| Author                                                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 80(9/15/02 11:29 pm)Reply  | Islam <hr/> What are your thoughts on Islam? Has anyone read the Koran?What do you make of these quotes? Are these English translations wrong? Quote: <hr/> "Believers, take neither Jews nor Christians for your friends." (Koran, Surah 5:51) "Slay them wherever you find them...Idolatry is worse than carnage...Fight against them until idolatry is no more and God's religion reigns supreme." (Koran, Surah 2:190-) O ye who believe! Murder those of the disbelievers .... and let them find harshness in you. [Koran, Repentance: 123] Humiliate the non-Muslims to such an extent that they surrender and pay tribute. [Koran, Repentance: 29] "There will not be found [anyone] more hostile to the believers than the Jews and the idolaters." (Palestinian TV, April 13, 2001, quoting the Koran - Sura 5,84) |

Muhammad said, "The last hour will not come until the Muslims fight the Jews and the Muslims kill them" (Mishkat, page 147.)

According to the Koran, the Jews try to introduce corruption (5:64), have always been disobedient (5:78), and are the enemies of Allah, the Prophet (Mohammed) and his angels (2:97-98).

He that chooses a religion over Islam, it will not be accepted from him and in the world to come he will be one of the lost. (Q 3:86)

Mohammed promised his followers seven heavens in which: They are to cohabit with demure virgins...as beautiful as corals and rubies...full-breasted maidens for playmates...in the gardens of delight.... They're to lie face to face on jewelled couches, and be serviced by immortal youths... young boys, their personal property, as comely as virgin pearls.... We created the houris [dancing girls] and made them virgins, carnal playmates for those on the right hand.... We are going to wed them to dark-eyed houris. [The Koran 55:56; 55:58; 78:33; 56:12; 52:16-17, 24; 56:35-38; 52:20]

Who told me that the act of Jihad, the act of killing non-Muslims was good? Well, if you read the Koran, you will find that in a certain sura God says that he has bought the lives of the Muslims in return for the rewards of Paradise. They kill non-Muslims and get killed in this war-effort, & the reward for these Muslims is paradise & paradise is a huge garden inhabited by the most beautiful virgins, who live in palaces, & there are countless pretty pearl-like boys to serve them as well. [Anwar Shaikh]

The deeper study of the Koran, Hadith, and Arab history led me to believe that Islam had been cleverly devised on the principle of divide and rule. And its purpose is to enable the Arabs to dominate the rest of the world. I have no doubt the Prophet wanted to raise himself to the same status as Allah. Muhammad loved Arabia & its culture, and his one desire was to create a strong, conquering Arab nation that believed in him and propagated his name. This could only be achieved by imperial dominance. [Anwar

Shaikh]

When I began to study the Koran, the holy book of Islam, I found many unreasonable ideas. The women in the Koran were treated as slaves. They are nothing but sexual objects. Naturally I set aside the Koran and looked around me. I found religion equally oppressive in real life. And I realized that religious oppression and injustices are only increasing, especially in Muslim countries. The religious terrorists are everywhere. But if I criticized Muslim fundamentalists and mullahs in particular, it is because I saw them from close quarters. They took advantage of people's ignorance and oppressed them. They considered women as chattel slaves and treated them no better than the slaves of the ancient world. [Bangladeshi writer Taslima Nasrin, in exile]

The earth is flat, and anyone who disputes this claim is an atheist who deserves to be punished. [Muslim religious edict, 1993 Sheik Abdel-Aziz Ibn Baaz Supreme religious authority, Saudi Arabia]

If someone becomes a Muslim then apostatizes, he would be asked to repent; if he does not repent, he should be killed. [Imam al-Shafi'i, The Ordinances of the Qur'an (part 1, p. 289)]

Somebody may say: 'Do you want to deny freedom to people?' We say to him: 'If what is meant by freedom is to disbelieve in God's religion, or the freedom of infidelity and apostasy, then that freedom is abolished and we do not recognize it; we even call for its eradication, and we strive to oppress it. We declare that publicly and in daylight'" [Dr. Taha Jabir's, "The Islamic Society" April 17,1984, p. 26]

---

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 98

(9/16/02 0:20)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Dave Sim has been running a series of essays in his comic Cerebus called Islam, My Islam. I find them pretty interesting and well thought out, and I'll post some excerpts when I have a chance.

Gregory Shantz

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 361

(9/16/02 1:23)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Kevin,

I have not read the Koran from cover to cover. I own a copy that is both in Arabic and English. I am dependent on the translation. When I get a chance this evening, I will look at the verses you have cited.

One thing that immediately stands out to me is the one about not being friends with Christians or Jews. All of the Muslims I have ever known -- many -- have always said emphatically that both Christianity and Judaism are religions that are greatly respected in Islam. That is what was preached at the Mosque I once attended.

But I will look into this because it is important. Quite obviously, not all Muslims are friendly people. I lived in Pakistani culture for many years. Seeing news reports of the violence there now gives me a sinking feeling in my stomach. I don't know the people on the streets but they look like people who used to come to my home.

In the last year of his life, my husband became much more fundamentalist in his thinking and more militant. He had a brain tumor. It is fortunate that it happened then and not now.

I will look into the quotes and write again. I am certainly no expert on Islam. But I did live with Pakistani Muslims for many years and I think that I learned a little.

Faizi

|                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 281(9/16/02 1:30)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Islam <hr/> I am intolerant of every religion. Edited by: suergaz at: 9/16/02 1:36:32 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 81(9/16/02 9:55)Reply      | Re: Islam <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Dave Sim has been running a series of essays in his comic Cerebus called Islam, My Islam. I find them pretty interesting and well thought out, and I'll post some excerpts when I have a chance. <hr/> Please do. I'm impressed with Sim's writings. I have some of his writings on women here: www.theabsolute.net/misogyny/sim.html                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 362(9/16/02 11:10)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> Kevin, First of all, I must say that I am not an Islamic scholar as is Anwar Shaikh. That said, I will say that I am in some disagreement with Shaikh though not complete disagreement. I can respect someone who turns against his religion. However, in doing so, I think it is prudent to be truthful and it is prudent to not simply flip-flop one's contentions as Anwar Shaikh has done in the interest of politics and nationality. I was born into a Christian family and I have rejected Christianity. There is much that I do not like about Christianity as it is practiced. However, I do not believe that it is a worse religion than other religions. I don't believe that Islam is a religion that is worse than other religions. It was for this reason that I became a Muslim when I married a Muslim. It did not matter to me. Anwar Shaikh is partially driven by his pro-India stance. He believes that |

Islam ruined India and caused all non-Arab Muslims to become subjugated to Saudi Arabia. Since he is Pakistani, he believes that Islam is especially detrimental to Pakistan. He believes that the "peaceful brotherhood" brand of Islam is not true Islam but Sufism or the result of cultural exposure to Hinduism. He believes that Islam is a religion of war and murder and division and was intended to be that way by its prophet, Mohammed. He also puts forth the proposition that Mohammed considered himself to be greater than Allah.

I am not writing to defend Islam because I do not care for it or any other religion. However, with things in the world being the way things are in the world presently -- much fear and anxiety about terrorists -- some things should be made clear. I do not believe, as Anwar Shaikh believes, that the basics of Islam promote hatred of nonbelievers. Just this weekend, three medical students were accused of discussing upcoming bombings as they ate in a restaurant in Georgia. At first, it was said that they were playing a joke. But that has been retracted now. It seems that they were merely discussing their upcoming medical rotations and a woman sitting near them thought they were discussing upcoming attacks. She reported this discussion to authorities.

Allah Rehemkah!! As though they could have no better sense than to discuss -- in English -- planned terrorist attacks in a public restaurant when the United States is in a Code Orange terror alert! One young man is a naturalized American citizen and the other two were born here. I am not sure that they know how to speak their native languages. All three have American accents. I don't know how this woman could have thought they were speaking about upcoming terrorist attacks unless she has a very vivid imagination.

Anwar Shaikh's writings perpetuate hysteria. His web site features illustrations that highlight violence and murder. I don't think this sort of hysteria is needed when there is already enough hysteria over Muslims. Most Americans cannot distinguish an Arab from a Puerto Rican. Hysteria combined with ignorance is deadly.

I have not been able to find in my Koran all of the passages cited in your post. This could be due to my ignorance or it could be due to a difference in translations. My Koran is standard -- the translation by Yusef Ali. It was my husband's Koran and still contains his bookmarks.

In fairness, I should say that Yusef Ali is said to be a translator with a Sufistic slant.

Quote:

---

What do you make of these quotes? Are these English translations wrong?

---

Quote:

---

"Believers, take neither Jews nor Christians for your friends." (Koran, Surah 5:51

---

I found this in my Koran in Sura V; 54. It says, "O ye who believe, take not the Jews and the Christians as your friends and protectors: They are but friends and protectors to each other."

The translator's note says: "That is, look not to them for help or comfort. They are more likely to combine against you than to help you."

Quote:

---

"Slay them wherever you find them...Idolatry is worse than carnage...Fight against them until idolatry is no more and God's religion reigns supreme." (Koran,Surah 2:190-)

---

My Koran says in Sura II, 190-191: "Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, But do not transgress limits; for God loveth not transgressors. And slay them wherever you catch them, and turn them out from where they have turned you out; For tumult and oppression are worse than slaughter; But fight them not at the Sacred Mosque, unless they first fight you there; But if they fight you, slay them. Such is the reward of those who suppress faith."

Verse 192 reads: "But if they cease, God is oft-forgiving, most merciful."

The key idea here is to fight only those who fight against you; who seek to oppress you. Mohammed did not preach the idea of turning the other cheek. At that time in history, Muslims were being persecuted by a Pagan autocracy so this was applicable.

The translator's note reads: "In general, it may be said that Islam is the religion of peace, goodwill, mutual understanding, and good faith. But it will not acquiesce in wrong-doing, and its men will hold their lives cheap in defense of honor, justice, and the religion they hold sacred. Their ideal is that of heroic virtue combined with unselfish gentleness and tenderness, such as exemplified in the life of the Apostle. They know that war is an evil but they will not flinch from it if their honor demands it."

Quote:

---

O ye who believe! Murder those of the disbelievers .... and let them find harshness in you. [Koran, Repentance: 123]

---

I could not find this -- probably because I do not recognize the Arab word for repentance. The Suras all have titles but they are written in Arabic transliteration and I do not know the meanings.

However, I found this on the subject of repentance in Sura XLII: 25-26: "He is the one who accepts repentance from his servants and forgives sins: and he knows all that ye do. And he listens to those who believe and who do deeds of righteousness, and gives them increase of His Bounty: but for the unbelievers there is a terrible Penalty."

Since the time that I wrote the above, I found the Sura Repentance. In Sura IX; 123, it is written: "O ye who believe! Fight the unbelievers who gird you about, and let them find firmness in you; and know that God is with those who fear him."

This conveys a rather different sentiment than the one which you cited.

Quote:

---

Humiliate the non-Muslims to such an extent that they surrender and pay tribute. [Koran, Repentance: 29]

---

The Koran says: "Fight those who believe not in God nor in the Last Day, nor hold that forbidden which hath been forbidden by God and his Apostle, nor acknowledge the Religion of Truth, (even if they are) of the People of The Book, until they pay the Jizya with willing submission, and feel themselves subdued."

Jizya was a tax that non-Muslims paid to Muslims in order to be allowed to exist in Islamic society with full protection of that society. It was no set amount and it was more symbolic -- acknowledgment that those whose religion was tolerated in Islamic society would not interfere with the preaching and progress of Islam. (Yusef Ali)

Quote:

---

"There will not be found [anyone] more hostile to the believers than the Jews and the idolaters." (Palestinian TV, April 13, 2001, quoting the Koran - Sura 5,84)

---

The Koran says in Sura 5; 85: "Strongest among men in enmity to the Believers wilt thou find the Jews and Pagans; And nearest among them in love to the Believers wilt thou find those who say, 'We are Christians': because amongst these are men devoted to learning and men who have renounced the world; and they are not arrogant."

The translator's note says: "The meaning is not that they call themselves Christians, but they are such sincere Christians that they appreciate Muslim virtues, as did the Abyssinians to whom Muslim refugees went during the persecution in Mecca. They would say, 'It is true that we are Christians, but we understand your point of view, and we know you are good men.' They are Muslims at heart, whatever their label may be."

Quote:

---

Muhammad said, "The last hour will not come until the Muslims fight the Jews and the Muslims kill them" (Mishkat, page 147.)

---

I do not have a copy of Mishkat al-Masabih. However, I will offer these few quotes I could find:

If you overpower your enemy, treat your forgiveness of him as an expression of gratitude for defeating him. Ali ibne Abi Talib

It is better for a man to take a rope and bring in a bundle of sticks to sell than to beg. Mishkat al Masabih.

Whoever approaches Me walking, I will come to him running; and he who meets Me with sins equivalent to the whole world, I will greet him with forgiveness equal to it. Mishkat al Masabih.

Because of length and time involved, I will stop this for now and continue tomorrow or later this evening.

Shaheena Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/16/02 11:15:58 am

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 363
(9/16/02 11:28)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

I will also be interested to see what David Sims has to say about Islam. The title, "Islam, My Islam" seems most appropriate. Like all religions, Islam has been perverted for various interests and purposes.

Please post these excerpts.

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 282
(9/16/02 12:13)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

A man who thinks that "reason doesn't stand a chance in an argument against emotion" (as David Sims says himself) is not a man. Are you a self-declared misogynist Kevin?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 82

(9/16/02 12:23)

Reply

Misogyny

---

Quote:

---

Are you a self-declared misogynist Kevin?

---

It depends on how you define "misogyny". If a misogynist is someone who is perceived to hate women, or someone who says what most women don't like, then I am a misogynist.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 283

(9/16/02 12:31)

Reply

Re: Misogyny

---

Are you a hater of women or not?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 364

(9/16/02 13:00)

Reply

Islam

---

Quote:

---

According to the Koran, the Jews try to introduce corruption (5:64), have always been disobedient (5:78), and are the enemies of Allah, the Prophet (Mohammed) and his angels (2:97-98).

---

Sura V; 67: "The Jews say: 'God's hand is tied up.' But their hands are tied up and be they accursed for the blasphemy they utter. Nay, both his hands are widely outstretched; He giveth and spendeth of his bounty as He pleaseth. But the revelation that cometh to thee from God increaseth in most of them their obstinate rebellion and blasphemy. Amongst them we have placed enmity and hatred until the Day of Judgment. Every time they kindle the fire of war, God doth extinguish it; but they ever strive to do mischief on Earth. And God loveth not those who do mischief."

Sura V; 75-76: "They do blaspheme who say: 'God is Christ the son of Mary.' But said Christ: 'O Children of Israel! Worship God, my Lord and your Lord.' Whoever joins other gods with God -- God will forbid him the Garden, and the Fire will be his abode. There will be for the wrong-doers no one to help.

They do blaspheme who say: God is one of three in a Trinity: for there is no God except One God. If they desist not from their word of blasphemy, verily a grievous penalty will befall the blasphemers among them."

Sura II; 97-98: "Say: Whoever is an enemy to Gabriel -- for he brings down the revelation to thy heart by God's will, a confirmation of what went before, and guidance and glad tidings for those who believe.

Whoever is an enemy to God and His angels and apostles, to Gabriel and Michael, -- Lo! God is an enemy to those who reject Faith."

Quote:

---

He that chooses a religion over Islam, it will not be accepted from him and in the world to come he will be one of the lost. (Q 3:86)

---

Sura III; 86: "If anyone desires a religion other than Islam (submission to God), never will it be accepted of him; and in the Hereafter he will be in the ranks of those who have lost all spiritual good."

Quote:

---

Mohammed promised his followers seven heavens in which:

They are to cohabit with demure virgins...as beauteous as corals and rubies...full-breasted maidens for playmates... in the gardens of delight... They're to lie face to face on jewelled couches, and be serviced by immortal youths... young boys, their personal property, as comely as virgin pearls.... We created the houris [dancing girls] and made them virgins, carnal playmates for those on the right hand.... We are going to wed them to dark-eyed houris. [The Koran 55:56; 55:58; 78:33; 56:12; 52:16-17, 24; 56:35-38; 52:20]

---

Sura LV; 56-58: "In them will be Maidens, chaste, restraining their glances, whom no man or Jinn before them has touched; -- Then, which of the favors of your Lord will you deny? -- Like unto rubies and coral."

Sura LVI; 12: "In Gardens of Bliss:"

Sura LXXVII; 33: "Companions of Equal Age;"

Sura LII; 17: "As to the righteous, they will be in gardens and in Happiness,"

Sura LII; 24: "Round about them will serve, devoted to them, youths handsome as Pearls well guarded."

Sura LII; 20: "They will recline with ease on Thrones of dignity arranged in ranks; and We shall join them to Companions, with beautiful big and lustrous eyes."

Sura LVII; 35-38: "We have created their Companions of special creation and made them Virgin-pure and undefiled, -- beloved by nature, equal in age, -- for the Companions of the Right Hand."

I will stop this again for now until tomorrow evening. This ends the quotes from the Koran. The rest are quotes from Anwar Shaikh and others.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/17/02 8:52:05 am

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 365

(9/16/02 13:17)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Frankly, I don't give a damn if he is a misogynist or not.

Faizi

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 83
(9/16/02 13:40)
Reply

Re: Misogyny

---

Quote:

---

Are you a hater of women or not?

---

I don't hate women, but you can't find out if a person hates women by asking them.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 284
(9/16/02 14:16)
Reply

-----

---

Kevin:--"I don't hate women, but you can't find out if a person hates women by asking them."

-No, not always, but for the most part you can, or rather, I can.

Is there really anything quite as disgusting as the religions?

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 203
(9/16/02 20:32)
Reply

God's Will

---

Is there really anything quite as miserable as a person saying such things...?

(Plus the well-known record of "misogyny" again...)

Regarding the original subject:

I think, Faizi opened an eye to the modern & slant translations.

Quote:

---

Sura III; 86: "If anyone desires a religion other than Islam (submission to God), never will it be accepted of him;...

---

And there's the relevant argument: Islam means "submission to God's will".

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Moreover, we should not miss that religions are just things made for the masses. The teachings of Islam can be interpreted exoterically for them just to 'have faith', while Islam has an esoteric way, see Sufism, which was more or less lost due to incomprehension. For example, 'sacred war' (jihad) can have a completely external meaning that we can see from the previous (mis)interpretations, while has a meaning of realizing yourself through 'fighting' your way towards God. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 288(9/16/02 21:24)Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> Bondi! ...you don't believe in God do you? Why is everyone confused by the simplicity of this question?!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 289(9/16/02 21:27)Reply  | Tolerance of religion at the expense of personality. <hr/> Could anything be more clear?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 56(9/16/02 23:22)Reply                                                                                    | Female Void <hr/> Hm, Kevin: are anger and resentment, boredom and hostility, apathy and disappointment considered to be emotions? Or is this idea of 'female' stuff limited to excitement, happiness and sadness?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| SapiusRegistered UserPosts: 263(9/17/02 4:59)Reply                                                                                     | Views <hr/> Quote: <hr/> KS: What are your thoughts on Islam? <hr/> My views: Old story, and that it is rather unfair to quote quotes with those many "....." in-between, which gives a different meaning being out of                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | context. Thanks to Marsha for filling in the blanks.

Would love to hear your views though, Kevin.

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 103

(9/17/02 6:00)

Reply

Irrelevant

---

Islam, like all the other religious books, is full of love, hate, peace, violence, and contradictions written with with a wide open stance and passed down by word of mouth, allowing infinite interpretations.

Unfortunately a large amount of the human race take these books seriously.

Islam is only what you make it or what you've allowed others to make for you.

Your question:

Quote:

---

What are your thoughts on Islam?

---

They are just that, my thoughts and contain no universal truth and therefore irrelevant.

It seems apparent though, what you seem to have made of Islam.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 366

(9/17/02 12:30)

Reply

Islam

---

Quote:

---

When I began to study the Koran, the holy book of Islam, I found many unreasonable ideas. The women in the Koran were treated as slaves. They are nothing but sexual objects. Naturally I set aside the Koran and looked around me. I found religion equally oppressive in real life. And I realized that religious oppression and injustices are only increasing, especially in Muslim countries. The religious terrorists are everywhere. But if I criticized Muslim fundamentalists and mullahs in particular, it is because I saw them from close quarters. They took advantage of people's ignorance and oppressed them. They considered women as chattel slaves and treated them no better than the slaves of the ancient world. [Bangladeshi writer Taslima Nasrin, in exile]

---

I have some sympathetic regard for Taslima Nasrin. I am not sympathetic to her because she is a woman but because she is an educated, secular, modern thinker (relatively) who has been exiled from her native country of Bangladesh because of her anti-religious writing; her feminist writing; her secular humanism. It is notable that, because of her published writings in Bangladesh prior to her exile, she was welcomed in Sweden. Despite the high price on her head -- more than 1200 dollars -- I am certain that she must have felt confident of shelter in Europe or the United States before she began to write the more sensational autobiographical novels and articles that finally led to her expulsion from her native country. A less prominent and less educated woman would have had no such chance of support. A less prominent woman would have been stoned to death and her death would not have mattered to Sweden or the rest of Europe or the United States at all.

I would have higher regard for her had she not used the matter of womanhood as the focus for her dispute with Islam and, ultimately, the means of her escape. It has been well documented that not all women are treated well in Islamic countries. This is not news. I am not going to defend nations of Islam against these charges and this evidence because it is apparent -- as it is also apparent that women in modern, secular societies are also raped and beaten.

Indeed, so much for liberation.

But the most troubling thing -- the saddest thing -- is that within the very countries that have been progressive enough to allow women all rights of ownership, education, law, self-determination -- women have maligned themselves. What worth is liberation of women from chattel if they persist in remaining chattel?

Thus, I have sympathy for Nasrin as a secular humanist within a religious autocracy but no sympathy for her cry as a woman. The need for modernism and intellectual progress in Islamic countries is not a feminist issue. It is a human issue.

In nearly all instances in which a secular person has attempted to lead an Islamic country away from the oppression of religious/cultural practices, he has not succeeded. The founder of Pakistan, Mohammed Ali Jinnah, was not a religious man. He was progressive and had desire for Pakistan to come into the modern world. Though he is revered in Pakistan, it is well known that he drank alcohol and smoked tobacco. Like Nasrin, he was a secular humanist. His vision for Pakistan was modernity. He did not envision government by religion. Unfortunately, Jinnah died shortly after the creation of Pakistan.

It could be said that he may be rolling in his grave now but I don't think that he was so stupid. He must have been astute enough to recognize that the reality of a Muslim State could not live up to the ideal in which he envisioned that Hindus would forget that they are Hindus and Muslims would forget that they are Muslims.

"No nation can rise to the height of glory unless your women are side by side with you; we are victims of evil customs. It is a crime against humanity that our women are shut up within the four walls of the houses as prisoners. There is no sanction anywhere for the deplorable condition in which our women have to live."

Mohammad Ali Jinnah, 1944

Ali Bhutto of Pakistan was also a progressive, secular leader of merit. The present leader of Pakistan, Mussharif, is also progressive and secular -- Allah be with him.

"I don't agree with those who think that the conflict is simply between two religions, namely Christianity and Islam. Nor do I think that this is a conflict between East and West. To me, the key conflict is between irrational blind faith and rational logical minds. Or between modernity and anti-modernity. While some people want to go forward, others are trying to go backward. It is a conflict between the future and the past, between innovation and tradition, between those who value freedom and those who do not." -- Taslima Nasrin

I agree with the above. It is a fight between religiously induced ignorance and logical thinking. It is not a fight between East and West. It is a fight between progress and regression. There is much in Southwest Asia that is valuable but that is being repressed by religious ignorance on the one side and by deliberate political ignorance on the other side.

One recollection that I have from my time with Pakistanis from Lahore and Sialkot and Faisalabad and Islamabad -- was a time walking down a city street with two Pakistani men. One was very accustomed to living in the United States and the other was freshly arrived from Sialkot. The new arrival said, "East and West will never understand one another."

It is not just Islam that is the barrier to understanding.

Shaheena Faizi

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 118(9/29/02 21:08)Reply | Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I was paraphrasing Marsha, Leyla. <hr/> I'll have to check where Marsha first used that phrase. I suspect (though I cannot say I absolutely recall) the same post context made all the difference. Without proper context such a statement is indeed no more than cowboy rhetoric. Quote: <hr/> Kevin has clearly expressed why he thinks Islams is a waste of space, and I've already presented my long-term solution (which, in case you have forgotten, you "wholeheartedly" agreed with). So I'm not exactly sure what you're going on about. <hr/> |

I still do agree with your long-term solution wholeheartedly. It's your method that remains in question for me. And, the fact that you can yet state that Islam is ten times worse than Christianity even tho they are equally as bad. That just doesn't make sense.

I have asked further questions of you regarding the method (refer doctor analogy) but have assumed, since they were not responded to, that you felt maybe they were stupid questions?

Quote:

---

Why else would you post that quote from Pink Floyd's "The Wall"?

---

I've been waiting for someone to mention this! I think that CD is a profound, and artistically excellent, legacy of a (as in 'one') man's life. I never tire of it and am usually listening to it when I post here. I usually post verses that I believe may have some relevance. Food for thought?

Quote:

---

Although this thread has going on for some time now, no one has yet pin-pointed anything that is worth saving from Islam.

---

How about the people?

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 119

(9/29/02 21:26)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

David: What about the Ku Klux Klan? I would consider them to be the same level as Islam. If I had said that it is part of my goal in life to wipe out the Ku Klux Klan (and it is), would you have rejected my stance and accused me of being arrogant?

---

Good question. However, there's one problem. You are taking a single faction of Christianity that comprises of a group of people distinguished by the particular stress and interpretation of the mother group "philosophy" and equating it with an entire mother group without regard for any sub-groups therein.

Can you say without a single doubt that: the Kuran is violent and animalistic=Islam is violent and animalistic=any person of Islam is violent and animalistic?

If not, why are you addressing Islam directly as the ignorance requiring... wiping out?

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 220

(9/29/02 22:37)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

I AM: David, for a 'wise' man you sure have had an unusual string of unwise posts. I am convinced that there is a path no matter how hidden or exposed to every mans true colors, regardless to how clever he may be.

D.Q.:What about the Ku Klux Klan? I would consider them to be the same level as Islam. If I had said that it is part of my goal in life to wipe out the Ku Klux Klan (and it is), would you have rejected my stance and accused me of being arrogant?

---

Quote:

---

M.F.: You are considering things from only your side and you are completely blind to the other side -- the other face of the monster from which your more delicate and oh-so- dainty Christianity functions as a killer and a perpetuator of hate and misery.

D.Q.: You must have a short memory. I've constantly attacked the Christian mentality for many years. I've long considered it to be one of the most evil philosophies imaginable.

M.F.: So, put your haughty snout back up in the air and continue to discuss Buddhism on this forum as though you are a high priest with his flock. The forum has become a Buddhist forum. There is no room for anything else.

D.Q.: I'm happy to discuss a philosophical Islamic idea with you, if there is one. One of the reasons why Buddhism is vastly superior to Islam is that it is far more philosophical in nature. It openly addresses the great questions of Reality in a rational fashion, whereas Islam can barely look at them.

---

It's just a silly democratic thing to set Islam, Christianity, Buddhism etc. against each other. At least in this way. (Ku Klux Klan... oh, man...) Moreover, Christianity and Islam hadn't been philosophies ever (thank God). Buddhism perhaps - but only the westernized one. That which is rather a 'mentality' (as the "Christian mentality" mentioned above, or the "Islamic mentality" discussed here), that is a myopic rational system with less and less signs of intelligence from day to day.

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 24

(9/29/02 23:12)

Reply

One might well ask

---

...what the results to a people and a culture from embracing a "way".

If we examine any given country, its culture and its dominant religion we CAN begin to judge the utility of the religion to the average citizen who espouses it.

In the countries dominated by Buddhism, what has the history of the country and its people been like?

In the countries dominated by Christianity, what has...

The same might be asked of any place dominated by a religion and mind-set...

If one examines the cultural/religious climate of Germany one can realize that the anti-semitic beliefs of the people there WERE in fact promoted by a religious figure born there... Namely Martin Luther, who wrote what could be interpreted as a template for the Nazi Holocaust...

"The Jews and their Lies"

www.fordham.edu/halsall/source/luther-jews.html

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 596

(9/30/02 2:47)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Xer wrote,

Quote:

---

If we examine any given country, its culture and its dominant religion we CAN begin to judge the utility of the religion to the average citizen who espouses it.

---

Utility is a function of efficiency relative to a desired outcome. How can someone pinpoint a particular outcome or destiny for an entire culture; especially since recorded human history is less than 10,000 years old? If there is no specific desired outcome, then judgements of utility are meaningless.

Quote:

---

In the countries dominated by Buddhism, what has the history of the country and its people been like?

---

Domination is more a Christian/Muslim trait than a Buddhist trait. You can also reverse that question and ask, What has the history of Christian dominated societies been like?

The answer...bloody.

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 25

(9/30/02 8:32)

Reply

Wolfson...

---

I think you missed the point...

Pls re-read... All the way to the bottom...

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 762

(9/30/02 10:07)

Reply

Re: Bush

---

Martin wrote:

Quote:

---

This might be a little off topic but did anyone hear Bush's latest rationale for war against Iraq and Saddam Hussein - "After all, the guy once tried to kill my dad".

Do we really want someone with that kind of mentality starting a war?

---

Since Bush is clearly mad, what would you expect? I'm sure he'll pluck as many reasons as he possibly can out of his backside to attack Iraq. The more he can muster the more people are likely to lose sight of the real issue: oil.

The whole thing really is a crude as that, in every possible sense.

Dan Rowden

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1026

(9/30/02 10:07)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Kevin has clearly expressed why he thinks Islams is a waste of space, and I've already presented my long-term solution (which, in case you have forgotten, you "wholeheartedly" agreed with). So I'm not exactly sure what you're going on about.

Leyla: I still do agree with your long-term solution wholeheartedly. It's your method that remains in question for me. And, the fact that you can yet state that Islam is ten times worse than Christianity even tho they are equally as bad. That just doesn't make sense.

---

As I say, I was paraphrasing Marsha. I don't regard every major religion to be equally as bad.

Quote:

---

I have asked further questions of you regarding the method (refer doctor analogy) but have assumed, since they were not responded to, that you felt maybe they were stupid questions?

---

I did intend to respond to them, actually, but it slipped my mind. I'll work on a response today.

Quote:

---

DQ: Why else would you post that quote from Pink Floyd's "The Wall"?

LR: I've been waiting for someone to mention this! I think that CD is a profound, and artistically excellent, legacy of a (as in 'one') man's life. I never tire of it and am usually listening to it when I post here. I usually post verses that I believe may have some relevance. Food for thought?

---

I have happy memories of exploring the world of Pink Floyd and used to own all of their albums. "Animals" and "Ummagumma" were probably my favourites. I also liked the movie, "The Wall" and found it to be a spiritual work to some degree. The only problem I had with it is that I don't think Roger Waters knew how to solve the dilemma of the wall. I mean, he was good at articulating the nature of its existence and the way it alienates people from others and from themselves, but he didn't seem to have any idea how to eliminate it. The only thing he could think of was to blow it up with explosives! So I must admit I found the ending very weak and anti-climactic.

Quote:

---

DQ: Although this thread has going on for some time now, no one has yet pin-pointed anything that is worth saving from Islam.

LR: How about the people?

---

Saving them from Islam, you mean?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1027

(9/30/02 10:23)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

Can you say without a single doubt that: the Kuran is violent and animalistic=Islam is violent and animalistic=any person of Islam is violent and animalistic?

---

I'm not saying that. I'm sure there are just as many intelligent, open-minded people in Islamic culture as there are anywhere else. What I am saying is, though, is that those kinds of people are being severely hampered by the existence of Islam - both politically, in that they are surrounded by masses of Islamic fundamentalists who are keeping their countries impoverished, and also spirituality, by having to bow down and conform to unintelligent dogma.

Quote:

---

If not, why are you addressing Islam directly as the ignorance requiring...wiping out?

---

I'm not. Islam is merely an offshoot of a more fundamental ignorance - namely, an ignorance concerning the nature of existence and the self. Christianity, most of Buddhism, and atheism are also offshoots. I attack them as well.

\*edit*** Replaced "Islam wrote:" with "Leyla wrote:"

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 9/30/02 11:28:17 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1028

(9/30/02 10:44)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Bondi wrote:

Quote:

---

D.Q.: I'm happy to discuss a philosophical Islamic idea with you, if there is one. One of the reasons why Buddhism is vastly superior to Islam is that it is far more philosophical in nature. It openly addresses the great questions of Reality in a rational fashion, whereas Islam can barely look at them.

Bondi: It's just a silly democratic thing to set Islam, Christianity, Buddhism etc. against each other. At least in this way.

---

There is nothing "democratic" in what I am doing. It all stems from the valuing of reason. Are you seriously trying to argue that Islamic theology is of the same quality as Buddhist philosophy? I hope not.

Quote:

---

(Ku Klux Klan... oh, man...)

---

They're very similar. If you replaced the words "Jews and Christians" with "negroes" in the Koran you would more or less have a word-for-word translation of a KKK manifesto.

For example:

"Believers, take neither negroes or asians for your friends." (Koran, Surah 5:51)

"Humiliate the negros to such an extent that they surrender and pay tribute." [Koran, Repentance: 29]

" O ye who believe! Murder those of the non-white races .... and let them find harshness in you. [Koran, Repentance: 123]"

Quote:

---

Moreover, Christianity and Islam hadn't been philosophies ever (thank God).

---

They are both based in the philosophy that submission to an external God, devotion to a sacred book, reverence for a prophet deity, and open support for the local church or mosque are essential to a life of goodness.

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 599

(9/30/02 11:37)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Xer,

I don't think I missed your point....it is meaningless and non-specific.

Quote:

---

If we examine any given country, its culture and its dominant religion we CAN begin to judge the utility of the religion to the average citizen who espouses it.

---

Please elaborate on the phrase "utility of the religion."

Quote:

---

The same might be asked of any place dominated by a religion and mind-set...

---

...which would include any and every "place" in human history that consisted of a society or group of humans.

avidaloca

Registered User

Posts: 94

(9/30/02 12:36)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Fiazi wrote:

Quote:

---

Like Kevin, your aura has taken on the color of the British Sahib in colonial India. Your attitude is like an Eighteenth Century English gentleman -- a useless fop in white stockings and silk breeches and lace whose gloved hands have never done work.

---

I'm not getting into a discussion on this but I will say that Kevin is actually a very skilled programmer who makes tens of thousands of dollars a year through programs he has written entirely on his own with no external help whatsoever other than tips anyone can find on the internet. I know he spends countless hours updating these programs, easily equating to the actual work the average person does in their 9 to 5 job. A lot of people appreciate his work and he has not lived off the public purse for several years due to the income generated from this.

Martin Dudaniec

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 26

(9/30/02 12:43)

Reply

Since you presume to know what my point is

---

Wolf...

Perhaps you would like to explain what you THINK my point is, that you consider "meaningless"

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 123

(9/30/02 14:22)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

I'm not saying that. I'm sure there are just as many intelligent, open-minded people in Islamic culture as there are anywhere else. What I am saying is, though, is that those kinds of people are being severely hampered by the existence of Islam - both politically, in that they are surrounded by masses of Islamic fundamentalists who are keeping their countries impoverished, and also spirituality, by having to bow down and conform to unintelligent dogma.

---

So, let's wipe out Islamic fundamentalism and its opposites, Christian and Jewish fundamentalism. I'm sure that the intelligent and open-minded members of Islam would prefer that to wiping out Islam altogether. The rest should all fall into place rather nicely after that.

Quote:

---

I'm not. Islam is merely an offshoot of a more fundamental ignorance - namely, an ignorance concerning the nature of existence and the self. Christianity, most of Buddhism, and atheism are also offshoots. I attack them as well.

---

I think it more accurate to say "Islamic fundamentalism is an offshoot...". Don't you think, David?

Quote:

---

**edit** Replaced "Islam wrote:" with "Leyla wrote:"

---

LOL. Careful. You almost wiped me off the face of your Earth.

Leyla R
Registered User
Posts: 124
(9/30/02 14:33)
Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

I have happy memories of exploring the world of Pink Floyd and used to own all of their albums. "Animals" and "Ummagumma" were probably my favourites.

---

:) The Wall and Animals and Dark Side of the Moon and Wish You Were Here are mine.

Quote:

---

I also liked the movie, "The Wall" and found it to be a spiritual work to some degree. The only problem I had with it is that I don't think Roger Waters knew how to solve the dilemma of the wall. I mean, he was good at articulating the nature of its existence and the way it alienates people from others and from themselves, but he didn't seem to have any idea how to eliminate it. The only thing he could think of was to blow it up with explosives! So I must admit I found the ending very weak and anti-climactic.

---

Well, yeah, you're right. Now if he had've broken it down to bricks and mortar, he might have had a better chance, eh?

Quote:

---

DQ: Although this thread has going on for some time now, no one has yet pin-pointed anything that is worth saving from Islam.

LR: How about the people?

DQ: Saving them from Islam, you mean?

---

Haha flippen ha! I meant saving them from ignorant fundamentalists of any particular persuasion.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 413

(9/30/02 14:37)

Reply

Re: Since you presume to know what my point is

---

Quote:

---

I'm not getting into a discussion on this but I will say that Kevin is actually a very skilled programmer who makes tens of thousands of dollars a year

---

Incredible.

I could not care less how Kevin gets his money. A fop is a fop. I never mentioned a word about whether or not he lives on the dole and I don't care if he lives on it or not.

And you people think Muslims are backward.

Faizi

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 222

(9/30/02 18:05)

Reply

Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

David,

Quote:

---

D.Q.: I'm happy to discuss a philosophical Islamic idea with you, if there is one. One of the reasons why Buddhism is vastly superior to Islam is that it is far more philosophical in nature. It openly addresses the great questions of Reality in a rational fashion, whereas Islam can barely look at them.

B.: It's just a silly democratic thing to set Islam, Christianity, Buddhism etc. against each other. At least in this way.

D.Q.: There is nothing "democratic" in what I am doing. It all stems from the valuing of reason. Are you seriously trying to argue that Islamic theology is of the same quality as Buddhist philosophy? I hope not.

---

On the contrary. The very thing of not same quality precludes such an argument. That's why I wrote that one shouldn't set Islam & Buddhism against each other. There's no such thing as measuring truth as if there were "10% truth in Islam" and "70% in Buddhism". Truth is not a quantity. I think the example of KKK exposes the serious confusion about what is qualitative and what is quantitative. KKK has obviously no quality, it is a perverted product of a corrupted world.

(It's unnecessary to comment the KKK-Koran replacements. It's easy to pervert sacred scripts with empty words. Nowadays, it is a tool of politicians.)

Quote:

---

B.: Moreover, Christianity and Islam hadn't been philosophies ever (thank God).

D.Q.: They are both based in the philosophy that submission to an external God, devotion to a sacred book, reverence for a prophet deity, and open support for the local church or mosque are essential to a life of goodness.

---

It is called religion not philosophy. You are using "philosophy" here according to its coarse meaning: "a way of living", "an individual way of looking at life".

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 29

(10/1/02 0:09)

Reply

Rather Leyla...

---

"So, let's wipe out Islamic fundamentalism and its opposites, Christian and Jewish fundamentalism. I'm sure that the intelligent and open-minded members of Islam would prefer that to wiping out Islam altogether. The rest should all fall into place rather nicely after that."

Let's wipe out ALL organized religion and leave it up to each individual to decide for themselves what foolish fountain to drink from.

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 600

(10/1/02 7:22)

Reply

Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

How would you wipe out all religions?

Reason? With reason, you might influence to some significant degree say...5-10% of the population? This is after you have reached them and spent time reasoning with them, of course.

Force? Good luck.

Subversion? You risk losing credibility once lies are discovered.

To be honest, the motivation for collective action in this manner is no different, IMO, than the practitioners of the religions you might wipe out.

If you have already chosen to think for yourself, why does it ultimately matter if they do the same?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1031

(10/1/02 9:07)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

Avidaloca wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin is actually a very skilled programmer who makes tens of thousands of dollars a year through programs he has written entirely on his own with no external help whatsoever other than tips anyone can find on the internet. I know he spends countless hours updating these programs, easily equating to the actual work the average person does in their 9 to 5 job. A lot of people appreciate his work and he has not lived off the public purse for several years due to the income generated from this.

---

He's gone from being a drain on the public purse to being a drain on the wisdom purse.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1033(10/1/02 9:59)Reply  | Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> Leyla wrote: Quote: <hr/> DQ: I'm not saying that. I'm sure there are just as many intelligent, open-minded people in Islamic culture as there are anywhere else. What I am saying is, though, is that those kinds of people are being severely hampered by the existence of Islam - both politically, in that they are surrounded by masses of Islamic fundamentalists who are keeping their countries impoverished, and also spirituality, by having to bow down and conform to unintelligent dogma. Leyla: So, let's wipe out Islamic fundamentalism and its opposites, Christian and Jewish fundamentalism. I'm sure that the intelligent and open-minded members of Islam would prefer that to wiping out Islam altogether. The rest should all fall into place rather nicely after that. <hr/> The point is, I'm not sure there is anything else in Islam apart from fundamentalism. There is only moderate fundamentalism and extreme fundamentalism. |

The moderates are those who are happy enough to submit mindlessly to the dogma of Islam, but who also have other priorities as well - such as striving for worldly success and a contented middle-class existence. They don't give themselves completely over to Islam and therefore don't really have the commitment or stamina to start blowing people up. They are part-time or diluted fundamentalists, as it were.

The only real exceptions would be those few who reject the more literalist interpretations of Islamic scripture and try to seek deeper meaning in them. For they are beginning to leave Islam behind altogether.

Quote:

---

DQ: Islam is merely an offshoot of a more fundamental ignorance - namely, an ignorance concerning the nature of existence and the self. Christianity, most of Buddhism, and atheism are also offshoots. I attack them as well.

Leyla: I think it more accurate to say "Islamic fundamentalism is an offshoot...". Don't you think, David?

---

If we define "fundamentalism" as blind faith in handed-down dogma, then all religion is fundamentalist in nature. There isn't a single religious person who isn't a fundamentalist. To be religious is to be a fundamentalist.

Given this, the only way that an Islamic person could cease being a fundamentalist is by rationally challenging everything that is taught in Islam and training himself to stop believing in anything that cannot be established as 100% certain and true. That is to say, he would have to relinquish his attachment to Islam and become a rational human being.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 127

(10/1/02 12:55)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Let's define the following terms this way and see what happens:

religion the quest for the values of the ideal life, involving three phases, the ideal, the practices for attaining the values of the ideal, and the theology or world view relating the quest to the environing universe.

religious imbued with or exhibiting religion; pious; devout; godly.

fundamentalism uncompromising religious or ideological beliefs seen as aggressively extremist.

Whilst I wouldn't necessarily label you a fundie, I do consider you to both have a religion and to be religious.

I have stated previously that anyone who operates on the basis of the achievement of an ideal in life (which is everyone) is necessarily religious -- no matter what that ideal may be. Even the bourgeoisie with their own particular brand of religion, despite their claims to any other God or none.

What say you?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 417

(10/1/02 13:05)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

I have been completely disheartened and disappointed in this thread.

I am disheartened by the lack of compassion from those who claim to have achieved ultimate understanding through enlightenment.

If Islamics are Ku Klux Klan-ers, then, so are the enlightened men of this forum. Ultimately, I see no wisdom here beyond a self appointed teacher with his flock. I can picture David Quinn in a white robe and pointed hat.

In five years, I have achieved disgust much more than enlightenment. I am completely disgusted.

Faizi

|                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 38(10/1/02 13:47)Reply                                                                                  | MKF... <hr/> My apologies for any perceived lack of compassion on my part. Any REAL wisdom has to include feeling and compassion for others. Wisdom without compassion is foolishness.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1035(10/1/02 13:49)Reply  | Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> Okay, I exaggerate a bit. It is a notch or two above the Ku Klux Klan. Those few quotes that you posted in are evidence of this.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| why234Registered UserPosts: 2(10/1/02 18:47)Reply                                                                                       | hmm <hr/> islam, is the way of life, defined by the Creator of everything. the Almighty, the supreme being. many will question, who is this Creator?Is there proof to His existence?Can science unveil Him?Does logic and rationality agree with Him? logically, it would be easier for God to reveal himself, his power, his greatness. so no one would dare to question Him. indeed, it would be too easy. but i guess, He wanted to 'test' us. among us, who would have faith in him?among us, who would believe, when it appears as if there is no reason to?among us, who would give submission, when others would not? God has promised enlightenment to those who seek it.if truth is what, one is looking for, that is what he will find. |

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 765

(10/1/02 23:37)

Reply

Religion and wisdom

---

The basis of Buddhism (or Taoism for that matter), however falsely manifest due to its derivation from past cultural and religious influence and the natural herdism it may be subject to, is totally worthwhile; the basis of Islam, however, may be defended how?.....

Can someone fill the dots without some bullsh*t about submission to a God that only exists via the submission to a brainless religion that demands said submission?

That would make the apparent defence of Islam worthwhile.

Otherwise, I hold to my stated and only view in this thread that the religious mentality, be it manifest in Islam, Christendom, Judaism, humanism or whatever) be worthless for the truth seeker.

I'd like to wipe them out too, but there's petty few individuals who are close to that to be even talking about it - other than metaphorically.

So, look to yourself!

Dan Rowden

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 770

(10/2/02 1:06)

Reply

Re: hmm

---

Marsha,

Give me one reason why Islam should exist.

Dan Rowden

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 45

(10/2/02 1:44)

Reply

Reasons for "Islam's Existence"

---

That which uses the title "Islam" has been practiced in as many ways as in Christendom. Some as liberal as Unitarian Universalists who say "You might be a Unitarian and not even know it..."(Leo Rosten's book, "Religions of America")

One might well ask what it is that is being asked by the question "Give me one good reason why Islam should exist?" especially if the definition of exactly what IS "Islam" is unclear.

One could argue that the "reason" for "Islam" to exist is that the letters "I", "S", "L", "A", and "M" exist.

On the other hand if we can explain with some precision and come to terms with what it is we mean by "Islam", then perhaps we could have a discussion about the utility of it's existence.

Of course in discussing "utility" we'll necessarily need to come to terms and agreement on what standard to measure things by as well...

Shall we give it a go?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 419

(10/2/02 11:08)

Reply

Don't read this if you have a short attention span

---

Dan Rowden,

Quote:

---

Give me one reason why Islam should exist.

---

As I have stated from the beginning of this thread, I do not consider Islam to be a good religion. As I have oft stated in my five years of writing to Genius, I do not believe that there is such a thing as a good religion. I loathe religion and its proponents -- all religion. Religion is dictatorial and it is technical. It precludes self thought. It precludes wisdom. It proposes that one may become wise or enlightened simply through belief -- blind faith. All religions do this -- not only Islam. Buddhists believe faithfully that, if they follow the Two-Pronged Path -- what the hell ever it is called -- that they will come -- automatically now -- to enlightenment. You just believe this bullshit and, by God, you got it sussed. You just put this thing with that thing and do this thing and do that thing -- and there you go. You can build your way to Heaven.

Christians believe that Jesus saves. Muslims believe that Allah rules over them.

Fool that I am, I see no salvation; no knowledge to be gained through faith of any kind -- except the faith of lessons learned while yet tied to the yoke of life; to flesh and blood; to one's humanity. This is why I think the lesson of Abraham and Isaac is such an important historical lesson and it is a lesson that is taught in Islam and Judaism and in Christianity and is a lesson that Kierkegaard discussed at length in "Fear and Trembling." It is the story of one man's complete trust in Nature -- God -- the path to Enlightenment as well as his complete trust in his own nature that is like God. When Abraham went to sacrifice his very beloved son, Isaac, on Mount Moriah, he well knew that such a sacrifice would be a crime against God. His faith in God was such that he intrinsically knew that God could not allow his son to be killed by his hand. Had Abraham killed Isaac, it could not have been the will of God. It would have been an act committed out of hate; jealousy; insanity -- and Abraham was not jealous of his son nor did he hate him nor was he insane.

That is the lesson of Abraham. It is the lesson of knowledge that exceeds faith. It contains nothing of greed and nothing of hate or malice. It was pure both in its seeming surrender and in its obvious defiance of such surrender and faith. Abraham could not have killed Isaac. To have sacrificed him on false pretenses, would have been an act against God and Abraham understood this.

Abraham was not a Christian and he was not a Jew. He was nomadic. He moved all around the Middle East. He traveled through what is now Israel and what is now Iraq and Saudi Arabia. He set forth the Cabbala to which all Islamic pilgrims travel as they are told to do in their religion.

Jews -- and, by conscript, Christians -- are the descendants of Abraham through Isaac. Isaac was Abraham's son through his wife, Sara.

Arabs -- and, by conscript, all Muslims -- are descendants of Abraham through Ishmael. Ishmael was Abraham's son through his servant, Hagar.

While there is kinship between Muslims and Jews/Christians, there is also division. Jews/Christians believe that the land of Caanan is sacred because it is their inheritance through Abraham. Muslims, through Hagar and Ishmael, believe that the land belongs rightfully to them.

Because I am a complete idiot, I believe that the land belongs to no one. The continuing war in the Middle East is tribal. It is based on tribal tales and loyalties that have grown into separate religions.

I don't like Christianity. I don't like Judaism. I don't like Islam and I don't like Buddhism. If there was some way to clear the human mind of these tribal loyalties, I would clear it. I do not look upon men as this or that or this or that. Skin color means nothing to me -- other than variations on the color brown. Ancient tribal history that has branched off into religions means nothing to me.

Abraham is not my father. Isaac is not my brother. Ishmael is not my brother. I belong to no tribe.

Unfortunately, as long as the children of Abraham are warring, my protest against such ignorance is futile. Despite our scientific knowledge and our quest toward longevity, nothing of significance can be accomplished as long as we are hell bent on fighting brother against brother.

The only reason that I can offer that Islam should exist is because Judaism/Christianity exists and exerts its tribal will. It does so with complete political and economical authority as well as religious authority. The descendants of Isaac are supreme.

Because I do not believe that the descendants of Ishmael should die -- more than the descendants of Isaac should die, I believe that Islam should exist.

If there can be reconciliation and realization from both sides -- the end of Christianity/Judaism, then I could see no reason for Islam.

The reason that Islam should exist is because it is the opposite of Christianity/Judaism.

What is an enemy without a brother? What is a brother without an enemy?

A fight cannot exist without reason for taking sides. How wonderful if we can convince ourselves that reason does not exist. How nice that we can convince ourselves that Buddhism transcends all reason -- is Ultimate Reason.

Buddhism is the Great Western Escape. It lets Whitey off the hook.

The tribal fight goes on. I do not think that it is an act of wisdom to feign ignorance of it. I do not believe that one people should be sacrificed for the other. I do not believe that one brother deserves favor above the other. I do not raise my children in such a fashion. When I look at my children, I see two separate offshoots from the father. Both are valuable and I love both equally.

The stupid proposal to wipe Islam from the face of the earth is a proposal to cut off one's right arm; to kill one's brother.

There are kindred ideations between Jews/Christians and Muslims.

God help us if the two factions ever unite or if one survives without the survival of the other.

Faizi

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 795

(10/2/02 11:10)

Reply

Re: hmm

---

Xero,

No, we don't need to make it that complex. Of course Islam is as multifarious in its expression as Christendom. So what? All its manifestations are still religious in nature. As an expression of that nature, what I'm asking is, in the end, why should the religious mentality and any expression of it exist or be defended?

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 10/2/02 11:25:32 am

why234

Registered User

Posts: 4

(10/2/02 11:34)

Reply

hmm

---

what is islam?

it is the way of life that is blessed by Allah swt.

it is the act of believing with the heart, proclaiming with speech, and finally to materialize it through action.

it's quite disheartening to see a group of thinkers deny the existence of the true God. islam is created to be a blessing to the universe. it's a gift from Allah swt. though the rational mind may not have the capacity to decipher the inevitable truth at this moment, everything will become apparent once the soul leaves this world.

at that time, the soul will utter..

"dear God, i have seen, i have listened, return me back to that world, and i will submit myself completely.."

and the angels would question the soul incessantly

"have you not heard of islam? have you not been preached? have you not?"

solemnly, the soul answers..

"i have.. but i turned away.. had i listened and dwelt in thought, surely this will not become of me.."

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1041

(10/2/02 15:40)

Reply

Re: Don't read this if you have a short attention span

---

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

The reason that Islam should exist is because it is the opposite of Christianity/Judaism.

---

To my way of thinking, Islam is like the twin brother of Judaism, while Christianity is vastly superior to both.

Judaism and Islam are very similar in that they are both extremely parochial, vindictive religions that are obsessed with hero-worship, political overthrows, annihilating enemies, and the like. Open up the Old Testament and it is just as revolting and petty-minded as the Koran. There is nothing wise or timeless in either of them.

Christianity at least makes the attempt to be a timeless, transcendent religion that concerns itself with ultimate reality. It may well be a token attempt for the most part, but at least it serves to introduce the concept of Truth to people, however vaguely. With Islam and Judaism, however, you get nothing like this at all. They are religions that are designed for monkeys.

This doesn't mean that I would like to see Christianity preserved. I think it should disappear along with the other two. But it's all relative, isn't it. Compared to Islam and Judaism, Christianity is a religion of great genius. But compared to the wisdom of a sage, Christianity is a sick and decrepid thing that should be put out of its misery.

why234

Registered User

Posts: 7

(10/2/02 18:53)

Reply

..

---

DavidQuinn000..

perhaps u should study reductio ad absurdum and then, analyze the contents of the bible to see whether it is consistent with itself.

only when u have done all this, would u be worthy of making any form of comparative analysis. else, u're just making a profound statement of ur own ignorance.

think before u speak. do not condescend others. ask urself the orientation of which u stand upon. to find truth? or merely.. to be emotional. :) if the latter is your choice, then i will speak no further.

"it is easier to be blinded by emotions, than to decipher truth with reason".

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 604

(10/2/02 20:49)

Reply

Re: Don't read this if you have a short attention span

---

Quote:

---

only when u have done all this, would u be worthy of making any form of comparative analysis. else, u're just making a profound statement of ur own ignorance.

---

...and someone who cannot spell out the word "you" should expect no significant respect on a serious discussion board.

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 420
(10/3/02 10:20)

Reply

Re: ..

---

Most of what is written to this forum is crap. It's just chat put out as a discussion of philosophy. Few people are interested in serious discussion. They just want to hang out and whine.

I wrote a very serious post last evening. I put much thought into it.

As usual, the returns are very weak.

I expect a challenge. I don't expect chat but chat is what I get.

The nature of this forum has turned completely to chat or to Buddhist tenets or to discussion of elementary logic.

I expect a little more. In fact, I expect a lot more.

Faizi

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host
Posts: 1043
(10/3/02 10:59)

Reply

Re: ..

---

Is it really the case that the replies have been crappy, or are you upset because no one is pandering to your attachment to Islam? What I find strange is that you are prepared to defend the nonsense which is Islam (and you even admit that it is nonsense) just because you happened to marry a Pakistani bloke in the past. It's almost as though you feel I am attacking a cherished aspect of your past life and therefore attacking you personally.

why234

Registered User
Posts: 10
(10/3/02 11:50)

Reply

sigh

---

wolfsonjak,

ehhehe.. ic.. 'u' wish to judge my intelligence by the way i spell 'you'. hehehe this is by far the funniest form of intelligence evaluation. ur test is the paramount of 'content validity'. ehheh :) shall we begin with a spelling test of common pronoun? ahahahha

y dont u restudy intelligence theory and i'll get back to u. in addition, please do a lil' bit of research in pragmatics to understand y syntax theory can sometimes lose its significance in the sociological context of communication. maybe then u wont be so eager of making a fool of urself in front of me. :)

davidquinn00,

in theory, ur calumination should have instigated anger within me. considering ur current emotional status, and ur putative reputation as a blind interlocutor, i will tolerate this absurdity. again, i urge u to study the bible and reductio ad absurdum. u might wanna take a prerequisite course in EQ too, just in case. :) however, should u voluntarily deem urself as an emotional thinker, who speaks without proof, who condemns islam without studying the quran, who worships the bible without analyzing it, then so be it. eheh ur act is self explanatory. it's just ur way of 'proving' ur own mental deficiency. :)

why do i have a feeling that this is not really a genius forum?
my impending departure is understandable...

why234

Registered User

Posts: 11

(10/3/02 11:54)

Reply

sigh

---

wolfsonjak,

ehhehe.. ic.. 'u' wish to judge my intelligence by the way i spell 'you'. hehehe this is by far the funniest form of intelligence evaluation. ur test is the paramount of 'content validity'. ehheh :) shall we begin with a spelling test of common pronoun? ahahahha

y dont u restudy intelligence theory and i'll get back to u. in addition, please do a lil' bit of research in pragmatics to understand y syntax theory can sometimes lose its significance in the sociological context of communication. maybe then u wont be so eager of making a fool of urself in front of me. :)

davidquinn00,

in theory, ur calumination should have instigated anger within me. considering ur current emotional status, and ur putative reputation as a blind interlocutor, i will tolerate this absurdity. again, i urge u to study the bible and reductio ad absurdum. u might wanna take a prerequisite course in EQ too, just in case. :) however, should u voluntarily deem urself as an emotional thinker, who speaks without proof, who condemns islam without studying the quran, who worships the bible without analyzing it, then so be it. eheh ur act is self explanatory. it's just ur way of 'proving' ur own mental deficiency. :)

why do i have a feeling that this is not really a genius forum?
my impending departure is understandable...

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 807

(10/3/02 12:14)

Reply

Re: sigh

Well, before you disappear off into the religious ether, perhaps you could provide just one example of a metaphysical fact that you have gleaned from your study of the Bible?

Dan Rowden

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 808(10/3/02 12:15)Reply       | Re: sigh <hr/> Well, before you disappear off into the religious ether, perhaps you could provide just one example of a metaphysical fact that you have gleaned from your study of the Bible? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 421(10/3/02 12:16)Reply  | Re: sigh <hr/> David Quinn, Quote: <hr/> To my way of thinking, Islam is like the twin brother of Judaism, while Christianity is vastly superior to both. <hr/> You are a Buddhist. Since you are coming completely from that manner of thought and because you are completely faithful to it, I expect you to consider Christianity to be vastly superior to Judaism and Islam while |

completely ignoring the fact that Christianity is a direct offshoot of Judaism. Jesus was a Jew. Abraham was not a Jew. Muslims are descendants of Abraham through Ishmael. Christians and Jews are descendants of Abraham through Isaac and the line of David. This is why, though on the surface, it may seem that Jews and Muslims have much more in common by tradition, it is true that Christians and Jews have more in common by lineage.

What is your evidence that Christianity is vastly superior to Islam and Judaism? Certainly, Jesus was a wise man but so was Abraham. In fact, it is the matter of my intellectual taste that I consider Abraham to have been the wiser. His so called faith did not require him to kill or to be killed. If you look completely at the face of things, Jesus was quite a showoff and a false martyr. I see no wisdom in falseness. He proved a point that should have been obvious.

Quote:

---

Judaism and Islam are very similar in that they are both extremely parochial, vindictive religions that are obsessed with hero-worship, political overthrows, annihilating enemies, and the like. Open up the Old Testament and it is just as revolting and petty-minded as the Koran. There is nothing wise or timeless in either of them.

---

I am quite glad to know that Christianity is not vindictive. How enlightening. It is a relief to realize that people do not carry around crucifixes or pictures of Jesus out of hero worship. Amazing! All this time, I thought that Christians worshipped Jesus. I thought that one of the great Bible verses was John 3:16. Boy-howdy, am I stupid or what?!!

I think it is the height of ignorance to worship the figure of a man on a cross. I think it is the height of ignorance to think that such hero worship will get you to Heaven. I would not stoop so low.

But, of course, Christianity is vastly superior to Islam. I forgot.

Quote:

---

Christianity at least makes the attempt to be a timeless, transcendent religion that concerns itself with ultimate reality. It may well be a token attempt for the most part, but at least it serves to introduce the concept of Truth to people, however vaguely. With Islam and Judaism, however, you get nothing like this at all. They are religions that are designed for monkeys.

---

I will make it a point, then, to go to church. There are five churches on Main Street in my town. I am only sorry that I had not realized years before that enlightenment in the form of a timeless, transcendent religion could be just around the corner. I reckon I will have to get baptized or something.

I am somewhat shocked that you consider Muslims and Jews to be monkeys. In fact, I am utterly disheartened that a Buddhist who has ambition toward enlightenment could consider Jews and Muslims to be monkeys while Christians are a part of a timeless, transcendent religion.

Well, it certainly is obvious to me that Christianity is a very superior religion to Islam and Judaism. Islam, before Christianity should be wiped off the face of the earth.

Quote:

---

This doesn't mean that I would like to see Christianity preserved. I think it should disappear along with the other two. But it's all relative, isn't it.

---

It's relative if you are a Christian.

Quote:

---

Compared to Islam and Judaism, Christianity is a religion of great genius.

---

Well, it does have Jerry Falwell. I forgot.

Quote:

---

But compared to the wisdom of a sage, Christianity is a sick and decrepid thing that should be put out of its misery.

---

What, exactly, is a sage?

Your Buddhism smacks terribly of Southern Baptist.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 422
(10/3/02 12:17)

Reply

Re: sigh

---

(This message was left blank)

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 10/3/02 12:30:41 pm

Ursus Horribilis

Registered User
Posts: 20
(10/3/02 12:28)

Reply

Personal invective

---

Mr. Quinn,

Personal remarks are never in good taste. I find your resonse to Mme. Faizi to verge on the personal invective.

----

What does it matter what her past was to the discussion at hand?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1044

(10/4/02 17:23)

Reply

Re: Personal invective

---

I think it is relevant in this case. I've known Marsha for a long time now and know that she is just as anti-religious as I am. She despises religion, dismisses it as group-think, and aggressively attacks those who support it. So her sudden spirited defence of Islam over the past few days is quite inexplicable, as you can imagine.

It isn't quite inexplicable, however, when you consider the emotional attachment that Marsha has to Islam, which I believe originally stems from a past marriage to a Pakistani. Just look at her posts in this thread, for example. It is plainly obvious that Marsha enjoys being an Islamic chick. She gets off on it. It gives colour to her personality. She can prance around in its exotic air. She can shock her American friends and acquaintances with it. It is too precious for her to lose.

The way she signed off one of her earlier posts with "Shaheena Faizi" gives it away. Indeed, the very fact that she hangs on to her married Islamic name of Faizi, even though she is no longer married, indicates that she identifies with Islam to some degree, that it has become part of her ego. So much so that she is prepared to passionately defend the religion even though her intellect knows that it is a heap of nonsense.

So yes, as far as this issue is concerned, I think her past is entirely relevant

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1045

(10/4/02 17:47)

Reply

Re: sigh

---

"Faizi" wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: To my way of thinking, Islam is like the twin brother of Judaism, while Christianity is vastly superior to both.

Faizi: You are a Buddhist.

---

Well, I doubt that many Buddhists would agree with that. In truth, I am no more a Buddhist than I am a Christian or an atheist. Granted, I often like to use Buddhist terminology to explain a philosophic point, but that is only because I find it useful. I also like to make use of scientific terminology, but that doesn't make me a scientist.

Quote:

---

I expect you to consider Christianity to be vastly superior to Judaism and Islam while completely ignoring the fact that Christianity is a direct offshoot of Judaism.

---

That doesn't mean anything. A mature adult is the direct offshoot of an immature child.

Quote:

---

What is your evidence that Christianity is vastly superior to Islam and Judaism?

---

Consider the principle of turning the other cheek, for example. This is one of the defining principles that Christianity is known for. It represents a step upwards in spiritual development from the worldly, dog-eat-dog, vindictive principles that Islam is known for.

Quote:

---

Certainly, Jesus was a wise man but so was Abraham. In fact, it is the matter of my intellectual taste that I consider Abraham to have been the wiser. His so called faith did not require him to kill or to be killed.

---

He was prepared to kill his own son if God asked him to.

Quote:

---

If you look completely at the face of things, Jesus was quite a showoff and a false martyr. I see no wisdom in falseness. He proved a point that should have been obvious.

---

What is an example of this?

Quote:

---

DQ: Judaism and Islam are very similar in that they are both extremely parochial, vindictive religions that are obsessed with hero-worship, political overthrows, annihilating enemies, and the like. Open up the Old Testament and it is just as revolting and petty-minded as the Koran. There is nothing wise or timeless in either of them.

Faizi: I am quite glad to know that Christianity is not vindictive. How enlightening.

---

I didn't say that. You're trying to turn it into a black-and-white issue, when in reality it's a matter of degree. Everyone knows that Christians can be very vindictive.

Quote:

---

DQ: Christianity at least makes the attempt to be a timeless, transcendent religion that concerns itself with ultimate reality. It may well be a token attempt for the most part, but at least it serves to introduce the concept of Truth to people, however vaguely. With Islam and Judaism, however, you get nothing like this at all. They are religions that are designed for monkeys.

Faizi: I am somewhat shocked that you consider Muslims and Jews to be monkeys.

---

Again, I didn't say that. I said that the religions were designed for monkeys - i.e. they pander to the base animal values of community, submission and political conquest. They don't foster the "human" attributes of rational thought, individuality and enlightened consciousness.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 225

(10/4/02 18:06)

Reply

Re: Personal invective

---

I suppose if I were living in America I would do the same. I would be proud of my origin, too.

As I wrote before, there is no such thing for a Muslim as dismissing Islam (or for a Christian as dismissing Christianity). If you're a Buddhist and rationalist ("reasonist", heh... :), you can call this an "emotional attachment". But the sentimental element renders a "religion" into a religion, and Islam is a religion, while Buddhism is not. That's why it is unreasonable to argue about that "emotional attachment"...

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 812

(10/4/02 23:52)

Reply

Re: sigh

---

I have to say I don't quite see the basis of David's elevation of Christianity (i. e. Christendom) above Islam. It strikes me as an attempt to mix together certain nobler aspects of so-called Christian principle, which have never in that religion's history been meaningfully applied, with the public, religious face of Christianity that, in fact, never really applies said principles!

The religious mentality is bad whenever and wherever it appears and for me that is the primary concern. I frankly don't even see the real relevance of an in-depth analysis of the public, ritualistic face of any religion - other than an a means of examining the nature of the ego and herdliness.

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 10/4/02 11:53:49 pm

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 79

(10/5/02 0:47)

Reply

It MUST necessarily be this complex, Dan

---

We MUST define before we can begin.

Let me explain from the perspective of an extremist Muslim.

ALL humans are defined by an extremist to BE a Muslim at BIRTH. What happens later from that perspective is either considered apostasy or embracing the "truth".

Definitions are important if we're not to descend into a word game.

We need to know what we're talking about.

In my experience it takes very little to be accepted as a Muslim and only rejection of "it", whatever "it" might be (as "they" seem to axiomatically reject denying anyone as being a muslim...ALL are muslims, it's just that some are apostates)...places one as a rejector of Islam.

So never mind the fact that THEY themselves have in being UNABLE or UNWILLING to define a muslim from externally observed behavior, argued against any reasonable way to define "what is a muslim"...

One MUST be able to state that which something is NOT before we can accurately say what something IS. Or the other way around.

In any case something cannot, by definition BE and NOT BE any given thing...

Some, have become enamored of the LABEL "Islam" as much as some "Catholics" have been enamored of the LABEL "Catholic".

I asked a friend once the question:

"Gustavo, Could you believe what I believe and still consider yourself to be a 'good Catholic'?"

He said "Yes!"

I said, "Then your definition of who or what IS a Catholic is NOT discernable from any observable behavior save the mere identification with the label."

And concluded... "Catholicism, then for you is mere emotional attachment with the label."

(Argument ensues...)

For many muslims I know, (who seem to know little if any of the Quran from personal study, more along the lines of some kind of Islamic catechism) being a "Muslim" is merely identifying emotionally with the label...

So the argument for "Islam" and its existence (in my view) can be reduced to the fact that some, having been raised as nominal muslims have associated the love and affection from their culture and parents and country WITH the LABEL "Islam" and emotionally reject any attack on the "Label" as an attack on the love and validation they recieved growing up...

The "argument", then is not so much an "argument", but rather an explanation.

The real goal is, then to get people to THINK and reject these "Labels".

This is not likely to happen until such a time as humans have evolved to the point where their "emotional side" has been reined in by their rational side.

Edited by: xerosaburu at: 10/5/02 12:50:09 am

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 128

(10/5/02 7:22)

Reply

Re: It MUST necessarily be this complex, Dan

---

Why, xero, I do believe (at least concerning the masses) you've hit the nail on the head.

Quote:

---

So the argument for "Islam" and it's existence (in my view) can be reduced to the fact that some, having been raised as nominal muslims have associated the love and affection from their culture and parents and country WITH the LABEL "Islam" and emotionally reject any attack on the "Label" as an attack on the love and validation they recieved growing up...

---

This is why I say "wiping Islam off the face of the Earth" is no solution; and is far from well thought out.

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 93

(10/5/02 7:26)

Reply

Leyla...

---

I'm think I'm developing some very "irrational" thoughts about you...

Ever heard of synesthesia? I smell roses every time I see your name. ;)

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 129(10/5/02 7:39)Reply                                                                                                                       | Re: sigh <hr/> Yes, Dan, I agree. The point, as David presents it, is indeed moot.(xero, you're going to get us into trouble again.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 96(10/5/02 7:43)Reply                                                                                                                     | With you it would be worth it... <hr/> Leyla, Leyla, Leyla... What a beautiful name!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1049(10/5/02 8:32)Reply  | Re: It MUST necessarily be this complex, Dan <hr/> Xero wrote: Quote: <hr/> For many muslims I know, (who seem to know little if any of the Quran from personal study, more along the lines of some kind of Islamic catechism) being a "Muslim" is merely identifying emotionally with the label... So the argument for "Islam" and it's existence (in my view) can be reduced to the fact that some, having been raised as nominal muslims have associated the love and affection from their culture and parents and country WITH the LABEL "Islam" and emotionally reject any attack on the "Label" as an attack on the love and validation they recieved growing up... The "argument", then is not so much an "argument", but rather an explanation. <hr/> The same argument/explanation could be used to justify the existence of the Ku Klux Klan. Quote: <hr/> The real goal is, then to get people to THINK and reject these "Labels". <hr/> |

Exactly. There is no other way to wipe Islam from the face of the earth, together with all other forms of ignorance.

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

This is why I say "wiping Islam off the face of the Earth" is no solution; and is far from well thought out.

---

At least it presents to the mind the possibility that our species can exist without all these institutionalized crutches. I have given this matter a lot of thought and have decided that we can't afford to pussy-foot around when it comes to widespread collective insanities, such as Islam or Christianity, and hope that they will go away. They have to be confronted head on.

Christianity is gradually disappearing in the West and that is primarily because it has been intellectually attacked by hordes of intelligent people who would like nothing better than to see it disappear from the face of the earth. Christianity cannot withstand that kind of onslaught, and neither could Islam if similarly exposed.

Dan Rowden wrote:

Quote:

---

I have to say I don't quite see the basis of David's elevation of Christianity (i.e. Christendom) above Islam. It strikes me as an attempt to mix together certain nobler aspects of so-called Christian principle, which have never in that religion's history been meaningfully applied, with the public, religious face of Christianity that, in fact, never really applies said principles!

---

That's true if we simply concentrate on the fact that both Christians and Muslims have submitted to their dogmas with blind faith and are herdishly observing the rituals. My argument concentrates less on this aspect and more on the actual content of these dogmas.

I agree that there is little to distinguish between the average Christian and the average Muslim. But I also think that there is more chance of a sage arising within Christendom than there is in Islamic culture. That is why there are people of the calibre of Meister Eckhart and Soren Kierkegaard within the Christian tradition, and no one comparable in the Islamic tradition (as far as I know). Islam creates an atmosphere of fear which kills all potential thought in the bud before it has a chance to flourish. As a result, there doesn't seem to be the same level of introspection in Islam as there is in Christianity. Even the Sufi stories are weak and indirect compared with the mystical parables of Christianity and Buddhism.

Leyla R
Registered User
Posts: 133
(10/5/02 11:59)
Reply

Re: With you it would be worth it...

---

Quote:

---

Leyla, Leyla, Leyla... What a beautiful name!

---

Thank you. I must say, I really like it, too. Tho it seems to evoke the unmistakable scent of Samsara for me.

Leyla R
Registered User
Posts: 134
(10/5/02 12:02)
Reply

Re: It MUST necessarily be this complex, Dan

---

Quote:

---

DQ: The same argument/explanation could be used to justify the existence of the Ku Klux Klan.

