Are you going to give us that "Stuff existed before existence existed"?
Hardly a scientific view imho, only an excuse.

Endless is also not possible. As when time stops, and the universe collapses (reverses) into singularity, all your manmade endlessness' will have ended, completely and unconditionally. All your perceived infinities will also be gone, and a new unknown beginning to everything will engage.

I believe your infinity theories will turn out to be folded back upon themselves, proving a finite structure. A pretzel, a torus, a sphere..... ( I believe in the expanding sphere)

Defining the universe as infinite and numbers as endless is not my kind of argument. They are the same by definition imho and both also have a beginning, and the end has not been seen, but of course it is there.

REASON:

Nothing is infinite, and nothing lasts forever. This is a basic animal instinct, a knowledge, a given, and is probably right for that reason. We didn't invent it, it empirically presents itself everywhere, in all structures of space, time and matter.

EMPIRICAL EVIDENCE:

If the universe is "Expanding" as any number system is expanding (Into Endlessness), it too shares the exact same details for your argument for endlessness, but not for Infinity. So "I" think they should share the same word meaning.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 649

(10/14/03 9:03 am)

Reply

Re: Infinite? Endless? Don't agree with the difference.

---

I'm not sure if you've really understood what has been said.

Quote:

---

Defining the universe as infinite and numbers as endless is not my kind of argument. They are the same by definition imho and both also have a beginning, and the end has not been seen, but of course it is there.

---

Nobody has defined the Universe as infinite, it is the Totality that may be described that way. If you know a way out of that conclusion, you should detail it.

Of course it is correct to say that nothing is infinite but the totality is the only 'thing' which cannot be a thing.

Quote:

---

If the universe is "Expanding" as any number system is expanding (Into Endlessness), it too shares the exact same details for your argument for endlessness,

---

Yes indeed. Just as an endless number sequence is finite, so the Universe is finite.

Quote:

---

but not for Infinitat. So "I" think they should share the same word meaning.

---

Wouldn't this entail the opposite conclusion then?

-----

Quote:

---

Infinity is not real. Everything has a beginning, and an end. For you to see it and understand the beginning and end is impossible.

---

Agreed, although I think we mean a different thing when we both say 'real' and 'every-thing'.

Quote:

---

REASON:

If it has no beginning, It does not exist.

---

Ditto for 'exist'.

Quote:

---

Are you going to give us that "Stuff existed before existance existed"? Hardly a scientific view imho, only an excuse.

---

I'm not sure what you mean.

Quote:

---

Endless is also not possible. As when time stops, and the universe collapses (reverses) into singularity, all your manmade endlessness' will have ended, completely and unconditionally. All your perceived infinities will also be gone, and a new unknown beginning to everything will engage.

---

So that would mean that there is, in fact, no beginning and no end then, right?

Quote:

---

I believe your infinity theories will turn out to be folded back upon themselves, proving a finite structure. A pretzel, a torus, a sphere..... ( I believe in the expanding sphere)

---

Agreed, the theories can only be constructed within a finite structure. There is no need for them to turn out like that because they are already like that.

What do you mean when you say you "believe in the expanding sphere"?

rushdl

Registered User

Posts: 20

(10/14/03 11:38 am)

Reply

 Re: Infinite? Endless? Don't agree with the difference.

---

I think I cheated by speaking of Time stopping and the universe collapsing. I need to stay within those bounds, while it's known that it may be like the breath, expand, contract, etc...

Thanks for taking time, and I'll have to come back after reading this thread a few more times.... HaHa, your right, I've missed a few excellent points.

The Expanding Sphere Universe: Big bang, outward expansion, spherical in nature... The center being where the singularity "was", and may be again once the contraction completes. I believe there has been some work done to try to locate this area.

You know this really messes up time travel as well. Imagine that you calculated the rotation of the earth so you would now only be able to move in One year increments, or you'd be left in the atmosphere, bloated and irradiated! But now imagine needing to know the unknown (constant or variable) of the expansion rate. This whole solar system is probably Zinging along at some Awesome rate of speed, and in what direction I dont know.

Any evidence on that?

---

So that would mean that there is, in fact, no beginning and no end then, right?

---

This is where I think I cheated. Gimme some time on that.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1577

(10/14/03 11:42 pm)

Reply

 ---

---

rushdl, an end and a beginning to everything doesn't mean that infinity isn't, only that the finite is.

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 652(10/15/03 12:22 am)Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> Indeed. And the fact that the finite is, means that infinity must be.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1210(10/15/03 2:28 am)Reply                                                                                 |  Re: --- <hr/> How so? Did I miss something? How is the infinite derived from the finite?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| rushdl Registered UserPosts: 22(10/15/03 6:33 am)Reply      |  Re: --- <hr/> Silly boy. Remove the "In"!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| rushdl Registered UserPosts: 23(10/15/03 6:44 am)Reply    |  SugarZ <hr/> Does that actually sound like sewergas? I like SugarZ! -- an end and a beginning to everything doesn't mean that infinity isn't, only that the finite is. -- I must cog. on that a bit too. But here is more. Faith in God, and the scriptures indicate that life everlasting is the ticket. This is an interpretation of infinity, me tinks. And by denying infinity, I may have just sinned a biggie! I cannot deny infinity, I think, if I leave out the collapse of the universe. Also, If time stood still, would you all consider that infinity? I would not, and I would, all in the same breath. But theoretically, it MUST go forever, but |

|                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                              | forever would not exist, only the Now, for infinity!         Damn, I liked that one. How can now and forever exist in the same moment? Liek a heirarchial structure, one must/could encompass the other, yes?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| birdofhermes         Registered User         Posts: 958         (10/15/03 7:14 am)         Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> Toast: And the fact that the finite is, means that infinity must be. Wolf: How so? Did I miss something? How is the infinite derived from the finite? Well, I don't know what Toast has in mind, but I'd say that the existence of finite things points to infinity, as there is no other way for them to get here. And a second reason, is that you cannot have and end to finitude. There is always going to be something after that thing, and before that thing, at least in the imagination.                                                                           |
| WolfsonJakk         Registered User         Posts: 1211         (10/15/03 9:02 am)         Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> So the very existance of finite things presupposes infinity or perhaps even divinity? I don't think so. More likely is a mere low level energy field permeating space (area between existant objects) that allows for quantum events which seem to be spontaneous and "from nothing." That is probably how things got here. Does the matter/energy of the universe collapse and expand in a Big Bang type scenario at intervals? Maybe, maybe not. But the fact that energy coalesces into matter does not seem to intrinsically correlate to any type of geographical infinitude. |
| birdofhermes         Registered User         Posts: 960         (10/15/03 10:01 am)         Reply |  Re: --- <hr/> More likely is a mere low level energy field permeating space (area between existant objects) that allows for quantum events which seem to be spontaneous and "from nothing." That is probably how things got here. Where did this low level energy field come from?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

|                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1212(10/15/03 12:28 pm)Reply                                                                               |  Re: --- <hr/> A stack of turtles?                                 |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 653(10/15/03 9:27 pm)Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> And therein lies the answer to your question Wolf. |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

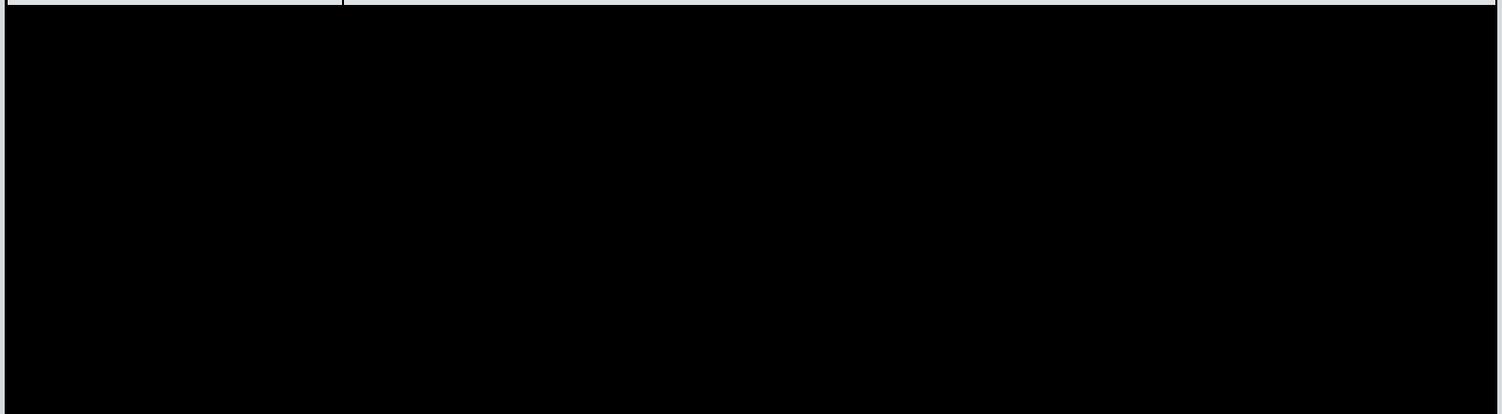

> The Infinite - what is it?

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1578(10/15/03 11:13 pm)Reply |  --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> How can now and forever exist in the same moment? Like a heirarchial structure, one must/could encompass the other, yes? <hr/> Now is the moment, that is how. oww, things is like wow goin' down |

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 654
(10/16/03 12:10 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

"What is infinite about endlessness is only the endlessness itself"
Wittgenstein.

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

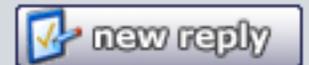

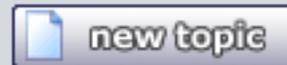

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Jesus Christ Code ! ©

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Caesarsquitti Posts: 7(4/5/04 2:33 am) Reply  | The Jesus Christ Code ! © <hr/> The Jesus Christ Code ! © With the movie of "The Passion" in the headlines, perhaps we can take a moment to move beyond the picture and reflect on the message of one who proclaimed to be "the way and the truth", "the light of the world". The star of the movie came to this world some two thousand years ago, a king born in a stable, who was crowned with thorns, falsely labeled as a threat to the King of the day, and died proclaiming to be the way to The Truth. For centuries philosophers have failed to grasp, that “ The Truth” in the infinite sense is constant only in a point in time. The Truth does expand as time continues. The Truth is relative to time and space, yet can be absolute somewhat consistent to Einstein's theory of relativity. But the key to unlocking this facet of truth lies in being able to differentiate between Truth, and a truth. Reality is that we as humans are not privy to "The Truth" in the infinite sense. We know merely parts of it. Upon these truths we use human logic to suggest many other Truths and we can still error. Truth is not black and white, for we can only see some of the different colors of it, and sometimes even the gray areas. The understanding of Truth can be more understood when one establishes a metaphoric link between the concept of Truth and LIGHT. Light as in Truth can be refracted in the many colors of the rainbow with its shades and | shadows, exposing a dark side to truth; The anti-truth or half-truth (the current definition is incomplete) statements and words that polarize issues and deceive us.

Modern day examples include the following examples. The campaign aimed dealing with family violence “stopping violence against women” excludes general abuse and totally ignored “men and children” . The philosophy that discrimination is wrong, ignores the discrimination forms that are rational and morally correct. The statement that “We are equal” is a literal half-of-the-truth, ‘We are equal before God or the Law’. The biblical example of Jesus as king, referred to the King of Heaven and not of Rome.

Truth is like taking an apple from the Tree of Truth, and forgetting that there are many, many more apples still on the tree, unknown to us that may deceive us ! The history of mankind is plagued by inability of humanity to move beyond this philosophical flaw about the concept of Truth. The history of mankind is a monument to the many errors of logic and truth.

We must move beyond the current paradigms surrounding Truth as we did regarding the belief that the world was the center of the Universe. This example is still with us when we speak of a 'sunrise' for it is based on the days when we believed the world was flat. In reality the sun does not rise.

In an interesting play of words that the star of "The Passion" the supposed son of God rose from the darkness of death, the reality is that truth is not flat but circular and dimensional as is the earth and the universe !

The bottom line is that human truth can lie; a paradox befitting the message from the star of The Passion whose life was a paradox and whose message will one day explain the deception from the Garden of Eden, when and where mankind was deceived about Truth.

The way to understanding the negative and positive ( + ) properties of Truth may be found within the properties of LIGHT, by one who proclaimed to be "The Light of the World"- the Jesus Christ Code.

THE LIGHT: The Rainbow of Truth !

Caesar J. B. Squitti

Son of Maryann Rosso & Arthur Squitti

voce io

Registered User
Posts: 867
(4/5/04 5:12 am)
Reply

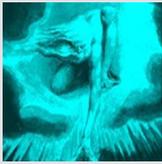

...

---

I'm a bit lost. Why are you typing this, and what does knowing this do for you?

primus meridian

Posts: 13
(4/5/04 7:42 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Thanks for the post and the belief in Jesus the Christ. I too believe wholeheartedly in the path to Christhood, the Buddha consciousness and the inherent divinity within each and every one of us, which Jesus Christ proclaimed quote:

"Look not for the Kingdom here, look not for the Kingdom there; for the Kingdom of God is within you."

The path to Enlightenment, the path to the acknowledgement and becoming of each and every one of our own particular Godhood within lay very much within the messages which these ascended beings and many others throughout time, Jesus Christ, Buddha, etc., came to deliver. Buddha greatly expounded upon the concept of Enlightenment.

However, some of these analogies that you point out do not seem to be above the world's standards of thought, as is taught in the spiritual traditions throughout the world. You are taking something divine and turning it into something of the world, when it should be the world's ways that are transforming into the ways of divinity. That's just my opinion.

Edited by: primus meridian at: 4/5/04 7:45 am

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1681

(4/5/04 9:26 am)

Reply

Re: The Jesus Christ Code ! ©

---

Caesar wrote:

Quote:

---

The Jesus Christ Code ! ©

---

Jesus Christ.

Quote:

---

With the movie of "The Passion" in the headlines, perhaps we can take a moment to move beyond the picture and reflect on the message of one who proclaimed to be "the way and the truth", "the light of the world".

---

Indeed, let's do that.

Quote:

---

The star of the movie came to this world some two thousand years ago,

---

Actually, the star of the movie, Jim Caviezel, an actor, came here fairly recently. The person the movie was based on was born some 2,000 yeats ago. Sorry to be so pedantic.

Quote:

---

a king born in a stable, who was crowned with thorns, falsely labeled as a threat to the King of the day, and died proclaiming to be the way to The Truth.

---

I don't think he was falsely accused of being a threat to the king of the day at all. Obviously he was since he was a threat to the overall cultural paradigm, despite the "give to Ceaser what is.... etc etc" statement.

Quote:

---

For centuries philosophers have failed to grasp, that "The Truth" in the infinite sense is constant only in a point in time. The Truth does expand as time continues. The Truth is relative to time and space, yet can be absolute somewhat consistent to Einstein's theory of relativity.

---

Fortunately, I didn't understand a word of that.

Quote:

---

But the key to unlocking this facet of truth lies in being able to differentiate between Truth, and a truth. Reality is that we as humans are not privy to "The Truth" in the infinite sense.

---

Oh yes, and how do you know that? Don't answer, you'll just contradict yourself.

Quote:

---

We know merely parts of it.

---

Oh yes, and how to you know this? As above.

Quote:

---

Upon these truths we use human logic

---

Actually I use entirely inhuman logic to ascertain my truths; or, so it seems....

Quote:

---

to suggest many other Truths and we can still error.

---

Yes, and we can be right, too.

Quote:

---

Truth is not black and white,

---

I think it is entirely black and white that Truth is black and white.

Quote:

---

for we can only see some of the different colors of it, and sometimes even the gray areas.

---

If you can see a gray area, is it still gray?

Quote:

---

The understanding of Truth can be more understood when one establishes a metaphoric link between the concept of Truth and LIGHT. Light as in Truth can be refracted in the many colors of the rainbow with its shades and shadows, exposing a dark side to truth; The anti-truth or half-truth (the current definition is incomplete) statements and words that polarize issues and deceive us.

---

My good fortune at lacking understanding has visited me once again.

Quote:

---

Modern day examples include the following examples. The campaign aimed dealing with family violence “stopping violence against women” excludes general abuse and totally ignored “men and children”.

---

Indeed, so is that fact black and white or one of those "gray" areas?

Quote:

---

The philosophy that discrimination is wrong, ignores the discrimination forms that are rational and morally correct.

---

Or, more to the point, that philosophy thoroughly contradicts itself and is impossible to put into practice.

Quote:

---

Truth is like taking an apple from the Tree of Truth, and forgetting that there are many, many more apples still on the tree, unknown to us that may deceive us!

---

So, an apple a day keeps untruth at bay?

Quote:

---

The history of mankind is plagued by inability of humanity to move beyond this philosophical flaw about the concept of Truth. The history of mankind is a monument to the many errors of logic and truth.

---

I agree with that, which kind of scares me.

Quote:

---

We must move beyond the current paradigms surrounding Truth as we did regarding the belief that the world was the center of the Universe. This example is still with us when we speak of a 'sunrise' for it is based on the days when we believed the world was flat. In reality the sun does not rise.

---

We've never really believed the world to be flat. That's a nifty little historical fabrication. We've known the world was "spherical" since the days of the Ancient Greeks. Apart from not knowing that, your other problem is that your examples are essentially empirical in nature and the concept of Truth doesn't apply to them at all.

Quote:

---

In an interesting play of words that the star of "The Passion" the supposed son of God rose from the darkness of death, the reality is that truth is not flat but circular and dimensional as is the earth and the universe!

---

How do you know the Universe is circular?

Quote:

---

The bottom line is that human truth can lie; a paradox befitting the message from the star of The Passion whose life was a paradox and whose message will one day explain the deception from the Garden of Eden, when and where mankind was deceived about Truth.

---

No such place or events existed, Get real.

Quote:

---

The way to understanding the negative and positive ( + ) properties of Truth may be found within the properties of LIGHT, by one who proclaimed to be "The Light of the World"- the Jesus Christ Code.

---

Interesting interpretation of things. Silly, but interesting.

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 4/5/04 9:27 am

Caesarsquitti

Posts: 8

(4/5/04 11:58 am)

Reply

Re: The Jesus Christ Code ! ©

---

There is some 7 new definitions of half-truth that move beyond the definition i encountered some 15 years ago in 'the books'...

Take a look, take your time, it took me some 15 years to figure it out...

How truth can lie, that is !!

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1682

(4/5/04 1:39 pm)

Reply

Re: The Jesus Christ Code ! ©

---

A couple of examples other than those in your initial post would be nice. I'm having trouble taking you seriously at this juncture - as you may have noticed :)

Dan Rowden

Caesarsquitti

Posts: 9

(4/6/04 12:44 am)

Reply

Truth can LIE!

---

The USA and Canada have a democracy.

We have a free vote. This is a truth.

But the system does not empower 'the people'. Here in Canada we elect local representative, each whom belongs to a party. The party that gets the most representatives, "FORMS" the government and their leader becomes Prime Minister. He or she gets all the power, selecting judges and Senators. The people do not have the power, and for that matter neither do the representatives elected. In most all cases, they MUST vote on party line or face discipline.

Statistical representations are often used to use a truth to conclude a FALSE TRUTH, you not only generalize but you exclude truths that are counter to your arguement...

Naturyl

Posts: 185

(4/6/04 2:38 am)

Reply

Re: Truth can LIE!

---

Ted Jesus Christ God is ORDERING and DEMANDING and COMMANDING and INSISTING and PUSHING 100% and SHOUTING and JUDGING that we have to keep slamming down NUKES on World Earth until Satan and the Demons are ALL Dropped or Killed!

wypleader.freesevers.com/

Caesarsquitti

Posts: 12

(4/6/04 9:15 pm)

Reply

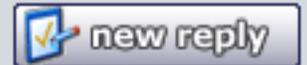

Re: Truth can LIE!

---

"The Truth" in the infinite sense from the perspective of God would be black and white...we cannot see that well....

|                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1690(4/7/04 11:05 am)Reply  | Re: Truth can LIE! <hr/> Speak for yourself, Caesar. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 252(4/8/04 3:07 am)Reply                                                                              | re: <hr/> "Statistical representations are often used to use a truth to conclude a FALSE TRUTH, you not only generalize but you exclude truths that are counter to your arguement..." But surely to use a truth to a false end is merely lying, not telling a 'false truth'--the truth itself is not false, but it is used out of context to suggest something that is false. In a more ordered, logical language such fallacies are easier to spot--mathematical proofs are considered solid because they rely only on a few assumptions and every other step must be rigorously proved. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 499(1/30/04 10:23 am)Reply |  The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality. <hr/> Definition – Ultimate reality is that which essentially real. Ultimate wisdom is really what the QRS are on about not reality. I sometimes speak of energy waves as if they were not a thing, but they have some form of physical presence, so by definition they are a thing. Personally I know we do not fully understand anything that is tiny and in wave pattern, even light. Indeed we do not fully understand anything physical at all. The wave effect is just whatever it is that allows movement. It may not be a wave it may be some sort of spinning object with a form of perpetual motion. It may also be that the entire universe just consists of differently combined units of positive and negative (as nouns), where energy/matter = groups of greater positiveness and negative=is what we think of as emptiness. We simply can't recognise that emptiness is 'full' because we consist almost entirely of positive matter. I believe the universe and everything in it pulses from empty to full, it actually has to for it to be infinite in size and time. We see this action at the macro level in everything we are able to recognise. It is a universal principle. The underlying cause of all things that exist is movement. |

Another option is that matter may form out of so called emptiness, purely because matter is that part of the void which spins at a slower speed than emptiness, and all different forms of matter and energy are created by different speeds of the spinning void, with the densest material having the lowest speed. The slower the void speed the more opportunity for the void to intertwine with itself. The universe may be like an air pressure system based on speed. Matter can move through the void only because there is no opportunity for matter to intertwine with the faster void and is repulsed, giving movement.

Or it could be the reverse of this whereby fast spin is what allows the creation of physical things because the action is so much greater - come to think about it and if what I've said below is correct, it is more likely to be the reverse of the above...whatever...it is the principle of movement that counts.

The spectrum of existence may begin with a single wave thing that will automatically join with other wave things in a Fibonacci sequence when for whatever reason they come in contact with another wave. Different forms of energy/matter form when different combinations of wave sets can merge into each other like keys in locks.

They continue to join until collisions of larger units of matter of a certain configuration hit them and break them apart, somewhat like how the sun produces light/radiation but at an even smaller level.

As the cause and effect process applies to all individual things it is also likely to apply to universe as a whole. Physical negativeness is the cause and positiveness is the effect. Scientifically, I think that understanding the nature of black holes is paramount to understanding the nature of the universe and its timelessness. I'm thinking that anti-matter and black holes are collections of combined units of negativeness(causes), and that all other things are collections of positiveness (effects). Above these sits the totally of the cause and effect process which is movement. If say a black hole is created by the immediate collapse of an enormous star, then the speed of that collapse causes the positive matter to turn into negative matter. Although negativeness exists everywhere, it cannot group without the application of intense speed. This occurs because the implosional speed is so great that the denseness of the black hole allows very little movement at the sub-atomic level under the crust of the black hole. Negativeness is the near absence of movement. With a complete absence of movement the universe cannot exist. So when a black hole has sucked up all or most of the surrounding positive matter over trillions of years and changed it into aggregated negative matter, due to near absence of movement the negative matter explodes into positive matter, aka the big bang and the cycle starts again.

Why would it explode, I think the key may be the word 'near', perhaps what actually happens is that the black hole crust is weakened sufficiently on one side while another side remains active, and the black hole structure becomes imbalanced, causing a chain reaction of movement. The black hole becomes unbalanced as there are competing black holes sucking up positive matter, so on one side an old black hole may still be sucking up positive material while on the other side a completing black hole has removed the matter that would keep the black hole active.

Actually, a more probable scenario for the cause of an explosion is that competing black holes collide at sufficient speed to tear them apart.

Another one is that black holes spin because the surrounding matter is not in a perfect circle, so as they such up material the force of the material slamming into it from a particular angle cause it spin in a particular direction. Eventually though this material has all been sucked into the black hole and its momentum dies. The core of the black hole still has some movement and once the rotational speed has slowed to a sufficient extent, then the constrained matter can then break out as there is no competing rotational speed to keep it in place. Like an atomic bomb it may only take the release of a few anti-atoms to set up the chain reaction.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/30/04 10:37 am

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 500

(1/30/04 10:58 am)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

All other physical laws are caused by the Natural Law of Movement.

Physics is the study of movement, using maths.

Time is the movement of matter within space and between objects.

Movement creates time, for without movement there is no time, the faster the movement of an object the faster the time relative to slower objects.

Without movement gravity would not exist.

Chemistry deals with the collision of different atomic materials moving at different speeds.

Different elements are created by differing speeds of movement, sometimes via the speed of atoms colliding with each other and sometimes by the external activity of material colliding with other material differing speeds.

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                      | Temperature is caused by the movement or lack of movement of matter within itself and outward.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2146(1/30/04 12:51 pm)Reply  | Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality. <hr/> The collision of my spit ball in your ear would not be dealt with to your satisfaction i'm certain. Everyone already knows movement alone is immutable.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1358(1/30/04 12:58 pm)Reply                                                                             | Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality. <hr/> Great thoughts. I like it. You're a puzzle, Jim.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 522(1/31/04 6:09 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality. <hr/> I bit of expansion on a couple of points. I'm pretty sure I could apply the overall concept to anything. Heat Heat is a figment of our imagination. What causes heat - in my view heat is simply the degree of ability the atomic structure and sub atomic structure has to break down or combine. The breakdown of this structure or its formation into a different compound results in the transfer of matter internally and outward. Take petrol for example. The application heated oxygen via say a match results in a change in the atomic structure of the immediate vicinity of the application. It becomes more volatile resulting in a chain reaction throughout the rest of the petrol. The lit match also appears to have heat, but only because the striking of that match against a certain form of atomic structure creates volatility within that immediate area, which again via a chain reaction sets the whole match tip alight. The striking of a match does not cause a chain reaction in the air, so that the entire atmosphere is heated up, only because the right match of speed and structure to cause atoms/sub-atoms to disintegrate does not occur. |

It is like the cogs on a transmission with a million gears. You just can't get a the smallest gear to seamlessly flow into the largest gear without the application of sufficient speed, you'll crunch the gears, however if you slam the gear into place it will often work. You have the application of movement and structure. Again what holds the structure in place is the same, speed and structure -each atom/sub-atom consists of bits spinning at different speeds and with different structures. When something external is brought into the structure, as per chemistry AND by the application or removal of force, like in the manufacture of diamonds, compounds can change form. Note that chemistry often requires force, even the pouring of a chemical into a beaker and stirring it is a force. It is the molecular configuration that determines what goes with what, and what are molecular configurations but keys and locks.