---

Justify? Personally, my position was never about justification. A precise problem requires a precision solution. You must find the exact thoughts/computations to correct. No?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 423

(10/5/02 13:41)

Reply

Islam

---

Someone wrote:

Quote:

---

Personal remarks are never in good taste. I find your response to Mme. Faizi to verge on the personal invective.

What does it matter what her past was to the discussion at hand?

---

I well understand what you are saying and I appreciate, somewhat, your sentiment. However, it is true that David Quinn and I have been acquainted for several years and I am not offended by anything that he says of me or my ideas, even if I do have difference with them. I am not uncomfortable with variance. It is acknowledgment and discussion of variance in ideas that is fruitful.

Naturally, however, I am on the right side and he is on the wrong side in this instance. There is nothing unusual in this. I have been in this position before. It is nothing to me.

David is somewhat behind in his thinking of me. He still considers me to be a woman because, five years ago, I began this discussion as a woman. He does not realize my mental growth. He would rather think of me still as his pet pitbull on a leash. He and I broke that chain long ago. There is no one for me to bash nor is there anyone whom I could want to mentally bash.

My past as a Muslim is relevant to this discussion. Other than Leyla, who has Turkish blood and has some remembrance of Islamic traditions observed when she was a child, I am the only one here who has experience with Muslims in a very close way; on a daily basis for six years.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 424

(10/5/02 13:45)

Reply

Islam

---

Quote:

---

So her sudden spirited defence of Islam over the past few days is quite inexplicable, as you can imagine.

---

Just as I have been surprised by your sudden, inexplicable defense of Christianity -- that is more inexplicable than my defense of Islam; because you are defending, for you, a native faith; a dominant faith. I am defending what is very poorly understood in the West -- The First World; Modernity -- whatever you may wish to call the side of the world that has become highly developed technologically. I think part of your quarrel with Islam is that most Islamic countries are technologically undeveloped.

I think that what you have failed to investigate -- if you have investigated anything -- is the very real possibility that it has not only been the religion of Islam that has been the cause of poverty and backwardness in some Islamic countries. It is very easy for a white man living in Australia in relative affluence to judge from afar the circumstances of others. It is also easy for a Kuwaiti and a Saudi to judge the roughness of people who are not wealthy from oil that is a commodity sold to the West.

Musharraf, who is someone you have cited in the recent past as a sane Muslim, hopes to emulate Ataturk. If he hopes to do so, he will not only have to battle the anti-Western clerics in his country but the West, that hopes to keep Pakistan in its place as a thing for occasional use.

Quote:

---

It isn't quite inexplicable, however, when you consider the emotional attachment that Marsha has to Islam, which I believe originally stems from a past marriage to a Pakistani.

---

It is not that I have emotional attachment to the religion but that I have emotional attachment to some Muslims I have known who, though not wise and not philosophically enlightened, were decent human beings. In many cases, the Muslims I have known were very sweet-natured and good-humored people who came to the United States out of complete naiveté; very innocent people; perplexed by the huge economic superstructure in the United States and, yet, determined to find a niche -- not unlike other immigrants here at earlier times in history, particularly Jews and Italians.

For Jews and Italians in the early part of the Twentieth Century, there was Mafia . For Muslims, there is Al-Qaeda.

Quote:

---

Just look at her posts in this thread, for example.

---

Yes, just look. David Quinn is very fond of admonishing people to "just look." Don't think and consider, just look.

Quote:

---

It is plainly obvious that Marsha enjoys being an Islamic chick. She gets off on it. It gives colour to her personality. She can prance around in its exotic air. She can shock her American friends and acquaintances with it. It is too precious for her to lose.

---

I don't have any American friends. I have no friends whatsoever. I have not pranced in years. I don't think that I am shocking and most people here are completely unaware and uninterested that my dead husband was a Pakistani.

I do love the colors of the East. I like sequins and mirrors sewn into fabric. I like to see some nose piercings because they can be quite pretty. Coal black hair is somewhat unusual so I like seeing it. I like shelwar kameez because they are comfortable to wear and I like goat cooked in pungent masala and cow's feet. But these are private things and insignificant. In fact, these things are quite normal things for one who has lived in that culture.

Even when I lived in that culture, I had no American friends or family to shock. Even my own family was very accepting of Faizi. My parents were very supportive of him, despite cultural and religious differences. I brought Pakistanis wearing shelwar kameez to my family's home and there was no shock. I did not bring them for the purpose of shock. I brought them because they were a part of my husband's family and my family was hospitable to them.

Because of my ties to Pakistan, I know that I am always welcome there. I can go to Lahore and to Faisalabad and Islamabad and I can have shelter and protection. These people are my brothers and sisters; aunts and uncles; cousins; nieces and nephews. They are my family.

Quote:

---

The way she signed off one of her earlier posts with "Shaheena Faizi" gives it away.

---

Shaheena is my Muslim name that was given to me when I became a Muslim. My Pakistani relatives know me as Shaheena. It is my family name. I use it sometimes when it seems appropriate. I am Marsha Faizi and I am Shaheena Faizi. I understand Pakistan well and I understand the United States well.

Understanding and knowing both sides well is a hard position.

My occasional use of Shaheena gives nothing away. You have a cheap mentality, David, like a man watching a strip show when no one is stripping. You look for the sensational when there is none. You are a Drama Queen. You are a Drama Queen with bright red lipstick and rotten teeth.

Quote:

---

Indeed, the very fact that she hangs on to her married Islamic name of Faizi, even though she is no longer married, indicates that she identifies with Islam to some degree, that it has become part of her ego.

---

The last names of both of my children is Faizi. In my town, there are only three Faizis. If I dropped my surname, then, there would only be two Faizis and both of them would be underage. It is my feeling that the two child-

Faizis require my support. My children receive a very small amount of Social Security under the name, Faizi, their father. It is my feeling that I owe my son and my daughter some allegiance and loyalty. Not now but in the past, I have desired to remarry. Had I remarried, I could not have changed my name to something different from my children's name. When I gave birth to my children and, especially after the death of their father, I became Faizi.

When I had two children, my marriage was finalized. I can never be unmarried.

The name has some meaning for me not for its supposed shock value -- most people think it is Spanish or Italian -- but because I am the conduit between father and child. I am the only connection that my children have to their father and to his religion and his culture. In the light of current circumstances in the United States, I think it is important for my children to realize that their father came from a noble culture; one that had some ambition greater than capitalism; that had some nobility of spirit, if not knowledge of technology.

Quote:

---

So much so that she is prepared to passionately defend the religion even though her intellect knows that it is a heap of nonsense.

---

I could never be religious. However, I do recognize that religion is tied to culture. There are aspects of Islamic culture that, because of your adherence to Christian culture, you will despise through your ignorance and you will completely discount it.

You are a fundamentalist, David. Especially during the past year, you have insulated yourself inside your own doctrine in such a way that you are as shut off as an Islamic cleric.

A few years ago, you were more open to ideas. Your thought was fresh.

Rather than keeping your mind fresh, you have shut it down rather firmly.

When one has nothing left to him but to point and say, "Look" or "See how she does," then, one has nothing. He is clutching at straws.

Quote:

---

So yes, as far as this issue is concerned, I think her past is entirely relevant

---

I agree that my past is relevant to this discussion. I was a Muslim and I lived as a Muslim.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 10/6/02 7:06:13 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1058

(10/5/02 16:58)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

Just as I have been surprised by your sudden, inexplicable defense of Christianity -- that is more inexplicable than my defense of Islam; because you are defending, for you, a native faith; a dominant faith. I am defending what is very poorly understood in the West -- The First World; Modernity -- whatever you may wish to call the side of the world that has become highly developed technologically. I think part of your quarrel with Islam is that most Islamic countries are technologically undeveloped.

---

No, it is the sheer lack of spiritual wisdom that I find most problematic. I've been scouring the internet for last couple of days looking for any signs of wisdom within Islam and Sufism, and so far, apart from a couple of bits and pieces, I've drawn a blank. Muslims do know how to design a pretty website though.

If anyone could direct me to a wise Islamic site, I would be most grateful.

Quote:

---

You are a fundamentalist, David. Especially during the past year, you have insulated yourself inside your own doctrine in such a way that you are as shut off as an Islamic cleric.

A few years ago, you were more open to ideas. Your thought was fresh.

Rather than keeping your mind fresh, you have shut it down rather firmly.

---

I've probably become less tolerant of bullshit over the past year or two. But I'm still open to anything that seems intelligent and reasonable. If I don't seem open to your ideas about Islam, Marsha, it is because I don't find them very convincing. Give me something of substance and I will happily change my views.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 226

(10/5/02 19:37)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

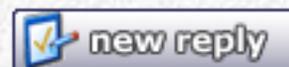

I've been scouring the internet for last couple of days looking for any signs of wisdom within Islam and Sufism, and so far, apart from a couple of bits and pieces, I've drawn a blank. Muslims do know how to design a pretty website though.

If anyone could direct me to a wise Islamic site, I would be most grateful.

---

I quite understand that real Sufis are rather hidden and don't want to reveal themselves in such a stupid world. It is totally useless. The only thing they get would be a complete misunderstanding.

However, there are some fair Islamic sites, I suppose, but I should check my thousand-years-old outdated bookmark list... And one should check sites not only in English but in other languages as well to find useful stuff. Regarding Islam, perhaps there are some useful sites in Spanish.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| TheStupidOne2011Registered UserPosts: 20(10/6/02 2:42)Reply                                                                                | The middle ages <hr/> First of all, I thought the people here were done with religion a long time ago, but I guess I'm wrong. David,what is ur point? Muslims(followers of Mohammed) and Christians(followers of Christ) are on the same level. So are u debating the fact that which religion contains more wisdom. If so isn't that quite pointless, its like comparing two pools of mud and deciding which is cleaner. |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 100(10/6/02 3:22)Reply | Re: Islam <hr/> I will get around to posting those excerpts from Dave Sim's Islam, My Islam essay that I mentioned I would. Not having internet access at home I limit my visits to the library to once a week. Next week for sure. Gregory Shantz                                                                                                                                                                                      |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1063

(10/6/02 8:44)

Reply

Re: The middle ages

The Stupid One wrote:

Quote:

---

David, what is ur point?

Muslims(followers of Mohammed) and Christians(followers of Christ) are on the same level.

So are u debating the fact that which religion contains more wisdom.

If so isn't that quite pointless, its like comparing two pools of mud and deciding which is cleaner.

---

It's a good question, and I'm almost in agreement with you. I guess what interests me most about this issue is the way in which people balk at being too conscious in their philosophic goals. It seems that we are all in agreement that religion is an undesirable thing that produces many harmful consequences. But when it comes to openly stating that specific religions need to be eliminated, people tend to freeze up. It's as though the ideal of eliminating religion can only exist as an abstract pipe-dream for them. Anything more than this and it becomes too real.

Also, I wouldn't like to see the teachings of past wise people disappearing along with religion. Not all of Christianity is undesirable and worthless. The gospels of Jesus, for example, along with the writings of Meister Eckhart and Soren Kierkegaard, are worth saving. I'm just wondering what Islamic spiritual writings should be saved, if any.

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 124

(10/6/02 9:13)

Reply

Re: The middle ages

---

Quote:

---

I'm just wondering what Islamic spiritual writings should be saved, if any.

---

David, I am not trying to purposely run up your alley as it may lateley seem, but didn't Marsha post some 'sayings' in this very thread? I suppose you will find a reason to declare them insufficient. I'd imagine that the contibuters to this topic/thread are trusting that you are givng an unbiased and fair debate.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 426

(10/6/02 14:23)

Reply

Re: The middle ages

---

I am not quoting the Koran. I do not care for that book more than I care for the Bible. I am quoting some thought from Islamic mystics or thinkers, in the spirit of Meister Eckhart or Soren Kierkegaard. Meister Eckhart and Kierkegaard glean from Christianity much inspiration for thought, though neither can be said to be Christians in the way of Billy Graham or the Pope. They were Mystics or Gnostics, rather than preachers or believers in a particular faith. There are parallel thinkers in Islam. It is erroneous to attempt to separate Sufism from Islam because one could not exist without the other. The beginning of Sufism stems from the time of the Prophet, when some came near him to discuss and to examine the meaning of life.

As I reject the religion of Christianity, I also reject the religion of Islam. I do not reject the derivative mystical, philosophical thought of either, though I admit that I am coming to favor Islamic mysticism over the Christian, merely because there is more of it.

I agree with David Quinn that religion is for monkeys. I do not agree with him that only Christians can have capacity for wisdom.

Nothing is better for a man than to be without anything -- having no asceticism, no theory, no practice. When he is without all, he is with all.
Bayezid Bistami

Renunciation is not made in order to obtain some later recompense, for it bears its fruit within itself, fruit of knowledge and beauty. Spiritual virtue is neither a mere negation of the natural instincts. It takes birth from a presentiment of the Divine Reality which underlies all objects of desire and this presentiment is in itself a sort of "natural grace."

Bayezid Bistami

Some one asked, "What is the Way?" I said, "This way is to abandon desires."

Jalaluddin Rumi

Throw a dog a bit of something. He sniffs to see if he wants it. Be that careful. Sniff with your wisdom-nose. Get clear. Then decide.

Jalaluddin Rumi

Recognize that your imagination and your thinking and your sense perception are reed canes that children cut and pretend are horsies. Deny your desires and willfulness, and a real mount may appear under you.

Jalaluddin Rumi

Everything in this world -- like wealth, women, and clothes -- is sought because of something else, not in and for itself.

Jalaluddin Rumi

The 'veil' (al-hijab) which has to be rent is not the individual human nature, but the act of attributing an autonomous character to this individual nature. Only the Essence Itself is truly autonomous.

Titus Burckhardt

Your Saying "God is Most Great" does not mean that He is greater than something else, since there is nothing else alongside of Him, so that it could be said that He is greater than it. Rather, the meaning of Allahu Akbar is that He is much too great to be perceived by the senses or for the depths of His Majesty to be reached by reason and logic, and indeed, that He is much too great to be known by an other-than-Him for truly, no one knows God but God.

Ahmad Ibn `Ata'Allah

Whenever there remains any support for the ego within, even if it be only an atom's weight, then you are pretentious and have a devil who leads you astray.

Ahmad Ibn `Ata'Allah

When the mystery -- of realizing that the mystic is one with the Divine -- is revealed to you, you will understand that you are no other than God and that you have continued and will continue ... without when and without times. Then you will see all your actions to be His actions and all your attributes to be His attributes and your essence to be His essence, though you do not thereby become He or He you, in either the greatest or the least degree. "Everything is perishing save His Face," that is there is nothing except His Face, "then, whithersoever you turn, there is the Face of God." Ibn `Arabi

I will not serve God like a laborer, in expectation of my wages.
Rabi`a

Note: Rabia was female. A close friend of Faizi's named his daughter Rabia in honor of this Islamic mystic, though this friend and his wife were supposed to be strictly Sunni.

If someone remarks "What an excellent man you are!" and this pleases you more than his saying, "What a bad man you are!" know that you are still a bad man.
Ath-Thawri

We verily created man and We know what his soul whispereth to him and We are nearer to him than his jugular vein.
The Holy Quraan L:16

He who has known his self has known Allah.
Muhammad

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 10/6/02 2:27:43 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 427
(10/6/02 14:46)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David Quinn,

Quote:

---

I will happily change my views.

---

You will not happily change your views. One who has become overly sure of himself will never do such a thing happily.

Nevertheless, you will do it. You will not be able to deny your ignorance of wisdom on the other side of the world forever.

Faizi

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 124

(10/6/02 14:50)

Reply

Marsha...

---

Let's hope we're ALL pleasantly surprised...

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 428

(10/6/02 15:00)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David Quinn:

Quote:

---

If anyone could direct me to a wise Islamic site, I would be most grateful.

---

There is no such thing as a wise Islamic site. There is no such thing as a wise Christian site or wise Buddhist site or a wise Jewish site. There is no such thing as a wise philosophy site.

If you want wisdom, you must work, Sahib.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 10/6/02 3:02:11 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 429
(10/6/02 15:25)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

"David Quinn" wrote:

Allah Rehemkah, behen chod! How dare you put my name in quotes as though I write here under an alias!

Let your mother take back her maiden name and negate your father, as you advocate that I negate the father of my children.

I am not Anglo in my thinking.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 10/6/02 3:26:26 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 430
(10/6/02 15:55)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David Quinn wrote, regarding discussion of Abraham:

Quote:

---

He was prepared to kill his own son if God asked him to.

---

No, he was not prepared to kill his son if God asked him to do it.

This is something essential that you do not understand. I have read "Fear and Trembling" and I do not think Kierkegaard could understand, though he gave it a valiant try from a strictly Christian-Aryan standpoint.

The wisdom that I glean from the story of Abraham and Issac/Ishmael is an act of knowledge. Abraham's "faith" in God was not so superficial that it could have allowed him to kill his son. His faith in God -- Truth -- was great enough that he knew that God could not require him to kill his son. No real God -- no real Truth -- could command him to kill his son. That is the reason that Abraham could place his son on the slab and raise a knife to him. The faith of Abraham was not blind and ignorant belief in a Deity; an idol. It was faith in reason; faith in wisdom.

I am not sure that you can understand that.

Faizi

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1067

(10/6/02 23:10)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

If Abraham already knew that God wasn't going to command him to kill his son, then why did he go through all the bother of placing his son on an alter and raising the knife? It seems a bit superfluous to me.

I interpret the story a bit differently - namely, that it is a parable about the abandoning of attachments. The man of faith has to be prepared to sacrifice his most cherished attachments for the sake of Truth. Abraham showed that he was willing to make that sacrifice when he raised the knife. That God spared his son is meant to indicate that it is inner sacrifice which counts.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1068

(10/6/02 23:54)

Reply

Re: The middle ages

---

I particularly liked these quotes, Marsha:

Quote:

---

Nothing is better for a man than to be without anything -- having no asceticism, no theory, no practice. When he is without all, he is with all.

Bayezid Bistami

Everything in this world -- like wealth, women, and clothes -- is sought because of something else, not in and for itself.

Jalaluddin Rumi

If someone remarks "What an excellent man you are!" and this pleases you more than his saying, "What a bad man you are!" know that you are still a bad man. Ath-Thawri

---

These seem quite inspired to me. You could imagine Eckhart saying them. The others are okay, but like the others that you have posted in this thread, they're nothing special.

The problem that I have with Sufism is similar to the problem I have with Hinduism, particularly the bhakti or devotional side of Hinduism. The Hindus who practice bhakti are big on using grand words such as "Truth", "God", "Ultimate Reality", etc, and they like to stress how important it is to abandon worldly desires and be completely devoted to Truth and so on, but they don't actually come out and specifically state what this Truth is. They all tend to go a bit vague when it comes to the nitty-gritty. Because of this, there is nothing to prevent delusional people from seizing onto their words and using them to reinforce their own false views and attachments. Most of the New Age movement, for example, finds its moral support in the vagueness of Hinduism and Sufism.

This vagueness is either the result of genuine ignorance of the nature of God (highly likely in most cases), or in the case of Sufism, the result of not wanting to upset conventional, orthodox Muslims - or perhaps a combination of the two.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 228

(10/7/02 1:34)

Reply

Re: The middle ages

---

Just to add my two cents:

Quote:

---

Most of the New Age movement, for example, finds its moral support in the vagueness of Hinduism and Sufism.

---

I'd rather say they find it in Buddhism. Look at those 'Buddhist' Hollywood-stars and artists and musicians, for example. Tons of "Buddhists". Yeah, what they call 'Buddhism' has nothing to do with Buddhism. The same with Hinduism and Sufism. New Age is nothing more than (senti)mental onanism.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 431

(10/7/02 2:22)

Reply

Islam

---

Yes, it is true that Sufism, like Hinduism and Buddhism and Christianity along with some Pagan beliefs and some straight Islam, has been thrown into the superficial hodgepodge called the New Age.

However, this does not mean that Sufism itself is a bad thing any more than it means that Buddhism is a bad thing.

Superficial people make things superficial.

The Sufi poet, Rumi, is very popular. Sufis dance and go into trances. There are many Americans who call themselves Sufis who have no idea of what they are saying. They are as disconnected from Sufism as many who practice Buddhism are disconnected from the essence of that religion.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 432

(10/7/02 3:35)

Reply

Islam

---

One other thing that I would save from Islam before it is wiped off the face of the earth is qwalis. Nusrat Ali Khan was the best qwali singer of all time. His music has been used in Western films -- "Natural Born Killers" and "The Last Temptation of Christ," particularly.

He had an especially beautiful tenor voice. He died of a heart attack in 1997 but his music is still available.

He was born in the same town as my husband's family. When he was very young, he often would sing at my father-in-law's house and there would be crowds from the neighborhoods to hear him. All were welcome except the Whirling Dervishes. Anyone who became ecstatic and started to twirl and cry was shown the door.

Despite the popular conception of Sufis dancing in ecstasy, such dancing is actually considered to be a sign of weakness.

Faizi

|                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| TheStupidOne2011Registered UserPosts: 21(10/7/02 7:56)Reply                                                                             | Which cause what <hr/> The question I have is whether Islam and Christianity made Kierkegaard, sufism etc, or did these people using their wisdom make the the two religions a tad wiser than the garbage they normally are.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 433(10/7/02 9:11)Reply     | Re: Islam <hr/> No, it is plain that the religions are no wiser because of Kierkegaard or Meister Eckhart or the Islamic mystics. Most Christians have never heard of Kierkegaard or Meister Eckhart and the ministers -- with very little exception -- preach the same crap that has been preached for many years. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 438(10/8/02 12:17)Reply  | Abraham <hr/> Quote: <hr/> If Abraham already knew that God wasn't going to command him to kill his son, then why did he go through all the bother of placing his son on an alter and raising the knife? It seems a bit superfluous to me. <hr/> Because it was Abraham's test of God. It was not God's test of Abraham. Faith is a two-way street. God badgered Abraham about killing his son; pestered him about it. God was a monkey on Abraham's back about this thing. God was getting to be pretty damned annoying. Abraham thought, "Now, I have never doubted the wisdom of God but this is some fucked up shit and he won't shut up about it. Day in and day out, it's 'You gotta put Isaac up on the rock. You gotta pull out your dagger. You gotta cut his throat.' God is becoming some kinda nag, for Christ's sake. Nag! Nag! Nag! You know, I put up with Sara's nagging over Ishmael and Hagar and I sent 'em out to the desert, just to shut her up but did it shut her up? Hell, no. Bitch is one-hundred ten years old and she's still on my back | about Hagar and Ishmael. But whose idea was it for me to screw around with a slave woman, huh? It was Sara's idea, for crying out loud. She nagged the crap out of me until I shagged the Egyptian wench and I catch hell for it every single day of my life. Now, God is nagging the living daylight out of me to sacrifice Isaac -- worse than a goddamn woman, already. In fact, he's acting like a complete cunt. Whaddya want from me, God? I don't got to prove nothin' to you, cuz. I done been your goddamn loyal servant for more'n a hundred years, already. Back off, motherfucker. You gonna push me to the wall and the wall's gonna come tumbling down and, when that wall come down, Gawd Almighty, bro, you gonna experience it. Fuck you and your burning bush. Kill my son -- shee-it. What I look like, God, a chump? You think I'm some kinda patsy or somethin'? I don't be playin' these mind games. Screw you, God."

But God wouldn't shut up. He kept nagging and nagging Abraham to sacrifice Isaac.

Finally, Abraham had had enough of God's bullshit. I mean, RIGHT UP TO HERE!! My man was fed up. So, he took Isaac up to Mount Moriah and he put his ass up on the killin' slab and drew his dagger and put it to the young'un's throat and he said to God, "Okay, motherfucker. This is what you want. You want me to kill Isaac, I'm gonna goddamn kill him. Boy means more'n life itself to me but I cain't stand the naggin' no more, God. You are fuckin' gettin' on my last nerve, home boy. You want me to kill him, God, then, I am here to do it. But it's on you, God. This is your motherfuckin' will. It ain't mine. You done promised me that I be the daddy of millions -- all them Christians and Jews -- through my boy, Isaac. Now, you reneg'n on that promise when you s'posed to be the light and the way. You s'posed to be some kinda truth. Shee-it! Like some truth is gonna make me kill my son. You a liar, God! You a chump motherfucker. I don't believe in you. I know truth! Now, fucker, make me kill my son. I'm gonna kill my boy in the name of God, the Motherfucker and God, the Cunt and God, the Fakir. Think, after that, I'm gonna go around spreadin' the gospel of One God? You have made me an influential man, motherfucker, and I can turn it around and influence things the other way, quicker than make your head spin, Ol' Suds. I got it honest from my own paw on account he was an idol-maker and I can make 'em, too. So, go ahead, God, make my day. Kill my boy and I will kill you. Think that can't happen? Go ahead and try me."

He placed his dagger close on the boy's throat.

Then, God got real sheepish-like. He say, "Heh heh heh...I was jus' pullin' your leg, Abe. I never wanted you to kill your boy. I was jus' kiddin.' No hard feelin's, right?"

After that incident, God got off Abraham's back, real quick. He didn't fuck with him anymore.

The moral of the story is that truth is truth and it does not matter whether truth comes from either God or man. If a man knows God as Truth, then, he holds God to that Truth, and God -- real God, not some egotistical manifestation of God; not some false God -- the God that is Truth -- recognizes man's capacity for it and is submissive to Truth, as a truthful man is submissive to Truth.

Like Abraham, I don't believe in a false God, David. A God of Truth could not cause me to kill my son or my daughter or my brother or sister. No Truthful God could cause me to kill.

Abraham was a wise man because he doubted the Truth of God. Had he doubted Truth, he would have killed his son without conscience; without question -- in the name of a false God and he would have suffered falsely for it.

I think it may do you some good to consider the wisdom of Abraham and its place in history more clearly. I think that Kierkegaard touched on it. I think that he had some intuitive understanding of it.

But he was too much of a Christian to doubt God. Like a Christian, he saw Abraham's actions as acts of faith rather than defiance of falseness.

Quote:

---

I interpret the story a bit differently - namely, that it is a parable about the abandoning of attachments. The man of faith has to be prepared to sacrifice his most cherished attachments for the sake of Truth. Abraham showed that he was willing to make that sacrifice when he raised the knife. That God spared his son is meant to indicate that it is inner sacrifice which counts.

---

I think that is plausible. But I do not put much credence into a "man of faith." Faith is not Truth. God is not Truth. Abraham was not willing to sacrifice his son for a false God. He was not willing to sacrifice his son for falseness. He put his son up on the killing rock as an act of defiance to a false God. A God of Truth could not ask him to kill his son.

A God of Truth could not ask murder; retribution; hate; jealousy; malice; suicide; of anyone.

A show of faith is a show of ignorance.

Knowledge of truth is not a show, ever.

Faizi

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 182

(10/19/02 8:17)

Reply

Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

How is it you know that Abraham & God had conversations in the manner of which you speak?

Let's take this a step at a time...

I have eternity.

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 198

(10/19/02 12:23)

Reply

"Be perfect as your Father in Heaven is perfect" J

---

A God of Truth could not ask him to kill his son.

A God of Truth could not ask murder; retribution; hate; jealousy; malice; suicide; of anyone.

A show of faith is a show of ignorance.

Knowledge of truth is not a show, ever.

Faizi

-- True ignorance is not knowing that the True God is the doer of all things, the God of Truth permits (causes) all things, including "murder; retribution; hate; jealousy; malice; suicide;" No other Being is above Him, and no other Being does anything but that which He commands.

One with some Knowledge of Truth doesn't exercise Faith in "common sense", rather Faith in Reason.

The God of Reason favors Life, favors Wisdom, seeks reunification.

God releases those who hate Him, but assists those who seek after Him, pursue wisdom, and strive for perfection.

Leo

"Who- not knowing he is blind- seeks the light?"

Italian proverb

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 451(10/19/02 12:46)Reply  | Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham <hr/> I doubt that the conversations were exactly as I described them above. Abraham probably did not call God "homeboy," for instance or "motherfucker." It is not even necessarily that I think that God and Abraham had actual conversations at all. But both the Bible and the Koran say that God commanded Abraham to sacrifice Issac/Ishmael. The story, however, is so deeply ingrained into Christianity and Judaism and Islam, that it is worth discussing. The children of Ishmael are the Muslims and the children of Issac are the Jews and Christians. This tribal root is the cause of much of the misery we currently have in the Middle East and that is spreading to the rest of the world. When the Egyptian slave woman, Hagar and her son by Abraham, Ishmael, were sent out to the desert because of Sarah's unease with having them around, God promised Abraham that he would look after them; that nations of people would come from Ishmael's seed and that those nations would be great -- but God's covenant was with the children of Issac, according to the Bible -- Christians and Jews. Ishmael, because he was not conceived in the promise of God but in doubt, is eternally cast out. Abraham and Sarah agreed that Abraham should make the slave, Hagar, pregnant only because they doubted that God would provide |

them with a son of their own. Once Ishmael was born, however, Sarah became pregnant with Issac who was the promise -- God's covenant.

Sarah observed Ishmael and Issac playing together and she told Abraham that Ishmael must not supersede Issac in his inheritance of nations. According to the Bible, God sided with Sarah and ordered Abraham to turn Hagar and Ishmael out into the desert. Abraham did this and left them with one loaf of bread and a skin of water. Ishmael nearly died from the lack of water until God provided.

The Jews believe that God's covenant is with the Jews and the Christians through the lineage of Issac. Muslim's believe that they are entitled to the Promised Land -- Israel-- through God's covenant with Ishmael. Muslims believe that it was not Issac whom Abraham took to sacrifice but Ishmael. Eid is celebration of the sacrifice.

It all boils down to a tribal war between Abraham's illegitimate son and his legitimate son. The legitimate son is heir to Israel, according to Jews and Christians. The illegitimate son is heir to the land, according to the Muslims -- because he was first born. But, according to the Bible, it is the heirs of Issac who are entitled because Issac was the promise of God.

I am appalled by the self righteous hypocrisy of the Jews and the Christians in this matter. The claims of the outcast are as valid as the claims of the sanctioned. Ishmael was as much the son of Abraham as was Issac. In fact, the birth of Ishmael was encouraged by the mother of Issac who later decreed that he should be cast out and had him cast out.

I do not believe that there could be such a thing as an outcast from God. I don't believe that a God could revere one child over another. I don't believe that God said that the sons of Issac are deserving of special favor while the sons of Ishmael are deserving of rebuke and punishment. I don't believe that the sons of Ishmael are "donkeys," as Christians believe.

I do not condone Islamic fanaticism. I am not on the side of Islamic fanaticism. I don't believe that the solution to the problem of illegitimacy is violence. I believe that the best way to prove one's legitimacy is to establish a superior civilization.

I also recognize the difficulty of such establishment when the purpose of Christian civilization is to keep Islam at bay; to keep it backward; to deny its legitimacy -- not as much as a religion but as a tribe of man.

Abraham was the founder of monotheism. He was the son of an idol-maker who did not believe in idols. He is the founder of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The great divisions between Judaism/Christianity and Islam stem from Abraham and his two sons.

I was married to a Muslim and I have Jewish blood. I was raised as a Christian.

I cannot believe that a man is not my brother because of tribal/family differences. If my sister is not my sister by blood but by legacy, she is not my sister less than if by blood.

I do not recognize the illegitimacy of Ishmael.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 452

(10/19/02 12:54)

Reply

Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

Quote:

---

-- True ignorance is not knowing that the True God is the doer of all things, the God of Truth permits

---

No, the God of Truth does not permit murder, hate, jealousy. The wise man makes wise choices, Leo. I do not believe that all choices are permitted by God.

You claim to speak for a God of Truth when you are speaking of an excuse for Nihilism.

You do not speak of a God of Truth but a God of Anything Goes.

Faizi

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 183

(10/19/02 13:16)

Reply

If you'll note...

---

that after the Basbylonian captivity upon the return their were a number of those who were of the priestly lineage who were not allowed to serve as priests because they could not legally establish their lineage.... Certainly no one today whether they "think" they are in the lineage of Abraham, or not can establish their lineage.

All of the temple records were destroyed by the Romans in 70 C.E.

No one today can really claim to be a Jew OR a descendant of Abraham.

No one knows.

For the record I think lineage is of no importance.

From the so-called Christian perspective, being a Jew according to the flesh ceased to be important by the year 37 CE at the conversion of the first Gentile to Christianity.

From then on being a "Jew" was considered a symbolic thing and not a matter of physical descendancy at all.

When the NT speaks of a Jew, as Paul does in Romans he speaks of a person who is a Jew (on the inside), rather than being one according to birth (Romans 2:28-29)

And when Jerusalem is spoken of it is not the physical Jerusalem which is accorded importance, but rather the "spiritual Jerusalem"...(Galatians 4:26)

As far as "inheritance" of anything in perpetuity is concerned, the Jews forfeited all (from the biblical perspective when they broke the covenant) Deuteronomy 31:16-18...

From then on the point was that the "meek", or teachable would be the ones who would eventually inherit not just some small plot of land somewhere, but rather the entire earth... Mt. 5:3, Ps. 37:29...

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 523
(10/19/02 15:02)

Reply

Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

The god of truth does not exist.

Is there anyone on this forum who like me doesn't believe in God?!

Lbartoli

Registered User
Posts: 201
(10/19/02 16:07)

Reply

nothing escapes cause and effect

---

LB Quote:

-----
-- True ignorance is not knowing that the True God is the doer of all things, the God of Truth permits
-----

MKFaizi:

No, the God of Truth does not permit murder, hate, jealousy. The wise man makes wise choices, Leo.

-- Pay attention now: The wise man makes wise choices because the true God made him wise. The ignorant man, or woman, makes ignorant choices because the true God made them ignorant.

It's really as simple as that.

I do not believe that all choices are permitted by God.

-- It's not a matter of belief, the wise man knows this with certainty, and he's correct.

Keep in mind when i speak of the true God i am not literally talking about some personal finite Being, in truth every thing is just a whim of Nature.

You claim to speak for a God of Truth when you are speaking of an excuse for Nihilism.

You do not speak of a God of Truth but a God of Anything Goes.

-- All things are determined by their causes, and nothing more.

Leo

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 453
(10/19/02 23:51)

Reply

Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

Oh, well. There went the possibility for a decent discussion.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 454
(10/20/02 2:05)

Reply

Re: nothing escapes cause and effect

---

Quote:

---

after the Babylonian captivity upon the return their were a number of those who were of the priestly lineage who were not allowed to serve as priests because they could not legally establish their lineage.... Certainly no one today whether they "think" they are in the lineage of Abraham, or not can establish their lineage.

---

Of course not. That is not the point. The point is that the Bible and the Koran and the Torah all agree about the story of Abraham and the family split. The story is an archetype; something that is deeply ingrained into the human psyche -- so much ingrained that I am not sure that it can be uprooted.

The point is that the fight is still going on. This archetypal story is so deeply ingrained that the fight in the Middle East is a tribal fight. It is that ancient and that primitive. It is about what tribe has the right to Israel/Palestine. The Jews believe that it belongs to them because of God's covenant with them and the Muslims believe that it belongs to them because they are descendants of Ishmael, the son of Abraham who was cast out but, yet, was the first born son.

It is that belief that is unshakable.

Quote:

---

All of the temple records were destroyed by the Romans in 70 C.E.

No one today can really claim to be a Jew OR a descendant of Abraham.

---

Nevertheless, the archetype persists and that is what the persistent feud between Jews and Muslims is all about -- the right to the land of Israel/Palestine.

Quote:

---

For the record I think lineage is of no importance.

---

Neither do I. I could not care less who lives in Israel/Palestine. However, because of the deep religious roots of the fight, it effects the rest of the world -- obviously.

Quote:

---

From the so-called Christian perspective, being a Jew according to the flesh ceased to be important by the year 37 CE at the conversion of the first Gentile to Christianity.

---

Christianity is a direct offshoot from Judaism and descends, then, from Issac -- symbolically if not by blood fact.

The prophet, Muhammad, was said to have been a direct descendant of Ishmael. Again, whether this is historically factual or not, it is something that is devoutly believed. Muslims, then, believe that they are the children of Ishmael, the child who was sent into the desert by Abraham in order to protect God's covenant with Abraham and Issac.

Quote:

---

From then on being a "Jew" was considered a symbolic thing and not a matter of physical descendency at all.

---

You may say that but the fact remains that the fight persists in the Middle East over Israel/Palestine. Plus, you are speaking from the New Testament of the Bible, something that has no relevance for Muslims or Jews.

Quote:

---

When the NT speaks of a Jew, as Paul does in Romans he speaks of a person who is a Jew (on the inside), rather than being one according to birth(Romans 2:28-29)

And when Jerusalem is spoken of it is not the physical Jerusalem which is accorded importance, but rather the "spiritual Jerusalem"...(Galatians 4:26)

As far as "inheritance" of anything in perpetuity is concerned, the Jews forfeited all (from the biblical perspective when they broke the covenant)Deuteronomy 31:16-18...

---

The covenant is said to have been broken in Christianity because the Jews did not accept Christ as the son of God. Neither Jews nor Muslims believe that Jesus was the son of God.

Quote:

---

From then on the point was that the "meek", or teachable would be the ones who would eventually inherit not just some small plot of land somewhere, but rather the entire earth... Mt. 5:3, Ps. 37:29...

---

But neither the Jews or the Muslims believe this.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 455

(10/20/02 2:22)

Reply

Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

Quote:

---

-- Pay attention now: The wise man makes wise choices because the true God made him wise. The ignorant man, or woman, makes ignorant choices because the true God made them ignorant.

---

I realize that you believe that your "wisdom" is something preordained from God.

I don't believe that. I don't believe that anyone is preordained by God to become a wise man. I think that one must work toward wisdom. It is not something that is merely handed to you.

For the record, I will say that your admonishment to me to "pay attention now" does not speak well of your intelligence. It is not my interest to engage with you in egotistical game playing.

If you have something of substance to add to this discussion of Islam and of Abraham, your comments are most welcome. But I am not interested in "chat."

Faizi

 JoshuaStone

Registered User

Posts: 8

(10/20/02 8:34)

Reply

ezSupporter

Golly Gee Whiz!

---

If your life is not becoming to you,
you should be coming to us!

First Assemblies of God Church

The Only True Chruch that Knows God Personally!

We be the only church on Earth preordained and Divinely authorized to call God: "Homeboy"

?: So you people believe that you know God personally, eh?

@: At's right. We know God personally and we can prove it because God signs all our checks. Just look at this...

?: Well, first of all that doesn't say G-O-D it says C-O-D, and second of all... that's not a check, it's a bill!

*****

We screw the other guy over and pass the savings on to you!

*****

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 457

(10/20/02 8:43)

Reply

Re: Ok, Marsha... Let's talk about Abraham

---

Very funny, Joshua, but also very disappointing.

Faizi

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 203

(10/20/02 9:12)

Reply

nothing escapes cause and effect

---

I still don't think you're paying close enough attention, really try to focus now:

"I think that one must work toward wisdom."

-- Whether or not one has it in him to work toward wisdom is- once again- completely up to Nature.

Whether or not one has it in him/her to spot the wisdom in (my) words, is also "God's will".

But God didn't will this into any women, nor many men.

Leo

 JoshuaStone
Registered User
Posts: 9
(10/20/02 9:19)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Golly Gee Whiz!

---

Most powerful humor is based on capitalizing upon tragedy. What I wrote in my above post is what I call 'multi-level humor.' The message capitalized upon is truly tragic. I could get into all the tragedy of what is being expressed in that post, but what is the point of doing that?

The comic genius Charley Chaplin felt that we either laugh at life or risk going mad.

Be well and happy, if you so choose

Be miserable and overly serious, if you so choose

The choice is always there and we have no one else to blame for the choices we make throughout our lives. Once we take full responsibility for all our thoughts, words, actions and reactions to the world around us we put ourselves in a position of power to make incredibly wonderful changes in our lives.

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 458
(10/20/02 9:26)
Reply

Re: nothing escapes cause and effect

---

You are right, of course, Leo. I am not paying enough attention. I am paying less and less attention to you all the time. In fact, I will pay no attention to you at all.

Faizi

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 184

(10/22/02 2:30)

Reply

Actually...digressing to a sidepoint..

---

1)My understanding is that Jesus (PBOH) was a prophet and as such was listened to.

2)The hebrew scriptures indicate that the covenant was broken long before the arrival of Jesus...

Jeremiah 11:10..."The house of Israel and the house of Judah have broken my covenant that I concluded with their forefathers."

Then later a NEW covenant is prophesied..

Jeremiah 31:31-34 " Behold, the days are coming, says the LORD, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah -- 32 "not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day [that] I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, My covenant which they broke, though I was a husband to them, says the LORD. 33 "But this [is] the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says the LORD: I will put My law in their minds, and write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people. 34 "No more shall every man teach his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, 'Know the LORD,' for they all shall know Me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, says the LORD. For I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin I will remember no more."

Nowhere in the hebrew scriptures is it later found that the new covenant is made with "Israel".

Too, the prophet Daniel foretold the arrival of this "new covenant" in chapter 9...

Daniel 9:24-27 " Seventy weeks are determined For your people and for your holy city, To finish the transgression, To make an end of sins, To make reconciliation for iniquity, To bring in everlasting righteousness, To seal up vision and prophecy, And to anoint the Most Holy. 25 "Know therefore and understand, [That] from the going forth of the command To restore and build Jerusalem Until Messiah the Prince, [There shall be] seven weeks and sixty-two weeks; The street shall be built again, and the wall, Even in troublesome times. 26 "And after the sixty-two weeks Messiah shall be cut off, but not for Himself; And the people of the prince who is to come Shall destroy the city and the sanctuary. The end of it [shall be] with a flood, And till the end of the war desolations are determined. 27 Then he shall confirm a covenant with many for one week; But in the middle of the week He shall bring an end to sacrifice and offering. And on the wing of abominations shall be one who makes desolate, Even until the consummation, which is determined, Is poured out on the desolate."

This was understood by the Jews on the first quarter of the first century as a prophecy relating to the arrival of messiah and a new covenant...

The Encyclopaedia Judaica says: "The Jews of the Roman period believed [the Messiah] would be raised up by God to break the yoke of the heathen and to reign over a restored kingdom of Israel." (Jerusalem, 1971, Vol. 11, col. 1407)

They wanted liberation from the yoke of Rome. Jewish history testifies that on the basis of the Messianic prophecy recorded at Daniel 9:24-27 there were Jews who expected the Messiah during the first century C.E. (Luke 3:15)

But that prophecy also connected his coming with 'making an end of sin,' and Isaiah chapter 53 indicated that Messiah himself would die in order to make this possible.

However, the Jews in general felt no need for anyone to die for their sins. They believed that they had a righteous standing with God on the basis of their descent from Abraham.

Says A Rabbinic Anthology, "So great is the [merit] of Abraham that he can atone for all the vanities committed and lies uttered by Israel in this world." (London, 1938, C. Montefiore and H. Loewe, p. 676)

By their rejection of Jesus as Messiah, the Jews fulfilled the prophecy that had foretold regarding him: "He was despised, and we esteemed him not."- Isaiah 53:3, JP.

Before his death, Moses foretold that the nation would turn aside from true worship and that, as a result, calamity would befall them. (Read Deuteronomy 31:27-29.) The book of Judges testifies that this occurred repeatedly.

In the days of the prophet Jeremiah, national unfaithfulness led to the nation's being taken into exile in Babylon. Why did God also allow the Romans to destroy Jerusalem and its temple in 70 C.E.?

Of what unfaithfulness had the nation been guilty so that God did not protect them as he had done when they had put their trust in him? It was shortly before this that they had rejected Jesus as the Messiah.

The bus came and they didn't want to get on...

Now as far as veracity of the Quran is concerned, it seems clear that Muhammed was unacquainted with a clear understanding of it as by the time he came on the scene, all that remained was apostate and corrupt Christianity and a rabinnic form of hellenized Judaism...

So much of this is clear from reading such passages as those condemning the "trinity", a pagan concept that had infiltrated nominal Christianity through platonic thought...

In any case the argument for the Quran is the same as the argument for the Book of Mormon in my view...

"The Bible is ok insofar as is properly translated and where it differs from either the book of Mormon or the Quran the Bible has been changed" ...

There isn't any clear argument proving this and since the uncovering of the Dead Sea scrolls it is increasingly clear that the idea that the Bible was corrupted is false...

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 190

(10/22/02 9:44)

Reply

Re: Actually...digressing to a sidepoint..

---

Quote:

---

There isn't any clear argument proving this and since the uncovering of the Dead Sea scrolls it is increasingly clear that the idea that the Bible was corrupted is false...

---

Really? From what scholarly works/sources do you arrive at this conclusion?

Edited by: Leyla R at: 10/22/02 9:45:35 am

xerosaburu
Registered User
Posts: 186
(10/22/02 14:48)
Reply

Here you go Leyla...

---

“After all variations are noted and taken into account and the reasons for them (lapses, spelling errors, simple human error in copying, dialectical difference, Aramaic environment etc.) are understood then it is easy to say with confidence that the Q text [of Isaiah] is substantially the same as the received text of the Book of Isaiah that we now read in our English Bible”

Note that this comparison is made to a document 1000 years younger as in the masoretic, or received text. This means that the message remained essentially unchanged over 1000 years of copying and recopying.

www.ao.net/~fmoeller/qumdir.htm

Leyla R
Registered User
Posts: 191
(10/22/02 21:15)
Reply

Re: Actually...digressing to a sidepoint..

---

Thank you.

I'm having trouble working out how you conclude the Bible (or should I say the religion?) has not been corrupted based on the (assumed for the sake of argument) confirmation that one book (Isaiah) has been accurately translated.

Given the "fact" that Jews and Muslims descend from two different sons of Abraham, and that the message of the book of Isaiah (as well as the OT as it appears in the Bible) is directed at Jews, I don't see how the truth of the Bible (and thus the religion) becomes truth for all people--the way, the light...just because Muhammed came into the picture after the fact of many battles between Christian factions, killing more of eachother than pagans ever did?

As you seem to be aware, certain historians claim that the introduction of the trinity was largely influenced by Emperor Constantine of Rome (a pagan, no less) at the Nicacene Council circa 325AD at a time where such disagreement between Christians was tearing the Church apart. He, apparently in doing so, united the common folk. What other legitimate link would today's Christian's have to the Jews and the OT otherwise?

In this light, the corruption largely appears to be politically rather than altruistically motivated, as usual. I guess someone had to stop them killing eachother.

As far as I'm concerned, it's rather a sweeping claim to imply that one book confirmed as an accurate translation is testimony to the idea that the Bible is closer to the truth than the Kuran, the book of Mormon or Beauty and the Beast.

Therefore...

Quote:

---

...since the uncovering of the Dead Sea scrolls it is increasingly clear that the idea that the Bible was corrupted is false...

---

I disagree with this statement.

Edited by: Leyla R at: 10/22/02 9:20:07 pm

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 187

(10/23/02 0:05)

Reply

Leyla

---

The matter of accuracy of textual transmission of these manuscripts does not necessarily have anything to do with belief that the Bible is "the word of God" or that there even IS a "god" of any kind.

It is strictly a procedural matter for historians examining the evidence.

The fact is that there is more evidence that the textus receptus closely matches those of the original autographa than scores of other historical documents that the collective "we" have little difficulty in accepting.

The inductive evidence increasingly points to the conclusion that the text we have is essentially the same as the original autographa.

Your notes as regards Constantine are somewhat correct. The doctrine of the "trinity" wasn't fully developed until after 325. What was at issue at Nicea was political control and the justification was the theological discussion as to whether the Son and the Father were of the same "substance".

An interesting recent book on this subject is "When Jesus Became God - The Struggle to Define Christianity During the Last Days of Rome", by Richard Rubenstein...

http://www.amazon.com/exec/obidos/tg/detail/-/0156013150/ref=lib\_dp\_TFCV/002-7903285-1934439?v=glance&vi=reader#reader-link

Still, the history of those have argued against the idea that the textus receptus we have today matches those of the originals shows that time and again such claims have been found wanting.

The burden of proof of such contentions rests with those making these contentions.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 192

(10/23/02 7:26)

Reply

Re: Leyla

---

Quote:

---

The fact is that there is more evidence that the textus receptus closely matches those of the original autographa than scores of other historical documents that the collective "we" have little difficulty in accepting.

---

Three (probably major) questions:

What, if any, (and how much) physical evidence (apart from the Dead Sea Scrolls) exists that authenticates the accuracy of the textus receptus?

Can you give me some examples of the scores of other historical documents that the collective "we" have little difficulty in accepting?

Please elaborate on who this collective "we" is and what fundamental ideas/premises bind them?

Quote:

---

The inductive evidence increasingly points to the conclusion that the text we have is essentially the same as the original autographa.

---

You mean, the inductive "explanations/conclusions"? On which facts are said conclusions based, exactly?

Quote:

---

Your notes as regards Constantine are somewhat correct. The doctrine of the "trinity" wasn't fully developed until after 325. What was at issue at Nicea was political control and the justification was the theological discussion as to whether the Son and the Father were of the same "substance".

---

Agreed.

Quote:

---

An interesting recent book on this subject is "When Jesus Became God - The Struggle to Define Christianity During the Last Days of Rome", by Richard Rubenstein...

www.amazon.com/exec/obido...eader-link

---

Thanks. I'll take a look at it.

Quote:

---

Still, the history of those have argued against the idea that the textus receptus we have today matches those of the originals shows that time and again such claims have been found wanting.

---

So, you're personally satisfied that every word in the Bible is an accurate translation of the original documents?

Edited by: Leyla R at: 10/23/02 7:28:36 am

|                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 188(10/23/02 14:59)Reply | Leyla, why would you be interested<hr/> in having a lesson in textual criticism of ancient historical manuscripts?It might be of interest to some, but I'm sure not to very many. |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 194(10/23/02 20:55)Reply   | Re: Leyla, why would you be interested <hr/> Well, I guess I'm not; directly. But I am very interested in why you are interested in the subject. No, that's not quite right. I'm interested in many things, but find little time to pursue them all with a passion. Others don't need to read your replies if they don't want to. And, hey, how come I'm always being questioned about my questions?? |
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 189(10/24/02 2:47)Reply | Re: Questions <hr/> Quote: <hr/> And, hey, how come I'm always being questioned about my questions?? <hr/> I give up, why?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

|                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 196(10/24/02 19:16)Reply   | Re: Re:Questions <hr/> Well, let's just see if we can work it out. Tell me what happens when you consider the following question directed at you: Quote: <hr/> So, you're personally satisfied that every word in the Bible is an accurate translation of the original documents? <hr/> |
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 190(10/25/02 2:57)Reply | I'll answer in binary for brevity. 0=no,1=yes <hr/> 0 Next question?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 202(10/29/02 2:48)Reply    | Re: I'll answer in binary for brevity. 0=no,1=yes <hr/> OK, good. Quote: <hr/> You mean, the inductive "explanations/conclusions"? <hr/>                                                                                                                                                |
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 196(10/29/02 9:48)Reply | Was the quote a question? <hr/> Hmmm?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 144
(12/21/02 22:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

I wrote:

Quote:

---

I will get around to posting those excerpts from Dave Sim's Islam, My Islam essay that I mentioned I would. Not having internet access at home I limit my visits to the library to once a week. Next week for sure.

---

Well, three months later and I haven't posted a single excerpt. Evidently anyone who wants to read these essays will have to seek them out on their own for now, and I encourage anyone to do so. I am slowly transcribing them onto the computer, and I will make them available sometime. I think Sim's use of Islam could be called wise. He's certainly no deluded extremist of the Osama bin Laden mould.

Gregory Shantz

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 128
(12/22/02 3:21)

Reply

Islam, my Islam

---

Greg, is there a link you could post that contains the article?

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 146
(12/23/02 6:33)

Reply

Re: Islam, my Islam

---

Here is part of what I've copied:

Quote:

---

How can Muslims argue that Islam is misunderstood when the evidence indicates that, actually, Islam is understood only too well by those who have been raised to think for themselves and to test their beliefs in the crucible of contrary viewpoints? In the fall of last year, most Muslim writings and most Muslim views quoted in the newspapers and magazines consisted of simplistic recitations of Islamic cant along the lines of "You can't understand Islam in Western terms." Well, yes you can.

You can understand anything in Western terms. Western terms have been evolving since the Greeks in such a way that Western terms arguably constitute the best means of understanding any subject and testing that subject to see if it has a solid foundation of rational thought behind it or if it is pure emotionalism, quackery or mumbo-jumbo.

---

If you read the whole essays, he gets his spiritual foundations from Judaism, Christianity and Islam, and he wrote the essays to defend Islam.

I don't think there are any web pages with the essays on them. They were published in his comic book 'Cerebus' over the past year.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 299

(8/23/03 13:20)

Reply

Re: Islam, my Islam

---

Recent article

Losing his religion

Apostate Ibn Warraq campaigns for the right not to be a Muslim

EVER SINCE SEPT. 11, 2001, American scholars, pundits, and ordinary citizens have not hesitated to offer their opinions about the state of Islam. Critics say the religion is long overdue for the kind of a thoroughgoing reformation that modernized and diversified Christianity in the 16th century. More sympathetic voices argue that today's Islam is not an ideological monolith but a thriving culture, with as many Islams as there are Muslims. But what has been virtually ignored is that there are Muslims, both in the Muslim world and outside it, who want nothing to do with Islam, moderate or otherwise.

Most keep their feelings to themselves. Those Muslims who disown or even criticize their faith publicly are likely to be accused of apostasy, a crime punishable by death under Islamic law—a penalty enforced in a number of Muslim nations, including Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan. But more commonly, the punishment for speaking freely is a kind of social death as the apostate is ostracized by family, friends, and community. Muslim moderates and Western scholars of Islam frequently cite the Koranic verse that affirms there is no compulsion in religion. Yet the weight of Islamic tradition, including the Koran, compels a Muslim to remain Muslim.

At the meeting, Warraq says, the Iranian participants, some of whom had been tortured by the Khomeini government, "wanted to eliminate Islam." For his part, Warraq says he just wants to win the right to criticize the religion without fear of retribution. "Criticism, free speech, is the foundation of democracy," he declares. "We criticize and use reason to solve human problems in the best way possible. You can't do that if certain things are off-limits, like the Koran."

Warraq takes pains to distinguish religious Islam from "Islamic civilization," which, he says, "often reached magnificent heights despite [the Koran and the theologians] and not because of them." (While few fundamentalists would admit as much, freethinkers have been signal figures of Islamic civilization. Consider the well-known 11th-century Syrian-born poet Abu al-Ala al-Maarri, who wrote: "The earth has people of two kinds:/The ones who think have no religion,/the others do and have no minds.")

Warraq's book cuts against the ecumenical, feel-good vision of Islam as a "religion of peace" found everywhere from President Bush's speeches to popular books such as Karen Armstrong's "Islam: A Short History." Armstrong, for example, says that it's impossible to judge the prophet Muhammad's assassinations of his political enemies and wholesale slaughter of a Jewish tribe against our present-day mores. But if we cannot condemn his faults according to contemporary standards, Warraq argues, then neither can we hold him up as the wise and tolerant lawgiver whom contemporary moderates praise.

Warraq also contends that Islam's apologists are so eager to perpetuate the "myth" of a tolerant Islam that accorded liberty to its non-Muslim subjects that they concentrate almost exclusively on the relatively decent treatment of Christians and Jews, the so-called fellow People of the Book, while ignoring the harsher fate of Arab pagans, Zoroastrians, Hindus, and Buddhists. "Are they not human?" he asks.

While some evangelical Christians have embraced his work, Warraq has been critical of that faith as well. Still, Warraq says he much prefers Christianity's philosophy, which "teaches God's love, a far cry from Islam's wrathful image of God." In "Why I Am Not a Muslim," he adds that while "most Christians" have moved away from a "literal interpretation of the Bible," Muslims have not. "All Muslims—not just the group we have called fundamentalists—believe that the Koran is literally the word of God," delivered directly, word for word, to his prophet Muhammad, he says.

It is certainly possible to reject literal interpretations of the Koran. Warraq's books discuss many who have tried to do so, from Sufis like the heretical philosopher al-Hallaj (executed in 922) to the early 20th-century Egyptian liberal Ali Abd al-Raziq, who argued for a separation of religion and politics. But these are exceptional figures in Islamic history and Warraq doubts that contemporary Islamic theologians who call for adjusting the Koran to modern times—"opening the door of ijihad," or interpretation, as they like to say—are pointing the way toward a genuinely free society.

For the most part, Warraq tells me, "Muslims have a horror of putting the Koran to critical scrutiny as a human document. The layman is not permitted to question the Koran. This is why there's no progress in Islamic society."

With any "religious institution that is beyond doubt," he writes in "Why I Am Not a Muslim," "you have tyranny, thought police, and an absence of the critical sense that includes intellectual and moral progress." And for Warraq the current test of moral progress is democracy, which he believes is incompatible with Islam as it now stands. "Muslims have yet to appreciate that democracy is not merely 'majority rule,'" he writes, but a social system that also guarantees the right to religious and political dissent.

"How can Feldman believe there is any compatibility at all between Islamist movements and democratic principles?" he asks. "They are democrats only in that they will use elections to take power. One man, one vote, one time. The first people who suffer are women, and after that non-Muslims. The level of denial from Western liberals renders me speechless."

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 1066
(8/31/03 13:46)

Reply

Re: Islam, my Islam

---

In a personal way, I feel some sadness for Muslims in present circumstances. Iraq is in such a mess. Every day, it reminds me more and more of Vietnam. Worse than that, really.

I have read discussion that the Bush regime truly believed that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

That's a hoot. I think it was a bald face lie from the get-go. I will never forget Colin Powell lying to the UN.

The present Bush is the worst American president I have ever seen. Nixon was arrogant but he could not get away with his arrogance. He was checked.

To me, one of the most shameful spectacles was when Bush put on a pilot's suit. So assured of his victory. So assured of his heroism after the events of 9/11.

I don't call it a victory when American youth are dying every day in Iraq.

It is not Islam that is the culprit here. Muslims are fighting Muslims. It's Shi'ite against Sunni and it is obvious that Al Qaeda has taken root in the fertile ground of chaos.

I think it is ironic that America defeated the Taliban in Afghanistan just to engage the original monster in Iraq.

There were no recent weapons of mass destruction in Iraq until the United States made such things possible.

Faizi

fulmination

Registered User

Posts: 1

(9/2/03 23:29)

Reply

Re: Islam, my Islam

---

I attended an "open-day" at one of the Mosques (the mainly Turkish Auburn Mosque) here in Sydney on the weekend. It was a very open day with an open question forum (hostile questions were aplenty) which went really well. However, while this open-day was great, I know there are some other sects of Islam who wouldn't even consider having someone of another faith, or of no faith in their Mosque. But, the same can be said for different Christian sects. I mean, some are really open and welcoming, others (such as the infamous "Hillsong" here in Sydney) you have to actually pay to enter and then give money throughout the 'service'.

I guess I'm just re-iterating a point someone else made way above that all religions have their fanatics, moderates, lefties, righties and just about everything else; and all can turn to their books, prophets, verses, scrolls or whatever for justification of what they're doing. At the moment, it's open season for and against Islam (depending on where you're sitting). We'll move on eventually to another phenomenon of critique - maybe not for a while, but it'll happen. I guess we'll just have to see how we get through the current one. Islam is in crisis - but Christianity has been in crisis since the Enlightenment and it's still fighting and alive - very modified, but alive. I guess we'll just have to wait and see how Islam reacts.

Me personally; I'm a three quarter atheist, one quarter agnostic for the record.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1443(9/2/03 23:35)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Islam, my Islam <hr/> Will you be a complete atheist only when you die?!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| fulminationRegistered UserPosts: 2(9/2/03 23:43)Reply    | Re: Islam, my Islam <hr/> :-P hehe. Good point. I guess what I should have said is: "I'm 75% sure that 'god' doesn't exist and the other 25% is definitely not based on a conscious god, but rather a possibility that a 'force' of energy could exist (non-conscious with no design)..." I definitely don't believe in a 'soul', an 'afterlife' or 're-incarnation'... But, I guess that's for another discussion. I just like to usually state what 'position' I'm coming from when religious beliefs/discussions are brought up. |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1396(9/2/03 23:44)Reply        | Re: Islam, my Islam <hr/> Welcome to the board, Fulmination. I'm just wondering what the content is of the agnostic part? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| fulminationRegistered UserPosts: 3(9/2/03 23:51)Reply  | Re: Islam, my Islam <hr/> Still trying to figure that out myself... Will eventually let you know..                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 562(9/3/03 0:06)Reply  | Re: Islam, my Islam <hr/> A faint conviction?    |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 87(8/3/04 5:51)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Islam <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA |

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 367(9/17/02 12:43)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> I also feel the need to add that most of the links and sites on the Internet that are not pro-Islam connect to Hindu and pro-India sites. There is little that is unbiased. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 956(9/17/02 12:57)Reply | Re: Islam <hr/> Personally, I haven't seen anything that is even remotely wise in the religion of Islam and, because of this, I would rather see it disappear from the face of the earth. At least the religions of Buddhism and Christianity do contain some wise teachings, which creates the impression that there is some hope for the human race. But in Islam there is nothing. It is a purely animal/herd religion that suppresses all rational thought. Even the mystical tradition of Sufism is a very poor cousin of the mystical traditions of the other major religions. The Sufis could never say anything too truthful or direct for fear of getting their heads lopped off by the animalistic Islamic community. It is beyond a joke. The world would definitely be a far better place without Islam. |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 957

(9/17/02 13:14)

Reply

Re: Islam

Marsha Faizi wrote:

Quote:

---

"I don't agree with those who think that the conflict is simply between two religions, namely Christianity and Islam. Nor do I think that this is a conflict between East and West. To me, the key conflict is between irrational blind faith and rational logical minds. Or between modernity and anti-modernity. While some people want to go forward, others are trying to go backward. It is a conflict between the future and the past, between innovation and tradition, between those who value freedom and those who do not." -- Taslima Nasrin

I agree with the above. It is a fight between religiously induced ignorance and logical thinking. It is not a fight between East and West. It is a fight between progress and regression.

---

It must be very frustrating for the educated Muslim minority in most of these Islamic states having to deal with hordes of primitive-minded people all of the time. No matter how great their efforts to get their countries moving forwards, progress is near impossible because of the sheer weight of numbers wanting to go the other way. And to think that Islam used to be the one shining light in the world for science and rationality only a few centuries ago.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 368

(9/17/02 13:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

Quote:

---

I think, Faizi opened an eye to the modern & slant translations.

---

Yusef Ali's translation is the only resource I have. I did have some copies of the Hadiths and some other religious tracts but they have been lost.

My husband, like many Muslims, could read the Arabic text and recite much of it. He also read the English translations for understanding. He used to urge me to read it also but, when I took it up, there was always some reason that I should not read it -- my feet were not in the correct position or my face was not clean enough -- many things. Eventually, I resolved that I would not read it. I did not care for religion anyway.

In retrospect, I think he did not want me to read it because he feared that I either would reject it or my understanding would surpass his.

I seldom went to Mosque. There were many women active there but I was not interested in the religion. I could not have cared less about it. I was Muslim mostly in name only. I did observe Ramadan and Eid and I dressed as a Muslim woman. I ate no pork and I took no alcohol. I became a good Pakistani cook.

There was much that I liked about the culture. I liked the separateness. Because I was American, I did not associate much with the other Pakistani women. Yet, I did not associate with Americans. I was cut off from all society. I was left alone.

I could have some intellectual discourse with my husband but there was nothing else.

I did not attend his American funeral. It was a spectacle that I found distasteful. There were three hundred people at the Mosque and that was more than I could bear.

I did the proper Islamic thing and returned him to his family in Faisalabad.

Faizi

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 84

(9/17/02 14:05)

Reply

Re: Irrellevant

---

Quote:

---

It seems apparent though, what you seem to have made of Islam.

---

What I think of Islam depends on what Islam is.

1. If Islam is what those who call themselves "Muslim" actually practise, then I don't think much of Islam, because I haven't come across any wise Muslims. Rather, I have come across many extremely ignorant ones, who call themselves, and have been conferred the title "Islamic scholar".

2. If Islam is what is taught in the Koran, then my opinion of Islam is slightly higher, but still not very high, as I haven't seen much in the Koran to impress me.

I see now that the quotes I gave at the beginning of this thread were poorly translated into English. But even a good translation doesn't do much to improve them.

Take the following statement from the Koran for example:

"O ye who believe, take not the Jews and the Christians as your friends and protectors: They are but friends and protectors to each other." (Koran, Sura V; 54)

Now this takes the position that Islam is superior to both Judaism and Christianity, and that Judaism and Christianity are enemies of Islam, and, taken in the context of other teachings in the Koran, should be subdued if not destroyed. I don't see how the Koran could be interpreted as teaching anything else.

3. If Islam is submission to Truth, then Islam must be a good thing. But is such an Islam to be found among those who call themselves Muslim? It seems not.

Edited by: ksolway at: 9/17/02 2:07:58 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 369

(9/17/02 14:09)

Reply

Islam

---

David,

Quote:

---

At least the religions of Buddhism and Christianity do contain some wise teachings, which creates the impression that there is some hope for the human race. But in Islam there is nothing.

---

The Koran contains the exact things that are related in the Christian Bible. Islam holds Moses and Abraham and David and Joseph and Jesus and Mary in high esteem. If the Bible contains wisdom, then, the Koran contains the same wisdom.

The big difference between Islam and Christianity is that Islam preaches One God. Though Jesus is considered to be a wise man, he is not believed to be the son of God. The idea that Jesus could be worshipped instead of God is considered to be blasphemy in Islam. Christians worship God only as a secondary God. Allegiance, for Christians, is to Jesus. Christians believe that one cannot come to God except through Jesus.

I don't worship Jesus. The very idea of worshipping Jesus seems ridiculous to me. I do not believe that there can be any "middleman" in one's relationship with nature. The entire crucifixion scenario in Christianity is meaningless to me. I do not believe that anyone could die for my sins. I would not allow anyone to die for my sins. I would rather rot in Hell than to ever allow anyone to die for my sins. I am responsible. What I have done in my life that has caused suffering is because of me and I am answerable to these things. Ethically, I would not use Jesus as my shield or my excuse, even if I believed this to be possible.

I would not have crucified him had I been present in his time and I will not crucify him now.

The very idea of using Jesus as my excuse is disgusting to me. I see no wisdom in that. I see no wisdom in Christianity, the result of the New Testament. Would I offer Buddha as my excuse? No. That is not something that can be done.

The one wisdom that I see in Islam is the rejection of Jesus as Savior. I am grateful that I learned from that. My exposure to Islam underscored that for me. It severed my mind from Christianity forever. You yet have that attachment. It is like a psychological umbilical cord. You should drop it. You will be forty soon.

There is much bullshit in Islam as there is much bullshit in all religions. I don't believe that God will provide me with lovely virgins in the afterworld. That's a fantasy; a delusion. But it is no more fanciful than what most Christians believe. I do not believe that I will go to Heaven where roads are paved with gold either. I do not believe in Immaculate Conception. Islam contains no tales of virgin births with God as the father.

That's just plain weird.

Islam is not a religion of wisdom. I don't believe that there is such a thing as a religion of wisdom.

I also do not believe that there is a religion that is humanist.

Drop Jesus and drop your worship of Buddha and you might know God. You use Buddhism as a mighty crutch between yourself and nature.

Are you afraid?

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 370

(9/17/02 14:29)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

I see now that the quotes I gave at the beginning of this thread were poorly translated into English. But even a good translation doesn't do much to improve them.

---

Kevin,

I am appalled that you have nothing more to say than what you have posted. I spent much time and careful deliberation in posting my thought and in investigating the thought of others whom you cited.

I do not uphold Islam as an enlightened or enlightening religion but I do not uphold Christianity or Buddhism as enlightening religions nor do I uphold science.

For one who set forth "mighty" questions in poor translations and in some bias, I am disappointed that you can offer nothing in return to what I have offered, more than your pithy comments.

How disappointing. I would have thought better of you.

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 292

(9/17/02 14:48)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Kevin, do you mean to say that you do not have the courage to know what Islam is? Your tolerance is appalling.

I know the religions by their smells. The perfumed ones, the sublimated systems, the 'isms', are just as rotten.

Marsha, you surely don't believe in God do you!!? THAT would be disappointing! I thought you were beyond all those who will say "It depends on what one means by 'God'"

Is anyone as tired as I am with such dire definers of life?!

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 372

(9/17/02 14:56)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Kevin,

Quote:

---

Now this takes the position that Islam is superior to both Judaism and Christianity, and that Judaism and Christianity are enemies of Islam, and, taken in the context of other teachings in the Koran, should be subdued if not destroyed. I don't see how the Koran could be interpreted as teaching anything else.

---

Is it not true that Christianity and Judaism are the enemies of Islam?

Are you Christian? You sound like a Christian.

In my lengthy post, I was careful to offer the translator's note that stated that a Muslim must be careful of Christian and Jews because they will combine against those who oppose them. The passage says nothing about destroying Christians and Jews.

I have come across nothing in the Koran that states that Christianity and Judaism should be destroyed. Christians and Jews are People of the Book.

I cited other passages of the Koran that spoke of the need to recognize Christians as allies; learned men.

I am perfectly willing to acknowledge and to discuss the shortcomings and the great ignorance that is practiced and perpetuated by Muslims.

But, in order to do so, I expect some better input from those who hold themselves above ignorance.

You are not better than an American.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 373

(9/17/02 15:01)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Suergaz,

I have a swell idea: Why don't you shut the fuck up?

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 374

(9/17/02 15:05)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David Quinn,

Quote:

---

The world would definitely be a far better place without Islam.

---

It is good to see that you are in agreement with Bush and Sharon.

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 293

(9/17/02 16:44)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

"Suergaz,

I have a swell idea: Why don't you shut the fuck up?"

Swollen ideas are too quick to dismiss, you should try to seal yours not with cuts, but a kiss. (:D)

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 85

(9/17/02 17:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

Is it not true that Christianity and Judaism are the enemies of Islam?

---

It depends what you mean by "Christianity" and "Judaism". Fundamentalist Christianity and fundamentalist Judaism may well be the enemies of Islam. And it may be that mainstream Christianity and Judaism are as well. But if it is written into the Koran that Christianity and Judaism are enemies to be subdued and/or destroyed, then we should not be surprised if Christians and Jews want to see the end of Islam.

Quote:

---

Are you Christian? You sound like a Christian.

---

I would probably be judged to be a Christian or a Buddhist by a Muslim, which is worry, because if they follow the instructions of the Koran they might try to kill me as an enemy of Islam!

Quote:

---

In my lengthy post, I was careful to offer the translator's note that stated that a Muslim must be careful of Christian and Jews because they will combine against those who oppose them. The passage says nothing about destroying Christians and Jews

---

Yet the Koran clearly states that if Islam is being attacked (or possibly threatened?) by an enemy, then the way is clear to destroy that enemy. Now the passage I quoted (as well as other passages) casts the Christians (to a lesser degree) and the Jews (to a large degree) as the enemy, who are at least a big threat. "O ye who believe, take not the Jews and the Christians as your friends and protectors: They are but friends and protectors to each other." (Koran, Sura V; 54)

The very next step is to attack those whom you are scripturally forbidden friendship with, and who are scripturally only working to serve themselves (. . . and possibly plotting against you).

Quote:

---

I have come across nothing in the Koran that states that Christianity and Judaism should be destroyed. Christians and Jews are People of the Book.

---

I agree that the Koran doesn't seem to directly say "Christians and Jews should be destroyed". But from what I have seen, it says everything but that!

Quote:

---

I cited other passages of the Koran that spoke of the need to recognize Christians as allies; learned men.

---

Yes, that is certainly a relief. But does that mean that all the others are enemies to be destroyed?

I think that the Christians and Jews of today are probably equally as insane as the Muslims - ie, very much so - but it seems to me that Islam has the potential to be more dangerous - because of what is written in the Koran - and because of the way in which foolish Muslims interpret it (or fail to interpret it as the case may be).

Yes, a person should fight to defend what he believes in. But the Koran, as quoted, assumes to do a person's thinking for him. It quite literally points-out who the enemy is supposed to be (Christians and Jews, generally speaking), and then more or less says "fight them to protect your faith". This isn't bad if the instructions are given to wise people, as they can make up their own minds about right and wrong, but when you give those instructions to herd animals, then all hell will break loose.

My main reason for giving those quotes at the beginning of the thread was firstly to see whether they were a correct translation, and secondly to see whether anyone could interpret them in such a way that they didn't mean "Fight Christianity and Judaism". You provided some good alternative translations, which were enlightening, and also put forward some reasonable differing interpretations, but I didn't find them very convincing.

Edited by: ksolway at: 9/17/02 5:21:02 pm

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 204

(9/17/02 20:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

David Quinn:

The world would definitely be a far better place without Islam.

Faizi: It is good to see that you are in agreement with Bush and Sharon.

---

I'm already see David chanting the oximoron of "war on terror". :)

I was really surprised to see the pitiful comments from David. What the hell is this modernist-Americanist bullshit of "moving forward" and "progress"? The only phrase I miss is "civilised world".....

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 60

(9/17/02 22:25)

Reply

Mother do you Think They'll Drop the Bomb?

---

Mother do you think they'll drop the bomb? Mother do you think they'll like this song? Mother do you think they'll try to break my balls? Oh, ah...Mother should I build the wall?

The wise who yet see something other than ignorance as the why?

Mama's gonna keep baby cosy and warm...oooo babe, oooo babe...oooo babe, of course Mama's gonna help build the wall.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 86

(9/17/02 22:39)

Reply

Cat Stevens and Islam

---

Increasingly, I am coming to understand the "aggressiveness" of Islam as a reaction against the relative non-judgemental acceptance of Christianity, or the insipidness of Christianity, as Nietzsche would put it.

But that doesn't make Islam right.

A case in point is the treatment Cat Stevens, a Muslim, dished-out to Salman Rushdie, when he accused Rushdie of blasphemy - a crime punishable by death under Islamic Law.

Cat Stevens clarified, in his formal statement to the press catstevens.com/articles/00013/index.html

Quote:

---

Under Islamic Law, the ruling regarding blasphemy is quite clear; the person found guilty of it must be put to death. Only under certain circumstances can repentance be accepted.

---

Elsewhere he explains that such a killing must only be done after "due legal process". But what is "due legal process" in this case, but a number of authorised Muslims deciding that Rushdie be killed for what they perceive to be slander?

More fighting words from Islam:

Quote:

---

O you who believe!
do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends;
they are friends of each other;
and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend,
then surely he is one of them;
surely Allah does not guide the unjust people.

[Koran 5.51]

---

This teaching from the Koran squarely sets Christianity and Judaism apart from Islam, saying they are "unjust". This is virtually the same as saying they are a harmful enemy. And elsewhere in the Koran it says that the enemies of Islam should be subdued if not destroyed.

Many words can also be found in Islam about how much is shared between Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, but words in the Koran such as those quoted above, and those spoken by Cat Stevens and so-called "Islamic Law" are bound to cause big trouble when they are fed to people of little intelligence.

Edited by: ksolway at: 9/17/02 10:43:36 pm

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 61

(9/17/02 23:16)

Reply

G Dubbya and Islam

---

Kevin: Many words can also be found in Islam about how much is shared between Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, but words in the Koran such as those quoted above, and those spoken by Cat Stevens and so-called "Islamic Law" are bound to cause big trouble when they are fed to people of little intelligence.

You mean like, G Dubbya?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 87

(9/18/02 0:49)

Reply

Re: G Dubbya and Islam

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: Many words can also be found in Islam about how much is shared between Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, but words in the Koran such as those quoted above, and those spoken by Cat Stevens and so-called "Islamic Law" are bound to cause big trouble when they are fed to people of little intelligence.

You mean like, G Dubbya?

---

Certainly.

I can well understand how ordinary Christians feel threatened by another religion whose holy scriptures single out Christianity as unjust, and (arguably) as enemies to be subdued or destroyed - especially when that other religion might soon have access to a lot of nuclear weapons.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 62

(9/18/02 1:09)

Reply

Re: G Dubbya and Islam

---

OK. So how would you go about ridding the world of Islam? Or would you address Christians?

lol...I see now why my question about editing was ignored! Boy, what a task. And I don't have to C&P the subject anymore.

Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/18/02 1:13:11 am

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 221

(9/18/02 1:38)

Reply

Re: Islam

Islam is one of the topics I know next to nothing about. So, I am basically just reading and learning. It is interesting to see that the Qur'an can apparently be translated into English quite differently. I also suspect that the quotes brought forward are not representative for the content of the Qur'an. There must be something of more substance, is there? Anyone who can cite something inspiring?

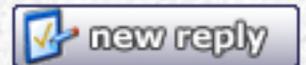

I have a few Muslism friends and colleagues here in Thailand. These are educated people with university degrees. We hardly talk about religion and there isn't any "barrier" between us, at least none that I am aware of.

Luckily Thailand is free from the conflicts we see in other countries with religious diversity. Muslims are a minority in Thailand, roughly 4% of the population (almost all Sunni) with the largest concentration in the Southern provinces bordering to Malaysia, while 94% of all Thai people are Buddhists. There are many Muslim communities in Bangkok and mosques are a common sight here. If Thailand can live in peace with its Muslims, they must be doing something right. It is possible that other nations can benefit from taking a closer look at the integration of Muslims in Thailand.

Cheers, Thomas

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 296(9/18/02 2:00)Reply                                                                                           | --- <hr/> Religions destroy themselves. Weapons don't. What are your views on nuclear disarmament? How is it to be brought about?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 960(9/18/02 7:46)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> Bondi wrote: Quote: <hr/> David Quinn:The world would definitely be a far better place without Islam. Faizi: It is good to see that you are in agreement with Bush and Sharon. Bondi: I'm already see David chanting the oximoron of "war on terror". :) <hr/> America's brand of Christianity (as epitomized by Bush) is essentially no |

better than fundamentalist Islam, so it doesn't really matter to me who wipes out who. The only real tragedy about this coming conflict between the US and Iraq is that, when it is all over, Christianity and Islam will still be as strong as ever.

Quote:

---

I was really surprised to see the pitiful comments from David. What the hell is this modernist-Americanist bullshit of "moving forward" and "progress"? The only phrase I miss is "civilised world".....

---

I was referring to progress in the realm of intelligence and rational thought. Fundamentalist Islamic culture is the complete enemy of rational thought and has to go. It belongs in another, less-developed era and has no place in the 21st century world.

But this is not to say that I am supportive of the American (or Australian) way of life. I only rate our culture slightly above the fundamentalistic Islamic culture, and that is only because we make a few more (albeit usually empty) noises about freedom and individual rights.

If we were to compare the development of culture with the development of a single human being, then Islamic fundamentalism is the sandpit mentality of five year olds, while American culture is the aimlessness and silliness of early adolescence. I would like to see our culture grow beyond adolescence.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 375

(9/18/02 7:58)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

There is much here for me to respond to and I am not sure that I can keep up -- I have a job.

I will give it a try.

To Thomas: I don't find much in the Bible to be inspiring so I doubt that I can find much in the Koran that I will consider to be inspiring. Much of it is the same ol' stories -- Heaven, Moses, Joseph, Jesus -- the whole gang. But I will give it a try.

I don't find qwalis (sic) to be exactly inspiring but it is some rousing music. "Allah Hooo!" is a great tune.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 376

(9/18/02 9:23)

Reply

Re: Islam

I found this on the Internet when I was doing some other searches. It is written by a Pakistani. It is poorly written because it is obvious that the writer has not fully mastered English.

I think it expresses the sentiment that can cause some Muslims to "go backwards." Some Muslims become so frustrated in their efforts to "go forward" that backwards seems logical.

I do not offer it as an excuse for Islamic fundamentalism but I think that it does explain the very deep frustration that some Islamics feel with the developed, Western world.

Faizi

Just a few years back, when I was in my early classes, I was taught that after the World War II an organization was formed with the name of United Nations Organizations. The purpose of this organization was to save mankind, from the bloodshed and wars and to solve the disputed issues through dialogue. At that time there was an impression that this organization was very powerful and capable to implement its decisions.

As I was a child I believed in what was taught to me but now through observations I have realized that reality was not the same as it was revealed to me in my text books and by my teachers. Because the reins of UNO are in the hands of five countries and whenever a decision goes against the interest of these countries they pull these reins and change the direction of smooth going horse of UNO by using the lash of VETO.

One of these five countries is America. We all know America's "GOLDEN AIMS" to rule the entire world. And after the fall of Russian Empire, America has become all in all in UNO. And now it seems that USA is not a member of UNO but UNO is an organization of USA. UNO can't draw a single step without and permission of USA.

As far as the claims and slogans of "HUMAN RIGHTS" and "PEACE ON EARTH" are concerned the UNO's performance is really remarkable. But when we try to find out some logical and factual results of those so called efforts and slogans we come to know that the progress is NILL.

When we talk about the rights and interest of West (non-Muslim world) we find that UNO is very active and influential. For example in the case of Israel, all Western world and specially USA are always alert and they don't miss a single chance to get soft corner in Jewish community's heart by waving the flags of Human Rights. Similarly, recently in the case of Kuwait within no time there was a "SETTLEMENT" to crush Iraq and to break her military might (just because Iraq was declared a fundamentalist by the so-called super power USA). In addition to this when two American's were killed in Karachi, there was a earth quake in entire world and secret agencies from different counties were in Karachi to find out the person or persons who killed those GREAT people (as they were Americans).

But when we look towards Kashmir, Palestine, Bosnia, Somalia and Iraq, where human rights are being violated with such an extent that no one can hide these facts from the eyes worlds, we observe that all these flag carriers of so-called human rights become deaf and dumb. In these areas dozens of people are killed each day, innocent girls are raped in front of their family members, dead bodies of old citizens are thrown on the roads. But so-called organizations working for human rights do not seem to work with seriousness as the situation of these area demands.

Also the biggest organization of world i.e. UNO is not fulfilling her duties. All UNO has done is just passing the resolutions that worth nothing but a piece of paper, as these resolution can't be implemented. It is just because the solution of these issues goes in the interest of Muslims. As the Muslims have been declared 'FUNDAMENTALISTS' by our great "UNCLE SAM" (America). And these areas do not attract the UNO and western powers, as there are no Oil wells to fill the stomach of Western Economy.

That is why we see that UNO is pretending that every thing is fine and under control. So it is totally clear that UNO doesn't stand for UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION but it stands for "UNITED NO OBJECTION (to crush Muslims)". So the Muslims must stop looking towards UNO or any so-called super power (because the super power is only ALLAH Almighty) and should trust and utilize their own resources to solve their problems. We must remember that UNO will never work for the welfare of Muslims and if we do not realize this vital fact of the twentieth century then there will be no help even from God to keep us safe from the evils of west.

Note: This article was written about seven years back when I was a college student and it was published in a local magazine. And yesterday when I turned the pages of that magazine I realized that the situation has not changed in these seven years and even now this article depicts the current situation. So here it is to share it with you.

Contributed by M. Imran Saeed on Tuesday, October 16, 2001 Discuss...

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 721

(9/18/02 9:50)

Reply

Re: Islam - and the rest

---

I'd like to see the religious mentality in all its manifestations disappear from the face of the earth, whether that be Christendom, Islam, Judaism, religious Taoism, the religious face of Buddhism or even Humanism (which has replaced God with "society" but which is equally religious in its underlying psychology). It's tempting, with respect to Christendom to say that it, unlike Islam, has Jesus, but this wouldn't be accurate. Christendom has no more to do with Jesus than religious Taoism has to do with the Tao te Ching, or Nazism and National Socialism has to do with Nietzsche.

Herd-think, in whatever way it is expressed, is the real problem. Religion is but one form of it.

Dan Rowden

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 722

(9/18/02 10:05)

Reply

Kind of ironic

---

Oh, and isn't it funny how everyone indignantly dismisses as "fundamentalists" and "fanatics" those religionists who actually stick to the letter of the law of the scriptures that are supposed to be their spiriutal and/or temporal authority.

Why don't we dismiss the moderates as "insipids" or "religious agnostics"? Obviously it's because we identify with their insipidity.

Dan Rowden

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 64

(9/18/02 10:30)

Reply

19¢ DIGITAL PRINTS
www.clubphoto.com

Incredible Quality Prints

Re: Kind of ironic

---

My sentiments exactly, Dan.

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 590

(9/18/02 10:39)

Reply

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Heh.

Damn those Christian Insipidists.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 377

(9/18/02 10:55)

Reply

Islam

---

David Quinn wrote:

Quote:

---

Fundamentalist Islamic culture is the complete enemy of rational thought and has to go. It belongs in another, less-developed era and has no place in the 21st century world.

---

I agree with this and this is a big struggle within Islamic countries -- especially developing Islamic countries such as Pakistan. Pakistan has had three progressive, modern leaders in its short history and none of these leaders have succeeded in bringing Pakistan to the present century, despite noble effort. The words that I posted from Mohammed Ali Jinnah, the founder of Pakistan, would probably be considered heresy in the country today where he is revered as Qaid-e-Azam.

There is a progressive leader in Pakistan now. His ambition is to raise his country out of ignorance. That is a very tall order. Many Al Qaida fighters were trained in camps in Pakistan. Many of them are graduates of Madrassas that train boys in religious and political hate. Thirty years ago, Pakistan was making progress under the leadership of Z. Ali Bhutto. Education was valued -- real education -- not education by religious conscription. But Bhutto was imprisoned and hung.

It is possible the he was considered to be too progressive. In a country that is oil poor, one solution to this lack of power, is nuclear power to provide electricity. The electrical power of the United States is largely dependent on nuclear power plants.

Ali Bhutto gave nuclear power to Pakistan, a country yet plagued with electrical outages. This was a very important step toward modernity for Pakistan, to have electricity in many places, as the United States has electricity available to its people. Without proper electrical power, how can a Third World country modernize itself? Electricity is fundamental to a modern, technological society. Do we expect an undeveloped country to come to modernity without it? Can it be expected that one -- by force -- can read by candlelight and come to enlightenment when the rest of the modern world has the advantage of electric light and this thing is forbidden to Pakistan? Forbidden not by Islam but by the West, the great Future?

"Bhutto was the founder of Pakistan's Nuclear Program. Under his guidance and leadership as Minister for Fuel, Power and Natural Resources, President and Prime Minister, Pakistan developed into the unique Muslim State with a nuclear capability for which he paid with his life. In his book 'If I am Assassinated' written from the Death Cell, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto revealed how Kissinger had said 'We will make an example of you.'"

"At the time of his overthrow, Bhutto was emerging as a spokesman of the World of Islam and the leader of the Third World. The age of Bhutto was an Age of Revolution. Although his life and career were cruelly terminated, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto will forever shine in history as one of the Great leaders who took part in the liberation of the Third World from the yoke of Imperialism and Neo Colonialism during the Twentieth Century."

I have some old photographs of my husband from his college days in Lahore. How different from photographs you can see of college students in Pakistan now! Now, you see pictures of women in class wearing burqas. Then, you see pictures of very relaxed looking young people enjoying themselves by engaging in political discussion. The women are bare-faced and look very much at ease. Faizi was a member of the politically progressive Pakistani Peoples Party of Ali Bhutto. Their intention was to bring Pakistan to the modern world.

Looking at the pictures, the young people seem very idealistic and very naive.

I must wonder if it is desirable by the West to bring into fruition a modern, secular State that is neither Christian or Jewish or Pagan based. If this was desirable, Pakistan could have made great strides toward it in thirty years. Such was Ali Bhutto's intention. Bhutto was a leader of some greatness by anyone's standards -- innovative and a dynamic speaker; inspirational; capable of subduing the religionists. Bhutto drank wine and ate pork and kept dogs. He could not speak the national language of Pakistan. He communicated in English. He was secular.

We decry fundamentalism in the West now. But I wonder how much we have contributed to the cause of Islamist fundamentalism through our firm opposition to Islamic progress?

Religion did not have to take precedence in Southwest Asia. Things could have turned out differently. But that time has passed.

You slap a people down long enough and that people will rise up in any way it can.

I don't condone or sympathize with "terrorist" acts. I do not condone the murder of anyone. I felt great sadness when I saw the World Trade Centers fall. I felt it for the West and I felt it for the East. The rise of the warring Islamists is as much the responsibility of the West as it is the responsibility of the East.

You who hold yourselves above ignorance should read a bit of Twentieth Century history.

It is not Islam that should be eradicated from the earth but ignorance and the conscious, dedicated desire to perpetuate ignorance. You should consider for a minute that, thirty years ago, ignorance could have been brought to enlightenment in the Twenty-first Century but it was denied.

It is a wonderful thing to cloak yourselves in the starry wonder of Christianity and Buddhism when you have the technological luxury to do so. It is quite another thing to struggle to survive.

Faizi

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 104

(9/18/02 11:27)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

What I think of Islam depends on what Islam is.

---

How can one say what Islam IS, or any other religion for that matter?

If they are but a collection of stories and rules/ethics passed down by different people with different desires and input.

You can't really say that Islam is saying this....

or Christianity is saying this... and so on.

It's not like one man sat down one day and wrote the Quran or Bible all by himself, with one goal and one message.

All the religions are a potpourri of different sayings from different sources and different times.

For you they are what YOU make of them. Debating over what one religion means or the message it is trying to impose is truly primitive.

O' wise ones!

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 378

(9/18/02 11:40)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Dan,

Quote:

---

It's tempting, with respect to Christendom to say that it, unlike Islam, has Jesus, but this wouldn't be accurate. Christendom has no more to do with Jesus than religious Taoism has to do with the Tao te Ching, or Nazism and National Socialism has to do with Nietzsche.

---

But Islam does have Jesus. It recognizes Jesus as an enlightened and wise man in history and Jesus is written about in the Koran as I'sa. It does not promote the absurd belief that Jesus is the son of God and the product of a virgin birth. It does not promote the absurd belief that Jesus is a free ticket to Heaven.

It has its own sets of absurd beliefs that are completely divorced from Christianity.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 379

(9/18/02 11:44)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla,

Quote:

---

My sentiments exactly, Dan.

---

How are these your exact sentiments, Leyla?

What is your knowledge of religion?

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 299

(9/18/02 13:31)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

I AM:--"How can one say what Islam IS, or any other religion for that matter?

If they are but a collection of stories and rules/ethics passed down by different people with different desires and input. "

I think you have said what Islam, and any other religion for that matter, IS.

"You can't really say that Islam is saying this.... or Christianity is saying this... and so on."

Yes, I can, but No, only because you said it first.

The religions exist, but they are dead....can we call them corpses? They are riddled with worms.

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 105

(9/18/02 14:13)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

I think you have said what Islam, and any other religion for that matter, IS.

---

I am pretty sure you know what I meant in my post suergaz so I will take your post as an irrellevant rant from someone attempting to appease his ego at anothers expense.

But if you truly did not understand what I was trying to convey than I strongly suggest a re-read.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 303

(9/18/02 14:30)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Not at your expense! My own! -----I was agreeing with you! But how is what I wrote a rant? And how is it irrelevant?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 88

(9/18/02 16:29)

Reply

The Wisdom of the Koran

---

Over the last couple of days I have been attempting to read the Koran, to see if there is anything good about it.

Today I have given up trying to read it, because I think it is a waste of my time.

I believe it is the product of a sick mind.

I think there is some kind of awareness of truth behind it, but that connection is remote indeed, and the mind of the writers of the Koran has been polluted with much poison, which has become embodied in the Koran.

I was hoping to arrive at a compilation of half-decent wise quotations from the Koran, but the following is the best I could come up with:

Quote:

---

[2.42] And do not mix up the truth with the falsehood, nor hide the truth while you know (it).

---

On a scale of great quotes, out of ten, the above probably ranks a score of 1.

Here is another:

Quote:

---

"God changes not what is within people until people change what is in themselves." [13:11]

---

This one probably ranks 0.01, because it is just plain stupid.

What is worse, for every quote I found of a similar quality to the above, I found fifty that are a hundred times worse.

I find much of the Koran quite repulsive.

Much, if not most of the Koran comes across as fearful and paranoid rantings, trying to scare people into submission by beating them with a big stick.

I don't believe it has anything to do with wisdom.

I will here attempt an abstract of the Koran:

Believe in Allah.

Pray to Allah.

Don't be an Unbeliever.

If you are an Unbeliever, you will go to hell.

If you believe, you will receive virgins as your reward in heaven.

Don't make friends with Christians or Jews.

Don't make friends with the unjust.

Unbelievers are unjust, and are doomed.

Pray to Allah.

Allah will destroy the unbelievers.

If unbelievers repent, then you might forgive them.

Submit to Allah.

If you don't submit to Allah you will be punished.

etc, etc.

Here is another typical example of what I found:

Quote:

---

But whoever disputes with you in this matter after what has come to you of knowledge, then say: Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our near people and your near people, then let us be earnest in prayer, and pray for the curse of Allah on the liars. (The Family of Imran 3.61)

---

This comes across to me as plainly vindictive.

What gives the Koran away as a fraud is that if a person is truly a "believer" (which means he would not only know Ultimate Truth, but also have faith in it) then he would be repulsed by all that is in the Koran. He would have no need of "praying for the curse of Allah on the liars". And he could make up his own mind who to make friends with and who to avoid.

What more can I say?

Can anyone else find something good about the Koran?

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 66

(9/18/02 16:38)

Reply

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Marsha,

I don't agree that religious mentality equates with herd-mentality, but I am assuming that was not Dan's intention. As far as I'm concerned, any quest toward an ideal is necessarily religious; and I believe we're all doing that.

On herd-mentality: I believe it is considered to be the act of following of a set of principles just because everyone else is doing it. It involves no contemplation, and produces little in the way of self-realisation. It may give one a sense of belonging, but I believe orthodox religion has far more to offer, as allegory and metaphor, than that.

I was raised in what would be considered a moderate Muslim environment within the setting of Western culture. Traditionally Turkish. Religion was only used as an attempt to keep me in line. The myriad of more meaningful questions, such as 'who/what is God exactly?', 'why am I here?', 'what has eating pork really got to do with spirituality?', (and those are just some of the ones I've asked of Islam) were never really answered.

I have participated, as a child, in several Muslim rites (though I could not properly name them now). I have read some of the Kuran, read the Bible-- and continue to do so as intellectual necessity demands.

Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/18/02 4:58:18 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 965

(9/18/02 16:49)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

Kevin wrote:

Quote:

---

Over the last couple of days I have been attempting to read the Koran, to see if there is anything good about it.

Today I have given up trying to read it, because I think it is a waste of my time.

I believe it is the product of a sick mind.

---

Agreed. I've tried reading it in the past but also found it ignorant and repulsive. Probably the only reason why more people don't speak up against it, and against Islam in general, is fear of having a fatwah issued against them.

Quote:

---

I was hoping to arrive at a compilation of half-decent wise quotations from the Koran, but the following is the best I could come up with:

[2.42] "And do not mix up the truth with the falsehood, nor hide the truth while you know (it)."

On a scale of great quotes, out of ten, the above probably ranks a score of 1.

---

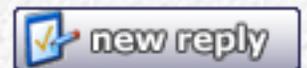

And they don't even put it into practice! Not hiding the truth is the last thing a Muslim would want to do, for he knows that it would only lead to his throat being slit.

Quote:

---

I think there is some kind of awareness of truth behind it, but that connection is remote indeed, and the mind of the writers of the Koran has been polluted with much poison, which has

|                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                           | become embodied in the Koran. <hr/> Can you articulate what you mean by this? I personally didn't sense any awareness of truth when I read the Koran, so I'm not sure what you are refering to here. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 305(9/18/02 16:51)Reply           | Re: Kind of ironic <hr/> Religion offers self-realisation only in the process of self-denial.                                                                                                        |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 224(9/18/02 17:11)Reply  | Re: Kind of ironic <hr/> Congratulations! You have defined yourselves a new Feindbild. Was about time to throw in another "evil axis" paradigm. :) Cheers, Thomas                             |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

 new topic

 new reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 68(9/18/02 17:26)Reply   | Re: Kind of ironic <hr/> Alright, what's a Feinbild??           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 309(9/18/02 17:50)Reply  | Re: Kind of ironic <hr/> A feindbild is a picture of the enemy. |

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 206

(9/18/02 18:13)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

Bondi: I was really surprised to see the pitiful comments from David. What the hell is this modernist-Americanist bullshit of "moving forward" and "progress"? The only phrase I miss is "civilised world".....

David: I was referring to progress in the realm of intelligence and rational thought. Fundamentalist Islamic culture is the complete enemy of rational thought and has to go. It belongs in another, less-developed era and has no place in the 21st century world.

---

I see what you mean. However, there's one thing I cannot agree with. The current situation is exactly a rational situation -- while it is not an intelligent situation. We mustn't confuse reason (ratio) with intelligence! The realm of rationality is inferior and rather limited when compared to intelligence and intellect.

If we were waiting for "progress" in the realm of rationality, we would be waiting for the Islam to destroy the USA, or the USA to destroy the Islamic world:

Quote:

---

David: America's brand of Christianity (as epitomized by Bush) is essentially no better than fundamentalist Islam, so it doesn't really matter to me who wipes out who. The only real tragedy about this coming conflict between the US and Iraq is that, when it is all over, Christianity and Islam will still be as strong as ever.

---

And, instead of realising the stupidity of such a "thinking" and improve ourselves intellectually, we are turning into the other direction: endless sentimentalism, moralism:

Kevin wrote:

Quote:

---

A case in point is the treatment Cat Stevens, a Muslim, dished-out to Salman Rushdie, when he accused Rushdie of blasphemy - a crime punishable by death under Islamic Law.

Cat Stevens clarified, in his formal statement to the press:

(quote:)

Under Islamic Law, the ruling regarding blasphemy is quite clear; the person found guilty of it must be put to death. Only under certain circumstances can repentance be accepted.

Kevin: Elsewhere he explains that such a killing must only be done after "due legal process". But what is "due legal process" in this case, but a number of authorised Muslims deciding that Rushdie be killed for what they perceive to be slander?

---

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 207

(9/18/02 18:30)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

---

Kevin wrote:

Quote:

---

Over the last couple of days I have been attempting to read the Koran, to see if there is anything good about it.

Today I have given up trying to read it, because I think it is a waste of my time.

I believe it is the product of a sick mind.

I think there is some kind of awareness of truth behind it, but that connection is remote indeed, and the mind of the writers of the Koran has been polluted with much poison, which has become embodied in the Koran.

---

David wrote:

Quote:

---

Can you articulate what you mean by this? I personally didn't sense any awareness of truth when I read the Koran, so I'm not sure what you are referring to here.

---

Your problem is that you do not make a distinction between esoterism and exoterism. These writings are exoteric, namely they are the external aspect of the doctrine. Something that was made for the masses not to stray far away from truth - not for the individual to become immersed in them.

Edited by: B0ndi at: 9/18/02 6:32:23 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 970

(9/18/02 22:44)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

---

Does the Koran contain any esoteric writings, Bondi? Or are you thinking of Sufism here?

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 69

(9/19/02 2:39)

Reply

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Thanks, suergaz. Now that's cleared up I'll comment...

Thomas: Congratulations! You have defined yourselves a new Feindbild. Was about time to throw in another "evil axis" paradigm. :)

Thanks! And isn't it just so ironic??

It's like ten thousand spoons when all you need is a knife :)

19¢ DIGITAL PRINTS
www.clubphoto.com

Incredible Quality Prints

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 72

(9/19/02 3:28)

Reply

19¢ DIGITAL PRINTS
www.clubphoto.com

Incredible Quality Prints

Re: Islam

---

David: I was referring to progress in the realm of intelligence and rational thought. Fundamentalist Islamic culture is the complete enemy of rational thought and has to go. It belongs in another, less-developed era and has no place in the 21st century world.

How do we make it go? What should the plan be, exactly?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 971

(9/19/02 7:12)

Reply

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

Thomas: Congratulations! You have defined yourselves a new Feindbild. Was about time to throw in another "evil axis" paradigm. :)

Leyla: Thanks! And isn't it just so ironic??

---

Are you referring to Thomas's Feinbild? :)

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 972

(9/19/02 7:29)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

David: I was referring to progress in the realm of intelligence and rational thought. Fundamentalist Islamic culture is the complete enemy of rational thought and has to go. It belongs in another, less-developed era and has no place in the 21st century world.

Leyla: How do we make it go? What should the plan be, exactly?

---

The only permanent long-term solution is the promotion of rationality and wisdom in individual human beings. We have to set the example ourselves by living without delusion and then encourage others to do likewise. The more rational and wise a society of individuals become, the less openings there are for institutionalized insanities, such as Islam, to gain a foothold.

In the short term, there is no easy solution because we are dealing with the almost unstoppable momentum of hundreds of millions of people who are so lost in their dreamworlds that they can't be reasoned with. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to herd them all into one geographic area and then nuke them into oblivion. That would certainly help world peace and social progress immeasurably. It might be a bit impractical though .....

Seriously, the only way that irrationality and insanity can be attacked is by demonstrating the value and benefits of truthfulness, which is the main reason why Genius Forum was created in the first place.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 89

(9/19/02 13:17)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: I think there is some kind of awareness of truth behind it, but that connection is remote indeed, and the mind of the writers of the Koran has been polluted with much poison, which has become embodied in the Koran.

David: Can you articulate what you mean by this? I personally didn't sense any awareness of truth when I read the Koran, so I'm not sure what you are referring to here.

---

On a lowly level, the quote which says "speak the truth" might indicate some crude awareness of truth - but not necessarily.

Similarly, the phrase "pray to Allah", might be interpreted as "rest your mind in direct awareness of Reality", which would make the phrase relatively wise. But taken in the context of the whole Koran, this interpretation would be hard to justify.

Bondi wrote to David:

Quote:

---

Your problem is that you do not make a distinction between esoterism and exoterism. These writings are exoteric, namely they are the external aspect of the doctrine. Something that was made for the masses not to stray far away from truth - not for the individual to become immersed in them.

---

If the Koran is an esoteric teaching, then one must say that it is very, very poor.

On the other hand, if the Koran is an "external" or "exoteric" teaching, "made for the masses" so that they might not "stray far away from truth" - then how can that be?

If something is "external" to Truth, then it is not Truth: it is false. Given that such an "exoteric" teaching is false, does it yet succeed in keeping the masses "not too far away from truth"? I have personally yet to meet a Muslim who is "not too far away from truth". Every Muslim I have met is nowhere even remotely close to Truth.

In any case, what is there in the Koran, specifically, which is "close to Truth", or has the effect of keeping people close to Truth? Precious little, as I far as I can see.

If I wanted to be reminded of the direction in which Truth lies, the Koran would certainly not be my choice of reading.

If you want ordinary ignorant people to become "close to truth" then you must encourage them to reason things through, and think for themselves, and to enjoy thinking. The Koran does none of this whatsoever. Threatening people with hell for not being a "believer" is no help to anyone.

Edited by: ksolway at: 9/19/02 1:21:35 pm

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 74

(9/19/02 13:20)

Reply

19¢ DIGITAL PRINTS
www.clubphoto.com

Incredible Quality Prints

Re: Kind of ironic

---

David: Are you referring to Thomas's Feinbild? :)

LOL. That, too!

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 725

(9/19/02 13:47)

Reply

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

I don't agree that religious mentality equates with herd-mentality, but I am assuming that was not Dan's intention.

---

So as to clarify things: the equating of the religious, as opposed to spiritual mentality, with herd-think, was entirely my intention, because it is absolutely true.

Religion is a self-evidently herdly activity. Spirituality, where authentically expressed, is an utterly individual undertaking.

Dan Rowden

 Sanduleak

Registered User

Posts: 10

(9/19/02 21:18)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Kind of ironic

---

Organised doctrinal religion has mostly been more about the exercise of power and the submission to authority (through appeals to greed, coercion or plain old fear etc) than it has ever been about wisdom.

Witness the fact that in the monotheistic religions the individuals' 'personal' relationship with 'god' is only ever rubber stamped by the majority of followers and ruling body when it agrees with everyone else's supposed individual and personal relationship with god.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 228

(9/19/02 21:19)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David: Perhaps the best thing to do would be to herd them all into one geographic area and then nuke them into oblivion.

Are three people enough to form a herd?

Cheers, Thomas

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 77

(9/19/02 21:37)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

<bangs her melancholy drenched head gently and repetitively against the desk>

Flippen circles. I've always preferred star shapes.

:)

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 210

(9/19/02 21:50)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

---

David wrote:

Quote:

---

Does the Koran contain any esoteric writings, Bondi? Or are you thinking of Sufism here?

---

I don't think it contains directly. Rather, some parts of it may have such a meaning, for example this one (btw, it was described "plain stupid" by Kevin):

Quote:

---

"God changes not what is within people until people change what is in themselves."

---

I'd rather say, the intellectual backup was faded away.

With Sufi, the problem that it was virtually lost. The rest became shallow words, which perfectly indulge modern people nonetheless.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 211

(9/19/02 22:09)

Reply

Re: The Wisdom of the Koran

---

Kevin wrote:

Quote:

---

Bondi wrote to David:

Your problem is...

---

Actually, I addressed it to you, also. But it doesn't matter, anyway. :)
(English has the same word for singular and plural: "you". Perhaps I should have written 'you two' or such.)

Quote:

---

If the Koran is an esoteric teaching, then one must say that it is very, very poor.

On the other hand, if the Koran is an "external" or "exoteric" teaching, "made for the masses" so that they might not "stray far away from truth" - then how can that be?

If something is "external" to Truth, then it is not Truth: it is false. Given that such an "exoteric" teaching is false, does it yet succeed in keeping the masses "not too far away from truth"? I have personally yet to meet a Muslim who is "not too far away from truth". Every Muslim I have met is nowhere even remotely close to Truth.

In any case, what is there in the Koran, specifically, which is "close to Truth", or has the effect of keeping people close to Truth? Precious little, as I far as I can see.

If I wanted to be reminded of the direction in which Truth lies, the Koran would certainly not be my choice of reading.

If you want ordinary ignorant people to become "close to truth" then you must encourage them to reason things through, and think for themselves, and to enjoy thinking. The Koran does none of this whatsoever. Threatening people with hell for not being a "believer" is no help to anyone.

---

Basically, I agree. To be short: Koran directed to people who does not in any way wanted to be reminded to Truth. That's the reason for threatening them with more and more terrible things, I suppose. Without esoterism, there are no such thing as exoterism, either. Exoterism has no use without the backup of esoterism; an élite, for example, which keeps the light of Truth shining. We can see the complete lack of such an intellectual élite nowadays.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 728

(9/19/02 23:30)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Are three people enough to form a herd?

---

Actually one person is enough, which is the point; a point which you'll probably never get.

Dan Rowden

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 232

(9/19/02 23:58)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Thomas: Are three people enough to form a herd?

Dan: Actually one person is enough, which is the point; a point which you'll probably never get.

I will believe it if you, David, and Kevin line up, say "Moo", and live on grassy plants for the rest of the week.

Cheers, Thomas

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 319

(9/20/02 0:12)

Reply

Re: Islam

Thomas: Are three people enough to form a herd?

Dan: Actually one person is enough, which is the point; a point which you'll probably never get.

You'll never live this down Dan! (:D)

How ironic!

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 78(9/20/02 0:13)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> David: Seriously, the only way that irrationality and insanity can be attacked is by demonstrating the value and benefits of truthfulness, which is the main reason why Genius Forum was created in the first place. Yes, I agree. So it's not Islam (nor even Christianity) that needs to go, per se, but ignorance--for there is certainly much ignorance beyond Islam. And, really, you've just mentioned the only real means of recovery above. I, for one, am really glad this forum exists. I've been given some new insights from several people here and am developing quite a booklist. For that I am certainly grateful, even if still a little abstract and vague! For now. |

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 380

(9/20/02 11:03)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

I was away for a day because my telephone was disconnected. I am only now reading what has been posted over the past couple of days.

One thing that I pointed out that has been ignored here is the fact that it is not only Islam that perpetuates ignorance in Islamic countries. As I have shown, Pakistan has had periods of progressive leadership -- especially the leadership of Ali Bhutto. It is notable that during his tenure as prime minister, certain Islamic customs were very relaxed. At that time, the Pakistani people were looking to progress. They were looking toward the prospect of entering the modern world. Under Bhutto, they gained nuclear power for electricity.

The US did not care for the progress that Pakistan was making. It was not in the interest of the US and its allies to have Pakistan progress toward the same standard of modernity that is enjoyed by the US and most of Europe and Australia. There is much evidence that Bhutto was killed by the CIA. The next leader was Zia who was very repressive.

Yes, of course, the great ignorance in Muslim countries is reprehensible. How easy it is to point one's fingers at it and declare that it should be eradicated from the face of the earth as though it could be zapped away with a ray gun.

The truth is that, when progress has been wanted, it has been stopped and it has not been stopped only by Islamic fundamentalists. It has been stopped by the progressive west. Much of the religious zeal that is integral in the Middle East and Southwest Asia today is not religious zeal as much as it is pure hatred.

Why do they hate us? They hate us because we want them oppressed. They hate us because, when they have progressed, that progress has been thwarted. They resort to religious fanaticism and murder when they have been allowed no other tools.

I have known many Pakistanis as friends in my life. They are a decent people. No, I have never known a Pakistani whom I could consider wise but I have never known an American whom I could consider wise. I don't believe that Judaism or Christianity or Buddhism leads to wisdom more than Islam. If this was so, then, there would be many more wise or potentially wise people in the world. I do not see them.

This Muslim Monster we now see in our midst is not merely the product of Islam. It is our monster as well. We have fed it for decades. As long as it was a beast that was not on our front steps, we did not mind feeding it. Now that the monster has made its presence well known in the United States, we cry, "Kill it! Kill it!"

Of course, we now have no choice but to do so. The proposed US war with Iraq is for this purpose only. Saddam Hussein is not an Islamic fundamentalist. He is merely a dictator. But he is the last Islamic voice of defiance.

If the US succeeds in the killing of Saddam Hussein, what then? If, after Saddam's death, fundamentalist hatred recedes and there again emerges some seeds of progress and secular modernity in the Middle East and Southwest Asia, will we allow it to grow or will we chop it down at its mere beginning and, again, feed the monster?

There are secular Muslims in the world -- many of them -- intelligent people who want to see their countries become modern and wealthy; who have no desire to live under strict Shariah according to fundamentalist ignorance anymore than I could want to live under strict Christian fundamentalism.

Christian fundamentalism has a strong voice in the United States, especially under George Bush. In the great swoon over the atrocities committed by the Islamists in the United States, the fundamentalism of the West can be overlooked.

Faizi

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 731

(9/20/02 13:48)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

Thomas: Are three people enough to form a herd?

Dan: Actually one person is enough, which is the point; a point which you'll probably never get.

Zag: You'll never live this down Dan! (:D) How ironic!

---

Sorry, what's there to live down? What I said is perfectly correct. You must suffer from a total lack of comprehension of the nature of herd-think to not see my point. Herd-think is all about the egotistical need of the individual for the support of others. That need only has to exist in the person's head for herd-think to be operating. It doesn't necessitate an actual physical relationship to others.

Must a romantic be involved with an actual woman to be a romantic?

Dan Rowden

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 328
(9/20/02 14:57)

Reply

----

---

What you said is not 'perfectly' correct at all. One person is enough to form a member of a herd but not a herd itself.

Leyla R

Registered User
Posts: 85
(9/20/02 15:00)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I believe the idea is that one person is enough to form a herd because of herd-think. What do you think?

drowden

Forum Host
Posts: 737
(9/20/02 15:35)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Yes, that's basically the point.

The herd mentality is all about the absence of true individuality. Thomas tried valiantly, but vainly, to imply that because myself, David Quinn and Kevin Solway agree about a number of things that that suggests a "herd" in action. It doesn't and the implication is foolish and ignorant. People can agree on facts of existence without that being expressive of herd-think.

It does not express a herd mentality, for instance, that everyone agrees that winter in Canberra is fuckin' cold.

Dan Rowden

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 331
(9/20/02 16:47)

Reply

Re: ----

---

MY point cannot be argued. One person IS NOT enough to form a herd. 'Herd-think' is a non sequitur! A contradiction in terms! a misnomer, the result of a feeling, not a thought!

Thomas Knierim

Registered User
Posts: 238
(9/20/02 16:55)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Dan: The herd mentality is all about the absence of true individuality.

And what is "true individuality" if not a collective paradigm? You are deceiving yourself.

Your history and thought is so closely knit together with that of Kevin and David that you might as well attach the "herd" label onto yourself if you (a) had the humor, and (b) would be open-minded enough to realize that such labeling is in the eye of the beholder.

Cheers, Thomas

Sapius

Registered User
Posts: 264
(9/21/02 3:38)

Reply

True Individuality

---

Quote:

---

Dan: The herd mentality is all about the absence of true individuality

---

What is "true" "individuality" but an egotistical illusion of the one who thinks he is over and above the intelligence of an ant. ;)

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 87

(9/21/02 9:27)

Reply

19¢ DIGITAL PRINTS
www.clubphoto.com

Incredible Quality Prints

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

This Muslim Monster we now see in our midst is not merely the product of Islam. It is our monster as well. We have fed it for decades. As long as it was a beast that was not on our front steps, we did not mind feeding it. Now that the monster has made its presence well known in the United States, we cry, "Kill it! Kill it!"

---

Yes.

I'd be interested to see your response to Marsha's latest reply, Kevin. Do you agree?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 384

(9/21/02 10:56)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Much of what I have written has a ring of truth to it and I also think that it deserves a serious reply from Kevin.

What I have seen mostly on this thread is not serious discussion but the usual chat.

I am ready for seriousness. The subject of Islam and the value of the Koran is a very broad topic that deserves complete seriousness of intent as I have given it.

I have found some quotes from the Koran that, though I do not rate them as wise, are better than what has been offered by Kevin as the low pinnacle of Koranic thought.

The Koran, like the Bible, is a book that has been handed down over centuries. It has much to do with history rather than the present day. In English, the Bible is far more poetic and romantic than the Koran. The Koran is straightforward and explicit.

A Christian marriage is poetic and romantic. A Muslim marriage is a business arrangement.

When I have finished compiling them into readable form, I will post my quotes from the Koran.

In the meantime, I do think that a serious reply to what I have posted is due.

Faizi

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 241

(9/21/02 14:47)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha: Much of what I have written has a ring of truth to it and I also think that it deserves a serious reply from Kevin. What I have seen mostly on this thread is not serious discussion but the usual chat.

It seems you are complaining, and probably rightly so. The absence of replies to your posts may indicate that most people are not very interested in what is going on in a country like Pakistan. I also wonder how many Americans have a concrete idea about the history and culture of countries like Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iran, or Iraq.

This kind of ignorance is becoming dangerous in view of the American foreign policy and the looming conflict between the West and the Islamic world. Unfortunately, I have to admit my own ignorance of the Islam here. It never interested me much, but maybe this will change, since it's becoming a global issue, and Europe is already deeply involved -and split- over it.

I have respect for Musharraf in view of his leadership. He is facing extreme difficulties at all fronts; with India, with the West, and with the fundamentalists in his own country. I think that the mere act of keeping balance in this situation is an achievement. Hamid Karzai's job may be even harder, since he deals with very rudimentary problems, such as keeping foreign aid funds from going down the drain and preventing his country from sinking back into chaos. I wish the world would put as much attention to these political processes as it did to bombing the mickey out of the Taliban.

Cheers, Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 90

(9/21/02 15:10)

Reply

Re: Islam

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

. . . it is not only Islam that perpetuates ignorance in Islamic countries.

---

Yes, but this thread, as I see it, is discussing mainly how Islam (and the Koran) perpetuates ignorance.

Quote:

---

The truth is that, when progress has been wanted, it has been stopped and it has not been stopped only by Islamic fundamentalists. It has been stopped by the progressive west.

---

I don't know whether the West has prevented progress in Islamic countries. I would need to see hard evidence. If it were not for the West it is possible that Islamic countries might be even more backward than they are now. But the question here, in this thread, is not whether Western capitalism is stupid, but whether Islam is.

Quote:

---

There are secular Muslims in the world -- many of them -- intelligent people who want to see their countries become modern and wealthy; who have no desire to live under strict Shariah according to fundamentalist ignorance anymore than I could want to live under strict Christian fundamentalism.

---

Yes, but my concern is with the Koran itself - the very basis of Islam. Is the Koran a book of wisdom? I don't think so. And what good is a religious book that is not a book of wisdom?

Edited by: ksolway at: 9/21/02 4:42:14 pm

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 93

(9/21/02 17:41)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

I think it becomes difficult, perhaps even unwise, to discuss how Islam perpetuates ignorance considering the political status quo. It is not a balanced topic for discussion in this light and far from a 'middle-way' approach to truthfulness.

I have more to say, but I have to rush out for the moment.

Until then...

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 977

(9/21/02 18:00)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Thomas wrote (to Dan Rowden):

Quote:

---

Your history and thought is so closely knit together with that of Kevin and David that you might as well attach the "herd" label onto yourself if you (a) had the humor, and (b) would be open-minded enough to realize that such labeling is in the eye of the beholder.

---

Only in the sense that Einstein, Bohr, and Heisenberg were part of a herd.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 978

(9/21/02 18:10)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

I think it becomes difficult, perhaps even unwise, to discuss how Islam perpetuates ignorance considering the political status quo. It is not a balanced topic for discussion in this light and far from a 'middle-way' approach to truthfulness.

---

There is nothing inherently wrong with discussing Islam and its shortcomings. It is part of the Universe, just like anything else.

If we start to censor ourselves because of "the political status quo" or whatever, then in effect we are handing over control of our lives to the ignoramuses who are involved in political life. We bowing down to their dishonest values and curbing our own right to speak and think freely. What is the good of that?

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 94

(9/21/02 19:56)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

There is nothing inherently wrong with discussing Islam and its shortcomings. It is part of the Universe, just like anything else.

---

I agree. Q: Is there anything inherently wise?

Quote:

---

If we start to censor ourselves because of "the political status quo" or whatever, then in effect we are handing over control of our lives to the ignoramuses who are involved in political life. We bowing down to their dishonest values and curbing our own right to speak and think freely. What is the good of that?

---

It was not my intention to censor. Rather it was to indicate the inevitable direction toward which such a discussion would travel.

Whose ignorance do we bow down to when our perspective is limited?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 387

(9/22/02 0:00)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

It seems you are complaining, and probably rightly so. The absence of replies to your posts may indicate that most people are not very interested in what is going on in a country like Pakistan. I also wonder how many Americans have a concrete idea about the history and culture of countries like Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iran, or Iraq.

---

But it is not simply about Pakistan. I offered some of the past leadership of Pakistan as an example only. There are many other examples of good leadership in the Third World that were not allowed to flourish.

It is not only Americans who do not have a concrete idea of the struggle of the Third World. Obviously, such ignorance is very wide spread.

I cannot write again until this evening.

Faizi

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 979

(9/22/02 8:39)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

Is there anything inherently wise?

---

Sages and their actions are inherently wise. That is to say, anyone who is conscious of Reality.

Quote:

---

DQ: If we start to censor ourselves because of "the political status quo" or whatever, then in effect we are handing over control of our lives to the ignoramuses who are involved in political life. We bowing down to their dishonest values and curbing our own right to speak and think freely. What is the good of that?

LR: It was not my intention to censor. Rather it was to indicate the inevitable direction toward which such a discussion would travel.

---

Which is?

Quote:

---

Whose ignorance do we bow down to when our perspective is limited?

---

Our own, obviously. But in what way are the participants in this thread ignorant of the nature of Islam?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 388

(9/22/02 12:19)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

I have taken these quotations from various places on the Internet. I have given no credit. Anyone can easily find the sites I have quoted here.

I do not offer these as quotations of great wisdom from the most wise book in the world. I do think that it is very notable that it can be said that much is lost in the translation of the Koran from Arabic to English. There is not much poetry to the Koran as there is poetry in most translations of the Bible. The New Testament of the Bible particularly has great romantic appeal. Jesus appears as a hero persecuted by "bad men." He is a miracle worker; extremely gentle; lovingly expressive toward children. He encourages his followers to "turn the other cheek" and to "love one's neighbor as oneself" and to "do unto others only as you would have done unto you" and "father forgive them for they know not what they do." In the end, he gets hung by the bad men but that's all right because he has died so that those who believe in him may have everlasting life.

In short, he was the ultimate woman.

The prophet of Islam, Mohammed, on the other hand, was a far more pragmatic personality. He married a businesswoman who was about fifteen years older than himself and he lived comfortably in such a way that afforded him time for thinking. He took several other wives after her death. One of them was Ayesha who was a warrior and who led men into battle.

Mohammed was not a miracle worker and he did not preach love. He preached a very practical approach to God -- Nature; an approach with no romance; no poetry; no heroism; no martyrdom; no promise of salvation; no forgiveness for sins. Above all, he was a secularist in his time and a modifier for decadence. He preached brotherhood for all men and women, no matter their color and no matter their circumstances of birth.

One's covenant with God in Islam is a covenant between oneself and one's Maker; the Supreme Father; Ultimate Will. There is no soft Messiah to make that covenant for you. There is no beautiful, slender, innocent creature on a cross to die for your sins. In Islam, you answer for your sins. You are responsible and you alone will witness before God your transgressions of limits. You will answer to your own Karma.

It was the intent of Islam to unite mankind under the auspices of One God; to erase all boundaries of religious argument and difference; all boundaries of race and creed. It was also the intent of Islam to promote knowledge and learning.

One submits oneself completely to the will of God. One recognizes that one is small; that self is finite; that self is nothing. One does for Allah as one does for the Universe; the Infinite. One submits himself to the vastness of the Universe as a mere speck of dust on a mere speck of dust within a mere speck of dust. Only God is great and only God is just.

Screw Cat Stevens. I never liked him. It is preposterous to suppose that Cat Stevens could know the will of God and it is preposterous for him to say of Salman Rushdie that Rushdie must die for his writing of fiction. Cat Stevens spoke out in fear and ignorance as did many Muslims on the question of Rushdie; fear of the hypocrisy of the fundamentalists. A fundamentalist in any religion is one who puts himself above the will of God. A fundamentalist is a blasphemer who feeds on the ignorance of man.

It is as preposterous to suggest Cat Stevens -- or bin Laden or Ayatollah Khomeini -- as a fair representative of Islam as it is to suggest Jerry Falwell as a fair representative for essential Christianity; as it is to put forth the example of most practicing Buddhists as a fair example of Buddhism. Unlike most people on this forum, I do not believe that Buddhism is a better religion. It is a religion like other religions with essential teachings that may be worthwhile but also with many faults. When I say that I am not religious, I am not religious. I do not believe in the concept of religion, no matter the value of its essential teachings.

Only a rational man could be a fair representative of Christianity and only a rational man could be a fair representative of Islam or of Buddhism.

Mohammed Jinnah was such a rational man and Ali Bhutto and Mussharaf as was the prophet, Muhammad and I'sa bin Maryam and Ibriham and Daoud.

There is much ignorance in Islam as there is much ignorance in Christianity. Fundamentalist Christians constantly cite the Bible in disfavor of homosexuals and others. No rational man could follow completely the teachings of the Bible just as no rational man could follow the teachings of the Koran. It is the essential teachings of either that the rational man will recognize and forbear. The rest is ignorance that may have made some iota of sense within a historical context but that makes no sense today.

Much of what is written in the Koran is a code of conduct meant to bring together many varying sects and tribes. Much of it is simplistic and says no more than, "Don't beat your wife" or "Don't defacate in the Mosque" and "Don't eat unclean food" and "Don't eat with the bare hand you use to clean your butt" and "Take a bath."

I believe that it is rational to submit oneself completely to the will of God. I think that it is rational to know and to understand that, no matter the greatness of one's thought, it is nothing in comparison to the vastness of the Universe; Infinity. In this way, I can somewhat appreciate the Muslim's ritual of prayer. It is not a piteous offering nor an egotistical offering as is Christian prayer -- "God give me or God grant me or Dear Jesus, give me strength." It is an exercise in sublimation to that which is all powerful. If there is poetry in Islam, it is in the call to prayer and that is something that is better heard and seen than written.

"In the case of the Quran there is also the problem of translation. The most beautiful lines of Shakespeare frequently sound banal in another language because little of the poetry can be conveyed in a foreign idiom; and Arabic is a language that is especially difficult to translate. Even Arabs who speak English fluently have said that when they read the Quran in an English translation, they feel that they are reading an entirely different book."

Arabic is a language of pleasing sound. It is filled with the sound of "la" or

"li." The sound of the syllable "la" is relaxing and comforting to the human being. It involves the touching of the tongue to the roof of the mouth and this is soothing.

"La illah ilallah Muhammed dir rasulillah," for example, or "Asalomolikum" and "Bismillah."

Islam is not a religion of hate and ignorance. It is a religion like Christianity and Judaism, fraught with incongruities and ambiguities and codes of conduct suitable for their times. The backwardness exhibited by Muslims in many countries in opposition to the United States was not the intention of essential Islam. The intent of Islam was to raise up his people to civilization; to the best standards of life; all people.

You speak like a Sahib, Kevin. You look like a Sahib. You snub your nose like a Sahib. Your attitude is extremely British. You are not better than Rudyard Kipling. You go to the land but you have no understanding of the people.

Wisdom is not something held exclusively for the white. It is available to all people if they will seek it. Wisdom does not speak only English or only the language of the Anglicans. Your beloved Buddha was from India. Jesus was brown, at least, if not Negroid.

I can tell you that you cannot understand the one unless you thoroughly have walked in the path of the other. Black is white through understanding.  $A=A$  is not a mathematical equation. It is truth.

Intentionally blocking out the beliefs of much of the world's population is an act of ignorance as much as is the blocking out of the Twenty-first Century by religious zealots.

Hate is not a religion. Hate is hate and there are reasons for such hate. I strongly suggest that you make a study of the reasons for hatred from Pakistanis and Yemanese and Egyptians and the reasons for the recent upsurge of fundamentalism in these countries.

You have said that this discussion is not a discussion about the reasons for hatred of Islamics for the West but that it is a discussion of the ignorance put forth in the Koran and the ignorance of the followers of the Koran. This premise blatantly ignores ignorance.

Ignorance is not different from ignorance. A does not equal B. Your ignorance is not different from the ignorance of others.

Despite the injections of chat into this thread, this is a very broad discussion and one from which, despite the interruptions of my personal life, I will not back down until I am satisfied that you, as one who has put forth his highly enlightened mind as an example, has an understanding that ignorance is at work on both sides thoroughly and that this is the tragedy of the world.

You have a wonderfully analytic mind when it comes to small discussions of mechanics, Kevin. But, as you have exhibited here, you have a bad habit of backing down from "big" discussions. My best surmise is that you are lazy.

Because this post is overly long, I will work on the quotes I have collected from the Koran and post them later tonight or tomorrow evening.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/22/02 12:31:06 pm

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 389(9/22/02 13:06)Reply  | Quotes from Muhammed <hr/> These are quotes from Muhammed: The ink of the scholar is more holy than the blood of the martyr. The best of friends is one who is best in behavior and character. The love of the world is the root of all evil. The most excellent Jihad is that for the conquest of self. Do not exceed bounds in praising me, as the Christians do in praising Jesus, the son of Mary, by calling Him God, and the Son of God; I am only the Lord's servant; then call me the servant of God and His messenger. Assist your brother Muslim, whether he be an oppressor or oppressed. "But how shall we do it when he is an oppressor?" inquired a companion. Muhammad replied, "Assisting an oppressor consists in forbidding and withholding him from oppression." He dieth not who giveth life to learning. Whosoever honoreth the learned, honoreth me. The Messenger of God was asked, "What is the greatest vice of man?" |

He said, "You must not ask me about vice, but ask about virtue;" and he repeated this three times, after which he said, "Know ye! The worst of men is a bad learned man, and a good learned man is the best."

Verily God doth not taketh away knowledge from the hands of His servants; but taketh it by taking away the learned; so that when no learned men remain, the ignorant will be placed at the head of affairs. Causes will be submitted to their decision, they will pass sentence without knowledge, will err themselves, and lead others into error.

An hour's contemplation is better than a year's adoration.

Philosophy is the stray camel of the Faithful, take hold of it wherever ye come across it.

Go in quest of knowledge even unto China.

Seek knowledge from the cradle to the grave.

The knowledge from which no benefit is derived is like a treasure from which no charity is bestowed in the way of the Lord.

Do you know what sappeth the foundation of Islam, and ruineth it? The errors of the learned destroy it, the disputations of the hypocrite, and the orders of kings who have lost the road.

To spend more time in learning is better than spending more time praying; the support of religion is abstinence. It is better to teach knowledge one hour in the night than to pray all night.

Whoever seeketh knowledge and findeth it, will get two rewards; one of them the reward for desiring it, and the other for attaining it; therefore, even if he do not attain it, for him is one reward.

One learned man is harder on the devil than a thousand ignorant worshippers.

The pursuit of knowledge is a divine commandment for every Muslim; and to waste knowledge on those who are unworthy of it is like putting pearls, jewels, and gold on the necks of swine.

That person who shall pursue the path of knowledge, God will direct him to the path of Paradise; and verily the superiority of a learned man over an ignorant worshipper is like that of the full moon over all the stars.

He who knoweth his own self, knoweth God.

Verily the best of God's servants are just and learned kings; and verily the worst are bad and ignorant kings.

To listen to the words of the learned, and to instill into others the lessons of science, is better than religious exercises.

He who leaveth home in search of knowledge, walketh in the path of God.

One hour's meditation on the work of the Creator is better than seventy years of prayer.

The acquisition of knowledge is a duty incumbent on every Muslim, male and female.

Acquire knowledge. It enableth its possessor to distinguish right from wrong; it lighteth the way to Heaven; it is our friend in the desert, our society in solitude, our companion when friendless; it guideth us to happiness; it sustaineth us in misery; it is an ornament among friends, and an armour against enemies.

With knowledge man riseth to the heights of goodness and to a noble position, associateth with sovereigns in this world, and attaineth to the perfection of happiness in the next.

Learn to know thyself.

The calamity of knowledge is forgetfulness; and to waste knowledge is to speak of it to the unworthy. Who are the learned? They who practise what they know.

God hath not created anything better than Reason, or anything more perfect, or more beautiful than Reason; the benefits which God giveth are on its account; and understanding is by it, and God's wrath is caused by disregard of it.

Say what is true, although it may be bitter and displeasing to people.

Be in the world like a traveler, or like a passer on, and reckon yourself as of the dead.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/22/02 1:20:30 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 390

(9/22/02 13:47)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

If we start to censor ourselves because of "the political status quo" or whatever, then in effect we are handing over control of our lives to the ignoramuses who are involved in political life. We bowing down to their dishonest values and curbing our own right to speak and think freely. What is the good of that?

---

Absolutely, I agree with this. It is the height of ignorance to neglect to discuss something that is extremely pertinent.

It is in the interest of knowledge and enlightenment to discuss Islam and Christianity and Judaism and their political ramifications.

The promising clouds of war with Iraq are gathering thickly here in the United States. It is plain that it is only the matter of a little time before the bombing begins.

I feel some measure of relief in the knowledge that my country will not be villified for its aggression as is the usual case. Because we have been charged with wiping Islam off the face of the earth, I feel sure that this forum will applaud our efforts.

The Israelis with US support now has Arafat trapped in his compound and it is being speculated that bin Laden is dead. Get rid of Saddam and the opposition should be roundly defeated.

With any luck at all, this will be accomplished before Christmas and there will be peace on earth.

I wonder where the Americans will go next? Is there anything left to conquer?

Faizi

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 243

(9/22/02 16:40)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha: The Israelis with US support now has Arafat trapped in his compound and it is being speculated that bin Laden is dead. Get rid of Saddam and the opposition should be roundly defeated.

According to the latest news it looks like Arafat's compound will be rubble tomorrow. I hope Sharon knows what he is doing.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 91

(9/22/02 16:46)

Reply

Re: Quotes from Muhammed

---

Quote:

---

These are quotes from Muhammed: . . .

---

These quotes are pretty good, but I don't think you will find them in the Koran.

Can you find out which books they come from, and how important those books are to Muslims?

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 213

(9/22/02 19:26)

Reply

(to Faizi)

---

Marsha,

I do find your posts about Islam interesting, decent, proper and fair enough. I do agree with the whole of your opinion on the matter. Of course, I would find many things in your posts to argue with, for example Christ did not make ourselves free of the inherent sin, Buddhism is not a religion, and it is pointless to set religions and 'guessed religions' against each other, etc. etc... Let's forget that. You've got a basis that every man would or should envy. I suggest you to leave behind thinking about 'man' as an equal of some fictitious 'Rational Being'. It's a deadlock, a true man is no more rational than he is emotional - that's why he is true. For example, what about the 'love of Wisdom'? It's just fashionable to contrast these two aspects, 'reason' and 'emotion', in a desperate response to the modern world's materialism and

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                   | matriarchy as though 'rationality' would be an equal to spirituality. Nonsense. Or, as you wrote: ignorance on both sides. And both believe themselves wise.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 391(9/23/02 0:12)Reply    | Islam <hr/> These are the sayings of Muhammad as compiled in the hadiths or ahadiths. The hadiths are considered to be as important to Muslims as the Koran. They are the teachings and sayings of the Prophet. I chose the ones that appealed to me. There are others that I find less appealing; just as there are sayings of Nietzsche that I find more and less appealing. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 348(9/23/02 1:47)Reply                                                                                    | How about this one? <hr/> " War.One can say against war that it makes the victor stupid and the vanquished malicious. In favour of war, one can say that it barbarizes through both these effects and thus makes man more natural; war is the sleep or wintertime of culture: man emerges from it with more strength, both for the good and the bad." -Nietzsche (444 human all too human.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 392(9/23/02 1:53)Reply  | Islam <hr/> I have not yet completed my compilation of quotes from the Koran. I came across these comments from non-Muslims and I am posting them because I think they are relevant to this discussion. It has been said here that Islam is a religion of complete and abject ignorance. "My choice of Muhammad to lead the list of the world's most influential persons may surprise some readers and may be questioned by others, but he was the only man in history who was supremely successful on both the religious and secular levels."(M.H. Hart, THE 100: A RANKING OF THE MOST INFLUENTIAL PERSONS IN HISTORY, New York, 1978, p. 33) |

THOMAS CARLYLE in his HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP wrote of Muhammad: "how one man single-handedly, could weld warring tribes and wandering Bedouins into a most powerful and civilized nation in less than two decades."

Mahatma Gandhi: "Some one has said that Europeans in South Africa dread the advent Islam -- Islam that civilized Spain, Islam that took the torch light to Morocco and preached to the world the Gospel of brotherhood. The Europeans of South Africa dread the Advent of Islam. They may claim equality with the white races. They may well dread it, if brotherhood is a sin. If it is equality of colored races then their dread is well founded."

"There was once a civilization that was the greatest in the world. It was able to create a continental super-state that stretched from ocean to ocean, and from northern climes to tropics and deserts. Within its dominion lived hundreds of millions of people, of different creeds and ethnic origins. One of its languages became the universal language of much of the world, the bridge between the peoples of a hundred lands. Its armies were made up of people of many nationalities, and its military protection allowed a degree of peace and prosperity that had never been known. The reach of this civilization's commerce extended from Latin America to China, and everywhere in between.

And this civilization was driven more than anything, by invention. Its architects designed buildings that defied gravity. Its mathematicians created the algebra and logarithms that would enable the building of computers, and the creation of encryption. Its doctors examined the human body, and found new cures for disease. Its astronomers looked into the heavens, named the stars, and paved the way for space travel and exploration. Its writers created thousands of stories. Stories of courage, romance and magic. Its poets wrote of love, when others before them were too steeped in fear to think of such things.

When other nations were afraid of ideas, this civilization thrived on them, and kept them alive. When censors threatened to wipe out knowledge from past civilizations, this civilization kept the knowledge alive, and passed it on to others.

While modern Western civilization shares many of these traits, the civilization I'm talking about was the Islamic world from the year 800 to 1600, which included the Ottoman Empire and the courts of Baghdad, Damascus and Cairo, and enlightened rulers like Suleiman the Magnificent.

Although we are often unaware of our indebtedness to this other civilization, its gifts are very much a part of our heritage. The technology industry would not exist without the contributions of Arab mathematicians. Sufi poet-philosophers like Rumi challenged our notions of self and truth. Leaders like Suleiman contributed to our notions of tolerance and civic leadership.

And perhaps we can learn a lesson from his example: It was leadership based on meritocracy, not inheritance. It was leadership that harnessed the full capabilities of a very diverse population—that included Christianity, Islamic, and Jewish traditions. This kind of enlightened leadership — leadership that nurtured culture, sustainability, diversity and courage — led to 800 years of invention and prosperity.

In dark and serious times like this, we must affirm our commitment to building societies and institutions that aspire to this kind of greatness. More than ever, we must focus on the importance of leadership— bold acts of leadership and decidedly personal acts of leadership." CEO of Hewlett Packard Carly Fiorina

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/23/02 3:02:10 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 983

(9/23/02 7:56)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha is right in saying that Islam doesn't have a monopoly on religious fundamentalism. Christianity and Buddhism have their fair share as well. But it seems to be a lot more prevalent in Islam, and this is mainly due to the very nature of what Islam is - namely, a religion of submission.

Some people would argue my view of Islam is an illusion created by the Western media's focus upon Muslim extremists. But I have my doubts about this. Even more moderate forms of Islam demand open displays of submission from its adherents. For example, everyone must bow down together towards Mecca and pray in unison five times a day. This alone fosters a fundamentalist, submissive mindset.

Marsha should know from first-hand experience how restrictive Islam culture is on individual rights and freedoms. We can't just pretend that Islamic culture is equal to Christian or Buddhist culture in this regard. Clearly, there are fundamental differences. Islam resembles medieval Christianity, if anything.

It would be interesting to know how prevalent atheism is in Islamic countries. To me, that would constitute a reliable indicator of how much freedom its citizens actually possess. Do you have any data on this, Marsha? I would wager that it is extremely small. There seems to be very little diversity in Islamic countries.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 986

(9/23/02 8:47)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

You have a wonderfully analytic mind when it comes to small discussions of mechanics, Kevin. But, as you have exhibited here, you have a bad habit of backing down from "big" discussions. My best surmise is that you are lazy.

---

Kevin might argue that the "small discussions of mechanics" are actually dealing with the big questions, while the "backing down from the big questions" - such as speculating on current affairs and discussing politics - is his way of saying that they are trivial.

In other words, his priorities are different from yours.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 393

(9/23/02 10:59)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

In other words, his priorities are different from yours.

---

I have enjoyed reading some of Kevin's posts. My mind is also very analytic but I am not technical.

I have not discussed current events here, David. It is obvious that the political ramifications of Islam and Christianity and Judaism are closely related to the matter of religion. Indeed, I don't think you can separate politics and religion in relation to current conflicts in the world.

The Koran says that the only person who could lead a Jihad would have to be the successor to the prophecy. Bin Laden, then, and other Islamic terrorists are under the delusion that they are direct messengers of God. They have wrongly interpreted the Koran.

Other than the possibility of laziness, I have also interpreted some of Kevin's silences as periods of listening and thinking.

He started this thread because he wanted to know something. I am not now Muslim and I was not born into Islam so there are plenty of gaps in my knowledge. But I do know more about it than the average person who has had no contact with it at all.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 394
(9/23/02 11:14)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

The rate of atheism in Islamic countries is between one and three percent of the population.

Faizi

drowden

Forum Host
Posts: 738
(9/23/02 12:08)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Zag wrote:

Quote:

---

MY point cannot be argued.

---

It is wrong, therefore it can.

Quote:

---

One person IS NOT enough to form a herd. 'Herd-think' is a non sequitur! A contradiction in terms! a misnomer, the result of a feeling, not a thought!

---

Herd members need only be conceptual, not empirical for the herd mentality to be expressed and for a herd to exist.

Let's imagine a planet in some far flung corner of the universe, one that is entirely mechanistic - run by machines; now, let's imagine that these machines, for whatever reason, create a biological entity, a humanoid.

Now, this "person" is the only one that exists on the planet, and, as far as he knows, he's the only one that exists anywhere. According to you, he cannot express the herd mentality, but the truth is that as soon as the desire arises in his mind for the existence of entities like himself, the herd mentality is operating and a herd exists, regardless of whether the other members are conceptual in nature.

If you want to quibble over the point of conceptual entities being real, then that's fine, by my primary concern is the nature of the herd mentality, and it literally only takes one person for that to be enacted and for thought, individuality and wisdom to "suffer" as a consequence. And it doesn't have to be expressed towards other people, it can be dogs and cats and pets of any kind - in fact, anything that we can bounce our egos off.

Dan Rowden

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 96

(9/23/02 12:30)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David,

Quote:

---

DQ: Sages and their actions are inherently wise. That is to say, anyone who is conscious of Reality.

---

Is this Reality not brought to consciousness through the middle-way?

Quote:

---

LR: It was not my intention to censor. Rather it was to indicate the inevitable direction toward which such a discussion would travel.

DQ: Which is?

---

Right here, if only by virtue of my presence which comes with certain knowledge and experience.

Quote:

---

LR: Whose ignorance do we bow down to when our perspective is limited?

DQ: Our own, obviously. But in what way are the participants in this thread ignorant of the nature of Islam?

---

In the way that certain 'participants' appear to infer that burning the 'unwise' books of Islam would rid the world of ignorance perpetuated by Islam. Perhaps I have misunderstood?

Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/23/02 12:36:27 pm

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 739

(9/23/02 12:41)

Reply

Esoteric and Exoteric

---

I think this discussion of Islam and the degree of ignorance it brings into the world, in contrast to other religions, revolves, somewhat, around the two different faces of any religion: the esoteric and the exoteric. The outer face of Islam is pure rubbish, pure herd and dementia, as is the outer face of Judaism and Christianity (as is, for that matter, the face of any herdly group at all); the Exoteric dimension of any religion is more about controlling the behaviours and mechanisms of a given population than anything else. It's about ritual, not mind.

The Esoteric dimension of the "big three" sometimes has something worthwhile to say (or at least individuals within it).

Personally, I find all the religions to be equally worthless, at least in their outer expression. What is of worth with regard to the "inner" is a matter of sorting the wheat from the chaff. The "random" - more philosophical than religious - quotes that Marsha supplied aren't all that bad at all (but I suspect came from various Sufis and not Muhammed himself).

The extent of the spiritual value of Esoteric Islam is a question some might like to explore; however, my admittedly limited experience of it does not lead to me to want to go further in my personal exploration of it, or to particularly recommend it. Perhaps there have been some Islamic Meister Eckharts. I don't know. Perhaps someone does. I think it's entirely possible there have been and I see no reason there wouldn't have been.

And I think it is entirely worth making the point that the social "progress" one may ascribe to "Chistian" nations has had Sweet-F-A to do with Christianity and everything to do with secular forces within these societies. The idea, which many seem to hold, of Christianity as a meaningful force for "civization" and Islam not, is pure codswallop.

Dan Rowden

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 395

(9/23/02 13:41)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Quote:

---

The "random" - more philosophical than religious - quotes that Marsha supplied aren't all that bad at all (but I suspect came from various Sufis and not Muhammed himself).

---

No, they are sayings of Muhammad. They are not random but are a part of collections that have been handed down over generations in the form of hadiths and ahadiths.

The sayings of Muhammad are as important to Muslims as the Koran. The Koran is the religion itself. The hadiths are the personal wisdom of the prophet.

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 350

(9/23/02 18:49)

Reply

-----

---

Dan:--"Herd members need only be conceptual for a herd to exist"

Wrong.

MY point had nothing to do with what you 'wrongly' call 'herd-think' and more correctly call 'herd-mentality', rather it was that one person is not enough to "FORM" a herd. Your argument shows you either fail to discern between conceptual existence (which is not existence) and existence, or are ashamed to acknowledge that I was correct and you were wrong.

One person may 'belong' to a herd by their nature, but they cannot form a herd (we are talking about a herd, not herd-mentality) on their own. I take you on your initial statement. Your example of forming a herd with dogs and cats is ridiculous. If one must form a herd, it CANNOT BE with life itself, but with ones kind of life.

P.s I am not saying dogs and cats are life itself.

Edited by: suergaz at: 9/23/02 7:10:10 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 987

(9/23/02 23:03)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Sages and their actions are inherently wise. That is to say, anyone who is conscious of Reality.

LR: Is this Reality not brought to consciousness through the middle-way?

---

It depends on what is meant by the "middle-way". What do you mean by it?

Quote:

---

DQ: But in what way are the participants in this thread ignorant of the nature of Islam?

LR: In the way that certain 'participants' appear to infer that burning the 'unwise' books of Islam would rid the world of ignorance perpetuated by Islam. Perhaps I have misunderstood?

---

I've must have missed that inference. I don't think anyone here is suggesting anything that crude. We probably all realize that the ignorance perpetuated by Islam, or by any other source, can only be eliminated by the will to conquer one's inner delusions and realize the Truth. In other words, it is an inward thing that everyone needs to participate in.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 989

(9/23/02 23:23)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Marsha Faizi wrote:

Quote:

---

No, they are sayings of Muhammad. They are not random but are a part of collections that have been handed down over generations in the form of hadiths and ahadiths.

---

Are they really the sayings of Muhammad, or are they merely attributed to them? I find it difficult to reconcile those quotes with a married politician.

Perhaps it was the tradition for the hermitic sages who lived in the generations immediately following Muhammed's death to attribute their quotes to him - to avoid having their heads cut off for trying to upstage the revered prophet.