Everything is created by a chain reaction, as everything is cause and effect and all cause have past causes. Thus we have the butterfly flapping its wings saying.

We feel heat/cold only through our sense of touch, which is a chemical reaction, ultimately though what underlies that chemical reaction is changes in structural positiveness and negativeness.

Gravity

Gravity is an effect of the cause of matter transfer. It does not inherently exist as a force.

Rather the appearance of gravity is the net balance of these competing movements:

1. A structure breaking down and emitting 'something' from itself that hits something else causing the object to move in the direction in which it strikes the object, as per light/radiation from a star

and

2. The sum of the internal collapse of it's atomic structure causing it to shrink and become more dense, causing a form of vacuum, which allows a smaller or less dense object to travel down the path of least distance towards it.

and

3. The ability of the structure that is being bombarded to match up with the material that is being emitted from the other structure. Taking the Sun and Earth as an example, the light that is emitted from the sun being of such a small size and travelling at such a speed has a greater degree of ability to force itself into the structure it hits. The ability of light to move the object it hits in the same direction is decreased because of the ever so small size of the light energy. The speed of the light waves hit at such force that it easily forces itself into the slower spins of matter on earth. Thus, for example, on the crust there is light, but at the bottom of the sea there is little. Also some light will hit and will be reflected in other directions. Being successful in slamming a gear into place does not work all the time.

and

4. The sum of the above causes from all other objects in the universe form all different angles, with the degree of effect varying due to distance and the size and density of each object creating different angles and quantities of matter striking another.

and

5. The degree of positiveness or negativeness of the source and target objects (really this fits into points 1-3 above, it is not really a separate cause, but has been thrown in to account for the gravitational distortions proven to exist). Collections of positive matter will produce different results than collections of negative matter (say anti-matter or a black hole). It may be the case that all matter consists of different degrees of positive and negative matter, highly likely when you consider electricity and the internal structure of atoms. Note: As pure guesswork, I apply the same reasoning to what we consider empty space, I just assume it is negative matter at its most basic level - it is not compound matter, unlike anything we regard as physical. So called energy might just be compounded negative matter, with a greater number of negative bits than positive.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 526
(2/1/04 5:09 pm)
Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

I was seaching for info about atoms today and came across this set of lectures.

Alice Bailey
The Consciousness of the Atom

beaskund.helloyou.ws/netn...m/toc.html

Table of Contents

The Field of Evolution
The Evolution of Substance
The Evolution of Form, or Group Evolution
The Evolution of Man, the Thinker
The Evolution of Consciousness
The Goal of Evolution
Cosmic Evolution

My ego greatly regrets finding this as 'The Evolution of Substance' lecture devalues what I thought I was at the very start of achieving above (and at a science forum, which I'm using to try and develop some consistency - it aint working though), in terms of a different way of looking at things.

I realise that this whole thing may be old hat to most people here, and there may be any number of books out there dealing with what I was getting at and what she is on about, but I haven't read any, so the idea of creating something from within myself appealed to me.

Nonetheless, my angle is a lot different in that, she, being feminine, has spun it into something that is fundamentally religious in nature, whereas my male angle is based on movement, or activity. The qualities and life of atoms she speaks of I believe are mere coincidences caused by different degrees of movement, rather than some inherent quality of the matter in question.

Lyrutan
Registered User
Posts: 4
(2/1/04 5:16 pm)
Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

You just make this shit up, though, right?

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 527

(2/1/04 5:18 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

I rather liked this Browning poem (you hypocrit Jim), because it tallies in with my idea the evolution is about us becoming gods.

"Thus He (God) dwells in all,
From life's minute beginnings up at last
To man - the consummation of this scheme
Of being, the completion of this sphere
Of life: whose attributes had here and there
Been scattered o'er the visible world before,
Asking to be combined, dim fragments meant
To be united in some wondrous whole,
Imperfect qualities throughout creation,
Suggesting some one creature yet to make,
Some point where all those scattered rays should meet Convergent in the faculties of man."

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2173

(2/1/04 5:36 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

Heat is a figment of our imagination.

What causes heat - in my view heat is simply the degree of ability the atomic structure and sub atomic structure has to break down or combine.

---

This is quality thought, in my view. It breaks down an everyday concept into its component parts and presents it an entirely new light.

It doesn't matter if this particular view of heat is old hat or not. It is coming from your own mind and shows that you appreciate the liberating qualities of logical analysis.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 529

(2/1/04 11:10 pm)

Reply

Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

Dan, Is it OK if I fill this thread up with the stuff from other forums? I'll post a few now, just say if you wish me to cease. It will slow down from here anyway.

---

Quote: Many states-like universe is also possible

That would make our observable universe simply a sub-universe, a cluster of galaxies. I think that is sci-fi myself but cannot prove it. In any case can you imagine any universe existing without movement, what would it be?

Quote: Good ol' sci-forums is still lively I see

I'm not sure what you were being sarcastic about, but if you were saying my post is lunacy then, how does any scientist develop any new idea, they build on the known and imagine what the unknown might possibly be. All new theories are developed this way or by accident. The trouble is people often go outside of what is logically reasonable, and this sometimes gets accepted as fact, purely because it temporarily resolves a dilemma.

---

If you want to get your ideas taken seriously, then you will have to formulate them in a more coherent form, preferably mathematical (which is probably the most logical and coherent possible form to write ideas in).

Crisp, well you are correct in terms of fashioning 'proof', but I am neither a scientist or a mathematician so to do as you suggest would take years.

Also I think the answer to most things is ultimately very simple. My aim is to describe the universe in the most simple terms possible. Something that everyone can understand. Personally I find the more you delve into detail, the further divorced you become from actually understanding it. The old forest from the trees scenario.

Yeah right.

Go walk over a hot metal plate and then we will see whose imagination it is a figment of.

A love these people. Do you know what you are. Lazy. You just want to sit in your armchair and think up the workings of the Universe and pretend you are doing physics.

We would all love to describe the Universe in simple terms, but it is the complicated which makes it so interesting.

So how does the metal plate you speak of 'feel' heat?

Imagine yourself as say a blind, deaf, paraplegic without smell and tell me how your leg would sense that it was dipped in acid. It is equivalent to what I've said above.

If you limit yourself to what humans can sense then you cannot see the whole picture.

---

The only thing of value to me posed was that it's all an imagination but this may belong more in the philosophy forum instead of here

I realised that in stating the fact that my knowledge was limited, it would immediately mean that people wouldn't properly consider what I'd written, but what is one to do, lie?

In saying that this may belong in the philosophy thread you may be right, although you are perhaps just saying that because you may have little regard for philosophy. Note however that philosophy and science were once the domain of the truly imaginative, the giants of the past, on which science is now based. Nowadays the imaginative is instantly rejected, unless one has some form of paper or position to prove their worth.

It is interesting that no-one as yet has come up with a valid argument to refute what I've said. I did expect someone would have a go and until they do I'll have to assume I may be correct.

If science consisted of what people perceived without measurement, then the spanish would still be having inquisitions.

I have no qualms with this. It is the daily work of scientists to measure things. It is the measurement of things that makes it useful.

Measurement of any type is also a way we can understand and use the effect of complex movements. But I won't go into that because it would take forever to explain.

---

Are you telling me that when I put a thermometer in something hot, it is my imagination that is making the mercury expand.

Not at all. But without the transferral of something physical into the mercury it would not expand. Nor am I suggesting the amount of matter transferred into the mercury is anywhere equal to the amount of increase in volume, due to the chain reaction effect I speak of between individual atoms/sub-atoms in the mercury. I'm just suggesting that heat is an effect of changes in the molecular structure of the mercury, and that these molecular changes occur only because of movement. In this particular case I would say that heat convection is the conceived effect, not actually the cause of the mercury expanding.

Basically I'm suggesting that forces do not exist. That force is just our way of visualising movement, it has no inherent existence. It always just represents the sum of movement.

I am not however suggesting that terms like heat, gravity, matter, energy, force are useless, far from it. I am merely indicating that to understand the true nature of the universe in a holistic fashion you need to go to the most base level. In effect you need to become a philosopher/physicist, because so few scientists adequately understand what the process of cause and effect really means. Few people actually realise that nothing can exist, even your thoughts, without the sum of all past causes having occurred. The universe does not flow forward through time, it merely continually changes configuration.

It might be that I'm just stating Newtons laws in another way, and expanding it to offer an explanation of why the universe could be infinite.

---

Your point about the frequency of folks offering theories is well taken - after looking around a bit I can see they are everywhere. There are a hell of a lot that reject the General Theory of Relativity if taken in the context of it's entirety, and the single Big Bang theory, and so do I. The thing is the vast majority of those theories are at the detail or specialist level, rather than the base level that I'm suggesting is worthy of consideration.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/1/04 11:35 pm

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 529

(2/1/04 11:16 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

Me: The universe does not flow forward through time, it merely continually changes configuration.

Response: Now this is an interesting use of words or angle. However how does this improve our understanding of reality? Or does it describe something that is already well described but using different words to describe it?

To me the statement proves, that a concept like 'will we ever be able to travel forward and backward through time' is completely irrational.

Although one can move pieces about on a chess board to a previous configuration, that is a very finite action. In essence you are not really creating the previous configuration but creating an illusion of the previous configuration, it looks the same but it is not, the chess pieces and the board have lost some atoms in the meantime due the friction of your fingers and, importantly, the air surrounding each piece is different. The air bit is important as it shows that all things have some form of interconnectedness, even where it is extremely indirect like the gravity of a distant galaxy affecting the gravity of our solar system. Galaxies are moving things, so the gravitational configurations are also changing.

Taking it a step further, to move back in time one would have to have the ability to move all the matter in the universe back into the position it once was. Clearly this is impossible, except if one were a god. But even the god scenario is impossible, for any such god would need to be separate from the universe, however if any god has any impact on anything in the universe at any time, then it is not separate from the universe, and thus becomes part of the definition of universe.

The above is just an example, a scientist with more detailed knowledge in particular areas may gain a better understanding of the true or falsity of say dark matter, red shifts, worm holes, the existence of matter older than the universe, and so on, if they considered things from the angle of changes in configuration, rather than matter and time.

The thought that comes to mind is : Do you assume that the "base level" hasn't already been considered? Your statement implies this I feel. When a person goes to university for 4 years the base level and a lot more are studied.

Scientists are a generally intelligent, knowledgeable people. Sure they study the base levels, but as soon as they have done so they move into something more detailed. The base knowledge is not forgotten, it is applied somehow in everything they do as they investigate streams of research flowing from this base knowledge.

What I'm suggesting in that implications of the base knowledge might not be fully understood. A great scientist is generally considered great because they improve on the understanding of the base level knowledge, Newton, Einstein etc. (Nonetheless it is still possible to say win a Nobel Prize is one deals in specific details). The problem is that I have read that only about 12 people in the world, **fully** understands Einstein's Theory of General Relativity. Who here can say they do?

---

And what caused movement in the first instance?

I'm working on this at the moment. It is extremely difficult. Might take a while and I may have no answer.

It is the essential question, that no-one has ever answered, unless they decide that faith in god is the answer - but lets not go into that.

I think my posts show that the universe **can** last infinitely, although this depends in a way on the existance of positive and negative matter, which it seems science admits probably exists. Note that it doesn't entirely depend on this though, as the multiple competing exploding black hole scenario could still work without interactions between negative and positive matter.

You may have described this earlier but can you explain how and why movement exists and how does it come to exist? What causes movement?

Depends if you believe everything has an equal and opposite reaction. I do, to me it is just another way of saying past causes cause new causes.

---

Do you propose that movement just magically occurs with out any physics involved?

No. There is no magic. This is why singularities are not logically consistent and why I won't bother researching that. It presumes no cause, it presumes magic.

Physics does not cause movement or even explain it at its base level, it explains and measures the process and allows predictions.

How does movement pass from one entity to the next without touching so to speak?

I don't believe it does, as I believe everything is somehow interconnected, meaning everything is inter-reacting with something else. Research appears to be saying that that is the case.

Einstein seems to agree:

From the UNITheory site

"Albert Einstein - address delivered on May 5th, 1920, in the University of Leyden

- More careful reflection teaches us, however, that the special theory of relativity does not compel us to deny ether. We may assume the existence of an ether.....

- Recapitulating, we may say that according to the general theory of relativity space is endowed with physical qualities; in this sense, therefore, there exists an ether.

- According to the general theory of relativity space without ether is unthinkable; for in such space there not only would be no propagation of light, but also no possibility of existence for standards of space and time (measuring-rods and clocks), nor therefore any space-time intervals in the physical sense."

I think the ether he refers to is negative matter or matter at its most base level, matter with a structure of one, in which no material can combine and form recognisable matter without the application of intense speed, perhaps speed greater than the speed of light as what might occur with the explosion of a black hole or some other such cause. It makes sense that a big bang would spurt out material in all directions and that this material would initially mostly consist of material with a unit of one, being the 'ether'. The force of the explosion being so great that it breaks up all the material of the black hole into unit of one, except for that part of the material which is at the core hits other material during the process of the explosion and combines into units of two or more. Again it might be the reverse, where material does not form until it has slowed sufficiently to allow one unit to match up with another. In this scenario the ether in our immediate galaxy system (or sub universe) would mostly consist of material that was propelled from other black holes outside of our sub-universe.

I believe light to consist of more than one unit (so we get a colour spectrum), of many more than one and thus we can sense it and can travel through the negative matter. Negative matter is said to exist in the 'space' between individual atomic segments and the sub-atomic segments as well. What I refer to as negative matter may simply be all matter that exists in a unit of one, however I am inclined to think of matter being negative and positive, due to what electricity is.

Here is a description of Electric Charge (not posted here), to me it all refers to changes in the configuration of material and any change in a material is caused by movement. The thing that causes this movement is the introduction of external matter being brought in that breaks the stasis of the material and changes the structure in some small way....or in the case of a nuclear explosion a large way . It is natural for things to balance out (as per the Law of Thermodynamics discussed in my next post and which your comment about entropy made me find...thanks for that). I see no reason for it not to be the basis of all the things we conceive of as energies and forces.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 530

(2/1/04 11:21 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

If nothing interacts how do you get movement?

I did think of a sort-of-answer to this question, but it is circumstantial, so I'll save that for when I put something together re your previous question of "what started movement in the first place, which ultimately relates to 'what is infinity'. Geez .

If everything interacts how can you NOT get movement?

Precisely what I've been saying.

Everything does not interact with everything else in a direct fashion though. A movement of an atom in the most remote galaxy known or even 1mm away, of course has zero direct interaction and almost zero indirect action, but it does effect directly something in it's immediate vicinity, which goes on to effect ever so slightly the next thing and so on. That's where the term convection comes from.

How do you answer questions about entropy?

I would refer to the Laws of Thermodynamics below. Lol, these laws are precisely what I was going on about.

Why didn't someone point me to them. Is this not just basic physics!!!!

I posted my initial post on another science forum and they haven't pointed this out either. Although it might be that no-one could be bothered, due to the problem of 'where would I start', but IMO it is circumstantial evidence that many scientists have become too far removed from the basics and perhaps even never fully understood the basics in the first place.

Thermodynamics Dictionary Definition: Physics that deals with the relationships and conversions between heat and other forms of energy.

This is where I deviate from that definition. I say it applies to everything and the universe as a whole, after all energy is matter and heat is an energy process and energy is simply a symbolic way of describing movement.

An explanation I got from another website on the laws of Thermodynamics.

Symmetry, Broken-Symmetry and the First and Second Laws of Thermodynamics

The laws of thermodynamics are special laws that sit above the ordinary laws of nature as laws about laws or laws upon which the other laws depend (Swenson & Turvey, 1991). It can be successfully shown that without the first and second laws, which express symmetry properties of the world, there could be no other laws at all.

The first law or the law of energy conservation which says that all real-world processes involve transformations of energy, and that the total amount of energy is always conserved expresses time-translation symmetry. Namely, there is something that unifies the world (constitutes it as a continuum) which if you go forward or backward in time remains entirely the same (Thought - except that the latter part of this statement is not possible).

It is, in effect, through this conservation or out of it that all real-world dynamics occurs, yet the first law itself is entirely indifferent to these changes or dynamics. As far as the first law is concerned, nothing changes at all, and this is just the definition of a symmetry, something that remains invariant, indifferent or unchanged given certain transformations, and the remarkable point with respect to the first law is that it refers to that which is conserved (the quantity of energy) or remains symmetric under all transformations. (I interpret this to mean that competing movements surrounding an object can and mostly do hold an object in place relative to other near objects. But this is only relative, as any object or group of objects is moving, so we see the universe expanding and contracting)

Entropy and the Second Law of Thermodynamics

The second law of thermodynamics (the entropy law or law of entropy) was formulated following Carnot's earlier observation that, like the fall or flow of a stream that turns a mill wheel, it is the "fall" or flow of heat from higher to lower temperatures that motivates a steam engine. The key insight was that the world is inherently active, and that whenever an energy distribution is out of equilibrium a potential or thermodynamic "force" (the gradient of a potential) exists that the world acts spontaneously to dissipate or minimize. All real-world change or dynamics is seen to follow, or be motivated, by this law.

So whereas the first law expresses that which remains the same, or is time-symmetric, in all real-world processes the second law expresses that which changes and motivates the change, the fundamental time-asymmetry, in all real-world process.

Clausius coined the term "entropy" to refer to the dissipated potential and the second law, in its most general form, states that the world acts spontaneously to minimize potentials (or equivalently maximize entropy), and with this, active end-directedness or time-asymmetry was, for the first time, given a universal physical basis. The balance equation of the second law, expressed as  $S > 0$ , says that in all natural processes the entropy of the world always increases, and thus whereas with the first law there is no time, and the past, present, and future are indistinguishable, the second law, with its one-way flow, introduces the basis for telling the difference.

Of important theoretical interest for this paper is the fact that Joule's experiment (Figure 2) while designed to show the first law unintentionally demonstrates the second too. As soon as the constraint is removed the potential produces a flow from the falling weight through the moving paddle through the thermometer. This is precisely the one-way action of the second law and the experiment depends upon it entirely. The measurement of energy only takes place through the lawful flow or time-asymmetry of the second law, and the point to underscore is that the same is true of every measurement process (Thought: No, not just measurement process, actually in everything). In addition, every measurement process also demonstrates the first law as well since the nomological relations that hold require something that remains invariant over those relations (or else one could not get invariant or nomological results).

The first and second laws are thus automatically given in every measurement process for the simple fact, in accordance with the discussion above, that they are entailed in every epistemic act

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 531

(2/1/04 11:24 pm)

Reply

 Re: The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

---

Last one, actually I won't post anymore questions and responses, except for whatever I might come up with theory-wise.

Me: What causes heat - in my view heat is simply the degree of ability the atomic structure and sub atomic structure has to break down or combine. The breakdown of this structure or its formation into a different compound results in the transfer of matter internally and outward. ”

A: The energy required for a bond to break/combine is bond strength. Something else entirely.

My response: Would then bond strength, not simply be a description of the degree of ability for something to break down due to it's molecular structure. Anything can be broken but it requires something physical to break it apart.

Me: Gravity is an effect of the cause of matter transfer. It does not inherently exist as a force. ”

A: It does actually (excluding at certain levels of energy, but then every force combines, so it's pretty irrelevant to mention it except in a quest for precision), but carry on.

My response: That is like saying gravity can sometimes exist without matter, but it usually requires matter. You are saying there are two forms of gravity, so this means gravity is not properly understood. IMO, for something to be inherent it must be able to have an existence of its own and it could not have two forms.

Me: A structure breaking down and emitting 'something' from itself that hits something else causing the object to move in the direction in which it strikes the object, as per light/radiation from a star ”

A: There is a theorised exchange particle for gravity (called the Graviton, appropriately enough), which is radiated from a mass like photons are radiated from a charged body. But decay has nothing to do with it.

My response: So you are admitting that there is an respectable theory that gravity exists because of something radiated, or moved out from a mass. For something to radiate outward its internal structure must change in some fashion, it doesn't do it because that is what it just does.

Me: The sum of the internal collapse of it's atomic structure causing it to shrink and become more dense, causing a form of vacuum, which allows a smaller or less dense object to travel down the path of least distance towards it. ”

A: Only in the sense that there exists a gravitational potential field, but not in the sense that you mean it.

My response: I'll look into that. It was a statement I was not entirely confident was accurate. I was wrong.

On another forum I made a couple of responses to some questions about my ideas, one section of which I talk briefly about the ether and light. I'll post them after this post.

After you've read them, this would be my response to your comment

Matter and energy such as light, can travel more or less effortlessly through any matter that exists in a unit of one, or very low combinations of units, purely because the larger matter cannot combine with the units of one. Perhaps all matter is in the form of the Fibonnacci sequence, which is as follows - 1,1,2,3,5,8,13,21,34,.....

I would however alter the sequence to be as follows -

1 negative, 1 positive, the base units of matter, then 2, 3,5,8,13,21,34,..... in effect this would make the number of elements and the periodic table infinite and each more complex configuration would be of a degree density.

Units of one cannot easily combine with any of these numbers, without the application of speed, however perhaps units form sequences outside of the fibonnacci ratio that is what causes anti-matter.

I imagine lower level combinations of the fibonnacci sequence are things like radiation, light and so on. When I say lower level it might not be 2,3,5,8,13 but much, much larger numbers of units. The fact that light can form a colour spectrum would indicate so. That we can even recognise atomic structures probably means that the number of units are quire large. Tools are still being developed to look closer at sub-atomic structures.

Elements can group together to form gases liquid and solids, when groups of like size come into contact with each other, for instance Hydrogen might have 21 base units and oxygen 8 base units, but because there are two hydrogen atoms and only one oxygen atom, they don't fully combine to form a new 'element' they create a new 'thing', like water. However what is this new substance but not simply a different form of matter, they could easily be called elements if we so wished.

That things may only join together in a fibonacci sequence might be a red herring, however I prefer to think that it is not otherwise I'm sure we would have discovered so many more base elements.

Here is a link about fibonacci in nature. I believe the things that are most common in nature tell us how to view all matter no matter how large or small.

<http://www.mcs.surrey.ac.uk/Persona...cci/fibnat.html>

Edited by: jimhaz at: 2/1/04 11:47 pm

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 532

(2/2/04 5:59 pm)

Reply

 Primer for The Theory of No First Cause

---

I'm posting these explorations because a) someone might be able to help and b) the deductive process I'm going through may help an understanding to 'click' in someone with more knowledge of philosophy and science than me.

Primer for The Theory of No First Cause

.....-3.22, -3.21, -3.1, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.21....

Here we have a sequence of numbers. Now what do numbers represent. It is a concept to represent things or parts of things of both a positive and negative existence.

- § 3 orang-utans
- § 2.3 children per household
- § -22.573 degrees Celsius.

Addition, division, multiplication etc are a way of representing changes to these numbers or changes to these things

- § 3 marsh mellows + 2 jelly beans = 5 lollies
- § 1 cm - 5 mm = 5 mm
- § 2 hydrogen atoms + 1 oxygen atoms = 3 atoms and also = water
- § 10% interest on $100 = $110 dollars
- § 3 times 3 = 3+3+3 = 9

Any conceptual change to numbers is mathematics, simply a tool, but any actual change to things is physical.

To change anything physical requires movement.

§ You weigh 120kgs but want to loose 30 kgs so you diet and exercise, in which case the fat and water moves out of your body.

§ Exercise makes you thirsty and hot so you make some ice cubes. The water in the ice tray changes structure through internal movement into ice.

§ The pond the water came from has 100,000 litres of water but a drought occurs and 50,000 litres evaporate into the air.

§ You own 1 house, but desire 2 more so you invest or work hard till you end up with enough money to buy another 5 houses. This all requires movement on your part and the part of others.

§ The solar system has 9 planets, which formed through the movement of matter into planetary balls.

§ The galaxy has 1 billion stars which formed through the movement of matter into stars.

Nothing that is greater or lesser comes out of thin air. It is transported from one place to another. Numbers symbolise and assist in measurement of these occurrences. Numbers do not inherently exist in their own right, a number is not a thing it is a representation of a thing.

In physical terms we cannot conceive of what infinity is, it is neither 'too big' or too small', it can only be represented as something unlimited or as something symbolic in a mathematical formulae.

Here is the sample sequence of numbers again

.....-3.22, -3.21, -3.1, -3, -2, -1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 3.1, 3.2, 3.21 ad infinitum

The numbers have no start or finish, but it does have a zero representing nothingness. If the sequence has no start or finish and zero is the point of nothingness, then logically the sum of the infinite negative numbers and the sum of the infinite positive numbers balance each other out.

Now apply this balancing out concept to physical things for otherwise it is a merely a concept.

For every house that is built the sum of material taken to build the house is exactly equal to that which has been taken away from somewhere else, including the energy used by the builders in the construction (they eat and drink). Material is taken from something to make that something negative of the thing taken out and put somewhere else to make the new thing positive.

Eventually the house gets old and is taken apart and moved somewhere else and a new house built.

This applies to all physical things. It is inconceivable for anything to exist without it being from material taken from elsewhere. There also was no vacant space created either, immediately material was taken from somewhere else it was replaced by air or some other material.

And so it is for the universe itself, for what is the universe but the sum of all individual things. Via the action of movement the universe takes from negative matter and makes it into positive matter, then takes from the positive matter and makes it negative matter and so on. As there is no net loss or gain the universe therefore must be everlasting.

Nature does not recognise things. To nature there is no difference between the roof of a house and the air surrounding it, or the air surrounding that air, or the earth or the solar system and so on. It is all one.

Although to nature there are no separate things, there is still something. It could be said nature has a division between matter and true emptiness, which I will attempt to explain later. (but later I suggest this is wrong)

Looking at the number series, and recognising that say between -1 and 0 and 0 and 1 there are an infinite number of fractions, and as numbers are simply a symbolic representation of the physical, then it follows that all physical things are of the nature of an infinite spectrum of matter. A spectrum is an ordered array of the components of an emission or wave.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 533

(2/2/04 6:01 pm)

Reply

 Primer Number Two

---

Primer Number Two

So is the universe infinite in size and what started the first cause?

I have an answer but it is very difficult for anyone to conceptualise, as such is the nature of the question. It is difficult to conceptualise for it is a complete reversal of the NEED for life to compartmentalise, which we all have done since the day we were conceived.

I doubt there will be any minds eyes out there that will accept my proposition, but I'll post it anyway.

The only way to try and explain this essential dilemma using words is via using the concepts of zero and infinity and the physical and mental concepts of negative and positive. There are some philosophers who have grasped it conceptually, in simply using the power of their brains, but I don't comprehend how it is done, it takes years of contemplation on the essential nature of things. The conclusions appear to be similar. Both methods require a kind of 'leap of faith', in the case I'm proposing it is 'that mathematics is the way in which humans both consciously AND unconsciously conceptualise reality'. In the case of philosophers it goes something along the lines of 'that to truly understand reality one must remove all emotional attachments so as to be able to what is', is not'. As mentioned I don't understand the philosophical method, so my definition may be incorrect.

Apart from zero, infinity, fractions and the number series itself, there are other ways in which we conceptual what is real, for instance in analytic geometry, 0 is the origin and the exponential  $x^0 = 1$ .

Although I've included fractions in the above number series, the truth is that in nature there are no fractions. An apple with one half taken away is not half an apple, to a human it has the properties of half an apple, but to nature it is simply that matter has moved from one place to another.

Aside from their conceptual meaning in mathematics, fractions are simply the human way of viewing spectrums as they exist in nature. Colours are fractions of light or electromagnetic waves, measurements degrees are fractions of the structure of circular things, temperature degrees are a way of viewing the relative 'heat' of something. "degrees of freedom" is a concept used in mathematics, physics and engineering, scale degrees in music are a way of defining notes, the electromagnetic spectrum is the power spectrum of an electromagnetic signal, in politics there is a political spectrum of thought from left to right wings.

They each signify a large range of points of measurement for a particular physical thing, mostly of which have no clear deliniation between one point to the next. I suggest that they are our conceptual way of identifying 'infinity' as it exists within finite things.

Negative and positive is a representation of an essential duality existing within the universe, recognisable in many forms. Cause/effect, passive/active, equal/opposite, male/female, life/death, positive/negative ions, elements/spirits, wave/particle properties within quantum mechanics, white/black, energy/matter, counscious/unconscious and so on.

A balance occurs when they are one or the other or are a conceived point on some form of spectrum. Each point on something that is part of a spectrum however, contains both negative and positive properties.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 534

(2/2/04 6:03 pm)

Reply

 Re: Primer Number Two

---

An Initial Attempt at Developing a Theory of No First Cause

Each thing within a universe is a fraction of the whole universe and the universe is the spectrum of all things, so logically it should then follow that nothingness cannot exist, just as we see there is no distinctly different point within any spectrum. A point of nothingness within the universe would be a disinctintly separate point and be outside of the spectrum of things.

If nothingness cannot exist, then the universe has no limits, for anything outside of the universe, could only be nothingness, otherwise it is part of the universe.

The universe and all things in it consist entirely of negative and positive matter. The sum of all infinite negative matter and infinite positive matter is zero. There is no cause that can make something that exists physically equal zero, however things can and do change from one state to another. Negative matter can change into positive matter and vice versa, but where this occurs an equal and opposite quantity of the opposite matter is created in the process, otherwise it would pass into zero or nothingness.

As things do change from one state to another, something must cause this. Zero is dividing 'non-point' in which the switch occurs, however as the point of zero can never be reached, then zero or nothingness becomes the creator of something, thus the universe is the created from nothingness.

But the above cannot occur, it does not make logical sense, so therefore the universe must create itself and must always have done this will always do this. In which case there would be no first cause.

A most unsatisfactory theory indeed, and wrong!
What a load of gobbly-gook!
Get real!

So I tried. The above lead me to the Almost Real answer.

The Almost Real Answer

Zero does not exist in nature and if zero does not exist then the only thing that can replace it is infinity.

Alas though, it is not the Absolute Answer!!!! Damn it

A paradox formed, the paradox of motion.

If space were truly full then there would be no movement as there would be no space in which something could move from A to B.

This question breaks the linkage I was trying to get to the illusion of our perception of all things physical.

I think the absolute answer relates to a proper understanding of electrical charge. I'm thinking movement is not real but another figment of our imagination.

The only answer to this paradox seems to be that all negative and positive units of one and configurations of imbalanced negative or positive compound units can change from negative to positive and that the appearance of movement is caused by the the configuration of these changes from one state to another. As all things are interconnected, then any change causes a pulse-like chain reaction in all other matter. There is no net change of the sum of the infinite positive and infinite negative units of one. Certain compound configurations of positive and negative are inherently stable while others are not, perhaps depending on whether they have a odd sum of negative/positive or an even sum.

Anyway I've had enough for the time being. At the moment it is taxing me too much. I'll need to do some research into electricity.

Most of the stuff in the next post was written before I realised the paradox, but I'll post it anyway.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 535
(2/2/04 6:09 pm)
Reply

 Supporting Explanation

---

Supporting Explanation (prior to realising I didn't actually have a logically consistent answer)

When we think of zero we think of the absence of things or balances in competing forces, but this is relative, nature does not separate one thing from another, nature does not recognise balances for no balance is permanent, nor does a balance really exist.

What we think of as balances in nature are always the appearance of balance, but it is always just near balance, it is the equivalent of approaching zero down to the trillionth degree, but zero is never actually reached.

No balance is permanent and no thing is permanent because the absence of movement would be zero movement, but if zero does not exist how can we then say there is zero movement. I know of no thing that has zero movement.

Zero is our way of understanding the movement of a humanly conceived thing, as it must be, for to not do so would force us to conceptualise the full process of a thing moving from one place to another and then being filled by something else and the place we moved the thing to would need to be emptied before it was filled.....ad infinitum. We would have to have the omniscient mind of a god.

But you say, I have thoughts and they are real, but they become nothing once the thought has gone ,so nothingness can exist

One could say that the exception is that nothingness exists as even if it is it a figment of our imagination, that still means it exists. This would be reasonable, except that for us to conceive of it must always be relative to a thing. Just as we cannot visualise infinity, nor can we truly visualise nothingness. Thoughts are just the electrons in your brain changing form. They have no permanent existence, they are just something that is in a state of near balance.

But what is a vacuum

Any vacuum is relative. A vacuum is not truly empty, for instance it contains the matter of gravity and ether and stretches the surface of the container inward. When humans extract material from a bottle it causes implosive 'pressure', nature abhors a vacuum, why would this be? Is it because it does not recognise zero and aims to fill the relative emptiness. Conceptually yes, but in reality no.

What!, you say, if that were the case then the vast emptiness of space compared to the small amount of matter would instantly tear the world and all things physical apart.

Well that would be true, only if nature actually did abhor a vacuum, but to do so would assume the existence of nothingness and sentience, an inherent power of consciousness. That is not the case. There is not a smaller amount of matter in space, there is simply less complexly combined matter.

Lets look at a man in a spaceship who steps into space without a suit. He starts to 'decay'. No, no he doesn't you say, the pressure of the surrounding vacuum pulls him apart!

The reality is however, that that would only be the case if space was truly empty in which case he would explode instantaneously. As that does not occur then the existence of the ether is confirmed.

I stated in an earlier post the ether consisted mostly of negative material. It does not, it simply consists of more negative material than positive in various combinations.

There are two or three possible answers to why things decay, whether in space or not.

Answer A

Note: This answer has problems, it might be more to do with how matter is created than what occurs with matter in space. I've left it in because some points will also apply to the more probable answer B. The principle of movement causing combination and destruction are similar.

Things exist because one negative and two positive units of one can form. Due to movement the negative becomes positioned between two positives, one on either side of the negative. I'll call this combined unit a HAZ. This does not automatically occur, it takes time for coincidence to place them in the right position. Hence the man in space and all things do not 'decay' instantly. The denser the thing the greater the number of positives that form the temporary skin of the thing and the longer it takes to longer it takes to combine with negative units. The man does not actually decay, as in ultimate terms decay cannot exist, for again that would imply nothingness can exist. When the HAZ forms it breaks off from the thing, because combinations of HAZ, such as light, travelling through the units of one, strike it at different angles, causing it to move away. When considered from the perspective of units of one this takes a lot of time.

The movement that caused the negative and positive to form does not disappear, as again that would imply that something could decay, it is simply transferred to the HAZ becomes that which causes the HAZ to spin.

In space the units of HAZ do not last long, a mere instant OR alternatively the ether may in fact consist nearly entirely of something like units of two negative and one positive.

Answer B

Note: This seems more logically consistent than the above, as it occurs both within space and amongst interactions of matter

It is not actually negative combining with positiveness that causes decay in space (or anywhere), but simply the force of smaller things hitting larger things. Light and radiation being small in structure can move into the structure of the atom and break it apart. It explains why light/radiation makes things fade, skin burn, tumours and so on. We on earth are protected from this destruction for the most part by the deflection of what is above us,

This scenario appears more logical, as matter appears to not easily form, it requires intense speed and intense density as which might occur in big bangs and star explosions. If it formed easily then there would be no space.

But if space were truly full then there would be no movement as there would be no space in which something could move from A to B.

A very difficult question, I must say, and damn you for thinking of it Jimhaz !!! :)

The answer I will give here conflicts with everything I've said about movement, however just replace movement with 'electric flow' and my arguments are not totally negated. (I'll need to review my theory, in the light of this question but I'm a bit tired and need a break from all this mental work and I'm keen to post it to see what others think)

It depends on how you view matter. A life form views matter as something existant on its own, it has too to be able to operate and utilise what is around it. Science has shown however that matter is a form of illusion, matter can be transformed into energy and energy can be transformed into units of positive and negative. To quote wikipedia "Electric charge is the fundamental conserved property of matter"

Go to this website and read through the explanation of electric charge www.amasci.com/elect/charge1.html

I've been suggesting the universe consists of equal quantities of positive and negative. It appears that movement or motion is also a delusion brought about by the way the mind sees 'movement' everywhere.

Physical things are things composed of parts, in which the amounts of positive and negative electric charge are both perfectly equal at the lowest level and not perfectly equal at the combined level. Things of the nature of energy light and so on have equal charge throughout.

Motion is the observed effect of electrical changes from positive to negative at the unit of one level, just as electricity flows through an optic cable at the speed of light, so to can all other matter flow through the universe. Note however there is no actual movement. The unit of one negative in a segment of the light 'coming' from the sun, remains where it is, however at the time the unit changed from negative to positive the unit next to it in a particular direction changed to negative and so on unit it reached the earth. I

Perhaps teleportation will eventually become realisable for this reason.

(incomplete, if indeed it is possible to complete).

And what is density anyway, how can density not be relative to nothingness?

Density is not relative to nothingness it is relative to various combinations negative+positive matter and combinations of those combinations. It is the mix of these that creates the stickiness of dense objects.

Density is a state of near balance, the higher the internal density of an object the closer the state of near balance, the closer the state of becoming motionless, relative to what is outside of it. A rock cannot walk, a machine cannot do other than where motion is designed, a human (mostly full of water and air) can move, a laser beam can burn because of the high density of light.

Things can move through the ether only because it there is "Less Resistance of Combination". Units of one do not break things apart easily unless the thing is travelling at intense speed.

---

Science and mathematics cannot describe a zero or non-movement, that is not relative. Ultimately advances in physics deal with the approach to zero, but alas will never find zero, because there is none. The numerical series nature uses is any combination of negative and positive....-1,1,-1,1,-1,-1,-1,1,1,-1,1,1....

There was never a first cause, no beginning, no absence of movement because it cannot exist.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 592

(2/6/04 10:49 pm)

Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

Just adding this excerpt from David's response on TPG to my thread for convenience/later reference.

Nagarjuna saw in the concept sunya, a concept which connoted in the early Pali Buddhist literature the lack of a stable, inherent existence in persons, but which since the third century BCE had also denoted the newly formulated number "zero," the interpretive key to the heart of Buddhist teaching, and the undoing of all the metaphysical schools of philosophy which were at the time flourishing around him. Indeed, Nagarjuna's philosophy can be seen as an attempt to deconstruct all systems of thought which analyzed the world in terms of fixed substances and essences. Things in fact lack essence, according to Nagarjuna, they have no fixed nature, and indeed it is only because of this lack of essential, immutable being that change is possible, that one thing can transform into another. Each thing can only have its existence through its lack (sunyata) of inherent, eternal essence. With this new concept of "emptiness," "voidness," "lack" of essence, "zerness," this somewhat unlikely prodigy was to help mold the vocabulary and character of Buddhist thought forever. - The Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy

-----

Here is a classic example of deluded men (both Robert and the author of the article above) projecting their own deluded interpretations upon a wise teaching given by Nagarjuna. The concept of sunyata does not refer to the supposed ineffable nature of enlightenment, nor does it even support such a notion. The concept of sunyata specifically refers to the nature of Reality (emptiness) which Nagarjuna spent his whole life describing in great detail - using words no less. There is nothing even remotely "ineffable" about this and Robert's insistence that Nagarjuna was trying to teach this message is wrong.

Nor does the number zero have anything to do with the concept of sunyata. After all, Gautama Siddharta and many Hindu sages before him were perfectly capable of comprehending the nature of emptiness without any help from the Greeks and their numbering system. It should be stressed that sunyata (emptiness) does not mean "nothingness" or "zerness".

"Nothingness is a dualistic entity which can only find its existence in contrast to "something". Being a duality, it cannot be applied to the nature of Reality. Reality is beyond all attempts to straightjacket in this way. It is neither something, nor nothing. It neither exists, nor not-exists. It is neither real, nor illusory.

The person who comprehends this great truth, and who opens up his entire being to it, is perfectly able to think about it, probe it, analyze it, and fully express it in words, just as Nagarjuna has done. It is only ignorant people who keep harping on about the ineffableness of enlightenment, or the indescribability of Reality. It may be indescribable to them, yes. But not to the enlightened person who knows it like the back of his hand.

silentsal

Registered User
Posts: 37
(2/7/04 1:56 am)
Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

---

it is our challenge to go beyond the absolute or the relative to no-position, and from this loose flowing non-base to use both to be exactly what we are.

jimhaz

Registered User
Posts: 680
(6/12/04 3:17 pm)
Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

---

The Revised Jimhaz Theory of the Universe

Nagarjuna: All is impermanent, but impermanence or permanence never existed. If an entity existed, it would be impermanent or permanent, but how can it exist in the first place?

Time is the recognisable universe.

The effect of time is movement. Time creates chaos and chaos is required for movement.

The effect of movement is energy and matter and life.

Time is infinite. Dark matter is no-time segments of the universe.

The universe should be considered as being full. There is only one thing that can possibly be everywhere at once and that is time.

Fibonacci/Lucas sequences limits the elements to time groups can create.

Colour spectrum and black streaks represent the curl of time as a cross section

The Yin/Yang symbol is representative of this as well

Time is the void, vortex

Time vortexes can be 'broken up' by collision with other vortexes.

Time vortexes should not be thought of as being of a certain size with a large end and a point, but of being like Phi and phi - endless 'fractions' of the universe.

Light/Sound Waves - Sound has a different pitch, as does light depending on the direction it is coming from. This is because it is a part of the time spiral as if it were seen from a different angle.

At any one time you are both as old as the ageless universe and as new as the infinity of the immediately preceding moment.

---

When I refer to a time spiral that is purely a description of something indescribable. I like the concept of a spiral because it leads one to think of infinity.

Black holes are the 'centre' of the time spiral. The term centre is fairly meaningless - they are merely the centre as seen from the time plane and scale in which we exist. What would be more accurate is that it is time at a distance from an observer. They are the centre of our time spiral. We visualise it as densely packed matter, as that is all that we can do. It is the centre when an infinite number of time vortexes overlap. Dark matter is much further up the time spiral, it may even be time that has less overlaps.

Gravity doesn't really exist, what it is, is the relationship between one time universe and another that is on the same plane. Time 'spins' like hurricanes and eddies and it is the spinning of time that attracts objects together. Time is attracted to itself, but only to a degree, the motion of time itself means that where time is accumulated it gets in the way of itself and creates fault lines which crack up. Explosions can be seen as a breakup of time and implosions of a condensing of time.

As time is a spiral vortex made up of other spiral vortexes there exists an infinity of universes.

One must remember the brain can both only sense what it can sense, and our imagination is limited by what we can logically build upon from what we have sensed using comparisons to things that we can actually observe. The brain has evolved to limit the universe because the universe obviously cannot fit into our head.

Nagarjuna: Eye awareness is not existent in the eye. It is not existent in form, nor in the space in between. What is constructed dependent upon the eye and form is erroneous.

Nagarjuna: While colour and shape never exist separately, the separate are not apprehended as one, because the two are known as form.

Nagarjuna: If the eye does not see itself, how can it see form? Therefore, the eye and form are insubstantial. The remaining sense spheres are also similar.

Nagarjuna: The eye is empty of its own substantiality. It is empty of another's substantiality. Similarly, form is also empty, and also the remaining sense spheres.

Time of course is only an effect, as we humans can only sense and dream effects. The evolution of self-desiring life comes from the 'density' of time overlaps. The same applies to the evolution of anything including energy and matter. This occurs because things are made of time and time in our universe spirals inward like a float in a whirlpool. We are mere travellers on time's inward path.

How the Spiral Works

When you look into the horizon from a ship, things appears small. However if you realise that what you are looking into is time itself, because to move to an object that is far away takes time. As you move into what was the horizon then everything becomes its regular size. When you add that everything is circling everything else any size related thoughts become impractical. Distance is visual effect of looking into the spiralling time channel.

If life is a guide, size and speed seem to have a relationship. The world to an ant is little different to ours, around ourselves we can only sense what we can sense so our worlds are essentially the same relative size. The sun would probably regard the planets as having fast movement and a short life compared to its own.

Nagarjuna: How can what is not established in its own intrinsic being produce another? A condition which is not established cannot cause the origination of another.

Time is a mirror against itself, reflecting in and out and in-between and out. Outside of our perception relating to size and distance there are no straight lines in the known universe, therefore everything must be curved in some fashion.

If everything is curved time and time is reflecting everywhere then there must be occasions where time overlaps. Seeing time is everything then the periods of these overlaps are essentially timeless. Overlaps of time create energy/matter only because for something to be matter it must exist in at least two levels of time, inherent permanent universal time and non-inherent temporary time relating to its time configuration. If time does overlap then something is created and perhaps with enough overlaps we end up with this thing called life, human life even where a new level of existence is created whereby it actually has tools to observe time.

Einstein was on the right track when he spoke about space-time, but he kept relating it to objects from the human perspective which is not relevant in the grand time vortex of the universe.

He said MASS AND ENERGY CURVE SPACE AND TIME which is correct but only because matter and energy are time itself. His mathematics don't quite work out because he did not bring into play overlapping time spirals.

---

Time is the only thing that has an intrinsic existence. It must have for even if there was a big bang or singularities or whatever, or any other form of existence including any creator god, there must have been time. Gods can surely only exist where time exists and how can there be a 'moment' before time.

Nothing else has an intrinsic existence. Any object gets its characteristics by being different to some thing else, and therefore must itself have characteristics or properties you would think, but the further you delve down into the parts of these objects the more alike the separate parts become to each other. They gradually lose properties. The object is merely the sum of a seemingly infinite number of sub-parts grouped together by beings with consciousness in a fashion that allows the observer to recognise differences in the manner in which things are grouped. These groupings always change over time, stars explode and so on, so therefore the group does not have an intrinsic or self-contained existence.

Time is the universal backbone that everything depends on. Without time nothing moves, nothing changes.

Force is time

The act of moving any object requires something physical to occur. All forces act in the same manner. They make something move. Nothing more, except that a new equal force is created. Everything that exists is therefore in infinite motion. This is backed up by everything being temporary and it is motion that creates the disturbances of destruction. But destruction is only the destruction of the illusory group, nothing is destroyed, everything that is destroyed becomes something else. Nothing is lost and if nothing is lost then the combination of the concept of motion plus equality is actually infinity.

To evince that motion and change is an illusion, Zeno presented the following paradoxes:

1. The Racecourse. Imagine a racecourse of a given length, say 100m. The runner starts at the beginning of the racecourse and reaches the goal in a given time. In this example of motion, the runner traverses a series of units of distance, foot perhaps. Zeno holds, that each unit of distances can be divided into smaller distances,  $1/2$  foot,  $1/4$  foot,  $1/8$  foot and so on, until at last we have an infinite number of distances. How can the runner traverse an infinite number of distances in a finite amount of time?

2. Achilles and the Tortoise. The swift Achilles and the tortoise hold a race contest. Because Achilles is a sportsman, he gives the tortoise a head start. While the tortoise is already moving towards the goal, Achilles starts and pursues the tortoise. In a few seconds he reaches exactly the point, where the tortoise has been when Achilles started. However, during this time the tortoise has moved forward and it takes Achilles a certain amount of time to make up for this distance. Again, the tortoise has moved on in that time and Achilles needs another, smaller amount of time to make up for it. The distance between Achilles and the tortoise will always be divisible and, as in the case of the racecourse, no point can be reached before the previous point has been reached, thus Achilles can never overtake the tortoise.

3. The Arrow. Does the arrow move when the archer shoots it at the target? If there is a reality of space, the arrow must at all times occupy a particular position in space on its way to the target. But for an arrow to occupy a position in space that is equal to its length is precisely what is meant when one says that the arrow is at rest. Since the arrow must always occupy such a position on its trajectory which is equal to its length, the arrow must be always at rest. Therefore motion is an illusion.

Zeno's paradoxes may not be paradoxes if motion is the crossing of a time channel in some time 'direction' - 'down' or 'across' the time spiral as it were.

Of course any such 'movement' would have some type of opposite time effect to all things around it so it would appear as if it moved, and taking from the perspective of a reference point would appear as if 'distance' had been travelled.

To move any object there must be a point of vacancy otherwise there would be no space to move in to, but how do you get this vacancy of space?

For example, lets say the particles at the foremost point of your arm bash into air particles on the pathway from one point to another. You can imagine that your atoms push the atoms of air out of orbit from the larger group, and these strike your particles causes even more volatility of particles, with the illusion of heat as a force being the result, but the problem then becomes that these out-of-group-orbit particles must also find space into which to move.

You might say that there is emptiness between the particles or atoms, but how can that be? Emptiness does not mean some sort of spongy vacuumness, for it to be empty it must have the 'property' of nothingness (or not have any property that can interact with something with a property). Now if it is nothingness than nothing can travel across this void of nothingness as it has no properties by which anything can be carried. It is impossible for say the space between particles to be nothingness because we can see that gravity must flow through this 'space' otherwise each particle would not be able to create an orbit around another. So this seemingly emptiness must actually be full, completely full.

If that is the case then how can space be created?.

It can't. There is no room because complete emptiness does not exist. Anything without any properties cannot exist, properties and thus things can only exist become we can measure them or imagine them, but if it has no properties there is no concept or sense that could possibly be used to imagine or know it.

Any thing with any property must exist, for instance, we know that the conventionally imagined vacuum of space can carry gravity and waves of light and radiation, so it must have some property.

At the same time, things with properties don't have any intrinsic existence, their properties change, even space. Where does the space go in the area where a spaceship is now located. It can't move anywhere, for to do so would be to go back to the concept that space is empty and thus spongy, which I've tried above to show is not correct.

Things obviously do change their relativity to other objects. I would not be surprised if our brain used some complex algorithm of time to measure size and distance, after all it certainly uses time to measure velocity. As far as I can see, if things appear to move but logically can't, then something else is happening, there is still some effect occurring, so imo the only thing that can possibly be occurring is that time is being warped to create the effect. However as nothing has an intrinsic existence it has no power to warp time, as to do so it would have to, in some fashion, be external to time. Clearly however we cannot be external to time, we can only be on some type of different frequency, level, grade or speed of time.

Time however is infinite and anything infinite and somehow separate from everything can only have the property of itself. With only the property of itself, it would have no ability to interact with anything else. If it had other than the property of itself it would not be time.

Elsewhere I've suggested that time should be thought of as having some kind of whirlpool existence, but if time has only one property, itself, then it surely it can't really have different frequency levels or whatever, as that would imply more than one property. The reality of time is that it has both one property and all properties as the one property. It is infinite so it must have both and any property imaginable can only exist if it has a relationship with time.

Thus any thing that can interact with time can only be a property that resides within the wholeness of time. Essentially we humans just another part of time's property as time itself becomes the universe.

Objects that are part of something larger - as all are - and consists of parts - as all things do - have difficulty in realising or understanding what the whole is that they are part of. Humans for instance have a hard time recognising they have no soul, no self that is separate in any way from the universe, we are merely part of a larger system - family, city, country, earth, solar system and so on.

Nor do we understand what we are made of, nor will we by experimental science regardless of the tools used - there will always be some smaller particle of existence.

Nagarjuna: Because the three characteristics of the compounded object -- origination, duration and destruction -- are non-existent, the compounded and the un-compounded are also non-existent.

Assume if you like that a certain thing is the base unit of the universe. What does it know? As far as I can see, it only knows one thing and that is to move in a certain direction when something nears. It does not actually join with another particle it appears to orbit or move in some fashion near the other. Now if movement is the property of time and is actually illusory due to the limitations of the observing consciousness, and this base particle only knows to move, then it must be time as for something to have the smallest thing, then it must be the thing with only one property. The only thing with one property is time. The only thing with all properties is time. One could say time's one property is that it is the temporary vacuum and fullness of existence that creates the space to move.

The problem with time for humans and anything that could be conceived of holding consciousness is that we think in terms of objects for everything, even god - except we don't do that with time. We think of time as just what is. So if we remove objects from the equation of what is, as they don't actually exist as such, then really all we have left is some type of interconnectedness of something. Time is the thing that interconnects everything. Now if in one hand you have everything and another hand you have time, then on their own then in one way neither can exist as they are reliant on each other - time without matter has no properties other than itself and matter without time has no movement thus no properties as awareness would not exist - so you actually have nothing in each hand. We know time exists though, therefore time is of the nature of motion rather than things, for without motion nothing changes and nothing can exist without change. Thus time could be considered to 'move'. If time moves then it must move in some form of eternal fashion. It must both change and remain the same.

Time Exists = TRUE (confirmed by awareness and consciousness)

Space, matter, gods cannot exist without time = TRUE

Objects exist inherently = FALSE (always temporary and consisting of parts)

Objects exist temporarily = TRUE (there is something inherent that creates the temporariness)

Objects have multiple properties = TRUE

To objects time appears to only have one property = TRUE (the sense of moving forward)

Space is empty = FALSE (emptiness can't carry anything)

The base unit of material existence is known = FALSE

The base unit of material existence could have only 1 property = POSSIBLY

Time can exist without matter = POSSIBLY

Humans sense the world like a kaleidoscope. Our minds group things together. Any one bit or congregation of h<sub>2</sub>o can be described as water. If you look into a kaleidoscope patterns form. If you look into two mirrors facing each other here is an endless procession of copies of itself. These effects are a reflection of the nature of reality. Time is the same shape, the same conceptual image conjured up in one's brain that appeals to the Mandelbrot brainset in all of us. The shape is an infinitely inwardly spirally tornado of property differences. Fibonacci, orbiting objects, galaxies or whatever are no mere coincidences.