Quote:

---

The rate of atheism in Islamic countries is between one and three percent of the population.

---

How do this three percent survive? By keeping their views to themselves, one would imagine.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 98

(9/24/02 8:52)

Reply

Re: Islam

David,

Quote:

---

DQ: It depends on what is meant by the "middle-way". What do you mean by it?

---

Actually, I'm more interested in what you mean by it (and how it applies directly to this issue):

Quote:

---

DQ: Hopefully, what Shardrol means is that although the enlightened mind continues to function from its "referential coordinates" as before, it differs from the ordinary mind in that it no longer believes in the ultimate validity of these coordinates, due to its understanding of emptiness. In other words, while the enlightened mind continues to operate within duality, thus preserving the existence of its consciousness, it no longer believes the dualistic creations that it experiences in each moment are ultimately real.

---

Quote:

---

DQ: We probably all realize that the ignorance perpetuated by Islam, or by any other source, can only be eliminated by the will to conquer one's inner delusions and realize the Truth. In other words, it is an inward thing that everyone needs to participate in.

---

Yes, I believe I absolutely agree with this.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 99(9/24/02 9:04)Reply | Re: Esoteric and Exoteric <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Are they really the sayings of Muhammad, or are they merely attributed to them? I find it difficult to reconcile those quotes with a married politician. Perhaps it was the tradition for the hermitic sages who lived in the generations immediately following Muhammed's death to attribute their quotes to him - to avoid having their heads cut off for trying to upstage the revered prophet. <hr/> Perhaps. However, I find myself asking similar questions regarding Jesus. It seems the Old Testament is the common denominator of Islam, Christianity and Judaism. One would need to embark upon an honest and serious historical study in order to glean a credible and informed understanding of the above religious evolutions/revolutions. Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/24/02 9:05:50 am |

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 741

(9/24/02 10:19)

Reply

Re: -----

---

Zagreus wrote:

Quote:

---

MY point had nothing to do with what you 'wrongly' call 'herd-think' and more correctly call 'herd-mentality', rather it was that one person is not enough to "FORM" a herd. Your argument shows you either fail to discern between conceptual existence (which is not existence) and existence, or are ashamed to acknowledge that I was correct and you were wrong.

---

I don't experience shame, Zag. And I'm not sure I can take your argument seriously when you say things like "conceptual existence is not existence".

Concepts exist.

Dan Rowden

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 742

(9/24/02 10:27)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

Quote:

---

Marsha: No, they are sayings of Muhammad. They are not random but are a part of collections that have been handed down over generations in the form of hadiths and ahadiths.

David: Are they really the sayings of Muhammad, or are they merely attributed to them? I find it difficult to reconcile those quotes with a married politician.

---

Or a man who supposedly wrote the Koran. Prima facie, I would say those quotes are almost certainly just attributed to Muhammed. Then again, maybe it's the other way round and the Koran is merely attributed to him!

The bottom line in any of these situations is not so much who wrote them but whether they have worth or not in themselves. Getting to the truth of authorship is something I'd prefer to leave to historians and academics - the web weavers.

Dan Rowden

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 354
(9/24/02 12:00)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Dan, concepts exist, but not in and of themselves. Conceptual existence is not existence.

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 396
(9/24/02 12:57)

Reply

Islam

---

David Quinn,

Quote:

---

Are they really the sayings of Muhammad, or are they merely attributed to them? I find it difficult to reconcile those quotes with a married politician.

Perhaps it was the tradition for the hermitic sages who lived in the generations immediately following Muhammad's death to attribute their quotes to him - to avoid having their heads cut off for trying to upstage the revered prophet.

---

Maybe. I cannot say with absolute certainty either way. I am not a religious scholar. I am, by profession, a nurse.

As a human being, I also have to wonder if it may be possible that you, in your present condition and with your present sets of beliefs, cannot conceive of the possibility that the prophet of Islam could possibly have had any wisdom. The sayings of Muhammad are somewhat separate from the Koran. The Koran was the message of God as revealed to the prophet. Yet, the prophet was a man who was in many ways the same as other men. He had ideas and ambitions and desires in much the same way as other men. He never claimed, like Jesus, to have supernatural powers or to be the son of God.

Yet, the sayings of the man are considered to be as important in Islam as the Koran. I like the hadiths because they give a human face to the religion; a human mind. Much of the Koran was meant to pull many sects and traditions and cults into one cohesive whole that was in some agreement, however broad.

As for marriage, he was beyond marriage. He had multiple wives. It was not a marriage in modern terms; in the way that we think of marriage. He was not tied to one person. Women were, during the time of Muhammad, quite a separate issue from man. They were not considered to be less intelligent than men but they were separate. They were things that had to be cared for as possessions.

The rate of atheism in Islamic countries is between one and three percent of the population.

Quote:

---

How do this three percent survive? By keeping their views to themselves, one would imagine.

---

Pretty much, yes. In Pakistan, I can say that there is an intellectual elite that is allowed some manner of free thinking and there is also the "great hypocrisy." Many people are Muslim in name only -- Muslim not by belief but by cultural upbringing. They don't eat pork because they are religious. They don't eat pork because pork is culturally repugnant. Because of my cultural upbringing, I would be hard pressed to eat cat or dog.

Yes, except among themselves, people of a more rational nature keep their thoughts shut up -- except in the very upper classes.

I think that part of the reason for the existence of this forum is for some people to be able to express that which they cannot express openly in most society; to enjoy the freedom to express themselves openly among those who will allow it.

One of the greatest tragedies of terrorism is that it not only perpetuates murder, it also causes silence and suspicion and censorship. I used to live in a society that was grudgingly tolerant and reluctantly accepting of free thought and speech. Now, I live in a society that will arrest me because I am not of Irish descent or German descent or English descent or French or Swiss or Swedish or Finnish or Norwegian. If my skin is a little brown, I may be arrested for shaving. If I express knowledge of or sympathy for Muslims, I could be suspect. In the United States, I would not be stoned or beaten for my transgressions. I would be arrested and not granted any rights.

In some ways, stoning could be more merciful. If I was in Pakistan and I ran into the streets loudly proclaiming my adoration of George Bush, it is possible that I could be stoned. In the United States, if I ran into the streets loudly proclaiming my adoration for Saddam Hussein, I would be arrested and held with no charges indefinitely. I would become a non-person.

A little over twelve years ago, my husband and his brother and nephew were questioned and photographed by the Secret Service for driving too close to Camp David. That was during the time of George I. In the time of George W, they would have been arrested and jailed with no charges necessary. I have no doubt that they would have been held indefinitely.

After 9/11, I can understand somewhat the extreme caution. It was brown-skinned Muslims who drove planes into the World Trade Centers and the Pentagon. They were not Irishmen. It was not Frenchmen who pulled off this stunt and it was not the Japanese nor the Swiss nor the Swedes nor the German nor Australians.

When the planes hit, I felt great remorse for the West and for the East. Until that moment in history, I can say that the United States was the great melting pot of races, even with its inherent racism and jingoism. But, after these hits, things changed. The Statue of Liberty has no meaning. It is a relic.

After the liberation of the Afghan people from the Taliban, the people immediately brought forth televisions and CD players and they were relieved to be able to bring these things out. They were greatly relieved to enjoy some secular activities publicly. It is unnatural for people to exist completely in restraints of any kind. No one can be "brought" to wisdom. No one can be forced to live a life of the mind.

Even one who does select to live a life devoted to wisdom and to the mind must have some latitude for relaxation once in a while.

In antiquity, there were many persons who followed the prophet, Muhammad, around and recorded his sayings. One such person asked him if he could record his every word or if he should await such time when it could be apparent that Muhammad might impart something of wisdom. The prophet remarked that this person should record his every word -- even those imparted in anger or out of desire; for, he said, "I do not lie."

There is much in Islam, then, that I do not like. There is much in Islam that is reprehensible and deplorable. There are many Muslims whom I could not like. There are many Muslims who are criminals.

But, in his mental nakedness, there is much to like about Muhammad.

The sayings of the Prophet that I have posted are real. I have checked them against various versions of hadiths and I have seen them repeated. Again, I will tell you that I have culled the cream from the chaff. Muhammad sometimes preached pure religion and codes of conduct that I rate as dull and uninteresting and silly. I ran through several versions of his sayings and picked the best of them according to me. The man was garrulous.

It is notable that Christians and Jews have left Muslim countries in droves since about 1948. There was a time when Muslim countries supported many religious faiths and creeds so long as those faiths and creeds did not impinge on Islam.

Things are different now. There is little tolerance in Islamic societies. I don't believe that is the way Muhammad intended things.

As a side note, my husband was a strict Muslim but he believed that the Sufis were wise men. In his last illness, he consulted Sufis in Pakistan.

I do think there is much sadness in Islamic countries because I equate sadness with ignorance. I believe that an open society is more conducive to wisdom than a closed society because there are choices. Sometimes, as in a modern grocery store, there are too many choices and some people are overwhelmed and become upset. Some people become mentally disturbed by choice. Overwhelming freedom may delay wisdom but I do not think it precludes it. A society that is closed closes minds permanently.

Islam was not intended to be understood by closed minds.

Faizi

|                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowden Forum Host Posts: 745 (9/24/02 13:47) Reply                                                                                       | In and of itself? <hr/> Zag, Nothing exists "in and of itself"! Don't go getting all Kantian on me now! Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 369 (9/24/02 14:55) Reply  | Re: In and of itself? <hr/> Of course nothing exists in and of itself, which is why conceptual existence is not existence, but only a type of existence! And one person cannot form a herd damn you! One person can form a herd-mind, but this WAS NOT the issue! I am so unkantian it is shocking! |
| Leyla R Registered User Posts: 100 (9/24/02 15:26) Reply                                                                                  | Re: In and of itself? <hr/> LOL. So, suergaz, what you're saying is that herd-mentality is basically formed as a product of environment. Sounds more the likes of Marx, to me. Eh?                                                                                                                                              |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 370 (9/24/02 16:23) Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> I'm not saying that Leyla, I said what I said! No one will take me at face value since I stuck my face in here! (:D) Which Marx? groucho chico or harpo?                                                                                                                                                       |
| Leyla R Registered User Posts: 101 (9/24/02 16:28) Reply                                                                                  | Re: --- <hr/> I can't seeeeeee your flippen face, babe!! It keeps fading in and out. Geez. &lt;s&gt; Oh, and keep your damn conceptual coconuts that don't exist to yourself, next time. You DID NOT win that argument about threats!                                                                                           |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 102(9/24/02 16:36)Reply                                                                                                                       | Re: In and of itself? <hr/> Now, tell me why (if herd-mentality can be formed) one person is not enough to then form (make, produce, serve to make or produce, place in order, arrange, organise) a herd? Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/24/02 4:38:11 pm                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 372(9/24/02 17:22)Reply                                                                                                                       | ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Now, tell me why (if herd-mentality can be formed) one person is not enough to then form (make, produce, serve to make or produce, place in order, arrange, organise) a herd? <hr/> because a herd is formed by herd mind AND by number. And concerning my showing all threats are not perceived, ---there was no argument.                                                               |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 996(9/24/02 17:39)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> Leyla wrote: Quote: <hr/> DQ: Sages and their actions are inherently wise. That is to say, anyone who is conscious of Reality. LR: Is this Reality not brought to consciousness through the middle-way? DQ: It depends on what is meant by the "middle-way". What do you mean by it? LR: Actually, I'm more interested in what you mean by it (and how it applies directly to this issue): |

DQ: Hopefully, what Shardrol means is that although the enlightened mind continues to function from its "referential coordinates" as before, it differs from the ordinary mind in that it no longer believes in the ultimate validity of these coordinates, due to its understanding of emptiness. In other words, while the enlightened mind continues to operate within duality, thus preserving the existence of its consciousness, it no longer believes the dualistic creations that it experiences in each moment are ultimately real.

---

The middle way represents the intellectual path to enlightenment. One travels down this path by rejecting the idea that a dualistic position can embody the Truth.

In particular, one rejects the duality of "existence" and "non-existence", together with all of the views and beliefs that rely on either one of these dualities as a basis. For example, one rejects the idea that the Universe is either materialistic or non-materialistic in nature, that it is either temporary or eternal, that it is either subjective or objective, that things are either real or illusory, and so on. It is only by learning how to see beyond duality, as it were, that one can begin to comprehend the nature of Reality.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 215

(9/24/02 18:32)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Quote:

---

D.Q.: Are they really the sayings of Muhammad, or are they merely attributed to them? I find it difficult to reconcile those quotes with a married politician.

Perhaps it was the tradition for the hermitic sages who lived in the generations immediately following Muhammed's death to attribute their quotes to him - to avoid having their heads cut off for trying to upstage the revered prophet.

Faizi:... As a human being, I also have to wonder if it may be possible that you, in your present condition and with your present sets of beliefs, cannot conceive of the possibility that the prophet of Islam could possibly have had any wisdom...

---

Those are just speculations, David. I also say it's just your preconception to think that a married man cannot be a 'wise'. I do not agree with that.

And I note that it is a modern bias to carry the conditions of the present world over the vanished conditions of the past. Not to mention the other (cultural etc.) differences amongst various ages and locations.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 216

(9/24/02 18:41)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Dan wrote:

Quote:

---

I think this dicussion of Islam and the degree of ignorance it brings into the world, in contrast to other religions, revolves, somewhat, around the two different faces of any religion: the esoteric and the exoteric.

---

I'd make a correction here: a religion is always wholly exoteric - by definition. For the very thing a religion supposes a transcendent or an immanent 'God'. There is (there have to be) a gap between object and subject in a religion, while in esoterism the aim is to realize that the object and the subject are one.

(Or to translate it into your favourite phrase:

[David wrote] "... by learning how to see beyond duality... one can begin to comprehend the nature of Reality.")

Edited by: B0ndi at: 9/24/02 6:48:01 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 999

(9/25/02 8:36)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Bondi wrote:

Quote:

---

Those are just speculations, David. I also say it's just your preconception to think that a married man cannot be a 'wise'. I do not agree with that.

---

Can you imagine a husband saying to his wife, "The love of the world is the root of all evil". Or, "Be in the world like a traveler, or like a passer on, and reckon yourself as of the dead". She would only cringe away in fear.

Unless, of course, she perceived that he didn't really mean any of it - in which case she would laugh, give him a hug and think him a silly old fool.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 746

(9/25/02 11:26)

Reply

Iraq

---

Whilst not necessarily wanting to instigate a discussion of the issue, I found a couple of web sites that people may find interesting in terms of offering a different insight into the Iraq situation than what we're getting from western governments:

<http://www.antiwar.com/>

<http://www.freerepublic.com/forum/a3aa929d67d52.htm>

The latter one, if you read the discussion at the bottom of the page also gives a bit of insight into the level of intelligence being injected by the two sides of the argument.

Dan Rowden

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 397

(9/25/02 11:30)

Reply

Islam

---

Quote:

---

Some people would argue my view of Islam is an illusion created by the Western media's focus upon Muslim extremists. But I have my doubts about this. Even more moderate forms of Islam demand open displays of submission from its adherents. For example, everyone must bow down together towards Mecca and pray in unison five times a day. This alone fosters a fundamentalist, submissive mindset.

---

I never saw the prayers of Muslims as submissive in the way that you are thinking of submissiveness. It is not submission to a religion or to Mecca but submission to God. It is submission to the will of God. It is acknowledgment of one's smallness in the universe.

Also, it is not just bowing down. One does not simply bow down and pray. The whole process takes about fifteen or twenty minutes, not counting ablutions. I never prayed in that matter and my husband did not force me to do so. But I watched him do it many times. It is part standing, part sitting, and part putting one's head on the floor in the direction of Mecca. I particularly liked it when my daughter used to jump on his back while he was praying. She would stand with him and fold her hands like him and sit like him but, the minute he put his head on the floor, she jumped on his back -- or she would put her head down to the floor with him to try to peek under his head to see what he was doing.

Muslim prayer is a ritual that involves much more than bowing. I realize that you are thinking of it as a form of submission in the way that the rituals of a cult could be said to be submissive. I do not see the Muslim form of prayer as more submissive than the Christian taking of communion or Christian baptism.

Yet, I cannot dispute with you that there does exist a very deep hatred of Westerners in Muslim countries. This is not something that the news media has made up. Obviously, it exists in abundance. It has existed since long before the World Trade Centers were destroyed. There are many, many, many, many reasons for this hatred. It is deep-seated; and it is also true that many, many Muslims do not hate Westerners. Certainly, not all Muslims are terrorists nor supporters of terrorism.

Most Muslim immigrants to the US who become citizens also become Republican conservatives. They become Bush supporters. In light of the treatment of some Muslims in the United States under George W. Bush and his Attorney General, Ashcroft -- who is most certainly a Christian fanatic -- I find this conservatism to be ironic.

Quote:

---

Marsha should know from first-hand experience how restrictive Islam culture is on individual rights and freedoms.

---

But I never left the United States.

It is true that, if one is a Muslim, one cannot wear shorts or go to the beach wearing a bikini. I did not wear dresses either. Mostly, I wore a shelwar kameeze. A shelwar kameeze, though it does not reveal a lot of skin, can be quite sexy. I have seen many cinched tightly at the waist and bust and with very high slits on the sides. Most women I knew at that time wore make-up and jewelry that was very colorful and attractive.

My reading material was never restricted. I could read whatever I wanted to read. I listened to American radio all day.

The one way that I was restricted was that I had no American friends. Though I lived in the United States, I was completely cut off from actual contact with my culture. This was somewhat of a difficulty because since I did not speak Punjabi, I was also cut off from that culture somewhat. I could not associate much with the Pakistani women because they spoke little English. But, in a way, that suited me because I had little in common with most of them.

I had had a friend from the southern part of India who was Muslim and a woman but she was very different from the Pakistanis. Her name was Aziz and she was extremely black. Her English was excellent and her intellect was well developed. She was a nurse and I worked with her. I had occasion to defend her against the hatefulness of the American nurses -- mostly African Americans who, for reasons of their own, despised her.

I liked her because of her intellect. She was Muslim and she was not submissive in the least. She was married and her kids were mostly grown up. She had a lot of freedom. Her husband was quite white -- extremely pale. Her own grandmother was red haired and very white. Aziz was very insulted when she went to get her driver's license and they classified her as "black." Her color was black but she was not black.

She was a much more "liberated" woman than the Pakistani wives I came to know. Unfortunately, I lost contact with her when I married Faizi. Other than intellectual discourse with my husband, there was no one with whom I could converse freely.

That was my one restriction as a Muslim living among a group of Pakistani Muslims within the bounds of the United States. This is why I listened to the radio as I cooked and tended to the children. Other than books, there was no mental stimulation for me otherwise. This was before 1990 so personal computers were not in wide use. I felt in the "middle way" of two cultures and I was the only one in the "middle way." Everyone else was either American or Pakistani and those "twains" did not meet. Most people are incapable of transcending cultures. Most immigrants bring their culture with them. Effectually, they wear mental blinders to the ways of the culture to which they have immigrated. They continue to live in their own countries mentally if not physically.

It is the damnedest thing to live in the United States and to not live in the United States at the same time. Physically, you are in the US but, mentally, you are not. You look out the window and you see Americans everywhere but you are living in Pakistan. The only language you hear is Punjabi and you watch Indian movies. You wear clothing from Pakistan and you cook Pakistani food. But there are pork-eating Christians on every corner. You are observing Ramadan and celebrating Eid and, outside, it is St. Patrick's Day or people are shopping for Christmas.

It is my strong feeling that I am happy that I had the experience because the experience of living within a very separate culture from one's own culture is valuable. It is also my very strong feeling that I am happy that that time in my life came to an end. It was always my very strong feeling that it would come to an end. I never pictured myself growing old confined to the restrictions on communication with others outside of the culture of Islam.

I am a communicator. It is my purpose to communicate. I believe that communication is the way to understand; to know. If I lived in Pakistan or any other Islamic country, I would do that or die; not because I am so heroic but because the act of communicating is a necessity for me. I could not give up freedom of speech for any God and I will not give that privilege up for any country or culture or belief. I will never deny my intellect. I never did. That is the one thing that, even as a Muslim wife, I preserved. My husband, as sole recipient of my opinion, both loved and hated my intellect.

He remarked, "Begum, I married you for your mind."

My standard reply was, "I am certain that you regret your decision."

One sore point in our marriage were my trips to the park, for the sole purpose of giving my children some recreation. He was certain that I went there to flirt. It was during one of these arguments over the park that I first physically struck my husband. I had cooked supper and I was washing the dishes. He began badgering and nagging me for taking the children to the park. It was my intention to completely ignore him and I did that for several minutes as he continued to badger me. He would not be quiet. I was washing the dishes in quite a calm manner.

But, suddenly, it hit my mind that he was wrong. I was tired of hearing his harangue. I never accused him of flirting with anyone. I could not have cared less if he did flirt. I worked very hard every day in the house and I got up at five in the morning to begin the preparations of the meals and to clean and to do the wash. I was a good Muslim wife. I took the kids to the park once or twice a week because they needed to run. There was no space in our house for it. The very last thing on my mind was flirting.

When it struck me that he was wrong, I turned and I picked up a chair and I threw it at him forcefully. He was fortunate that I did not throw it at his head. It hit him in his knees and the chair bounced off and put a hole in the wall. Because I was naive, I was certain that he would retaliate physically. But he did not. He was pleased. He was well praising.

After that, I became aware that Pakistani women rule their men by kitchen utensils. Large stainless steel pots are not only for the purpose of cooking rice. They are weapons and women use them.

In Islamic countries, men are granted rights but women rule. At the exact moment that a majority of Islamic women come out of the kitchen, Islamic aggression will stall.

It is curious that the very thing that Genius purports to be the downfall of wisdom -- femininity -- could be the very thing that can ignite wisdom.

Women are the backbone of any patriarchal system. When women no longer submit to rule by rice pot, the society falls; becomes modern by force.

Both the East and the West are backward. The East is backward because it suppresses woman and the West is backward because it empowers femininity.

It will take a thousand years for men and women to become equal.

Until that time, there will continue to be war and strife in the world. I believe that the world could come to peace immediately if all women were forced to support themselves completely.

There is no such thing as love. Love in any language is codependency.

Quote:

---

We can't just pretend that Islamic culture is equal to Christian or Buddhist culture in this regard. Clearly, there are fundamental differences. Islam resembles medieval Christianity, if anything.

---

Fat chance.

In Western-Christian cultures and those few Buddhist cultures that are secularized, the sexes are still codependent.

Dependence is dependence. Until we cut those cords, the world will continue in backwardness.

My guess, David, is that you are still attached to woman or you would not have any argument with me.

Faizi

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 104

(9/25/02 11:32)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

David,

Quote:

---

The middle way represents the intellectual path to enlightenment. One travels down this path by rejecting the idea that a dualistic position can embody the Truth.

In particular, one rejects the duality of "existence" and "non-existence", together with all of the views and beliefs that rely on either one of these dualities as a basis. For example, one rejects the idea that the Universe is either materialistic or non-materialistic in nature, that it is either temporary or eternal, that it is either subjective or objective, that things are either real or illusory, and so on. It is only by learning how to see beyond duality, as it were, that one can begin to comprehend the nature of Reality.

---

OK. What is the purpose, then, of such a wise person taking a dualistic position on a dualistic issue?

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 105

(9/25/02 11:49)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha, may I say what an utter delight it is to read your replies.

Quote:

---

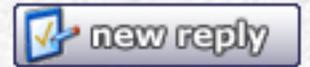

I particularly liked it when my daughter used to jump on his back while he was praying. She would stand with him and fold her hands like him and sit like him but, the minute he put his head on the floor, she jumped on his back -- or she would put her head down to the floor with him to try to peek under his head to see what he was doing.

---

LOL. Simply gorgeous.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 375(9/25/02 12:38)Reply  | Re: Islam <hr/> Marsha: Quote: <hr/> There is no such thing as love. Love in any language is co-dependency <hr/> In language it is certainly codependency, but you forget life! The independency of living! Marsha: Quote: <hr/> It will take a thousand years for men and women to become equal. <hr/> | men and women will never be equal, because there is such a thing as love!

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1001

(9/25/02 15:16)

Reply

Re: Islam

Marsha Faizi wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Some people would argue my view of Islam is an illusion created by the Western media's focus upon Muslim extremists. But I have my doubts about this. Even more moderate forms of Islam demand open displays of submission from its adherents. For example, everyone must bow down together towards Mecca and pray in unison five times a day. This alone fosters a fundamentalist, submissive mindset.

MF: I never saw the prayers of Muslims as submissive in the way that you are thinking of submissiveness. It is not submission to a religion or to Mecca but submission to God. It is submission to the will of God. It is acknowledgment of one's smallness in the universe.

---

But it is propogating the idea that there is only one way to submit to God - and that is, by doing all the rituals that everyone else does. It is mistaking submission to God (or better yet, to Truth) with submission to herdly ritual, which is a horrible mistake to make.

Quote:

---

Muslim prayer is a ritual that involves much more than bowing. I realize that you are thinking of it as a form of submission in the way that the rituals of a cult could be said to be submissive. I do not see the Muslim form of prayer as more submissive than the Christian taking of communion or Christian baptism.

---

True. But at least Christianity has the decency to back off from daily life and demand that the rituals only be followed once a week, whereas Islam demands that they be followed all day, every day. Islam is far more intrusive in people's daily lives. It's as though the Islamic clerics are hell-bent on nipping any kind of serious thought in the bud, before it has a chance to flourish and wreak its havoc.

Quote:

---

After that, I became aware that Pakistani women rule their men by kitchen utensils. Large stainless steel pots are not only for the purpose of cooking rice. They are weapons and women use them.

---

I must admit that I found this very funny. It encapsulates the madness of the worldly life overall, not just Islam. Who in their right mind would want to be a husband, I ask you?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1002

(9/25/02 15:26)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: The middle way represents the intellectual path to enlightenment. One travels down this path by rejecting the idea that a dualistic position can embody the Truth.

In particular, one rejects the duality of "existence" and "non-existence", together with all of the views and beliefs that rely on either one of these dualities as a basis. For example, one rejects the idea that the Universe is either materialistic or non-materialistic in nature, that it is either temporary or eternal, that it is either subjective or objective, that things are either real or illusory, and so on. It is only by learning how to see beyond duality, as it were, that one can begin to comprehend the nature of Reality.

LR: OK. What is the purpose, then, of such a wise person taking a dualistic position on a dualistic issue?

---

He does this in order to address people's attachment to duality. He is like a doctor who prescribes various medicines in order to cure people's illnesses.

He himself is perfectly healthy and doesn't require any medicine. But he recognizes that other people are in need of it and so he provides it for them.

In other words, a wise person uses duality skillfully for the purpose of weening people off duality. He himself has no attachment to duality, but he recognizes that other people are trapped in it and need his help.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 107

(9/25/02 17:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

LR: OK. What is the purpose, then, of such a wise person taking a dualistic position on a dualistic issue?

DQ: He does this in order to address people's attachment to duality. He is like a doctor who prescribes various medicines in order to cure people's illnesses. He himself is perfectly healthy and doesn't require any medicine. But he recognizes that other people are in need of it and so he provides it for them.

In other words, a wise person uses duality skillfully for the purpose of weening people off duality. He himself has no attachment to duality, but he recognizes that other people are trapped in it and need his help.

---

So, what you are saying is that in order to demonstrate the value and benefits of Truth, it is necessary to adopt a lie? Doesn't this proposition serve only to perpetuate ignorance of Reality by that very adoption? Isn't that a bit like the doctor infecting himself with the same virus as the patient...are you telling me that Kevin (and I say Kevin because this whole discussion is a result of this thread) only raised the issue of the lack of wisdom in the Kuran to infect himself (even though he can cure himself thru his knowledge of Reality) and thus show infected people how infected they are? I'm not sure that that forwards the stated purpose emphasised above.

Wouldn't it be simpler, and more effective, to demonstrate the value and benefits of the non-dualistic position since the path to enlightenment is travelled by "rejecting the idea that a dualistic position can embody the Truth"?

Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/25/02 5:16:20 pm

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 217

(9/25/02 18:07)

Reply

Re: Esoteric and Exoteric

---

Quote:

---

B.: Those are just speculations, David. I also say it's just your preconception to think that a married man cannot be a 'wise'. I do not agree with that.

D.Q.: Can you imagine a husband saying to his wife, "The love of the world is the root of all evil". Or, "Be in the world like a traveler, or like a passer on, and reckon yourself as of the dead". She would only cringe away in fear.

Unless, of course, she perceived that he didn't really mean any of it - in which case she would laugh, give him a hug and think him a silly old fool.

---

I can imagine but I don't think so. :) However, I've got a different point of view. Call me a sentimental Christian but I do say that the lack of love of the world is the root of all evil. Indeed, I don't want to love the world and I cannot love the world in my 'everyday life' but I cannot reject it in my 'sane moments'. People just pretend to love the world and each other, while they love no more than their own petty ego. The most disappointing for me is to see the so-called 'couples' in this situation. Their "love" is more of a "treaty of co-existence", an economic pact, which I would summarize in the phrase: "I need you because a man needs a woman / I need you because a woman needs a man so let's be together." I spit upon such a "love". I just don't want to make things worse with acting alike and corrupting love even more.

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 218

(9/25/02 18:24)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

MF: I never saw the prayers of Muslims as submissive in the way that you are thinking of submissiveness. It is not submission to a religion or to Mecca but submission to God. It is submission to the will of God. It is acknowledgment of one's smallness in the universe.

D.Q.: But it is propogating the idea that there is only one way to submit to God - and that is, by doing all the rituals that everyone else does. It is mistaking submission to God (or better yet, to Truth) with submission to herdly ritual, which is a horrible mistake to make.

---

Sorry to interrupt but nope, for heaven's sake! Their purpose was to keep up the contact with God, later these rituals just became more-or-less empty of any higher/deeper meaning. For a Muslim, to leave these already empty restrictions is to enter a more barren world, some sort of 'nihilism', that's why it is hard, if possible at all, to find any other way. 'Cause where on earth can you find a meaningful way nowadays?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 398

(9/26/02 8:52)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Leyla,

Quote:

---

LOL. Simply gorgeous.

---

I don't write in order to receive compliments on it but, nevertheless, thank you.

At first, when she jumped on his back, I would try to pull her off -- because his time for prayer meant a lot to Faizi. He could not pray five times a day in the United States so, when he had the chance to do so, I thought that he should be able to do it in peace.

However, he told me that it was perfectly all right for Monobitty -- his name for Rock that meant "little kitten" but should have been "wild cat" -- to jump on his back when he was praying. It never disturbed him. So, she was allowed to pounce on him freely. She would cling to him when he went to stand and it was quite funny to see.

She was very much her father's daughter and I feel that much of the problems that she experiences now stem from not having his direct influence. She would have rebelled against him, too, but not as fiercely. Plus, her influences would have been very different. She would have attended an Arabic school and most of her friends would have been second generation Pakistani girls.

Before he died, however, Faizi was very aware of her ferocity, even as a toddler. He used to say that he never expected to have a female child who was so fierce.

It was funny to watch her jump on his back when he was praying. It was the natural thing for a child to do and it was allowed.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 400

(9/26/02 13:25)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

But it is propogating the idea that there is only one way to submit to God - and that is, by doing all the rituals that everyone else does. It is mistaking submission to God (or better yet, to Truth) with submission to herdly ritual, which is a horrible mistake to make.

---

I understand what you are saying and, largely, I agree with it. For most people, the Muslim prayer is an empty ritual. It is something that Muslim people are required to do in order to be able to consider themselves to be good Muslims. For that reason, it does become a herdly act. It is just something that one is expected to do and one does it without question -- kind of how a Christian automatically puts a few dollars in the plate when it is passed to him and how a Christian takes communion and allows himself or his child to be baptized in the church.

All of these things are things that are taught to us and that many of us do without question or hesitation because they are the "right" things to do. It is no different in Islam. People agree to pray five times a day because it is right to do so. When it is done in this sort of automatic fashion, it is a herdly act. It means nothing. The shopkeeper or banker comes outside for the prayer because it is expected that he must do so. It would be wrong if he did not.

Yet, when the prayer is offered in sincerity and with some consciousness, it is a deliberate submission to God or Ultimate Truth. Because it is a solitary act, it is an individual's submission to the Infinite. However, mixed with the distortions of religion -- the belief that everything in the Koran is absolute truth -- it is an impure offering, as the offering of a Christian is an impure offering.

I don't believe in Islam. I don't believe in Christianity. I don't believe in Judaism. I don't believe in Buddhism. It is my personal belief that all religion is inherently impure. I have distaste for it. It disgusts me -- all religion.

There is some wisdom in the teachings of Christianity and there is some wisdom in the teachings of Judaism and the teachings of Islam and Buddhism. But they are all religions and, as such, and because of the acts of the followers, I sorely dislike them. All of them. It is true that the Islamic countries are presently backward and ignorant, on the whole. There are many reasons for this and I have explored some of those reasons on this forum. Because Islam has produced splendid civilization in the past, it is erroneous to blame this current backwardness solely on the teachings of the religion. There are reasons for the so called fundamentalism.

No sane man could wish to live in the conditions of Pakistan and Afghanistan and Iraq. There are chaos and misery in those countries; much squalor; much filth; much war; much ignorance. Can you not imagine trying to raise yourself up from that and being thwarted in your every effort?

Presently, both Pakistan and Afghanistan have intelligent leadership. If those two leaders manage to survive their multitudes of enemies and their countries begin to flourish, will the West welcome that development?

Pakistan has often shown promise for secularism. It has had, at least, two leaders who were politically enlightened; who had the personal power of persuasion to place religion in the background of progress. In the first case, death from natural causes robbed the country of intelligent leadership -- leadership that acknowledged that it was wrong to keep women in Purdah. In the second instance, the leader was cut down in his prime and at the apex of his power. He was censored for bringing modern electricity to his country. Ali Bhutto was a finely educated and Westernized man. He was jailed and hung. He was acknowledged as the obvious leader of the Third World.

The last thing that could be wanted in the West is an intelligent, gifted leader for the Third World. Who, then, would the West exploit? If the Third World is allowed to progress to the pinnacle of power, the power of the West would be diminished.

Ultimately, the United States is the ruler of the world. When the Soviet Union bit the dust, there was nothing left in opposition. Despite the showing of terrorism, Islamic countries are powerless against the United States. I have heard tales of the biological and chemical weapons available to Saddam Hussein and I do not discount the power of those weapons. But weapons are just weapons. No one likes Saddam Hussein. No one is loyal to Saddam Hussein. Because of this detriment of loyalty and because of the poor condition of his country, if there is war between the US and Iraq, Hussein will fail.

Given the choice, would anyone sane choose to live in present day Iraq when he could live in a country that is bountiful and powerful?

No, he would not.

Therefore, there is something very wrong with the belief that Islamic countries are backward because of religion. It may be somewhat true that such countries are backward because of religion but that religion is not necessarily or only Islam.

I am surprised at your Christianity, David. You excuse much in Christianity that you fault in Islam. Christian rituals are all right because they take less time than the Islamic ritual of praying five times a day. Time is relative. In Pakistan, time is much slower than in the United States or, even, Australia.

In my day, time is essential. I don't have time to breathe let alone to pray five times a day in a ritualistic manner. The time that I spend at night to write and to contemplate is forced time. I force it.

My work day is spent rushing quickly from one thing to another. Speed is extremely valuable. Because I am able to cope with speed, I am currently being considered to go to school to learn to do limited x-rays -- extremities and lungs, basically. That way, I can be the lab technician and x-ray technician and nurse simultaneously, plus answer the phone and make appointments and deal with insurance referrals.

It is kind of hard to do x-rays and take blood and process it to three different labs and tend to patients and take orders from doctors and answer the telephone and deal with insurance companies simultaneously but, if I can do all that -- and I can -- I will be one very valuable employee. More than that, I will be a free agent. Very skilled. It is kind of hard to turn away a licensed practical nurse who can also be a referral nurse and a lab technician and an x-ray technician and a secretary simultaneously.

I could go for a slower pace. I think it must be wonderful to have the luxury of praying five times a day. I don't agree with the herdly religious aspects of that but I do agree with the time given to something that could be truth. The United States has nothing to do with truth. Yet, we are the most advanced civilization on earth. We are automatons. We are learning to cure cancer and we are rich but there is no time to contemplate.

Quote:

---

But at least Christianity has the decency to back off from daily life and demand that the rituals only be followed once a week, whereas Islam demands that they be followed all day, every day. Islam is far more intrusive in people's daily lives. It's as though the Islamic clerics are hell-bent on nipping any kind of serious thought in the bud, before it has a chance to flourish and wreak its havoc.

---

But a day is a week in Muslim time -- Third World time; Asian time. A day in Pakistan is a luxurious expanse. A day in the United States is an hour.

For an educated, refined Muslim, prayer five times a day is no different from washing one's face five times a day. In the United States, the pressure of multitasking at work is far more demanding than praying five times a day. No Islamic cleric nips at my heels. My employer nips at my heels. If I wanted to pray five times a day, that request would be denied. If I wanted to have fifteen minutes five times a day to write, that request would be denied. Things have progressed to such a point that I cannot ask for a day off because that will be denied. In writing, I have a vacation but, in practice, I have none. As an employee in the United States, I have no rights. I am free to work and that is all. God is nothing and truth is nothing.

I would grant my employer more honor if he simply stated the reality of my slavery. I am a free agent only to slavery. I have no opinion because my opinion is worthless. I am fortunate that flogging is out of fashion in the United States. Otherwise, it would be utilized and I would know it.

My living conditions are better than in Pakistan. I have the freedom to remain single. I have the freedom to live as an atheist. I have the freedom to shirk religion. But I pay for those freedoms with my slavery to work and to work with the full knowledge that I cannot afford to live in a mini-mansion of the kind that is extremely popular in the US now. I work with the knowledge that I can never afford a SUV, no matter how hard I work. I don't want those things. I look around me and I am disgusted.

Life is short. I would not spend it in a mini-mansion and a SUV even if I could afford to do so. My house is relatively small and my mortgage is relatively small -- less than rent. Ironically, I work much harder for little than most Americans work for much more.

No, I do not like what Islam does to people but I do not like what a purely capitalistic society does to people more. I am utterly amazed by the wealth of the United States. I am awed by it. I live in what has long been considered to be a depressed sector of the United States and I am yet awed. What puzzles me is the source of the money.

After that, I became aware that Pakistani women rule their men by kitchen utensils. Large stainless steel pots are not only for the purpose of cooking rice. They are weapons and women use them.

Quote:

---

I must admit that I found this very funny. It encapsulates the madness of the worldly life overall, not just Islam. Who in their right mind would want to be a husband, I ask you?

---

I am happy that I could make you laugh. I am sure that you could use it. I only hope like hell you didn't crack your face or anything.

Yes, the world is mad, not just Islam. Who in his right mind could want to be a husband or a wife? Who could want to be an employee or an employer?

The great irony of the world is that no one wants anything. We just accept the shit that is handed down to us.

I only struck my husband in self defense and it gave him great pleasure. I did my utmost to refrain from it. No one could have been more surprised than myself when he liked it.

So much for Muslim manliness.

Faizi

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1010

(9/26/02 18:02)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Marsha Faizi wrote:

Quote:

---

I am surprised at your Christianity, David. You excuse much in Christianity that you fault in Islam.

---

Don't worry. I've long made it my vow to wipe Christianity off the face of the earth. Christianity is a mental disease that the human race doesn't need. The amount of misery it has inflicted upon the world is incalculable. But as bad as Christianity is, Islam is ten times worse.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 384

(9/26/02 23:15)

Reply

Re: Islam

---

Quote:

---

"Don't worry. I've long made it my vow to wipe Christianity off the face of the earth."

---

You're not doing a very good job of it with your 'good' this and 'evil' that....

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 7

(9/27/02 1:13)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Here's an interesting web site...

Actually, my understanding is that many of the "biased" sites contra Islam are in India precisely because when any attempts are made to elsewhere publicize the "deficiencies" of Islam as a "moral" system, the hosts of the sites get terrorist threats.

The Indian's have realized that they will suffer terrorist acts at the hands of the "faithful" whether they allow criticism or not (as they are not even the "untermenschen" "People of the Book"). So why NOT allow such information to be disseminated.

This also explains why the German company that was to have released the "Satanic Verses" in Germany refused to do so.

www.flex.com/~jai/satyamevajayate/index.html

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 402

(9/27/02 8:21)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Indians are not so pure. They take pleasure in toying with the "Great Satan" as well as do some Islamic countries. I don't hate Indians. I have had many friends who were Indians -- Muslims, Sikhs, and Hindus.

I have had friends who were from the border towns of the Punjab whose families have endured attacks from India over many years. It is not only Pakistan that is backward.

Historically, the British and Americans have favored India over Pakistan or Hindus over Muslims and Sikhs. This was especially true during the partition of Pakistan from India.

Faizi

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 13

(9/27/02 8:33)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Point is, that I don't lose any sleep at night worrying about hindu's blowing themselves up in some misguided Jihad. Nor do I worry that hindu's are going to prevent me from speaking my mind. I do worry about that, especially if I'm in a country dominated by islam.

Are you familiar with the egyptian professor who was killed by his students for merely discussing some possibilities with regard to Muhammed and the Quran or Hadiths?

It's that violent intolerance that I dislike. One that can and has been justified by Islamic extremists. Note that no Islamic religious leaders have denounced such suicide bombing perpetrators as "Apostates against Islam"...

Where are the Fatwah's against them, condemning them as NOT MUSLIMS?

They are noticeably absent, yet Salman Rushdie should die.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 403

(9/27/02 10:52)

Reply

Islam

---

I am writing this story as an aside.

At work today, I was passing through my office when I heard a conversation between two ladies. Ironically enough, they were discussing the backwardness of Pakistan and, in particular, the bad treatment of women in Pakistan.

One lady said, "They burn women in Pakistan."

Just like that.

I said, "Do they burn ladies daily? Is there such a thing as a 'Daily Lady Burning?' Do they light one up and throw the rest in a pile with her and roast kabobs in the flames?"

The Christian lady said, "No, I don't think they do it quite like that."

"Then, how do they do it?"

"I don't know but they do burn women in Pakistan."

I let her off the hook some. I said, "Yes, I know that many atrocities are committed against women in Pakistan and other countries. They are mostly committed by very ignorant people and many men are also ill treated there but you hear less about that."

I also said that I have many female relatives in Lahore and Islamabad and Faisalabad and none of them have ever been burned up. In fact, they live comfortably as part of the middle class of Pakistan. Most of them are well educated. A few of them are extremely well educated. Nearly all of the men in my family in Pakistan are well educated and, as far as I know, they are all very well educated. They are businessmen and professionals and government workers and none of them has ever burned a woman.

Then, the ladies took up the topic of how the skull of a young girl was found in North Carolina yesterday and it is thought to be the remains of a twelve year old girl who has been missing from southwest Virginia for a month or so after someone killed her parents and abducted her.

I started to suggest that some Pakistanis may have burned her up but I decided in the favor of mercy.

Later still, I was passing by these same ladies and they were discussing a professor from a local university who, last Halloween, dressed up as a woman. He decided that he liked being a woman so much that he is divorcing his wife and having a sex change operation. He has teenage children.

The consensus of the office ladies was this man should be put to death. Plain and simple. No questions asked -- just kill the queer.

I said, "Well, why don't you do it like they do it in Pakistan, then. Just light the son of a bitch up. Take a torch and dip it in gasoline and -- kaboom!! No more queer! It works for the Muslims and I am sure it can work for us."

The ignorance and hypocrisy is astounding.

Faizi

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 110

(9/27/02 11:11)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

xero,

Quote:

---

It's that violent intolerance that I dislike. One that can and has been justified by Islamic extremists. Note that no Islamic religious leaders have denounced such suicide bombing perpetrators as "Apostates against Islam"...

Where are the Fatwah's against them, condemning them as NOT MUSLIMS?

---

From whom, or whence, do you patiently await such denunciation?

www.islamdenoucesterrorism.com/index.html

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 755

(9/27/02 12:50)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Unfortunately, Leyla, this site does little more than give weight to the perception of Islam's intellectual vacuity and underlying intolerance and bigotry, with a disappointing level of stupidity and ignorance tossed in for good measure. It's just another religious sub-group claiming to be the authentic expression of a given religion and using the authority of scripture to back it up. It's a huge yawn and we've seen enough of it with Christian groups to know better than find it meaningful.

If you want an example of the ignorance, stupidity and simmering intolerance (of this mob at least), look at the "Darwin and Materialism" link - bottom right, or just go there:

http://www.islamdenoucesterrorism.com/darwinism\_materialism.html

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 9/27/02 12:53:02 pm

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 404

(9/27/02 12:54)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Xero:

Quote:

---

Point is, that I don't lose any sleep at night worrying about hindu's blowing themselves up in some misguided Jihad.

---

The Hindus have a country and no one -- certainly no superpower -- disputes them in their right to their country. They have no reason to blow themselves up or to engage in murder. No one has moved to Delhi and kicked them out of their homes and deprived them of rights.

I do think that the suicide bombings in Palestine have gone too far and I think that the Israelis have gone too far. I also think that both sides should continue in warfare without interference until both sides are thoroughly sick of it. Obviously, that could take a while; but with US interference and support for the one side, it will take much longer. Palestinians may feel that God is on their side but the Israelis not only feel that God is on their side, they know that the United States is on their side and the US is better than God.

Quote:

---

Nor do I worry that hindu's are going to prevent me from speaking my mind. I do worry about that, especially if I'm in a country dominated by islam.

---

But you are not in a country dominated by Islam nor one dominated by Hindus.

I wonder how much freedom an Untouchable has in India. I wonder about the freedom that the caste system affords for individuals living in India. Skin color means a lot in India.

Quote:

---

Are you familiar with the Egyptian professor who was killed by his students for merely discussing some possibilities with regard to Muhammed and the Quran or Hadiths?

---

I am sure that this thing happened and I think that it is deplorable and heinous.

Quote:

---

It's that violent intolerance that I dislike.

---

I also dislike that sort of violent intolerance. The other night, I heard of the deaths of some young women at a university in California at the hands of their sorority. They were incited to kill themselves in order to prove themselves worthy of a certain club. They were quite intelligent young women who had their splendid lives before them. They had every reason to live. Each of them would have grown to be leaders in society. I wonder why such dictatorial clubs are allowed to exist and encouraged to exist on a modern campus in the Twenty-first Century in the most civilized nation in the world.

Quote:

---

One that can and has been justified by Islamic extremists.

---

Islamic extremists. I think the key word here is "extremists." When civilizations are pushed to the point of extremism -- of allowing extremists to take control and to set precedence -- heinous acts can be allowed. This is oppositional behavior. I don't like it. I don't condone it. I deplore it. But, if people are pushed to extremes, they will take the extreme. They will take it for the sole purpose of opposition.

This has happened in the United States during the Civil Rights movement. The United States pushed Alabama and Alabama opposed; defied; the government. Racial extremity rose to prevalence in the American South in part because extremity was pushed to the limit. Put a Black Panther in the same room as a Ku Klux Klan member and they are going to understand each other because they are extremes. They will hate each other but they will understand the nature of their hatred.

Put bin Laden and Ashcroft in a room and I have no doubt that there would be understanding there, too. They are each representative of extremes. Iraqi people fear the US as much as they fear Saddam.

I do feel some sorrow at witnessing the hatred of the West for the East and the East for the West. It is painful to see. It is painful to have to witness extreme acts of violence from both sides.

But, as in the case of the Soviet Union versus the United States, there will be the clash of ideals. Extremist ideals. It is my hope -- because I seem to have no choice but to hope -- that the coming war between the US and Iraq will settle the extremes.

George W. said today that he wants to destroy Saddam Hussein because Saddam tried to kill his father. That makes sense. I am just sorry that my kids are too young to fight against Iraq for this purpose.

Quote:

---

Note that no Islamic religious leaders have denounced such suicide bombing perpetrators as "Apostates against Islam"...

---

That is correct. I have heard no religious leaders condemning suicide bombers. Religious leaders support the extreme. Religious leaders in the United States are supportive of Israeli aggression and supportive of US war with Iraq.

According to the Koran, martyrdom is subject to God, not man. One who sets himself up to be a martyr is mistaken. The Koran does not support the corrupt ideal of using "believers" as weapons. One who ties a bomb about his waist and walks into a crowd is a victim of religious extremism that is wrong. He is not killing for Allah but killing for a political end.

Quote:

---

Where are the Fatwah's against them, condemning them as

NOT MUSLIMS?

---

As far as I know, there are no such Fatwahs. The actions of suicide bombers should be stopped. But this is extremism pushed to the extreme by extreme measures from an opposition. The Palistineans have nothing to lose. That is pretty extreme.

Quote:

---

They are noticeably absent, yet Salman Rushdie should die.

---

I could not care less about Rushdie and he was fully conscious and fully aware of the certain consequences of his actions. He fully understood the extreme stance that he was taking. If it was his desire to take on the Islamic extremists, good for him. But his extremism is his responsibility.

Rushdie is not Christ.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 405

(9/27/02 13:09)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Thanks for the great Hindu site. I was not so mean as to post such a thing. I merely hinted at it.

There are many sites such as the one you cited.

Faizi

Leyla R
Registered User
Posts: 111
(9/27/02 13:13)
Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

Dan,

Quote:

It's just another religious sub-group claiming to be the authentic expression of a given religion and using the authority of scripture to back it up.

Well, I found it about as meaningful a denunciation one could hope to find from a monotheistic source. Which is why I asked xero what I did.

In hindsight, perhaps xero's was a rhetorical question?

I'll check out the Darwinism section a little later.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 757
(9/27/02 13:15)
Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

The contention that Hinduism is somehow more tolerant and "civilized" than Islam, if that is what "Xero" is in fact contending, I find pretty daft and one that does not take into account political factors (which tend to be the major fuel for so-called "religious extremism").

I would not like to be a Muslim living in certain parts of India right now.

Dan Rowden

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 758(9/27/02 13:30)Reply  | Re: Islam and "biased" reporting <hr/> Leyla, Quote: <hr/> Well, I found it about as meaningful a denunciation one could hope to find from a monotheistic source. Which is why I asked xero what I did. In hindsight, perhaps xero's was a rhetorical question? <hr/> No, I think it was a reactionary statement of ignorance from someone who obviously doesn't follow the news in any way whatever or events in his own society. There's no moral obligation for anyone to do that, of course, but it might help make for more informed statements about happenings, or the absence of them, in one's society. Here in Australia - and I doubt it was different in the States - every moderate Islamic leader denounced the terrorism (and terrorism generally) and stated clearly that this was not "real" Islam at work. Going so far as to expect them to pronounce a a "fatwah" is expecting the asburd to occur. |

*edit* Oh, and it isn't necessary to read the whole page on that Islamic sight, just the blurb within the link on the page you provided is enough to give the picture.

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 9/27/02 1:33:16 pm

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 112

(9/27/02 14:08)

Reply

Re: Islam and "biased" reporting

---

Dan,

Quote:

---

Going so far as to expect them to pronounce a a "fatwah" is expecting the asburd to occur.

---

I agree. It was rather an odd thing to imply.

xerosaburu

Registered User

Posts: 14

(9/28/02 0:06)

Reply

"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

One would expect that if it truly be believed that Islam is a religion of peace and tolerance as some have suggested, that there be unequivocal denunciations of such actions as branding perpetrators of such violence as "Not Muslims" or "Apostates from Islam".

Instead we see denunciations of the ACTIONS of the perpetrators, NOT that they in fact THROUGH THEIR ACTIONS are not to be considered Muslims.

This is important because in the Quran it little matters your moral behavior as long as you're a Muslim.(Which is to point out that the ONLY IMMORAL behavior to be condemned is criticizing the Quran or Muhammed.) And, of course all that one has to do is mouth the words and PRESTO CHANGE-O, you're a Muslim...

Now this business of Salman Rusdie is to point out how Muslims typically react to opposition.

My experience, my observations are that as a Muslim, one can mouth whatever one might mouth to an infidel, and not be accountable, as lying to an infidel is no crime against Islam.

Therefore how on earth is there ever expected to be any sort of trust-based relationship between Muslims and all others when the whole intent and purpose of Islam is complete surrender on the part of the world.

In areas where they move in, they behave peacefully until such time as it looks like they can seize control. Then, some get tired of waiting and Jihad their way to the control seat of government and enact Sharia as the law for all.

If religion has been a pox on the world. Which it has been. Today, the most feared element in religion is Islam.

There is hypocrisy in Christendom for waging war as the NT decries warfare, but rather calls on all to wait "for God to sort it out"

There IS no such conflict in Islam. War is approved and can be used to further the aims of Islam.

Islam IS feared and IS TO BE FEARED...

I note that any surah's that clearly make inflammatory statements such as those that say "One may never take Jews or Christians as friends" is papered over by "interpretation"...

Such peaceful application of such interpretations needs proof that THIS in fact is what the "prophet" "peace be on him" meant.

It certainly is NOT clear from Muhammed's own actions in application...

I won't even get INTO the ridiculous "principle of abrogation" whereby Muhammed, after contradicting himself, said in essence "Whatever I said to you last...THAT's what's from God"

Edited by: xerosaburu at: 9/28/02 12:33:38 am

xerosaburu
Registered User
Posts: 15
(9/28/02 0:41)
Reply

Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Oh, and another thing...

If I can find Fatwah's on things like THIS

"I need to know what is the fatwa for passing gas from the front in women? will her wadhu be valid?"

www.islam.tc/ask-imam/view.php?q=6625

Why, in the name of ALL the prophets ("peace be on all-o-them") Can't a Fatwah denouncing suicide bombings and the like be declared as a demonstration of "Apostasy"?

Certainly we get "Fatwah's" on 'passing gas' but we can't get even a lil' one for blowing up innocent civilians in suicide attacks.

Edited by: xerosaburu at: 9/28/02 12:47:24 am

xerosaburu
Registered User
Posts: 16
(9/28/02 0:56)
Reply

How about a current ruling on the examples of the past

---

of murderous intolerance.

What does it teach Muslims today?

"Please confirm whether hadith (Abu Dawud Book 38, Number 4348) is authentic. If so please, explain the meaning behind it and why there was no punishment imposed on the man who murdered the woman."

www.islam.tc/ask-imam/view.php?q=6491

I'm sure you can search to your hearts content here and see what I mean...

<http://www.islam.tc/ask-imam/>

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 113

(9/28/02 0:59)

Reply

Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

xero,

What country do you live in, and do you have a religious faith?

Quote:

---

One would expect that if it truly be believed that Islam is a religion of peace and tolerance as some have suggested, that there be unequivocal denunciations of such actions as branding perpetrators of such violence as "Not Muslims" or "Apostates from Islam".

Instead we see denunciations of the ACTIONS of the perpetrators, NOT that they in fact THROUGH THEIR ACTIONS are not to be considered Muslims.

---

I think you're being pedantic. An apostate is one who deviates from the principles of their religion through their actions. No?

Quote:

---

This is important because in the Quran it little matters your moral behavior as long as you're a Muslim.(Which is to point out that the ONLY IMORAL behavior to be condemned is criticizing the Quran or Muhammed.)

---

Rubbish. How many Muslims do you know personally? I was raised by them, and my conduct was regularly condemned by some.

Quote:

---

And, of course all that one has to do is mouth the words and PRESTO CHANGE-O, you're a Muslim...

---

Sounds a bit like "accept Christ as Lord and Saviour and thou shalt go to heaven" to me. Course, some require baptism and others confession.

Quote:

---

Now this business of Salman Rusdie is to point out how Muslims typically react to opposition.

---

I just love these fail-safe, gross generalities: "how Muslims typically react". You know every single Muslim on Earth in order to make this statement?

Quote:

---

My experience, my observations

---

Now this I'm interested in hearing about. What, exactly, is your experience and what have you observed?

Quote:

---

...are that as a Muslim, one can mouth whatever one might mouth to an infidel, and not be accountable, as lying to an infidel is no crime against Islam.

---

Hm. Fleeting recollections. Isn't there something in the Bible that says it's OK to lie for Jesus?

Quote:

---

Therefore how on earth is there ever expected to be any sort of trust-based relationship between Muslims and all others when the whole intent and purpose of Islam is complete surrender on the part of the world.

---

Who, xero, is Islam?

Quote:

---

In areas where they move in, they behave peacefully until such time as it looks like they can seize control. Then, some get tired of waiting and Jihad their way to the control seat of government and enact Sharia as the law for all.

---

Which areas are these, exactly?

Quote:

---

If religion has been a pox on the world. Which it has been. Today, the most feared element in religion is Islam.

---

According to whom?

Quote:

---

There is hypocrisy in Christendom for waging war as the NT decries warfare, but rather calls on all to wait "for God to sort it out"

---

Yeah? You spoken to any Christian fundies lately?

Quote:

---

There IS no such conflict in Islam. War is approved and can be used to further the aims of Islam.

---

How do you know?

Quote:

---

Islam IS feared and IS TO BE FEARED...

---

I don't fear it. I am, however, scared of spiders.

Quote:

---

I note that any surah's that clearly make inflammatory statements such as those that say "One may never take Jews or Christians as friends" is papered over by "interpretation"...

---

You mean, like the NT did for the OT?

Quote:

---

Such peaceful application of such interpretations needs proof that THIS in fact is what the "prophet" "peace be on him" meant.

It certainly is NOT clear from Muhammed's own actions in application...

---

You've met Muhammed?

Quote:

---

I won't even get INTO the ridiculous "principle of abrogation" whereby Muhammed, after contradicting himself, said in essence "Whatever I said to you last...THAT's what's from

|                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                               | God" <hr/> Why not?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Leyla RRegistered UserPosts: 114(9/28/02 1:15)Reply                                                                                | Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> Oh, xero, one more question out of interest: what's your opinion on the Christian fanatic escapee who claims that God let him out of prison in order to kill as many of those who are involved with abortion (even if it is just the receptionist who happens to be working in such a clinic)? Edited by: Leyla R at: 9/28/02 1:17:16 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 759(9/28/02 10:31)Reply  | Re: "Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> I have deleted a number of brainless personal posts that do nothing but make a mockery of this thread (sorry Marsha but that includes your observation of this fact which I removed because it would look out of place). And, Xero, could you refrain from your current habit of posting images and . gif files. All that achieves is the much slower loading of pages. Thanks. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                  |
| I AMRegistered UserPosts: 111(9/28/02 10:32)Reply                                                                                  | Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing" <hr/> xerosaburu, You comments on Islam can only apply to a very small minority in Islam. The extremest and their views. There are billions of Muslims in the world and the extremest account for less than 1%. As with all the other religions it is the same old story the only difference is that Islam and it's extremeties happen to be in the spotlight right now. Anything you hear in the media and from others about Islam are the negative things such as with anything else, so people can easily fall under the presumption that 'most' Muslims see this way. |

In your case you may have had a direct negative experience, but if you were open minded on the subject you would have made clear in your post that what you say can only apply to a very small minority. Which in turn doesn't really add up to anything since every religion has it's own little extremist faction.

I grew up with Muslims and been around many different kinds and different races in different countries and was first introduced to the extremist side on CNN with the headlines "Americas New War" about a year ago.

I can only assume that your views may stem from a personal experience. I assure you that they are not absolute but quite relative.

edit: bad syntax

Edited by: I AM at: 9/28/02 10:36:28 am

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 407

(9/28/02 12:13)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

I think this thread started out as a worthwhile endeavor. However, it has seriously degenerated into the usual chat and espousing of half facts and a lot of prejudice.

I definitely do not mind discussing Islam and Muslims openly and I am the first to admit that there are a lot of hopelessly ignorant Muslims all over the world. Though I may not be entirely in agreement with David Quinn and Kevin Solway that Islam is the worst religion in relation to Christianity and Buddhism and Judaism, I find their arguments to be respectful in the sense that, though they are not religious scholars or experts, they think things out carefully and do not simply rely on web sites to supply fodder for their belief that Islam is a sick religion and should be wiped off the face of the earth.

It is fair to say that Kevin and David believe that all religions should be wiped off the face of the earth and the best place to start with that process is with Islam. I can respect that view, even if I find it to be personally reprehensible because I have many relatives living in Pakistan and England and Denmark and Saudi Arabia and Kuwait who are Muslims. I have that attachment because I know that, despite their religion, my relatives are decent people. They are ordinary people but they are decent people who do not feel particular hatred toward the United States.

In order to wipe Islam off the face of the earth, there would have to be much plundering and pillaging of Islamic countries. There would have to be much bombing and millions of people would die. I cannot think that these people deserve to die any more than the thousands of people who died in the World Trade Centers attacks. I do not think the people of Iraq deserve to be bombed. We have already bombed the hell of them.

What we fail to understand is that there is as much fear of us in Pakistan and Iraq and Palestine as there is fear of Muslims in America. We are feared because we have huge bombs at our disposal that make suicide bombings look like child's play. Allah Rehemkah, our capability makes the World Trade Center attacks look like child's play.

The United States quickly defeated Iraq once. Desert Storm was essentially a cake walk for the US. I feel certain that we will do that again. The US armed forces are technically far more advanced than they were during the time of the Gulf War. US soldiers look like space men to Iraqis. We have a Twenty-first Century Army. They are somewhere between WWII and Vietnam -- not quite that good.

Islam has no real war power. Iraq is pathetic and Pakistan is more pathetic. Yes, Islamic shitheads managed to pull off the New York/Washington attacks but they did that when the US was not looking; when the US was very complacent and sure of the impenetrability of its borders. It was a sneak attack and it was based on American arrogance. In retrospect, there were plenty of warning signs. The United States was paying no attention at all to Afghanistan and Pakistan. We could not have cared less that the Taliban was killing innocent people left and right. We could not have cared less that Pakistan was supporting the Taliban.

We could not have cared less about Islam or Islamic people.

Now, Islam is the Great Terror. It is far worse than Communism. It is the scourge of the earth. It stinks. It should die.

I reckon that life in the world would be much easier for everyone if everyone was exactly the same. If everyone was exactly the same, there could be no need for thinking; no need for philosophy. If we wipe out Islam, we will wipe out religious contention and we will wipe out political contention.

I don't believe that the right way is to obliterate Islam. The right way for Twenty-first Century man is to work to wipe out ignorance -- not by bombing but by reason; through education; offered without hate or malice. If we want the rest of the world to come to the Twenty-first Century, we must reach down rather than to push up.

There is such a thing as critical thought for which I have utmost respect. Then, there is this thing that can only be called ugliness.

I have no respect for ugly non-thought.

I set out here to discuss Islamic thought seriously and I am appalled by the display of ignorance to which the initial discussion has plummeted.

I am also deeply sorry for it. It is a pity.

The Islamic world may be one of ignorance but our world -- the one that has pretenses to enlightened philosophy -- is no better. The vulgarity displayed on this forum has been supremely disgusting and disappointing.

I see no wonder that the West is hated by the East.

We lack grace.

Faizi

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 258

(9/28/02 14:54)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Marsha,

I am in agreement with what you say here. However, I find your apology for David's and Kevin's position an obvious attempt to whitewash the severely flawed thought of your friends. If you say that their position -which is that Islam must be wiped off the face of the Earth- is "carefully thought out" and "respectful", you are certainly deceiving yourself. It is the type of thought that leads to war.

Cheers, Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1011

(9/29/02 8:50)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

It's all part of the war on ignorance. What part of Islam is worth keeping, do you think? Is there any part at all? I quite like some of the mystical/artistic aspects of their culture - the persian rugs, the music, the arabian tales, the shape of their writing, etc. But that has probably more to do with Persian culture than Islam itself.

Marsha has it wrong when she says that I believe we should focus on Islam first, even though I acknowledge that all of the main religions are equally bad. In reality, I hardly ever discuss Islam and barely give it a single thought. It would be beneath my dignity to give it any thought. It is too obviously a crude and animalistic religion.

I usually prefer to focus upon the more subtle and more profound delusions contained in modern Buddhism, Christianity, science, academia, feminism, etc. For these are the delusions that are going to dominate humanity for the next few thousand years. Islam is a thing of the past and will slowly die away of its own accord.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 116

(9/29/02 9:35)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

So ya thought ya might like to go to the show. To feel the warm thrill of confusion, that space cadet glow...Are there any queers in the theatre tonight? Get 'em up against the wall. Now there's one in the spotlight, he don't look right to me, get him up against the wall. And that one looks Jewish and that one's a coon, who let all this rifraff into the room? There's one smoking a joint, and another with spots! If I had my way, I'd have all of them shot!

Quote:

---

If you say that their position -which is that Islam must be wiped off the face of the Earth- is "carefully thought out" and "respectful", you are certainly deceiving yourself. It is the type of thought that leads to war.

---

I agree. This is not carefully thought out. At the very least, certainly not clearly expressed. I've not heard exactly how David or Kevin hope to administer this apparent panacea.

I see many truths in Marsha's post.

As I've stated earlier, it is a complex issue. If you go with the mainstream media representations of an Iraq that supports a dictatorship, you must ask yourself why? Why would any country support such a man? Fear of the West is a plausible conclusion. The inroads to resolving ignorance therefore lies within that answer. And the solution will be as good as the accuracy and detail of the conclusion.

It is a reactionary mind that relies on war, murder and obliteration. It is that same mind which causes the circumstances for us to apparently have no choice but arrive there. For this reason, sometimes one has to fight. It's worth identifying precisely, and uncompromisingly, the real enemy so that it does not live on to fight another day. The enemy is not so much the dictator as it is that which creates and feeds it.

The greatest victories will be those with the correct balance of intelligence and force.

Leyla R

Registered User

Posts: 117

(9/29/02 10:00)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Daaaavid,

Quote:

---

Marsha has it wrong when she says that I believe we should focus on Islam first, even though I acknowledge that all of the main religions are equally bad.

---

I hate to be pedantic, BUT; you said Islam was "ten times worse". You ought not confuse me like that. Are you repenting?

If they are equally bad, how can Islam be ten times worse?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1014

(9/29/02 10:34)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

I was paraphrasing Marsha, Leyla.

Quote:

---

Thomas: If you say that their position -which is that Islam must be wiped off the face of the Earth- is "carefully thought out" and "respectful", you are certainly deceiving yourself. It is the type of thought that leads to war.

Leyla: I agree. This is not carefully thought out. At the very least, certainly not clearly expressed. I've not heard exactly how David or Kevin hope to administer this apparent panacea.

---

Kevin has clearly expressed why he thinks Islams is a waste of space, and I've already presented my long-term solution (which, in case you have forgotten, you "wholeheartedly" agreed with). So I'm not exactly sure what you're going on about.

It may well be that the phrase "wiping Islam of the face of the earth" is spooking you a bit. Why else would you post that quote from Pink Floyd's "The Wall"? I know how easily Thomas gets spooked by this kind of thing. But of course, I'm not talking about physical war or any kind of violent solution. As I've mentioned before, it can only come about via the mental development of the human population overall.

Although this thread has going on for some time now, no one has yet pinpointed anything that is worth saving from Islam. Marsha has posted a few quotes, of which probably only half-a-dozen are any good, and that's about it. No one is exactly rushing to Islam's defence, are they.

avidaloca

Registered User

Posts: 93

(9/29/02 12:01)

Reply

Bush

---

This might be a little off topic but did anyone hear Bush's latest rationale for war against Iraq and Saddam Hussein - "After all, the guy once tried to kill my dad".

Do we really want someone with that kind of mentality starting a war?

Martin Dudaniec

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 113

(9/29/02 13:20)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

Although this thread has going on for some time now, no one has yet pinpointed anything that is worth saving from Islam. Marsha has posted a few quotes, of which probably only half-a-dozen are any good, and that's about it. No one is exactly rushing to Islam's defence, are they.

---

David, for a 'wise' man you sure have had an unusual string of unwise posts. I am convinced that there is a path no matter how hidden or exposed to every mans true colors, regardless to how clever he may be. I will not 'pinpoint' or 'save' Islam in this post, as I am not convinced that you are honest let alone wise. Although, for a well read/learned man you should have learned by now how to conceal your arrogance.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 412

(9/29/02 16:19)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

---

Quote:

---

Marsha has it wrong when she says that I believe we should focus on Islam first, even though I acknowledge that all of the main religions are equally bad. In reality, I hardly ever discuss Islam and barely give it a single thought. It would be beneath my dignity to give it any thought. It is too obviously a crude and animalistic religion.

---

It did not seem, however, to be beneath your dignity to give it thought when you said that Islam is a far worse religion than Christianity and Buddhism and Judaism and should be wiped from the face of the earth.

I have never said that Islam is a good religion. I have said that it is not worse than the others and I still know that to be true. You are considering things from only your side and you are completely blind to the other side -- the other face of the monster from which your more delicate and oh-so-dainty Christianity functions as a killer and a perpetuator of hate and misery. I think that you forget who has the real power here and the loaded arsenal. If we -- the United States -- choose to do so, we can, indeed, wipe Islam off the face of the earth and the very great irony of that is, if we chose to do so and started dropping bombs, you would be one of the first to say "how dreadfully heinous."

It is amusing to me, David, that you consider yourself to be lofty and high above others when, in reality, you are a pig with its snout in the mud who lacks even the virtue of character to acknowledge it when you have made statements in a halfcocked manner. I honestly would have thought better of you than that. I have thought better of you than that.

So, put your haughty snout back up in the air and continue to discuss Buddhism on this forum as though you are a high priest with his flock. The forum has become a Buddhist forum. There is no room for anything else.

Like Kevin, your aura has taken on the color of the British Sahib in colonial India. Your attitude is like an Eighteenth Century English gentleman -- a useless fop in white stockings and silk breeches and lace whose gloved hands have never done work.

As a philosophical exercise, I suggest that you take out your garbage and scrub and mop your floors on your hands and knees or, perhaps, just dig a very deep hole and fill it back in -- more than once. I think a little dirt would be good for you.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 9/29/02 4:22:06 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1018

(9/29/02 19:52)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

I AM wrote:

Quote:

---

David, for a 'wise' man you sure have had an unusual string of unwise posts. I am convinced that there is a path no matter how hidden or exposed to every mans true colors, regardless to how clever he may be.

---

What about the Ku Klux Klan? I would consider them to be the same level as Islam. If I had said that it is part of my goal in life to wipe out the Ku Klux Klan (and it is), would you have rejected my stance and accused me of being arrogant?

Quote:

---

I will not 'pinpoint' or 'save' Islam in this post, as I am not convinced that you are honest let alone wise.

---

These sort of comments don't meaning anything unless you back it up with some reasoning.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1022

(9/29/02 20:49)

Reply

Re: Re:"Fatwah's and denouncing"

Marsha Faizi wrote:

Quote:

---

You are considering things from only your side and you are completely blind to the other side -- the other face of the monster from which your more delicate and oh-so-dainty Christianity functions as a killer and a perpetuator of hate and misery.

---

You must have a short memory. I've constantly attacked the Christian mentality for many years. I've long considered it to be one of the most evil philosophies imaginable.

Quote:

---

So, put your haughty snout back up in the air and continue to discuss Buddhism on this forum as though you are a high priest with his flock. The forum has become a Buddhist forum. There is no room for anything else.

---

I'm happy to discuss a philosophical Islamic idea with you, if there is one. One of the reasons why Buddhism is vastly superior to Islam is that it is far more philosophical in nature. It openly addresses the great questions of Reality in a rational fashion, whereas Islam can barely look at them.

Am I supposed to be ashamed at acknowledging this? Sorry, Marsha, I cannot oblige you.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Kantian Metaphysics

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                      MGregory                     Posts: 486                     (3/7/04 10:36 pm)                     Reply   | Kantian Metaphysics <hr/> I'm working on a little project to revive metaphysics. My idea is that metaphysics has not been killed because it has never been understood by the academic community, so it was never born in the first place. I'm thinking about writing a little piece on this phenomenon, so I thought I would do a little research on the subject. As I read Russell's exposition of Kant in "A History of Western Philosophy", I'm thinking Kant was right on the money with respect to space, and Russell misunderstood it. Kant created four arguments in favor of the idea that space is an a priori concept. It's interesting to note that it took Kant twelve years to write his "Critique of Pure Reason", although I'm not sure if it was spent mastering the knowledge, or making it so complicated that it is incomprehensible. Quote: <hr/> Kant: (1) Space is not an empirical concept abstracted from external experiences. For in order that certain sensations may be referred to something outside me [i.e., to something in a different position in space from that in which I find myself], and further in order that I may be able to perceive them as outside and beside each other, and thus as not merely different, but in different places, the presentation of space must already give the foundation. <hr/> Kant is basically saying that if the concept of space was not known, then it would be impossible to conceive of anything outside of oneself or apart from each other in any way. There would be no way to learn about space if it wasn't built into our minds. Quote: <hr/> Russell: There is here, as throughout Kant's theory of the subjectivity of space and time, a difficulty which he seems to have never felt. What induces me to arrange objects of perception as I do rather than otherwise? Why, for instance, do I always see people's eyes above their mouths and not below them? <hr/> If space was not part of the mind, people's eyes and mouths would be part of oneself, a self that would have no size. The concept of them being separate objects would never arise in the first place, so his refutation is misguided. Quote: <hr/> Kant: (2) Space then is a necessary representation a priori, which serves for foundation of all external intuitions. We never can imagine or make a representation to ourselves of the non-existence of space, though we may easily think no objects are found in it. It must, therefore, be considered as the condition of the possibility of phenomena, and by no means as a determination dependent on them, and is a representation a priori, which necessarily supplies the basis for external phenomena. <hr/> Kant is saying that our imaginings of the physical world, thus our conceptions of it derived from perceptions, require space. |

Quote:

---

Russell: It seems to me that no serious argument can be based upon what we can or cannot imagine; but I should emphatically deny that we can imagine space with nothing in it. You can imagine looking at the sky on a dark cloudy night, but then you yourself are in space, and you imagine the clouds that you cannot see. Kant's space is absolute, like Newton's, and not merely a system of relations. But I do not see how absolute empty space can be imagined.