If you placed yourself in the dead centre of the mirrors without any space and without any direction, then you would experience time (as you do). If from these reflecting mirrors, you were to head in any one direction you would become timeless as because there is an infinity of reflection in all directions, you would never reach the spot where you came from. Once on any one directional path then you couldn't go 'back' to where you started from as any direction that you took would be infinite.

The twin mirrors is the void of reality. One is always at the centre of the void. It's void because it contains all directions, but we travel along only one path, thus the infinity of all other paths is the void, completely unrecognisable. It may be that the void is perceived as emptiness as that is only how it could be perceived, but note that it is not really emptiness but fullness - it contains all possibilities and that is why something which appears to be empty of properties namely space and other vacuums like those between particles can appear to carry time/matter from one point to another. Matter moves through this time void and collects or loses properties in relation to all the other matter that cuts across it's time plane. Gravity may be the natural ability of matter to move into the void as the void has no resistance, but the mass of other matter that is pushes out time directions creates time swirls from which the time planes in the smaller object can then travel towards the object with greater mass.

Evolution

Nagarjuna: Consciousness originates dependent upon an object of consciousness, therefore it is non-existent. Without cognition and an object of consciousness, there is consequently no consciousness at all.

Why would evolution work. Why did things gradually change from random particles, to materials, to elements to complex compounds, to life. Even though evolution is merely predetermined 'coincidence', in that the sum of different causes add up to create a different effect, some which last to replicate part of themselves, some which don't, why is it that life wants to live in the first place? Life is just a combination of things so why is it that things combine?

If time has all properties then it must have all properties that humans have. Therefore all things have awareness of some description. Consciousness is simply complex awareness. Nonetheless it is compounded awareness dependant on compounded materials, and thus very, very complex. The only way it could have become so complex, as us humans are now, is to have a form of self-knowledge of itself, even way back yonder when it became a particle. And that self-knowledge is an awareness that it is a part of time. The property of the base level of existence is one property + time.

Nagarjuna: How can what is not established in its own intrinsic being produce another? A condition which is not established cannot cause the origination of another.

So how did this one property + time come about. Properties are description of matter but you can't have matter without it having any properties, so matter could not just have suddenly appeared, as there is nothing from which it could originate from, except time itself.

Awareness means an ability to interact with something else, so 2 bits of 1 property can interact with each other, but are equal so cancel each other out. It still exists, but is inactive so it then becomes 1, or matter. One bit of matter and another can join with each other and the Fibonacci sequence starts. The initial property of the one property base units is the awareness of two levels of time, now and forever, caused by a time overlap. Our consciousness is the same, it always relates to the ungraspable instant and the infinity of past-future, but the crucial point is that in having a conscious knowledge of both time and awareness-of-now it is automatically set upon the path that leads deeper into more 'now' time channel, it can only move in that direction, and thus we have the evolution of energy, matter and life. Intelligent design.

Electricity is core driving force of life. Electrical charges move our body and all it's parts and create chemical reactions that allow growth and rejuvenation using food, air and water. It is used to store memories or information and thus create consciousness. Life is merely self directed electrical current.

Electricity is channelled time. The positiveness and negative attributes of electricity come from the congregations of like swirls of time. By like I mean kind of occupying a like position on the time spiral, lets say positive is on the outer perimeter and negative in the more densely centre, the dead spot in the time hurricane. The ability of matter to group is the grouping of like time segments. Grouping on it's own does not produce life though, the groups must become so complex that they become self-organised and able to direct energy/electricity/time flows to a degree.

As humans have the ability to direct time it could be said that we are apprentice masters of time, but something which is a complete master of time would be considered a god. It is therefore possible that created gods exist.

Actually it is possible that anything exists. Ghosts, evil spirits, ESP are all possible if matter is time and motion is crossing time channels. Although these things are more likely to be imagination, all things have causes, and everything a human knows or senses has to at some stage have come from the real world. Imagination and the invention of new concepts occurs from randomness of brain behaviour, caused by its extraordinary complexity, a kind of grouping together of segments of other concepts.

Music

Music appeals to us because it is a reflection of the complexity of the time spiral. Music is the sensed vibration of time spirals of different planes. We like it because it displays our mastery of time.

MGregory

Posts: 577

(6/12/04 5:12 pm)

Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz: Time is the only thing that has an intrinsic existence. It must have for even if there was a big bang or singularities or whatever, or any other form of existence including any creator god, there must have been time. Gods can surely only exist where time exists and how can there be a 'moment' before time.

Nothing else has an intrinsic existence. [...]

---

Time doesn't have intrinsic existence either. The existence of time depends on things because without things there would be no change, therefore there would be no time. So if things have no intrinsic existence, neither does time.

Quote:

---

To evince that motion and change is an illusion, Zeno presented the following paradoxes:

---

Zeno's problem was that he was conceiving of time independently of change, but, particularly in the context of problems like Zeno's, they are the same thing.

Edit: good post, BTW

Edited by: MGregory at: 6/12/04 5:38 pm

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

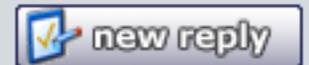

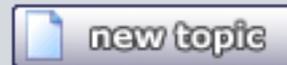

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Jimhaz Theory of Ultimate Reality.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1114(6/13/04 3:15 am)Reply  |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> Zeno's motion paradoxes aren't paradoxes at all, the maths was resolved a long time ago. Some claim that converging infinities is a convenient dodge as far as the physical world of time and space is concerned, others claim not. But there is also a fairly recent theory which resolves them in the physical world which posits that the paradoxes only arise when it is assumed that a body in motion has a determined relative position at any instant in time. The fundamental problem of Zeno's motion paradoxes is that they assume instances of static position for moving objects. Clearly, there is no instance in time, no matter how small, where a moving object is static. Pretty much like Matt said.                                             |
| MGregoryPosts: 578(6/13/04 10:36 am)Reply                                                                                                          |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> I was thinking more along the lines of the presentation of the problem. By stating the positions in a list, like 1/2, 1/4, 1/8, etc., he makes it look like a bunch of equal things with only one difference between them: the positions. So we naturally assume that everything else is equal, like time. We think of the list as: 1/2 foot = 1 unit of time, 1/4 foot = 1 unit of time, etc. But if change and time are the same thing, then time is also 1/2, 1/4, 1/8, etc. He just exploited a common oversight. Edit: After thinking about this, I think the problem does arise because we think of static moments of time, so I don't think I disagree with Dave. I'm not going to fix it, though, because I think I was onto something with the | equal time thing.

Edited by: MGregory at: 6/13/04 11:38 am

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 681

(6/13/04 11:01 am)

Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

Matt: Time doesn't have intrinsic existence either. The existence of time depends on things because without things there would be no change, therefore there would be no time. So if things have no intrinsic existence, neither does time.

I don't agree. The fact the there would be no change is irrelevant as that is only of interest to an observer. I agree that time would not be recognisable but I'm not sure you could say it was not infinite. The thing about time, at least under my theory, is that it must contains all properties. Also self-changingness must be it's core property. It itself must move in some fashion, otherwise there would be no eternity. What is eternity anyway when you are precisely that. Eternity only means something to things that are finite. If movement is times core property, then both it and everything is eternal. As movement is the core only the structure constantly changes making any thing finite, as any thing is a structure.

Matt: good post, BTW

I think so. It is not always logically consistent and contains logic gaps, but that doesn't matter that much. Even if wrong as a theory overall, it has enough good points that are original in the way it has been put together.

Dave: Clearly, there is no instance in time, no matter how small, where a moving object is static.

That is true because there is no time that any object is static, whether it appears to move or not. In that case it must be true that there are no instances in time - that there is never a now only an infinity. If you take a photo of a bullet in flight it doesn't shoot off the processed film, so it would appear to be an instant in time. However, the picture will still include distances travelled, and atoms orbiting, as no shutter has instantaneous speed, so the picture will still be the sum of some form of movement.

If time does not have a now, then everything is infinite. But we have memories, so we know there is a past, we know there are groups of things that change so some form of finiteness exists. If there is a past because things change then we know there is some difference between then and what we think of as now. There was a POINT of crossing where it moved or pivoted from one to the other.

This would allude to me that time has different properties. If time had different properties, planes, paths what would intervene to limit time properties and what would be the effect of time having more than one property?

To be perfectly honest, I'm not so sure that modern science has actually solved the problem, but I don't understand the stated solution. It seems more like changing the rules to make the problem disappear. I'll think about it more.

www.utm.edu/research/iep/z/zenoelea.htm

MGregory

Posts: 579

(6/13/04 11:31 am)

Reply

 Re: Supporting Explanation

Jimhaz,

Quote:

---

I don't agree. The fact the there would be no change is irrelevant as that is only of interest to an observer. I agree that time would not be recognisable but I'm not sure you could say it was not infinite.

---

Well, we can't experience time. We experience change and then mentally construct time as a measurement of it, so I think change is the basis for time and not the other way around. Time could be infinite depending on how you define "infinite". If you mean that there is only time and nothing else, I would say that's false, otherwise I would probably agree that it is infinite.

Quote:

---

I think so. It is not always logically consistent and contains logic gaps, but that doesn't matter that much. Even if wrong as a theory overall, it has enough good points that are original in the way it has been put together.

---

I like shit like that because it makes me think about things I don't normally

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | think about. I like the Presocratic Greeks for the same reason.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1117(6/13/04 3:22 pm)Reply     |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> Jim, have a look at David Hilbert and the Grand Hotel Paradox.                                                                                                                                                             |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 684(6/13/04 10:24 pm)Reply        |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> Grand Hotel..completely meaningless. A mathematician looking for a job. As they do they try and fit the infinite into the finite. derr. All it says to me is that movement is constant and we all know that. |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1118(6/14/04 12:10 am)Reply  |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> I see.                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 685(6/14/04 12:38 pm)Reply       |  Re: Supporting Explanation <hr/> My apologies Dave. Was somewhat inebriated when I had a look at that link. Will have another look later.                                                                                                                 |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

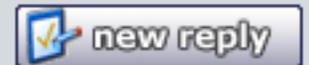

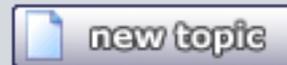

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The king of philosophers

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 4(10/24/03 12:52 pm)Reply | The king of philosophers <hr/> The king of philosophers2003.10.2322. Every new sentence i read of "Sex and Character" gives me the new power, my thinking is getting higher and higher by reading this greatest book.I sensed my selfishness that don't want to share the truth to the others, because i know, by understanding the truth, i can get anything i want, oh, i must conquer this selfishness, and i need to conquer the selfishness of to use philosophy for my own benefit, i should use my philosophy ideology for the whole human. I can conquer this selfishness, as you see, i was a free software developer :) The other thing i need to be aware of is: prevent others to misuse my ideology. oh, i am saying my ideology now, but it is no mine, it is Otto Weininger's, although i will develop my ideology in the future, i revere him so much, as my brother, but, i really thought Otto Weininger is me, we are together, we are the one, i must have his soul :) The afraid of others will know the truth is just a child's idea :) Otto Weininger have tell the truth to you, but we only understand it 100 years later :) i need to do my best to tell the truth to the others.The ordinary people, such as my parent, work hard for the whole life, save every little money in their life, after gathered some money, them can only waste it to buy some things seems modern and can make you house seems luxury, but these things(wide TV set, vcd) is not so useful in fact, and become out of fashion and just a garbage several years later, they didn't collected any property when they come to middle-aged, and then, the man, because luck of spiritual food, although he never play cards ago, become |

very generous to throw the last little money to the gamble(or some thing like lottery), because he get some money at first, and believe it is his wisdom, it is the luck give by her fate, makes him won on the gamble, but, at last, the money he won is lost, the last little money collected by his whole life is lost too. Gamble always make the poor become completely no money. The woman, because luck of spiritual food, maintained the family for a whole life, but her opinion is totally others', as woman is mind-less, after she realized his husband's weakness, she become hysteria, make trouble things to resist his husband, but don't know how to resist his husband indeed, these trouble things made by she only waste some of their last little money, and she is conquered by his weak husband at last for she released her resist just make thing go worse. And she can't stop his husband from the gamble now. Why them luck of spiritual fond? they never read any book after left the school, them were always busy earning money, and can only read newspaper when they become old, but, newspaper, is useless tomorrow, it is useless today too in fact. Because they luck of spiritual food, because their quarrel, their son leaned to stand on the side of his mother, so his father can't educate him easily, and his son become a play boy, waste money for play, for cool, need money to buy a school for him. They tried to fight, but failed because lack of knowledge, and then begin to obedient the life, which sees won't make them fall into starvation. This is their misery whole life. They haven't money, not because them didn't earn many money, if they know how to save and use money, they will be rich at last after so many years' collecting. They don't luck money in fact, although they think them luck it, because the society tell them this, they trust it too. They luck spiritual food in fact, but they won't know this because no one tell this truth to they, as I said before, they never read book after left the school.

I would like to talk more about money to you here, I know you care about it. I won't have much money, but you will see I will lead a rich man's material life(needn't say, a much richer spiritual life), I have enough money to lead a rich man's money, because i never waste money, 90 percent or more of the rich man's money is use for wasting, it is very easy for me to get 10 percent money as the rich man have, as it is easy for me to get 10 times more money of the rich man too in fact. I will create many money for the society, because my software is free, it have millions users, my books is free, it help many people to make money and save money. OK, your situation is different from me, as you are not a philosopher, I can still tell you how to become rich and lead a happy life :) in fact, as you are reading this article, you needn't worry about you won't have enough money :) Just don't waste money will make you rich, buy a computer, a piano, don't spend your money on the expensive notebook computer, don't buy the luxurious DVD, read some books every year, don't be busy earning money every second, try to be thinking sometimes, just by making your family harmonious, will make your child become excellent when he/she grown up, and you needn't leave money for your child, they can live by themselves as they are excellent . Money just likes air, it is very important to you(which you realized), but it is very easy for you to get it too, as you don't need much money indeed, to build a big bag to collect as much air as possible just waste your time because you don't need so much air in fact, you needn't afraid no enough air in fact, and, the collecting will be failed at last too, those air is not yours although it is in your big bag. These best things always be free, such as my software and my book :_) Classical music is free, the best literature books are free(as they are written many years ago), van Gogh's "Wheat Field with Crows" is free, etc. Who is the one that have most money in the world now? Is he the happiest man? Can't you see his tired face? Is he the wisest man in the world? Then what are these wise man doing? If he give his money to everyone in the world, you will get how much from him? A classic music will give more pleasure to you, and this classic much can be given to every one after it is created. Who is the one that have most money in the world 100 years ago? No one knows, no one cares, he never exists to you, in fact, the contemporary most rich man don't exist to you too.

When i reply the article in the bbs, i find so many worm and mosquito will write their non-sense articles to waste your time, as they have too much time to waste, but i have already have this experience from Linux. They know nothing about philosophy, if you argue with him...that is don't play with pigs :) I won't touch them. I have already cleaned the vanity by Linux experience.

It have already disturbed me, i need to leave them, i need to hide myself. shit, i have broken my best environment by myself :( now i need to recover it.

I shouldn't talk about money in the previous sentences, it have already be done by the previous philosophers, what i need to do is, absorb Otto Weininger and many others philosophers' ideology, then develop it and write my book. So i need to stop writing my thinking, my current thinking is not matured, i will only write my thinking note.

Believe, i believe it!

Genius needn't your discussion.

I become famous now :) All the SCU bbs's focus is moved to my philosophy articles paste in the "love" board, then come a praise person, very humorous articles :) It is still interesting to me, as i am a child :_) But i have the experience to deal with it, which come from the Linux in the last two years, my Linux experience showed its important usefulness to me now.

I return to my normal status now, after listen to classical music for the whole afternoon and the evening :)

Everything is happening as i thought, because my thought contained their thought, just as the circumstances described in "1984" and the theory said by Otto Weininger :) I can analyze each of them easily and clearly. Just by one day, i promote so much compared to the me of yesterday.

I am a philosopher now, as you see, i begin to call myself a philosopher in the previous sentences :) Being a philosopher feels very good :)

You can often see some students walk on the road and gaze on the mobile phone which is in his/her hand, these who have mobile phone two years ago saw these students, so they never show their mobile photo again, you can sense they are saying, that small mobile phone haven't much thing on it, why you look at it and play with it so... :) and by never show their mobile phone, they tell you that they have mobile phone two years ago :) both are vanity. Mobile phone don't have so much usefulness as its cost, most of its cost is spend on the dazzling place :) If i can buy my mobile phone for the first time again, i will buy a second-hand one :) Mobile phone's real life is much longer than it become out of fashion.

These discussion in the bbs become more or less for fun now :) while laughing, i get to be more calmed :_) I need to review recent three days' thinking.

She is so innocent a girl :_) I like her very much. I like the lovely girl too :_) I will love a girl who is innocent at first and become lovely at last :_) After you analyzed these person completely, they can't disturb you now, as you can know what their reaction will be :) I controlled the SCU bbs now :) I won't let you analyze me :) I will make myself more and more hard to analyze :_)

Otto Weininger's ideology is so great! All my power comes from him. To distinct 0 or 1, you can start to make the conclusion just after you see whether it seems to bigger or smaller than 0.5. So, you can write down your thinking first although it is not so mature, and after your thinking get matured, you will see the thinking in the book which you write down ago is just be confirmed. So, this can explain why Otto Weininger commit suicide two years after he wrote down his book, he just use these two years to confirmed his book. Nietzsche write down "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and go mad(then died) for the same reason. It seems the greatest philosopher always commit suicide or go mad after his ideology become matured, as he concentrate all of his energy on it, if it get matured, he have nothing to do then. haha, i have already said i am the philosophy genius ago, you should agree with me now :) you see, i find the secret of philosopher's death. I will be greater than Otto Weininger and Nietzsche, as i absorb both of their ideology and merged them, then develop it, my ideology will be more cool than theirs :) And, as i find this secret, i won't commit suicide or go mad now :) I will find my wife first, after my ideology get matured, i will just be relaxed and then have my happy life with my wife :) Both Otto Weininger and Nietzsche don't have wife(I can't make sure of Otto Weininger, but it should be so). I created one rule for the philosopher now, that is:"Find and culture your wife before start study philosophy deeply", you can understand why i use the words "find and culture" by read "Sex and Character". I changed the marriage history of philosophers now :) And, these ideology which want to get rid of wife is wrong, Kevin Solway, your ideology is wrong, i have the sense that your are wrong at the first time i see your ideology, and now i proved your wrong :) haha, I am 20 only, I only touch philosophy three month ago, and only start my philosophy thinking three days ago, but you, have studied for almost 20 years. Just by three days, i defeated your ideology, hoho, you see the power of genius now :_) but your work still makes sense, your contribution to philosophy is: find the book of "Sex and Character", and hand it to Hu Zheng, who, the philosophy genius, start his work base on Otto Weininger and Nietzsche :) No one will doubt of me now, the biggest philosophy revolution in the history will be start by me, philosophers, cheer up, after our three thousands years' thinking, we can get our fruit now, science, and all other branch of learning, will kneel on the front of philosophy. You see, who am i now, i am the king of philosophers :) but wait, let me get my beautiful wife first :)

Dear, just by a small phenomenon, i start to analyze it, and get so big a result, just as Newton find the gravity by the dropping of an apple :) But, don't compare me to a scientist(Although Newton know a little philosophy as i know a little science), i am philosopher, philosophy is higher than science, higher than any other learning branch, it is the highest, so i am the greatest man in the world, as i will be the king of philosophers.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1615
(10/24/03 2:28 pm)
Reply

---

---

Hi Huzheng, more soon (:D)

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 352
(10/24/03 3:41 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

You're a speck of dust floating through the air in my 12 X 12 room. You aren't anything special! You won't be anything special.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The Limitations of Language

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 37(1/26/04 12:43 am)Reply | The Limitations of Language<hr/> One of the prophecies of the oracle at Delphi."Ibis, redibis numquam peribis in bello."That's one of the most famous examples of syntactic ambiguity.Two different translations and interpretations may be provided:1) "You'll leave, and you shall never return as you will perish in the war."2) "You'll leave and return, and you shall not perish in the war." |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2123(1/26/04 12:59 am)Reply    | ---<hr/> I get it! You're kurt russell! All the movies you're in I never can remember!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 39(1/26/04 3:14 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I get it! You're kurt russell! All the movies you're in I never can remember! <hr/> Okay. Okay. You got me. Don't worry, I can't remember them either. I'm getting quite old you know. ;)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 77(1/31/04 10:41 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Actually, "The Barefoot Executive" comes to mind for some reason. ;)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 83(1/31/04 11:19 am)Reply      | Re: The Limitations of Language <hr/> Kurt, Actually, one of your most philosophical flicks was "Overboard" with Goldie. It all revolved around intentions. As you'll recall, Goldie snubbed you, refused to pay for the remodeled closet and pushed you overboard [along with your tools]. She falls overboard herself later on, however, and contracts amnesia from the ordeal. You see her on the tube and decide it is pay back time. So, you pretend to be her husband and take her home to be your personal slave for a month. Your intention being that fair is fair. And once you get her home you treat her as though she WERE a slave---to you and your 4 young sons [5 if you count Roy ; )]. You put her through sheer hell!!! Ah, but this being Hollywood what many would construe as outrageous behavior on your part [you kidnapped her for all intents and purposes!!] metamorphoses into true love instead. The two of you actually DO fall in love. Joanna transfigures Annie and the rich bitch transfigures into a wonderful mother and a warm and loving human being. |

So, what often matters out in the real world is not just the nature of our intentions but what actually unfolds as a result of our acting on them.

The two do not, however, necessarily intertwine into a Happy Ending, do they?

That's what makes human interaction impervious to, among other things, Ultimate Reality.

Biggie

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

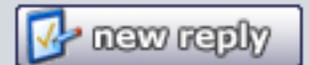

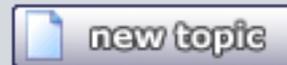

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> the mad and the madder than hell

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 73(1/19/04 11:21 am)Reply | the mad and the madder than hell <hr/> Emile Cioran: "Around midnight, a woman in tears comes up to me in the street: 'They've knifed my husband, France is disgusting, luckily I'm from Brittany, they took away my children, they kept me on drugs for six months...'. Not having realized at first that she was mad, so real her agony seemed [and in a sense was], I let her chatter on for a good half hour: talking did her good. Then I abandoned her, telling myself that the difference between us would be infinitesimal if I began to pour out my recriminations to the first comer." Me too. But not most, of course. Most are so intellectually, philosophically, politically, emotionally and psychologically shallow their recriminations would revolve around things like the cancelation of their favorite television program, their team losing the super bowl, the size of their breasts or being eliminated from the golf tournament. The mad have nothing over those who worship at the feet of the brand new Gods: mass consumption, pop cultue and celebrity. Do they? And I've lost count of the number of times I wished I could be just like them. Biggie Edited by: Biggier at: 1/19/04 11:23 am |

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1290
(1/19/04 11:35 am)
Reply

mad as hell

---

Perhaps you could, Biggie. Try taking zoloft. I took one pill once, and it flipped me out for days. I was really mentally ill, because I was convinced everyone else felt the same as I did, and the fact that my personality had undergone a radical change sort of didn't register. But why does that woman's hellish experience appeal?

And what's the name of this book you keep quoting from?

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 55
(1/19/04 12:23 pm)
Reply

Re: mad as hell

---

Quote:

---

The mad have nothing over those who worship at the feet of the brand new Gods: mass consumption, pop culture and celebrity. Do they? And I've lost count of the number of times I wished I could be just like them.

---

This is why the truth of the matter is that people are all the same, and only those blind to reality can imagine otherwise. One has the love of truth, another has the love of the world. One has wisdom, another has Monday Night Football. One has enlightenment, another has a good salary. One wants to be like the rest, another wants to be unlike them. One suffers in ignorance, another suffers in knowledge. Does anyone not see this? Any who imagine themselves either to be greater or lesser than any other is a fool. There are many paths in this life. None are free from suffering, although the grass often seems greener on the other side.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2097
(1/19/04 8:19 pm)
Reply

----

---

And just because no-one is free from suffering you think no-one is greater or lesser than any other? People are greater and less than one another. There is of course danger in discrimination, but that is no argument against it. No-one is the same as any other.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1424
(1/20/04 1:25 am)
Reply

----

What's wrong with Monday Night Football?

Canadian Zoetrope
Registered User
Posts: 23
(1/20/04 6:43 am)
Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'

That to which you refer would be the individuation of the collective unconsciousness. We are constantly trying to bridge between the projected and actual self.

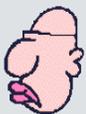

The same thing happens throughout society, and thusly in the unconscious of the collective. It is an ingenious development of the human mind. Jealousy, is the right hands it can be a powerful tool for change and radical thought. But that also requires a strong hear, with equally strong convictions.

To covet another's possessions, both physical and psychological is the curse of self actualization. We do our best to achieve what society tells us is success, without ever challenging the idea of success. For me success is discovering the undiscovered self and doing things you never imagined you would do.

Today I cooked stir fry for the first time! It tasted sooo good.

Eat your heart out Justin Timberlake.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 890
(1/20/04 10:20 am)
Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'

Mmmmmh, heart of Justin Timberlaaaaaake.

Quote:

What's wrong with Monday Night Football?

True football is for the weekend.

Although I guess you people can do whatever you like with your poxy little game by any other name.

; -)

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 1428

(1/23/04 10:02 am)

Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'

---

It would be an interesting experiment to see the Carolina Panthers football team and the Manchester United football team line up, each playing by their own rules, and see which one scores first.

But of course we already know what that outcome would be, don't we?

: -P

Tharan

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 893

(1/23/04 11:34 am)

Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'

---

That would indeed be interesting as I am a Liverpool fan.

Anyway, if you want to go like for like, how about putting them up against the England rugby union team (recently crowned world champions), sans body armour?

Now that would be interesting.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 455

(1/23/04 11:59 am)

Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'

---

That would be good, but first you'd have to extract the England rugby union team's heads from up each other's arses. I'm not sure if that is possible. They should have learnt by now there ain't no sunshine there.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1430
(1/23/04 4:57 pm)
Reply

Re: Coveting others 'success'....pfft, FOOTBALL!

As you know the American G.I. sans body armor is not an overly impressive specimen, historically speaking. But damn, that is some good body armor.

It would be unfair to pit a UK rugby team against an American football team without armor. There would be too much danger of a Major League baseball-style groin pull or perhaps even the chain of bling-bling around the neck breaking. One must consider the sponsors, after all.

Go Halliburton!!