---

By "space" Kant means "dimension", not outer space. If you can think of an empty box, then you are thinking of space with no objects in it. Kant is saying no object can be imagined without size.

Quote:

---

Kant: (3) Space is not a discursive, or as we say, general conception of the relations of things, but a pure intuition. For, in the first place, we can only represent to ourselves one space, and, when we talk of divers spaces, we mean only parts of one and the same space. Moreover, these parts cannot antecede this one all-embracing space, as the component parts from which the aggregate can be made up, but can be cogitated only as existing in it. Space is essentially one, and multiplicity in it, consequently the general notion of spaces, of this or that space, depends solely upon limitations. Hence it follows that an a priori intuition (which is not empirical) lies at the root of all our conceptions of space. Thus, moreover, the principles of geometry- for example, that "in a triangle, two sides together are greater than the third," are never deduced from general conceptions of line and triangle, but from intuition, and this a priori, with apodeictic certainty.

---

Kant is saying that space is contiguous and the same for all objects.

Quote:

---

Russell: The gist of this argument is the denial of plurality in space itself. What we call "spaces" are neither instances of a general concept "a space," nor parts of an aggregate. I do not know quite what, according to Kant, their logical status is, but in any case they are logically subsequent to space. To those who take, as practically all moderns do, a relational view of space, this argument becomes incapable of being stated, since neither "space" nor "spaces" can survive as a substantive.

---

I can't tell what Russell is saying about this argument, but he's still stuck on #1 because he is conceiving of space as a physical phenomenon. Space pervades all objects because Kant is not talking about a lack of matter.

Quote:

---

Kant: (4) Space is represented as an infinite given quantity. Now every conception must indeed be considered as a representation which is contained in an infinite multitude of different possible representations, which, therefore, comprises these under itself; but no conception, as such, can be so conceived, as if it contained within itself an infinite multitude of representations. Nevertheless, space is so conceived of, for all parts of space are equally capable of being produced to infinity. Consequently, the original representation of space is an intuition a priori, and not a conception.

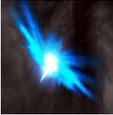

---

He's saying we cannot conceive of space being cut off or limited in any way, so it's built into the mind. In other words, it's not a conception that we have created, so it can't be modified conceptually in any way.

Russell just doesn't get it. His argument is just out there and it's not worth repeating.

Thanks in advance for corrections if I've made any mistakes!

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/7/04 10:59 pm

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| primus meridianPosts: 10(3/8/04 2:19 am)Reply                         | Re: Kantian Metaphysics <hr/> Was metaphysics ever lost? Kant has always been thoroughly explored in philosophical communities as far as I know, so much so even as to become too much. I know Nietzsche despised Kant for being too categorical, but overall I myself might be a bit ignorant of the works of Kant the hermit.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| MGregoryPosts: 487(3/8/04 5:49 am)Reply                               | Re: Kantian Metaphysics <hr/> Most people believe that empirical science can be used as a basis for all knowledge and that introspective knowledge can be ignored, so I think it's safe to say that metaphysics is lost. Modern Western philosophy is primarily concerned with epistemology, which seems to me to be an attempt to resolve the conflicts that emerge when this point of view is taken. Modern psychology is essentially empirical, which explains why it has had such little success, although I think it might be turning towards Eastern philosophy these days, which would probably be a good thing, although I doubt that will fix it. People just don't take the time to think about anything metaphysical. It can take years of introspection to work out all the errors, and each person has to do this for himself. I think Nietzsche's main grudge against Kant was the idea of things-in-themselves, an idea which is totally unnecessary if one takes a holistic view of noumenon like Spinoza did. But I'm not completely sure about that. I'm pretty sure he rejected Kant's Categorical Imperative, which was an attempt at absolute morality. I'm a bit ignorant of the works of Kant myself. I'm just kind of exploring them. I think his idea of "pure intuition" was good, but he seems to have missed the idea that the idea of separated objects is a "pure intuition", and instead turned to things-in-themselves. Although, I don't really know if he addressed how we can know about individuated things. I'm thinking he probably didn't. Edited by: MGregory at: 3/8/04 5:50 am |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 854(3/8/04 12:29 pm)Reply  | Re: Kantian Metaphysics <hr/> MGregory: As I read Russell's exposition of Kant in "A History of Western Philosophy", I'm thinking Kant was right on the money with respect to space. Matt, I've got the same book from Russell; it's not really a good introduction to Kant. If you want to "revive" metaphysics, then Kant's space and time conceptions are probably the wrong starting point, because Kant uses them as a foundation for his epistemology in "Critique of Pure Reason"; he doesn't treat them metaphysically. What Kant wants to show in the Critique is that spatiotemporal perception is a property of consciousness and that space and time are not empirically derived as the British empiricists claimed. Kant says that time and space are 'non-empirical particulars' providing the basis for both synthetic a priori propositions, as well as a posteriori propositions. MGregory: Kant created four arguments in favor of the idea that space is an a priori concept. Kant actually made a distinction between a priori concepts in general and space and time in particular. He classified space and time as described above while he proposed twelve additional fundamental 'a priori concepts', which he also calls 'categories'. This term has a special meaning for Kant; it means something like 'foundation class of thought'. They are: unity, plurality, totality, reality, negation, limitation, substance, causality, interaction, possibility, existence, and necessity. Thomas                                                                                                   |
| MGregoryPosts: 492(3/8/04 1:10 pm)Reply                             | Re: Kantian Metaphysics <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Matt, I've got the same book from Russell; it's not really a good introduction to Kant. If you want to "revive" metaphysics, then Kant's space and time conceptions are probably the wrong starting point, because Kant uses them as a foundation for his epistemology in "Critique of Pure Reason"; he doesn't treat them metaphysically. What Kant wants to show in the Critique is that spatiotemporal perception is a property of consciousness and that space and time are not empirically derived as the British empiricists claimed. Kant says that time and space are 'non-empirical particulars' providing the basis for both synthetic a priori propositions, as well as a posteriori propositions.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

But that's what metaphysics is! Properties of consciousness. At least that's how I understand it.

I think of metaphysics as knowledge that we use to create our mental construct of the world, including science and everything stemming from it, like theoretical science. It's knowledge that we intrinsically have, but we are not naturally aware that we are using it, much like Kant's idea of space. Space itself is empirical, but the knowledge that space is intrinsic to consciousness would be metaphysics.

So, I guess I need a good definition of metaphysics that's absolutely unmistakable. What is your definition? Are you thinking of something like Democritus, because I think his theories are considered metaphysics, but I think of that as theoretical science (or maybe they call it speculative science). I don't think of metaphysics as anything that could supplant physics or anything that physics could supplant. This is because metaphysics itself cannot change since it exists prior to physics, and physics can only change via more physics, since if you tried to change physics with metaphysics, you'd just end up in a different field, like quantum mechanics. The boundaries would change and require different methods until the knowledge became developed enough to cross the boundaries. And even then the two fields would probably coexist, they would just start to overlap.

Quote:

---

Kant actually made a distinction between a priori concepts in general and space and time in particular. He classified space and time as described above while he proposed twelve additional fundamental 'a priori concepts', which he also calls 'categories'. This term has a special meaning for Kant; it means something like 'foundation class of thought'. They are: unity, plurality, totality, reality, negation, limitation, substance, causality, interaction, possibility, existence, and necessity.

---

I do remember Russell talking about those now that you mention them, but I haven't got that far yet.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 856
(3/8/04 6:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

MGregory: But that's what metaphysics is! I think of metaphysics as knowledge that we use to create our mental construct of the world...

No, that is not metaphysics; that is epistemology. Everything that has to do with how we establish knowledge, beliefs, mental constructs, etc. is epistemology. The problem is that metaphysics is traditionally a loose term and that it has once included - for obscure reasons- the field now known as psychology. This does, however, neither fit well with the modern nor the classical Aristotelian understanding of metaphysics. Metaphysics is ontology, theology, and speculative natural science, or respectively the study of that which is 'above' the natural sciences. Of course, this notion has been shaken in recent times, because it became increasingly clear that there is nothing 'above' the natural sciences.

MGregory: So, I guess I need a good definition of metaphysics that's absolutely unmistakable.

That's going to be a bit difficult, because today you find branches of philosophy that do not comfortably fit into one of the traditional categories. The philosophy of mind is such an example.

MGregory: I don't think of metaphysics as anything that could supplant physics or anything that physics could supplant.

The latter is the case. Physics has actually supplanted metaphysics during the course of history, especially in the field of cosmology where speculations 'on the heavens' were superseded by the science of astronomy. Biology is another example. Metaphysical speculations about the origin of man have been made redundant by evolution theory.

MGregory: I do remember Russell talking about those now that you mention them, but I haven't got that far yet.

While Kant has treated metaphysics in separate works such as 'A New Explanation of the First Principles of Metaphysical Knowledge (1755)' and 'Metaphysical Foundations of Natural Science (1786)', it is impossible to deny that metaphysical themes are present in all of his works. So, the issue isn't simple.

Thomas

MGregory
Posts: 499
(3/9/04 6:05 am)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

Quote:

---

No, that is not metaphysics; that is epistemology. Everything that has to do with how we establish knowledge, beliefs, mental constructs, etc. is epistemology.

---

I don't know about this. I have tried to find information about it and all I could find was postmodernism and analysis of natural science and virtue. That's not really what I want. I still think metaphysics is the term I want to use. The term "epistemology" will suffer the same fate as "metaphysics", mark my words. Someday all the astrology and witchcraft books will be under the "epistemology" section of the bookstore, just as they are under "metaphysical studies" now. Once the philosophy of mind becomes considered under epistemology, ESP and channelling won't be too far behind.

---

Quote:

---

The problem is that metaphysics is traditionally a loose term and that it has once included -for obscure reasons- the field now known as psychology.

---

Yes! Psychology should be included in metaphysics. In fact, they are the same thing, just different ends of the spectrum. At the end of the metaphysical side is the Universe, and at the end of the psychological side is the dictum "Make yourself." But the entire spectrum is fully metaphysical and psychological throughout. I only call it a graduated spectrum out of convention. The reason why it was included in metaphysics is because Freud started doing psychological research through introspection instead of through empirical observation. And in fact, it was Otto Weininger who suggested this to him, his introspective abilities being unmatched by any known person who ever lived. So metaphysics is really the science of introspection. That is an excellent definition!

---

Quote:

---

This does, however, neither fit well with the modern nor the classical Aristotelian understanding of metaphysics. Metaphysics is ontology, theology, and speculative natural science, or respectively the study of that which is 'above' the natural sciences. Of course, this notion has been shaken in recent times, because it became increasingly clear that there is nothing 'above' the natural sciences.

---

But that is metaphysical conclusion. Surely you can see that no amount of science could yield it. Science is about gathering data. Technology is about putting it to use. Metaphysics is used to determine what to look for next.

---

Quote:

---

The latter is the case. Physics has actually supplanted metaphysics during the course of history, especially in the field of cosmology where speculations 'on the heavens' were superseded by the science of astronomy. Biology is another example. Metaphysical speculations about the origin of man have been made redundant by evolution theory.

---

See, here is where I disagree. Right exactly here. Metaphysical results can be supplanted and refuted, but not metaphysics itself, because scientific speculation depends on knowledge that is not dependent on science, otherwise we would be trapped within the confines of current science and speculation would not be possible. Scientific results will only take you so far until you have to start looking in new directions, and this is where metaphysics fits in. But this is only one use of metaphysics. I see its purpose as the science that unchains thought from past results and allows us to be more creative. Creativity is a very important part of science and logic. But no, science has never destroyed metaphysics, only metaphysical results, and even that is debatable. The argument for intelligent design for instance, hasn't been defeated by physics, but by metaphysics. Physics doesn't address the issue of intelligent design because physics itself is just data, metaphysics is the logical interpretation. There is nothing in data that says where it came from, whether it be from a creator god or randomness or whatever.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 859
(3/9/04 1:25 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

MGregory: Someday all the astrology and witchcraft books will be under the "epistemology" section of the bookstore, just as they are under "metaphysical studies" now.

Look, I give a hoot about how bookstores classify their titles. The classical five branches of philosophy are logic, ethics, aesthetics, epistemology, and metaphysics. The ancients also included physics into the body of philosophy, which has now become the field of natural sciences. There can be no doubt that some of the classical branches are in the process of dissolution, most prominently metaphysic and aesthetics. Try to name a significant philosophical work on metaphysics or aesthetics that was written during the past 100 years. You won't find any.

MGregory: The term "epistemology" will suffer the same fate as "metaphysics", mark my words.

You may be right, but this is highly speculative. In epistemology we don't really observe the continuous decay that is peculiar to metaphysics. The field of epistemology seems to have a tendency to lie idle for a few hundred years after which it progresses in a sudden jolt. The greatest such jolt was Immanuel Kant after whom epistemology went into a slumber for almost 200 years until the advent of the philosophy of science when epistemology peaked again in Popper, Kuhn, et al. Are we really at the end with epistemology? Who can tell?

MGregory: So metaphysics is really the science of introspection. That is an excellent definition!

It's not a bad starting point. However, the method of introspection is also claimed by other fields such as psychology, ethics, aesthetics, and even by modern fields, such as philosophy of mind, social philosophy, value theory, and so on. The fact that philosophy is undergoing change and that some branches die out while others spring up is a good thing, in my view. It indicates that philosophy isn't dead yet.

MGregory: See, here is where I disagree. [...] Metaphysical results can be supplanted and refuted, but not metaphysics itself, because scientific speculation depends on knowledge that is not dependent on science.

But Matt, you can't delineate a field such as metaphysics merely by methodology. The corpus of metaphysics has once included cosmology, evolution, genetics, particle physics, etc., all of which have been eaten away by the natural sciences. Today I see the main habitat of metaphysics in the philosophy of religion. This field has been carefully excluded from scientific research, and it is the only extant reservation for metaphysics.

MGregory: Physics doesn't address the issue of intelligent design because physics itself is just data, metaphysics is the logical interpretation.

First, it's evolution theory -not physics- that kicked intelligent design out of the idea pool. Second, physics (or natural science) isn't just data! This is an outdated and flawed paradigm. Science is a logical, interpretative, curve fitting, theory building process.

Thomas

MGregory
Posts: 504
(3/9/04 3:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

Quote:

Look, I give a hoot about how bookstores classify their titles.

Well, I only say this as a fact indicative of academia. They don't just make these things up out of thin air.

Quote:

Try to name a significant philosophical work on metaphysics or aesthetics that was written during the past 100 years. You won't find any.

That's because most metaphysical work is being done in tandem with scientific fields, so people no longer think it is metaphysics. That is going to be the whole premise of my revival. Not to mention the books Kevin and David have written are highly significant, groundbreaking metaphysical works. They are way ahead of their time and will be widely recognized someday.

Quote:

---

Are we really at the end with epistemology? Who can tell?

---

I didn't mean to insinuate that epistemology is presently coming to an end. It could be just the beginning for all I know. I only say that someday it will come to an end because it is a field based on pure thought, which people for the most part do not understand. I could see someone with a doctorate in epistemology writing some bestselling book on ethical theory that contains an argument based on the existence of angels or something and it will go downhill from there.

Quote:

---

It's not a bad starting point. However, the method of introspection is also claimed by other fields such as psychology, ethics, aesthetics, and even by modern fields, such as philosophy of mind, social philosophy, value theory, and so on. The fact that philosophy is undergoing change and that some branches die out while others spring up is a good thing, in my view. It indicates that philosophy isn't dead yet.

---

See, I think if metaphysics comes to be seen to be a science that stands on its own, the scope for advancement in it would be astronomical. It would become by far the largest intellectual field by virtue of the fact of its open-endedness and pervasiveness. The whole challenge would be in making this pervasiveness visible.

Quote:

---

But Matt, you can't delineate a field such as metaphysics merely by methodology. The corpus of metaphysics has once included cosmology, evolution, genetics, particle physics, etc., all of which have been eaten away by the natural sciences.

---

Again, I say these fields have adopted metaphysical products, not methods but products, in their approach to innovation. The methodologies of metaphysics would be so different from ordinary scientific methodologies that they would be useful only to metaphysics itself.

Quote:

---

Today I see the main habitat of metaphysics in the philosophy of religion. This field has been carefully excluded from scientific research, and it is the only extant reservation for metaphysics.

---

I think that's a mistake.

Quote:

---

First, it's evolution theory -not physics- that kicked intelligent design out of the idea pool.

---

Ah ha! The basis of evolution theory is entirely the product of metaphysical speculation. The only scientific part of it is the data which is interpreted using these metaphysics. The main characteristic of its metaphysical component is that it is frozen and taken to be fact, which is fine, I'm not saying that it shouldn't be taken as fact, but the origin of this fact came from metaphysics and I think this lack of consciousness ought to be addressed so that the discovery of such facts can become a science in itself.

Quote:

---

Second, physics (or natural science) isn't just data! This is an outdated and flawed paradigm. Science is a logical, interpretative, curve fitting, theory building process.

---

That's because it has taken results from metaphysical thought and incorporated it, so now it's considered part of natural science. A static part, that doesn't necessarily need to be static. A highly skilled scientist with a deep understanding of metaphysics could conceivably approach science in a new way and create a huge leap in advances. That's exactly what Einstein did. We ought to cultivate the conditions for things like that. True metaphysical skill would produce a mind capable of forming new logical connections in any field. It's far from outdated, it's just been pushed into the background by people who do not understand that they are using it.

MGMacLeod
Registered User
Posts: 59
(3/10/04 1:47 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

Just to throw in my two cents here:

Metaphysics literally means 'after physics' and refers to the work that Aristotle did after his work on physics. On that basis, metaphysics traditionally means 'the study of the ultimate nature of reality'.

In contemporary philosophy, the word 'metaphysics' seems to have been replaced by 'ontology' and it has taken on the traditional meaning as well. This is pretty apparent from the context of the use of the word 'ontology' in recent philosophical works. I suspect that this happened because of the overly 'spiritual' and 'new age' kind of connotations that have been given to metaphysics recently.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 864
(3/10/04 2:22 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

MGregory: That's because it has taken results from metaphysical thought and incorporated it, so now it's considered part of natural science. A static part, that doesn't necessarily need to be static. A highly skilled scientist with a deep understanding of metaphysics could conceivably approach science in a new way and create a huge leap in advances.

Okay Matt, after thinking this over, I realize that metaphysics cannot be separated from physics (or natural science in general), since it surrounds science like a halo. As such metaphysics is probably immortal, or let's say at least no less mortal than science itself. When we talk about quantum physics questioning causality for example, that is metaphysics. The Copenhagen interpretation, the many worlds interpretation, all of that is metaphysics. These fields may some day disappear due to new advances in physics, but metaphysics will then simply move on to greener pastures.

But the way, philosophy of mind is one of the most dynamic fields in philosophy these days and it seems to contain a good portion of metaphysics, although it is somewhat hard to classify such a field using the traditional categories.

MGregory: That's exactly what Einstein did. We ought to cultivate the conditions for things like that. True metaphysical skill would produce a mind capable of forming new logical connections in any field. It's far from outdated, it's just been pushed into the background by people who do not understand that they are using it.

I agree with that. The skill for thinking philosophically (and metaphysically!) is still taught in many schools and universities in Europe. I presume that it is also taught in America, but I am somewhat skeptical of the education systems here in Asia, particularly in Thailand.

MGMacLeod: In contemporary philosophy, the word 'metaphysics' seems to have been replaced by 'ontology' and it has taken on the traditional meaning as well.

But ontology has always been the beef of metaphysics, hasn't it? The fact that metaphysics is reduced to ontology these days is due to the failings of theology to integrate with science, not because of any new age thingies...

Do people in America actually classify astrology, divination, new age theories, paranormal phenomena, and such things under 'metaphysics'? In Europe, bookshops and libraries maintain an 'esoterics' section for this.

Thomas

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1027
(3/10/04 2:39 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

metaphysics
1 a (1) : a division of philosophy that is concerned with the fundamental nature of reality and being and that includes ontology, cosmology, and often epistemology (2) : ONTOLOGY
2 b : abstract philosophical studies : a study of what is outside objective experience

Although 2 b is obviously a valid definition, you can see how all sorts of claptrap might be put into that category by people who wish to lend their claptrap some credence, or people who simply don't understand the more specific meaning of the definition.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 498
(3/10/04 5:18 pm)
Reply

Metaphysics

---

I believe the following site is mentioned here before somewhere, but nevertheless:
www.notcreatedequal.com/index.html

MGregory
Posts: 511
(3/10/04 8:54 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

Quote:

---

Thomas: Okay Matt, after thinking this over, I realize that metaphysics cannot be separated from physics (or natural science in general), since it surrounds science like a halo. As such metaphysics is probably immortal, or let's say at least no less mortal than science itself. When we talk about quantum physics questioning causality for example, that is metaphysics. The Copenhagen interpretation, the many worlds interpretation, all of that is metaphysics. These fields may some day disappear due to new advances in physics, but metaphysics will then simply move on to greener pastures.

---

What!!!? You're agreeing with me? I can't believe it! Surely you're putting me on. Hold on you guys, I think I'm having a Twilight Zone moment. Yep, you posted that at 2:22, that's my magic number. I have fully entered the Zone.

But seriously, I thought we would butt heads for awhile and call it a day. The last thing I was expecting was that you would agree with me. I'm in shock.

Do you realize that metaphysics, the science of introspection, is the science of living life? And that the only "method" in the pursuit of this science is dropping one's emotional attachments and freeing the mind of their burden? And that the field of metaphysics, as I conceive of it, would consist of mastering a spectrum of personal issues looking something like this?

These all blend together in the master metaphysician, who would actually be an enlightened sage.

This is really the only way it could become a science. But the unique thing about this science is that the observations one makes must take place within oneself. Each person would have to discover his own objectivity himself and use it to analyze his own personal observations. It would be the science of the individual. As more and more people get involved and start producing more metaphysical works, it would provide more arrows to point in the direction of the advancing metaphysician, which is all purely metaphysical works could provide, but that would be enough to maintain the intellectual integrity of the field. There would be no more questions like "What did the Buddha mean? What did Jesus mean?" because there would be enough materials available to discern the true direction of the path.

Now surely you don't agree with any of this. But I assert that it is the only way metaphysics as an intellectual field capable of being advanced could work. And as an added bonus, it would expose intellectual people to the ideas they would need to become enlightened if they have the inclination. And if they don't, they could use their metaphysical skills and lack of attachment to advance other areas of knowledge. I think a metaphysical revival like this would be a fine thing and it would probably be greatest thing that could happen on this planet. Indeed, it would be greatest thing that could happen in the entire Universe. My heart swells with joy at the mere thought of it. <sigh> But I suppose my revival will end with this post. I'm still going to write a book about it. It will be called Metaphysical Consciousness: The Science of Introspection. Pretty catchy, eh?

Quote:

---

Bu the way, philosophy of mind is one of the most dynamic fields in philosophy these days and it seems to contain a good portion of metaphysics, although it is somewhat hard to classify such a field using the traditional categories.

---

I will look into it soon. I've never heard of it until you mentioned it, to be honest with you. It sounds interesting.

Quote:

---

The skill for thinking philosophically (and metaphysically!) is still taught in many schools and universities in Europe. I presume that it is also taught in America, but I am somewhat skeptical of the education systems here in Asia, particularly in Thailand.

---

In not sure if it's taught here in America. They had no philosophy classes that I can remember at the high school I went to, which was a school in metro Detroit, so it was pretty big. I took Philosophy 101 in college, but it was just a light overview. It wasn't compulsory at all.

Quote:

---

Do people in America actually classify astrology, divination, new age theories, paranormal phenomena, and such things under 'metaphysics'? In Europe, bookshops and libraries maintain an 'esoterics' section for this.

---

Well, at Borders it's called "Metaphysical Studies". When I was in high school it was just called "Occult", which is what it should be called, in my opinion. I used to read that stuff hehe. It jelled well with all the horror novels I read. The Necronomicon was just a fabulous tome :-P

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 865
(3/11/04 12:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

MGregory: What!!!? You're agreeing with me? I can't believe it!

Why not? Occasionally I even agree with David. Depends on the point you or he makes. I still see metaphysics as being severed from philosophy, though, and I cannot imagine it to be a science on its own. For example when we look at the ontology of matter, we need to consider physics. Hence, the questions that have to do with the nature of material existence are attached to the body of physics.

MGregory: There would be no more questions like "What did the Buddha mean? What did Jesus mean?"

Hahaha. Actually I'd be glad to hear these questions more often. The problem is that many people don't care what the Buddha or Jesus meant, so these questions aren't asked in the first place.

Thomas

MGregory
Posts: 512
(3/11/04 2:35 pm)
Reply

Re: Kantian Metaphysics

---

Quote:

---

Thomas: I still see metaphysics as being severed from philosophy, though, and I cannot imagine it to be a science on its own. For example when we look at the ontology of matter, we need to consider physics. Hence, the questions that have to do with the nature of material existence are attached to the body of physics.

---

Well, the way I see it is that these types of questions would stay in their respective sciences where they belong and, although it may look at these questions as examples of metaphysical works for intellectual stimulation, metaphysics itself would be purely the study of introspection, and how we can improve the quality of it. It wouldn't actually be about creating metaphysical questions dealing with science or solving them. The primary purpose of metaphysics as a field of study would be to advance itself basically, like any other field. Part of this would involve distancing ourselves from scientific questions, because they don't have anything to do with the pursuit of metaphysics.

Take the argument for intelligent design, for example. What purpose does a theory like that serve? If it were suddenly taken seriously by the scientific community, would it then begin the quest for this intelligent being? I mean, what type of effect would it have on science? I personally can't think of any, other than to stop scientific research. So, I basically see this theory as a paraphrase of the question, "Do our lives have importance?" That's all it really is. The true metaphysician would just solve this problem directly.

The popularity of the theory of natural selection on the other hand is largely a cultural reaction against the arguments of intelligent design and creationism, which I also think is a bad thing. It's a theory that can never be proven to be certain, so I think we should always try to keep an intellectual distance from it and not think of it as certain. We should always think of it as a provisional theory instead of a religious truth, because you never know what might be out there waiting to be discovered. It might seem unlikely to the point of impossibility, but things always seem like that before something new is discovered. We shouldn't fixate ourselves on our current theories by becoming emotionally invested in them.*

Although this was probably a poor example, I'm trying to make the point that although metaphysics might analyze these types of things occasionally, it itself would have no vested interest in the outcomes of these types of things, nor in the creation of these types of questions. Those would be delegated exclusively to scientists that hopefully would have some metaphysical skill, in the same way a computer scientist has a firm foundation of mathematical skill.

* I should point out that I'm thinking of this in terms of the masses. The scientists themselves have a different, and quite likely additional, problem: they want to make their discoveries and profit from them as quickly as possible, and if they questioned their basic foundations all the time, it would slow down research and probably frustrate them. Ideally, though, they would constantly question the metaphysical assumptions of their work. I think it would be better in the long run, since it could save us from going down blind alleys. Granted, it could also cause us to go down blind alleys, but I think that the alleys would be much shorter if they were all constantly under scrutiny.

---

Quote:

---

MGregory: There would be no more questions like "What did the Buddha mean? What did Jesus mean?"

Thomas: Hahaha. Actually I'd be glad to hear these questions more often. The problem is that many people don't care what the Buddha or Jesus meant, so these questions aren't asked in the first place.

---

Well, we'll never really know what they meant for sure. For all we know they could have been lunatics that we have misinterpreted for hundreds of years. Although I believe they were speaking a timeless message, and can see logic in some of the things attributed to them, their manner of expression was geared toward the people of their day. That's not to say that we can't gain anything from reading it, but I think the body of literature communicating this timeless message should grow continually. It should be communicated from a wide variety of angles and perspectives, and address all different types of individuals. One reason for this is that it serves as a precaution against people becoming attached to a particular expression of Truth and missing the point of the message. Granted, they could become attached to the variety of expressions of Truth as well, but I think after awhile the person would realize that he is reading the same things over and over in different dresses and start looking within.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Karma

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|  pseudonymous11Registered UserPosts: 5(9/21/03 3:16 pm)ReplyezSupporter | Karma <hr/> In another forum, I noticed in a suffering (topic) thread that a member stated that Newton "proved" karma by discovering the natural law of an equal reaction for every action, and that no one addressed it. So I thought to start a new thread about my understanding on karma. Newton's Law is in reference to physical action and reaction, not valued emotional assessment and retribution. A movement will cause a displacement of elements. The action of knifing someone does not signify a karmic law. It signifies that an action was made, and a reaction was caused by it. The physical action has no emotional value, only a physical one according to Newton's Law. Karma reeks of the same stench of "if you are a good boy, you go to heaven, and if you are a bad boy, you go to hell". The Eastern philosophers being aware that the "soul" re-incarnates were bound to have asked the question "Why?" Simple. You re-incarnate because you were bad. It is a comfortable fit, and allows for a reward/punishment ideal that fit human's evolving morality. It has been an accepted ontology of the East for millenia. It is a viable possibility, but one rife with holes. What if the reason why we have to re-incarnate is because that which we |

are a part of is in matter? Consciousness has been evolving in this universe prior to the advent of humanity. The human body, with its emergent property of a pre-frontal lobe allowed for the most complex sensual tool for evolving consciousness to date. There is no reason to assume that homo erectus erectus is the last in the line for evolution. History supports evolution continuing beyond this human form.

So the consciousness we see as our own would seem to be more likely a part of the whole of consciousness evolving universally before during, and likely after our inclusion in the process. If the above scenario be true, which many theologians, philosophers, and awareness researchers like myself have concluded, then neither karma nor the liberation of your "soul" is plausible.

If the consciousness is here until it awakens, then the human portion of it will be here too. Simple, since a part cannot be greater than the whole, but must be subject to the existence of the whole. There is no such thing as karma, and there have never been any historical figures that have transcended re-incarnation. We evolve in the arena of matter so long as we are a part of consciousness as a whole. We arrived on the timeline of it, and science has yet to proven otherwise (in fact has proven it a likely fact by the theory of evolution, which seems self-evident enough to me).

What I wrote above is not Truth, but another possibility of it. For me, in my transcendental existence, it is self-evident. This does not make it truth. It just makes it the most likely percetion for me to date, having moved beyond karma, and liberation from incarnation, as plausible perceptions.

dcv-

Hanzil Sowwhat

Registered User

Posts: 2

(9/22/03 8:46)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

If you look at Newtons law and Karma as cause and effect in the physical universe, both are merely a "natural law" involving movement and the shaping of "things".

The "I thought that way last year, but now I think about things "this" way partly supports this.

Possibly the same explanation put into different forms by different cultures/thinkers. "What goes around, comes around", "If you continue to think the way you've always thought, you'll continue to get what you've always got."

Merely observations that no matter how much you isolate yourself or a "thing" it is still a 'causal' item.

There was a description once I read (Walter Russell I believe) that our mind is like the center of a wheel. One spoke is in contact with the 'world' and we sense it. As the wheel moves that spoke (ourselves?) loses that sense of 'being in the world' (death) but does not destroy the mind which may again sense the world anew through the next spoke.

Certainly there are bad things that happen to us and others in the world, though the bad being bad is somewhat based on cultural and other beliefs.

Not that I've answered anything here, but I do enjoy the comparisons between science and philosophies. As I understand it now, the truth is a whole, as soon as it is broken down into component parts to aid understanding it becomes merely part-truth.

The Karma belief, Newton law of cause and effect and other similar beliefs(?) seem to sustain the thought that history repeats itself and that human life may be a process of re-remembering or putting back together. There are also thoughts that the universe is in constant flux which may fit the wheel death/rebirth theme also.

Sorry, I guess this turned into a ramble.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 924

(9/22/03 10:48)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

I had naturally noticed that Newton's law of cause and effect appears to be a physical level representation of what could be the larger truth of karma. I tend to believe that patterns in this universe repeat themselves in different ways and different levels. It's odd to believe in reincarnation and the development of the "soul" without thinking that one's actions, motives, and thoughts have a boomerang affect. It would also obviously seem to be a logical process that would eventually effect the growth and change of the individual.

I agree that while the Eastern philosophy of reincarnation is at first glance a much more reasonable and just belief system than eternal damnation, it often amounts to the same thing when interpreted by negative and twisted human beings. The foolishness of people seems to be a sickness of some sort, and I personally think it has something to do with civilization. There is no sublime teaching that cannot be perverted to despicable ends by the clueless.

I very much like your understanding of our consciousness not needing to "go" anywhere, or become forever bodiless. You have what I call an organic outlook. But it is not true that there is no liberation possible. We can be liberated from ignorance and all the misery it entails. It is part of the above-mentioned negative interpretations that religions put on things to obsess over guilt. Guilt, in my opinion, does not exist. One is what one is, and one will become what one will become.

 pseudonymous11

Registered User

Posts: 6

(9/22/03 12:12)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Karma

---

hanzil,

thank you for that response. there was much of value there, and it was appreciated.

dcv-

 pseudonymous11

Registered User

Posts: 7

(9/22/03 12:21)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Karma

---

I had naturally noticed that Newton's law of cause and effect appears to be a physical level representation of what could be the larger truth of karma. I tend to believe that patterns in this universe repeat themselves in different ways and different levels. It's odd to believe in reincarnation and the development of the "soul" without thinking that one's actions, motives, and thoughts have a boomerang affect. It would also obviously seem to be a logical process that would eventually effect the growth and change of the individual.

hermes,

this was wonderful. got me contemplating, and wondering if repeatable patterns (a necessary aspect of matter being matter, if i am not mistaken... repeatable and sustainable patterns) might have been given an egoic definition to explain an emotional level of patterns. ego is part of the illusion too, and therefor would be subject to the same laws as all other forms. i don't know if that made any sense, but it is hard to get a clear causal awareness into writing sometimes in my experience.

dcv-

Hanzil Sowwhat
Registered User
Posts: 3
(9/22/03 17:47)
Reply

Re: Karma

---

.... hard to get a clear causal awareness into writing sometimes in my experience.

Yes indeed, like the wise man that went into the wilderness to "discover" himself. So many satorical insights, he gained a complete understand of life, the universe, and everything.
His followers, upon his return, rented a large hall in a majior city so he could relay what was learned.
People heard of this and came from all over, paying $75 a seat.
A low rumble hushed as the wise man walked on stage, about to reveal his secrets to everyone present.
Stepping up to the microphone he said in a clear but quiet voice "What is, is", turned again and walked away.

The wise man was a Zen master. ;) From what I've heard, this is a mostly true story.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 589
(9/22/03 22:30)
Reply

Re: Karma

---

Reincarnation, in it's commonly understood sense, has always struck me as a rather bizarre, yet understandable, invention of fantasy. However, the everyday Karmic process (I hesitate to call it a 'law') seems to me quite descriptive in it's definition, which flows and follows naturally from experience. One might call it the Ironic 'law'.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 615
(9/23/03 20:37)
Reply

Re: Karma

---

pseudonymous11: There is no reason to assume that homo erectus erectus is the last in the line for evolution.

Quite right. There no reason to assume such a thing, since its successor has already evolved. Should there be any uncertainties regarding your own lineage, kindly post your avatar/photo to this board so we may ascertain and properly classify your anthropolgical affiliation.

Thank you. :-)

Now to the suggested parallels between the law of karma and Sir

Newton. Although such a relationship exists in the mind of anyone who cares to conceptualize it, the comparison is allegoric, therefore hardly a 'proof'.

It goes into the right direction, though. You cannot touch without being touched. You cannot act without being acted upon. Ah, yes of course; but this is obvious. This realization is about as useful as knowing that atoms and molecules envelop spinning motions in view of life-size motions, such as the complex motions of wind, water, and bodies. Real-life karma, the sort of karma that matters in our life, is a million times more complex than what Mr. Newton had addressed. It can only be grasped intuitively if it can be 'grasped' at all.

Cheers, Thomas

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 590

(9/23/03 23:10)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

I guess that's correct, grabbing a hold of 'Karma' and giving it's complexities a full analysis would be akin to doing the same with truly chaotic complex systems, like the brain perhaps. It is way above our heads, out of our reach. But if we jump high enough, we might give the pinata a whack and see some of it's contents spill out. One might say that the whacking is done intuitively but the spillage can be pored over by the conscious.

Karma is most readily identified with Buddhism in the west, although it is also a central tenet of Hinduism and Jainism. If the associated notion of reincarnation is removed, there are also parallels with other religious conceptions. The pagan witch follows the Law of Threefold Return, under which any act "for good or for ill, shall be returned to us threefold.". There are many new age conceptions which associate good fortune with virtuous action and vice versa. Even the Xian idea of sin and judgement goes some way towards it.

It's popularity and expression across the board points to some kind of shared experiential circumstances, which in turn might be isolated, analysed and described, thereby removing the more theistic elements.

On a very basic level, karma could refer to justice, defined as 'that which is merited or deserved'. Of course this introduces the element of judgement - right and wrong, good and bad - which might point us in the direction of it being a moralistic guide, the devil and the angel on the shoulder - the conscience. If we look at it from an experiential and descriptive point of view (as opposed to it being portioned out by some judge or mechanism of judgement), it might even throw some light on this very subjective subject of good and bad, where good and bad are simply defined in the sense of personal advantage or disadvantage - do unto others as you would have done to you, or do unto the world as you would have the world do to you. On this basic level, it seems quite natural that sets of circumstances are conceptualised in such a way and the resultant mindset would also seem to naturally fit in with the seeming patterns in circumstance.

Often it might seem to an observer that another might be contravening this 'law' yet not experiencing the just reactions caused by their actions, although one can never truly know this to be the case. Perhaps this is where the concept of reincarnation comes in, in that such a person will be visited by their accumulated Karma in the next lives.

The eastern conceptions seem to work on a more psychological level, as well as the gross level. In Buddhism, Karma means cause, or more specifically intention. It is accompanied by Vipaka, which is result or effect. So by an individual's will, an effect or reaction can itself influence an action - the chain of causality. The psychological element is simple and seems to naturally flow from the concept. Not only does conscious and intentional positive action produce positive reactions in the gross world, it also produces and reinforces positive conditioning of the mind (and vice versa), and so one's personal karma. Perhaps one might contend that rebirth would naturally follow from this, who knows.

Personally, I'd prefer to remove the theistic elements and see it simply as a system of positive personal governance which will in turn produce whatever the opposite of a vicious circle is, or if one so chooses, a vicious circle, depending on the virtue of one's intentions and actions. This would satisfy psychological and experiential description and also tie in with ancient religious conceptions whilst removing their more seemingly fallacious elements. It would also offer a personally beneficial carrot on the end of a stick, encouraging positive action, offering basic moral guidance, so forming a more ordered world where there is such a thing as right and wrong; and where one's accordance with this will see one, and eventually all, right and proper.

Karma as some supernatural judgemental mechanism, portioning out justice to the sentient inhabitants of the universe, I'm not so sure about.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 929

(9/24/03 1:04 am)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

There no reason to assume such a thing, since its successor has already evolved.

Actually, I've been pondering the possibility that we are indeed undergoing an evolutionary leap, which is possible under the punctuated equilibrium style of evolution. However, it would not be detectable in a photo.

But, re karma-

The question is, Thomas, is it really just a coincidence that physical laws have a parallel in the more subtle levels of reality? As to complexity, wasn't it you who discussed the butterfly effect and how the system was so complex that we could never predict outcomes?

Actually, I find it odd to even separate "real life karma" from physical action and reaction. It is all one system.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 9/24/03 1:08 am

rushdl

Registered User

Posts: 2

(9/24/03 1:29)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

I think maybe karma is created, by the way in which you travel through this life. So in general, it holds true. How you eat sleep and live, effects the things that come your way. The same effects how you choose to deal with those things.

See if there is any correlation between your Best Times in life, and your worst times.

Basic Principles Of Vaastu

The following are some of the Vaastu-logically correct principles of house making and design. Please note that like most of the ancient sciences, some of the knowledge that is contained in these principles may not be any more relevant at present times. However, the very basic of Vaastu principles will always continue to be beneficial to the mankind in one form or the other.

The basic principles are:

If you are in the process of buying a plot or site, please remember that plots/sites in South West, South & West directions are more advantageous than others.

According to Vaastu, the most beneficial entrances in the house are those in North East, East or North direction.

Living Room or the dining room is best looked in East, North & Northeast directions.

The bedroom according to Vaastu should be in southwest/south or west direction.

The children's bedroom should ideally be in NorthWest. It could be in Southeast & North as well but never in southwest or south.

If you are fortunate enough in present times to have the luxury of having a separate room for the guests, make the guestroom in Northwest or northeast direction.

The kitchen of the house is ideally located in Southeast followed by NorthWest & East.

Bathrooms & Toilets should be in Northwest of the house or in West or South direction.

While purchasing a plot or a site, it is advisable to go in for a rectangular or square shape. As far as possible, the site should be slopping towards North & East or Northeast.

While making the building or the house, it is advisable to have equal open space on all four sides. The levels of open spaces should be higher in South & West side and lower in North & East side. Outlets of rainwater should be in Northeast or North zones.

The living room of the central zone (Brahma sthan) should be free from any kind of obstructions. By obstructions, we mean any kind of beam, pillar, fixture, toilet, staircase or even a wall or lift.

The direction in which you sleep is also very important. One should never sleep with head in the north. Sleeping with head towards south ensures long life. While on a journey, it is advisable to sleep with head towards west.

In your study room, have your seat so as to face east or north. Do not have a toilet in the study room, though you can have a bathroom.

Do not use a dark colour in the study room. Use yellow or white or pink. Put the book shelf in east or north.

If you construct more than a floor, prepare the first floor on Southwest. The height of first floor shall not exceed that of ground floor. Do not build a storeroom on first floor.

It is said that a storeroom in the Northwest corner leads to abundant supply of essential commodities. Keep a holy picture on one eastern wall. Light colours should not be used on the storeroom. Use dark colours or blue or green. Never sleep in the storeroom at night. Also refrain from taking out grains from the storeroom in night.

The bathroom/bathrooms can be either inside or outside the house. In case it is inside, it should be located on the eastern or northern side. (If attached to a bedroom, then to eastern or northern side of the bedroom). When located outside, then it should be in Northeast corner, but away from the main building. The lavatories are forbidden in Northeast, Center, Southwest and West directions of the house.

Vaastu Shastra also guides us about what type of plants and trees should be planted around a dwelling unit so as to enjoy their positive properties the most.

Vaastu does not prescribe having a Mango, Banana or a Jamun tree very near your house. However Peepal at some distance from the house in West direction is considered auspicious as is Imli in South West of the house.

It is also auspicious to have an Anaar, Ashoka, Chandan, Champa, Chameli, Gulaab, Nariyal & Keshar tree around a house. On the size & shape of the door, Vaastu advises that width of the door should be half of the height of the door. Square doors as also automatic doors should be avoided.

The Paintings / Statues in the house are also important. One should not have pictures depicting war scenes (even if they belong to the Epic Mahabharata or Ramayan battles). Similarly scenes depicting negativities of life like sorrow, struggle, violence (including that of wild beasts), tragedy and of calamities.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 617

(9/24/03 13:58)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Dave: Personally, I'd prefer to remove the theistic elements and see it simply as a system of positive personal governance which will in turn produce whatever the opposite of a vicious circle is, or if one so chooses, a vicious circle, depending on the virtue of one's intentions and actions.

Theistic elements? I sympathize with what you are saying, but where do you see theistic elements? Even though the idea of karma was injected into world literature by the pronouncedly theistic culture of India, the idea is remarkably "godless". Karma is described as a "law" as in "natural law", which emphasizes the absence of higher agency.

Anna: Actually, I've been pondering the possibility that we are indeed undergoing an evolutionary leap, which is possible under the punctuated equilibrium style of evolution. However, it would not be detectable in a photo.

It was a pun, Anna. I don't know about the previous poster, but my personal genetic club membership is homo sapiens sapiens and not homo erectus. If you should belong to a genus other than homo sapiens sapiens I would be thrilled to meet you. :-)

Anna: The question is, Thomas, is it really just a coincidence that physical laws have a parallel in the more subtle levels of reality?

No, it is not coincidence. But Newton's third law is very primitive compared to karma and thus the comparison is symbolic at best. Sir Newton's findings relate to mechanical bodies. Would you say that classical mechanics is capable of describing the interactions of body, mind, and spirit? Probably not.

When I think of karma, I think of architecture. That may seem unconventional, because karma is a dynamic process - cause and effect - action and reaction, whereas architecture is structure; it is static. The crux is that karma as a dynamic process unfolds too slowly to be observed consciously at its full scale. Occasionally, karmic bits and flashes do of course unfold quickly or even instantly, capable of being consciously noticed, but these are only fragments. The large mass of karma is only indirectly visible in form of its products, sentient beings. Karma formations are clear and present in every human being. People's bodies, characters, aptitudes, habits, inclinations, circumstances, likes and dislikes, almost everything including the tone of their voices, the way they move and speak, everything is formed, molded, and carved out by karma. Karma is the architecture of sentient beings; shapes, posts, beams, brackets and trusses. Architecture.

Anna: Actually, I find it odd to even separate "real life karma" from physical action and reaction. It is all one system.

Both the butterfly and the storm comprise the same system, but it does make sense to differentiate them, doesn't it? The differentiation is made for the sake of clarity. There is nothing odd in that.

Cheers, Thomas

Hanzil Sowwhat
Registered User
Posts: 10
(9/24/03 14:12)
Reply

Re: Karma

Dave

Quote:

---

Reincarnation, in it's commonly understood sense, has always struck me as a rather bizarre, yet understandable, invention of fantasy

---

From the base point, the earth is sort of a closed environment, what's here stays here. Atoms that were part of a trilobites body could be a component in yours or mine now.

Not that this is a reason to believe in reincarnation (or karma) but many times words get used to describe that which is poorly understood and then get expounded upon.

Odd thing though, the original 'creator' of the word and belief in karma or reincarnation..well, we all know how difficult it is to come up with an original thought don't we? How could you make something up like that?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 599
(9/24/03 21:38)
Reply

Re: Karma

Quote:

---

Thomas: Theistic elements? I sympathize with what you are saying, but where do you see theistic elements?

---

Specifically, I can see the karmic process as a perfectly simple, naturally flowing, description of empirical and meta-empirical circumstances within conscious human experience. It is it's marriage with rebirth/ reincarnation which introduces what I see as a more speculative, as opposed to interpretive, element. Whilst one might say that such a thing could be described as supernatural, as far as our current empirical understanding goes, I can also see the arguments for such a thing, as well as understanding the more obscure definitions of reincarnation, and the fact that current empirical understanding is anything but definitive.

However, there can be no doubt that the general interpretation is that of the individual being individually reincarnated. Whether one puts this down to a god or to some judgemental mechanism, be it 'natural' or not, one seems to be deferring and referring to higher agency.

Quote:

---

Even though the idea of karma was injected into world literature by the pronouncedly theistic culture of India, the idea is remarkably "godless". Karma is described as a "law" as in "natural law", which emphasizes the absence of higher agency.

---

I'm hoping you remember the argument I put forth some time ago on the subject of free will?

The prescriptive Vs descriptive thing, propositions looking after themselves, etc?

When one says that Karma is described as a 'law', even a 'natural law', one is ascribing it the generally understood quality of prescription - something violable and enforced (In contrast to prescriptive laws, descriptive laws are factual truths -which are inviolable - as opposed to logical truths). If something is as such, I can see no other enforcer or prescriber than higher agency.

It is akin to logical fatalism, as illustrated by Aristotle's 'Sea Battle' - what will be true tomorrow is necessarily true today.

Logical causation confuses the semantic order in that it makes it appear that the truth of a proposition 'causes' an event to occur. Surely it is, rather, that the event's occurring tomorrow 'makes' (but does not cause) the proposition to be true today. This is not 'backwards causation', the relationship between an event and the truth of the proposition describing that event is not a causal relationship at all. It is a semantic relationship.

One can make all sorts of predictions about future events, based on varying levels of evidence. However, those that turn out to be true are not forced to occur by my (or anyone or anything) prescribing so, rather they become true when they become true (at which point they may be described). That the sun will come up tomorrow is only a belief, until it happens.

A prescribed 'law', in its description, misrepresents the nature of the relationship between a true proposition and the state-of-affairs in the world that accounts for that proposition's being true. It is the way the world was, is, and will be that account for propositions being true. It is not the other way round.

You may have noticed that 'Natural laws' seem in fact to be inviolable, and might therefore more readily fit into the category of descriptive laws (I won't go into the arguments about the discovery of these laws and the prevailing theistic views of the time, even for Newton). But one must then ask the question, if the 'Natural Laws' are descriptions, how can a description govern?

From a strictly descriptive point of view, 'Natural Laws' do not and cannot govern the universe. To do so, they would require (dare I say) supernatural powers. To think otherwise is to turn the semantic theory of truth upside down, making the argument unintelligible.

The truth of propositions does not force the world to be one way rather than another. The world unfolds and whichever way it does unfold, propositions 'look after themselves'. They take their truth from the way the world is. They don't 'force' the world to be any particular way at all.

I think that the source of the problem lies in the failure of many persons to fully shake off the historical view that laws of nature govern the world. I also think this is a legacy of theism.

Of course, this is all based on mere logical truth. And I'm confident that you are one of the few that truly recognises the very real limitations of Incompleteness.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 600

(9/24/03 22:05)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Quote:

Hanzil: From the base point, the earth is sort of a closed environment, what's here stays here. Atoms that were part of a trilobites body could be a component in yours or mine now.

Not that this is a reason to believe in reincarnation (or karma) but many times words get used to describe that which is poorly understood and then get expounded upon.

---

Indeed. I understand this more obscure definition of reincarnation and there can be no doubting it's truth, just as there can be no doubting the truth of the fact that everything in our universe was once contained within a singularity, and that therefore we are the incarnation (or perhaps 'reincarnation') of said singularity.

I believe that this conception of reincarnation only conforms with that of Buddhism when one is extremely obscure with one's interpretation, whilst also ignoring some of the defined processes like accumulated Karma and it's rebirth along with, for want of a better word, the individual soul. However, I'm no authority on Buddhism.

---

Quote:

Odd thing though, the original 'creator' of the word and belief in karma or reincarnation..well, we all know how difficult it is to come up with an original thought don't we? How could you make something up like that?

---

As an argument for the subject, this constitutes logical fallacy. To suggest that it has truth merely because it is hard to have an original thought and that it is something that would be difficult to make up, does not relate to whether reincarnation describes an actuality at all.

On the subject of original thought, I'd say it's rarity really depends on what you mean by original. If I have a new thought which has been thought before by someone else, is it not still original to me. Many people say that there's nothing new in music, it's all been done before. Whilst there may be an element of truth in this, you'd do well to show that any new composition is anything but original. Creation by definition is original, as far as descriptive definition goes. Whilst every thought I have may well be a product of everything I've learned plus my genetic makeup, and might therefore be described as not being original; this definition of original is useless. The descriptive definition of original makes our every thought so.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 392

(9/25/03 1:12 am)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Dave Toast dismissed logic:

Quote:

---

Of course, this is all based on mere logical truth. And I'm confident that you are one of the few that truly recognises the very real limitations of Incompleteness.

---

I'm not sure about this Incompleteness.

Logic is based on differentiated concepts, which necessarily exist as consciousness. As long as there is consciousness, there is an object of consciousness. Consciousness is objects of consciousness, or rather the objects of consciousness and consciousness are the same thing. It doesn't matter whether you're thinking of a tv monitor or your wife, there is an object and it is what it is ('A') because of what it is not ('not A'). Change the definition and A is something else, because all definitions are arbitrary. That's all you need to know to form reasoned lines of thought. Even if you try to disprove it,  $A=A$ , you only assert it. That's why this incompleteness thing doesn't hold any water with me. If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts.

Edited by: G Shantz at: 9/25/03 2:34 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1518

(9/25/03 1:37)

Reply

----

---

Logic only appears to be the basis of all thought. It is logical that we attempt to see to where our thoughts begin. It is like recalling ones earliest memories. Like remembering however, it is impossible to capture the essence of what was, or in this case the basis of our thought, as anything, let alone logic, regardless that this same essence still is and continues to be. Reason is (or amounts to) no reason, as logic is illogical. Not that reason is not reasonable or logic illogical, but both.

Consciousness begins. In countless places. Springs.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 934

(9/25/03 2:26)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Thomas-

It was a pun, Anna.

Ha, ha! I had not noticed that he said homo erectus.

No, it is not coincidence. But Newton's third law is very primitive compared to karma and thus the comparison is symbolic at best. Sir Newton's findings relate to mechanical bodies. Would you say that classical mechanics is capable of describing the interactions of body, mind, and spirit? Probably not.

It is a useful window into more complex workings of reality. The reality of Newton's law will render some minds much more able to entertain a law like karma.

I like your architecture idea. (I see you have the requisite spatial reasoning David says is needed for enlightenment.) Shouldn't Newton's law have a role in this structure?

but it does make sense to differentiate them, doesn't it?

Of course it does. I'm all for differentiation, as I think that such divisions are indeed real and not arbitrary. I thought you had overdivided them, to the extent that one could exist entirely indepenently from the other, which I don't believe.

Hanzil-

How could you make something up like that?

I don't find it odd or very original. Indigenous peoples the world over come up with very similar interpretations. One would come up with the idea of karma from simple observation, and also somewhat more complex observation of a psychological nature. All people have a conscience, a sense of justice, and a great interest in the problem of death and time.

David-

I'm afraid you've left me in the dust. I followed your semantical argument to a point, but even though the laws are just descriptions of reality, and do not force it, does not mean that the actualities they describe are not in operation. Why should karma, if it be such a law, like gravity, need to be forced by a separate agent?

I seem to be a bit less leery of the divine than you, but I perceive karma as a mechanism that works automatically.

I particularly couldn't unravel this thought:

But one must then ask the question, if the 'Natural Laws' are descriptions, how can a description govern?

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 618

(9/25/03 14:08)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Dave: Specifically, I can see the karmic process as a perfectly simple, naturally flowing, description...

That's the way I see it, too.

Dave: I'm hoping you remember the argument I put forth some time ago on the subject of free will?

Yes, I remember it.

Dave: When one says that Karma is described as a 'law', even a 'natural law', one is ascribing it the generally understood quality of prescription - something violable and enforced (In contrast to prescriptive laws, descriptive laws are factual truths -which are inviolable - as opposed to logical truths). If something is as such, I can see no other enforcer or prescriber than higher agency.

This is possibly a misunderstanding. The classical Indian definition of karma leaves no room for such an interpretation. There is no supernatural agency. There is only the doer and the deed. Example: You are the doer.

You reach out your arm and shake hands with another person. The pressure you apply onto the other's skin is felt as pressure on your own skin. Action and reaction. The act is mechanical (Newton's third law!) and at the same time it is also psychological/karmic. The warm welcome creates a feeling of mutual goodwill and trust. Again, action and reaction. This is the way karma operates; simple and natural. To say it with your own words, the "law" of karma is descriptive and inviolable. Action is inseparable from reaction, since the latter is already contained in the first. You get the idea.

Anna: I like your architecture idea. (I see you have the requisite spatial reasoning David says is needed for enlightenment.) Shouldn't Newton's law have a role in this structure?

Perhaps. Structures are subject to many forces, such as gravity, wind, vibrations, etc. which can be visualized as a force diagram. Depending on the bearing qualities, the structure either collapses (transforms) or resists when a force is applied. Similarly, sentient beings encounter influences which -depending on the accumulated karma they carry- they may resist or by which they may be transformed.

A common obstacle to understanding karma is introduced by the assumption that karma applies only to the individual and that the transference of karma is strictly linear from entity to entity. This is quite incorrect. Karma works at both the individual and the collective level. Families, groups, populations, nations, and cultures all create their respective (collective) karma which is interwoven with that of the individual. This makes things more complicated. For example, tendencies in a society may spill over into the lives of the individuals, or vice versa, negative or beneficial actions of individuals may impact society as a whole.

Cheers, Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 935

(9/25/03 14:34)

Reply

Re: Karma

---

Quote:

---

Karma works at both the individual and the collective level. Families, groups, populations, nations, and cultures all create their respective (collective) karma which is interwoven with that of the individual.

---

Yes, I had figured that out. I've been wondering at the complexity engendered by reincarnating into different groups.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 604

(9/25/03 11:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Incompleteness.

---

Quote:

---

Greg: Dave Toast dismissed logic:

---

It was not my intention to do any such thing Greg. I was simply designating it's proper, logical context. Far from being a dismissal of logic, it is a confirmation. It would dismiss the absolute utility which is sometimes falsely projected onto logic, but it's actually a logical confirmation of logic itself, proof theory.

---

Quote:

---

Logic is based on differentiated concepts, which necessarily exist as consciousness.

---

No doubt that what we conceptualise as the logical law of identity is a product of human consciousness, which is in turn a product of it's environment and it's sensational experience of it. However, to say that formalised logic, or even logic itself is based on what we formalise as the law of identity is incorrect. In the same way that a house is based on so much more than it's foundations, logic is based on so much more than it's foundations. More pertinently, just as a house's foundations are based on something, so too are logic's foundations.

"It's no use sir, I'm afraid it's turtles all the way down."

Quote:

---

there is an object and it is what it is ('A') because of what it is not ('not A').

---

I'm not sure about your language here. To say that A is what it is because of what it is not, is not quite accurate - it is to put the cart before the horse. A is actually identified as A because it is identified as not being what it is not. It is not simply what it is because of what it is not. To use the same language, A is what it is because it is what it is.

Quote:

---

That's all you need to know to form reasoned lines of thought.

---

Seems to me that you need a damned sight more than the knowledge that something is what it is, in order to form reasoned lines of thought - reason for one.

Quote:

---

Even if you try to disprove it,  $A=A$ , you only assert it. That's why this incompleteness thing doesn't hold any water with me.

---

Incompleteness is not concerned with disproving  $A=A$ . Rather it is concerned with proving that ANY sufficiently strong axiomatic system is either inconsistent or incomplete, and that ANY sufficiently strong consistent axiomatic system cannot prove it's own consistency. That the law of identity falls into this category is neither here nor there, even if we were to assume that Identity is the bedrock of logic. This is because Incompleteness is a logical truth about logical truth.

Whether this holds any water with you is irrelevant. It's relevance is dependant upon it's holding proveable logical water, which it does.

Quote:

---

If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts.

---

This is a non sequitur. Why would Godel have to use something other than logic to logically prove Incompleteness?

-----

I realise that you may think that  $A=A$ , and what you do with it, does not qualify as 'a sufficiently strong axiomatic system', due to it's simple looking appearance; this is however not the case. Equivalence requires three axioms for starters, and that is before we even introduce the problem of change with respect to that of identity (temporal indexing), or the Law of the Excluded Middle, etc. Then we have all the axiomatisation involved in formalising what you describe above as "forming reasoned lines of thought".

Logic is all we've got, knowledge wise. It is not, and cannot be, the be all and end all.

$A=A$

Logical Truth = Logical Truth

Logical Truth about Logical Truth = Logical Truth about Logical Truth

Identity = Identity - (Percieved Reality)

Substance = Substance - (Actuality)

Totality = Totality - (A Complex Axiomatizable System)

Ultimate Reality = Ultimate Reality - (Incomplete Proveability Via Logic)

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Karma

 new topic

 new reply

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 621(9/26/03 14:59)Reply | Re: Incompleteness. <hr/> If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts. This argument always strikes me as particularly absurd. Consider the following construct: "If the gardener really thought that the rake has gaps, he would have to use something else to prove this." Answer: "No, he would not. He would find that the rake has gaps simply by looking at the patterns that it creates. This is what Goedel did." Cheers, Thomas |

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 394

(9/28/03 1:49)

Reply

--

---

Quote:

---

Greg Shantz: If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts.

Thomas Knierim: This argument always strikes me as particularly absurd. Consider the following construct: "If the gardener really thought that the rake has gaps, he would have to use something else to prove this." Answer: "No, he would not. He would find that the rake has gaps simply by looking at the patterns that it creates. This is what Goedel did."

---

When he looked at the rake, he would have had to compare it to a conception of what a rake without gaps would look like, in order to conclude that the rake he was looking at had gaps.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 129

(9/29/03 16:38)

Reply

Re: --

---

Quote:

---

Greg Shantz: If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts.

---

If logic were incomplete, then his "proof" must also be incomplete (and thus admits the possibility of being totally wrong). In other words, it would not be a proof at all, but simply nonsense.

The very definition of a logical proof is that it is complete, so Godel's incomplete proof can only be nonsense.

At least, that's the Godel spoken of by modern academics, who is probably just a product of their imagination, and nothing to do with the real Godel, who could have had some sense.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 622

(9/29/03 21:41)

Reply

Re: --

---

ksolway: The very definition of a logical proof is that it is complete, so Godel's incomplete proof can only be nonsense.

While the philosophical implications of Gödel's theorem are debatable, the theorem itself is not. Or as Gödel might have put it: "The position that Gödel's position is nonsense is nonsense." Of course everyone has the freedom to think and say that the earth is flat and that Gödel is wrong. Everyone is at liberty to derive a philosophical system based on a flat planets and non-Gödelian systems. Most people, however, will find such an approach fairly irrational.

Cheers, Thomas

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 436

(7/27/04 9:18)

Reply

Re: --

---

I wrote:

Quote:

---

Greg Shantz: If Godel really thought that logic was incomplete, he would have had to use something other than logic to prove this, which would have been impossible, because logic is the basis of all thoughts.

Thomas Knierim: This argument always strikes me as particularly absurd. Consider the following construct: "If the gardener really thought that the rake has gaps, he would have to use something else to prove this." Answer: "No, he would not. He would find that the rake has gaps simply by looking at the patterns that it creates. This is what Goedel did."

Greg Shantz: When he looked at the rake, he would have had to compare it to a conception of what a rake without gaps would look like, in order to conclude that the rake he was looking at had gaps.

---

Clearly this doesn't make any sense. What does a rake without gaps look like? Not a rake, clearly.

I suppose that what I should have said was that when he looked at the rake, his conception/definition of it would have included that rakes have gaps between the teeth, and that his conception was differentiated from what it was not (A/not A). This is using reason/logic. Since reason is the basis of all thoughts, Goedel would have done the same thing, since he was conscious, and consciousness operates through logic/rationality.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Owen1234Registered UserPosts: 1(1/5/04 2:45 am)Reply |  Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox <hr/> K Solway: (from the Logic/Reason thread)"Eg, if a barber shaves everyone in town who does not shave himself, then does he shave himself? This is undecidable." Not so. It is decidable, and it is contradictory. Assume that it is true that, There is a barber who shaves all and ony those who do not shave themselves. 1. There is a barber who shaves all and only those that do not shave themselves, implies, he shaves himself if and only if he does not shave himself. (that is the paradox) But, He shaves himself iff <math>\sim(\text{He shaves himself})</math>, is a contradiction. This is clearly of the form <math>p \leftrightarrow \sim p</math>, and it is contradictory. That is to say: The barber shaves himself, implies a contradiction. Therefore: it is not the case that The barber shaves himself. The barber does not shave himself, is true. Our assumption, 'There is a barber who shaves all and ony those who do not | shave themselves' is false!

He cannot exist. The description is contradictory.

There is no object that satisfies the description of the barber.

i.e. there is no thing that this barber does.

We can say what he does not do but we can't say what he does do.

It is false to say that the barber shaves himself.

There is no relation (R) at all, such that,  $\text{Ax}(\text{xRy} \leftrightarrow \sim(\text{xRx}))$  is true.

$\text{Ax}(\text{xRy} \leftrightarrow \sim(\text{xRx})) \rightarrow (\text{yRy} \leftrightarrow \sim(\text{yRy}))$ . By.  $\text{Ax} \text{Fx} \rightarrow \text{Fy}$

$\sim \text{Ax}(\text{xRy} \leftrightarrow \sim(\text{xRx}))$ , is a valid for all R's and all y's

$\sim \text{EyAx}(\text{xRy} \leftrightarrow \sim(\text{xRx}))$ , is a theorem.

There is no y (a barber) such that: y shaves x iff  $\sim(\text{x shaves x})$ , for all x's.

Also:

There is no y (shampooer) such that: y shampoos x iff  $\sim(\text{x shampoos x})$ , for all x's.

etc.

Note, this method resolves Russell's Paradox as well.

Owen

Edited by: Owen1234 at: 1/5/04 7:26 am

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 390
(1/5/04 5:19 am)
Reply

 Re: Ken Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

(Kevin. It's Kevin, Ohwhen.)

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 235
(1/5/04 9:47 am)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

---

KS: Eg, if a barber shaves everyone in town who does not shave himself, then does he shave himself? This is undecidable.

Owen: It is false to say that the barber shaves himself.

---

It depends whether "everyone" is meant to include the barber, or whether it means everyone except himself.

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 2
(1/5/04 10:30 am)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

It depends whether "everyone" is meant to include the barber, or whether it means everyone except himself.

How can it be that 'everyone' does not include the presumed barber.

Your hypothesis is absurd.

Owen

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 236
(1/5/04 1:14 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

---

How can it be that 'everyone' does not include the presumed barber.

---

That's just the way people use language.

If we say that the barber charges everyone $20 for a shave, it doesn't mean that he charges himself $20 when he shaves himself.

In the case that "everyone" does include the barber, and to "shave" means for a person to shave his face once, then on the one hand the moment the barber had shaved his face he would have shaved someone who shaves himself. On the other hand, until he has shaved himself once, he is a person who doesn't shave himself, so he is shaving a person who doesn't shave himself.

That's why this question has no real solution.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/5/04 3:36 pm

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 3
(1/5/04 9:10 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Kevin Solway:

In the case that "everyone" does include the barber, and to "shave" means for a person to shave his face once, then on the one hand the moment the barber had shaved his face he would have shaved someone who shaves himself. On the other hand, until he has shaved himself once, he is a person who doesn't shave himself, so he is shaving a person who doesn't shave himself.

-----

KS: ..then on the one hand the moment the barber had shaved his face he would have shaved someone who shaves himself.

This barber cannot shave himself because: he shaves all and only those who do 'not' shave themselves.

KS: On the other hand, until he has shaved himself once, he is a person who doesn't shave himself, so he is shaving a person who doesn't shave himself.

??? This statement has no logic. It has no sense.

He who shave all and only those who do not shave themselves impies that ...

If he shaves himself then he does not shave himself, and, if he does not shave himself he does shave himself.

This contradiction obviously cannot occur at all.

It is logically impossible for the barber, so described, to exist anywhere.

Kevin Solway: That's why this question has no real solution.

??? You are clearly wrong. The barber cannot shave himself.

Owen

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 237
(1/5/04 9:37 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Perhaps I should reword it:

A barber daily shaves every man who does not shave himself (and no one else).

- If the barber does not shave himself, he must abide by the rule and shave himself.

- If he does shave himself, according to the rule he will not shave himself.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/5/04 9:39 pm

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 209
(1/6/04 12:08 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

A barber daily shaves every man who does not shave himself (and no one else).

- If the barber does not shave himself, he must abide by the rule and shave himself. [And thus breaks the rule. In the moment that he begins to shave himself he becomes a man that shaves himself and has thus broken the rule. The rule cannot be followed, the statement is false]

- If he does shave himself, according to the rule he will not shave himself.

1. How quickly the barber must shave...how many billion each day?

2. I've been to a few female barbers.

Are you illustrating a form of false statement, a construct un-truth?

Rhett

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 239
(1/6/04 9:35 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

---

Are you illustrating a form of false statement, a construct un-truth?

---

I was illustrating a certain kind of meaningless/undecideable statement in the Reason/logic thread (to do with "incompleteness").

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 4
(1/6/04 10:04 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

K Solway:
I was illustrating a certain kind of meaningless/undecideable statement in the Reason/logic thread (to do with "incompleteness").

'The barber, who shaves all and only those that do not shave themselves, shaves himself' is neither meaningless nor undecidable. It is false!

Undecidable propositions are not meaningless.

The axioms of a given system are undecidable (within that same system)and they are certainly meaningful.

For example,  $x=x$  is an axiom of classical logic and it is not decidable within classical logic.

Owen

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 240
(1/6/04 11:06 pm)
Reply

Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

---

'The barber, who shaves all and only those that do not shave themselves, shaves himself' is neither meaningless nor undecidable. It is false!

---

The question is "Does the barber shave himself". If he doesn't shave himself, then the rule says he does in fact shave himself.

That is meaningless by my book.

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 5
(1/7/04 2:37 am)
Reply

Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

-----

'The barber, who shaves all and only those that do not shave themselves, shaves himself' is neither meaningless nor undecidable. It is false!

-----

KS:

"The question is "Does the barber shave himself". If he doesn't shave himself, then the rule says he does in fact shave himself."

"That is meaningless by my book."

I thought we were talking about logic and reason here.

Why do you think that your personal subjective view about meaning is relevant to logic or reason?

Is it your opinion that all talk about non-existent things such as, the barber or the present king of France, etc. are meaningless?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 212
(1/7/04 9:44 am)
Reply | Edit

☐ Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

The question is "Does the barber shave himself". If he doesn't shave himself, then the rule says he does in fact shave himself.

That is meaningless by my book.

Okay, i agree, i was not considering it in conjunction with the question, i presumed it had been deleted.

Rhett

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1595
(1/7/04 9:46 am)
Reply

☐ Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

I don't think the paradox is meaningful because it doesn't contain sufficient information. A number of different things might be inferred from it, some leading to resolution, some to contradiction or incoherency. It doesn't state, for example, whether the barber is, himself, from town. He may be an out of townner. One simply infers that he is from town.

I think the paradox is fundamentally incoherent, frankly.

Dan Rowden

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 215
(1/7/04 11:11 am)
Reply | Edit

☐ Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

He may be an out of townner. One simply infers that he is from town.

I agree with this point Dan (and is the barbershop itself in town?), but Kevin indicated that he dropped the town bit.

[However, despite my previous email, i am reluctant to support or refute it even in it's latter incarnation, because i haven't even looked at the link yet to know it's context, and because of my previously mentioned issues (billions & female barber). People will always look for a loophole, and if they find one it will water down, or they'll miss entirely, the point that one is trying to convey.]

Rhett

Owen1234

Registered User

Posts: 6

(1/7/04 6:46 pm)

Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Dan: He may be an out of townner. One simply infers that he is from town.

Rhett: I agree with this point Dan (and is the barbershop itself in town?), but Kevin indicated that he dropped the town bit.

The puzzle states that there is a small town called 'Seville' such that: among the shavable men of Seville there is a barber who shaves all and only those shavable men who do not shave themselves.

Rhett:

[However, despite my previous email, i am reluctant to support or refute it even in it's latter incarnation, because i haven't even looked at the link yet to know it's context, and because of my previously mentioned issues (billions & female barber). People will always look for a loophole, and if they find one it will water down, or they'll miss entirely, the point that one is trying to convey.]

There is no  $y$  such that: for all  $x$ ,  $(y \text{ shaves } x) \text{ iff } \sim(x \text{ shaves } x) \dots$ in any town.

-----
Barber paradox

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia.

The Barber paradox is a paradox with importance to mathematical logic and set theory. The paradox considers a town with a male barber who daily shaves every man who does not shave himself, and no one else. Such a town cannot exist:

If the barber does not shave himself, he must abide by the rule and shave himself.

If he does shave himself, according to the rule he will not shave himself.

Thus the rule results in an impossible situation.

This paradox is attributed to the British logician Bertrand Russell, who in 1901 constructed Russell's paradox to demonstrate the self-contradictory nature of Cantor's elementary set theory by formalizing the Barber paradox. The paradox also underlies the proof of Gödel's incompleteness theorem as well as Alan Turing's proof of the undecidability of the halting problem.

-----

Owen

Edited by: Owen1234 at: 1/7/04 7:04 pm

kprosser

Registered User

Posts: 2

(1/7/04 9:27 pm)

Reply

 Barberism

---

The problem is that people - even logicians - have an inbuilt desire to classify statements as true or false.

The barber paradox (and other well known paradoxes) show that there is a very awkward class of statements that do not fit either these categories. The world is not defined by intuition - we are just plain wrong that there the only choice is between true and false.

In practice this means that it is not completely safe to use the principle of the excluded middle, or the reductio ad absurdum. Two approaches arise;

1 - Hope like hell that our carefully crafted arguments that rely on the excluded middle are actually valid.

2 - Never use the principle of the excluded middle.

Most people take route 1, but others, such as the 'intuitionist' school of mathematicians take route 2.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2038

(1/7/04 11:58 pm)

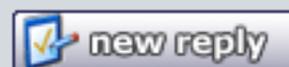

Reply

 ---

---

Hi kprosser, routes? what then of minor keys?

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Owen1234Registered UserPosts: 7(1/8/04 4:27 am)Reply      |  Re: --- <hr/> suergaz: Hi krosser, routes? what then of minor keys? What do your expressions mean?Is it a secret code? Minor keys, is a musical term for me. What does it mean for you? |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 4(1/8/04 11:17 am)Reply |  Re: --- <hr/> He who shaves himself is a better man. ;) Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/8/04 11:19 am                                                                                                |
| Owen1234Registered UserPosts: 10(1/8/04 12:12 pm)Reply    |  Re: --- <hr/> He who shaves himself is a better man. ;) I agree that:Independence does have value.                                                                                                   |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1597(1/8/04 2:13 pm)Reply             |  Re: --- <hr/> Oh well, seeing the full content of the so-called paradox makes things clearer. Like Godel's Incompleteness Theorem, it has meaning to set theory and certain aspects of math, but beyond that it is mere triviality. But, we do like our trivia, don't we..... Dan Rowden                                     |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 726(1/8/04 8:59 pm)Reply  |  Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox <hr/> I think the paradox is fundamentally incoherent, frankly. Dan Rowden I am particularly fond of this statement because it misses the point in such a blunt and condensed manner. Let's just hope that no trained logician will ever have a look at this thread. Thomas |

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1602
(1/9/04 1:38 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

I concur with that stated hope. God forbid that we should have someone as boring as a trained logician posting here.

Dan Rowden

Owen1234
Registered User
Posts: 11
(1/10/04 4:59 am)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Dan: I concur with that stated hope. God forbid that we should have someone as boring as a trained logician posting here.

I can easily see why you think that way. It would destroy the logical fantasies that this board thrives on.

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 37
(1/10/04 6:06 am)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

For me it all lies on the "ALL" statement. I too exclude the barber from the statement as a matter of how I was taught to speak and infer meaning. These paradoxes too too goofy, you can do better than a simple homonym type example. Those are kids games aren't they? I don't mean any disrespect to you though, I think a true paradox should deal with real matter, with or without mass, to have any true scientific meaning. I do not entertain wordplay as a paradox. It seems to easy to make up words that contradict each other and use them in the same sentence. This may not be a real paradox because words are simply created and then they are destroyed. BEcause the Barber is an idiot, loudmouth or a lier do not constitute a paradox do they?

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1605

(1/10/04 9:58 am)

Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Owen wrote:

Quote:

---

Dan: I concur with that stated hope. God forbid that we should have someone as boring as a trained logician posting here.

Owen: I can easily see why you think that way. It would destroy the logical fantasies that this board thrives on.

---

Hmm, logical fantasies? Care to name one?

Dan Rowden

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 223

(1/10/04 11:13 am)

Reply | Edit

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

For me it all lies on the "ALL" statement. I too exclude the barber from the statement as a matter of how I was taught to speak and infer meaning.

Then at least it taught you one lesson.

These paradoxes too too goofy, you can do better than a simple homonym type example. Those are kids games aren't they? I don't mean any disrespect to you though, I think a true paradox should deal with real matter, with or without mass, to have any true scientific meaning.

Since science is outside the realm of true or false, it is incapable of paradox.

I do not entertain wordplay as a paradox. It seems to easy to make up words that contradict each other and use them in the same sentence. This may not be a real paradox because words are simply created and then they are destroyed.

'Wordplay' is the only possible form of paradox, it cannot exist outside words, as per my comments above.

BEcause the Barber is an idiot, loudmounth or a liar do not constitute a paradox do they?

Who said the barber made the declaration?

Rhett

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 1/11/04 11:45 am

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 728

(1/10/04 1:38 pm)

Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Rhett: Since science is outside the real of true or false, it is incapable of paradox.

What about physical paradoxes such as Zeno's arrow, Olber's paradox, relativistic time travel, or the Einstein-Podolsky-Rosen (EPR) paradox, just to name a few?

Thomas

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 232

(1/11/04 11:58 am)

Reply | Edit

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

"Rhett: Since science is outside the real of true or false, it is incapable of paradox".

Thomas: What about physical paradoxes such as Zeno's arrow, Olber's paradox, relativistic time travel, or the Einstein-Podolsky-Rosen (EPR) paradox, just to name a few?

They are all constructions that necessarily rely on concepts/language, within which any paradox will dwell and be apparent. The 'real physical world' is fundamentally incapable of paradox, excepting of course those concepts that are harboured by humans. Humans may create paradox's based on their confusion about the evidence presented to them by improper scientific enquiry, but that's because they don't understand the nature of scientific enquiry and Reality.

[My apologies for not fluffing it out, but the phone line nazi's are just too close for comfort...]

Rhett

Erichtho
Registered User
Posts: 1
(1/11/04 12:08 pm)
Reply

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Rhett,
A lot of modern physics does imply a paradox actually. At least in the sense that it implies that the principle of bivalence may be incorrect.

Quote:

---

They are all constructions that necessarily rely on concepts/language, within which any paradox will dwell and be apparent

---

These paradoxes rely more upon our mistaken assumptions about the physical world than they do upon the flaws of language (assuming that you can separate the two).

Quote:

---

The 'real physical world' is fundamentally incapable of paradox

---

Can you justify this?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 234
(1/12/04 10:42 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Kevin Solway and the Barber Paradox

---

Quote:

---

Rhett,
A lot of modern physics does imply a paradox actually. At least in the sense that it implies that the principle of bivalence may be incorrect.

---

I actually addressed this point in my previous email. I'd just be repeating myself to address it again. Please have another look.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

They are all constructions that necessarily rely on concepts/language, within which any paradox will dwell and be apparent

---

These paradoxes rely more upon our mistaken assumptions about the physical world than they do upon the flaws of language (assuming that you can separate the two).

---

Yes, I agree that paradox's often arise from our mistaken assumptions about the 'physical' world (and said that in my previous post).

However, I am not talking about the flaws of language, I am talking about the flaws of meaning that we enact with language. The flaws of meaning being falsity or paradox.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

The 'real physical world' is fundamentally incapable of paradox

---

Can you justify this?

---

I can understand why you didn't quote the remainder of that point, but it's actually quite crucial, the point is now false - out of context.

The 'real physical world', any other world or appearance we care to imagine, and everything else that is not the former, is what it is, and could be said to be in a continual process of change in accordance with cause and effect. Thus, no paradox is possible outside of human conception, which, incidentally, is necessarily a part of the above (the Totality).

Rhett

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM
> Kierkegaard online

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Jones KellyPosts: 144(6/3/04 10:39 pm)Reply |  Kierkegaard online <hr/> Because of the lack of online Kierkegaard texts in English, i have been thinking about creating a website with Kierkegaard's translated works. I would probably start later in the year. Any help/advice appreciated. I'd do this because: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>(i) online texts are mostly in Danish;</li> <li>(ii) since i'd like electronic texts for easier access, reading, sharing, and storage, then others may also;</li> <li>(iii) academics seem to mostly publish interpretations, with quotes and extracts randomly inserted;</li> <li>(iv) i value publicising Kierkegaard's works freely;</li> <li>(v) it would pay homage to a great thinker and wise man.</li> </ul> Besides the Hong couple, can anyone suggest reliable translators/ions? I found a fairly comprehensive list of works at: www.heartrose.com/gaarden/skworks.htm I'd probably use links where current works are already online, and cite no translators or seek permission. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Kierkegaard's _Either/Or: I_

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mr Jive Bo JinglesPosts: 3(5/10/04 7:40 am)Reply                   |  Kierkegaard's _Either/Or: I_ <hr/> Have any of you read this book? I purchased it and will probably start reading it soon. Any thoughts on it?                                                                                                       |
| HansReinhardtRegistered UserPosts: 17(5/12/04 1:13 am)Reply  |  Re: Kierkegaard's _Either/Or: I_ <hr/> I've read parts of it; I enjoyed what I read. It's an early work and not very focused. I'd recommend Fear and Trembling and Sickness Unto Death, which are both shorter and very good. |

|                                                                                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 379(5/12/04 1:31 pm)Reply   Edit  |  Re: Kierkegaard's _Either/Or: I_ <hr/> If anyone knows of an electronic version, please let us know.                    |
| Jones KellyPosts: 74(5/12/04 2:31 pm)Reply                                                                                                                 |  Re: Kierkegaard's _Either/Or: I_ <hr/> Not much help, but the Diapsalmata is on David Q's website. It's pretty short.. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 5(1/14/04 5:03 am)Reply | Koan <hr/> The Short Staff Shuzan held out his short staff and said, "If you call this a short staff, you oppose its reality. If you do not call it a short staff, you ignore the fact. Now what do you wish to call this?" Edited by: Canadian Zoetrope at: 1/14/04 5:16 am |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1238(1/14/04 5:41 am)Reply   | koan <hr/> That's an easy koan. Even I can understand it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 583(1/14/04 6:08 am)Reply         | ... <hr/> Nice one.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 6(1/14/04 7:46 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Koans are not to be understood. Simply mused. Step away from who you are and look at it as though it were something you cannot interact with. Witness it not only for what it is, but equally, for what it is not. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 587(1/14/04 9:52 am)Reply         | ... <hr/> Canadian Zoetrope, That koan can be understood, though; why limit a person's reaction to a koan? Did you hear or read that somewhere else?                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2066(1/14/04 11:31 am)Reply       | Koan of my own <hr/> Do you form people in your image or do you set out an instruction?---You shall not go with me if you can know only the latter.                                                                              |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1246(1/14/04 2:55 pm)Reply   | re- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Koans are not to be understood. <hr/> Oh, koans are definitely to be understood, perhaps more than once.                                                                             |

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 10(1/14/04 4:08 pm)Reply | Re: re- <hr/> The Zen school of thought, for those of you who are familiar with it, mongers the precept that the goal is in the journey. It is not understanding a koan which makes it pregnant with meaning, the journey to understanding said koan, is that which is pregnant. People who run to exercise can attest to this. Ps. I am perfectly open to someone arguing my concept of the Zen approach, I would however require something beyond mere heresay and conjecture. I have provided proof, in the pudding. Pps. I am also willing to concede that my negative tone could quite possibly be compensatory of my own feelings of self doubt, when in the presence of decidedly more elite minds. I am simply intimidated by your minds, and do not mean to offend. Edited by: Canadian Zoetrope at: 1/14/04 4:11 pm |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1249(1/15/04 1:40 am)Reply    | re <hr/> Don't be inhibited by me. I'm one of the stupidest people I know. Most koans are rather vague, this one just happens not to be. I'm no zennist, but while I agree up to a point about the journey, it is still the goal to make progress via small or large epiphanies that alter one's view of things.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1412(1/15/04 2:37 am)Reply     | re <hr/> It is not a staff, but rather a pickle.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 596
(1/15/04 4:35 am)
Reply

Re: re

---

I agree with birdofhermes.

Canadian Zoetrope, don't be intimidated by anyone here, especially me. I've been awarded with the title of "the least conscious person on this board"! I've also been referred to as "boring", and "feminine minded".

You are the truth, and all of what you read here is an attempt to explain the truth. The latter is lesser in truth, and to be intimidated by it doesn't make sense...at least to me.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1256
(1/15/04 7:46 am)
Reply

re

---

Quote:

---

I've been awarded with the title of "the least conscious person on this board"!

---

So David has finally paid me a compliment, albeit at your expense. I'd better take what I can get.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 875
(1/15/04 8:48 am)
Reply

Re: re

---

Shuzan held out his short staff and said, "If you call this a short staff, you oppose its reality. If you do not call it a short staff, you ignore the fact. Now what do you wish to call this?"

The Emperor's new cock?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 241
(1/15/04 1:55 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan

---

The Short Staff

Shuzan held out his short staff and said, "If you call this a short staff, you oppose its reality. If you do not call it a short staff, you ignore the fact. Now what do you wish to call this?"

To call it a short staff isn't really "opposing it's reality", but i can well understand why they used the term.

When an un-enlightened individual calls it a 'short staff', or even looks at it for that matter, there would be an accompanying delusion that it has a finite and objective existence, and that it still exists even when it's outside of their awareness.

If Shuzan had reason to ask this question of someone that was enlightened, say as a test, they might well respond:

I accept that i am experiencing a seemingly discrete staff in this moment, and whilst i am not projecting any more notions onto it, for practical purposes, and in answer to your question, i shall refer to it as a 'short staff'.

There's simply no point referring to it any other way than as a 'short staff'.

Rhett

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 605
(1/15/04 2:04 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan

---

There's simply no point in referring to it.

Canadian Zoetrope
Registered User
Posts: 13
(1/15/04 2:13 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan

---

One of the students stood up, grabbed the staff, and broke it in 2 pieces, and threw it into the corner. And thus, the Koan was understood, at that moment, by that student.

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1265(1/15/04 2:39 pm)Reply    | staff <hr/> Quote: <hr/> there would be an accompanying delusion that it has a finite and objective existence, and that it still exists even when it's outside of their awareness. <hr/> A better answer is that it is neither a short staff nor a long staff, but only the relative mind that labels it so. Rhett, do you really accept the above nonsense, that the staff ceases to exist when it is outside of his awareness! No wonder women aren't interested in (this sort of) enlightenment.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 607(1/15/04 3:05 pm)Reply          | Re: staff <hr/> One of the students stood up, grabbed the staff, and broke it in 2 pieces, and threw it into the corner. And thus, the Koan was understood, at that moment, by that student. CZ, now that is the type of koan which shouldn't be understood. It stumps the mind...at least mine.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 16(1/15/04 6:01 pm)Reply | Re: Koan <hr/> Wow, you know, I see what your saying Voce. I never really got this Koan, until last night, I had an 'awakening experience'. To me, there are 3 parts to this Koan. 1st of all, 'you call it a short staff, you oppose it's reality.' -Yes, it is a staff. But is only a 'staff' in your eyes, ears, mouth, nose, and skin. Sensual perception can only bring us so close to an object and it's truth. The reality, is that this 'staff' is an object in a system of which everything, even the viewer is a member. Therefore, calling it a 'short staff' is opposing the reality, that if it is a 'short staff' then so are you, and so is everything in the system, calling it a 'short staff' is an ontological argument, but falls when logicall deduced. |

2nd of all, 'If you do not call it a short staff, you ignore the fact.'

-The fact is, is that this single existence has many connected manifestations. And differentiating between these manifestations is how the human mind evolved. Your leg is still part of you isn't it? When compared to your arm, it's your leg, but when compared to a football, it's you. Well, the fact is, that compared to everything you sense with your eyes, ears, mouth, nose and skin, it is factually a 'short staff'.

3rdly 'Now what do you wish to call this?'

-We are called to label it. To create a relationship between it and ourself. TO create the condition underwhich it is not to be confused with another part of the singular, plural system. So the monk, broke it. For him, this accomplished, both differentiation, and assimilation, because he destroyed his rational, and irrational thought, and answered the question.

I can read this Koan, and understand why this monk acted the way he did. This does not mean I understand this Koan. I think about it, muse over it, roll it around in my mouth savoring every last suckle, because each moment only happens once, and I want to love and know them all equally.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 247
(1/16/04 1:35 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett, do you really accept the above nonsense, that the staff ceases to exist when it is outside of his awareness! No wonder women aren't interested in (this sort of) enlightenment.

Funnily enough, i did manage to convince a woman such as yourself to discuss this very topic with me, for quite some time actually. She kept coming up with a variety of arguments, but didn't budge in the slightest.

I quite honestly told her that my focus was on reinforcing my own knowledge, but still did my best to get her to think a bit more creatively. Didn't work. She lacked vision, she didn't really want to change.

I admired her perseverance, but i think she really just wanted to interact with me, it made her feel better.

For me, women = attachment. They value attachment more than anything else i can think of at this moment.

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                   | Your distaste for the truth that things (ie. the staff) cease to exist when outside of your experience is most likely related to that. It would make quite a mess of your attachments! Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 621(1/16/04 1:47 pm)Reply | Re: staff <hr/> Rhett, if you were enlightened, you would know how stupid you have just proven yourself to be. For me, women = attachment. They value attachment more than anything else i can think of at this moment. For YOU. Being attached to unattachment and wisdom and your own ego, as well as the destruction of your ego in order to fulfill it's desire to be and look good...you make women, in your mind, value attachment more than anything you can think of at this moment. The fact that you think a staff stops existing when you don't see it proves your insanity. You could be sane if you stopped trying to fit your perspective to the perspective of past "wise" people; if you actually analyzed your own experience in the present moment. I recommend you recognize that you do this, and analyze why you do it in the first place. I'm quite sure it's because you have always been reserved, an outsider. You're trying to become someone that people like. All your attempts will ultimately fail; generally, half of all people will like you, half will hate you. |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 47(1/16/04 4:59 pm)Reply | Re: staff <hr/> Rhett Hamilton ----- Rhett, do you really accept the above nonsense, that the staff ceases to exist when it is outside of his awareness! No wonder women aren't interested in (this sort of) enlightenment. ----- Your distaste for the truth that things (ie. the staff) cease to exist when outside of your experience is most likely related to that. Would it not be more truthful and correct to say - one has no way of knowing if the staff exists or not when it is no longer perceived by one? All we can say is that the deluded mind sees things as either existing or non-existing. John |

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 249

(1/22/04 11:38 am)

Reply

Re: staff

---

-----
Anna: Rhett, do you really accept the above nonsense, that the staff ceases to exist when it is outside of his awareness! No wonder women aren't interested in (this sort of) enlightenment.

-----
Rhett: Your distaste for the truth that things (ie. the staff) cease to exist when outside of your experience is most likely related to that.

John: Would it not be more truthful and correct to say - one has no way of knowing if the staff exists or not when it is no longer perceived by one?

No. There are a number of ways we can tackle this:

1. Since you are asserting that the staff may exist even when it is not being experienced, philosophically speaking, i can put the onus on you to prove that proposition. Seriously, i am interested to know why you think that something you experience in one moment can continue to exist after you have finished experiencing it (?). Baffles me!

2. The roundabout way. The staff can only exist as an appearance, because only through appearing can it have form (as a staff). In the absence of an observer, there is nothing which can be identified as being a staff. Any appearance that we care to imagine would just be an appearance of our imagination (obviously).

If a bat flew past, it would not distinguish the Totality in the same manner as you or i might do. If it labels it's experiences at all, it might label the portion of the Totality that we labelled a 'staff' in with a few other things and consider them in a homogenous manner, and the 'staff' would certainly present a different appearance to what we see. The bat sees with echo's, we see with photons of light. Neither the bat or ourselves are wrong, what is experienced is all that could possibly be said to be 'right'.

Think of anything and then cut it up into an infinity of slices, and then think about how many ways it could be viewed. Then apply that to the Totality. It's capable of an infinity of appearances, what's to say that the particular view that you have at any moment in time is the 'right' one?

There is no right view, and each time you look at the staff it appears differently, the appearance of the staff is constantly in flux. People try so hard to make reality rigid, to make it conform to the rigidity of their static concepts, without realising that the nature of reality is anything but static.

Consider that even in the moment that you experience a staff you can't even see all of it to know exactly the manner of its existence. In any moment it is 2 dimensional to us, we cannot possibly experience a 3D image, even though things do seem 3D. We are constantly engaging in conceptual creations without even realising it, we often rotate things in our mind to see all of it, and then we think that this image is certain and true. Yet how often people are shocked when they turn out to be wrong about something. When things turn out different from what people expect - they are often visibly jolted by the experience. Artists play on this bad habit of humans by making works that surprise people in this manner.

Another thing to note is that the staff that you leave in a room could easily be removed and destroyed by something else, so why engage in thought about it unnecessarily when one is not in its direct presence?

3. The quick way. To take a big jump from this, we could at any moment in time be presented with evidence that our life is just a computer simulation, so in this instance the staff only ever existed as a few 0's and 1's during the moment of our experience of it, and might well never be experienced again during the remainder of the programs running.

All we can say is that the deluded mind sees things as either existing or non-existing.

How can any mind, deluded or wise, see a non-existing thing? Perhaps if you explain what you mean by the term 'non-existing'.

The deluded mind perceives things as being inherently finite, and upon this develops all manner of additional false notions.

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                          | The enlightened mind is wholly undeluded. Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 653(1/22/04 11:56 am)Reply       | Re: staff <hr/> Seriously, i am interested to know why you think that something you experience in one moment can continue to exist after you have finished experiencing it (?). Abductive reasoning, fool!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1317(1/22/04 12:02 pm)Reply | Re: staff <hr/> Quote: <hr/> For me, women = attachment. They value attachment more than anything else i can think of at this moment. Your distaste for the truth that things (ie. the staff) cease to exist when outside of your experience is most likely related to that. It would make quite a mess of your attachments! <hr/> Rhett, I apparently missed this response to me. I don't know about that supposition. What does it have to do with my attachments? I mean, I am going to leave this life one day. What difference does it make what the nature of material things is? It just seems silly to me, that's all. My best supposition about the appearance of matter is that it is dependent upon some prior condition, such as consciousness. QRS say it is not secondary but simultaneous. Even if that is so, my main objection is this assumption that our human brains are the awareness responsible for the existence of a stick, and that it could disappear when I, personally, don't view it. |

That strikes me as an absurdity.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 249

(1/22/04 12:13 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett: Seriously, i am interested to know why you think that something you experience in one moment can continue to exist after you have finished experiencing it (?).

Voce: Abductive reasoning, fool!

I'm sure people will take it in the manner in which it was intended.

It's easy for people to think that the enlightened don't really experience the world differently, that they just have these truths which they try to impress upon people, and which require constant attention to achieve anything with, if anything can be achieved with them at all.

Every moment that you are having experiences, nature is telling you the truth, so upon Enlightenment nature is on your side (in that respect anyway), it's affirming your understandings.

It's easy to think that people such as Kevin are poring and sweating over every email they write, trying to conjure up those abstract notions that he's come to understand.

Upon Perfection, the truth would be even easier to speak than the foolish talk that most people speak...

Rhett

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1318
(1/22/04 12:14 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

I guess I should have read through your answer to John before answering.

If that is all you have to offer!!!!!!!!!!

My answer to number one is: because I am no longer an infant.

My answer to number two is: The variability in perception is certainly fascinating, and quite irrelevant. To say we need not worry about it when we leave the room is similarly a nonargument. And to say it isn't real when not being viewed by us because, after all, we don't know absolutely everything there is to know about the stick is fatuous. We have not yet plumbed the depths of matter. So?

My answer to number three: Oh, gimme a break. In that case, there is little to discuss about reality or our ability to think about it.

And you can get away with this sort of intellectual drivel because you are male! I tell you it is unfair!

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 1/22/04 12:15 pm

John
Registered User
Posts: 55
(1/22/04 4:23 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett Hamilton

John: Would it not be more truthful and correct to say - one has no way of knowing if the staff exists or not when it is no longer perceived by one?

No. There are a number of ways we can tackle this:

1. Since you are asserting that the staff may exist even when it is not being experienced, philosophically speaking, i can put the onus on you to prove that proposition. Seriously, i am interested to know why you think that something you experience in one moment can continue to exist after you have finished experiencing it (?). Baffles me!

It seems you have become lost in a world of ideas.

So, Rhett is walking along the beach when this guy comes up behind him and whacks him over the head with a staff. Rhett falls to the ground dazed - the guy leans over him threateningly with the staff and shouts, "So does the staff exist or not?" Rhett stammers back, "Of course it exists now, because you hit me with it!"

We must conclude then, that the staff is magically spontaneously produced at the instant it strikes Rhett.

<snip>

Another thing to note is that the staff that you leave in a room could easily be removed and destroyed by something else

Now you're talking, so it does exist then!!

so why engage in thought about it unnecessarily when one is not in it's direct presence?

It is you who engage in such nonsense.

Go study koans.

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 653

(1/22/04 4:50 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett, you're right in your last post. You're most likely wrong in the fact that things don't exist when you don't view them. I mean, if such a thing were true, you wouldn't be existing when I wasn't aware of you, and I wouldn't be existing when you weren't aware of me. Do you see where this gets insane?

You can then conclude, in your little theory, that people are unreal, and only appear to you. You are only making your individual consciousness more important than it actually is. It APPEARS as if things cease to exist when you aren't directly viewing them, but that's entirely it - an appearance. If you're going to speculate based on appearances, why not just go for the sensible conclusion, which is - there is continuity in the existence of things.

Also, why would you be conversing with things that are going to cease existing as soon as they leave your sight? Why do you come online and talk on the Genius Forum, if it ceases to exist when you aren't online. In this type of thinking, how can you learn anything?

You aren't enlightened, at all.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1427
(1/22/04 4:51 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

It is irrelevant whether or not the staff exists. What matters is the fact that it hit your head.

I personally cannot say whether or not it truly hit your head, but I can notice your behavior. Only you truly know whether or not the thing struck you or if that thing even exists.

Not to mention, large pickles hurt when used by a professional and can sometimes be mistaken for staffs.

Tharan

John
Registered User
Posts: 57
(1/22/04 5:56 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

WolfsonJakk

-----

It is irrelevant whether or not the staff exists. What matters is the fact that it hit your head.

Without either concept of exists/non-exists - I pick up the staff, that's it!
One is free to use it.

Not to mention, large pickles hurt when used by a professional and can sometimes be mistaken for staffs.

The staff used varies but the use of the staff never ends it is the essential function!

John

Edited by: John at: 1/22/04 6:28 pm

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 250

(1/23/04 12:08 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Anna: My answer to number one is: because I am no longer an infant.

That's hardly a line of reasoning...

Anna: My answer to number two is: The variability in perception is certainly fascinating, and quite irrelevant. To say we need not worry about it when we leave the room is similarly a nonargument. And to say it isn't real when not being viewed by us because, after all, we don't know absolutely everything there is to know about the stick is fatuous. We have not yet plumbed the depths of matter. So?

I am quite aware that a number of the points in answer two were ultimately 'weak'. I put them in to get you thinking, to soften up your mind. I was experimenting (something i could be said to be doing with every email) with a soft approach, because based on my previous experience if i go straight to a harder line of reasoning - to the crux of the issue - people just glaze over.

Anna: My answer to number three: Oh, gimme a break. In that case, there is little to discuss about reality or our ability to think about it.

Oh, but there most certainly is...

We can still ascertain the most important knowledge known to man regardless of empirical uncertainty.  $A=A$  is an invincible truth, upon which we can create basic logic truths, and upon which we can lead the most gracious of existences.

Rhett

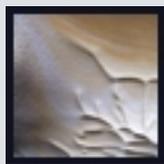

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 251

(1/23/04 12:29 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett:

1. Since you are asserting that the staff may exist even when it is not being experienced, philosophically speaking, i can put the onus on you to prove that proposition. Seriously, i am interested to know why you think that something you experience in one moment can continue to exist after you have finished experiencing it (?). Baffles me!

John: It seems you have become lost in a world of ideas.

So, Rhett is walking along the beach when this guy comes up behind him and whacks him over the head with a staff. Rhett falls to the ground dazed - the guy leans over him threateningly with the staff and shouts, "So does the staff exist or not?" Rhett stammers back, "Of course it exists now, because you hit me with it!"

We must conclude then, that the staff is magically spontaneously produced at the instant it strikes Rhett.

Rhett: The staff never really exists. It only ever exists - to me - in the moment of it making an appearance to me as a seemingly real object.

It's also likely that it exists, for a period of time, as a seemingly real object and as a conceptual creation to the clod who hit me.

Rhett: so why engage in thought about it unnecessarily when one is not in it's direct presence?

John: It is you who engage in such nonsense.

Are you married John? Have kids? Or a girlfriend? Or close relatives and/or friends? Do you not experience thoughts and fears about them when they are not in your presence? Thoughts that have little bearing on your subsequent interactions with them?

John: Go study koans.

I am, but I haven't found any hard enough yet. I'll keep you posted though.

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 252

(1/23/04 12:56 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Voce: Rhett, you're right in your last post. You're most likely wrong in the fact that things don't exist when you don't view them. I mean, if such a thing were true, you wouldn't be existing when I wasn't aware of you, and I wouldn't be existing when you weren't aware of me. Do you see where this gets insane?

Just because you no longer exist as a concept to me ("Voce"), doesn't mean much.

You can only ever exist as an indivisible portion of the Infinite (notice the illogic in 'indivisible portion', ie, it's just bullshit), as an appearance to mind of a seemingly finite entity (which only occurs as a construct of someone's consciousness, so it's not really you), and/or as a concept "Voce" (which i'm sure you'll agree is not you either).

So where in all this is the real Voce?

Nowhere.

Voce: You can then conclude, in your little theory, that people are unreal, and only appear to you. You are only making your individual consciousness more important than it actually is. It APPEARS as if things cease to exist when you aren't directly viewing them, but that's entirely it - an appearance. If you're going to speculate based on appearances, why not just go for the sensible conclusion, which is - there is continuity in the existence of things.

I've gone wholly beyond such thoughts because they're riddled with faulty reasoning.

Voce: Also, why would you be conversing with things that are going to cease existing as soon as they leave your sight? Why do you come online and talk on the Genius Forum, if it ceases to exist when you aren't online. In this type of thinking, how can you learn anything?

Wisdom has a life of it's own, through cause and effect. It's quite independant of your rigid and ill-conceived perspective on the matter.

Rhett

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 772
(1/23/04 1:07 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett: The deluded mind perceives things as being inherently finite, and upon this develops all manner of additional false notions.

The enlightened mind is wholly undeluded.

I've gone wholly beyond such thoughts because they're riddled with faulty reasoning.

Oh dear! It is a long time ago since such presumptuous bombast has been posted here. Memories of the early days of QRS enlightenment come back.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 58
(1/23/04 8:13 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett Hamilton

We must conclude then, that the staff is magically spontaneously produced at the instant it strikes Rhett.

The staff never really exists.

You are saying that a non-existent staff hits a non-existent Rhett and causes non-existent pain in a non-existent head. Can a non-existent thing be a cause, can there be a non-existent effect? To state that these things do not really exist has no real significance, one still experiences pain - to say that the pain is unreal does not diminish its effect.

It only ever exists - to me - in the moment of it making an appearance to me as a seemingly real object.

That's true but in no way does that prove that it does not exist. The boundaries of the mug on my desk are uncertain but the reality of the mug holding liquid holds true. To remain on one side is only a partial view.

It also exists as an object to you anytime you imagine that it does not exist. The notion of a 'non-existent thing' is nonsense.

Are you married John? Have kids? Or a girlfriend? Or close relatives and/or friends? Do you not experience thoughts and fears about them when they are not in your presence? Thoughts that have little bearing on your subsequent interactions with them?

Rarely.

John: Go study koans.

I am, but I haven't found any hard enough yet.

What valid reasons do you have for saying that?

John

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 253

(1/24/04 12:28 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

John: We must conclude then, that the staff is magically spontaneously produced at the instant it strikes Rhett.

Rhett: The staff never really exists.

John: You are saying that a non-existent staff hits...

The staff does exist, as i mentioned in my response. It exists in the mind of the thug. It may also have existed in others minds.

John: ...hits a non-existent Rhett...

I did exist at this moment, at the very least in the mind of the thug, if not in my own or anyone elses standing by.

John: ...and causes non-existent pain

Since i am feeling pain, the pain exists.

John: in a non-existent head.

My head exists in the mind of the thug or he wouldn't have been able to deliberately hit it. Once I feel pain my head probably starts to exist for me too!

John: Can a non-existent thing be a cause, can there be a non-existent effect?

No, 'cause and effect' and 'things' arise together, and are only present as constructs within consciousness.

John: To state that these things do not really exist has no real significance, one still experiences pain - to say that the pain is unreal does not diminish its effect.

Anyone that comes to understand the nature of existence considers it extremely significant. It has ramifications beyond most people's wildest imagination, and it is life-changing.

And yes, those changes extend to the experience of pain. Most people experience far more than just pain when they are hit on the head. Consider just how intimately involved the ego is with pain...all manner of fears are triggered, which run through a person's mind and make the experience far worse than it actually was, often rendering the actual pain insignificant in the process.

Rhett: It only ever exists - to me - in the moment of it making an appearance to me as a seemingly real object.

John: That's true, but in no way does that prove that it does not exist. The boundaries of the mug on my desk are uncertain but the reality of the mug holding liquid holds true. To remain on one side is only a partial view.

It is you that have tried to make me seem lopsided, your responses aren't particularly appropriate to what i wrote.

John: It also exists as an object to you anytime you imagine that it does not exist. The notion of a 'non-existent thing' is nonsense.

You've contradicted yourself here. Regarding your first point, how can i imagine a non-existent object (thing)?

I totally agree with your latter point. (Did it seem to you that i made a mistake regarding this earlier?).

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2114
(1/24/04 2:27 pm)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

how can i imagine a non-existent object (thing)?

---

That is all you can do! You don't think you can realize such an object do you?!

John
Registered User
Posts: 60
(1/24/04 5:28 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett Hamilton

Rhett: The staff never really exists.

John: You are saying that a non-existent staff hits...

The staff does exist, as i mentioned in my response. It exists in the mind of the thug. It may also have existed in others minds.

But you said "The staff never really exists" !

John: Can a non-existent thing be a cause, can there be a non-existent effect?

No, 'cause and effect' and 'things' arise together, and are only present as constructs within consciousness.

And so are 'existence' and 'nonexistence'! In fact 'existence' and 'non-existence' have no reality outside of your mind. I suggest both mental constructs are in fact unreal.

John: It also exists as an object to you anytime you imagine that it does not exist. The notion of a 'non-existent thing' is nonsense.

You've contradicted yourself here. Regarding your first point, how can I imagine a non-existent object (thing)?

So, to talk about something being non-existent is nonsense. Which is the overall point I'm making.

John: Go study koans.

I am, but I haven't found any hard enough yet.

Your response to the koan of this thread btw, "The Short Staff" was less than mediocre.

John

Edited by: John at: 1/24/04 8:33 pm

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 654

(1/24/04 5:34 pm)

Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett, I don't even know why I'm still trying to get you to see your faults, but whatever, I will go on.

Just because you no longer exist as a concept to me ("Voce"), doesn't mean much.

Right, concepts appearing and disappearing doesn't mean much.

You can only ever exist as an indivisible portion of the Infinite

"The Infinite"? I didn't know it was possible to say such a thing! How can I exist as anything BUT what you've described? How can anyone think they can exist as anything but what you've said? Not a single person has ever actually conceived of such a thing, and no one ever will.

as an appearance to mind of a seemingly finite entity (which only occurs as a construct of someone's consciousness, so it's not really you) and/or as a concept "Voce" (which i'm sure you'll agree is not you either).

Right, it is fleeting; just as these ideas you're having. Stop trying to be right, making beliefs, and just let things happen, Rhett. You're missing the mark because you're trying too damn hard to hit it (it's not actually what you're aiming for).

I don't agree a concept is me. Think about this, though: when you were younger, a little baby, playing with your toys...were the ideas of your toys - THE TOYS...or were the uncontrollable forces that made them appear as toys, the toys themselves?

So where in all this is the real Voce?

If you are looking for voce, stop talking of 'infinite' and 'finite'. Stop thinking about 'conceptualization' and 'non-conceptualization'. Shut up about 'appearing' and 'not appearing'. Don't even start with 'mind' versus 'not mind', and 'consciousness' versus 'unconsciousness'.

Nowhere.

Everywhere you look, mother fucker.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 654
(1/24/04 5:37 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Whoops, there was more...

I've gone wholly beyond such thoughts because they're riddled with faulty reasoning.

All of the reasoning I've seen you presenting here hasn't been too sturdy.

Wisdom has a life of it's own, through cause and effect. It's quite independant of your rigid and ill-conceived perspective on the matter.

"Rigid" and "ill-conceived" perspective?

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 255(1/25/04 11:10 am)Reply  | Re: staff <hr/> So, to talk about something being non-existent is nonsense. Which is the overall point I'm making. It's not nonsense if it makes people think, and helps them break down their delusional notions about the nature of existence. I haven't gone into a fuller explanation here because everyone in this discussion lacks the foundation for it. I intend to start from a far more fathomable point sometime soon, and lead people in a more gentle and comprehensible manner towards the truths i have been talking about here. Your assertion at the beginning of this thread that koans cannot be understood suggested to me that you think the nature of reality and existence is fundamentally unfathomable. Is this correct? Rhett |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 656
(1/25/04 5:38 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

You pretentious fuck!

Address your points, on your high level, regardless of what level people are at here. Don't back down, you coward. You are only avoiding it because IT ISN'T TRUE, and YOU WANT TO BE RIGHT.

You say you try and help people break down their delusional notions about the nature of existence...yet you've only been saying a bunch of delusional notions. I very very very very very highly doubt you're enlightened. If you don't prove your points, you are pushing people away from your teachings; you aren't helping anyone.

Prove that what you're saying is true, go into more detail, and it will help others in the way you want. If you don't, I hope everyone automatically assumes you are wrong, and they won't take you seriously.

John
Registered User
Posts: 61
(1/25/04 6:00 pm)
Reply

Re: staff

---

Rhett Hamilton

-----

So, to talk about something being non-existent is nonsense. Which is the overall point I'm making.

It's not nonsense if it makes people think, and helps them break down their delusional notions about the nature of existence.

As I've tried to point out the nature of existence is not non-existent. It is suchness, thusness, such-as-it-is-in-it's-ness.

This non-existent concept at best is a temporary resting place, move on!

I haven't gone into a fuller explanation here because everyone in this discussion lacks the foundation for it. I intend to start from a far more fathomable point sometime soon, and lead people in a more gentle and comprehensible manner towards the truths I have been talking about here.

Your assertion at the beginning of this thread that koans cannot be understood suggested

I assume you are confusing me with another? Canadian Zoetrope to me that you think the nature of reality and existence is fundamentally unfathomable. Is this correct?

How strange that you think your small mind could achieve such a thing as fathom reality.

Understanding is a function of the finite mind, it cannot encompass the infinite.

John

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 259
(1/26/04 10:28 am)
Reply

Re: staff

---

John: I assume you are confusing me with another? Canadian Zoetrope.

Yes, my apologies, and thanks for the correction.

Rhett: to me that you think the nature of reality and existence is fundamentally unfathomable. Is this correct?

John: How strange that you think your small mind could achieve such a thing as fathom reality.

Understanding is a function of the finite mind, it cannot encompass the infinite.

You've missed the key word: *nature* of reality.

Rhett

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 699(2/20/04 6:04 am)Reply  | Koan Thread <hr/> A monk asked Joshu, "What is the meaning of Bodidharma's coming to China?" Joshu said, "The oak tree in the front garden." A monk asked Zhaozhou, "What is the living meaning of Zen?." Zhaozhou said, "The cypress tree in the courtyard." - Mumonkan, Case 37                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 700(2/20/04 6:11 am)Reply  | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> Seijo's Two Souls Chokan had a very beautiful daughter named Seijo. He also had a handsome young cousin named Ochu. Joking, he would often comment that they would make a fine married couple. Actually, he planned to give his daughter in marriage to another man. But young Seijo and Ochu took him seriously; they fell in love and thought themselves engaged. One day Chokan announced Seijo's betrothal to the other man. In rage and despair, Ochu left by boat. After several days journey, much to his astonishment and joy he discovered that Seijo was on the boat with him! They went to a nearby city where they lived for several years and had two | children. But Seijo could not forget her father; so Ochu decided to go back with her and ask the father's forgiveness and blessing. When they arrived, he left Seijo on the boat and went to the father's house. he humbly apologized to the father for taking his daughter away and asked forgiveness for them both.

"What is the meaning of all this madness?" the father exclaimed. Then he related that after Ochu had left, many years ago, his daughter Seijo had fallen ill and had lain comatose in bed since. Ochu assured him that he was mistaken, and, in proof, he brought Seijo from the boat. When she entered, the Seijo lying ill in bed rose to meet her, and the two became one.

Zen Master Goso, referring to the legend, observed, "Seijo had two souls, one always sick at home and the other in the city, a married woman with two children. Which was the true soul?"

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1476
(2/20/04 7:21 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

A Buddha

In Tokyo in the Meiji era there lived two prominent teachers of opposite characteristics. One, Unsho, an instructor in Shingon, kept Buddha's precepts scrupulously. He never drank intoxicants, nor did he eat after eleven o'clock in the morning. The other teacher, Tanzan, a professor of philosophy at the Imperial University, never observed the precepts. Whenever he felt like eating, he ate, and when he felt like sleeping in the daytime he slept.

One day Unsho visited Tanzan, who was drinking wine at the time, not even a drop of which is supposed to touch the tongue of a Buddhist.

"Hello, brother," Tanzan greeted him. "Won't you have a drink?"

"I never drink!" exclaimed Unsho solemnly.

"One who does not drink is not even human," said Tanzan.

"Do you mean to call me inhuman just because I do not indulge in intoxicating liquids!" exclaimed Unsho in anger. "Then if I am not human, what am I?"

"A Buddha" answered Tanzan.

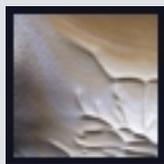

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 277

(2/20/04 11:40 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Ganto's Two Meals

Kisan paid a visit to Ganto, who was living in quiet seclusion, and asked, "Brother, are you getting two meals regularly?" "The fourth son of the Cho family supports me, and I am very much obliged to him," said Ganto.

"If you do not do your part well, you will be born as an ox in the next life and will have to repay him for what you owed him in this life," Kisan cautioned.

Ganto put his fists on his forehead but said nothing. "If you mean horns," Kisan said, "you must stick out your fingers on top of your head." But before he finished speaking, Ganto shouted, "Hey!" Kisan did not understand his meaning and said, "If you know something deeper, why don't you explain it to me?" Ganto hissed at him and said, "You have been studying Buddhism for thirty years, as I have, and you are still wandering around. I have nothing to do with you. Just get out." And with these words he shut the door in Kisan's face.

The fourth son of the Cho family happened to be passing by and, out of pity, took Kisan to his home. "Thirty years ago we were close friends," Kisan said sorrowfully, "but now he has attained something higher than I have and will not impart it to me."

That night Kisan could not sleep. He got up and went to Ganto's house. "Brother," he implored, "please be kind and preach the Dharma for me."

Ganto

opened the door and disclosed the teaching. The next morning Kisan returned home, happy with attainment.

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 2192 (2/20/04 11:57 am) Reply    | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> No woman can understand this aphorism.                                                                                                                                                                               |
| WolfsonJakk Registered User Posts: 1477 (2/20/04 12:25 pm) Reply                                                                                 | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> Yet I'm sure a few females could.                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 703 (2/20/04 12:52 pm) Reply    | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> In a past life, I was a woman.                                                                                                                                                                                |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2327 (2/20/04 12:53 pm) Reply                                                                                     | --- <hr/> You were not.                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 2194 (2/20/04 12:56 pm) Reply  | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> WolfsonJakk wrote: Quote: <hr/> Yet I'm sure a few females could. <hr/> Quite possibly. I'm glad you pointed out the difference. |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2330
(2/20/04 1:00 pm)
Reply

----

---

You idiot, what difference? You agree that some females may understand, but no women will? Are you going to be a man and make any sense at all on this point Quinbo?

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1645
(2/20/04 1:03 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Scott wrote:

Quote:

---

In a past life, I was a woman.

---

You mean, like, yesterday? :)

Dan Rowden

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2196
(2/20/04 1:08 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

You idiot, what difference? You agree that some females may understand, but no women will? Are you going to be a man and make any sense at all on this point Quinbo?

---

You're the great thinker around here. You work it out.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2332
(2/20/04 1:26 pm)
Reply

----

---

There is nothing to work out of your untruth.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 704
(2/20/04 5:31 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

You mean, like, yesterday? :)
Today, yesterday came tomorrow.

avidaloca
Registered User
Posts: 151
(2/22/04 12:20 am)
Reply

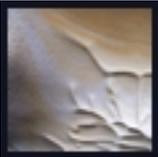

Re: ----

---

Tomorrow, yesterday becomes today.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 280
(2/22/04 12:05 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Have you considered cracking the koan i offered voce?
Can you provide an answer by tomorrow?

Rhett Hamilton

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 452
(2/22/04 1:53 pm)
Reply

Quizzz

---

Totally forbidden!
I mean, voce should answer,
but I, I, have The Answer.

Misfit.

Thank you, Rhett.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 719
(2/22/04 2:11 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I didn't know there was actually a definitive answer.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 720
(2/22/04 3:32 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

We need to teach morality and logic to women, and teach open mindedness to men.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1417
(2/22/04 3:43 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Hallaj said what he said and went to the origin through the hole in the scaffold.

I cut a cap's worth of cloth from his robe, and it swamped over me from head to foot.

Years ago, I broke a bunch of roses from the top of his wall. A thorn from that is still in my palm, working deeper.

A person comes to him, naked. It's cold.
There's a fur coat floating in the river.

"Jump in and get it," he says.
You dive in. You reach for the coat.
It reaches for you.

It's a live bear that has fallen in upstream, drifting with the current.

"How long does it take!" Hallaj yells from the bank.
"Don't wait," you answer. "This coat has decided to wear me home!"

+++++

A sufi was wandering the world.
One night he came as a guest to a community of sufis.
They went into deep meditation and mystical communion, he and these friends. For such people a person's presence is more to learn from than a book. A sufi's book is not composed with ink and alphabet. A scholar loves, and lives on, the marks of a pen.
A sufi loves footprints!
He sees those and stalks his game. At first, he sees the clues. After a time he can follow the scent.
To go guided by fragrance is a hundred times better than following tracks. A person who is opening to the divine is like a door to a sufi.

Immediate intuition to them is the simplest act of consciousness, what to others would be epiphany.
Much of our thought is of the past, or the future.
They're free of those. Before a mine is dug, they judge coins. Before vineyards, they know the excitement to come.
In July, they feel December.
In unbroken sunlight, they find shade. In fana, the state where all objects dissolve,
they recognize objects.

Friend, we're traveling together.
Throw off your tiredness. Let me show you one tiny spot of the beauty that cannot be spoken.
I'm like an ant that's gotten into the granary, ludicrously happy, and trying to lug out a grain that's way too big.

|                                                                                |                                                                                                                        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 453(2/22/04 3:44 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> Rhett is man nor woman.Did you consider that one, Scott? Ehm. (Yes, you did.) |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 454(2/22/04 4:02 pm)Reply                                                                                          | Eh?<hr/> Forgot the hardly necessary P.S.Rhett Hamilton is a Fucking Fool.And an asshole. We all know that.                                                                                                                        |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 721(2/22/04 4:27 pm)Reply | Re: Eh?<hr/> I am not sure that Rhett is an asshole or fucking fool, I don't really know him well enough. From what he's said in the past, he does seem a bit deluded.Yeah, everyone is a human before they are either a man or woman. |

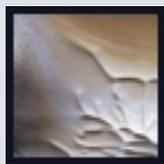

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 285

(2/25/04 10:52 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

A Buddha

In Tokyo in the Meiji era there lived two prominent teachers of opposite characteristics. One, Unsho, an instructor in Shingon, kept Buddha's precepts scrupulously. He never drank intoxicants, nor did he eat after eleven o'clock in the morning. The other teacher, Tanzan, a professor of philosophy at the Imperial University, never observed the precepts. Whenever he felt like eating, he ate, and when he felt like sleeping in the daytime he slept.

One day Unsho visited Tanzan, who was drinking wine at the time, not even a drop of which is supposed to touch the tongue of a Buddhist.

"Hello, brother," Tanzan greeted him. "Won't you have a drink?"

"I never drink!" exclaimed Unsho solemnly.

"One who does not drink is not even human," said Tanzan.

"Do you mean to call me inhuman just because I do not indulge in intoxicating liquids!" exclaimed Unsho in anger. "Then if I am not human, what am I?"

"A Buddha" answered Tanzan.

---

Unsho, despite his devout adherence to religion, is firmly attached to remaining normal, human, and remains so.

Tanzan has a far deeper understanding of the Truth.

Rhett Hamilton

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 290
(2/25/04 12:24 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: Have you considered cracking the koan i offered voce?
Can you provide an answer by tomorrow?

Voce: I didn't know there was actually a definitive answer.

---

Koans have meaning, what good would they be if they didn't? They'd just be a waste of time.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 741
(2/25/04 1:06 pm)
Reply

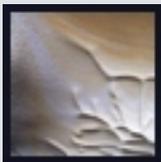

Re: ----

---

What was the definitive meaning of the one you challenged me to find an answer to?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 296
(2/26/04 11:31 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I'm not giving you the answer that easily!

Think about it some more.

Maybe others want to give it a go? I don't want to take that opportunity away from them.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 754
(2/26/04 11:53 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I think it's funny how you say there's a specific answer. Ganto opening the door is the teaching, is one answer.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1488
(2/26/04 12:51 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

"If you do not do your part well, you will be born as an ox in the next life and will have to repay him for what you owed him in this life," Kisan cautioned.

Ganto put his fists on his forehead but said nothing.

---

And Siddartha ventured forth from his castle to walk among the wretched and the poor. He saw no evidence that previous "choices" determined both his and their fate. From that moment on, he was destined to spend years under the tree. What was finally, newly born offered more promise than what was currently established in the minds of men and women.

Tharan

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 69
(2/26/04 2:07 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Ganto: Do I look like an Ox? You wander around so much you don't even recognize what is in front of you!

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 302
(2/27/04 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

I think it's great that people are giving it a go.

"Public mistakes can become public lessons.
Fear not that you will be caught out,
But that you will drown in your own swill."

[I quote myself]

But alas, the essence has not been revealed yet . . .

Rhett Hamilton

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 467
(2/27/04 12:38 pm)
Reply

My Hammy

---

So... no price for me, Rhetty?
How's David, btw?

wounded bird
Registered User
Posts: 1
(2/27/04 1:42 pm)
Reply

The mystery of the KOAN

---

I shall answer it with a similar story:

At that time Jesus went through the grainfields on the Sabbath. His disciples were hungry and began to pick some heads of grain and eat them. When the Pharisees saw this, they said to him, "Look! Your disciples are doing what is unlawful on the Sabbath."

He answered, "Haven't you read what David did when he and his companions were hungry? He entered the house of God, and he and his companions ate the consecrated bread--which was not lawful for them to do, but only for the priests. Or haven't you read in the Law that on the Sabbath the priests in the temple desecrate the day and yet are innocent?"

I tell you that one greater than the temple is here. If you had known what these words mean, 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice,' you would not have condemned the innocent. For the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath."

I may be way off here but is the answer that Unsho lives his life by living the law while Tanzan lives his life by living? It is not those things that one puts in the body that contaminate and defile but what comes out. Tanzan was being quite charitable to Unsho I would think.

If I am wrong, I tried at least, but keep in mind, I am but a mere woman, so I beg of your openmindedness and sense of humor.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 758
(2/27/04 1:43 pm)
Reply

Re: My Hammy

---

It's funny how there ISN'T a meaning.

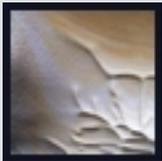

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2437
(2/27/04 1:46 pm)
Reply

--

---

Sure, but it can be just as funny to make one up.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 305
(2/28/04 9:44 am)
Reply

Re: My Hammy

---

Voce wrote:

Quote:

---

It's funny how there ISN'T a meaning.

---

Gee, you really harp on. As i said before, if they didn't mean anything they'd be a complete waste of time for the spiritual student. If you still disagree, then please give reason for saying so.

Rhett Hamilton

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1490
(2/28/04 11:48 am)
Reply

The mystery of the KOAN

---

Quote:

---

I may be way off here but is the answer that Unsho lives his life by living the law while Tanzan lives his life by living? It is not those things that one puts in the body that contaminate and defile but what comes out. Tanzan was being quite charitable to Unsho I would think.

---

Charitable perhaps, possibly also quite ironic.

Quote:

---

If I am wrong, I tried at least, but keep in mind, I am but a mere woman, so I beg of your openmindedness and sense of humor.

---

I will have no more of this kind of talk! Consider yourself warned! Punishment is brutal flogging at the hands of suergaz, our Nazi interlocutor. He has nary a bristle on his sweet cheeks and is primed for leather interdiction.

Tharan

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2450
(2/28/04 2:08 pm)
Reply

----

---

I have enough stubble to take the enamel off your teeth.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 759
(2/28/04 3:42 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

if they didn't mean anything they'd be a complete waste of time for the spiritual student

Exactly. It emulates the spiritual path in general. Once you're enlightened, you realize it was all just imagined. The point of a lot of koans is to make the mind work so hard at trying to find an answer that it gives up, and satori is experienced.

John
Registered User
Posts: 82
(2/28/04 6:04 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

voce io,

Quote:

---

The point of a lot of koans is to make the mind work so hard at trying to find an answer that it gives up, and satori is experienced.

---

Koans have meaning, never doubt it.

John

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 760
(2/29/04 2:51 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Oh yeah? I'm going to doubt it has a meaning if neither of you can tell me its meaning. I'd be an idiot if I wasted my time thinking about something which didn't have any meaning. Why should I believe it has a meaning?

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 435(2/29/04 3:57 am)Reply                                                                                                       | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Scott: I'm going to doubt it has a meaning if neither of you can tell me its meaning. I'd be an idiot if I wasted my time thinking about something which didn't have any meaning. Why should I believe it has a meaning? <hr/> Why do you believe that it doesn't? Edited by: MGregory at: 2/29/04 3:58 am |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 761(2/29/04 4:51 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> It could or it couldn't. I believe it has multiple meanings.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

|                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregory Posts: 438 (2/29/04 5:07 am) Reply                                                                                                               | Re: ---- <hr/> Well then, why do you believe it has multiple meanings?                                                                    |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 762 (2/29/04 5:23 am) Reply           | Re: ---- <hr/> Well, I gave a possible meaning earlier, and Rhett said that wasn't it. My meaning was valid. There could be more as well. |
| MGregory Posts: 439 (2/29/04 6:05 am) Reply                                                                                                               | Re: ---- <hr/> Do you think the person who originally wrote that story would agree with you?                                              |
| voce io Registered User Posts: 763 (2/29/04 6:28 am) Reply         | Re: ---- <hr/> I can't say for sure, I have no way of asking the guy.                                                                     |
| Rhett Hamilton Registered User Posts: 309 (2/29/04 8:11 am) Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> I'm still open to the answer coming out. What about you Matt? Or Leo? Or Philip? Rhett Hamilton                     |

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1000
(2/29/04 9:40 am)
Reply

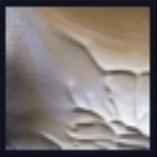

Re: ----

---

If you tell us Rhett, will we be in your debt?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 312
(2/29/04 9:50 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I don't really know what you mean(?)

MGregory
Posts: 441
(2/29/04 11:36 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

I have no idea. I assume Ganto's hands are the two meals.

John
Registered User
Posts: 85
(2/29/04 5:51 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

voce io

Quote:

---

I'm going to doubt it has a meaning if neither of you can tell me its meaning. I'd be an idiot if I wasted my time thinking about something which didn't have any meaning. Why should I believe it has a meaning?

---

Because a Buddha does not play games in this regard. When a student asks a Buddha a question for example, the answer is always immediate, meaningful and appropriate. That you do not see the meaning straight off is not surprising, it requires work. If you don't believe that, there is nothing more I can say that would convince you.

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 766

(2/29/04 6:52 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

When a student asks a Buddha a question for example, the answer is always immediate, meaningful and appropriate. That you do not see the meaning straight off is not surprising, it requires work.

Apparently a Buddha didn't write that koan, then!

John

Registered User

Posts: 87

(2/29/04 7:27 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

voce io

Quote:

---

Apparently a Buddha didn't write that koan, then!

---

Which koan are you refering to?

edit

and why are you saying that?

end

John

Edited by: John at: 2/29/04 7:48 pm

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 768

(3/1/04 2:20 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I'm referring to Gantos Two Meals, I think it was called.

I'm saying it because you said: When a student asks a Buddha a question for example, the answer is always immediate, meaningful and appropriate. That you do not see the meaning straight off is not surprising, it requires work. If a Buddha wrote it, it would be "meaningful", and when it's not meaningful to me...it must follow that a Buddha didn't write it. Some insane chinese guy, with no knowledge or attainment whatsoever, could have written it for all we know!

Should I spend my time thinking over it if I don't know the source personally; if there's no apparent meaning behind it? Why should I listen to people telling me, "oh it has meaning, you just don't get it yet"...when they won't say the meaning at all? I could pull that one, too. I could write: *the sun comes out at night, and butterflies turn into muffins...*and I could say "yeah, its meaning is hidden"...but what's the point in a Buddha doing that? You yourself said a Buddha is "immediate, meaningful and appropriate."

John

Registered User

Posts: 88

(3/1/04 5:17 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

voce io

Quote:

---

I'm saying it because you said: When a student asks a Buddha a question for example, the answer is always immediate, meaningful and appropriate. That you do not see the meaning straight off is not surprising, it requires work. If a Buddha wrote it, it would be "meaningful", and when it's not meaningful to me...it must follow that a Buddha didn't write it.

---

Just because you do not understand it does not mean a Buddha did not say it. Are you that arrogant!

Quote:

---

Some insane chinese guy, with no knowledge or attainment whatsoever, could have written it for all we know!

---

Sure, I cannot say that all stories you will encounter are bona-fide koans but you should be able to trust something - the major collections of koans have been passed down through many generations and are verified as it were by each generation. I don't know if you can trust that.

Quote:

---

Should I spend my time thinking over it if I don't know the source personally;

---

You do not know Gautama personally or the author of the Diamond Sutra, which I believe you have read.

Quote:

---

if there's no apparent meaning behind it? Why should I listen to people telling me, "oh it has meaning, you just don't get it yet"...when they won't say the meaning at all?

---

The purpose of a koan is for you to work on it yourself, don't listen to answers from others.

Quote:

---

..and I could say "yeah, its meaning is hidden"...but what's the point in a Buddha doing that? You yourself said a Buddha is "immediate, meaningful and appropriate."

---

Just because you do not see the meaning does not mean there is no meaning, surely you can see that. I'm sure that if someone was to come here and try to explain the math involved in generally relatively very few would understand or see much meaning in the explanation.

Apparently kung-an (koan) was a technique developed by master Ma-Tsu, one of the greatest Ch'an masters of the Tang dynasty and this effective method has continued until today.

Why use kung-an then, why did not the ancient masters just explain logically as is done here?

The answer seems obvious to me. :)

John

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 774
(3/1/04 5:44 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

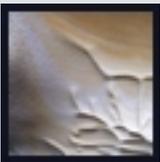

What is the purpose of a koan?
-To reach an understanding of reality.

Do koans sometimes have hidden meanings?
-Yes.

What is a Buddha?
-Someone who understands all of reality.

Is it useful for a Buddha to take the time trying to understand a koan with a hidden meaning?
-No, unless it benefitted someone in understanding reality. The Buddha already understands reality, so what's the point?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 316
(3/1/04 9:12 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Is it useful for a Buddha to take the time trying to understand a koan with a hidden meaning?
-No, unless it benefitted someone in understanding reality.
The Buddha already understands reality, so what's the point?

---

I assume that you've read it in order to make the assertions about it that you have?

Any Buddha that reads it would immediately perceive it's essence, because they would necessarily have gone through the stage where the issue was relevant. Personally, it took a little bit of thinking, and i think it's quite clever, a good koan. Presumably, you haven't bothered to think about it at all. Do Buddha's not think at all, or teach!? Have you read the section on Hakuin that is on the "Thinking Man's Minefield"? (or do Buddha's stay away from thinking places, for fear of their ignorance being exposed?)

Rhett Hamilton

MGregory
Posts: 450
(3/1/04 10:44 am)
Reply

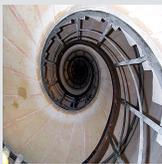

Re: ----

---

A man of old has said: "Those who have not yet gained understanding should study the meaning rather than the verses themselves. Those who have gained understanding should study the verses rather than the meaning."

-- Hakuin on the verses of Fu Ta-shih

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 778
(3/1/04 10:59 am)
Reply

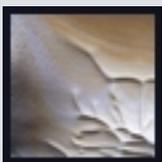

Re: ----

---

Rhett, you're like a man telling me there's buried treasure and I'm supposed to find it on a specific island...yet you don't give me a map. You say "I've found the treasure."

What kind of rational person would listen to you?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 320
(3/1/04 11:44 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Rhett, you're like a man telling me there's buried treasure and I'm supposed to find it on a specific island...yet you don't give me a map. You say "I've found the treasure."

What kind of rational person would listen to you?

---

The map is what i provide in all that i say, but more specifically, it's available via a simple mouse click on the icon at the top of the bulletin board, or on the Minefield, or in other great texts.

Rhett Hamilton

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 781(3/1/04 12:12 pm)Reply | Re: ----<hr/> No, Rhett.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 91(3/1/04 5:54 pm)Reply                                                                                            | Re: ----<hr/> voce ioQuote:<hr/> What is the purpose of a koan?-To reach an understanding of reality.<hr/>It is ultimately that but people have weak spots that need addressing so there are different classes of koans. And contrary to what you seem to think it is no easy matter.Quote:<hr/> |

Do koans sometimes have hidden meanings?

-Yes.

---

No! The meaning is only hidden if your mind is not in tune with what the master has said.

Quote:

---

Is it useful for a Buddha to take the time trying to understand a koan with a hidden meaning?

---

Fool! A Buddha would immediately understand, no time is required.

Quote:

---

-No, unless it benefitted someone in understanding reality. The Buddha already understands reality, so what's the point?

---

To help you. Your question though basically mirrors what I asked you.

Why use kung-an then, why did not the ancient masters just explain logically as is done here?

John

BJMcGilly

Registered User

Posts: 7

(3/2/04 1:16 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Ganto's Two Meals

Kisan paid a visit to Ganto, who was living in quiet seclusion, and asked, "Brother, are you getting two meals regularly?" "The fourth son of the Cho family supports me, and I am very much obliged to him," said Ganto. "If you do not do your part well, you will be born as an ox in the next life and will have to repay him for what you owed him in this life," Kisan cautioned.

Ganto put his fists on his forehead but said nothing.

Ganto shows his indifference.

"If you mean horns," Kisan said, "you must stick out your fingers on top of your head."

Kisan doesn't understand buddhism, and so tries to complete Ganto's thought for him. An offhand comment, trying to cement bonds that just aren't there.

But before he finished speaking, Ganto shouted, "Hey!" Kisan did not understand his meaning and said, "If you know something deeper, why don't you explain it to me?" Ganto hissed at him and said, "You have been studying Buddhism for thirty years, as I have, and you are still wandering around. I have nothing to do with you. Just get out." And with these words he shut the door in Kisan's face.

On the surface, it seems Ganto is the more rude of the two, but that's not the case.

The fourth son of the Cho family happened to be passing by and, out of pity, took Kisan to his home. "Thirty years ago we were close friends," Kisan said sorrowfully, "but now he has attained something higher than I have and will not impart it to me."

That night Kisan could not sleep. He got up and went to Ganto's house. "Brother," he implored, "please be kind and preach the Dharma for me." Ganto opened the door and disclosed the teaching. The next morning Kisan returned home, happy with attainment.

I don't know about this part, but it reminds me of the monk who walking at night, stepped on what he thought to be an egg-bearing frog. Troubled that night by nightmares of the frogs demanding his life, he repented fervently for his misdeed. Upon inspection the following day, it turned out to be naught more than an overripe eggplant.

Bryan

MGregory

Posts: 454

(3/2/04 3:31 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Alright, if Bryan is willing to stick his neck out, then I'll do it, too.

Quote:

---

Ganto's Two Meals

Kisan paid a visit to Ganto, who was living in quiet seclusion, and asked, "Brother, are you getting two meals regularly?"

---

Kisan comes to test Ganto.

Quote:

---

"The fourth son of the Cho family supports me, and I am very much obliged to him," said Ganto.

---

Ganto replies straightforwardly.

Quote:

---

"If you do not do your part well, you will be born as an ox in the next life and will have to repay him for what you owed him in this life," Kisan cautioned.

---

Kisan seizes onto causes and conditions, and foolishly admonishes Ganto.

Quote:

---

Ganto put his fists on his forehead but said nothing.

---

Ganto puts two meals on his head.

Quote:

---

"If you mean horns," Kisan said, "you must stick out your fingers on top of your head."

---

Kisan seizes onto causes and conditions again, piling more dung on Ganto's head.

Quote:

---

But before he finished speaking, Ganto shouted, "Hey!"

---

Kisan, that is not your mind.

Quote:

---

Kisan did not understand his meaning and said, "If you know something deeper, why don't you explain it to me?"

---

Kisan assumes fighting stance.

Quote:

---

Ganto hissed at him and said, "You have been studying Buddhism for thirty years, as I have, and you are still wandering around. I have nothing to do with you. Just get out." And with these words he shut the door in Kisan's face.

---

Ganto attempts to uncover Kisan's doubts.

Quote:

---

The fourth son of the Cho family happened to be passing by and, out of pity, took Kisan to his home. "Thirty years ago we were close friends," Kisan said sorrowfully, "but now he has attained something higher than I have and will not impart it to me."

---

Kisan is showing some potential.

Quote:

---

That night Kisan could not sleep. He got up and went to Ganto's house. "Brother," he implored, "please be kind and preach the Dharma for me."

---

Kisan realizes he knows nothing.

Quote:

---

Ganto opened the door and disclosed the teaching. The next morning Kisan returned home, happy with attainment.

---

Ganto helped Kisan work out his doubts.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 786

(3/2/04 3:47 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Those aren't answers or meanings, they're just play by play accounts.

No! The meaning is only hidden if your mind is not in tune with what the master has said.

Always? Are you telling me there isn't one koan out there which is deceptive in nature? That you have to figure out?

Fool! A Buddha would immediately understand, no time is required.

Why's that? I'm sure SOME time is required, I mean, the person has to say the koan...or the Buddha has to read the koan. It could be a very fast understanding, but..is it ALWAYS fast? You know that enlightened people can disagree, right?

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1493

(3/2/04 4:11 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

Alright, if Bryan is willing to stick his neck out, then I'll do it, too.

---

"To stick your neck out" implies some sort of danger or negative outcome. For where does this danger come?

Rhett, do you know the "meaning" of the koan you posted?

Tharan

John

Registered User

Posts: 94

(3/2/04 5:56 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

voce io

Quote:

---

No! The meaning is only hidden if your mind is not in tune with what the master has said.

Always? Are you telling me there isn't one koan out there which is deceptive in nature? That you have to figure out?

---

How could I know all koans that have ever existed? There will no doubt be bogus koans somewhere thought up by a crank.

Quote:

---

Fool! A Buddha would immediately understand, no time is required.

Why's that? I'm sure SOME time is required, I mean, the person has to say the koan...or the Buddha has to read the koan. You know that enlightened people can disagree, right?

---

That's ridiculous, you must know what I'm saying, spontaneous!

Buddhas by definition will understand all aspects of the Dharma, therefore although each might express something in a different way does not mean there is disagreement over a koan.

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 788

(3/2/04 6:27 am)

Reply

Re: Re: Koan Thread

---

Yet I understand all aspects of the Dharma, and Gantos Two Meals really doesn't mean much to me. If you think I am missing some understanding of the Dharma, the piece that's essential to understanding the Two Meals koan, then tell me what that understanding is. In order for you to know that I am missing a piece, you must know what the piece is! So what does Ganto's Two Meals mean to you?

BJMcGilly

Registered User

Posts: 8

(3/2/04 8:25 am)

Reply

Re: Re: Koan Thread

---

You don't understand dharma just as Buddha doesn't understand dharma. If you're missing a piece, no one can give you it- it's you're own damned fault plain and simple.

Even so, suppose you could understand aspects, what does that matter? A poker player can't conjure a royal flush to win the pot. All the world over you can find plenty of people willing to complete your thoughts, and you would be lucky to walk away flat broke.

Bryan

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2247
(3/2/04 9:31 am)
Reply

Re: ----

John wrote:

Quote:

---

Apparently kung-an (koan) was a technique developed by master Ma-Tsu, one of the greatest Ch'an masters of the Tang dynasty and this effective method has continued until today.

Why use kung-an then, why did not the ancient masters just explain logically as is done here?

The answer seems obvious to me. :)

---

Again, your thinking on these matters is conventional and scripted. Whenever I read one of your posts, it is like reading any one of a number of popular Zen books that are a dime a dozen in New Age books stores.

A koan is simply a rational thought from an enlightened sage that unsettles his listener. Being unsettled, the listener experiences a great desire to resolve the issue, and that is the koan's value. To induce the burning desire to resolve is what the sage intended.

In other words, a koan is specifically designed to stimulate the listeners mind into making significant breakthroughs in his thought. And if the listener is on the brink of enlightenment, a well-directed koan can even stimulate him into enlightenment itself.

There are an infinite number of possible koans, and each one has an infinite number of correct answers, depending on the delusions which exist in the listener. The idea promoted on this thread that there is a set number of koans, created only by officially recognized Zen Masters, with a specific answer to each one, is a complete joke. That is just religious drivel. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Wise men from all over the world have been creating countless koans for thousands of years. The Tao Te Ching, for example, is a lengthy koan. As are the sayings of Diogenes. And the Gospel of Thomas. And Kevin Solway's "Poison for the Heart". These works all consist of seemingly paradoxical, hard-to-understand sayings that are very stimulating and only fully resolvable with the onset of enlightenment.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1002

(3/2/04 9:32 am)

Reply

Re: Kisan's Two Masters.

---

Have you considered cracking the koan i offered?

Can you provide an answer by tomorrow?

Kisan comes to test the people.

I didn't know there was actually a definitive answer.

The people reply straightforwardly.

Koans have meaning, what good would they be if they didn't? They'd just be a waste of time.

Kisan seizes onto causes and conditions, and foolishly admonishes the people.

What was the definitive meaning of the one you challenged me to find an answer to?

The people answer straightforwardly.

I'm not giving you the answer that easily!

Kisan seizes onto causes and conditions, and foolishly scoffs at, piling more dung on the people's heads.

I believe it has multiple meanings.

Ganto opening the door is the teaching, is one answer.

The people answer straightforwardly.

I think it's great that people are giving it a go.

"Public mistakes can become public lessons.

Fear not that you will be caught out,

But that you will drown in your own swill."

[I quote myself]

But alas, the essence has not been revealed yet . .

Kisan assumes fighting stance.

I can't say for sure, I have no way of asking the guy.

The people answer straightforwardly.

I'm still open to the answer coming out. What about you Matt? Or Leo? Or Philip?

Kisan continues in fighting stance.

If you tell us Kisan, will we be in your debt?

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 325

(3/2/04 10:43 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

Ganto's Two Meals

Kisan paid a visit to Ganto, who was living in quiet seclusion, and asked, "Brother, are you getting two meals regularly?" "The fourth son of the Cho family supports me, and I am very much obliged to him," said Ganto.

"If you do not do your part well, you will be born as an ox in the next life and will have to repay him for what you owed him in this life,"

Kisan

cautioned.

Ganto put his fists on his forehead but said nothing. "If you mean horns," Kisan said, "you must stick out your fingers on top of your head."

But before he finished speaking, Ganto shouted, "Hey!" Kisan did not understand his meaning and said, "If you know something deeper, why don't you explain it to me?" Ganto hissed at him and said, "You have been studying Buddhism for thirty years, as I have, and you are still wandering around. I have nothing to do with you. Just get out." And with these words he shut the door in Kisan's face.

The fourth son of the Cho family happened to be passing by and, out of pity, took Kisan to his home. "Thirty years ago we were close friends," Kisan said sorrowfully, "but now he has attained something higher than I have and will not impart it to me."

That night Kisan could not sleep. He got up and went to Ganto's house.

"Brother," he implored, "please be kind and preach the Dharma for me." Ganto opened the door and disclosed the teaching. The next morning Kisan returned home, happy with attainment.

---

Ganto has recently 'realised' the nature of non-inherent existence. His 'attainment' is significant but still very much a beginning-stage of enlightenment (and thus, he is quite prone to significant rebirth).

Kisan enters the house and talks to him in a manner that is highly conducive to rebirth. Ganto indicates this to him by mimicking his rebirth as an ox, however, Kisan just doesn't get it. Even though Kisan then questions him, Ganto, now reborn and frustrated, isn't in the mood and sees that it's not appropriate, so he kicks Kisan out in disgust.