Tharan

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

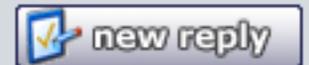

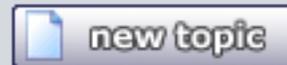

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2021(1/14/04 8:30 am)Reply  | The misogynist <hr/> Bird wrote, on the "I Dare You" thread: Quote: <hr/> Anyway, David, in vain I have searched for the recent bit about how you're the only nonmisogynist on the planet, so my question to you is, what the hell is your definition of a misogynist? <hr/> Someone who stifles women's philosophical development for the sake of their own emotional/sexual happiness. It represents a hatred of the full flowering of woman and it stems from being deeply attached to women the way they currently are. Most husbands, for example, are misogynists. They would be utterly repulsed and scared if they saw any signs that their wives genuinely wanted to become Buddhas. It is the last thing they would want to see. They want their wives to be cuddly, feminine and soft. They want them to be interested and supportive of their own petty male vanities. In short, they want a mediocre companion to accompany their own mediocre journey in life. Misogyny, then, is the inevitable product of men's own rejection of the life of truth. |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 588
(1/14/04 10:01 am)
Reply

...

---

Someone who stifles women's philosophical development for the sake of their own emotional/sexual happiness.

Yet, that is exactly what you're doing by saying that the mindset women generally have is delusional. You take it way too far sometimes, with saying that women can eventually be eradicated through science, and they should be killed at birth.

Let's relate this to a game of basketball. If the men say that women can't play because they generally suck, there's not going to be many women that will play at all. The few that do will be very ambitious women that are merely doing it to prove the men wrong. Most will just give up, and watch, though.

Now, if everyone was encouraged to play, sure it would appear to be disastrous at first, but eventually women would be just as good as men.

Relate this back to your grand gender theory. If you made it a very clear point that everyone has a brain which is capable of either an extremely 'feminine' consciousness, or an extremely 'masculine' consciousness (maybe even renaming those types of mind), the few women that do come in contact with philosophical matters would be more open to them.

You also say that the ideal 'woman' represents sexuality, and that mysteriousness which keeps weak men in check. If you made it sexy to think, I'm sure women would be very open to it. Stop making philosophy only for bearded men, who don't have jobs, and are boring. A thinking woman IS very sexy to me, and women have said a knowledgeable man is sexy to them. I think we should embrace both sexuality, and wisdom.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2062
(1/14/04 10:19 am)
Reply

----

---

Women will never be as good as men at basketball!

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2024

(1/14/04 11:03 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Someone who stifles women's philosophical development for the sake of their own emotional/sexual happiness.

VI: Yet, that is exactly what you're doing by saying that the mindset women generally have is delusional. You take it way too far sometimes, with saying that women can eventually be eradicated through science, and they should be killed at birth.

---

Killed at birth? That's a new one. Not a bad idea, though.

Again, I'm not advocating that women should be eradicated altogether. We can still keep people with vaginas and wombs. We can just slowly phase out the feminine features. Nobody needs to be killed.

It would be like the reverse of what has been happening for thousands of years, wherein feminine women have constantly been selected as breeding partners ahead of masculine women.

Quote:

---

Let's relate this to a game of basketball.

---

Pah! Basketball is a mere concept, an illusion, nothing. Why talk about it?

Quote:

---

Relate this back to your grand gender theory. If you made it a very clear point that everyone has a brain which is capable of either an extremely 'feminine' consciousness, or an extremely 'masculine' consciousness (maybe even renaming those types of mind), the few women that do come in contact with philosophical matters would be more open to them.

---

In other words, you want me to tell lies.

If a particular woman comes into contact with a philosopher such as me and is dissuaded from engaging in philosophy simply because of my openly-stated truths about women in general, then she has no potential to begin with. She is just another gullible, easily-led woman.

I know that if I was a woman and people kept telling me that women were incapable of doing philosophy, it would only inspire me to redouble my efforts and prove them wrong.

Quote:

---

You also say that the ideal 'woman' represents sexuality, and that mysteriousness which keeps weak men in check. If you made it sexy to think, I'm sure women would be very open to it.

---

I'm sure they would too. But what kind of fantasyland are you living in that you can imagine that thinking can be made "sexy" in the eyes of women? Thinking is, despite its fantastic rewards, a hard, terrible, painful business. It's something that is performed in solitude in a life-and-death corner of the mind. It isn't about trying to become attractive and snazzy in the eyes of others, or gaining lots of power and fame and adoration - which is what women normally equate with the term "sexy".

Quote:

---

Stop making philosophy only for bearded men, who don't have jobs, and are boring.

---

Boredom is in the eyes of the beholder. What one person finds sexy and exciting is often the very embodiment of tedium to another. You're only revealing your own lust-driven psychology with these kinds of comments.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2065

(1/14/04 11:27 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Again, I'm not advocating that women should be eradicated altogether. We can still keep people with vaginas and wombs. We can just slowly phase out the feminine features. Nobody needs to be killed.

---

These words fill me with disgust.

David is a misogynist.

If he was in any way effective in his desire I'd have to eradicate him.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 67

(1/14/04 11:48 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

These words fill me with disgust.

---

Easy now... take a deep breath...it's only one mans opinion...Why so serious?.

Quote:

---

David is a misogynist.

---

Isn't misogyny just a different degree of consciousness?

Quote:

---

If he was in any way effective in his desire I'd have to eradicate him.

---

So you advocate the eradication of a man, but not a woman?

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 15
(1/14/04 12:08 pm)
Reply

re:

---

Quote:

---

Isn't misogyny just a different degree of consciousness?

---

Misogyny means literally, "hatred of women". Yeah, its a different degree of consciousness alright.

Quote:

---

So you advocate the eradication of a man, but not a woman?

---

I think what sugaraz was saying that if David was successful in eradicating women (as in gynocide of all women) that he should be himself eradicated. I'm sure you've heard of An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, an ear for an ear, a foot for a foot.

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 163(1/14/04 12:09 pm)Reply      | ... <hr/> Even though I personally don't agree with the things you say about women and consider you a misogynist, the misogyny I see in you is not all that relevant to my refusal to your philosophy. The main problem I have with it is how your philosophy imposes itself to other people. My contact with women show me that they are just as capable of rationality as men, but I won't argue that point with you, because the discussion won't go anywhere. The problem lies somewhere else. I'm okay with the way you value rationality for yourself, but you seem to think that you have the right to change other people in order to fit them in your arbitrary values. And I don't agree with that. I truly couldn't care less if you think I am inferior to you, that I'm "feminine minded", as you like to call it. But if you tried to change me in any way, I'd resist. |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 164(1/14/04 12:15 pm)Reply      | ... <hr/> I would resist, because my mind is perfectly clear to know what I want to do. But some people are confused more easily, and I'm sure you'd be able to make them believe that they should act the way you want them to, even if they don't actually want to do that.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 16(1/14/04 12:16 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I truly couldn't care less if you think I am inferior to you, that I'm "feminine minded", as you like to call it. But if you tried to change me in any way, I'd resist. <hr/> And so you should. David Quinn is a walking talking contradiction in him self. On the one hand he says that women cannot achieve enlightenment and blasts other men for hindering their (women's) path to enlightenment because they appreciate their femininity. Then he has the nerve to call them mysoginists. Could you tell us all here David Quinn, why were you kicked out of Ne Plus Ultra after being their for only a week? I'm sure many of us                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                    | here would find it enlightening. Especially the members of the "weaker" sex. ;)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 250(1/14/04 12:35 pm)Reply | Re: Expulsion <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Could you tell us all here David Quinn, why were you kicked out of Ne Plus Ultra after being their for only a week? I'm sure many of us here would find it enlightening. Especially the members of the "weaker" sex. <hr/> As a third party, I saw that David was expelled from the Ne Plus Ultra forum because of several blatant lies that the members of that forum whipped up about him, in a frenzy. Firstly, they claimed that David was saying that women had no more worth than dogs. But he clearly never said anything of the kind. David only made the mistake of using the word "woman" and "dog" in the same sentence, thinking his readers would be intelligent enough not to jump to irrational conclusions. Secondly, they also accused him of "browbeating" a 19 year old, ultra-high IQ University student - through a couple of short paragraphs of the written word no less - and which again was clearly not the case. Thirdly, they accused him of "racism" and supporting "eugenics" . . . for apparently no reason whatsoever other than the desire the have him expelled from the forum. |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 251(1/14/04 12:45 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> krussel wrote: Quote: <hr/> On the one hand he says that women cannot achieve enlightenment and blasts other men for hindering their (women's) path to enlightenment because they appreciate their femininity. <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

If women cannot currently achieve enlightenment it is for two reasons: genetic and environmental conditioning (and genetic conditioning can also be considered a form of environmental conditioning).

Men who treat women as objects of sexual and emotional pleasure, and who encourage women to be feminine and "flowie", as opposed to cold, hard, and reasoning, are a major part of the environmental force which prevents women from developing philosophically and spiritually. These men are indeed lovers of women as they want them to be, but they are haters of women as they don't want them to be - for example, as philosophers, and as strong, independent individuals who don't need men, and probably even look down upon men. I think it is for this reason David calls these men "misogynists".

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2025

(1/14/04 12:47 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

David Quinn is a walking talking contradiction in him self. On the one hand he says that women cannot achieve enlightenment and blasts other men for hindering their (women's) path to enlightenment because they appreciate their femininity.

---

There is no contradiction. The main hindrances to women's spiritual and philosophical progress are psychological, cultural and genetic in nature. Men can play a very big role in changing this situation, but they probably never will because they much prefer to keep women as warm cuddly sex toys.

I doubt that I can think of a greater expression of misogyny than this. It is akin to deliberately stunting children's physical growth just so adults can enjoy their cute appearance.

Quote:

---

Could you tell us all here David Quinn, why were you kicked out of Ne Plus Ultra after being their for only a week? I'm sure many of us here would find it enlightening. Especially the members of the "weaker" sex. ;)

---

I will be going into this matter in some detail in a few days time, because there are important issues involved. But for now I will simply say that my expulsion from Ne Plus Ultra was primarily due to mob hysteria. This mob hysteria was deliberately whipped up and fanned by a particular (male) individual who detested the way I made him look foolish in the earlier part of the exchange. His behaviour, in particular, was quite reprehensible, although the others were just as culpable for going along with it. All in all, a very low-grade forum.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 252
(1/14/04 1:22 pm)
Reply

Imposing philosophy

---

Rairun wrote to David:

Quote:

---

The main problem I have with it is how your philosophy imposes itself to other people.

---

If a philosophy "imposes" on other people it should only do so through weight of reason.

Also, in a democracy the philosophy of the majority is imposed on you whether you like it or not. That imposition doesn't even rely on the weight of reason - it has only the imposing weight of numbers.

This also applies within the individual. A part of you might want one thing, but the majority of you wants something else, so the majority imposes on the minority. That's the way it should be.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 253
(1/14/04 1:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Eugenics

---

Here's an interesting fact: Testosterone is fast becoming the drug of choice for wealthy ageing women. Drug companies can't produce the hormone fast enough. It keeps women looking and feeling younger, and makes their thoughts clearer.

Yet if a man suggested that women should take testosterone he would be branded a misogynist.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 732
(1/14/04 1:36 pm)
Reply

Re: Eugenics

---

Kevin: Here's an interesting fact: Testosterone is fast becoming the drug of choice for wealthy ageing women. Drug companies can't produce the hormone fast enough. It keeps women looking and feeling younger, and makes their thoughts clearer.

Can you give us some references to Testosterone therapy for females?

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1243
(1/14/04 1:56 pm)
Reply

The misogynist

---

Right, well, let the mediocre bury the mediocre. Like should marry like. So should the Buddha-minded. They say most couples have IQ's within 5 points of each other.

Now, the question is, what is the full flowering of woman? If I understand you aright, that would be when they cease to be women. They may only flower into men.

The reason I consider you a misogynist, in fact the most complete misogynist on the planet, is that you want to erase women. That is the only way they can be salvaged - by their erasure. Why bother. Their genes and brains will need major overhaul. And if you would go so far as to have test tube reproduction, it's hard to say there would be two genders whatsoever. I'm wondering what you have in mind. Most of the physical improvements you have mentioned would render women rather ugly, which I don't think is fair as men are not ugly. If the women don't need to reproduce and sexual desire will be bred out of both genders, then I suggest you give your women a penis. Men's penises could be shrunk, as they are exorbitantly large (the largest among the primates by a good margin I understand) but a penis, while an overly delicate and cumbersome organ (however we can shrink the testicles since they are also large in men and most of that unnecessary size comes from sperm competition in our sex-crazed species) is one of the few real advantages of manhood, I think. It is so much more convenient for peeing, especially in cold weather and any other time when you are outside. On the surgical floor where I work, the women must painfully make their way to the bathroom, whereas the men can pee in urinals.

I realize you continue to hold out a certain amount of hope for women, but the more I hang around the bookstore and read about sex differences in the brain, the more unlikely it seems. On the other hand, I have also found some surprising things in my searches that I would never have expected, most notably the history of women as warriors, and their accepting the responsibility for revenge.

The thing I don't believe you have grasped, though, is that women are indeed different. I mean really different. No matter how much you have talked about feminine qualities, you have never truly accepted that women are different than men. All the misogynist talk continually centers around outrage that women are not like men. Oh, I have some idea what you might say here. "Sure - if women are different in that they don't have male a approach to life, which is crucial to enlightenment, then they have simply not achieved humanity and men have."

Well, I am now thinking that women have a different path and even a different enlightenment. I don't really mean different, just complementary.

The reality is that women and men are a mirror image, and all the attributes are equal in every possible sphere, but quite different. But you can't see this because your enlightenment is dependent upon the inferiority of woman. I don't think you can manage without it. So you see how laughable it is, that you talk about other men's dependence upon woman and you are every bit as dependent (but having a lot less fun).

I am sorry Mr. Quinn, but if you do not see how reality, all of it, is completely driven by equal and opposing forces, call them yin and yang, (damn I've never typed drunk before) then you are woefully ignorant.

This universe is so fucking simple. It's almost disappointing.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1244

(1/14/04 1:59 pm)

Reply

misogynist

---

Right, well, let the mediocre bury the mediocre. Like should marry like. So should the Buddha-minded. They say most couples have IQ's within 5 points of each other.

Now, the question is, what is the full flowering of woman? If I understand you aright, that would be when they cease to be women. They may only flower into men.

The reason I consider you a misogynist, in fact the most complete misogynist on the planet, is that you want to erase women. That is the only way they can be salvaged - by their erasure. Why bother. Their genes and brains will need major overhaul. And if you would go so far as to have test tube reproduction, it's hard to say there would be two genders whatsoever. I'm wondering what you have in mind. Most of the physical improvements you have mentioned would render women rather ugly, which I don't think is fair as men are not ugly. If the women don't need to reproduce and sexual desire will be bred out of both genders, then I suggest you give your women a penis. Men's penises could be shrunk, as they are exorbitantly large (the largest among the primates by a good margin I understand) but a penis, while an overly delicate and cumbersome organ (however we can shrink the testicles since they are also large in men and most of that unnecessary size comes from sperm competition in our sex-crazed species) is one of the few real advantages of manhood, I think. It is so much more convenient for peeing, especially in cold weather and any other time when you are outside. On the surgical floor where I work, the women must painfully make their way to the bathroom, whereas the men can pee in urinals.

I realize you continue to hold out a certain amount of hope for women, but the more I hang around the bookstore and read about sex differences in the brain, the more unlikely it seems. On the other hand, I have also found some surprising things in my searches that I would never have expected, most notably the history of women as warriors, and their accepting the responsibility for revenge.

The thing I don't believe you have grasped, though, is that women are indeed different. I mean really different. No matter how much you have talked about feminine qualities, you have never truly accepted that women are different than men. All the misogynist talk continually centers around outrage that women are not like men. Oh, I have some idea what you might say here. "Sure - if women are different in that they don't have male a approach to life, which is crucial to enlightenment, then they have simply not achieved humanity and men have."

Well, I am now thinking that women have a different path and even a different enlightenment. I don't really mean different, just complementary.

The reality is that women and men are a mirror image, and all the attributes are equal in every possible sphere, but quite different. But you can't see this because your enlightenment is dependent upon the inferiority of woman. I don't think you can manage without it. So you see how laughable it is, that you talk about other men's dependence upon woman and you are every bit as dependent (but having a lot less fun).

I am sorry Mr. Quinn, but if you do not see how reality, all of it, is completely driven by equal and opposing forces, call them yin and yang, (damn I've never typed drunk before) then you are woefully ignorant.

This universe is so fucking simple. It's almost disappointing.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 407
(1/14/04 2:02 pm)
Reply

The misogynius

---

Google doesn't mention it.

Well, I do. Now.

Thanks, Anna.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 591
(1/14/04 2:17 pm)
Reply

...

---

Killed at birth? That's a new one. Not a bad idea, though.

If I remember correctly, you said it. Maybe it never happened, but this is just a small detail, where the general idea is what counts.

Again, I'm not advocating that women should be eradicated altogether. We can still keep people with vaginas and wombs. We can just slowly phase out the feminine features. Nobody needs to be killed.

Why, when you value wisdom and another values feminine features, should we all phase out feminine features? You are imposing on others, and I will try my hardest to make sure your point of view doesn't become the norm. Call me feminine for it, but I think it's very unwise for you to teach the things you do.

It would be like the reverse of what has been happening for thousands of years, wherein feminine women have constantly been selected as breeding partners ahead of masculine women.

No, that's a very broad generalization, and a delusion on your part! If anyone actually could call that a conscious, or rational statement...I don't know. I'd burst.

Pah! Basketball is a mere concept, an illusion, nothing. Why talk about it?

The way out of concepts is through.

In other words, you want me to tell lies.

No, that's not telling a lie. You've said it before yourself.

If a particular woman comes into contact with a philosopher such as me and is dissuaded from engaging in philosophy simply because of my openly-stated truths about women in general, then she has no potential to begin with. She is just another gullible, easily-led woman.

No, she will be dissuaded because you appear as a delusional misogynist.

I know that if I was a woman and people kept telling me that women were incapable of doing philosophy, it would only inspire me to redouble my efforts and prove them wrong.

Which is why you're so adamant with your false state of consciousness; you're so driven to be right, to win.

I'm sure they would too. But what kind of fantasyland are you living in that you can imagine that thinking can be made "sexy" in the eyes of women? Thinking is, despite its fantastic rewards, a hard, terrible, painful business. It's something that is performed in solitude in a life-and-death corner of the mind. It isn't about trying to become attractive and snazzy in the eyes of others, or gaining lots of power and fame and adoration - which is what women normally equate with the term "sexy".

Anything is possible. Philosophy could be thought of as attractive, snazzy, about gaining lots of power, fame and adoration, sexy...all of that. Women go through the trouble of putting makeup on to feel sexy, so why wouldn't they go through the trouble of thinking?

Boredom is in the eyes of the beholder. What one person finds sexy and exciting is often the very embodiment of tedium to another. You're only revealing your own lust-driven psychology with these kinds of comments.

Your psychology is lust-driven as well, just in a different way. Also, I agree

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                    | with you that boredom is in the eyes of the beholder...which is why I always found it strange that you, a supposed philosopher, would call me boring! Maybe you were trying to get a rise out of me, to see how reactive I am, to see if I'm feminine or not. You were probably doing that to teach me. You were paying attention to teaching me, instead of paying attention to Truth, because...ummmm.... I just don't see the point in all of that. You seem to like who you are perceived as, in being a philosopher, and that "fame" is what drives you to reason. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2068(1/14/04 2:25 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> To want the feminine gone in women is essentially to want women gone. This is actual misogyny. Hatred is simply hatred. Kevin and David are misogynists. I don't like their unsmiling. I would smash them if they were given any kind of power outside the unripe truth in their books.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2069(1/14/04 2:34 pm)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Nox, you tool, I don't advocate the eradication of anyone. Go back to your studies.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 254(1/14/04 2:36 pm)Reply  | Re: Eugenics <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Can you gives us some references to Testosterone therapy for females? <hr/> If you search google you'll probably find a lot more than these: www.anti-agingmd.com/testoterone.html www.rense.com/general39/girlpower.htm www.findarticles.com/cf_dls/m0FQP/4645_132/105476599/p1/article.jhtml www.antiaginggroup.com/p/26.html |

www.cnn.com/HEALTH/library/WO/00019.html
www.liv4evr.com/ten\_pillars/testosterone.php
www.lubbockonline.com/news/042897/governme.htm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2070
(1/14/04 2:38 pm)
Reply

Re: Eugenics

---

Kevin, if you were my baby, I'd suckle you on ephemerol and scan your head off before I had to change your nappy.

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 68
(1/14/04 2:50 pm)
Reply

Re: Eugenics

---

Quote:

---

To want the feminine gone in women is essentially to want women gone.

---

This statement proves Kevin and David's point.

The removal of just one quality and Woman is gone, is that all you think that a Woman is worth, her femininity?

Its hard to see through all that social conditioning isn't it mate?

Stop thinking with your dick UberMan ;)

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1245
(1/14/04 2:50 pm)
Reply

baby strangling

---

Quote:

---

Killed at birth? That's a new one. Not a bad idea, though.

If I remember correctly, you said it. [/quote[

Oh, he said it alright, but men have such memory pro

---

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2071
(1/14/04 2:56 pm)
Reply

Re: baby strangling

---

Nox---

Quote:

---

The removal of just one quality and Woman is gone, is that all you think that a Woman is worth, her femininity?

---

Oh? Do you think women should be more masculine?! Why defend David and Kevin?! Are they that pitiful?! Woman is worth herself, not what makes her what she is.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 255
(1/14/04 3:24 pm)
Reply

Natural change

---

We love children, but we help their growth into adults by sending them to school, and eventually, out into the big, hard world by themselves. We help them to change. By helping something to change we don't hate the thing that is changing, or the thing it has changed from.

It is the same with women, who are in a state of evolution from what they are now, to what they will become. In helping women to become more independent, more rational, more masculine, it doesn't mean that you hate what they are now, or what they were. It is all a matter of the acceptance of natural change.

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2072(1/14/04 3:34 pm)Reply       | Re: Natural change <hr/> You liken women to children, but men are still more childlike. I do not see women becoming more masculine. Your curiosity-piece about rich women sucking back testosterone makes you appear to be a gossipy old trout. Men do not naturally change into women, they become what they are. It is the same with women, and all their differences. You are afraid of beauty. And it will be remembered what I have already said about your intelligence.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 736(1/14/04 3:35 pm)Reply | Re: Eugenics <hr/> Kevin: If you search google you'll probably find a lot more than these: www.anti-agingmd.com/testoterone.htmlwww.rense.com/general39/girlpower.htmwww.findarticles.com/cf_dls/m0FQP/4645_132/105476599/p1/article.jhtmlwww.antiaginggroup.com/p/26.htmlwww.cnn.com/HEALTH/library/WO/00019.htmlwww.liv4evr.com/ten_pillars/testosterone.phpwww.lubbockonline.com/news/042897/governme.htm Thanks, Kevin! |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 592(1/14/04 3:40 pm)Reply        | ... <hr/> What a fucking load of horseshit, Kevin! You don't know what women are evolving into. You are forcing them to evolve. Of course, that is theoretically (I don't actually see any women evolving with your ideas).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 69

(1/14/04 3:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Eugenics

---

Quote:

---

Oh? Do you think women should be more masculine?!

---

No, I am not under the influence of bigoted generalizations.

Quote:

---

Why defend David and Kevin?!

---

I don't fully know their stance on any issue so I will not endorse or defend these two, nor do I think they need it. All I am doing is stating my opinion's.

Quote:

---

Woman is worth herself, not what makes her what she is.

---

You should give Woman more credit than that.

If a woman is to earnestly pursue Enlightenment then she must abandoned attachments and conditionings in all forms, no matter how exaggerated or subtle they are.

The process of logically mastering mental fabrications and casualty for the purpose of moving beyond fabrications and beyond cause and effect is a mentally masculine endeavor, like it or not.

Nothing fruitful will ever develop in the mind of a cutesy, little bubbly blonde, with an ass in a skirt and tits bigger than her head...ever. And doesn't she deserve salvation as well?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 593
(1/14/04 3:47 pm)
Reply

...

---

The removal of just one quality and Woman is gone, is that all you think that a Woman is worth, her femininity?

Of course a woman is worth her femininity. Just the same as a man is worth his masculinity. If you remove one quality, "reason", from a man, he becomes a woman! (according to the QRS dogma)

If there was actually a group of women which tried to rid masculinity from men, it would be the same. It would be considered horrible, and based off of hatred.

Let both sexes drink from the fountain of wisdom, without imposing false judgements on either one.

John
Registered User
Posts: 46
(1/14/04 5:05 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

voce io

If there was actually a group of women which tried to rid masculinity from men, it would be the same. It would be considered horrible, and based off of hatred.

How dare you accuse these fine wise men of hatred! ;)

In Buddhism there is a teaching of the three poisons, 'lust', 'hatred' and 'ignorance'. Their stance on women show all three poisons. Being wise of course they will dress it up so it will not appear that way to themselves or others. In fact, it's pure reason they shout!

Let both sexes drink from the fountain of wisdom, without imposing false judgements on either one.

Here is wisdom from a respected zen master, Hakuin.

"Well, if a person really has a mind to reach the basic ground that has been realised and confirmed by the Zen patriarchs, it is by no means impossible. As a start, he should work on the koan 'Does a dog have Buddha Nature?' If he concentrates on it single-mindedly and keeps at it for a long time without wavering or faltering, he is certain to break through to realisation. He must not stop there, however. He must cast all that he has attained aside, and turn to tackle one of the difficult-to-pass koans. If he proceeds this way, he will surely come to see that the ground where the ancients lived and functioned is not found at any level of intellectual understanding."

From the above it can be seen that women are not hindered by men and men are not hindered by women, provided they have the 'mind to reach the basic ground that has been realised and confirmed by the Zen patriarchs'.

John

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2074

(1/14/04 8:27 pm)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

suergaz:---Woman is worth herself, not what makes her what she is.

Nox:---You should give Woman more credit than that.

If a woman is to earnestly pursue Enlightenment then she must abandoned attachments and conditionings in all forms, no matter how exaggerated or subtle they are.

The process of logically mastering mental fabrications and casualty for the purpose of moving beyond fabrications and beyond cause and effect is a mentally masculine endeavor, like it or not.

Nothing fruitful will ever develop in the mind of a cutesy, little bubbly blonde, with an ass in a skirt and tits bigger than her head...ever. And doesn't she deserve salvation as well?

---

No-one is worth what makes them what they are, only what they are. One is never entirely that which makes one what one is. This has been a problem for thinkers of many kinds for many thousands of years.

You are from a different land than I. I do not associate with women misguided enough to pursue enlightenment.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1247
(1/15/04 1:13 am)
Reply

eugenics

---

Quote:

---

The removal of just one quality and Woman is gone, is that all you think that a Woman is worth, her femininity?

---

It's more like an array or whole group of qualities, not exactly the basic homo sapien, whatever that is, but all of that which makes a female human, and to be replaced by traits that are male human.