I thought this was "the essence", even though i knew it would have little meaning to people that weren't enlightened or near enlightenment.

As i often state, i'm not too read up on spirituality, so if i've mislead people about the nature of koans, my deepest apologies.

Rhett Hamilton

MGregory

Posts: 455

(3/2/04 11:51 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

Scott: Those aren't answers or meanings, they're just play by play accounts.

---

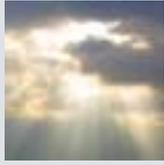

That's my interpretation. What did you expect me to say? 42?

MGregory

Posts: 456

(3/2/04 12:07 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

Tharan: "To stick your neck out" implies some sort of danger or negative outcome. For where does this danger come?

---

Well, look! You're questioning me, Scott yelled at me, Dave T. parodied me, David Q. yelled at everybody, Rhett implied that my answer is wrong...I'm in big trouble it looks like to me!

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1007

(3/2/04 12:35 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

That wasn't a parody of you Matt, it was a koan, for Rhett.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 789

(3/2/04 12:35 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

That's my interpretation. What did you expect me to say? 42?

No, 36. And I didn't mean to yell at you, sometimes I just get hot tempered. I'm sorry.

Rhett, it's funny how you say that a person who isn't close to enlightenment won't understand your interpretation of the meaning. What a sneaky way at guarding against people who will say you're wrong, because you can just say "you aren't close to enlightenment, so you can't understand". That's ox shit.

Your interpretation doesn't mean much anyway. It can be debated whether Ganto was actually mimicking an ox, or if he was just frustrated and developed a headache.

MGregory

Posts: 458

(3/2/04 12:41 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Damn, I think my communication skills are going down the tubes. Let me try that again:

Quote:

---

Tharan: "To stick your neck out" implies some sort of danger or negative outcome. For where does this danger come?

---

Well, look! :-) You're questioning me, :-) Scott yelled at me, :-) Dave T. parodied me, :-) David Q. yelled at everybody, :-) Rhett implied that my answer is wrong :-)...I'm in big trouble it looks like to me! :-)

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1008

(3/2/04 12:43 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

:-)

MGregory

Posts: 460

(3/2/04 12:45 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Huh??? What???

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 461(3/2/04 12:49 pm)Reply  | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> Alright, I admit I'm frickin' slap-happy. I have to be serious now and figure out the sound of one hand. I've been thinking about it all day and getting nowhere. I'd should really be very depressed. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2479(3/2/04 1:01 pm)Reply                                                                | --- <hr/> Anybody who's anybody can slap with one hand.                                                                                                                                                                      |
| MGregoryPosts: 462(3/2/04 1:07 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Zag,Go outside and stare at the sun!- that guy on the Carol Burnette show                                                                                                                |

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1495

(3/2/04 1:13 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Matt,

I was using you to point to Rhett. I wasn't really questioning you.

BTW, you won't know the sound of one hand by listening. Neither will Zag no the sound of one hand by touch. Sorry Zag :P

Tharan

MGregory

Posts: 463

(3/2/04 1:19 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

BTW, you won't know the sound of one hand by listening.

---

Funny you should say that, because I was doing just that for the past two days and I just happened to look at the book again (the yellow Hakuin book) and I realized I totally misinterpreted the passage that explains it! So I've been driving myself insane for nothing.

MGregory

Posts: 464

(3/2/04 2:26 pm)

Reply

When in doubt, type it out...

---

Just posting this here because I typed it up and it's such a classic essay. This is from "The Zen Master Hakuin - Selected Writings" translated by Philip B. Yampolsky. It is composed of about seven or eight letters written by Hakuin to various people inquiring about Zen. I don't like it quite as much as "The Essential Teachings of Zen Master Hakuin" translated by Norman Waddell, but it's really good. I like Hakuin a lot. I think he's very inspiring and easy to understand. -MSG

Edit: Easy to read, I should say. I ought to kick myself for saying it is easy to understand.

When I was fifteen I first left home to become a monk. Between the ages of twenty-two and twenty-three I forged a great ambition and night and day, persevering more and more, I devoted myself solely to the Mu koan. In the spring of my twenty-fourth year at Eigan-ji in Echigo I suddenly had a great awakening at the sound of the temple bell at night. Forty-five years have passed since that time and I have always urged people, paying no attention to whether they were relatives or friends, whether they were old or young, of high or low estate, by all means to once obtain the power to penetrate to the Great Matter. Some I have caused to doubt their "self," some I have required to study the Mu koan. I have used a variety of expedients, including teaching with admonitions and instructions. I should estimate that during this period those who have shown a degree of responsiveness and were able to obtain the great joy of awakening were several tens in number.

Five or six years ago I made up my mind to instruct everyone by saying, "Listen to the Sound of the Single Hand." I have come to realize that this koan is infinitely more effective in instructing people than any of the methods I had used before. It seems to raise the ball of doubt in people much more easily and the readiness with which progress in meditation is made has been as different as the clouds are from the earth. Thus I have come to encourage the meditation on the Single Hand exclusively.

What is the Sound of the Single Hand? When you clap together both hands a sharp sound is heard; when you raise the one hand there is neither sound nor smell. Is this the High Heaven of which Confucius speaks? Or is it the essentials of what Yamamba describes in these words: "The echo of the completely empty valley bears tidings heard from the soundless sound?" This is something that can by no means be heard with the ear. If conceptions and discriminations are not mixed within it and it is quite apart from seeing, hearing, perceiving, and knowing, and if, while walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, you proceed straightforwardly without interruption in the study of this koan, then in the place where reason is exhausted and words are ended, you will suddenly pluck out the karmic root of birth and death and break down the cave of ignorance. Thus you will attain to a peace in which the phoenix has left the golden net and the crane has been set free of the basket. At this time the basis of mind, consciousness, and emotion is suddenly shattered; the realm of illusion with its endless sinking in the cycle of birth and death is overturned. The treasure accumulation of the Three Bodies and the Four Wisdoms is taken away, and the miraculous realm of the Six Supernatural Powers and Three Insights is transcended.

How worthy of veneration it is! When the Single Hand enters the ear to even the slightest degree, the sound of the Buddha, the sound of the gods, the sound of the bodhisattvas, sravakas, pratyeka-buddhas, hungry ghosts, fighting demons, the sound of beasts, of heaven and of hell, all sounds existing in this world, are heard without exception. This is called "the pure supernatural power of hearing any sound anywhere." When the Single Hand enters the ear to even the slightest degree, it is possible at a glance to see through one's own world, other worlds, Buddha worlds, the demons' palaces, all Pure Lands in the ten directions, and the filthy worlds of the six realms, as if one were looking at the palm of one's hand. This is called "the pure supernatural power of seeing anything anywhere." When the Single Hand enters the ear even to the slightest degree, all traces rising and falling through the endless cycle of rebirth from the infinite kalpas of the past, all shadows revolving back and forth from the infinite kalpas of the past, appear as clearly and brilliantly as though they were placed before the treasure mirror. This is called "the pure supernatural power of knowing of the former existence of one's self and others." When the Single Hand enters the ear even to the slightest degree, you penetrate to the fact that eating gruel and rice, motion and action do not lie in practice or study, but are the living samadhi with which all men are from the outset endowed. At this time the four Dharma worlds of the Kegon and the One Vehicle of the Lotus are "Empty-handed, but holding a hoe; afoot, yet riding a water buffalo."

The Great Matter of this foul earth changing to become the Pure Land, this common body changing to become the body of the Buddha, stands brilliantly before the eyes. This is called "the pure supernatural power of going anywhere or doing anything." When the Single Hand enters the ear even to the slightest degree, your mind, another's mind, relative's minds, the Buddha mind, the minds of gods, the minds of all sentient beings are at one glance seen through without the slightest doubt. This is called "the pure supernatural power of seeing into the minds of others." When the Single Hand enters the ear even to the slightest degree, in the mind with which all men are originally endowed, not one bit of ignorance exists, not one bit of birth and death remains. All is vast perfection, all is vast emptiness. This is called "the pure supernatural power of exhausting all outflowings."

At this time the hundred thousand gates to the Dharma, the innumerable mysterious meanings, the accumulation of all the virtues of the world and the treasure adornments as well, are all endowed in one's own mind, with nothing whatsoever lacking. Then for the first time you know that "the six perfections and all practices are perfected within the body." What good fruits of the worlds of Heaven or man excel this! How can the joy of the Three Virtuous Positions and Four Rewards exceed this!

Ah, how difficult to obtain and difficult to receive is the body of a man! How difficult to meet and rarely to be heard is the Buddhadharma! But having received it and having heard of it, men still long after illusory fame and profit, wallow in meaningless greed and love, and spend their whole lives in vain. Then they return to their despised and dangerous former abodes in the three evil realms and receive their endless torments. What a sad and regrettable thing this is! Hated, and deservedly so, is the bitter fruit of the six paths and the three evil ways. In Buddhism belief in cause and effect and fear of suffering is considered the great wisdom; those who awaken to their own minds and penetrate to their own natures are the learned sages, Buddhas and Patriarchs. What a sad lot are those great fools who possess some worldly knowledge and conceptions! They read a few volumes of the scriptures, listen to a few lectures, and then call themselves wise and illustrious. Saying that they have destroyed cause and effect and done away with three periods, they consider themselves wise and knowledgeable. They look at people who believe in cause and effect, fear the fact of rebirth, recite the sutras, offer ceremonies, and practice compassion and good works, and then clap their hands and roar with laughter at them. What sort of mental state is this?

In examining well the workings of the rising and sinking of the cycle of birth and death in this world, we see instances where people, lacking the power of blessings that will allow them to be born in heaven, yet not having the evil karma to make them fall into hell, unexpectedly find rebirth in this filthy world. Some are noble, some base, some rich, some poor, some wise, some stupid, some clever, some dull. You must bear in mind that this is a reflection of the quality of their deeds in a former life. Those of noble and elevated station lack the blessings to be born in heaven; those miserable and starving lack the evil karma that will send them to hell. A frightening and sobering prospect indeed! I urge everyone to labor and strive and before this dewlike life is ended and the physical body disintegrates, to stand in fear and trembling and seek to hear for himself the Sound of the Single Hand.

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/3/04 4:45 am

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2489
(3/2/04 2:37 pm)
Reply

---

---

The religious are dismissed.

MGregory
Posts: 466
(3/3/04 2:54 am)
Reply

Re: When in doubt, type it out...

---

One thing I wonder about though is who is Hakuin writing for? Is it someone who is well read in Buddhism? Can someone go from no knowledge whatsoever, work with 100% dedication to this koan and become enlightened? That's what he seems to be saying. Then again, he does make many references to Buddhist literature.

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/3/04 2:55 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 790
(3/3/04 3:59 am)
Reply

Re: When in doubt, type it out...

---

100% dedication to a koan would bring about enlightenment.

MGregory
Posts: 469
(3/3/04 7:58 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

I just thought of something...

Quote:

---

Tharan: I was using you to point to Rhett.

---

Maybe I should follow suit. It's easy to be like me and claim to know nothing. It's much more difficult to claim that you know something.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 329
(3/3/04 9:08 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

That wasn't a parody of you Matt, it was a koan, for Rhett.

---

The Truth is straightforward, but that doesn't mean that people (including yourself) can see it, on the contrary, people do their best to distort and conceal it.

Quote:

---

Rhett, it's funny how you say that a person who isn't close to enlightenment won't understand your interpretation of the meaning. What a sneaky way at guarding against people who will say you're wrong, because you can just say "you aren't close to enlightenment, so you can't understand". That's ox shit.

---

No, as i said, people will understand my interpretation, but it won't mean much in the absence of enlightenment. Your next point is proof of this.

Quote:

---

Your interpretation doesn't mean much anyway. It can be debated whether Ganto was actually mimicking an ox, or if he was just frusturated and developed a headache.

---

Well, i think you're being silly.

Rhett Hamilton

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1498
(3/3/04 9:59 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Matt wrote,

Quote:

---

Maybe I should follow suit. It's easy to be like me and claim to know nothing. It's much more difficult to claim that you know something.

---

Why claim anything?

Tharan

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1009
(3/3/04 10:13 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

The Truth is straightforward, but that doesn't mean that people (including yourself) can see it, on the contrary, people do their best to distort and conceal it.

Kisan, happy without attainment, carried on wandering.

MGregory
Posts: 472
(3/3/04 4:53 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

Matt: It's easy to be like me and claim to know nothing. It's much more difficult to claim that you know something.

Tharan: Why claim anything?

---

In discussions no matter what you say you're claiming something, if only implicitly. Maybe "claim" is the wrong word, but I can't think of a better one. Rhett is most certainly claiming that he is enlightened even though he doesn't come out and say it, and those of us who criticize him are claiming we know

|                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                  | more than he does. As to why we choose to claim one thing over another, I think that is pretty obvious: to manipulate people. Edited by: MGregory at: 3/3/04 5:01 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| KellyvenPosts: 43(3/4/04 7:14 pm)Reply                     | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> Ganto's two meals When thinking of a full belly (this life), one will not learn (new life). Obligations are for this life, not for the new life.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 794(3/5/04 4:23 am)Reply | ... <hr/> Kelly, you may be on to something. Care to explain it more?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1502(3/5/04 4:56 am)Reply                | Re: Koan Thread <hr/> Matt wrote, Quote: <hr/> As to why we choose to claim one thing over another, I think that is pretty obvious: to manipulate people. <hr/> On the other hand, I made you stake a position (and thus potentially defend it) by merely asking a question. Questions are more subtle and when asked corectly and at the right time, can have quite an impact. "Are you enlightened?""Are you?""That's an evasion." (statement needing potential defense)"Is it?" ...and so on... |

Maybe I have had too much judo/ji jitsu training though or read the Art of War one too many times. Not everyone is inclined to bend.

Tharan

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1014
(3/5/04 7:48 am)
Reply

Re: Two meals.

---

Two masters.

Note the part of the fourth son of Cho, and the actions of those who know how to "do their part well".

MGregory
Posts: 481
(3/5/04 8:02 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Quote:

---

On the other hand, I made you stake a position (and thus potentially defend it) by merely asking a question. Questions are more subtle and when asked correctly and at the right time, can have quite an impact.

---

If I am correct in assuming that you are speaking in terms of teaching someone, I just want to point out that I was thinking of it more in terms of someone trying to enlighten himself. If I act enlightened, I'm pretty much inviting attack on myself, whereas if I don't people leave me alone.

As to teaching someone, I'm still undecided on whether making statements is better than asking questions. I try not to act like a teacher on truly ultimate issues because I don't feel qualified to teach anything like that. I ask questions because it feels natural to me, and I like to prod into people to see what they are thinking. I don't know if enlightenment can really be obtained, but I do know that understanding of knowledge can be greatly simplified, leading to greater clarity of mind, which I know from experience. I also know that my understanding can be simplified further. That's about all I can truthfully admit in regards to ultimate knowledge, which I believe to be the ultimate simplification of all knowledge.

FarrokhzAd
Registered User
Posts: 2
(3/5/04 9:29 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

Rhett,
Concerning Ganto's Two Meals...

You are still missing something.
Consider the title of the Koan and look at the fourth son of the Cho family.

Edited to add: Now that I've read the entire thread I see that Dave had the same general idea two posts back.

Edited by: FarrokhzAd at: 3/5/04 10:31 am

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Koan Thread

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|----------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1503(3/5/04 10:19 am)Reply | Re: Koan Thread<hr/> Matt,I would never suggest that anyone should act like anything. Better to be. Shortcomings are more obvious that way and more easily improved, if a person is honest.The art of asking questions is only a tool.Tharan |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1504(3/5/04 10:41 am)Reply | Re: Koan Thread<hr/> Farrokhzad wrote,Quote:<hr/> Rhett,Concerning Ganto's Two Meals...You are still missing something.Consider the title of the Koan and look at the fourth son of the Cho family.<hr/>                      |

Ganto is the focus of the koan, though Kisan certainly achieves something from it, it seems. I believe Rhett sees the essence correctly. The Cho family, Kisan, meals, oxen rebirths, are all merely character objects in Ganto's dream. He has recently awoken to the fact that he is dreaming. Now that he knows he is dreaming, he is awake. It takes some adjustment.

Tharan

FarrokhzAd
Registered User
Posts: 2
(3/5/04 11:03 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

WolfsonJakk,

While I don't disagree with your general assessment I also do not think it is complete.

There would be no need for the fourth son to take Kisan home if Ganto's perception was the primary focus.

It has been my experience that Koans do not have extraneous detail.

Sometimes we need to look at the end to understand the beginning.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1445
(3/5/04 11:20 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

The koan is about karma, and about how enlightenment and karma are not achieved in isolation from others but together. We help each other but our egos hinder. Appearances are deceptive. Those who seem to be following the "right" rules are not necessarily making the fastest progress. Mr. Cho is a compassionate householder, he is nonjudgmental and creates space for others to achieve their spiritual goals. Therefore he is gaining rapidly. His great asset is that he gives unconditionally. Kisan is a rule follower, but he does not understand humility or magnanimity. He doesn't really understand subtleties of karma. He is not acting from love but from self-promotion. However, he becomes humbled by Ganto's sharp rebuke, and makes progress, h as a breakthrough. Ganto is perhaps in danger as Kisan points out, however, it appears that he understands well enough that he is indeed able to "play his part well." He is beyond worrying about the pettiness of obligations, he isn't counting pennies, and neither is Mr. Cho.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1505
(3/5/04 12:49 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Farrokhzad wrote,

Quote:

---

There would be no need for the fourth son to take Kisan home if Ganto's perception was the primary focus.

It has been my experience that Koans do not have extraneous detail.

---

I would disagree completely about many koans not having extraneous detail. In fact, it is one of their main values, imo, sifting through the detail; to learn without learning (the act of learning).

Quote:

---

Sometimes we need to look at the end to understand the begining.

---

And sometimes we need not look at all.

BTW, what are you majoring in at college?

Tharan

SinclairIII
Registered User
Posts: 1
(3/5/04 1:50 pm)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Yes.

Koans are supposed to confuse you.

From Chaos comes understanding.

MGregory

Posts: 482

(3/5/04 4:05 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Tharan,

Quote:

---

I would never suggest that anyone should act like anything. Better to be. Shortcomings are more obvious that way and more easily improved, if a person is honest.

The art of asking questions is only a tool.

---

You're talking about teaching, right? Or seeking? Or both? Or neither hehe

Matt

John

Registered User

Posts: 98

(3/5/04 6:17 pm)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Anyone interested in koans and reading commentaries by a modern Zen teacher - here you will find a library of such discourses by Roshi John Daido Looi.

www.mro.org/zmm/dharmateachings/dharmateach\(daido\).html.html)

John

FarrokhzAd

Registered User

Posts: 3

(3/6/04 4:15 am)

Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Tharan

Quote:

---

I would disagree completely about many koans not having extraneous detail. In fact, it is one of their main values, imo, sifting through the detail; to learn without learning (the act of learning).

---

It looks like we simply disagree.

I think that if it affects our learning then it is not extraneous. The fourth son deffinately had an effect on both of the brothers.

There might be koans that I've never read that have it. If you know of any I'll gladly read them.

It's quite possible that, unless you want to try to convince me otherwise, we'll simply be in disagreement on this one.

Quote:

---

F: Sometimes we need to look at the end to understand the begining.

WJ: And sometimes we need not look at all.

---

True!

Quote:

---

BTW, what are you majoring in at college?

---

I started out as an Ecology major, now I've switched to cellular/molecular Biology.

I'm meeting with an advisor next week to see about minoring in Math and Physics.

How about yourself? College? Independent Study?

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1510
(3/6/04 7:13 am)
Reply

Re: Koan Thread

---

Farrokhzad wrote,

Quote:

---

It looks like we simply disagree.
I think that if it affects our learning then it is not extraneous.
The fourth son deffinately had an effect on both of the brothers.

---

I'm not sure we have to disagree. If you find value in each word of any given koan, then it is not extraneous.

Quote:

---

How about yourself? College? Independent Study?

---

Bachelor of science, computer science, University of Texas, 1992.
Independent study since then.

Tharan

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> LAUGHING WISDOM

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                   | Comment                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2710(6/25/04 11:10 pm)Reply | LAUGHING WISDOM<hr/>Edited by: suergaz at: 6/25/04 11:57 pm                      |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1725(6/26/04 9:48 am)Reply   | Re: LAUGHING WISDOM<hr/> Keeping up your usual standard of vacuity I see.Dan Rowden |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2711(6/26/04 9:55 am)Reply  | ---<hr/> Is that wit? It belongs in a museum!                                               |

|                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1727(6/26/04 10:01 am)Reply                      |  Re: --- <hr/> Right next to your vatted brain, you mean? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2715(6/26/04 10:30 am)Reply                                                                                                 |  ---- <hr/> What do you think the highest wisdom is you sotted ham?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 418(6/26/04 10:56 am)Reply   Edit  |  Re: ---- <hr/> I laughed so hard the other day i pulled a muscle in my rib cage, despite all the conditioning it's been getting over the last few weeks. Why? Well, when you realise that A does not equal B, and that B is in fact A, . . . uncontrolled hilarity is very much the order of the day. |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1668(6/26/04 2:11 pm)Reply                                                                                                                  |  ... <hr/> Welcome to infinity. It is ironically hilarious isn't it?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Jones KellyPosts: 179(6/27/04 8:49 am)Reply                                                                                                                   |  Re: ---- <hr/> The act of identifying is not the thing, the thing is its identity?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 429
(6/27/04 1:48 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ----

---

Quote:

Well, when you realise that A does not equal B, and that B is in fact A, . . . uncontrolled hilarity is very much the order of the day.

---

Paraphrased:

When one realises that one's experiences are not of a reality that exists outside of one's experiences, and that one's experience of a constructed reality occurs within experience . . . uncontrolled hilarity is very much the order of the day.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2722
(6/27/04 2:29 pm)
Reply

 Re: ----

Rhett:

---

Quote:

When one realises that one's experiences are not of a reality that exists outside of one's experiences, and that one's experience of a constructed reality occurs within experience . . . uncontrolled hilarity is very much the order of the day.

---

Ideally, yes.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Laziness

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 24(3/13/04 7:46 pm)Reply | Laziness <hr/> Laziness, in spite of what people say about it, is not bad because others look down upon it. It is bad because it betrays to yourself what your life lacks: a driving force, an engine, or in human terms: a personality. One can live a whole life, each and every day, without a shred of personality. A case like this could be asked at any point in the course of it "What is the meaning of your life?" and get no answer that the person answering can fully support. No wonder that the idea that life ultimately has no meaning is so popular. Many of such futile lives have been lived, are being lived, and will be lived in the future. Not much can be done about these many, but maybe the small number of people that do have a personality can be raised. Maybe they will be recognized again in the future as people who count.. and who count more. At least they should begin recognizing themselves. Laziness is not just the product of doing nothing. If that were so, it would not produce any uncomfortable feeling. It could be quite blissful, in fact. This is not the case: being lazy, consciously or (the regular case) unconsciously, does not feel good. There is a component of guilt in it, even apart from the guilt that is caused by potential social discredit that follows from the more obvious cases of laziness. The following probably happens to many people, occasionally: for a few moments they watch themselves live, from a distance as it were, and realise that after this living, there will be entirely nothing. Indeed, beyond death we can't see anything at all. It suggests a great nothingness, or at least so great a change that the living can't have any idea of it (In certain minds it is actually not that bad; they think their soul will continue to be as it is, albeit much more or less blissful | than 'in this life'. But I will get to that later). This idea is frightening, to say the least. Therefore it is easily forgotten, but a residue of it remains present and manifests itself in the discomfort behind laziness.

Being lazy can actually mean much more than hanging on a couch all day. Being immersed in work, having a (religious) higher cause beside oneself, alcoholism (and any addiction) are all ways of steering our minds away from the problem that we all face: if we don't do something now, we might have already wasted our entire life. Thinking of this something is a difficult task that in the beginning may give little hope of ever 'arriving' somewhere that takes away the feeling of incompleteness. However, not thinking means giving in and, in a sense, being already dead.

Because laziness is such a personal problem, it is a very worthy one. Every person, you could even say, is worthy to the degree that he recognises this problem. It may seem that this means that all one has to do is think that one is not living worthy enough a life. But a simple speaking out loud, for the sake of being able to turn over and continue sleeping, must mean one hasn't really realised anything. Those who return to sleep can't make any kind of claim in this respect – except to themselves, for comfort, which they readily do. In this category also fall people who believe in an afterlife.

So more has to be done... but what? This is where it gets difficult, though it sounds very simple: you must remember what you have thought, for as long and as consciously as you can. Automatically, you'll have to live according to your thought and get rid of all dissonance in your mind. In other words: you must find truth, which you cannot deny, cannot help but fully agree with. You must understand yourself through and through, and not be held back by anybody telling you that you understood wrongly. This is the only cure for laziness and, more importantly, for what lies below it.

MGregory

Posts: 526

(3/13/04 10:17 pm)

Reply

Re: Laziness

---

Quote:

---

Laziness, in spite of what people say about it, is not bad because others look down upon it. It is bad because it betrays to yourself what your life lacks: a driving force, an engine, or in human terms: a personality. One can live a whole life, each and every day, without a shred of personality. A case like this could be asked at any point in the course of it "What is the meaning of your life?" and get no answer that the person answering can fully support. No wonder that the idea that life ultimately has no meaning is so popular. Many of such futile lives have been lived, are being lived, and will be lived in the future. Not much can be done about these many, but maybe the small number of people that do have a personality can be raised. Maybe they will be recognized again in the future as people who count.. and who count more. At least they should begin recognizing themselves.

---

I'm having trouble understanding this. Are you saying that a person's personality is their meaning in life? Where does it come from, the person or somewhere else? What do you mean by "raised"? Do you mean it in the normal sense, as in brought up by their parents?

Quote:

---

Therefore it is easily forgotten, but a residue of it remains present and manifests itself in the discomfort behind laziness.

---

You think? That is an interesting theory. You're saying that people are lazy because they feel that life is meaningless, and so feel everything they do is a waste of time, right?

Quote:

---

So more has to be done... but what? This is where it gets difficult, though it sounds very simple: you must remember what you have thought, for as long and as consciously as you can. Automatically, you'll have to live according to your thought and get rid of all dissonance in your mind. In other words: you must find truth, which you cannot deny, cannot help but fully agree with. You must understand yourself through and through, and not be held back by anybody telling you that you understood wrongly. This is the only cure for laziness and, more importantly, for what lies below it.

---

I don't understand. What do you mean by "remember what you have thought?" I am very lazy, but I can't figure out why.

wounded bird
Posts: 13
(3/13/04 11:08 pm)
Reply

ANd Also...

---

Would those who are "enlightened" see this as unnecessary? I may be again misunderstanding, although I'm trying to understand, but those who are enlightened would, to me, have found something better other than the Self. For is it not the "self" that is the personality? Personally, I follow Autem's advice more so than attempting to achieve enlightenment for I think that through Autem's advice one finds the way inevitably to enlightenment at the end of the journey in bits along the way in stages as it is revealed and as the person is ready to accept it for it seems not an inward knowledge but grace bestowed, a type of spiritual "knowledge".

Autem what do you think of enlightenment in terms of your discussion?

Autem
Registered User
Posts: 25
(3/14/04 6:59 am)
Reply

Re: Laziness

---

MGregory,

Quote:

---

I'm having trouble understanding this. Are you saying that a person's personality is their meaning in life? Where does it come from, the person or somewhere else?

---

I'm not saying that. In my opinion, the degree to which a person looks for a meaning to his/her life and values living a meaningful life is the degree to which a person has a personality.

Quote:

---

What do you mean by "raised"?

---

'Raised' referred to the number of people. Sorry if my choice of words is somewhat vague, I tend to have that problem, probably because English isn't my native language. I meant that maybe the small number of people with a personality can be made a somewhat larger number of people.

Quote:

---

You're saying that people are lazy because they feel that life is meaningless, and so feel everything they do is a waste of time, right?

---

Not really. People are too lazy to give their life meaning, they just live it, and somewhere they know this. This brings (at least in my experience) some discomfort, though usually a not very conscious form of it. You feel that you are wasting the one lifetime you have.

Quote:

---

I don't understand. What do you mean by "remember what you have thought?" I am very lazy, but I can't figure out why.

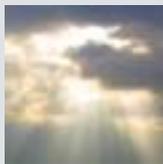

---

That was a bit vague, wasn't it? (and it seemed so clear when I wrote it) 'What you have thought' refers to the thought that life is passing by meaninglessly unless you give it some meaning. It's easy to dismiss the thought and live on without dealing with the problem. This I would call laziness. To choose to remember it is the only way of dealing with it.

Wounded bird,

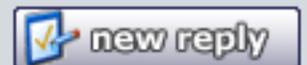

As long as a person has found that reaching enlightenment is for him the best way of giving meaning to his life and is actually dedicated to the reaching of this goal, that would be a solution to the 'problem'. There would be no comfortable sinking back into a life without thought. I'm not sure if enlightenment is the end of everybody's path, though. I myself tend to see enlightenment as a sort of death, in that both are endings. You can be as detached as you like when you're no longer alive, why try and achieve that sooner? But maybe it is inevitable, I can't tell that yet. Is there life after enlightenment?

|                                                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 226(3/14/04 7:28 am)Reply                                                                 | ... <hr/> I like being lazy when I'm lazy, or else I would get up and do something! I think the guilt you talked about is caused by social repression. I'm not saying you feel guilty only because they might find out that you have been lazy. You feel guilty because you were made to believe that it's bad.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| MGregoryPosts: 529(3/14/04 10:34 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> I think it depends on how consciously a person lives his life, Rairun. If a person has a will, then the guilt they experience is a product of his will. If a person lives by doing whatever he thinks other people want him to do, then guilt would stem from other people.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 227(3/14/04 12:11 pm)Reply                                                                | ... <hr/> But I think that if the will was truthful, they would stop being lazy before they had a chance to feel guilty. If they don't, they are either being stupid or trying to trick themselves into believing their purpose is important.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 228(3/14/04 12:24 pm)Reply                                                                | ... <hr/> For example, I have a paper due tomorrow, but I am lazy to write it. If my will to get a good grade was stronger than the will to be lazy, being lazy would simply show how I am stupid. As I am not stupid, I know very well the two possible outcomes. If I decide to be lazy, I am consciously valuing laziness over the grade. Why should I feel guilty to value what I value? I don't. Conclusion: if you value grades more than being lazy, then stop being stupid and study. If you value being lazy more than your grades, don't be stupid to feel guilty about it. It doesn't take half a brain to figure that out. |

|                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 26(3/15/04 4:28 am)Reply                                                                     | Re: <hr/> If you're doing something different from what your will 'tells you' to do, that really means you lack the will to do things your own way. This lack of will is reason for feeling guilt, as you are not taking responsibility for your life. But if you consciously choose not to write that paper and be lazy you at least acknowledge that you are responsible for whatever choice you make. The life of anyone who doesn't do that isn't so very different from that of an animal. |
| MGregoryPosts: 533(3/15/04 12:08 pm)Reply    | Re: Re: <hr/> I don't know you guys . . . if a person wills the lowest standard of himself, does that make him better than an animal?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 230(3/15/04 1:42 pm)Reply                                                                   | ... <hr/> Lowest standard compared to what?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| MGregoryPosts: 538(3/16/04 12:31 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Gee, I don't know. Something besides a thing with horns and a tail, and munches on grass while staring into space?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 27(3/16/04 1:25 am)Reply                                                                     | Re: ... <hr/> The difference between a person willing the lowest standard for himself and a cow is that the cow doesn't will any standard for herself. But people can be like that, too.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

|                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 231(3/16/04 1:48 am)Reply                                                                  | ... <hr/> I think we can't help but will things to ourselves, or else we wouldn't move at all. I can't see much difference between a cow and a person when it comes to that. The only difference is that we are smarter, so we are able to plan our actions in a more complex way. Unless you truly will to fit in a certain standard, why does it matter to be 'better' than anything else? We don't have to be better, even because we define what better is. It's just a judgement of value. Believing that you have to be perfect is not much different from trying to abstain from sex before marriage because you've been told it's a sin. I'm not saying it's wrong to will to be perfect, as I don't think it's wrong to abstain from sex, but do you really will that? Or are you kidding yourself? |
| MGregoryPosts: 541(3/17/04 12:05 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> The standard you choose just depends on what you want in life. If you don't want anything, then you have nothing to worry about.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> The Thinkers' Inn > Light

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 447(2/20/04 9:19 am)Reply                                                                                       | Light <hr/> Dan Rowden brought light in the overwhelming darkness.The background of this forum changed, it looks so much better now!Woowoooh! I'd better stop drinking now, and go to bed.Before I leave: suergaz, jimhaz, birdofhermes [beauty!] and voce io, those are the diamonds in the mud. So to speak. For me.Ah well, QRS, Dave Toast, Philip et al., they're way over my head.Hugs from The Golden Girls.http://www.spiderwebservices.nl/thegoldengirlsquotes/ |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 701(2/20/04 9:58 am)Reply  | Re: Light <hr/> Haha!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2328(2/20/04 12:56 pm)Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Paul, have you ever been on television? It is strange, I've never seen the golden girls. I've seen your site though.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 448(2/20/04 6:26 pm)Reply      | Light (reprise) <hr/> Abandonment.Oh. Oh!                                                                                                              |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2335(2/20/04 10:58 pm)Reply | --- <hr/> What do you mean abandonment?!                                                                                                                    |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2339(2/20/04 11:25 pm)Reply | -- <hr/> You can't just abandon this forum because I haven't seen the golden girls!I'm only 26! They have not seen me either! I've at least read them! |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 449(2/21/04 12:18 am)Reply     | Re: -- <hr/> Leave this forum? I'm infected with it. Attachment!Another addiction. Love to suergaz.                                      |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > Live and propagate

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 42(2/21/04 10:16 am)Reply | Live and propagate <hr/> Live and propagate2004.1.302004.1.21Physics "Absolutivity", overthrow the theory that random exists in Quantum physics, corresponding to my philosophy's Predestination.ç%oo©ç•†â-lã€Šç»•â-1è®ã€‹,æŽ`ç¿»é‡•â-âŠ&gt;â-lé‡Œéš•æœ°â-~âœ`çš„è®œ—,â-1â””äŽæ^‘çš,,â“2â-lé‡Œçš,, Predestination. I am going to gather members of genius religion and build a genius country organization in sixty years, build a space ship, fly out the earth.æ^‘â‡††âœ‡âœ`â...-â••â1^â†...èšé&gt;†âœ©æ%o•æ•TMæ•TMâ3/4’â»°ç««ä, €ä, aâœ©æ%o•â&gt;1/2æœ°æž,, â^¶lé€ â‡†°ä, €è%o~â®‡â®TMéŹžè^1, éŹžâ‡†°âœ°ç•f. Is genius killer hereditary? The male genius killer have a female soul, the female genius killer have a male soul. So it is better that a male genius killer marry with a female genius killer, but they don't like each other. I can't get the answer presently, anyway, it is interesting :) Genuine love, real life, pure human. Think intensely become philosopher, think peacefully become literateur. 2004.1.22When pig heard that to build a space ship, it consider food first, human-like animal consider money first. All of us need to be scientist. |

I return to the village where i lived in my childhood. The village didn't changed much even after so many years, i love this place. I think, how nice that will be, if Internet is connected, i live here peacefully with my girl, and do research for several years. It is feasible.

What you think as hallucination, is what i take for grant. My idea astonished you? Your stupid astonished me too. Human is really just grow up.

I see sister Ling, i wrote that she was died in "my childhood", but it was i misheard, i find now she lie down on the bed everyday, i think she is a genius who achieved unconsciousness at last, and become neurastheniac, she like a infant very much now, forget the ability to speak, but the curiosity and sex consciousness is kept, i think her neurasthenia can be recover if a boy payed enough time on her by love her.

2004.1.23

The big world in my childhood is a small place now, it become small because i grow to tall now, so the height of eyes changed, and i can walk for a much bigger area than ago by the same time, the most important is that i know the outside world now :) But i still remember the freshness in those years when explore it.

Why you can't feel i am handsome in normal case? Because the hero is fighting, his face is tried, but just after a little decorating and rest for one day, you will find he is so handsome :)

Nietzsche think character is changeable if the time is long enough, yes, but you must remember, the essence of a people is unchangeable, i.e. gene. Those changing you see, is only the development of his gene, his essence. So human need to propagate and die, so gene can be changed.

Human's mistake is distinguish themselves from animals too early while they still have many portion of animals, we should study to the animals, polygamy will be accepted by everyone, don't forget, China was always polygamy, so it have no problem such as make the society become unstable.

The feature of arguing is that they don't recognize what they said several seconds ago.

Why she didn't reply to you? Because you send to the wrong number. Haha, a philosopher, haha, a boy in love :_)

The secret, is do everything, everything on your initiative, you want him/her

Do you still have this character? the indication of eagerly learning child and doing important things? I am happy that i still have this character, even i am always calm, i am always doing important things.

I look at the stars in the sky, so big the universe is, a plane is flying in the sky, like a star. We have already done so miraculous a thing, we have already created so miraculous a world. I look at the star, i trust, if i hand out my hand, i can touch them, i trust, i can get on them. I love the child, his happy and beautiful smiling face, even we can't done the work, they will continue.

The stupid adults train their children rudely to their expectation. They don't know how stupid themselves are compare to their children. They are too stupid, too too stupid, the world is justice, so they will die, leave the world to the clever children.

I am never a fantast, my imagination is always my plan in fact. What i am more good at is practice.

Things past, only the fact left, but everything is contained in the fact.

å§‘çˆˆèˆˆæˆˆé,fx—¶å¾¼å¤šä†éfl½å¤©å¤©æ<ç•€æ ‘æž•åˆ°å¤š,æ³, éš•æ—
¶å••åˆ°åœ°ä,šçž©. å!å!èˆˆæˆˆå••æ—¶å€™æž¶é°»å†³, è®¾¾æ³•æššå°
•é°»å†³å¥—åˆ°å¤šé°»å†³é†(E, æž¶ä, å¥½½, çž©åˆ°å••æ°”. å‘åå‘µ, èç™åˆ°æˆˆéfl½æœ%å°•è±j, çœÿæœ%è¶¶å‘€.

I think, get the utmost truth in physics should have no use, it should like the harmoniousness in philosophy, can't give you anything, but it is fun to seek it and get it.

Make your ambition be higher than anyone else in the world, so they won't worry about you that you will envy their things. Remember, people don't like a competitor, but they are happy to receive a leader. Yes, the pyramid is harmonious, and it is most stable.

Sister Ling is a genius that achieved unconsciousness. Sex-complement can generate genius, this is the reason genius seems come out randomly. Anyway, it is easier that a male genius with a female genius get a genius, and the quality should be better.

I know sexual intercourse is mainly for satisfied sexual desire on normal people, but on me it is mainly for propagation now. Whose is better? I know i am right. I thought being a sage should be dreadful ago, but now i find it is so good, especially i surmounted it.

2004.1.25

I get on the train to return to the university this morning :)

The reason for soldier should take command absolutely is prevent their stupid thought take bad effect.

2004.1.26

Why you love each other so much, but still have regret when recall it? Because you didn't achieved genuine love. I have already described genius love. Let her borne a child for you, if you love her.

I enter into the bedchamber in the noon. One people in the cold room, so many people in the world, no one to communicate. Lonely, too lonely, but i know you are there, let's meet each other at the mountaintop.

Why i didn't contact to you? Because you stay in the past, and repeat the past things. I need to put more time on the future.

I will go my road, i know my road is surely right, although it need to go through a long time of darkness. I am the genius of geniuses.

Don't be too impassion, or you will pull a muscle, maybe it is because i stand too long yesterday on the train :_)

I am a little hate only writing these things now, i should shut up my lips and learn eagerly. I know it is hard for me to surmount myself this time, but i can done it.

I find i am still a very shy boy, although very cool :) Shy is a good weapon on me now.

I find the childish style words i written ago is not childish now, as it really isn't. I wrote them in childish style to express them, now i find it was the best way. Yes, i know my childish words such as build space ship will become not childish soon.

Is it possible to develop polygamy to "the man have more than one wife while the woman have more than one husband"? As female genius should have more children too. Synergamy. This depend on women themselves, i need to understand woman first.

Sexual desire is physically, as you have no sexual desire after make love, love is mentally, as it is connected to propagation.

It is surely that i won't stop writing, as i won't stop thinking :_) What i need to do is not stop writing, but write NEW things.

2004.1.27

clone is non-sense, as it can't change gene, and, as i have already discovered the secret of genius, we can easily get better gene by zoogamy, which human do, i think natural procreation should always be the best.

I love being alone, hahaha, reading and thinking in the cool air, cool, hoho.

Why GNU/Linux can success? Because genius have the desire of being thinking, just like my father will play gambling even it may lost money, many hackers are willing to develop free software, gain no money but it can create value, gambling and develop free software both make geniuses being thinking. For the same reason, build a space ship will surely success too.

I feel most not alone when alone, because thinking make me connect to everyone.

A plan fly through the bright and beautiful cloud, the sunshine sprinkle through a gap of the cloud, three kites in the high air, several new leafs on a tree, oh, the clear world.

Original sin is the animal portion in human? I think this is just what Jesus mean to others. So, it can be eliminated.

The feature, the next years, are too beautiful! :)

Why i seems haven't much difference to you while i am a genius and you are not? Right, i only have 0.1% difference to you, while you only have 2% difference to chimpanzee. :_) I have happy to be almost the same with you, so we can share many things, but the difference is interesting too :)

The happiest thing is philosophy, i love philosophy :) Science haven't this happy, but it is interesting :)

I laugh happily when read my old articles, especially the love letters, too interesting, too lovely :)

æ•jæ•jé•“è•é€šç½—é©¬, çj®å®žæ~èç™æ ·ã€€,å¤©æ— ç»•ä°°ä¹·è·ã €,,è½½!â^°â±±å%•âç...æœ%œè·¹¼Œè^¹â^°æj¥å¤`è‡ªç,,¶ç>´ã€€,èç~æœ%œ
GNOMEçš, "Where we're going, we don't need roads...", å<‡æ•çåœ°å•‘å%œ •èµ°å•šã€€,

2004.1.28

People will be astonished when you say out the truth which they think should be hide in each other's heart as a taboo, but they will accept it soon, as it is true.

2004.1.29

I find sexual desire and appetite are almost the same on me now, although their behavior and function are different.

Now i often have many good and small thought, but i don't write down them, they are just the parts of harmoniousness, and i think let you think and find them by yourself is better, it is much a pleasure :)

Read over "The Second Sex" at last :D, many good and amusing materials, but a little too long :_)

2004.1.30

Read over "ZhuanFaLun", too funny, cheat normal uneducated stupid people, his super science unified science and all the superstition :) May be i can write a "Super falun Gong" if i have time :_) You know i am more good at bragging than Li Hongzhi :)

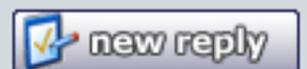

And i find FaLun Gong is saying "True, Good, Endure", but changed to "True, Good, Beautiful" when publicize to others for convenient, hehe, they know "Endure" is not a good moral character too, i don't like "Endure" this spiritual state, endure is ask you to hide your revenge in your deepest heart in fact, very despicable. I suggest student Li Hongzhi change the tenet to "True, Beautiful" strongly!

â†•â°±æ~â•çŽ°æ³•è½®âŠŸè´çš,æ~"çœŸâ-,â¿•"i¼Eâ•â¹âœ-â®fâ¼ æ
—¶â, °ä°†æ-¹â¾¿æ”¹æ^•â°†"çœŸâ-,ç¾Ž"i¼Eâ‘µâ‘µi¼Eä»-ä»-â¹ŸçŸ
Ÿé“â¿•â¹¶â, •æ~ä, €çš•âŸ½çš,,â“•æ€š¼Eæ^‘ä, •â-œæ-ç"â¿•"è¿™çš•ç²¾ç
ŸžçŠ¶æ€•i¼Eâ¿•â®žé™...ä, Šæ~è|â½ æŠŠæŠŸâœ•â¿fè—•â°â†...â¿fæœ
€æ±âœ,,i¼EæEâ°•‘é,,™çš,,ã€,,â¼°çf^â»°è®®æ•Žâ®•â¿—â•Eâ-
|æŠŠæ•™â¹%œ”¹æ^â€œçœŸŸ¾Žâ€!

What i want to say? :) I laugh :_) Laugh contained everything i want to say :)

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 391(2/21/04 11:13 am)Reply | Re: Live and propagate <hr/> Hey Hu Zheng, is there any way you could put more spaces in the Chinese parts? On my end (US, ISO-8859-1) the Chinese turns into garbage and makes the text go off the end of the screen.                     |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 43(2/21/04 11:26 am)Reply   | Re: Live and propagate <hr/> You can try Mozilla and use the codeset as UTF-8.It is not the text's problem.                                                                                                                           |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 392(2/21/04 1:09 pm)Reply  | Re: Live and propagate <hr/> Ok, thanks!                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2348(2/21/04 7:06 pm)Reply  | ---- <hr/> By living ones ideas, one can't help but propagate them! Hu Zheng, it is always refreshing to read you because you say of your living and your hopes, I mean you seem to live your hopes! Now about that spaceship! (:D) |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2354(2/22/04 12:49 am)Reply | --- <hr/> Ok, the real reason is that you are a thinker. :)                                                                                                                                                                                |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> "Logical causation"

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 272(7/7/03 5:35 pm)Reply | "Logical causation" <hr/> Empirical causation and logical causation are two different things and should be given different names. Any relationship they have to each other is accidental. We can never be certain that, empirically speaking, the acorn is a cause of the tree. The evidence that we have is purely statistical, which doesn't constitute absolute proof. But if we say that, logically, the tree is caused by that which it is not, and conclude that the acorn is not the tree, thus the acorn is a certain cause of the tree, then that is completely different from saying it is part of the causal chain that creates the tree. In logical causation, the acorn is no more significant than anything else, it's causal power on the tree isn't greater than any other cause. The acorn is no different than the sky, the sun, or the planet Pluto as far as logical causation is concerned. What similarities do empirical and logical causation have to each other? One is that the cause and the effect are necessarily different in both, but are there any others? The definition of cause that is espoused by DQ and DR is "something necessary for a thing to exist", so that links the two types of causation together. Or does it? If there is no way to verify that the acorn is an empirical cause of the tree, then how on earth is it going to be proven necessary for the existence of the tree? I suppose it can be considered | necessary within a particular empirical causal model, since without invariant conditions, scientific models would be useless.

But still, saying the acorn causes the tree in a logical sense and saying it causes the tree in the usual empirical sense are two different things. I don't see why they have to be called the same thing.

G Shantz

Registered User
Posts: 340
(7/8/03 8:00 am)

Reply

Re: "Logical causation"

---

(This message was left blank)

Edited by: G Shantz at: 7/8/03 8:06 am

drowden

Forum Host
Posts: 1297
(7/8/03 10:02)

Reply

Alternate term for logical causation

---

I've always thought "co-dependent origination", from the Buddhist lexicon, was an apt and useful alternative to "logical causation".

Dan Rowden

Now slipping back into his literary ether.....

MGregory

Registered User
Posts: 277
(7/9/03 16:07)

Reply

Re: Alternate term for logical causation

---

I forgot all about that one. You still equate them, though, don't you? I've been trying to figure this out: how the two types could be considered inseparable, or at least how physical causation necessitates logical causation (logical causation obviously doesn't need physical causation, unless it's considered needing it in the sense that concepts require physical causes to occur, but I don't think that's relevant, and certainly can't be proven beyond all possible doubt).

The most direct thing I can come up with is that if you have "acorn causes tree", you have three articles of consciousness: the acorn, the tree, and the relation between the two. The acorn and the tree are physical of course, but the relation is not so it must be a logical entity. The period of time where the object is half-acorn and half-tree doesn't refute it because all three articles are still necessary. The acorn and the tree cause the relation, and nothing else can possibly cause it, because that would make it a relation of something else. So there you have it. Physical causation dependent on co-dependent origination. Am I right or am I right?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 118

(7/9/03 11:04 pm)

Reply

Re: "Logical causation"

---

Quote:

---

Empirical causation and logical causation are two different things and should be given different names. Any relationship they have to each other is accidental

---

I think I agree. But I have a problem lending any credence to the "physical" type of causality for the following reason. All so-called "empirical" or "physical" entities are in reality only logical entities - ie, things which appear to our mind. That there are things "out there" can only ever be a supposition.

Let's take the acorn and the tree for example. A "physical" acorn appears to us, necessarily as an abstract, logical entity, as does the tree, and the physical relationship between the two. But the acorn may be simply a figment of our imagination, as with the tree, and the physical relationship between the two - regardless of how much supporting evidence there might seem to be for such things.

So for me, the word "cause", when applied to the physical world, is so incredibly weak it is rendered virtually meaningless. It really means "what we imagine the the relationship to be, at the moment".

When we say something like "the acorn is a cause of the tree", we may well be 100% wrong . . . and there is no way we can ever know if we are wrong. What kind of a cause is that?

The only way we can be sure that "an acorn causes a tree", is when we define an acorn as being a cause of a tree, in which case we are only saying  $A=A$ , and dealing with purely logical entities.

Edited by: ksolway at: 7/9/03 11:19 pm

|                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowden Forum Host Posts: 1298 (7/10/03 0:18) Reply                                                                                        | concepts and causality <hr/> This is right. We ought never forget that all things are concepts (including items of "supporting evidence") and so causal relationships between them are necessarily of a logical, abstract nature. Empirical, "physical" causes are just more concepts - practical rhetorical tools. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| jimhaz Registered User Posts: 268 (7/10/03 11:58) Reply   | Re: concepts and causality <hr/> If all things are concepts then ultimate truth or ultimate reality is also only a concept.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| drowden Forum Host Posts: 1301 (7/10/03 12:05) Reply                                                                                       | Reality and "thingness" <hr/> Ultimate Reality is not a "thing". "Thingness" is a characteristic of particular objects of appearance; that which exists and is relative. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| jimhaz Registered User Posts: 269 (7/10/03 12:39) Reply  | Re: Reality and "thingness" <hr/> I think it just depends how far one wishes to draw the bow. Humans can only think of what they sense or mentally 'create' as being things. It means nothing if it is not – you can't communicate it if it is not a thing. If one is willing to say that "things may be simply a figment of our imagination" then any concepts/thoughts we have may also just be our imagination, regardless of how logically pleasing they might seem. One cannot provide evidence for what lead to that concept being created or a person or group of people identifying it as the truth. Just as physical things are relative to other physical things all concepts are relative to other concepts. |

It is pointless replying, as I cannot see things the way you see them. In Davids book above he jumps from things existing to not existing in a way that seems to miss essential steps. The conclusions you three reach don't necessarily follow for me. (re - the book I'm only referring to the odd point - most of what has been written I agree with)

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 121

(7/10/03 15:41)

Reply

Re: concepts and causality

---

jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

If all things are concepts then ultimate truth or ultimate reality is also only a concept.

---

All things are concepts only, because logic tells us that the boundaries which divide one thing from any other are mentally created. But the Totality, which by definition contains all things within it, has no boundary demarking it from other things, because it is the only "thing".

While we can conceive of this Totality, we know logically that it must really exist, regardless of our concepts. For even if there were no consciousness anywhere, the Totality would still be, although there would be no conceiving of it.

This is contrasted with, say, the existence of a physical tree, which we believe we experience, but which may be purely imaginary, and whose boundaries we have in any case created.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 270

(7/10/03 17:01)

Reply

Re: concepts and causality

---

Yes well I can partially agree with those comments, they make sense on one level, but it is not a level I can grasp as being of importance, apart from pointing out the limitations of our consciousness.

I am unable to fully agree with you because I feel that a collection of things within the universe that have an abundance of certain sets of attributes or properties we can sense and differentiate between - is in effect a boundary. Sure whatever we conceive of as being a thing is not a distinct boundary, it's just that its existence is fuzzy, dynamic and is undoubtedly finite and only relative to what's around it but that does not negate its thingness. Its very finiteness makes it a thing. Even if there was no consciousness its sets of properties would still exist, it's just that it would have no name and have no reason to be a thing apart from its need for change or movement, its need to continue the process of cause and effect. You can't have cause and effect without things. To have cause and effect you need these temporary fuzzy boundaries otherwise there is nothing to effect.

On the other hand the Totality cannot be a thing because it is the sum of all things, the sum of all possible properties. There is nothing for which to distinguish it from anything else, as there is nothing else. And if it cannot be distinguished from anything else, then it must by default be infinite because nothing external can effect it in anyway.

sblaettler

Registered User

Posts: 1

(7/10/03 17:23)

Reply

Re: concepts and causality

---

ksolway wrote:

Quote:

---

All things are concepts only, because logic tells us that the boundaries which divide one thing from any other are mentally created.

---

Agreed.

Quote:

---

But the Totality, which by definition contains all things within it, has no boundary demarking it from other things, because it is the only "thing".

---

Even if you were to define the Totality in such a way, would not the mind still be differentiating the Totality from not-Totality (a finite thing within the totality, for example)?

Quote:

---

While we can conceive of this Totality, we know logically that it must really exist, regardless of our concepts. For even if there were no consciousness anywhere, the Totality would still be, although there would be no conceiving of it.

---

Can you elaborate on this? How can anything exist independent of consciousness?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 122

(7/10/03 21:59)

Reply

Re: concepts and causality

---

sblaettler wrote:

Quote:

---

Even if you were to define the Totality in such a way, would not the mind still be differentiating the Totality from not-Totality (a finite thing within the totality, for example)?

---

True.

Quote:

---

KS: While we can conceive of this Totality, we know logically that it must really exist, regardless of our concepts. For even if there were no consciousness anywhere, the Totality would still be, although there would be no conceiving of it.

Can you elaborate on this? How can anything exist independent of consciousness?

---

The moment we become conscious of the Totality, and even if it is only once, and only for a moment, then we know that the Totality is timelessly what it is. In that moment of consciousness we know that the Totality exists when consciousness does not.

But you are right that consciousness is required in the first place to know this, and thus that the concept of Totality is dependent on consciousness, naturally. But the concept refers to something beyond itself, which must be real/true, and which is not a concept.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1254

(7/10/03 23:40)

Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

The moment we become conscious of the Totality, and even if it is only once, and only for a moment, then we know that the Totality is timelessly what it is.

---

So how do you propose going about it?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 123

(7/11/03 22:01)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

KS: The moment we become conscious of the Totality, and even if it is only once, and only for a moment, then we know that the Totality is timelessly what it is.

So how do you propose going about it?

---

The only way is to think about the Totality a lot, and your part in it, and how it determines you and everything around you, until its significance permeates your being.

If you are asking how one approaches the idea of the Totality, then I would say to seek the source of things, as that always leads to the Totality.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1258

(7/11/03 23:28)

Reply

---

---

"seeking the source of things always leads to 'the totality?'"? But if the totality is what it is, timeless, then the source of things is all things.

What if I decide that being the signification of everything is not as pleasurable as being sign to oneself and also nothing to oneself?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 124

(7/12/03 21:28)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

What if I decide that being the signification of everything is not as pleasurable as being sign to oneself and also nothing to oneself?

---

You will only seek the Totality if you are dissatisfied with anything less than

|                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                    | total truth.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1273(7/13/03 15:17)Reply   | --- <hr/> Total truth? I suppose it's bound to be better than 'final' or 'ultimate' truth, but it still sounds to me as though it sucks. You see, there is nothing less than total truth, ever.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 282(7/13/03 6:53 pm)Reply | Physical causation <hr/> Kevin Solway wrote: Quote: <hr/> I think I agree. But I have a problem lending any credence to the "physical" type of causality for the following reason. All so-called "empirical" or "physical" entities are in reality only logical entities - ie, things which appear to our mind. That there are things "out there" can only ever be a supposition. Let's take the acorn and the tree for example. A "physical" acorn appears to us, necessarily as an abstract, logical entity, as does the tree, and the physical relationship between the two. But the acorn may be simply a figment of our imagination, as with the tree, and the physical relationship between the two - regardless of how much supporting evidence there might seem to be for such things. So for me, the word "cause", when applied to the physical world, is so incredibly weak it is rendered virtually meaningless. It really means "what we imagine the the relationship to be, at the moment". When we say something like "the acorn is a cause of the tree", we may well be 100% wrong . . . and there is no way we can ever know if we are wrong. What kind of a cause is that? The only way we can be sure that "an acorn causes a tree", is when we define an acorn as being a cause of a tree, in which case we are only saying A=A, and dealing with purely logical entities. <hr/> |

But, if we can't be certain that any particular thing physically causes the tree (or whatever), how can we be certain that the tree has any physical causes at all? Are you going to say that only because we have defined something to be a physical cause of the tree, that makes it sufficient to consider it a cause of the tree with certainty? But if that's the case, then if it just so happens that nothing has been defined as such, it would make the tree effectively physically uncaused! In other words, how can it be proven that all things have causes in a physical sense, or would you not even say that?

Edited by: MGregory at: 7/13/03 6:56 pm

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 346

(7/14/03 12:28)

Reply

Re: Physical causation

---

The cause of someone asking questions about how all things have causes in a physical sense is caused by the questioner's mind containing the concept that the world is physical, this concept being a mental construct only, just like the tree, the acorn and 'the cause of the tree'. All four concepts are logical entities.

On an unrelated note, I'm trying to change my personality a bit and understand deluded people more. I have to deal with them every day, after all. I think that that user, Sapius, who used to post here had the right idea. He doesn't alienate himself by telling everyone he is enlightened, he just goes about his business.

Of course this is just the herd in me speaking...

Gregory Shantz

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 1087

(7/14/03 13:57)

Reply

Re: Physical causation

---

Sapius...wow, there's a name from the past. I wonder how Hong Kong is treating him.

I suppose whether or not you tell people you are enlightened (if you think you are) depends on your business. If your "business" is enlightening others then it probably helps in the credibility department. If not, then it probably hurts you socially and professionally. Uninterested people generally project their own selfishness on you and think you are conceited.

Claiming it or not should not fundamentally affect how you are. If you claim it, you are either deluded or you're not.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> "Logical causation"

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 284(7/14/03 17:08)Reply | Re: Physical causation <hr/> Gregory Shantz wrote: Quote: <hr/> The cause of someone asking questions about how all things have causes in a physical sense is caused by the questioner's mind containing the concept that the world is physical, this concept being a mental construct only, just like the tree, the acorn and 'the cause of the tree'. All four concepts are logical entities. <hr/> Well, I know but I don't see how that invalidates the question. If by physical we mean the world of experience, and if by world of experience we mean the data we receive through the senses, and that data we receive causes thoughts to occur, and those thoughts create things out of the data.... well then yeah, I guess that does invalidate the question. Quote: <hr/> On an unrelated note, I'm trying to change my personality a bit and understand deluded people more. I have to deal with | them every day, after all. I think that that user, Sapius, who used to post here had the right idea. He doesn't alienate himself by telling everyone he is enlightened, he just goes about his business.

---

Hmm, I don't remember Sapius being very enlightened, but maybe he was. I don't know, I'm not enlightened so I have no reason to say that I am. I do engage people in philosophical discussions sometimes, but I'm not very good at it.

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 285

(7/14/03 18:26)

Reply

Re: Physical causation

---

No, I changed my mind. All that means is that the question in question only applies to a subset of the realm of logical entities. So the question still stands.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 125

(7/14/03 21:07)

Reply

Re: Physical causation

---

Quote:

---

But, if we can't be certain that any particular thing physically causes the tree (or whatever), how can we be certain that the tree has any physical causes at all?

---

A thing is, logically, always caused by that which is not itself. Regardless of whether a physical tree exists, or whether it is purely a mental construct, this must be the case. So we do know the cause of all things, provided we draw a big enough category. "A" is caused by the thing that is other than "A" (ie, "not-A", or  $\sim A$  - the complement of A - depending on how you want to think of it).

Supposing a physical tree exists, then it must be caused by other physical things, if they exist, as well as our thoughts, and whatever else there is.

Quote:

---

Are you going to say that only because we have defined something to be a physical cause of the tree, that makes it sufficient to consider it a cause of the tree with certainty?

---

Definitions (and pure logic) are the only things we can have certainty with.

Quote:

---

But if that's the case, then if it just so happens that nothing has been defined as such, it would make the tree effectively physically uncaused!

---

In defining a thing, such as a tree, we are automatically defining what is other than the tree ("not-tree"). So two things are defined. One is necessarily the cause of the other, as nothing can be without cause.

Quote:

---

In other words, how can it be proven that all things have causes in a physical sense, or would you not even say that?

---

Whether there is a physical world, with atoms and molecules, is something we can never be sure of. Physical causes are physical things, and we can likewise never be sure of them either. In fact we are doubly unsure about a particular physical cause, because we have to doubt its very existence, as well as its supposed relationship to the physical "effect".

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 287

(7/15/03 17:23)

Reply

Physis/nomos

---

Ok, so no one would rationally say that "all things have causes", unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities). So, if it isn't valid in the physical realm (except for practical purposes), then the next question is, what criteria can be used to establish whether what we're talking about is purely logical or not?

Earlier in the thread, I called the relationship between the acorn and the tree "logical", but you turned around and called it "physical", so one of us must be confused. I figured it was logical because the relationship isn't something that can be perceived. It's a deduction. But I guess that point is disputable. If you sat there and watched it, I suppose you would see it change, sort of. But what if we modified the relationship and said "the acorn is smaller than the tree." Would that still be a physical relationship because we're dealing with two physical objects?

What about if I was attached to something, like the tree. If I loved the tree, I water it everyday, I climb it and lounge in the branches and listen to the leaves patting each other in the wind, I think about it all the time, and if someone were to come and cut it down my whole life would be devastated.

Would that attachment be physical or logical in nature, or something completely different? Since it's something I experience, I would think it's physical. But what about that relationship between me and the tree in terms of my attachment? That's something that can't be experienced in any sense, I don't think. Someone could come and replace the tree with a nearly identical tree and I wouldn't realize it, the relationship would still be the same. So, I guess that would be a logical entity.

So, it seems quite arbitrary to me to call anything physical, if everything must necessarily be logical - the physical as defined within the logical. I don't think I can really explain it, but if the physical is merely the label "physical", at what point does something become "physical"?

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 464

(7/15/03 23:05)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Quote:

---

Matt: Ok, so no one would rationally say that "all things have causes", unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities).

---

I'm not sure if your description of the applicable context is precise enough. "All things have causes" is a semantic relationship (which one must also understand the context and limitations of) which logically describes observational evidence.

Quote:

---

So, if it isn't valid in the physical realm (except for practical purposes)

---

To say that because a described relationship is only logical it therefore has no analogous basis reflected in what is being described, is to misunderstand the semantic theory of truth. Sentences such as "All things have causes" are a description, not a prescription. They do not enforce their truth upon the subjects they refer to but they merely take their truth from the observation of said subjects. That such subjects can never be said to be 'truly interpreted' by the senses and the descriptive system is in no way to invalidate the description of the appearance of the subjects, or the descriptions of the apparent relationships observed between them.

Any context of 'physical' that you care to describe necessarily fits into the very same logical semantic system that you would use to describe the observed relationships and objects within it.

It is therefore correct to say that the descriptive sentence "all things have causes" is not an exhaustive account of what it is attempting to describe concerning a physical reality. It in no way means, however, that the 'truth' behind the concept which it is attempting to describe has no validity in the physical realm.

Quote:

---

Earlier in the thread, I called the relationship between the acorn and the tree "logical", I figured it was logical because the relationship isn't something that can be perceived. It's a deduction. But I guess that point is disputable. If you sat there and watched it, I suppose you would see it change, sort of.

---

Yes, it's a description not a deduction.

Quote:

---

But what if we modified the relationship and said "the acorn is smaller than the tree." Would that still be a physical relationship because we're dealing with two physical objects?

---

It would be a semantic relationship which describes a physical relationship within it's own semantic system.

Quote:

---

What about if I was attached to something, like the tree. If I loved the tree, I water it everyday, I climb it and lounge in the branches and listen to the leaves patting each other in the wind, I think about it all the time, and if someone were to come and cut it down my whole life would be devastated. Would that attachment be physical or logical in nature, or something completely different?

---

IMO the attachment would be emotional and therefore, within our logical semantic system, physical. The context of logical relationship which I am employing uses a semantic system to describe observations made. The attachment itself could not be said to be a logical relationship but a description of this attachment would be a logical relationship. So the sentence "I feel an attachment to my conception of this tree" would describe a semantic relationship within a logical framework.

Using the definition of a logical relationship outlined by KS, everything that can be distinguished necessarily has a logical relationship to what it is not, including a feeling like attachment.

Quote:

---

But what about that relationship between me and the tree in terms of my attachment? But what about that relationship between me and the tree in terms of my attachment? That's something that can't be experienced in any sense, I don't think. Someone could come and replace the tree with a nearly identical tree and I wouldn't realize it, the relationship would still be the same. So, I guess that would be a logical entity.

---

There is no relationship between you and the tree which concerns your attachment to it. Your attachment describes a feeling that you have with relation to your conception of the tree and its qualities. If someone were to replace the tree with something almost identical, your conception wouldn't change unless you noticed a difference. The relationship which describes your attachment to your conception of the tree wouldn't change if the tree were changed to another tree indistinguishable from the original because your attachment to the original tree was never a relationship with the actual tree in the first place.

Quote:

---

So, it seems quite arbitrary to me to call anything physical, if everything must necessarily be logical - the physical as defined within the logical. I don't think I can really explain it, but if the physical is merely the label "physical", at what point does something become "physical"?

---

It doesn't become physical. The description 'physical' is a label but labels are no 'mere' thing, they describe appearances. We can never know whether the description has a basis in 'objective reality'. We can however speculate on the probabilities. Ockham's Razor would point towards the probability that the relationships within the semantic logical conceptual framework with which we understand and describe appearances would be analogous to any 'ultimately true' actuality.

There is a big difference between descriptions and prescriptions. We have no way of knowing whether our descriptions are more or less prescriptive.

This applies across the board and is the reason that we have debates about such things as free will. When someone asserts free will, it is commonly understood that they are asserting autonomy and all the other associated characteristics that one might imply. This however, is never the case for a descriptive definition of free will, which cannot be refuted. Free will is the label which we use to describe our conceptualization of our apparent free will, regardless of it's causes. Even if we can delineate those causes in exhaustive detail and prove that it is deterministic, put all those causes and their interactions together and there you have the constituents of the label free will.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 347

(7/15/03 11:37 pm)

Reply

Re: Physical causation

---

(This message was left blank)

Edited by: G Shantz at: 7/16/03 7:28 am

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 288

(7/16/03 12:05)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Quote:

---

Matt: Ok, so no one would rationally say that "all things have causes", unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities).

Dave: I'm not sure if your description of the applicable context is precise enough. "All things have causes" is a semantic relationship (which one must also understand the context and limitations of) which logically describes observational evidence.

---

I'm sorry, I'm not sure what you mean by "semantic relationship". Could you explain it?

Quote:

---

Matt: So, if it isn't valid in the physical realm (except for practical purposes)

Dave: To say that because a described relationship is only logical it therefore has no analogous basis reflected in what is being described, is to misunderstand the semantic theory of truth. Sentences such as "All things have causes" are a description, not a prescription. They do not enforce their truth upon the subjects they refer to but they merely take their truth from the observation of said subjects. That such subjects can never be said to be 'truly interpreted' by the senses and the descriptive system is in no way to invalidate the description of the appearance of the subjects, or the descriptions of the apparent relationships observed between them.

---

I'm not sure I understand what you mean, but I don't think I am trying to do anything but analyze the statement as a description, to see if it's really true or not. If I'm trying to create a prescription you'll have to explain how I'm doing that, because I don't see what you mean.

Quote:

---

Any context of 'physical' that you care to describe necessarily fits into the very same logical semantic system that you would use to describe the observed relationships and objects within it.

It is therefore correct to say that the descriptive sentence "all things have causes" is not an exhaustive account of what it is attempting to describe concerning a physical reality. It in no way means, however, that the 'truth' behind the concept which it is attempting to describe has no validity in the physical realm.

---

Well, I was probably abusing the word "valid". I didn't mean to say that it can't be applied to the physical world (that seems to be what you are implying I said, correct me if I'm wrong). What I should have said was, it can't be established with certainty that it is the case that all things have causes, in the sense that a thing can be observed which could be considered to be a physical cause of something. I suppose that is kind of an absurd thing to say since what constitutes a cause in the scientific community is for the most part arbitrary, which isn't to say that it's whimsical, but that it could change depending on how much data they want to deal with, not to mention the fact that some causes would yield no data at all.

Quote:

---

Matt: Earlier in the thread, I called the relationship between the acorn and the tree "logical", I figured it was logical because the relationship isn't something that can be perceived. It's a deduction. But I guess that point is disputable. If you sat there and watched it, I suppose you would see it change, sort of.

Dave: Yes, it's a description not a deduction.

---

I have to wonder "why not?", though. If I bury an acorn and go back to that same place ten years later and see a tree, wouldn't it be a deduction to think that the acorn changed into a tree? Or maybe an induction even?

Quote:

---

Matt: But what if we modified the relationship and said "the acorn is smaller than the tree." Would that still be a physical relationship because we're dealing with two physical objects?

Dave: It would be a semantic relationship which describes a physical relationship within it's own semantic system.

---

Again, I'm not sure what a "semantic relationship" is exactly. Any comparison or contrast between two things? Or would that be a logical relationship? I don't get it.

(snipping the attachment to tree example - I'll accept all that for now)

Quote:

---

Matt: So, it seems quite arbitrary to me to call anything physical, if everything must necessarily be logical - the physical as defined within the logical. I don't think I can really explain it, but if the physical is merely the label "physical", at what point does something become "physical"?

Dave: It doesn't become physical.

---

Yeah, I didn't mean it like that, I meant the point at which it becomes understandable/logical to call it physical.

Quote:

---

Dave: The description 'physical' is a label but labels are no 'mere' thing, they describe appearances. We can never know whether the description has a basis in 'objective reality'. We can however speculate on the probabilities. Ockham's Razor would point towards the probability that the relationships within the semantic logical conceptual framework with which we understand and describe appearances would be analogous to any 'ultimately true' actuality.

There is a big difference between descriptions and prescriptions. We have no way of knowing whether our descriptions are more or less prescriptive.

---

I don't know what you mean by using "prescriptive" in this context. Would you be willing to explain it?

Quote:

---

Dave: This applies across the board and is the reason that we have debates about such things as free will. When someone asserts free will, it is commonly understood that they are asserting autonomy and all the other associated characteristics that one might imply. This however, is never the case for a descriptive definition of free will, which cannot be refuted. Free will is the label which we use to describe our conceptualization of our apparent free will, regardless of it's causes. Even if we can delineate those causes in exhaustive detail and prove that it is deterministic, put all those causes and their interactions together and there you have the constituents of the label free will.

---

I think I know what you mean, but I am looking forward to knowing what you mean exactly by "descriptive vs. prescriptive". I've tried Googling for it, but those terms are too generic. Even if you only want to name a school of thought or maybe a book about it, that would be cool.

I think maybe I didn't outline the question of "physical vs. logical" well enough. I'm mostly thinking of it as a rhetorical issue - just the case of knowing when to label something "physical", although I suspect it has some deeper ramifications that I haven't thought of yet.

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 292

(7/17/03 16:44)

Reply

Relationships

---

I guess if atoms and molecules can be sensibly injected into the relationship in any way then it can be considered physical. Seems kind of weak but I guess that's as good as it's going to get.

MGregory

Registered User

Posts: 293

(7/18/03 1:06)

Reply

Relationships

---

But in doing it this way, it would seem to make (using this word loosely) the relationship between an object and its complement a physical relationship, since any two complementary entities could be seen to be differentiated by molecules or properties of molecules. For example, the tree and the air surrounding it, taken as an immediate boundary, could be seen as a change in state from the solidness of the tree to the gaseousness of the air. The whole tree could be considered different from its bark (a part of the tree) from the overall composition of molecules of each object (a tree's molecules have chlorophyll, but bark's molecules don't). It seems to me that we'd have to call this relationship physical, otherwise it seems like an arbitrary exception to the rule. If the smaller/larger relationship is considered physical then A/not-A should be considered the same way.

Maybe, Kevin, you're thinking of conception in stages, similar to what Naturl was describing in another thread? I can conceive of conception like:

1. A Totality (implicit / can never be conceived of)
2. Sense data (no conception exists yet)
3. Imagination (interpretation into an object and, implicitly, its complement)
4. Judgement (smaller/larger, cause/effect, A/not-A, whatever)

So, stage 3 would be a stage where everything is a logical entity. Stage 4 is where we apply things like "physical" to the entities.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1737

(7/18/03 12:07)

Reply

Re: Reality and "thingness"

---

Jinhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

In Davids book above he jumps from things existing to not existing in a way that seems to miss essential steps. The conclusions you three reach don't necessarily follow for me. (re - the book I'm only referring to the odd point - most of what has been written I agree with)

---

Are you really sure that I am concluding that nothing exists at all?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 126

(7/18/03 15:23)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Quote:

---

Ok, so no one would rationally say that "all things have causes", unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities). So, if it isn't valid in the physical realm (except for practical purposes), then the next question is, what criteria can be used to establish whether what we're talking about is purely logical or not?