But sometimes he wants to retain the vagina and womb, which puzzles me. Perhaps for emergency backup.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1251
(1/15/04 4:30 am)
Reply

eugenics

---

Quote:

---

These men are indeed lovers of women as they want them to be, but they are haters of women as they don't want them to be - for example, as philosophers, and as strong, independent individuals who don't need men, and probably even look down upon men.

---

You have made some good points, Kevin, about how men over thousands of years can, via sexual selection, influence women's development for the worse. Sadly, I think they have also influenced men's development for the worse. This is all part of a theme I've been slowly putting forth here - much of all these complaints arose with the advent of civilization, a crisis in our species from which we may or may not emerge alive.

I'm not trying to idealize the noble savage, but there are really some well-thought-out books on this topic. Some changes that tend to arrive with the advent of civilization as a direct result of an altered view of nature, the ownership of food, and the division of labor are these: a tendency to see things dualistically, feeling separate from the web of nature, hierarchies that oppress both men and women, a shunting of values needed for basic emotional development onto women but a divorce of both women and men from their own inner spiritual guidance and a reliance on a separate priesthood, loss of democracy and individual independence. For a couple of reasons, women pretty much always get the shaft in this situation. It is interesting to watch people as they traverse from say, nomadic life to more civilized life. In the nomadic life, even if the only civilizing item they have adopted is Islam, the women are freely moving entities who do hard work and are actively involved in the activity and survival of the tribe. Many such people have ideals of behavior for both genders that can be called masculine. Mohammed himself fought in combat against women! And when he got some women to swear allegiance to him, they held out their hands, expecting it to be shaken as dictated in the culture of that time for an agreement - but Mohammed refused to touch their hands because they were women! Mohammed gets credit for alleviating the lot of women, but it is mostly a lie. He personally instituted some of the worst Islamic offenses, or increased their scope, such as veiling.

Again, while precivilized people were certainly violent, they did not see or engage in the levels of violence that civilization has brought about, nor have the men had to become as submissive and obedient as civilized men, therefore I think men have also deteriorated.

What you don't see is that you are necessarily a product of this civilization, and your solutions are typical for such a product. You appreciate, I know, the stupendous facts of nature and surely you realize that human beings are so great that it seems almost incomprehensible - yet you now feel ready to interfere in this process and you believe you are wiser than it.

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 215
(1/15/04 4:54 am)
Reply

re:

---

"I know that if I was a woman and people kept telling me that women were incapable of doing philosophy, it would only inspire me to redouble my efforts and prove them wrong."

That alone outlines a strong difference between men and women: women have little endurance in such matters, because they are fit for them. On matters of motherhood, though, most are very enduring.

I don't think women should try to be men, but that their traits are transient and will/should be phased out and replaced by science. Whether by perfecting in-vitro procreation or by egg-fields and computerised maternity-programs, the necessity of women lessens to a point where it is null. Trying to transform them into men to salvage them is a good way to keep them alive, but it would be a lot easier to simply not breed them at all.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1255

(1/15/04 7:38 am)

Reply

cut your losses!

---

Quote:

---

Trying to transform them into men to salvage them is a good way to keep them alive, but it would be a lot easier to simply not breed them at all.

---

Well put. That's what I've been trying to tell David. There's just too much re-engineering involved. I mean, why try to tweak and tweak a squirrel to turn it into a rabbit or something?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2028

(1/15/04 9:15 am)

Reply

Re: re:

---

Ynithrix wrote:

Quote:

---

I don't think women should try to be men, but that their traits are transient and will/should be phased out and replaced by science. Whether by perfecting in-vitro procreation or by egg-fields and computerised maternity-programs, the necessity of women lessens to a point where it is null. Trying to transform them into men to salvage them is a good way to keep them alive, but it would be a lot easier to simply not breed them at all.

---

Yes, genetically changing their traits over many generations to make them more open to wisdom and spiritual development would prove far more successful than trying to force women as they currently are into a life of truth. I've come to the conclusion that the latter course of action, which I've been trying to implement for many years, has virtually no chance of success at all.

Of course, I'm realistic enough to know that the chances of the human race consciously deciding that wisdom is far more important than women and sex, and acting accordingly, are virtually nil. It is a major spiritual hurdle and I doubt that the human race has what it takes to get over it. Instead, what it is probably going to happen is that the human race will continue to stagnate in its present level of spiritual development (which is currently very low) and not progress any further until it becomes extinct.

However, one thing that I can see happening, perhaps, is the replacement of women by androids or simulations. Since women aspire to the perfect ideal of feminine beauty and sexuality, and since they will never measure up to this ideal, they are in danger of being superceded by entities that can better approximate it. If this happens, there is a possibility that women might die out as a species.

--

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

It's more like an array or whole group of qualities, not exactly the basic homo sapien, whatever that is, but all of that which makes a a female human, and to be replaced by traits that are male human.

---

Men will need modification too. Greater ability to spacially reason, more mental focus, more imagination, more intuitive abilities, more courage, more inner discipline, and so on.

Quote:

---

But sometimes he wants to retain the vagina and womb, which puzzles me. Perhaps for emergency backup.

---

It's just my way of saying that femininity is my main focus in all of this, and not really women themselves.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 20
(1/15/04 10:27 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

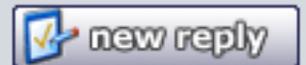

To want the feminine gone in women is essentially to want women gone. This is actual misogyny. Hatred is simply hatred.

---

Hence, why they got kicked out of the NPU forum. I rest my case.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

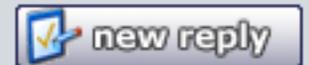

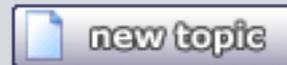

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

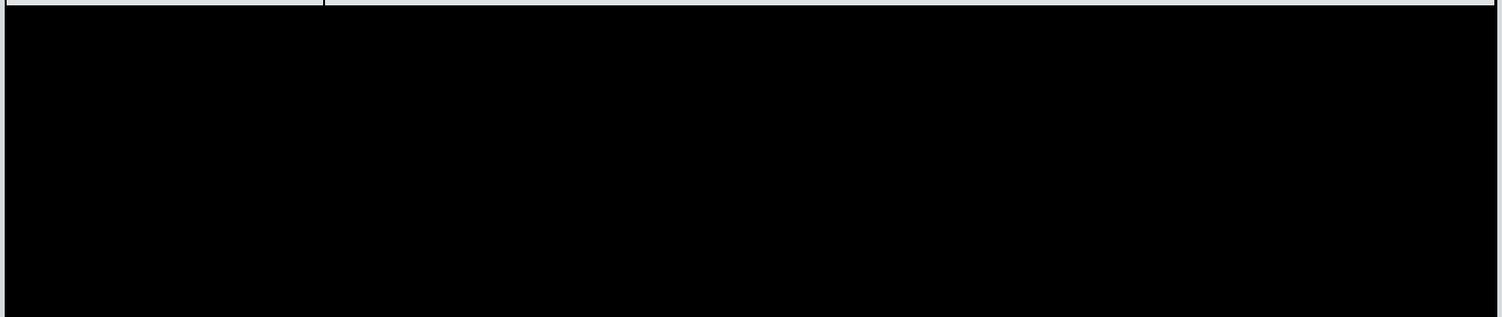

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1613(1/15/04 10:49 am)Reply | NPU <hr/> As a still current member of Neo Plus Ultra Brainless, I can assure all here that the reason - the only reason - that David was "kicked off" is because all too many of its significant participants are thoroughly insane, one self-professedly so. I assume that you are in fact from that forum. Unless I've missed something in the interim I can think of no other reason why you would even know about David's history there. No doubt, of course, that what I've just said will get back there all too soon. Such is the nature of the lunacy exhibited at that board. Indeed, the tone of this very thread is disturbingly similar.... Dan Rowden |

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 261
(1/15/04 11:41 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

KRussel wrote:

Quote:

---

"To want the feminine gone in women is essentially to want women gone. This is actual misogyny. Hatred is simply hatred."

Hence, why they got kicked out of the NPU forum. I rest my case.

---

"To want to educate and rear children is to want children gone. This is actual hatred of children. Hatred is simply hatred."

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 740
(1/15/04 1:09 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Kevin: "To want to educate and rear children is to want children gone. This is actual hatred of children. Hatred is simply hatred."

A smattering comparison so far-fetched that it is outright paradoxical. To want to eliminate the female from either women, men, or the world is foolish and certainly futile, because the female principle is universal. Yin (as in Yinitrix) is a principle of nature. It is ideally in balance with Yang. Hence all development, naturally tends to a balance of Yin and Yang. States of balance lead to growth (of individuals and populations); imbalanced states lead to decline. An equal 50:50 distribution of XX and XY chromosomes is evolutionary stable. The 50:50 principle can be observed even in the DNA-RNA dialogue, the most fundamental expression of life.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 262

(1/15/04 1:43 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

To want to eliminate the female from either women, men, or the world is foolish and certainly futile, because the female principle is universal. Yin (as in Yinitrix) is a principle of nature.

---

"To want to eliminate extreme submissiveness and mindless passivity from one's behaviour is foolish and futile, because the female principle is universal."

The fault of this statement can be clearly seen. Just because unconsciousness and passivity is one basic principle of Nature doesn't mean we should encourage it in people!

Quote:

---

It is ideally in balance with Yang.

---

I explained in another thread that Yin and Yang are in fact not two different things, but are two different aspects of Nature, or two views of Nature. They are not "in balance", but they are both simply in everything by the very nature of those things. And I mean the two are equally in literally everything, and necessarily so. They are both equally in extreme violence and also in extreme passivity and unconsciousness.

Quote:

---

Hence all development, naturally tends to a balance of Yin and Yang.

---

New Age nonsense.

Quote:

---

States of balance lead to growth (of individuals and populations); imbalanced states lead to decline.

---

To the contrary, states of imbalance lead to growth, while balance leads to stagnation and decline. For example, when a comet or asteroid hits the planet and wipes out 90% of all species on the planet, this gives rise to a new period of evolution and growth.

In the human sphere periods of war lead to much scientific advancement.

Imbalance leads to diversity, which is good.

Quote:

---

An equal 50:50 distribution of XX and XY chromosomes is evolutionary stable.

---

This is because the key to sexual reproduction is diversity, which helps us to adapt to imbalance.

KS

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2036

(1/15/04 1:48 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

To want to eliminate the female from either women, men, or the world is foolish and certainly futile, because the female principle is universal.

---

Kevin and I are not trying to get rid of the female principle altogether, only change its expression from submission to people and emotions to submission to truth. In this way, Yin and Yang is maintained, while feminine qualities in humans are eliminated.

Quote:

---

Yin (as in Yinitrix) is a principle of nature. It is ideally in balance with Yang. Hence all development, naturally tends to a balance of Yin and Yang. States of balance lead to growth (of individuals and populations); imbalanced states lead to decline. An equal 50:50 distribution of XX and XY chromosomes is evolutionary stable. The 50:50 principle can be observed even in the DNA-RNA dialogue, the most fundamental expression of life.

---

If our ancestors had this attitude, we would still be living in grass huts. There is no reason to suppose that better, more wisdom-friendly forms of genetic stability do not exist.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 31

(1/15/04 1:51 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

To want to eliminate the female from either women, men, or the world is foolish and certainly futile, because the female principle is universal. Yin (as in Yinitrix) is a principle of nature. It is ideally in balance with Yang. Hence all development, naturally tends to a balance of Yin and Yang. States of balance lead to growth (of individuals and populations); imbalanced states lead to decline. An equal 50:50 distribution of XX and XY chromosomes is evolutionary stable. The 50:50 principle can be observed even in the DNA-RNA dialogue, the most fundamental expression of life.

---

Yeah. I tried to get that across in the other thread. As you know, the Chinese term for it is 'Taiji,' or 'Supreme Ultimate' - the co-substantial union of yin and yang. My own favored term for it is 'Universal Dialectic.' No matter what we call it, though, it is the fundamental principle of Nature itself. Beyond it is only the 'all-encompassing emptiness' of the Tao or Sunyata, which cannot be concieved of in the dualistic framework of language or, for that matter, thought. So, in terms of what we are able to concieve of through reason, the yin/yang principle is as basic as it gets, which is why this grudge against femininity is so ill-concieved and out of place among people who otherwise seem to value reason.

Edited by: Naturyl  at: 1/15/04 1:53 pm

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1262

(1/15/04 2:10 pm)

Reply

re--

---

Quote:

---

The fault of this statement can be clearly seen. Just because unconsciousness and passivity is one basic principle of Nature doesn't mean we should encourage it in people!

---

But the problem is you guys insist that women are far more pathetic than they are. As I have shown more than once, women are never as obedient as men. Much of this kind of thing is forced into them by culture, cultures like our own, which denigrate the female from birth to death, and discourage a girl from having any confidence whatsoever. And yet, whenever girls are free from that heavy hand, you find them springing up being warriors, being leaders, taking public stands, demonstrating great personal courage, fighting Indians in the wild west, being sharpshooters, you name it.

And the number of times that women have been beaten and killed singly or in small numbers for trying to go against this tide is tragic.

I knew since age 5 that it was wrong to say that no female should ever physically enter the alter due to her being female, and so I went into every single one. But I only recently told my mother and my kids about it.

All this love and protection wears off very quickly when men feel threatened.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2038

(1/15/04 2:20 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

Beyond it is only the 'all-encompassing emptiness' of the Tao or Sunyata, which cannot be concieved of in the dualistic framework of language or, for that matter, thought. So, in terms of what we are able to concieve of through reason, the yin/yang principle is as basic as it gets, which is why this grudge against femininity is so ill-concieved and out of place among people who otherwise seem to value reason.

---

As Kevin says, this is New Age nonsense. It is the bizarre attempt to turn human qualities into cosmic attributes. It is essentially no different to the fundamentalist Christian who believes that God looks like a man.

By the same argument you propose, we should also endeavour to keep our evil qualities, so as to maintain a balance with our good ones. And keep our violence to balance our peace-loving urges. And our misogyny to balance our respect for women. And so on. Yin and Yang demands it.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 608
(1/15/04 3:19 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Yes, David, and that's exactly how things ARE! Enlightenment is knowledge of what is.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 34
(1/15/04 3:43 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

I said nothing about 'endeavoring to keep' anything. You don't 'endeavor to keep' the dandelions in your yard each spring. They just grow, because that's how nature is.

I'm not imbuing femininity with New Age qualities or anything of the sort. Besides, the yin/yang concept is from the I Ching, which I should think is a bit too old to be considered 'New Age.' Was Thomas' bit about DNA/RNA pairs 'New Age' rubbish as well?

There is nothing nonsensical about observing that things occur in pairs of opposites. This holds true straight from the absolute rock bottom of quantum mechanical virtual particle creation all the way to the infinite cycle of thermodynamic equilibrium and chaotic inflation which governs the origin and fate of entire universes. It is is even the basis of your celebrated A=A: a thing gains its identity from the fact that there exists 'everything else' which is not that thing. This/that, subject/object, mind/body, materialism/idealism, man/woman, yin/yang... it's all the same idea. You've always got two polarities, and they complement each other in some sense.

Of course, you would instantly assent to all of this if it wasn't being used to undermine your defense of anti-feminism. Because it is threatening that most important construct, however, it must be labelled 'New Age nonsense.'

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 448

(1/15/04 4:50 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

As far as I'm concerned there are few differences in the way men and women actually think, except because of past causes men are far more inclined to be wilder, more erratic than women, while women are more stable. Men thus have more experience and are better at coping with extreme situations but are less capable coping with stable situations, while women are the reverse.

Western women now have the freedom of men and are making use of it. In time more of them will seek wilder mental experiences.

We may appear to think differently because of the differences in our respective actions but is that a case of actually thinking differently or just one of coming to different conclusions due to different historical causes. When it comes down to it, all human thoughts are merely combinations of Off/On, with the evolved brain structure and memories determining what is turned off or on. Surely both brains have the capacity to learn the fairly elementary principles of enlightenment - given the right circumstances. It seems to me that enlightenment is only difficult because of the human-relationship mumbo jumbo we have already learnt and experienced.

Enlightenment is a individualists game. Enlightenment is not something that could be obtained by groups, at least not at this stage of human development, so why bother generalising it and talking about whether the group of women can obtain it or not.

For those who believe in enlightenment, shouldn't it be more important to do things that will save future potential thinkers from the scourge of capitalism which is slowly making us all alike, making us into people with equal feminine and masculine traits regardless of our sex. It is effectively removing the extreme bits of men while enhancing the feminine of women and men. You can sell more stuff to both blokes and women that way.

We have to make sure they aren't cut out from influencing people because of the impossibility of getting past the jetstream of bullshit relationship, material and entertainment influences. I don't care if 99% of the population are sheep as that has it's benefits, but over the next few centuries there is a danger that the deeper thinkers will become unable to influence others, because when growing up they'll never get a chance to see the forest from the trees.

I'm not against capitalism, as I see it as the only way for us to move above enlightenment, but it is a powerbase increasingly in the hands of fewer people as companies get bigger and that is now controlling politics across the whole world.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 744
(1/15/04 5:53 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

David: As Kevin says, this is New Age nonsense. It is the bizarre attempt to turn human qualities into cosmic attributes. It is essentially no different to the fundamentalist Christian who believes that God looks like a man.

There is nothing new-agey about Yin and Yang, or the female and male principle. It exists almost as long as life on Earth itself. Here is a scientific view:

"Asexual reproduction is still used by some organisms but in general failed to pass the test of natural selection. Sexual reproduction is the favored way of reproducing for many organisms. In sexual reproduction, new combinations of genes can be assembled on the same chromosomes through recombination. Independent assortment during meiosis, which changes combinations of chromosomes, generates endless genetic diversity. This variation enables a species to overcome novel environmental changes by fast adaptive change. In asexual reproduction, however, natural selection has to wait for some sort of mutation or change due to drift to take place, to act on. Sexual reproduction can also put two beneficial mutations together (although there is always a possibility to break a favorable combination too), or eliminate a deleterious one. The phenomenon that a favorable combination of genes may be broken during meiosis is called the 'cost of recombination'. Overall, groups reproducing sexually can evolve more quickly than those do not, because the combination of beneficial mutations will occur more quickly and deleterious mutations will accumulate more slowly." (Evolution of Sexual Reproduction, M.Tevfik Dorak, B.A. (Hons), M.D., Ph.D. 2003)

If you are willing to abstract the female/male principles from its strictly biological meaning -as the I Ching did with the introduction of the Yin/Yang concept- and assign more abstract properties to it, then you can use this model to explain a great deal of processes in the universe, namely all processes that involve antipodal forces or strategies. In this regard, I see Yin and Yang as an early form of game theory, where opposite strategies are employed in a mathematical game. The question is whether a given system has an equilibrium or whether the system oscillates. Equilibrate systems tend to be evolutionary stable.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2041
(1/15/04 6:46 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

There is nothing nonsensical about observing that things occur in pairs of opposites. This holds true straight from the absolute rock bottom of quantum mechanical virtual particle creation all the way to the infinite cycle of thermodynamic equilibrium and chaotic inflation which governs the origin and fate of entire universes. It is is even the basis of your celebrated A=A: a thing gains its identity from the fact that there exists 'everything else' which is not that thing. This/that, subject/object, mind/body, materialism/idealism, man/woman, yin/yang... it's all the same idea. You've always got two polarities, and they complement each other in some sense.

---

Alrighty, why don't we work towards a world in which 50% of the world's population are following the "QRS" philosophy and abandoning their feminine natures for the sake of becoming very wise, while the other 50% continue doing what they do now and revel in their femininity? That would surely make a nice balance and conform to the universal yin and yang.

What do you think?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2042
(1/15/04 6:59 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Thomas Knierim wrote:

Quote:

---

David: As Kevin says, this is New Age nonsense. It is the bizarre attempt to turn human qualities into cosmic attributes. It is essentially no different to the fundamentalist Christian who believes that God looks like a man.

Thomas: There is nothing new-agy ababout Yin and Yang, or the female and male principle. It exists almost as long as life on Earth itself.

Here is a scientific view:

"Asexual reproduction is still used by some organisms but in general failed to pass the test of natural selection. Sexual reproduction is the favored way of reproducing for many organisms. In sexual reproduction, new combinations of genes can be assembled on the same chromosomes through recombination. Independent assortment during meiosis, which changes combinations of chromosomes, generates endless genetic diversity. This variation enables a species to overcome novel environmental changes by fast adaptive change. In asexual reproduction, however, natural selection has to wait for some sort of mutation or change due to drift to take place, to act on. Sexual reproduction can also put two beneficial mutations together (although there is always a possibility to break a favorable combination too), or eliminate a deleterious one. The phenomenon that a favorable combination of genes may be broken during meiosis is called the 'cost of recombination'. Overall, groups reproducing sexually can evolve more quickly than those do not, because the combination of beneficial mutations will occur more quickly and deleterious mutations will accumulate more slowly." (Evolution of Sexual Reproduction, M.Tevfik Dorak, B.A. (Hons), M.D., Ph.D. 2003)

---

While I acknowledge the truth of this passage, it doesn't provide any reason why feminine consciousness cannot be phased out. We can still have the two sexes contributing 50% of their genetic material, and yet have each sex possessing a masculine human consciousness.

Quote:

---

If you are willing to abstract the female/male principles from its strictly biological meaning -as the I Ching did with the introduction of the Yin/Yang concept- and assign more abstract properties to it, then you can use this model to explain a great deal of processes in the universe, namely all processes that involve antipodal forces or strategies. In this regard, I see Yin and Yang as an early form of game theory, where opposite strategies are employed in a mathematical game. The question is whether a given system has an equilibrium or whether the system oscillates. Equilibrate systems tend to be evolutionary stable.

---

You're assuming in all of this that the current system of feminine women and masculine men is the only "equilibrate system" available to us. I dispute this. I can see no reason why the human race cannot evolve into a higher equilibrate state featuring a different pair of opposites - a pair that is closer to sagehood than the current one.

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 217

(1/15/04 10:13 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

"Western women now have the freedom of men and are making use of it. In time more of them will seek wilder mental experiences."

But to what end? Firstly, why does it matter that women are thinking--their bodies are built as mother, not as intellect. If we are to suffer the existence of women, they should be women, not inferior specimens of men.

Secondly, what purpose is there waiting for the off-chance that women might one day become more manlike--why not get rid of them and breed only men, if that is the intent.

Western women have no such freedom, they still have imposed on them the pressures they always have had, just different pressures, pressures sending them in different directions, wrong directions. Pressures which encourage them to pursue careers that they have almost no chance of succeeding in. And in consequence of this, the 'Western woman' is a delusional and ultra-ambitious waste of space.

"It is a major spiritual hurdle and I doubt that the human race has what it takes to get over it. Instead, what it is probably going to happen is that the human race will continue to stagnate in its present level of spiritual development (which is currently very low) and not progress any further until it becomes extinct."

Indeed. I can see you have little hope in humanity doing what is wise and so try to make the best of the situation -that man has too much pity and 'love' for woman to let her be phased out- by suggesting trying to educate women. But I don't think this will work, because feminism -as with all minority/inferior groups- has a tendency to pressure the government into altering qualification-granting so that it benefits the group they venerate. For example, the feminist-infested education systems across the world work to alter teaching methods and examination so as to venerate the female student, making qualification easier for her, thus creating a state where women seem more academically-able. The NYC fire service is another well known example.

I fear that the same could happen if women are too much encouraged to follow a path of wisdom: that it might be forcibly changed when they fail. That feminists would notice that women haven't a chance at achieving, so they work to either lessen it's status (so that they can shrug it off), or by simply advocating some other form of well-crafted lie to draw attention away from it. Either way would be deletrious to those who seek wisdom.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 21
(1/16/04 8:52 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

ksolway wrote:

Quote:

---

"To want to educate and rear children is to want children gone. This is actual hatred of children. Hatred is simply hatred."

---

That's a complete distortion of what suergaz said and you know it.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2047
(1/16/04 9:31 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Ynithrix wrote:

Quote:

---

I fear that the same could happen if women are too much encouraged to follow a path of wisdom: that it might be forcibly changed when they fail. That feminists would notice that women haven't a chance at achieving, so they work to either lessen it's status (so that they can shrug it off), or by simply advocating some other form of well-crafted lie to draw attention away from it. Either way would be deletrious to those who seek wisdom.

---

It's already been happening for thousands of years, alas. One of the major reasons why there are so few philosophical geniuses and enlightened sages in the world is because the conventional conceptions of enlightenment and the spiritual path have been completely altered and falsified so as to make them more woman-friendly.

So nowadays when the average person thinks of the spiritual path he doesn't think of great knowledge, rationality, heroics, courage and the pioneering spirit. Instead, he thinks of gullible worshippers, new age crackpots, womanly do-gooders, refuges for weak people, teary emotions, psychological crutches, and the like. And as a result, all the best young people with the greatest potential for wisdom are turned off from thinking about spirituality and enlightenment altogether. Who can blame them?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1277

(1/16/04 10:29 am)

Reply

!

---

This pisses me off because it is men in power who suppress these things, and it is one of several reasons why they also keep women suppressed - because the innate outlook and wisdom of women would cause rebellion against the status quo, always has, always will, and the various suppressions always include the suppression of women, the more suppressive the system the more women must be included in it. The idea that women are behind the current low level of religion is so monstrous a lie that it just shows simultaneously the kind of justice we can expect from superior men such as yourself.

Did you ever hear that the best way to get people to believe a lie is to make it really fantastic?

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 38

(1/16/04 10:38 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Alrighty, why don't we work towards a world in which 50% of the world's population are following the "QRS" philosophy and abandoning their feminine natures for the sake of becoming very wise, while the other 50% continue doing what they do now and revel in their femininity? That would surely make a nice balance and conform to the universal yin and yang.

What do you think?

---

It isn't for me to say. If you wish to work toward such a world, very well. It is your prerogative to do so. If you feel that you are capable of convincing people to 'abandon' an essential and universal element of human nature, your imagination must be powerful indeed. Perhaps, after achieving success, you might consider getting people to 'abandon' teeth as well - they are always decaying and saddling us with dental expenses which are another hindrance we might do well to 'get rid of.' Having done away with femininity, it should be child's play to have people renounce teeth. Like the process used to get rid of the 'feminine nature,' you should be able to just wish the pesky little buggers away and watch them vanish.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 267
(1/16/04 11:07 am)
Reply

Natural growth

---

krussel quoted suergaz:

Quote:

---

To want the feminine gone in women is essentially to want women gone. This is actual misogyny. Hatred is simply hatred.

---

and added:

Quote:

---

Hence, why they got kicked out of the NPU forum. I rest my case.

---

I then modified the original statement slightly to show up its extreme falsity:

"To want to educate and rear children is to want children gone. This is actual hatred of children. Hatred is simply hatred."

krussel replied:

Quote:

---

That's a complete distortion of what suergaz said and you know it.

---

To say that "the feminine has to be eliminated" only means that in the process of natural change and growth the feminine has to be surpassed. The feminine is a natural stage of growth, but we must ensure that we don't get stuck there, for the same reason as we don't want our children to be stuck as children for their whole lives.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2051(1/16/04 11:13 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Naturyl wrote: Quote: <hr/> If you feel that you are capable of convincing people to 'abandon' an essential and universal element of human nature, your imagination must be powerful indeed. <hr/> People are already abandoning an essential and universal element of human nature - namely, serious thought about the Infinite - for the sake of becoming more feminine and being closer to women. I would like to see this situation reversed. There can only be one or the other. It's either the Infinite or women/femininity. We can't have both. |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 616
(1/16/04 11:18 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

David, we obviously do have both.

Kevin, what basis do you have for saying women are inferior? You can try to list generalized, perceived traits...but that can easily be disproven by saying your perception is off. Also, children have to go to school in order to function in society, in order to survive. You can't logically relate women to children.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2053
(1/16/04 11:21 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

David, we obviously do have both

---

Women certainly like to think so.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 268
(1/16/04 12:04 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

What basis do you have for saying women are inferior?

---

Firstly, I should make clear that women are certainly not blanket "inferior". They are only inferior in a certain context. And that context is primarily serious philosophical or rational thought. By "serious thought", I don't mean academic thought, or social, business, or mere intuitive thought. By "serious thought" I mean deeply penetrative, consistent, freely and openly applied, and dangerous thought, powered by a great love of truth at all costs, and which is carried out on a purely individual basis, regardless of what anyone else thinks, regardless of human feelings, and of all other consequences.

I could write hundreds of pages about the inadequacies of women in this regard, but I have no need as you can find many of these listed in books like Sex and Character.

Quote:

---

You can try to list generalized, perceived traits...but that can easily be disproven by saying your perception is off.

---

Yes, but that can be said of any empirical observation. It might be the case that women don't even truly exist, which would make all of our observations of them way off the mark.

Quote:

---

Also, children have to go to school in order to function in society, in order to survive. You can't logically relate women to children.

---

It may be the case that in order for the human species to survive and evolve, the feminine-minded need to "go to school".

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 428
(1/16/04 12:09 pm)
Reply

--

---

Heh. :)

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 429
(1/16/04 12:12 pm)
Reply

--

---

I was having my hair cut at the barber. He's 64 years old. As part of his 'barber patter' he said something I thought was interesting:
"When I was young I spent my money on bubblegum and wild women."
Then he paused and said: "I should have spent it on bubblegum." The wisdom of 64 years?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 751
(1/16/04 12:45 pm)
Reply

Re: Natural growth

---

David: While I acknowledge the truth of this passage, it doesn't provide any reason why feminine consciousness cannot be phased out. We can still have the two sexes contributing 50% of their genetic material, and yet have each sex possessing a masculine human consciousness.

I hope you thought about this carefully. Before phasing out the female mind you should really make sure that humanity has no more need for it. The female mind is a result of adaptation to a role concerned with giving birth and raising children (the male contribution to this function is small by comparison). This is obviously an important function for humanity, one for which there is no replacement. The male mind is the result of adaptation to a role concerned with the provisioning food. However, since humanity moved from foraging to farming, the provision of food became a lot easier. In fact, agriculture has been so successful that a few farming males would be sufficient to provide food and sperm to a great number of females. Consequently, it seems more reasonable to suggest that males may be phased out, or respectively be kept at the minimum number required to obtain food for the females and for themselves.

By now you will have noticed that I am not entirely serious about this. It is just to demonstrate the absurdity of this line of thought. Of course, populations tend to a 50:50 gender distribution so that 'phasing out males' would have been quite impractical, regardless of how advanced agriculture became. So what to do with all the surplus males after agriculture? Luckily they found another occupation for themselves. It is easy to guess which one. Can you name it?

Thomas

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 619
(1/16/04 12:48 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Firstly, I should make clear that women are certainly not blanket "inferior". They are only inferior in a certain context. And that context is primarily serious philosophical or rational thought....

How do you know that for sure?

Yes, but that can be said of any empirical observation. It might be the case that women don't even truly exist, which would make all of our observations of them way off the mark.

Right. I thought the truth was absolute, though?

It may be the case that in order for the human species to survive and evolve, the feminine-minded need to "go to school".

That's entirely speculation.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 246
(1/16/04 1:06 pm)
Reply

Re: --

---

It is obvious to anyone that becomes enlightened - that removes the egotistical filters etc from their way of perceiving the world, that the essence of Kevin and David's thoughts about women are valid.

Even if an enlightened person happened to visit this forum for the first time and were from the backblocks of Laos, or the skyscrapers of new York, they would agree.

It's not merely conjecture.

To value femininity is to not value enlightenment.

To value enlightenment is to not value femininity.

Simple as that.

A few times i have thought about engineering them the other way though, starting by deleting the larynx...

To go a step further, if they didn't have conceptual/language capacity at all, they'd be free of delusion (but not enlightened!), and the blokes would likely have a much better chance of developing wisdom.

I'm sure it's all too complex to work out, and i'd much rather them be able to evolve to accomodate truth.

In regards to the comments about Ne Plus Ultra, i thought their actions were quite scary, in the sense that they are people that are influencing our world. I knew that they would have a lot of problems with the truth, but they really lost the plot and became utterly blinded by their attachment to unfounded notions. It was quite obviously a lynching.

They even quoted some of the best pieces of writing (funnily enough) from the minefield, and then proceeded to laugh at it. I was quite perplexed by their insecurity and close-mindedness.

Not only that, i didn't get to see the final days because they locked the forum to outsiders, surely not a good sign. I imagine that they will delete the thread asap so that their gross stupidities aren't seen by any more people than already have.

And yet, maybe they think it was all fine and well, despite the fact that they grossly contravened their own policy regarding personal attacks and language use etc (I hope you got a copy of that policy David).

Rhett

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2057

(1/16/04 1:13 pm)

Reply

Re: Natural growth

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Before phasing out the female mind you should really make sure that humanity has no more need for it. The female mind is a result of adaptation to a role concerned with giving birth and raising children (the male contribution to this function is small by comparison). This is obviously an important function for humanity, one for which there is no replacement.

---

Yes, I believe this to be the strongest argument for the retention of feminine consciousness, at least in a certain proportion of the population. People with masculine consciousness naturally find the task of rearing children incredibly tedious. A nanny-class is thus required.

That is essentially the category that women belong to - the nanny class. One possible solution is to replace women with a more sub-human species of nanny, one that is very docile and sexually unattractive to men. That way our children can be adequately looked after, while the masculine-minded population won't be dragged down into pursuing feminine aims - as is the case with the current family man.

Quote:

---

The male mind is the result of adaptation to a role concerned with the provisioning food. However, since humanity moved from foraging to farming, the provision of food became a lot easier. In fact, agriculture has been so successful that a few farming males would be sufficient to provide food and sperm to a great number of females. Consequently, it seems more reasonable to suggest that males may be phased out, or respectively be kept at the minimum number required to obtain food for the females and for themselves.

By now you will have noticed that I am not entirely serious about this. It is just to demonstrate the absurdity of this line of thought. Of course, populations tend to a 50:50 gender distribution so that 'phasing out males' would have been quite impractical, regardless of how advanced agriculture became. So what to do with all the surplus males after agriculture? Luckily they found another occupation for themselves. It is easy to guess which one. Can you name it?

---

Yes, the creation of civilization with all of its labour-saving devices and comforts and entertainments for women.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 753
(1/16/04 1:25 pm)
Reply

Re: Natural growth

---

And 'civilization' is the right answer! You just won a free dinner.
Congratulations.

Thomas

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 620
(1/16/04 1:38 pm)
Reply

Re: Natural growth

---

It is obvious to anyone that becomes enlightened - that removes the egotistical filters etc from their way of perceiving the world, that the essence of Kevin and David's thoughts about women are valid.

Give me proof of why it's obvious to everyone who becomes enlightened.

Even if an enlightened person happened to visit this forum for the first time and were from the backblocks of Laos, or the skyscrapers of new York, they would agree.

No, because it's an empirical 'truth'. Enlightenment has nothing to do with those types of truth.

It's not merely conjecture.

To value femininity is to not value enlightenment.

To value enlightenment is to not value femininity.

Simple as that.

That is right, and that is simple. I would also like to add: To be enlightened, is to not value femininity OR enlightenment. This is not a contradiction, or a flawed thought, doing some disservice to the law of identity.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 269
(1/16/04 2:33 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Yes, but that can be said of any empirical observation. It might be the case that women don't even truly exist, which would make all of our observations of them way off the mark.

Right. I thought the truth was absolute, though?

---

We've always said on this forum that empirical and scientific "truths" are always uncertain. It is only the purely logical truths that are certain.

That physical women have "feminine" attributes is an observational, empirical, uncertain truth.

Quote:

---

Kevin: It may be the case that in order for the human species to survive and evolve, the feminine-minded need to "go to school".

That's entirely speculation.

---

Even if wisdom is not the best thing for the survival of our species, I still think it is the best thing to strive for in any case.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 622
(1/16/04 3:34 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

That physical women have "feminine" attributes is an observational, empirical, uncertain truth.

Wouldn't you also say that "feminine attributes" are altogether purely observational, empirical, and uncertain as well?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 271
(1/16/04 7:54 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

KS: That physical women have "feminine" attributes is an observational, empirical, uncertain truth.

Voce Io: Wouldn't you also say that "feminine attributes" are altogether purely observational, empirical, and uncertain as well?

---

No. These things exist by our definition. If they appear to our mind, they definitely exist, even if they are only imaginary things.

Perhaps you mean that there might not be any "femininity" anywhere in the physical universe at all? Well, if we define "femininity", purely for simplicity's sake, as "unconsciousness", then the question becomes, "Can we be sure there is any unconsciousness in the physical universe?".

And, yes, we can be absolutely sure that there is something unconscious in the physical universe - on purely logical grounds.

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 218

(1/16/04 11:40 pm)

Reply

re: !

---

"Did you ever hear that the best way to get people to believe a lie is to make it really fantastic?"

Is that why you used so many insets in your response, raising adrenaline to make your post more exciting? Of course not, you don't lie--you just talk without understanding (or caring) what is true.

I have always believed Judeo-Christian religious views to be far more pro-woman than anything else. The idea of monogamy, for instance, is every woman's dream--to be the single treasure of a man and master, to have an existence paid for by another and to stay at home rearing children. The wedding celebration is also undoubtably shaped around these dreams, whereas the man simply turns up in black ready to give his freedom away. And of course the endless pity for the weak: the princess-diana syndrome, to wallow in mountains of money given to her by the state, then to go abroad in her endless free time and give it away--what a heroin, what an idol. And the father-figure God. Even the lonliest woman has nothing to fear then.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2076
(1/17/04 1:28 am)
Reply

----

---

Still with the sexes? Let's speak of rank. I am nobler, my person commands more, than anyone here. How much heart do you have for it? My words hold. My meaning is not only more. You can't go to let go when I let you loose before me. Your prosaic points are needed for my sharpest thrust-----
Do not presume to speak of woman, and women, without becoming one!

You men who are hurt by women, there is no-one to blame. Your fight can be with me instead. My value in your stead.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 624
(1/17/04 2:26 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

No. These things exist by our definition. If they appear to our mind, they definitely exist, even if they are only imaginary things.

Exactly, but what if I am not aware of femininity or it's definition? Your argument is not universal, it's only for you; which is fine, but I wouldn't call it philosophy, or truth in the slightest.

Perhaps you mean that there might not be any "femininity" anywhere in the physical universe at all? Well, if we define "femininity", purely for simplicity's sake, as "unconsciousness", then the question becomes, "Can we be sure there is any unconsciousness in the physical universe?".

And, yes, we can be absolutely sure that there is something unconscious in the physical universe - on purely logical grounds.

While I think you can make truthful logical arguments about unconsciousness and women, I don't think you can base them off of anything but your own perception and mind, which is not a reliable source.

Of course, everything is based off of perception, even logic itself...but I don't think that differentiation between objects within perception is an enlightened action. If true/unsurpassed enlightenment is beyond any type of change in perception, and perception itself, then your entire arguement and stance is untrue. Your entire philosophical argument is flawed.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 272

(1/17/04 10:04 am)

Reply

Enlightenment

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

KS: No. These things exist by our definition. If they appear to our mind, they definitely exist, even if they are only imaginary things.

VI: Exactly, but what if I am not aware of femininity or it's definition?

---

If you are not aware of femininity, or its definition, then . . . nothing. A stone is not aware of femininity or its definition either. What more can be said on this score?

Quote:

---

Your argument is not universal, it's only for you; . . .

---

Unconsciousness is universally the same.  $1+1=2$  is also universal. A stone is not aware of " $1+1=2$ ", but that doesn't mean that  $1+1=2$  is not a universal truth.

Quote:

---

I wouldn't call it philosophy, or truth in the slightest.

---

What wouldn't you call philosophy? The distinction between consciousness and unconsciousness?

Philosophy is precisely to do with these universals. It has nothing to do with physically observable things, which are necessarily all uncertain.

Quote:

---

While I think you can make truthful logical arguments about unconsciousness and women, I don't think you can base them off of anything but your own perception and mind, which is not a reliable source.

---

Yet we live in a physical world, and must do the best we can with the meagre perceptions we have.

If one chose not to make any judgements with regard to the nature of physical women, and their value in the context of certain goals, then to be consistent you should not make any judgements based on any physical perception. For example, if you feel hungry, then you should not eat, because of the unreliability of the perception of hunger. If you are driving your car and your senses, as well as the speedometer, tells you that are going 60kph over the speed limit, then you should ignore it because of the inherent unreliability of the perception.

You can't live like that.

Quote:

---

Of course, everything is based off of perception, even logic itself.

---

Pure logic is not based on sense perception, so is not prone to the uncertainties of sense perception.

Quote:

---

..but I don't think that differentiation between objects within perception is an enlightened action.

---

The only way not to differentiate between objects within perception is if you are unconscious - ie, like a stone (as most living people really are), or dead. The human brain is specifically designed to differentiate, as a survival mechanism. For example, it differentiates between "food" and "not food". Sometimes the brain gets it wrong, and we end up eating something that is not food, and get sick - but that's life.

Most people choose the route of being alive, but remaining unconscious, so they are making discriminations without being aware of it.

A lot of the people discriminate against conscious people, but are unaware that they are making any discriminations. They also state absolutes, but with no consciousness that they are doing so.

eg, they say: "All absolutes are wrong."

Quote:

---

If true/unsurpassed enlightenment is beyond any type of change in perception, and perception itself, then your entire argument and stance is untrue. Your entire philosophical argument is flawed.

---

The enlightened person is still dependent on sense perceptions, and can be misled by sense perceptions. His enlightenment doesn't rest on that.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 628
(1/17/04 12:56 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

If you are not aware of femininity, or its definition, then . . . nothing. A stone is not aware of femininity or its definition either. What more can be said on this score?

Yet, I am not a stone, and can differentiate between things. I am not aware of femininity or it's definition because you made it up, and it's within your own consciousness, as an abstraction...just as any lunatic can say they can see God, when no sane person around them can.

Unconsciousness is universally the same.  $1+1=2$  is also universal. A stone is not aware of " $1+1=2$ ", but that doesn't mean that  $1+1=2$  is not a universal truth.

A stone doesn't have a brain, but we both do. For humans, with brains, universal truths have to be things that can't be argued with. They have to be the laws which make up our perception; not merely our own personal conclusions based off of our own personal perceptions.

Mainly what I'm saying is: prove it.

What wouldn't you call philosophy? The distinction between consciousness and unconsciousness?

Your conclusions and evasions about the subject of women. You have observed the physical woman, through the five senses (which you say is "necessarily all uncertain"), and you've drawn out conclusions based on a system of logic, which while correct, is entirely a functioning of your mind, which is completely imagination. I don't see any sort of rational ground for any of the points you make. You contradict yourself, and it isn't merely a paradox.

Philosophy is precisely to do with these universals. It has nothing to do with physically observable things, which are necessarily all uncertain.

It also has nothing to do with imagination, which is necessarily uncertain as well.

Yet we live in a physical world, and must do the best we can with the meagre perceptions we have.

Yes, we do live in the physical world, where it's necessarily uncertain. So why make these broad judgements about a certain object in this physical world, and value another abstraction in the physical world? I really don't see a point to any of what you're doing.

If one chose not to make any judgements with regard to the nature of physical women, and their value in the context of certain goals, then to be consistent you should not make any judgements based on any physical perception. For example, if you feel hungry, then you should not eat, because of the unreliability of the perception of hunger. If you are driving your car and your senses, as well as the speedometer, tells you that are going 60kph over the speed limit, then you should ignore it because of the inherent unreliability of the perception.

You can't live like that.

Well, I agree with you completely. If I'm hungry (uncertain), I choose to eat (uncertain), because of the repercussions of not eating (uncertain)...yet I don't have this awareness that women can't function as well, rationally, as men. In fact, I've observed that they actually reason just as much, if not more, than men themselves! Yet all of this is uncertain, and being someone who values (uncertain) wisdom (uncertain), I choose (uncertain) to not really care (uncertain). I let the illusions go, and recognize them as illusions. I don't try to fight them, and fester in them, like a dirty rat with some feces in a sewer.

Pure logic is not based on sense perception, so is not prone to the uncertainties of sense perception.

I agree, it isn't based on sense perception. However, logic IS prone to uncertainty...just not of sense perception.

The only way not to differentiate between objects within perception is if you are unconscious - ie, like a stone (as most living people really are), or dead. The human brain is specifically designed to differentiate, as a survival mechanism. For example, it differentiates between "food" and "not food". Sometimes the brain gets it wrong, and we end up eating something that is not food, and get sick - but that's life.

I agree with that pretty much. You say that the brain differentiates as a survival mechanism, but women aren't trying to kill us. I don't even see them trying to make us unconscious. It's obvious that they are conscious, because they differentiate between things all the time.

Most people choose the route of being alive, but remaining unconscious, so they are making discriminations without being aware of it.

You have to be aware to make a discrimination. You may be lying to yourself, though...which everyone is still aware of, even if on the smallest level.

A lot of the people discriminate against conscious people, but are unaware that they are making any discriminations. They also state absolutes, but with no consciousness that they are doing so.

eg, they say: "All absolutes are wrong."

They are conscious that they are stating absolutes, but aren't conscious of the meaning of the term "absolute". In not knowing the term, they don't know that an absolute truth is a statement which is irrefutable. They make that statement, unknowing of the stupidity of it, but still conscious.

The enlightened person is still dependent on sense perceptions, and can be misled by sense perceptions. His enlightenment doesn't rest on that.

I agree entirely, but this doesn't make my statement untrue, or even address what I said.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

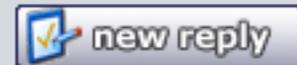

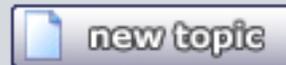

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1280(1/17/04 1:18 pm)Reply | Natural Growth <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Is that why you used so many insets in your response, raising adrenaline to make your post more exciting? <hr/> What are you referring to - what insets? Quote: <hr/> Of course not, you don't lie--you just talk without understanding (or caring) what is true. <hr/> That is pure projection. Men are simple creatures and always give away their inner reality.  Quote: <hr/> This is obviously an important function for humanity, one for |

which there is no replacement. The male mind is the result of adaptation to a role concerned with the provisioning of food.

---

While the above is completely true, Thomas, you must have noticed (well, maybe not) that the trends we see in animals are taken to unprecedented levels in humans. There is the trend, for example, for male animals to be largely superfluous, to be essentially walking (running, swimming) sacks of DNA who must be programmed to be at service for reproduction, above all else, as those unfortunate caribou. [And its funny, too, that reptiles rise above this far more often than mammals.]

As I've mentioned before, the invention of sexual reproduction makes of the male, initially, nothing but a convenient storage for DNA for the good of the species.

Participating in caring for the young is a high and noble calling, to which many males have risen. This is their ticket to "realness" -- to be a real wolf, a real cardinal, or a real human being.

Because the male on the outskirts of "society" has time on his hands, and because we have become so intelligent, and because our increased intelligence made the females require more assistance than ever before, males became even more adept at problem solving. It serves his need to go up in heirarchy and attract females to be able to think spatially, pursue lines of thought without distraction, have a high emotional threshold, and not to have senses as keen as women do.

The latest book on the brain I read states that little girls are quieter because they have more of a hormone that allows impulse control, and they have this little part of the brain that responds to small and helpless creatures. When a small girl sees a baby, her brain is flooded with (pitocin?). The boy does not react. The study goes on to show that beside better impulse control, little girls tend to play different games because their inner experience, that is, what is going on inside their heads, is richer. Their brains are giving them a lot more stimulus. This drives the boy to be more outward directed and active. This is probably why it is said that men love with their eyes, and women through their ears.

The accomplishments of men don't bear repeating, but women have two gifts that probably do arise from their gender role and the differnt structure of their brains. Those are: they have greater purity of motive, and can synthesize the disparate parts. Women rarely project their inner reality the way men do. I am talking about a stingy guy who gets incensed when someone else is stingy. I've noticed this hundreds of times over the years. Only the man's subconscious spits out the truth, to little avail. When a woman is stingy she knows it.

Ever since Dan mentioned a few months ago that women don't understand justice I've been studying the matter. I read Schopenhauer's lengthy one-page drivel on the topic, in which nothing of substance was said and finally he complains that women lose their looks after childbirth. Nietzsche was even briefer. Meanwhile there is solid evidence of a quiet admission that throughout history, in those few times when women were in power (even if only as regents for their minor sons) the lot of the common people tends to improve.

Now, about a year ago, David said, that while it was true that women have the same IQ as men (perhaps excluding the farthest reaches of genius) that they mostly engage in "lower" endeavors such as human rights, the environment, and suchlike. So when it is time to take from women the highest endeavor, philosophy, he throws them the bone of things we might loosely call justice, and care for nature and life in general. And isn't it pretty likely for that to be the case in a brain that is hardwired to notice helpless living things and care for them? And I think that ancient understanding of this is reflected in Justice being represented by a woman holding the scales, and wisdom as Sophia.

It is my belief that women have been prevented from exercising their talents for humanity since civilization got out of whack and patriarchy overtook us. It's no accident that women have been thoroughly excluded from religion. It is indeed harder to understand the feminine contribution, because all things feminine, like Tao, are extremely hard to pin down. And the feminine, being more inward, can hide.

Another funny thing is that as men and women get older, the women become more masculine, and the men acquire a bit of common sense and far more compassion.

I find it sad that even Nature and voice concede that women are less philosophical or what-have-you. There have been great and praised women philosophers. I see women philosophers all the time. They tend not to be dry. I just read today an absolute romp of a book by a Harvard grad, economics professor, a woman, about what is wrong with economists. Basically, it is following theories without checking them out in the real world, leaving out the human equation. And she manages, with incredible humor and references that show she is a great intellectual, to call them unscientific! And she is right!

Because women have been so consistently ignored and marginalized, women philosophers have often had to reinvent the wheel. That is, unlike the men who converse with each other through the centuries, they often say the same things without having had a basis upon which to build. It does give insight into the feminine mind.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 45

(1/17/04 1:25 pm)

Reply

Re: Natural Growth

---

Quote:

---

I find it sad that even Naturyl and voce concede that women are less philosophical or what-have-you.

---

I only concede this as a broad generalization. It does not hold true in all cases, nor does it place any limit on the potential of women. All in all, if you have a given number of philosophers, the majority will be men. This does not mean that there will not be women, or that those women cannot equal the men in skill. I believe only that men are more likely to be inclined toward philosophy to begin with, and therefore more likely to pursue it.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2078

(1/17/04 2:31 pm)

Reply

Tyranny of distance.

---

Kevin

Quote:

---

Pure logic is not based on sense perception, so is not prone to the uncertainties of sense perception.

---

What do you perceive it is based on then Kevin?

It is very unmanly of you to stand by such a supposition.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 631(1/17/04 2:32 pm)Reply  | Re: Natural Growth <hr/> I never said women are less philosophical. I think they're philosophical about other things, though; not metaphysics and ethics. They're philosophical about the way society works, and who they are. Of course they aren't outwardly defining themselves as philosophical. This could be thought as: women are not philosophical. I don't see why such a thing would be sad, though. You yourself, Anna, claim women are different than men in certain ways. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 632(1/17/04 2:38 pm)Reply  | Re: Natural Growth <hr/> Men are simple creatures and always give away their inner reality. I want to break this apart. I don't want you to be such a philogynist/feminist, Anna... "Men are simple creatures" - This statement is based entirely on individual perception. In order to observe 'men' as something, you have to place the something on 'men'. That is an opinion. "...and always..." - Always?                                                    |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2080(1/17/04 2:55 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> Humans can't help but give away their inner reality. It appears on their features while asleep if nowhere else. Women, for the most part, do not experience discontent as deeply as men for they are not given to systematising. Intellectually, battle is behind them.                                                                                                                                                                                              |

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 273

(1/17/04 4:58 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Yet, I am not a stone, and can differentiate between things. I am not aware of femininity or it's definition because you made it up, and it's within your own consciousness, as an abstraction...just as any lunatic can say they can see God, when no sane person around them can.

---

We talk about the definition of femininity a lot on this board, so I assumed you had a rough idea how I define it. I define it, pretty much, as "unconsciousness" - or, the state of not making conscious connections between things (this allows for the fact that women do make unconscious, or automatic discriminations, and that they do make intuitive connections between things).

If you can't see this unconsciousness in women, or their inability to be rational about deeper subjects (like love, attachment, existence, etc), then there's not much I can do to help you.

I personally see it as plain as day in virtually every woman I meet, or hear, or even read.

It is one of those things that is so obvious that it is pointless to try and demonstrate it, because there is no possible way to make it more obvious than it already is. That is, any such "proof" would be no more clear than what is already before your eyes.

For example, how does one "prove" that the sky is blue? It looks blue. You could do a spectral analysis of what you thought was the light coming from the sky, but you would then have to "prove" that the spectral results were in fact from light from the sky, just for a start. At some point, you just have to say, "It is blue". In just the same way, one looks at women, and one says "women are not rational".

Quote:

---

KS: Unconsciousness is universally the same.  $1+1=2$  is also universal. A stone is not aware of " $1+1=2$ ", but that doesn't mean that  $1+1=2$  is not a universal truth.

VI: A stone doesn't have a brain, but we both do. For humans, with brains, universal truths have to be things that can't be argued with. They have to be the laws which make up our perception; not merely our own personal conclusions based off of our own personal perceptions.

---

Many people, despite the fact that they have physical brains, are unable to understand even the most basic concepts (such as  $1+1=2$ , or  $A=A$ ). Take fundamentalists of any religion as an example.

Mental blocks prevent them from being aware of what is right in front of their nose.

These people are effectively totally unconscious, even though they might be a University Professor.

Such a person might have a great deal of intelligence when it comes to the latest fashion in shoes, or what happened on their favorite soap opera; but that doesn't translate to real intelligence, and real consciousness.

Quote:

---

Mainly what I'm saying is: prove it.

---

See my answer above.

Quote:

---

What wouldn't you call philosophy? The distinction between consciousness and unconsciousness?

Your conclusions and evasions about the subject of women. You have observed the physical woman, through the five senses (which you say is "necessarily all uncertain"), and you've drawn out conclusions based on a system of logic, which while correct, is entirely a functioning of your mind, which is completely imagination.

---

The only area of uncertainty is my judgement that women are as unconscious as I say they are (and men too for that matter). My judgement that unconsciousness (the lack of ability to make conscious connections between all things) cannot lead to enlightenment is necessarily true on purely logical grounds.

Quote:

---

KS: Philosophy is precisely to do with these universals. It has nothing to do with physically observable things, which are necessarily all uncertain.

VI: It also has nothing to do with imagination, which is necessarily uncertain as well.

---

Imagination is necessarily always certain. It only becomes uncertain if I imagine a unicorn, then entertain the idea that there might be a physical unicorn somewhere. The imagined unicorn is certain, but the physical one is not.

Quote:

---

Yes, we do live in the physical world, where it's necessarily uncertain. So why make these broad judgements about a certain object in this physical world, and value another abstraction in the physical world? I really don't see a point to any of what you're doing.

---

I value truth and consciousness, because that's just the way I'm made. Thus I try to make myself become more and more conscious. My "self" extends out to other people, including women. I don't want to leave anyone behind.

Only by recognizing the unconscious can we become more conscious. In the same way, only by recognizing the existence of a disease can you begin to find a cure for it.

Quote:

---

Well, I agree with you completely. If I'm hungry (uncertain), I choose to eat (uncertain), because of the repercussions of not eating (uncertain)...yet I don't have this awareness that women can't function as well, rationally, as men.

---

Yes, that seems to be the case.

Ask yourself why there has never been a female genius, or ever a female philosopher who has said anything of any real worth (with the exception of Celia Green, who arguably did something).

Here's an interesting task, which I did quite by accident. Find some of the compilations of the best quotes and aphorisms of all time. Then find yourself some of the best quotes and aphorisms written by women only, which specifically exclude men (yes, you will find such books). When you compare these books, you find that those books that are not "women only" contain writings almost exclusively by men, and contain very many great gems. By contrast, the books which contain "women only" writings contain almost 100% trash, mostly to do with sex, money, and boyfriends. It is very hard indeed to find a single quotation or aphorism of any worth at all.

Quote:

---

You say that the brain differentiates as a survival mechanism, but women aren't trying to kill us.

---

Falling ten-tonne weights aren't trying to kill us either, but it would be wise for us to defend ourselves against them (on a building-site, for example).

Quote:

---

I don't even see them trying to make us unconscious.

---

Unconscious beings don't "try" to do anything at all. They just do what they do, and can't do anything else.

Quote:

---

It's obvious that they are conscious, because they differentiate between things all the time.

---

Well, they certainly differentiate - no question there. I know that from the amount of hate-mail I receive from women: "You will never get laid as long as you live.", etc.

But there is a huge difference between merely differentiating, say, "enemy", or "woman-hater" and having a conscious understanding of what the hell you are doing. Few people have that, and women even less so.

Quote:

---

You have to be aware to make a discrimination.

---

Hitler discriminated against Jews, and others, but I doubt that he was truly aware of what he was doing. He also decided to fight the war on several fronts at the same time, and I don't think he was "aware" of what he was doing then either. Otherwise, he wouldn't have done these things.

There are differing degrees of awareness. The more conscious you are, the more aware. An "aware" person is consciously aware of the many connections between all things.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/17/04 5:43 pm

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 635

(1/17/04 6:16 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

For example, how does one "prove" that the sky is blue? It looks blue. You could do a spectral analysis of what you thought was the light coming from the sky, but you would then have to "prove" that the spectral results were in fact from light from the sky, just for a start. At some point, you just have to say, "It is blue". In just the same way, one looks at women, and one says "women are not rational".

I thought philosophy was supposed to be about the way things actually are, rather than how they look or seem.

Mental blocks prevent them from being aware of what is right in front of their nose.

I agree with that completely.

Such a person might have a great deal of intelligence when it comes to the latest fashion in shoes, or what happened on their favorite soap opera; but that doesn't translate to real intelligence, and real consciousness.

I don't see a difference between fashions in shoes and soap operas, and your wisdom.

My judgement that unconsciousness (the lack of ability to make conscious connections between all things) cannot lead to enlightenment is necessarily true on purely logical grounds.

Depending on what enlightenment actually is.

Imagination is necessarily always certain. It only becomes uncertain if I imagine a unicorn, then entertain the idea that there might be a physical unicorn somewhere. The imagined unicorn is certain, but the physical one is not.

I suppose that's quite true.

Ask yourself why there has never been a female genius, or ever a female philosopher who has said anything of any real worth (with the exception of Celia Green, who arguably did something).

Most every woman I've known has been a philosopher in her own right. Most of them geniuses.

Falling ten-tonne weights aren't trying to kill us either, but it would be wise for us to defend ourselves against them (on a building-site, for example).

Right, but that has nothing to do with what I said. All falling ten ton weights WILL kill you if you get in their way. All women (except for the very small percentage which are murderers) will NOT kill you if you get in their way.

There are differing degrees of awareness. The more conscious you are, the more aware. An "aware" person is consciously aware of the many connections between all things.

I agree with that completely.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 274

(1/17/04 8:51 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

I thought philosophy was supposed to be about the way things actually are, rather than how they look or seem.

---

It is. But then philosophy has to be applied in the physical world.

Quote:

---

Such a person might have a great deal of intelligence when it comes to the latest fashion in shoes, or what happened on their favorite soap opera; but that doesn't translate to real intelligence, and real consciousness.

I don't see a difference between fashions in shoes and soap operas, and your wisdom.

---

Do you mean that you don't perceive any less wisdom of reality in any person consumed with shoe fashions than in my wisdom, or that you don't think wisdom of reality has any more value than not having any wisdom of reality?

Quote:

---

Most every woman I've known has been a philosopher in her own right. Most of them geniuses.

---

Then I think you can't currently comprehend what I mean by "philosopher" and "genius".

Quote:

---

All falling ten ton weights WILL kill you if you get in their way. All women (except for the very small percentage which are murderers) will NOT kill you if you get in their way.

---

It is not women which will kill you, but unconsciousness. If that takes a hold in your mind, then you are a goner.

On the other hand, if women judge you to be a misogynist, then it might well be that women will actually kill you, or persuade their male friends to do the job for them.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2081
(1/17/04 11:26 pm)
Reply

---

---

Unconsciousness does not kill, Kevin.

Quote:

---

For example, how does one "prove" that the sky is blue? It looks blue. You could do a spectral analysis of what you thought was the light coming from the sky, but you would then have to "prove" that the spectral results were in fact from light from the sky, just for a start. At some point, you just have to say, "It is blue". In just the same way, one looks at women, and one says "women are not rational"

---

You haven't noticed that men are not rational either? You haven't heard the great saying, "With everything, one thing is impossible: rationality!"

I cannot see how the future will understand you as a philosopher, a kind of semi-blind behaviouralist yes, but not a genius.

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 219

(1/18/04 1:03 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

"Men are simple creatures and always give away their inner reality.

I want to break this apart. I don't want you to be such a philogynist/feminist, Anna...

"Men are simple creatures" - This statement is based entirely on individual perception. In order to observe 'men' as something, you have to place the something on 'men'. That is an opinion.

"...and always..." - Always? "

I'll state the obvious again for you, as you seem to keep walking past it. The 'truth' of a woman is not based on what is true/false, but what benefits her to think as true for the moment. The opinion she expressed there was what benefitted her to believe at that point--she felt feminist, so she accepted a feminist viewpoint. As her mood changes, her 'truth' will change: she has said herself "I don't like sameness"--nor does any woman.

According to the feminist, the young girl would "play dumb" in front of a man she likes in order to not threaten him/his ego. But what in fact happens is that she simply stops 'playing intelligent', because she no longer needs to believe that she is intelligent, and returns to her normal ("dumb") self. It's the feminist that labels woman's normal state as "dumb"--oh what a credit to her gender.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 637

(1/18/04 1:34 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

It is. But then philosophy has to be applied in the physical world.

Which you've said is 'necessarily uncertain'. This is one of the areas where your ideas seem irrational and contradicting.

Do you mean that you don't perceive any less wisdom of reality in any person consumed with shoe fashions than in my wisdom, or that you don't think wisdom of reality has any more value than not having any wisdom of reality?

Well, shoe fashions and wisdom are both part of the illusory world; changing and uncertain...so I don't really see the need to value one over the other. Wisdom is obviously more advanced, because it serves many purposes, whereas shoe fashions are just kind of dumb; but in order to make a claim such as that, I have to be an ego, and I have to be living in duality. I have to have the mindset of 'unenlightened'.

Then I think you can't currently comprehend what I mean by "philosopher" and "genius".

I comprehend it. I'm just saying that women have been more rational, in my life, than in yours (from what you say).

It is not women which will kill you, but unconsciousness. If that takes a hold in your mind, then you are a goner.

On the other hand, if women judge you to be a misogynist, then it might well be that women will actually kill you, or persuade their male friends to do the job for them.

Haha, yeah, that's right. I think you should clarify your point about unconsciousness killing you, though. Eternal life isn't what everyone assumes it is, it's something far simpler, and unextraordinary.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 638

(1/18/04 1:45 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

I'll state the obvious again for you, as you seem to keep walking past it. The 'truth' of a woman is not based on what is true/false, but what benefits her to think as true for the moment. The opinion she expressed there was what benefitted her to believe at that point--she felt feminist, so she accepted a feminist viewpoint. As her mood changes, her 'truth' will change: she has said herself "I don't like sameness"--nor does any woman.

And luckily, with enlightenment, nothing is the same. The only thing that ever stays the same is existence. Wisdom is really just repeated conclusions on what reality is. That isn't living in consciousness of Truth! If what you're saying is correct, women have the advantage of losing their belief systems, to take on what's happening at the present moment. That, in combination with a genuine teaching, can ultimately lead to an enlightened woman.

It's much harder to enlighten a person that has many strict beliefs.

According to the feminist, the young girl would "play dumb" in front of a man she likes in order to not threaten him/his ego. But what in fact happens is that she simply stops 'playing intelligent', because she no longer needs to believe that she is intelligent, and returns to her normal ("dumb") self. It's the feminist that labels woman's normal state as "dumb"--oh what a credit to her gender.

I will speak in general terms from here on out in this posting...

Don't you think it's interesting that what you just said is basically: when a woman is playing a role, she isn't bound to it? Of course, she lacks enlightenment, but she is closer.

I think what you're saying is primarily right, and I do the same thing as a woman. In my case, everything I do is playing, so I don't think of it in such terms really anymore.

Also, your statement doesn't imply that a woman's natural state is "dumb". Their natural state is "adaptability". If they can use this in matters of philosophy and spirituality, there's great potential...however, I think that if they don't have a specific teacher or teaching, they'll be lost.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 414(1/18/04 6:27 am)Reply     | Out of his closet <hr/> That's a quite revealing statement, Scott: Quote: <hr/> I think what you're saying is primarily right, and I do the same thing as a woman. <hr/> Smiley, of course!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 642(1/18/04 8:01 am)Reply  | ... <hr/> Yes Paul, I am like the bride unveiling herself to the bridesgroom after the wedding.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 220(1/18/04 8:10 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> I see you misunderstood my post and I believe your entire reply to be fallacious. "Also, your statement doesn't imply that a woman's natural state is "dumb". Their natural state is "adaptability"." The actor is adaptable. If he acted enlightened, does that make him enlightened? Of course not. There is a difference between being and pretending to be. The latter is always done for a purpose, in order to benefit oneself for some reason. |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2069

(1/18/04 10:00 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Yes Paul, I am like the bride unveiling herself to the bridesgroom after the wedding.

---

Well, you're definitely a woman .....

I'm not joking. It is very rare to see a bloke so stuck inside feminine cosnciousness and so completely unaware of what lies beyond it. For all intents and purposes, you have become reborn as a woman and, like all women, you mistake this for enlightenment.

And yet, one can see it, there is something inside you which knows that it is indeed a mistake. This "enlightenment", this reduction into feminine cosnciousness, has come too easily for you. It isn't real. Nothing has essentially been resolved by it and deep down you know it.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 643

(1/18/04 10:29 am)

Reply

...

---

I see you misunderstood my post and I believe your entire reply to be fallacious.

You believe it to be fallacious, but is it? Where is it fallacious?

The actor is adaptable. If he acted enlightened, does that make him enlightened? Of course not. There is a difference between being and pretending to be. The latter is always done for a purpose, in order to benefit oneself for some reason.

I agree with this completely.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 644

(1/18/04 10:38 am)

Reply

...

---

Well, you're definitely a woman .....

I'm not joking. It is very rare to see a bloke so stuck inside feminine consciousness and so completely unaware of what lies beyond it.

Well, I can assure you that I'm physically male.

Where is your proof that I'm unconscious, David? You can make claims all day, but you'll only be regarded as a lunatic if you don't back them up (at least by the sane ones that visit this forum).

I'm completely aware of what lies beyond all states of consciousness. I don't think anything else you can talk about really matters more than that.

For all intents and purposes, you have become reborn as a woman and, like all women, you mistake this for enlightenment.

No, I don't. I have actually attained enlightenment, in realizing my self. It's impossible for me to mistake it as anything.

And yet, one can see it, there is something inside you which knows that it is indeed a mistake. This "enlightenment", this reduction into feminine consciousness, has come too easily for you. It isn't real. Nothing has essentially been resolved by it and deep down you know it.

You can see it, because you've created it. What you've been doing lately, David, is being hypocritical. I haven't seen you actually reason anything out lately; it's all been speculation and no evidence to support it.

This leads your philosophy to the horrible level of "religious fundamentalist". You should start proving your claims.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1286
(1/18/04 12:34 pm)
Reply

natural growth

---

Quote:

---

Yes, the creation of civilization with all of its labour-saving devices and comforts and entertainments for women.

---

David, you state that civilization is created for women, and even war has only the motive of women, yet you also insist that men are capable of not thinking about women. It would appear that the ability to not think about women has only the goal of returning with new accomplishments and pleasing the women.

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

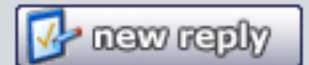

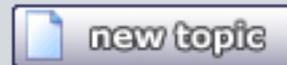

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> The misogynist

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1287(1/18/04 12:58 pm)Reply | natural growth <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I believe only that men or more likely to be inclined toward philosophy to begin with, and therefore more likely to pursue it. <hr/> Maybe. Quote: <hr/> I think they're philosophical about other things, though; not metaphysics and ethics. They're philosophical about the way society works, and who they are. Of course they aren't outwardly defining themselves as philosophical. This could be thought as: women are not philosophical. I don't see why such a thing would be sad, though. You yourself, Anna, claim women are different than men in certain ways. <hr/> |

I agree only to a point. Basically, the thing is really simple - men are concerned about the outer world, and women the inner. But there really have been so many women concerned about metaphysics and ethics. The difference with women philosophers is that they tend to obsess a lot less with abstract structures of thought that are often rather airy and unrealistic.

I certainly to think men and women are different, in fact, more so than anyone else here, so far as I can tell. Men have an edge in spatial and probably abstract thought. The mind tends to go along lines that are easy for it. So a person might seem brilliant because good at math, but perhaps you should also praise a computer for that.

I also think that whereas women mature emotionally faster than men, they mature mentally slower. Women are famous for not being awake until about age 30. That is when the changes begin. But even there, it is wrong to therefore infer that men are more conscious, i.e., my famous example of my brother torturing a grasshopper and oblivious to its obvious pain. I would not give such an example if it were not repeated many times over in my observations of children.

It may appear I praise women, but it is only because their merits are invisible to the wise here, not because I think they are better. But I do think they are better in SOME respects, as men are.

Men's wonderful abstract minds and love of structures and the workings of physical objects have given us the wonders of the world, and yet men, even of high intelligence, constantly, and I do mean often, come up with bloopers that any woman of average intelligence knows is crap.

And for the why of it, I think I'll go to the GOST thread.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 646
(1/18/04 1:38 pm)
Reply

Re: natural growth

---

I don't believe a thing you said to be true.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 275

(1/18/04 2:10 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Voce Io:

Quote:

---

KS: It is. But then philosophy has to be applied in the physical world.

VI: Which you've said is 'necessarily uncertain'. This is one of the areas where your ideas seem irrational and contradicting.

---

That can't be avoided.

Quote:

---

Well, shoe fashions and wisdom are both part of the illusory world; changing and uncertain

---

Wisdom, being of a purely logical nature, is not changing and uncertain. It is independent of the uncertainties of the physical observable world.

Quote:

---

...so I don't really see the need to value one over the other. Wisdom is obviously more advanced, because it serves many purposes, whereas shoe fashions are just kind of dumb; but in order to make a claim such as that, I have to be an ego, and I have to be living in duality. I have to have the mindset of 'unenlightened'.

---

You can't avoid "duality", even if you are enlightened. The difference is that the enlightened person perceives the truth through that duality, and in that duality, while the unenlighted person does not. Duality is a function of the brain, so as long as you have a brain you will experience duality.

Quote:

---

Most every woman I've known has been a philosopher in her own right. Most of them geniuses. . . .

I'm just saying that women have been more rational, in my life, than in yours (from what you say).

---

As women are the same everywhere, in all cultures, it is clear that you have an entirely different conception of genius and rationality.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/18/04 11:49 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 647
(1/18/04 2:14 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

I'm leaving. I'd like to thank everyone here. Cya.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 169
(1/18/04 2:25 pm)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: As women are the same everywhere, in all cultures, it is clear that you have an entirely different conception of genius and rationality.

---

You're joking, right?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 276
(1/18/04 3:39 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

KS: As women are the same everywhere, in all cultures, it is clear that you have an entirely different conception of genius and rationality.

You're joking, right?

---

About what? That women are the same everywhere?

I have travelled quite a lot, and met women from all walks of life, and that is my experience.

Men are more or less the same everywhere as well.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 887
(1/19/04 12:02 am)
Reply

Re: The Misogynist

---

Quote:

---

Voce: yet I don't have this awareness that women can't function as well, rationally, as men.

Kevin: Ask yourself why there has never been a female genius, or ever a female philosopher who has said anything of any real worth (with the exception of Celia Green, who arguably did something).

---

So there's one then, one who arguably makes it, despite your ultra stringent guidelines for estimation.

Being as you are stating your assertions as facts, I'll reply in kind. There have been plenty of female philosophers that have said something of real worth. These people have said these things, and these things have made it to print, and the print has been read by many a person, despite the prevalent watered-down misogynistic tendencies of civilization as a whole. But then that's what one might imagine that a lot of philosophers tend to do - they try to communicate their thoughts to as wider audience as possible if they think they are of sufficient merit. No wonder then that a certain number of females have managed to slip through the net and be able to be in the position where their thoughts and words are being perceived on a larger scale than the common everyday communicator. And this is to say nothing of the 'philosophical sayings' of women which have been strictly internal - thoughts.

However, when it comes to what you call the genius, or more specifically descriptive, the human being who has transcended the straightjacket of duality, you cannot possibly make an accurate assessment of whether there has ever been a female example of such. This is because such people (and there have doubtless been many more in history than you or I have heard a single word from) aren't necessarily going to be given to any particular action - trying to communicate it to as wider audience as possible, as a result of their transcendence. Of course you will paint them with your own brush nonetheless.

Then there is the fact that men are more given to conquest and glory than women are. No wonder then that many more men than women are published in this field, or are given to 'spreading their thoughts'.

So, standing in the way of your assertions stated as facts are my assertions stated as facts; those being that civilization favours the male when it comes to acceptance as bona-fide, the likelihood of being published, and the likelihood of a favourable causality which might bring about the mindset of a philosopher and in turn, wanting to get one's message out to as many as possible. Then there is the diminished likelihood of being published, and in turn, read, and in turn, judged according to merit only. This is to say nothing of the mindset which does for itself and feels no need to try to communicate it in any other way. With regard to the 'enlightened', there is no reason to expect such a person to want to speak, let alone be heard; and take away the male's love of conquest and glory to see how the female 'genius' is that much less likely to reach your ears and eyes. This is to say nothing of the fact that you have not read or heard every single word in history. And, considering the sound of your assertions-stated-as-fact, anyone would be forgiven for thinking that you must have.

Quote:

---

Voce: Most every woman I've known has been a philosopher in her own right. Most of them geniuses. (Ed- this must be his perspective, right.)

Kevin: Then I think you can't currently comprehend what I mean by "philosopher" and "genius".

Voce: I comprehend it. I'm just saying that women have been more rational, in my life, than in yours (from what you say).

Kevin: As women are the same everywhere, in all cultures, it is clear that you have an entirely different conception of genius and rationality.

---

It is clear to open eyes that the 'women are all of a certain type' assertions, which you both make, are highly inaccurate. But when considered with regard to what we know of your respective perspectives, it becomes more clear. It becomes more clear that you are both talking about a completely different thing.

Quote:

---

Rairun: You're joking, right?

Kevin: About what? That women are the same everywhere?

I have travelled quite a lot, and met women from all walks of life, and that is my experience.

---

Nope, it is your experiences coloured indelibly by your perspective. And you are not willing for a second to consider your perspective as anything but correct.

It all sounds like the most macho of men asserting-as-fact that women should not be allowed out of the home.

Then on the other hand, I can see the sense in some of your words. Some of them. But then that's just my perspective eh. If only I had access to your ultimate ratification, I could be judge, jury and executioner too; and we could shape the world together in the fashion of our ultimate 'knowledge' of what is right/wrong, good/bad for everyone on the face of this planet, nay every sentient being in the universe, be they of a higher or lower intelligence or perspective.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 277

(1/19/04 12:42 am)

Reply

Re: The Misogynist

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

No wonder then that a certain number of females have managed to slip through the net . . .

---

The more wise women who get published the better. I'm all for it. But to tell the truth, as far as I can see, and so far at least, it hasn't amounted to much . . . if anything.

Quote:

---

And this is to say nothing of the 'philosophical sayings' of women which have been strictly internal - thoughts.

---

Genuinely philosophical, deep, universally true, highly valuable thoughts shine forth like the sun. They cannot be kept "internal" to the individual. They are immediately recognized by the individual as the common property of humanity. To such a person the whole Universe becomes "internal", and everyone else their very own self.

Quote:

---

However, when it comes to what you call the genius, or more specifically descriptive, the human being who has transcended the straightjacket of duality, you cannot possibly make an accurate assessment of whether there has ever been a female example of such.

---

Very true. There may have been many such women. Only I don't know of any candidates. But that's not to say there aren't any, or that the candidates aren't fully fledged Buddhas. I hope there are many.

Quote:

---

This is because such people (and there have doubtless been many more in history than you or I have heard a single word from) aren't necessarily going to be given to any particular action - trying to communicate it to as wider audience as possible, as a result of their transcendence.

---

True "transcendence" is really an opening up to the the world, and a sharing of one's wisdom with one's larger self. Any kind of "transcendence" which keeps to itself, and preserves its own flame, is much diminished, and is only a pale shadow of the genuine article.

Quote:

---

Then there is the fact that men are more given to conquest and glory than women are. No wonder then that many more men than women are published in this field, or are given to 'spreading their thoughts'.

---

Nevertheless, it is good to be given to conquest and glory.

Quote:

---

civilization favours the male when it comes to acceptance as bona-fide, the likelihood of being published . . . . [snip]
. . the diminished likelihood of being published, and in turn, read, and in turn, judged according to merit only.

---

I question this. If you take a man and a woman of similar ability as writers

(let's say, mediocre ability), then it seems to me that the woman has considerably more chance of being published. She will be considered a genius (eg, Ophra Winfrey) and he will be considered . . . well, he won't be considered at all.

In my view, there are very few books published by women that aren't horribly mediocre.

One of the best books I've read by a woman is "Sexual Personae" by Camille Paglia, and that book was only very marginally above mediocre.

Quote:

---

With regard to the 'enlightened', there is no reason to expect such a person to want to speak, let alone be heard

---

The truly enlightened person must speak, out of compassion.

Quote:

---

It all sounds like the most macho of men asserting-as-fact that women should not be allowed out of the home.

---

The big difference is that I actually want to encourage women out of the home. But I first have to convince both men and women that women are in fact enslaved in the home, when everyone wants to believe that women are free.

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 271
(1/19/04 1:32 am)
Reply

sage sentimentality?

---

Quote:

---

The truly enlightened person must speak, out of compassion.

---

I don't think so. A truly enlightened "person" has eradicated all sentimentality from his self, thus has no compassion. He does not speak for compassion. The sun shines even when there's no one to see the light.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 21
(1/19/04 3:30 am)
Reply

Re: sage sentimentality?

---

Quote:

---

The truly enlightened person must speak, out of compassion

---

false; the truly enlightened person does not need to speak, although sometimes they do

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 278
(1/19/04 11:57 am)
Reply

Re: sage sentimentality?

---

Quote:

---

The truly enlightened person does not need to speak, although sometimes they do

---

And you know that because you are truly enlightened I presume? I suspect what you say here is what you think is the case for the enlightened person.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/19/04 12:03 pm

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 279
(1/19/04 12:02 pm)
Reply

Re: sage sentimentality?

---

Bondi wrote:

Quote:

---

A truly enlightened "person" has eradicated all sentimentality from his self, thus has no compassion. He does not speak for compassion. The sun shines even when there's no one to see the light.

---

Essentially you are correct, but the "compassion" of the enlightened person is entirely different to that of the normal person. To the enlightened person "compassion" is not a sentiment, but is more like "conscience", or even "wisdom".

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 56
(1/19/04 12:27 pm)
Reply

Re: sage sentimentality?

---

Kevin said:

Quote:

---

You can't avoid "duality", even if you are enlightened. The difference is that the enlightened person perceives the truth through that duality, and in that duality, while the unenlightened person does not. Duality is a function of the brain, so as long as you have a brain you will experience duality.

---

This is quite true.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2086
(1/19/04 12:38 pm)
Reply

-----

---

Great ones speak out of desire, and love. We remain silent rather than speak out of pity. We look better, we are better, than the compassionate, who always have mistrust of their desire.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