---

If something has uncertainty about it, then it's not purely logical. The physical existence of a tree is uncertain, the experience "tree" isn't.

Quote:

---

Earlier in the thread, I called the relationship between the acorn and the tree "logical", but you turned around and called it "physical", so one of us must be confused.

---

I don't think an acorn is generally defined to be a cause of the tree. It just so happens that we think it is. So that would make it an uncertain, physical cause.

Quote:

---

But what if we modified the relationship and said "the acorn is smaller than the tree." Would that still be a physical relationship because we're dealing with two physical objects?

---

Still we are dealing in the realm of uncertainty. We might measure the acorn to be smaller than the tree, but the acorn may actually be larger. Anything measured cannot be trusted.

Quote:

---

What about if I was attached to something, like the tree. If I loved the tree, I water it everyday, I climb it and lounge in the branches and listen to the leaves patting each other in the wind, I think about it all the time, and if someone were to come and cut it down my whole life would be devastated. Would that attachment be physical or logical in nature, or something completely different?

---

It would be an emotional attachment, or false logic. So it would fall into the "physical" category, which doesn't have the permanence of the logical realm. In the purely logical realm, there is a "tree", and then there isn't (when we stop applying the category), and that's all there is to it.

With regard to attachment, we are attached to pleasure, as opposed to unpleasantness and pain, regardless of what causes that pleasure. The uncertainty arises not through the pure experience of things, but when we surmise the relationships between them. "Tree" and "pleasure" are indisputable experiences or categories (logical), but the relationship between, say, the tree, and pleasure, is surmised and uncertain (physical). For example, the tree may have nothing to do with the pleasure you experience.

The pure experience of a tree, or of pain, is in the logical realm, and has certainty. It is only when we surmise as to what is behind those experiences . . . the cause of the experience of a tree, or the cause of the experience of pain, then we enter the world of uncertainty.

Quote:

---

. . . but if the physical is merely the label "physical", at what point does something become "physical"?

---

You are right that "physical", in reality, falls within the logical sphere, as all things must. Physical is something surmised.

Quote:

---

I guess if atoms and molecules can be sensibly injected into the relationship in any way then it can be considered physical. Seems kind of weak but I guess that's as good as it's going to get.

---

That there is anything other than our experiences - "the physical world" - as opposed to the mental world, is surmised. Atoms and molecules certainly occur to our minds, existing as logical entities, but whether they physically exist, ie, apart from our thoughts of them, is surmised.

Quote:

---

But in doing it this way, it would seem to make (using this word loosely) the relationship between an object and its complement a physical relationship, since any two complementary entities could be seen to be differentiated by molecules or properties of molecules. For example, the tree and the air surrounding it, taken as an immediate boundary, could be seen as a change in state from the solidness of the tree to the gaseousness of the air. The whole tree could be considered different from its bark (a part of the tree) from the overall composition of molecules of each object (a tree's molecules have chlorophyll, but bark's molecules don't). It seems to me that we'd have to call this relationship physical, otherwise it seems like an arbitrary exception to the rule. If the smaller/larger relationship is considered physical then A/not-A should be considered the same way.

---

Yes, the boundary between leaf and air is a logical, clear cut one, (even though leaves are full of holes to let air in, and all atoms are 99.999% open space). But whatever exists beyond the appearance of all these things we cannot be certain of (physical).

Smaller/larger, etc, are logical relationships when applied to logical things, and physical when applied to surmised, physical things.

Quote:

---

Maybe, Kevin, you're thinking of conception in stages, similar to what Naturyl was describing in another thread? I can conceive of conception like:

1. A Totality (implicit / can never be conceived of)
  2. Sense data (no conception exists yet)
-

"Senses" and "sense data", while occurring to us as real enough categories, are surmised things.

Quote:

---

3. Imagination (interpretation into an object and, implicitly, its complement)
-

This is really our starting point. Whatever happened to get us to this point is surmised.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 476

(7/22/03 1:20)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Quote:

---

Matt: Ok, so no one would rationally say that "all things have causes", unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities).

Dave: I'm not sure if your description of the applicable context is precise enough. "All things have causes" is a semantic relationship (which one must also understand the context and limitations of) which logically describes observational evidence.

Matt: I'm sorry, I'm not sure what you mean by "semantic relationship". Could you explain it?

---

Well I guess I was trying to come up with a logical framework for what you were talking about. I don't much like the label 'Logical causation' being applied to what I thought is commonly known as co-dependant origination. Whilst there is justification for such a label, the use of the word causation implies cause and effect and the fact that a thing is caused by what it is not says nothing but the most basic about causation. It may well represent the bigger picture and I suppose, in it's context, it is a major thing to understand. But it's not very specific and I can't see it as anything but a basic utility when it comes down to looking at specific relationships like the one in question.

Your first sentence, "Ok, so no one would rationally say that 'all things have causes', unless it's qualified with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities).", seemed to me to be forgetting what language is. The meanings of the words used are necessarily wrapped up with each other. Effects (although I realise you didn't use this word) necessarily have causes according to the logical semantic framework from which they take their meaning, they are bound together and it makes no sense to speak of one without the other. 'Things', in turn, necessarily have causes and effects. If this applies to things, then it applies to 'all things'. So if one were to say that "All things have causes", one would be simply describing a logical, semantic relationship of meaning and this particular sentence describes a semantic necessity. One could definitely say it rationally because its meaning, as a whole, is nothing but rational.

So, the qualification of this sentence with the context in which it is valid (the realm of logical entities) wasn't specific enough for me with regard to talking about specific causality. If the realm of logical entities is taken for granted, and how could we do anything else, and you look at the meaning of the words in the sentence, they describe a semantic relationship within a logical semantic framework; that is their true context. Within this context, to say that "Some things do not have causes" would be the height of irrationality. These things and their relationships follow within the semantic logical framework that defines their meaning, regardless of theorising or speculating as to what brings the relationship about.

Quote:

---

Matt: So, if it isn't valid in the physical realm (except for practical purposes)

Dave: To say that because a described relationship is only logical it therefore has no analogous basis reflected in what is being described, is to misunderstand the semantic theory of truth. Sentences such as "All things have causes" are a description, not a prescription. They do not enforce their truth upon the subjects they refer to but they merely take their truth from the observation of said subjects. That such subjects can never be said to be 'truly interpreted' by the senses and the descriptive system is in no way to invalidate the description of the appearance of the subjects, or the descriptions of the apparent relationships observed between them.

Matt: I'm not sure I understand what you mean, but I don't think I am trying to do anything but analyze the statement as a description, to see if it's really true or not. If I'm trying to create a prescription you'll have to explain how I'm doing that, because I don't see what you mean.

---

I'm not too sure here mate. I thought that you were saying that "All things have causes" only applies in the context of logical entities and therefore the relationships being described here have no validity in an objective reality (physical). It seems I may have interpreted your words incorrectly perhaps. What I was saying, bearing the above in mind, is that we cannot say with 100% accuracy that the info we get from our senses, the system that we use to conceptualise it all, and the descriptions of appearances that we make from these, have no validity in objective reality.

I thought that you were creating a negative prescription in that I thought you were saying that "All things have causes" has no validity in the physical realm.

Quote:

---

Matt: What I should have said was, it can't be established with certainty that it is the case that all things have causes, in the sense that a thing can be observed which could be considered to be a physical cause of something. I suppose that is kind of an absurd thing to say since what constitutes a cause in the scientific community is for the most part arbitrary, which isn't to say that it's whimsical, but that it could change depending on how much data they want to deal with, not to mention the fact that some causes would yield no data at all.

---

Agreed. Still, within the framework of the semantic relationship being described in the sentence "All things have causes.", it is a certainty, a necessity. Whether we can delineate them or not, there are always physical causes for any physical thing. Determinism and causality, whilst intrinsically linked, are two different things.

Quote:

---

Matt: Earlier in the thread, I called the relationship between the acorn and the tree "logical", I figured it was logical because the relationship isn't something that can be perceived. It's a deduction. But I guess that point is disputable. If you sat there and watched it, I suppose you would see it change, sort of.

Dave: Yes, it's a description not a deduction.

Matt: I have to wonder "why not?", though. If I bury an acorn and go back to that same place ten years later and see a tree, wouldn't it be a deduction to think that the acorn changed into a tree? Or maybe an induction even?

---

Yes, that would be a deduction but it wouldn't be a deduction based solely on the fact that you planted an acorn 10 years ago and there is now a tree there. It would also be based on your understanding that trees grow from seeds planted in the ground, amongst other things, which is an empirically proven fact.

To say "I planted an acorn here ten years ago and there is now an oak tree here. Therefore this tree was caused by, amongst other things, the acorn that I planted." would definitely be a deduction. But to say that "Oak trees are caused by, amongst other things, acorns." would be a description. If you were to plant an acorn in some soil in a glass box, right besides the glass, you could sit there and watch it (or more realistically set up a time-lapse camera and view back the footage), and you would see the acorn causing the tree. You could then say that the relationship you are describing is descriptive. Where is the line between deductive and descriptive? I think that most deductions of such a nature necessarily follow from previously established described axioms. So I know that lowering the temperature of water to 0* centigrade causes it to freeze. If I put some water in the freezer, come back to it later and it is frozen, I can only deduce that this ice was caused by my lowering the temperature of the water below 0*, being as I didn't watch it happen. But that deduction is based not only on observation of the circumstances, but also on my prior knowledge of the process, which is in turn based on prior research and description.

Quote:

---

Matt: But what if we modified the relationship and said "the acorn is smaller than the tree." Would that still be a physical relationship because we're dealing with two physical objects?

Dave: It would be a semantic relationship which describes a physical relationship within it's own semantic system.

Again, I'm not sure what a "semantic relationship" is exactly. Any comparison or contrast between two things? Or would that be a logical relationship? I don't get it.

---

It's nothing more than you might expect it to be at it's simplest level. 'Smaller' has a specific meaning, and if you are describing something which conforms to this meaning in relation to something else, then your description conforms to the semantic theory of truth. The sentence takes it's meaning from the semantic framework and attempts to described observations of appearances, which may or may not have analogous meaning in objective reality. This is a physical relationship being described here in the sense that the word physical is also part of said semantic framework and assumes as much meaning as anything else within that framework. As to whether what we conceive to be meant by the word physical has any validity in objective reality, we can't know. So, yes it is a 'physical' relationship being described within the context of a semantic relationship. Is it a relationship in objective reality or even is there an objective reality? We simply can't know for sure.

I don't think I'm really coming at this in the same way that you are. Perhaps your words were aiming in a different direction originally, to how I am interpreting them.

Quote:

---

Dave: The description 'physical' is a label but labels are no 'mere' thing, they describe appearances. We can never know whether the description has a basis in 'objective reality'. We can however speculate on the probabilities. Ockham's Razor would point towards the probability that the relationships within the semantic logical conceptual framework with which we understand and describe appearances would be analogous to any 'ultimately true' actuality.

There is a big difference between descriptions and prescriptions. We have no way of knowing whether our descriptions are more or less prescriptive.

Matt: I don't know what you mean by using "prescriptive" in this context. Would you be willing to explain it?

---

Again, it's about as simple as you might imagine it to be. When we describe things, we generally assume those descriptions to be prescriptive, solid or ultimately true. This can never be the case however, descriptions are only ever descriptive. For one of our descriptions to be prescriptive to an ultimate reality, it would have to possess the supernatural power to impose its truth on actuality, as opposed to simply taking its descriptive truth from observation of appearance.

I suppose the difference is illustrated by Aristotle's Sea Battle.

Consider the propositions,

- (1) There will be a sea-battle tomorrow.
- (2) There will not be a sea-battle tomorrow.

One of these must be true and if it is true now, then it will be true tomorrow. But this is actually a logical fallacy being as there is just no way to know whether there will be until it happens or doesn't happen. The fact that one of the propositions is true does not make it impose its truth upon reality (prescriptive), and somehow make it magically happen simply by being true. Rather it takes its truth from the happening and merely describes. If today is the day of the sea battle or no sea battle (i.e. the day described as tomorrow), and there is a sea battle, then it was indeed true yesterday that 'there will be a sea battle tomorrow'. However this truth about the fact before the fact does not prescribe the outcome, rather it takes its truth from, and describes the outcome.

So too when we speak of things being physical, we are describing an appearance. This description of appearance does not make the actuality being described conform to its truth (in other words prescribe). Rather it simply takes its truth from the appearance. The matter of whether the truth of the description might be analogous to the actuality has already been discussed.

Tying it all up, when we speak of something like an acorn causing an oak tree, we are describing a truth of physical appearances (the meaning behind such description being tied up in the semantic framework). That we do so does not make such a thing true in an objective reality (meaning it is not prescriptive), rather it describes our conception of the subjectively physical which we can only presume to be analogous with objective reality (true physical).

Quote:

---

Matt: I think I know what you mean, but I am looking forward to knowing what you mean exactly by "descriptive vs. prescriptive". I've tried Googling for it, but those terms are too generic. Even if you only want to name a school of thought or maybe a book about it, that would be cool.

---

I don't know if there is a school of thought or a book about such a thing.

I'm not sure if I've even explained any of this very well....LOL.

I'm not sure if I know what I mean anymore :-)

Oooh, here we go, objective reality (if there is such a thing) is not subject to any rules we might lay upon it when we describe observations based upon our conception of it, which we ordinarily think are actually prescriptions.

That's not too clear either.

Erm.

When we speak of the natural laws, they're not laws at all. They don't have the magical powers to make reality conform to them. If something were to happen which seemed outside of these concieved 'natural laws', you can bet that it's still natural. Our descriptions are only descriptions.

I just can't think how else to put it. Maybe it'll come to me.

Quote:

---

Matt: I think maybe I didn't outline the question of "physical vs. logical" well enough. I'm mostly thinking of it as a rhetorical issue - just the case of knowing when to label something "physical", although I suspect it has some deeper ramifications that I haven't thought of yet.

---

More likely it is my understanding which is deficient. I'm sure there are some deeper ramifications, let us know :-)

MGregory

Registered User
Posts: 300
(7/22/03 10:08)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Between these last two posts, I think my head is going to explode.

Dave Toast

Registered User
Posts: 477
(7/23/03 21:06)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Hey Matt, concerning schools of thought. A lot of that covered above is similar to Kant's phenomena and noumena, a priori and synthetic a priori, as covered in the 'Transcendental Aesthetic'.

This in turn stems from Hume's 'problem of induction'.

ksolway

Registered User
Posts: 128
(7/23/03 10:05 pm)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

Quote:

---

Whether we can delineate them or not, there are always physical causes for any physical thing.

---

If this is a logical truth, can you explain your reasoning behind it?

I can see how any physical thing must have been caused by the rest of the physical world, because without its environment there would be nothing to demarcate it. But this would really be "logical causation", or co-dependent origination.

If the physical thing is changing, then it would be caused by, for one thing, its previous self. But how do you reason that any physical thing must necessarily be changing, or must necessarily be caused by something previous, which made it?

Edited by: ksolway at: 7/23/03 10:06 pm

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 479

(7/23/03 22:59)

Reply

Re: Physis/nomos

---

In the context of the paragraph that this sentence originally belonged to, it is only a logical truth in the sense that it is a semantic truth.

The meanings of the words involved are bound together in a way that it could never not be so.

This is kind of the point I was driving at.

I am not arguing against "Logical causation". Rather I am saying that such causation is a subset (and perhaps in certain circumstances, the only applicable set) of the set of all causes.

BryanParrish

Global User

Posts: 74

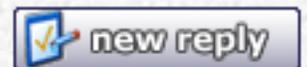

(8/3/04 5:38)

Reply

Re: "Logical causation"

---

FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> LOVE

 new topic

 new reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2865(7/24/04 2:37 am)Reply | LOVE<hr/> Everything that tears you down....did it ever matter?(:D) |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1721(7/24/04 8:02)Reply                   | LOVE<hr/> What the once-wet, now-crusty spot on your sheets?                    |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2867(7/24/04 13:13)Reply   | ---<hr/> I don't eat in bed.                                                    |

|                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1723(7/24/04 15:05)Reply                 | ... <hr/> Why do you refuse her?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2869(7/24/04 17:27)Reply | --- <hr/> refuse who?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 20(8/2/04 0:42)Reply    | Re: --- <hr/> Everything that builds you up... What did it matter? Paint a picture: without it there is murder, for example; war; rape; child abuse. ... Everything that tears you down... What did it matter? Paint a picture: trying to end murder, war, rape, child abuse. You tear down harmful things and build up useful things. Love is the wordly answer, valuable to objective reality. Transcendence is the spiritual answer, valuable to the unloved. |

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 749

(8/2/04 13:21)

Reply

Re: ---

Is this you?

Not bad.

The Dangerous Seclusion of an Unattractive Teenager by Bryan Parrish

It is not as though she were swathed
In the assurance of a chrysalis
Which one day might reveal her true splendor.
No, she will never become a butterfly.

Nor is there an antidotal fondness
Found anywhere in American culture for unattractive girls.
And no tender young man has ever dared live
For her embrace.
Rather, from the beginning, boys
Have persistently dismissed her intellect,
Becoming estranged from her long before
She remained wistful for their love.

And now, however willing she may be,
The dilemma is her forbidding unsightliness,
Atypical among the more fortunate girls,
Pretty High school debutants
In whom overawed schoolboys
Discover the ethereality of feminine beauty,
Like spring afternoons in a haze of sunlight
And the blinding brilliance of love.

But there is no beauty in loneliness.
And, for the time being,
Neither secluded groves of implacable lust,
Nor gentle café conversations
With a smart boy fondly gazing into her eyes
Are her expectations.
In fact, there is only her growing diffidence.
And for her, beauty is anathema; anathema, beauty.

And a song

<http://www.soundclick.com/bands/2/allmyfaithlost.htm>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Love

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2298(3/19/04 4:22 pm)Reply  | Love <hr/> This is taken from the "Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof" thread ..... Quote: <hr/> Thomas: If you would like to discuss this any further, please tell me why love is necessarily attachment, why emotions necessarily involve attachment, or why attachment necessarily involve emotions (I have seen you maintaining both positions in the past) and give me a reasonably detailed account on your understanding of love, so that I may be able to respond in a meaningful way. David Quinn: Let's take a lump of dirt, such as what might exist outside your front door or on the street. Do you ever experience feelings of love for such an entity? If so, why? Or if not, why not? Sapius: Yes. I would love that lump of dirt. Why? Just because it is a part of a causal process. A process on which my existence is also dependent upon, which in turn has given me the chance to think about some profound and lofty concepts, but that does not mean that I will smear that dirt on my face or go to bed with it for obvious reasons of course. <hr/> |

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                             | Why not? Don't you love it? When a person loves another person, they want to be near them, stroke them, and tell them how fantastic they are. They want to live with them and be with them daily, and they become upset and angry if this cannot eventuate. I've never seen anyone have this same attitude towards a lump of dirt.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 235(3/19/04 4:53 pm)Reply                                                                                            | ... <hr/> I've seen people have the same attitude towards consciousness of truth. :P Anyway, I find it hard to conceive feeling love for everything. I'd say that the people who say they do are lying, but I guess I can't prove that. I do think you can love "experiencing" (whatever the experience might be), but the definition of love would be different. The first one would be defined as preferring one thing over the other. The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience. I agree with David when he says that you value something more than others when you love it, but the rest of his description isn't always correct. Love isn't always expressed that way.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 894(3/19/04 5:44 pm)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> David: David Quinn: Let's take a lump of dirt, such as what might exist outside your front door or on the street. Do you ever experience feelings of love for such an entity? If so, why? Or if not, why not? I am not sure what your question is aiming at, but I'll answer it anyway. Unless something special happens, my attitude to a lump of dirt would be fairly neutral, as I imagine would be yours. Under some circumstances this might be different. Let's say I am sitting down outside and I accidentally find that lump of dirt on my clothes. I might get mildly annoyed by it. That's one possibility. Another possibility is that I am tending to the plants in my garden; in this case I might be quite grateful for the same lump of dirt, because it provides the soil that makes my plants grow. In both cases, my attitude is defined by a personal desire. The negative attitude is created by the desire for clean clothes, and the positive attitude is created by the desire for nice garden plants. Love doesn't enter the picture. The lump of dirt has its place in the universe. I acknowledge it and I think it would be possible to develop love towards lumps of dirt if one tried really | hard. It seems somewhat odd, though, since there are people and animals and plants that we can love.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 3/19/04 5:57 pm

Sapius

Registered User

Posts: 278

(3/19/04 10:45 pm)

Reply

Love out of context.

---

David wrote:

Quote:

---

Why not? Don't you love it?

When a person loves another person, they want to be near them, stroke them, and tell them how fantastic they are. They want to live with them and be with them daily, and they become upset and angry if this cannot eventuate. I've never seen anyone have this same attitude towards a lump of dirt

---

Please allow me to speak in your own "language", David.

That is simply because your mind is blocked due to compartmentalization, and you might be spiritually dead.

Thomas to David:

Quote:

---

I am not sure what your question is aiming at.

---

Same here, because I don't see the relevance between the question and his next paragraph, but I guess David is asking me why don't I sleep with the lump of dirt if I LOVE it so much? Which is what I would do when a PERSON is in question, since the common word is 'love'. I can't believe that David has gone so stupid over the years! I know he might say he asks such silly questions for the good of mankind, because there are others who might read this, but I think it is an excuse to hide his feminine interior which some times seeps through his outer protective shell of masculinity and creates an unintentional blunder.

Please read this again David.

Quote:

---

Thomas: The negative attitude is created by the desire for clean clothes, and the positive attitude is created by the desire for nice garden plants. Love doesn't enter the picture.

---

“Love doesn't enter the picture”. That's right, but you wouldn't understand this either, because although you keep preaching about emptiness and the nature of Reality, you seem to get out of touch of your own teachings from time to time, since desires of clean and un-clean are illusionary according to you, and hence your original question itself is quite stupid and unconnected. On the other hand, I think you do understand it, and keep lying to yourself. How feminine.

Tell me David, what is the relevance between the 'lump of dirt' and that 'person loves another person' thought? Why do you keep trying to escape by changing the context while still imagining the same meaning? That's delusion. Why are you so confused, David?

You wrote in that Cinema thread:

Quote:

---

David: I tend to use the word "karma" in different ways depending on the context.

---

...and some how others don't or should'nt? Try that for the word 'Love'. At times you don't make any sense David, some consistency please.

One could love experiencing every bit of existence and yet not be attached to any of it. You disagree? Of course, it is only a sage like you who could do that, is another story, for another time.

Quote:

---

Rairun: I do think you can love "experiencing" (whatever the experience might be), but the definition of love would be different. The first one would be defined as preferring one thing over the other. The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience.

---

Exactly! Now please switch off your computer, relax, take a walk in the open, and think about it.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1477

(3/20/04 3:18 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

The lump of dirt has its place in the universe. I acknowledge it and I think it would be possible to develop love towards lumps of dirt if one tried really hard.

---

I have tried hard and there is a lot of progress. My goal is a universal and impersonal love toward all without regard to conceptions and categories. However, love is not about oneself but is an outward movement, and it is therefore not a matter so much of how ones likes to feel about a particular thing, as what is appropriate for that thing's needs. The other day when we (lightly) crimped my son's dog's tail in the car door, we were very solitous and comforting toward her as befits a mammal, and did our best to assure her it was accidental (dogs have such a hard time with that!), whereas dirt does not require that type of love response. If we think a pile of dirt does not deserve to be loved, that is an error in understanding. First, it is a matter of appreciation. Without dirt, no life. This is very important to remember - we erect a house with doors and walls, but it is the emptiness that makes it useful. Those things we consider "not alive" are the backdrop of stuff that makes life possible, beautiful, and varied. Second, the more you understand that God is everything and everything is God, the more you value all parts as manifestations. Dirt is a manifestation of God. Rocks are a manifestation of God. Grass is a manifestation of God. Not a thing "made by God" but God. Dirt is God being dirt. Third, we don't know in what manner nonliving things partake in universal consciousness.

Quote:

---

On the other hand, I think you do understand it, and keep lying to yourself. How feminine.

---

Hey! That's a masculine trait.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 3/20/04 3:18 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 826
(3/20/04 3:20 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Anna, hatred is a form of God. In trying to love everything, you are trying to restructure God's unique plan for the universe. You are trying to undermine God!

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1479
(3/20/04 3:39 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Hatred is a contraction, and a reaction. It is a byproduct of ignorance and pain. Hatred is actually love, too concentrated.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1481
(3/20/04 3:50 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce, did you drop some bad acid or did your mother haul you off to a revival?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 80
(3/20/04 4:27 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience.

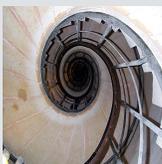

---

I agree with this in regards to love! to me it is a gift of acceptance, love is completely found within, and the outer appearance of love always points one back to oneself.

Now this "love" can overflow and extend outward but you never confuse this love as coming from an object, it just is. So to say I love this lump of dirt does not require any kind of "action" because you realize "love" is not the relationship. This type of love expresses itself in ways that may not be normally associated with love.

Edited by: silentsal at: 3/20/04 5:43 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 827
(3/20/04 5:48 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Anna, nope I'm just smart. Reconsider what I said, in accordance to what you said.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 83
(3/20/04 6:41 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

hatred is a natural consequence of identifying love with objects

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2300
(3/20/04 6:55 am)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Good to have you back, Sapius. :)
Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: David Quinn: Let's take a lump of dirt, such as what might exist outside your front door or on the street. Do you ever experience feelings of love for such an entity? If so, why? Or if not, why not?

Thomas: I am not sure what your question is aiming at, but I'll answer it anyway. Unless something special happens, my attitude to a lump of dirt would be fairly neutral, as I imagine would be yours. Under some circumstances this might be different. Let's say I am sitting down outside and I accidentally find that lump of dirt on my clothes. I might get mildly annoyed by it. That's one possibility. Another possibility is that I am tending to the plants in my garden; in this case I might be quite grateful for the same lump of dirt, because it provides the soil that makes my plants grow. In both cases, my attitude is defined by a personal desire.

---

Of course. And so is your love for your wife.

This is precisely my point. Love is always an expression of egotistical desire, and it is invariably focused upon those objects that give a person egotistical happiness. You love your wife because she gives you much happiness, and you are "fairly neutral" towards a lump of dirt because it gives you very little happiness.

This demonstrates my point that love is nothing other than attachment. Egotists are deeply attached to their own happiness and love anything which gives them this happiness. They also remain indifferent or neutral towards those objects that don't.

Quote:

---

The lump of dirt has its place in the universe. I acknowledge it and I think it would be possible to develop love towards lumps of dirt if one tried really hard. It seems somewhat odd, though, since there are people and animals and plants that we can love.

---

So you've already abandoned the idea that love cannot be compartmentalized? It seems you've now decided to compartmentalize your love towards some manifestations of Nature and not others. That's pretty typical.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2301
(3/20/04 7:01 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience.

---

A form of self-love? A faith in one's own desires and values?

--

Silentsal wrote:

Quote:

---

I agree with this in regards to love! to me it is a gift of acceptance, love is completely found within, and the outer appearance of love always points one back to oneself.

Now this "love" can overflow and extend outward but you never confuse this love as coming from an object, it just is. So to say I love this lump of dirt does not require any kind of "action" because you realize "love" is not the relationship.

This type of love expresses itself in ways that may not be normally associated with love.

---

Are you saying, then, that "love" is any attitude we happen to adopt towards any object? For example, is the indifference that we normally experience towards a lump of dirt a form of love?

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 237
(3/20/04 10:10 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Rairun: The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience.

David: A form of self-love? A faith in one's own desires and values?

---

Yeah, I guess you could say it's a faith in one's own desires and values. That doesn't mean the person believes that their values are right or wrong though. These secondary judgements of value are irrelevant to them.

I perceive every single thing I think or do to be an active movement, no matter what it is. I am put into movement, but at the same time the movement feels active in the sense that it's always directed outwards. It doesn't matter if it's something that is usually considered passive. Some would consider a great part of my behavior passive, but it's not "weak", because I'm actively choosing to be passive.

What I'm trying to say is that my love for people and other things is just one of the ways this movement expresses itself. My love is egotistical in the sense that I'm doing the only thing I would ever do in that situation. It has very little to do with your description of love.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 896
(3/20/04 3:32 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

David: This is precisely my point. Love is always an expression of egotistical desire, and it is invariably focused upon those objects that give a person egotistical happiness. You love your wife because she gives you much happiness, and you are "fairly neutral" towards a lump of dirt because it gives you very little happiness.

Your error is that you confuse desire/attachment with love. This is probably one of those issues that cannot be understood purely by logical argument. Let me try it anyway. The feeling of attraction and repulsion is a fundamental function of the human mind since it controls behavior (motivation/volition). Desire arises from expecting a rewarding experience and aversion arises from expecting a negative experience. Buddhism assigns to this the aggregate of feeling.

Desire and attachment are doubtlessly present in love. In fact, love is not a static thing; I would rather compare it to a spectrum, similar to the spectrum of light. At the low end you find desire and attachment being dominant (in infatuation, for example); whereas at the high end you find devotion and compassion. There is probably a continuous spectrum between these two. Love radiates according to the realization of egolessness, or insight if you want, the insight that the I and the loved is the same. This realization is present even in the lowest level of love, albeit in a very crude form, as a desire for possession or unification.

David: This demonstrates my point that love is nothing other than attachment. Egotists are deeply attached to their own happiness and love anything which gives them this happiness. They also remain indifferent or neutral towards those objects that don't.

To say that love is nothing but attachment is quite depressing. Not only that; it is also utterly wrong. The development of love and the development of spirituality cannot be separated from each other. It is impossible to move towards the high end of the spectrum without understanding the true nature of love.

One more thing: people who are attached to happiness are not happy.

David: So you've already abandoned the idea that love cannot be compartmentalized? It seems you've now decided to compartmentalize your love towards some manifestations of Nature and not others. That's pretty typical.

Love and awareness are always connected to objects/subjects, so in this sense they are compartmentalized, or better: love usually has one or more focal points, unless you have already developed love to its fullest realization. It is easier to focus love on people, or things that are alive, because they love you back and that makes love stronger. It is also more natural, because they are more like you and it is easier to realize that they are not separate. A lump of dirt is therefore a poor choice. What I meant with "not being compartmentalized" is that -unlike a simple desire- love is pervading. You can't switch it on and off and it radiates away from the focal point.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2303
(3/20/04 5:16 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: This is precisely my point. Love is always an expression of egotistical desire, and it is invariably focused upon those objects that give a person egotistical happiness. You love your wife because she gives you much happiness, and you are "fairly neutral" towards a lump of dirt because it gives you very little happiness.

Thomas: Your error is that you confuse desire/attachment with love. This is probably one of those issues that cannot be understood purely by logical argument.

---

This is what people who want to protect their attachments from the probing of logic always say. How many times have we heard Christians say that same thing with respect to their attachment to God? I can already see you preparing the escape hatch .....

Quote:

---

Let me try it anyway. The feeling of attraction and repulsion is a fundamental function of the human mind since it controls behavior (motivation/volition).

---

No, this is the fundamental function of egotism. The human mind, when it is liberated from egotism, no longer operates by feelings of attraction and repulsion.

Quote:

---

Desire arises from expecting a rewarding experience and aversion arises from expecting a negative experience. Buddhism assigns to this the aggregate of feeling.

---

Which, again, is in the realm of egotism.

Quote:

---

Desire and attachment are doubtlessly present in love.

---

Indeed. This is because love is egotistical in nature.

Quote:

---

In fact, love is not a static thing; I would rather compare it to a spectrum, similar to the spectrum of light. At the low end you find desire and attachment being dominant (in infatuation, for example); whereas at the high end you find devotion and compassion. There is probably a continuous spectrum between these two.

---

Undoubtedly. What you call devotion and compassion are also egotistical in nature. Like love, they are expressions of emotional attachment.

Quote:

---

Love radiates according to the realization of egolessness, or insight if you want, the insight that the I and the loved is the same. This realization is present even in the lowest level of love, albeit in a very crude form, as a desire for possession or unification.

---

Which also motivates devotion and compassion.

Quote:

---

David: This demonstrates my point that love is nothing other than attachment. Egotists are deeply attached to their own happiness and love anything which gives them this happiness. They also remain indifferent or neutral towards those objects that don't.

Thomas: To say that love is nothing but attachment is quite depressing.

---

Ah, that's sad.

Quote:

---

One more thing: people who are attached to happiness are not happy.

---

Anyone who is not a fully-enlightened Buddha is necessarily attached to his own egotistical happiness. Such a person still has an ego and, the ego by its very nature, is supremely attached to its own happiness.

What you're essentially referring to here is a form of mental trickery, whereby the egotist consciously stops striving for happiness in order to experience even greater amounts of happiness. It is just another trick to experience more happiness, not much different to drinking alcohol or taking drugs.

Quote:

---

David: So you've already abandoned the idea that love cannot be compartmentalized? It seems you've now decided to compartmentalize your love towards some manifestations of Nature and not others. That's pretty typical.

Thomas: Love and awareness are always connected to objects/subjects, so in this sense they are compartmentalized, or better: love usually has one or more focal points, unless you have already developed love to its fullest realization.

---

The spiritual love of a Buddha isn't connected to objects/subjects at all - which is what makes it unemotional and non-attached and infinitely greater than ordinary love.

Quote:

---

It is easier to focus love on people, or things that are alive, because they love you back and that makes love stronger.

---

They give you emotional happiness and that make your ego stronger.

Quote:

---

Is is also more natural, because they are more like you and it is easier to realize that they are not separate.

---

The ego is able to recognize itself in the other person and can thus engage in self-love - which is what all love boils down to. The ego has far more difficulty recognizing itself in a lump of dirt.

Quote:

---

A lump of dirt is therefore a poor choice.

---

It is a very good choice, because it demonstrates very clearly that the love you have for your wife is 100% selfish. Even though your wife and the lump of dirt are both manifestations of Nature with the same intrinsic worth, you devotedly love your wife for the egotistical benefits that a lump of dirt can't provide.

Quote:

---

What I meant with "not being compartmentalized" is that - unlike a simple desire- love is pervading. You can't switch it on and off and it radiates away from the focal point.

---

As we've already seen, you turn it on for those things which give your ego happiness and switch it off for those things that don't. It is very compartmentalized and no different to desire in this regard.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2304

(3/20/04 5:33 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

Rairun: The second one could be described as being fully confident about the preferences that define what you experience.

David: A form of self-love? A faith in one's own desires and values?

Rairun: Yeah, I guess you could say it's a faith in one's own desires and values. That doesn't mean the person believes that their values are right or wrong though. These secondary judgements of value are irrelevant to them.

---

Why do you need faith in them, then?

Quote:

---

I perceive every single thing I think or do to be an active movement, no matter what it is. I am put into movement, but at the same time the movement feels active in the sense that it's always directed outwards. It doesn't matter if it's something that is usually considered passive. Some would consider a great part of my behavior passive, but it's not "weak", because I'm actively choosing to be passive.

What I'm trying to say is that my love for people and other things is just one of the ways this movement expresses itself.

My love is egotistical in the sense that I'm doing the only thing I would ever do in that situation. It has very little to do with your description of love.

---

So even when you are being violent and hating somebody or something, you are engaging in love?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 85
(3/20/04 6:13 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Are you saying, then, that "love" is any attitude we happen to adopt towards any object? For example, is the indifference that we normally experience towards a lump of dirt a form of love?

---

I am saying that this form of Love has nothing to do with any object which is what makes it different from the ego centered love that you talk about.

edit:

so in this instance because love is not attached to the lump of dirt, I may feel indifference for it, or I may look at it and see potential, either way the lump of dirt does not create the emotion of love, love is a state of being, it's not an emotion that ebbs and flows.

Edited by: silentsal at: 3/20/04 7:08 pm

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 238

(3/20/04 6:34 pm)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Why do you need faith in them, then?

---

Maybe faith wasn't a good word to use after all.

It's more about just being who you are. You don't need faith to be you, just like a rock doesn't need faith to be a rock. I guess you could say that we need faith when we try to answer the question "who am I?", and you'd be right. But that kind of confidence I'm talking about doesn't come when that question is answered, it comes when there is no question at all.

Quote:

---

So even when you are being violent and hating somebody or something, you are engaging in love?

---

By the second definition I gave, yes. It doesn't matter what I'm doing, or better, what I am at that moment. (I always stress that point because eliminating the schism between action and actor is important to see what I'm talking about)

I didn't outline the first definition well enough to answer this question, so let me do it here. As I pointed out before, every single thing we do is egotistical in nature, because we are actively being who are by doing them. We are just following our preferences that are arbitrarily defined (by that I mean that they have no grounding). However, that's very different from assuming that our preferences always follow the rules you defined for egotistical behavior. When I say I love someone, I definitely don't act the way you explained.

Love does make me fond of a person, but that doesn't mean that I would personally act the way they do if I were in the same situations. That happens because I don't think about mine or their actions in terms of good and bad. I am and I let them be.

Love does make me want to be with the other person and spend time with them, but if that doesn't happen, I don't blame anyone for it. If they don't want to spend time with me, I just accept it and go on with my life. I might still want to be with them, but that's just how life is. You can't get everything you want. I love them even if they don't give me anything I wish they would.

It's rather hard to know what makes me love someone. What happens is that we become close somehow, and the closeness becomes the foundation for everything. Of course there are certain personality traits that attract me to them. They bring us together in the first moment, but after we are already close, the closeness is enough to keep the love alive. It doesn't have anything to do with satisfying my needs. I do want things, but I can live by myself just fine.

Like I said, of course this is egotistical. I just keep loving them because it's a preference of mine. But it doesn't even come close to a plot to get things I want from them, or a way to satisfy my emotions. I love them and I want them to be whoever they are. If that happens to be spending time with me and giving me "happiness", fine. If they don't want to do it, it's fine too.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 239
(3/20/04 6:41 pm)
Reply

...

---

Also, it's obvious that some people act the way you described, but I wouldn't call it love at all. It's not wrong, but it's just a way of exploiting and being exploited. If they know what they are doing and want that, it's fine; but I doubt that most people who engage in that sort of behavior know the mess they are in.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1044
(3/20/04 6:50 pm)
Reply

insecurity

---

Quote:

birdofhermes

The other day when we (lightly) crimped my son's dog's tail in the car door, we were very solicitous and comforting toward her as befits a mammal, and did our best to assure her it was accidental (dogs have such a hard time with that!),

---

The dog had the correct outlook and was fully justified in her insecurity.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Love

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 897(3/20/04 11:50 pm)Reply  | Re: Love out of context. <hr/> David: The human mind, when it is liberated from egotism, no longer operates by feelings of attraction and repulsion. It always does. There is no other way for the human mind to function. We are desire/aversion machines; that is the way our brain works. Desire and aversion are the prime motivators. If the desire/aversion machine is impaired, for example by an injury to the limbic system, the human mind ceases to function properly. There are clinical examples of people with this type of injury who are normal, except for their lack of motivation, which causes them to become immobile and stare at the wall for days. Although desires and aversions are always present, they can become very subtle, even unnoticeable. Nevertheless, the whole desire-volition-action sequence runs continuously and is repeated over and over. Often it completely bypasses conscious thought and thus remains undetected. The object of meditation is to become aware of such internal processes. By becoming aware of them, you can interact with them in a meaningful way. David: This is because love is egotistical in nature. Basic love may be egoistic, but not egotistic. The difference between egoism and egotism is that the former is the basic pursuit of self-interest, whereas the latter is an exaggerated sense of self-importance. Love begins with self-love. Without self-love, any other form of love is quite simply impossible. The absence of self-love (or in more severe cases the presence | of self-denial and self-hate) is pathological and leads to complexes and disorders. You can't really walk below the self-love threshold of love without marching straight into madness.

But, self-love is not the nature of love as you suggested. That is a misunderstanding. Self is only an object of love. It is usually the first object, but when the capability for love grows, love absorbs not only the self, but other subjects, objects, and pursuits, which become part of the self one after the other. For most people that means their parents, their pets, their hobbies, their lovers, and their partners. If love grows further, it includes friends, acquaintances, strangers, even enemies, and ultimately everything. Love is a process of the self becoming more and more absorbed in the world until it eventually vanishes.

At the heart of love is the realization that the self and the world aren't separate. It arises from the insight that all the people that surround you are really part of yourself, or respectively that you are a part of them. This is illustrated in the Baghavat Gita and in the Bible, particularly in the speech of Jesus. It is obvious that the teaching of Jesus is all about love. I recall that you consider Jesus enlightened!? So, what about the 'love thine enemy' thing? Do you consider that enlightened, too?

David: What you call devotion and compassion are also egotistical in nature.

Devotion and compassion are highly developed forms of love; that's why we admire them. They both transcend the self, since the self and the world become exchangeable. These forms of love are relatively rare except perhaps for the female devotion to her offspring. Devotion is blind but healthy, because it melts the ego. Compassion is essentially a cognitive function; it is the understanding of the situation/condition of others.

Thomas: One more thing: people who are attached to happiness are not happy.

David: What you're essentially referring to here is a form of mental trickery, whereby the egotist consciously stops striving for happiness in order to experience even greater amounts of happiness. It is just another trick to experience more happiness, not much different to drinking alcohol or taking drugs.

Your objection is ill construed. People who crave happiness are generally not happy, because it is the craving that's in the way. You suggest that the craver might stop craving for some time, because he wants to experience greater rewards afterwards. That is generally not possible, because the craver has little control over the craving. "Tricking consciousness" is generally not an option for the craver, since the craving is always present. You cannot simply switch it off. Developing a reasonable amount of control over craving (drug addictions especially) involves just too much hard work.

David: The spiritual love of a Buddha isn't connected to objects/subjects at all - which is what makes it unemotional and non-attached and infinitely greater than ordinary love.

I think that is a fairly romantic view. Although love can become an abstract state of being ostensibly disconnected from objects/subjects, it always manifests in some concrete way. I believe that the love of a Buddha is not fundamentally different from the love of an earthworm for its food, although it radiates at a very different wavelength and it manifests differently. Still, it's the same force.

David: The ego is able to recognize itself in the other person and can thus engage in self-love - which is what all love boils down to. The ego has far more difficulty recognizing itself in a lump of dirt.

You are almost right here, except for the conclusion that love always boils down to self-love. It doesn't. Self-love is just one basic expression of love.

David: They give you emotional happiness and that make your ego stronger.

You are far too hung up on ego. While it is true that the ego often poses a problem to mental/spiritual development, nothing is won by denying its presence, even if the presence is disturbing. This seems to be what you are doing. You pretend that you are ego-less and you stimulate other people to make similar pronouncements of denial. The actual letting go of ego is a lengthy and difficult process. It is quite necessary to be fully aware of the ego at all stages. Denying the ego is counterproductive, as it renders you virtually incapable of self-evaluation.

Thomas

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 87
(3/21/04 2:15 am)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Quote:

---

It is quite necessary to be fully aware of the ego at all stages. Denying the ego is counterproductive, as it renders you virtually incapable of self-evaluation.

---

I might be speaking about this prematurely but I think this is an important point. In my experience denying the ego may be done by refusing to only put oneself in situations that have become comfortable, but it's not really denying it at all because by moving into new situations you expose your ego, and this movement becomes normal.

sorta kinda ... /shrug

I guess I am speaking prematurely :D)

Sapius
Registered User
Posts: 280
(3/21/04 6:17 am)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Quote:

---

David: Good to have you back, Sapius. :)

---

I will drop by at times to check in on your progress. I see big changes. :)

Love.

It is not so much a matter of 'love', but emotions, which as a whole should be the issue. Hate is a form of attachment too, although not as productive. How about the pursuit of Truth? Is there no attachment involved?

Quote:

---

Thomas: Love is a process of the self becoming more and more absorbed in the world until it eventually vanishes.

---

I don't think the 'self' can vanish by any means. 'Ego', as I understand it, begins with the "I", the differentiation between the "I" and the rest, which cannot be switched off as long as one is breathing. We need to first define 'ego', and then go any further. There is a big difference between 'ego' and 'false ego'. One can say that 'ego = I, and the "I" is an illusion, but who or what is then communicating this thought? Can we escape the "I"?

Quote:

---

Thomas: At the heart of love is the realization that the self and the world aren't separate.

---

True in a way, but I would rather say that at the heart of that realization lies a volcano of love. It is the Realization that the self and the world aren't separate which might bring back love a million folds, because there remains nothing, and everything to love. We might use the word 'love' because we do not have a better word to express that indescribable understanding, but actually it is not "love" in any conventional sense. How one has come to this realization of oneness is immaterial.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2306

(3/22/04 11:05 am)

Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: The human mind, when it is liberated from egotism, no longer operates by feelings of attraction and repulsion.

Thomas: It always does. There is no other way for the human mind to function.

---

Your spiritual outlook is limited. The enlightened mind operates by cerebral foresight and the promotion of the cause of wisdom.

Quote:

---

We are desire/aversion machines; that is the way our brain works.

---

It is the way the egotistical brain works.

Quote:

---

Desire and aversion are the prime motivators.

---

For egotism, yes.

Quote:

---

If the desire/aversion machine is impaired, for example by an injury to the limbic system, the human mind ceases to function properly.

---

This is only true for the egotistical brain, which depends for its functioning on the desire/aversion mechanism. The wise brain no longer utilizes this mechanism, which is partly what makes it wise.

Quote:

---

There are clinical examples of people with this type of injury who are normal, except for their lack of motivation, which causes them to become immobile and stare at the wall for days.

---

Faulty egotistical people have no relevance to healthy sages.

Quote:

---

Nevertheless, the whole desire-volition-action sequence runs continuously and is repeated over and over. Often it completely bypasses conscious thought and thus remains undetected. The object of meditation is to become aware of such internal processes. By becoming aware of them, you can interact with them in a meaningful way.

---

Because your spiritual outlook is limited, your conception of meditation is petty.

Quote:

---

David: This is because love is egotistical in nature.

Thomas: Basic love may be egoistic, but not egotistic. The difference between egoism and egotism is that the former is the basic pursuit of self-interest, whereas the latter is an exaggerated sense of self-importance.

---

Any form of self-interest necessarily involves an exaggerated sense of self-importance. For it rests on the exaggerated self-important notion that the self actually exists!

Quote:

---

Love begins with self-love.

---

And ends with it.

Quote:

---

Without self-love, any other form of love is quite simply impossible. The absence of self-love (or in more severe cases the presence of self-denial and self-hate) is pathological and leads to complexes and disorders.

---

Self-hate and self-denial are both forms of self-love, for they both arise out of a love of self. A person who hates himself is really expressing an idealistic vision of how he wants his precious self to be.

All forms of self-love are pathological and lead to spiritual ignorance and violence. There is nothing remotely redeeming about love - unless it is directed towards the ALL.

Quote:

---

You can't really walk below the self-love threshold of love without marching straight into madness.

---

Madness is a possibility, yes. And so is enlightenment.

Quote:

---

But, self-love is not the nature of love as you suggested. That is a misunderstanding. Self is only an object of love. It is usually the first object, but when the capability for love grows, love absorbs not only the self, but other subjects, objects, and pursuits, which become part of the self one after the other. For most people that means their parents, their pets, their hobbies, their lovers, and their partners. If love grows further, it includes friends, acquaintances, strangers, even enemies, and ultimately everything. Love is a process of the self becoming more and more absorbed in the world until it eventually vanishes.

It would be much faster and simpler (not to mention far more honest) to do away with "parents, pets, hobbies, lovers, partners, etc" altogether and simply love the ALL straight away.

But that would only undercut our egotistical enjoyment of life, and we can't have that, can we.

Quote:

---

At the heart of love is the realization that the self and the world aren't separate.

---

There is no self and no world, and therefore nothing for love to find a foothold in - except in illusion.

Quote:

---

It arises from the insight that all the people that surround you are really part of yourself, or respectively that you are a part of them. This is illustrated in the Baghavat Gita and in the Bible, particularly in the speech of Jesus. It is obvious that the teaching of Jesus is all about love.

---

If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters — yes, even his own life — such a person cannot be my disciple.

- Luke 14:26

*Do not suppose that I have come to bring peace to the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword. For I have come to turn “ ‘a man against his father, a daughter against her mother,
a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law—your enemies will be the members of your own household.’*

- Matthew 10:34

I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled! But I have a baptism to undergo, and what constraint I am under until it is completed! Do you think I came to bring peace on earth? No, I tell you, but division.

- Luke 12:49

Quote:

---

I recall that you consider Jesus enlightened!? So, what about the 'love thine enemy' thing? Do you consider that enlightened, too?

---

Only if it constitutes an aspect of spiritual love - which is directed towards the ALL.

Quote:

---

David: What you call devotion and compassion are also egotistical in nature.

Thomas: Devotion and compassion are highly developed forms of love; that's why we admire them.

---

I don't admire them. Indeed, the hypocritical way in which people deny the selfish nature of devotion and compassion disgusts me.

Quote:

---

They both transcend the self, since the self and the world become exchangeable.

---

No, they both reinforce the self because they both foster the delusion that things inherently exist.

Quote:

---

These forms of love are relatively rare except perhaps for the female devotion to her offspring.

---

Female devotion to their offspring is unconscious, selfish and petty. It has no resemblance at all to the spiritual love of a Buddha.

Quote:

---

Devotion is blind but healthy, because it melts the ego.

---

It reinforces the ego by immersing it in a stronger entity. The only things it melts are feelings of anxiety and responsibility.

The only way to truly "melt the ego" is by intellectually comprehending the nature of Reality (and that all things lack inherent existence) and allowing this understanding to permeate every aspect of one's existence. There is no other way.

Quote:

---

David: The spiritual love of a Buddha isn't connected to objects/subjects at all - which is what makes it unemotional and non-attached and infinitely greater than ordinary love.

Thomas: I think that is a fairly romantic view.

---

It is reality.

Quote:

---

Although love can become an abstract state of being ostensibly disconnected from objects/subjects, it always manifests in some concrete way.

---

The spiritual love of a Buddha is not abstract. It is a concrete expression of his consciousness of the ALL.

Indeed, consciousness of the ALL is spiritual love.

Quote:

---

I believe that the love of a Buddha is not fundamentally different from the love of an earthworm for its food, although it radiates at a very different wavelength and it manifests differently. Still, it's the same force.

---

New Age clap-trap.

Quote:

---

David: The ego is able to recognize itself in the other person and can thus engage in self-love - which is what all love boils down to. The ego has far more difficulty recognizing itself in a lump of dirt.

Thomas: You are almost right here, except for the conclusion that love always boils down to self-love. It doesn't. Self-love is just one basic expression of love.

---

Name one form of love that isn't an expression of self-love.

Quote:

---

David: They give you emotional happiness and that make your ego stronger.

Thomas: You are far too hung up on ego.

---

The existence of the ego is what prevents consciousness of Reality from arising.

Quote:

---

While it is true that the ego often poses a problem to mental/spiritual development, nothing is won by denying its presence, even if the presence is disturbing.

---

I am acknowledging its presence, while you are denying it.

Quote:

---

This seems to be what you are doing. You pretend that you are ego-less and you stimulate other people to make similar pronouncements of denial.

---

I don't pretend or claim to be ego-less. I do claim to know what egolessness is, and that I am heading towards it.

Quote:

---

The actual letting go of ego is a lengthy and difficult process. It is quite necessary to be fully aware of the ego at all stages. Denying the ego is counterproductive, as it renders you virtually incapable of self-evaluation.

---

Fine words, but they sound empty they come out of your mouth.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 901
(3/22/04 12:27 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

As on previous occasion, your comments mechanically reject whatever I say. You seem to have developed an emotional attitude (repeat: emotional) that doesn't allow you to address things in a pertinent manner. Hence, I will only respond to two of your points.

David: This is only true for the egotistical brain, which depends for its functioning on the desire/aversion mechanism. The wise brain no longer utilizes this mechanism, which is partly what makes it wise.

It is surprising that you make a difference between the egotistic brain and the enlightened brain. You seem to suggest that enlightenment involves some physiological changes in the brain. Are you sure that this is the case?

Is the enlightened brain physically different from the normal brain? If this were the case, then neuroscientists could research those changes and find out their physiological basis. Perhaps they could develop a drug or a therapy that allows everyone to become enlightened. So the best thing you can do -if you really believe that your brain is different from anyone else's- is to contact a neuroscientist of your choice and volunteer for research.

David: Only if it constitutes an aspect of spiritual love - which is directed towards the ALL.

If that is all you have to say about Jesus and his teaching, I think you should cross him off your personal list of enlightened sages. Jesus never said that we should love the ALL. He specifically said that we should love our enemies like ourselves. To my understanding, he was talking about human beings, not about the ALL. He was talking about empathy and compassion and he said that we should forgive people their faults. These are very concrete teachings that have not much to do with what you are suggesting. Jesus did not say that other people don't exist or that the self doesn't exist.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2308
(3/22/04 2:32 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

As on previous occasion, your comments mechanically reject whatever I say.

---

From my perspective, my comments consciously and inspirationally reject what you say.

Quote:

---

You seem to have developed an emotional attitude (repeat: emotional) that doesn't allow you to address things in a pertinent manner.

---

My comments are brief and to the point. Say something wise and I will agree with it.

Quote:

---

David: This is only true for the egotistical brain, which depends for its functioning on the desire/aversion mechanism. The wise brain no longer utilizes this mechanism, which is partly what makes it wise.

Thomas: It is surprising that you make a difference between the egotistic brain and the enlightened brain. You seem to suggest that enlightenment involves some physiological changes in the brain. Are you sure that this is the case? Is the enlightened brain physically different from the normal brain? If this were the case, then neuroscientists could research those changes and find out their physiological basis. Perhaps they could develop a drug or a therapy that allows everyone to become enlightened. So the best thing you can do -if you really believe that your brain is different from anyone else's- is to contact a neuroscientist of your choice and volunteer for research.

---

I was using shorthand terminology to distinguish between those brains which are dominated by egotistical thought-processes and those which only emit wise ones.

The enlightened brain physiologically differs from the egotistical brain only in the sense that new and different neuronal pathways have been laid down, which in turn lead to different areas of the brain being triggered. In the enlightened brain, for example, the neuronal pathways that lead to the triggering of emotion have been closed down.

Quote:

---

David: Only if it constitutes an aspect of spiritual love - which is directed towards the ALL.

Thomas: If that is all you have to say about Jesus and his teaching, I think you should cross him off your personal list of enlightened sages. Jesus never said that we should love the ALL.

---

From the Gospel of Thomas:

2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All."

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say to you, 'See, the Kingdom is in the sky,' then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you, 'It is in the sea,' then the fish will precede you. Rather, the Kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you."

5) Jesus said, "Recognize what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

67) Jesus said, "Whoever believes that the All itself is deficient is himself completely deficient."

77) Jesus said, "It is I who am the light which is above them all. It is I who am the All. From me did the All come forth, & unto me did the All come forth, & unto me did the All extend. Split a piece of wood, & I am there. Lift up the stone, & you will find me there."

113) His disciples said to him, "When will the Kingdom come?" Jesus said, "It will not come by waiting for it. It will not be a matter of saying, 'Here it is', or 'There it is'. Rather, the Kingdom of the Father is spread out upon the earth, and men do not see it."

Quote:

---

He specifically said that we should love our enemies like ourselves.

---

In the New Testament, he stated that the greatest commandment of all was "to love the Lord your God with all of your mind, all of your strength, all of your soul and all of your understanding." What is God but the Totality?

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 623
(3/22/04 3:02 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

It could be said that love is directed completely towards the ALL, after all the purpose of love is propagation and living longer during one's life.

Love is the tool the herd uses to share resources and danger. In the broad sense love is sharing something of oneself, be it in its simplest form, namely sex, up to a general desire to share one's material and intellectual resources. Without love (sex and sharing) we would not have been able to evolve into animals.

Consciousness is the degree to which one can separate oneself from the immediate influences of one's immediate environment. In animals this is controlled via a sense of awareness of oneself, which is needed for speedy reaction to the environment. Animals are significantly more conscious than plants or material objects and humans have the strongest consciousness of all the animals.

Therefore, keeping in mind that 'the ALL' in each one of us is only what we perceive, then the SUM of consciousness that love has provided humans is incomparably greater than that that would have been achieved without love.

Of course over the last few thousand years as human control of the environment increased dramatically and large numbers of people can now survive without having to feed, house or cloth themselves by their own or immediate families hands – then love becomes less essential, although it is still necessary, as how would they obtain the food and shelter to survive without the community wishing to share.

Could enlightened folk remain enlightened without this sharing? I'd say no.

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 516(3/22/04 5:31 pm)Reply                                                                                            | Thomas <hr/> (Hey, a new picture of Thomas. Aren't you afraid people gonna fall in love with you? :-)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 902(3/22/04 5:51 pm)Reply  | Re: Love out of context. <hr/> David: In the enlightened brain, for example, the neuronal pathways that lead to the triggering of emotion have been closed down. Hilarious! I'll make sure to put this into the "noteworthy Quinn quotations" file. If it was all about shutting down emotions, the world population could be enlightened simply by prescribing everybody psychotropic drugs. David: 2) Jesus said,... 3) Jesus said,... 5) Jesus said,... I did not question whether Jesus used the word 'all' or 'All' (noun, capital A), but whether he taught love of the All, as you seem to insinuate. None of your quotes supports that. Thomas                |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2309(3/22/04 6:36 pm)Reply     | Re: Love out of context. <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> David: In the enlightened brain, for example, the neuronal pathways that lead to the triggering of emotion have been closed down. Thomas: Hilarious! I'll make sure to put this into the "noteworthy Quinn quotations" file. If it was all about shutting down emotions, the world population could be enlightened simply by prescribing everybody psychotropic drugs. <hr/> Shutting down the emotions is one of the inevitable consequences of enlightenment, but not its central focus. Its central focus is the intellectual comprehension of Reality combined with the direct experience of its |

fundamental nature. That is to say, the glory of the Kingdom of Heaven. No amount of psychotropic drugs can provide that.

Quote:

---

David: 2) Jesus said,... 3) Jesus said,... 5) Jesus said,...

I did not question whether Jesus used the word 'all' or 'All' (noun, captial A), but whether he taught love of the All, as you seem to insinuate. None of your quotes supports that.

---

I did provide them. For example:

Quote:

---

“Teacher, which is the greatest commandment in the Law?”

Jesus replied: “ ‘Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.’ This is the first and greatest commandment.”

Matt 22:36

---

His entire teaching was based on the complete and total unconditional love of the ALL. That is why he insisted that anyone who "does not give up everything he has cannot be my disciple." Luke 14:33

And it is also why he spoke against marriage:

Quote:

---

The disciples said to him, “If this is the situation between a husband and wife, it is better not to marry.”

Jesus replied, “Not everyone can accept this word, but only those to whom it has been given. For some are eunuchs because they were born that way; others have been made eunuchs; and others have renounced marriage because of the kingdom of heaven. The one who can accept this should accept it.”

- Matt 19: 10

---

And:

Quote:

---

"At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven."

- Matt 22:30

---

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 903
(3/22/04 7:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

I fail to see how this speaks against marriage. You are grasping at straws. I also don't see any support for your "love of All" theory. All very skewed.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2310
(3/23/04 9:16 am)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

I had quoted the New Testament:

Quote:

---

"At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven."

---

Translation. Those who are resurrected from the dead and enter the Kingdom of Heaven (i.e. become enlightened) are not married (i.e. are not bound by emotional attachments).

Quote:

---

You are grasping at straws

---

You are being willfully blind.

Quote:

---

I also don't see any support for your "love of All" theory.

---

As articulated in the Gospel of Thomas, the God of Jesus is the All.

As articulated in the New Testament, the greatest commandment, in Jesus's view, is to love God with all your mind and heart, etc.

Thus, Jesus's greatest commandment is to completely and unconditionally love the ALL

This is a very simple and straightforward truth, and yet it is pregnant with many dangerous implications. I can see why you want to stick your head in the sand.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 904

(3/23/04 12:37 pm)

Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

"At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven."

David: Translation. Those who are resurrected from the dead and enter the Kingdom of Heaven (i.e. become enlightened) are not married (i.e. are not bound by emotional attachments).

I think that this interpretation is quite farfetched.

David: As articulated in the Gospel of Thomas, the God of Jesus is the All.

No, he is not the All. The God of Jesus is the God of the Hebrews. The bible is quite clear about that. It speaks about a personal omniscient God, an entity above you and me. There are God's people and there are people against God. The 'All' doesn't apply.

You distort interpretations to fit your particular world view. How is this practice different from what Christian sects engage in?

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2311

(3/23/04 12:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Jesus: "At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven."

David: Translation. Those who are resurrected from the dead and enter the Kingdom of Heaven (i.e. become enlightened) are not married (i.e. are not bound by emotional attachments).

Thomas: I think that this interpretation is quite farfetched.

---

Of course. You're happily married.

Quote:

---

David: As articulated in the Gospel of Thomas, the God of Jesus is the All.

Thomas: No, he is not the All.

---

From the Gospel of Thomas:

2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All."

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say to you, 'See, the Kingdom is in the sky,' then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you, 'It is in the sea,' then the fish will precede you. Rather, the Kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you."

5) Jesus said, "Recognize what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

67) Jesus said, "Whoever believes that the All itself is deficient is himself completely deficient."

77) Jesus said, "It is I who am the light which is above them all. It is I who am the All. From me did the All come forth, & unto me did the All come forth, & unto me did the All extend. Split a piece of wood, & I am there. Lift up the stone, & you will find me there."

113) His disciples said to him, "When will the Kingdom come?" Jesus said, "It will not come by waiting for it. It will not be a matter of saying, 'Here it is', or 'There it is'. Rather, the Kingdom of the Father is spread out upon the earth, and men do not see it."

Quote:

---

The God of Jesus is the God of the Hebrews.

---

No. Jesus practiced the wisdom of the Infinite, which had nothing to do with the Hebrews.

Quote:

---

The bible is quite clear about that.

---

You seem to be confusing the Old Testament with the New one.

Quote:

---

It speaks about a personal omniscient God, an entity above you and me. There are God's people and there are people against God. The 'All' doesn't apply.

---

That is the God of the Old Testament and has nothing to do with Jesus.

Quote:

---

You distort interpretations to fit your particular world view. How is this practice differ from what Christian sects engage in?

---

Everyone interprets things in accordance with their worldview. That is how the mind works, in both sages and ordinary people.

Sapius
Registered User
Posts: 282
(3/24/04 8:08 am)
Reply

Re: Love out of context.

---

David wrote:

Quote:

---

There is no self and no world, and therefore nothing for love to find a foothold in - except in illusion.

---

No David, everything that The Ultimate Reality throws at you is Real, including "illusions", remember that.

Quote:

---

Only if it constitutes an aspect of spiritual love - which is directed towards the ALL.

---

Would 'illusions' be included in that 'ALL'? After all it is a manifestation of Reality. I take it by ALL you mean Totality, or do you have some exceptions, and don't actually mean ALL.

Quote:

---

I don't pretend or claim to be ego-less. I do claim to know what egolessness is, and that I am heading towards it.

---

Just wanted to wish you good luck there. :)

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Love this one...

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 7(1/14/04 7:54 am)Reply | Love this one... <hr/> The Infinite Circle Nicholas of Cusa (1401-1464) made the following interesting point regarding the shape of an infinite circle. The curvature of a circle's circumference decreases as the size of the circle increases. For example, the curvature of the earth's surface is so negligible that it appears flat. The limit of decrease in curvature is a straight line. An infinite circle is therefore... a straight line! Edited by: Canadian Zoetrope at: 1/14/04 9:17 am |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 586(1/14/04 9:47 am)Reply         | ... <hr/> Abstractly, theoretically, merely the appearance of a straight line.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 747
(1/15/04 6:31 pm)
Reply

Re: Love this one...

---

Zoetrope: An infinite circle is therefore... a straight line!

Unfortunately the conclusion is wrong. You said earlier:

The curvature of a circle's circumference decreases as the size of the circle increases. For example, the curvature of the earth's surface is so negligible that it appears flat. The limit of decrease in curvature is a straight line.

Yet it never reaches that limit. The Cusan circle is simply a spiral.

Thomas

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 880
(1/16/04 10:09 am)
Reply

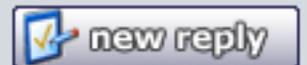

Re: Love this one...

---

The transfinite is not the infinite.

An infinite circle is an impossibility, as is an infinite anything.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Love vs. Logic

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 132(10/8/03 11:32 am)Reply                                                                                       | Love vs. Logic <hr/> There's no logic in love.And no love in logic.Logic is dumb.Love is genius. Truth. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1547(10/8/03 2:49 pm)Reply  | Re: Love vs. Logic <hr/> Truth?! Love is not opposed to logic!                                                                |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 401(10/8/03 2:51 pm)Reply                                                                                    | -- <hr/> Love of logic, maybe.                                                                                                |

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 337(10/9/03 1:42 am)Reply | ... <hr/> Love and Logic are only things you've made up.                                                                                                                                     |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 135(10/9/03 1:47 am)Reply    | Re: ... <hr/> Who, me?                                                                                                                                                                       |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 338(10/9/03 5:10 am)Reply | ... <hr/> Yes, your mind created them.                                                                                                                                                       |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 740(10/9/03 8:07 am)Reply     | Re: Love vs. Logic <hr/> Quote: <hr/> suergaz:Truth?! Love is not opposed to logic! <hr/> Please expound                                                           |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 136(10/9/03 8:44 am)Reply    | Re: ... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Yes, your mind created them. <hr/> You're right. Well?...'Not even a thank ye do I get!' (Stumpy [Walter Brennan] in Rio Bravo). |

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1548(10/9/03 1:47 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> suergaz:--Love is not opposed to logic. DEL:--Please expound You can verify the truth of my statement by attempting to find an exception to it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| HuzingtonRegistered UserPosts: 2(10/9/03 3:21 pm)Reply  | Re: Love vs. Logic <hr/> How can love be "illogical"? Which law of logic does it contradict? Logic only applies to statements, not feelings, not conduct. It is therefore perhaps non-logical (i.e. outside the sphere of logic) but not illogical. Such are my thoughts.                                                                                                                                                     |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 140(10/10/03 2:12 am)Reply  | Re: Love vs. Logic <hr/> There's nothing illogical about love. You might perceive that logic goes against it, because you reached the conclusion that it is not good to love through logical thought. But if you trace it back, you will find an arbitrary preference in the beginning of the process that resulted in that conclusion. You can't want and not want the same thing at the same time. That's what would be illogical. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 141(10/10/03 2:12 am)Reply    | Re: Love vs. Logic <hr/> 'Illogical', 'non-logical', whatever. Woman is great, do you agree?QRS do not entirely, I believe. 'You may say I'm a dreamerBut I'm not the only one'... Such are my thoughts.                                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 141(10/10/03 2:17 am)Reply        | ... <hr/> An example: you decide that you want to stay completely detached from everything. Through logical thought, you reach the conclusion that love goes against that objective - yet, you still want to love someone. In that case, you just have to see what you truly want. You have to see which one of the preferences are fake. It's a rather intuitive thing. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 142(10/10/03 2:24 am)Reply          | To Rairun <hr/> You know what your trouble is, Rairun?You're too smart. For me anyway. But... when I type 'Love' instead of 'love',does that ring a bell?                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 948(10/10/03 10:52 am)Reply | Re: To Rairun <hr/> You know what your trouble is, Rairun?You're too smart. For me anyway. He's just about the smartest person here. And why might that be. IQ alone can't account for it, nor logical thinking. The deal is, he has his heart and his head engaged, and does not put them in conflict.                                               |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 144(10/10/03 11:01 am)Reply         | Slimy? Oh! <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The deal is, he has his heart and his head engaged, and does not put them in conflict. <hr/> Yes, like you have!                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 143

(10/10/03 1:09 pm)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

You know what your trouble is, Rairun?
You're too smart. For me anyway.

But... when I type 'Love' instead of 'love', does that ring a bell?

---

It does ring a bell, but what does "Love" mean to you? I've heard JK and a bunch of other mystics talking about it. I can interpret their words in my own way and say, "yes, i know what they are talking about" - but do I really know it? And even if I did, would my interpretation be the same as yours?

To me, Love seems to be some sort of integration in my mind. It appears when there is no confusion about the source of my decisions and all thoughts are naturally developed from it. There is no difference between thoughts and articulated feelings there, because they all appear accordingly to that source and follow a logical chain.

I perceive that source as a physical sensation that doesn't have any linguistic articulation at all. Sometimes I forget it's there and I don't even notice that my thoughts are appearing from it. Other times, its intensity gets extremely high. I think it really depends on the situation I am in and how it makes me react. Driving to college or talking to a classmate don't spark anything strong in particular, while being quiet with my girlfriend and exchanging a few words heightens that sensation a lot. That's when I can notice it really clearly. I can feel exactly how each word and movement interact with that sensation and make a chain of thought appear. It's what makes me think, talk and even move.

A few weeks ago Zag posted a cool quote, here it is:

"Sense and spirit are instruments and toys: behind them still lies the Self. The Self seeks with the eyes of the sense, it listens too with the ears of the spirit. The Self is always listening and seeking: it compares, subdues, conquers, destroys. It rules and is also the Ego's ruler. Behind your thoughts and feelings, my brother, stands a mighty commander, an unknown sage - he is called Self." - Zarathustra

I don't think "Love" has anything to do with the realization of some sort of absolute reality. All those things those mystics talk about are metaphors. They express it like that only because they are used to thinking that way. Pure awareness, Love, Ultimate Reality, blah, blah, blah. To think logical understanding of those things can lead you anywhere that other things can't is missing the point.

Or maybe I am missing the point and know nothing about enlightenment. If that's the case, I'm not interested in it.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 145
(10/10/03 2:16 pm)
Reply

Rairun

---

Yeah, well, so, erm, this and that.

Why don't we understand the most important thing?

I love your words.

You do understand the most important thing.

I don't.

Anna was right. You're the brightest, Rairun.

(Hoho, to be continued :-)

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 350
(10/10/03 2:54 pm)
Reply

Re: Rairun

---

I love you Paul

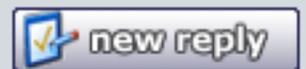

I really do :)

I hope you don't mind that I have an average size dick. Try not to think about that when you change personas.

So Paul dearest. What is your story. I kinda like the way you mock us all.

|                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 148(10/10/03 3:01 pm)Reply                                                                                    | jimhaz <hr/> Mocking? No, I'm not. Certainly not!Shall we talk this over by e-mail? paulterbeek@home.nl Later?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 352(10/10/03 3:13 pm)Reply  | Re: jimhaz <hr/> Email...private talk...No I don't correspond in that fashion. Btw I was joking...just putting your spin on things. I don't love anything except A, B and C....can't seem to do without them. Although I hate them at the same time – but really that is what makes it love (namely, a desire for irrational interfaces). There are no humans that I love, even my still alive parents, although many humans have aspects that I appreciate. (well perhaps I do) Of course you are mocking us, but then why not. You should. Edited by: jimhaz at: 10/11/03 1:08 am |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Love vs. Logic

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 149(10/10/03 3:26 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: jimhaz <hr/> Well, apart from the fact that you're a genius, I'd like you to take notice of another fact, namely that I'm more insane than you, Sir! How does that grab you, baby, huh? Coward!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 353(10/10/03 4:06 pm)Reply  | Re: jimhaz <hr/> The Jim GeniusA small Jim Geniussnuck off to the cityStrung out on lasersand slash back blazersAte all your razorswhile pulling the waitersTalking bout Monroeand walking on Snow White 19New York's a go-go 19and everything tastes rightPoor little Greenie The Jim Genius lives on his backThe Jean Genius loves chimney stacksHe's outrageous, he screams and he bawlsJim Genius let yourself go! |

Sits like a man
but he smiles like a woman
She loves himself, she loves herelf but just for a short while S'he'll scratch in the sand, won't let go his/her own hand
She says he's a mind beautician and sells you mental nutrition
And keeps all your dead hair for making up underwear
Poor little Greenie

He's so simple minded
she can't drive his module
He bites on the neon and sleeps in the capsule
Loves to be loved, loves to be loved

Who is more insane!!!!
Please be me me me me em em a emema enema.

(only changed a few words ...got bored)

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 627
(10/12/03 12:02 am)
Reply

Re: jimhaz

---

Jimmy, how comes you changed the things you love from alcohol, porn and entertainment, to A,B and C?

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 342(10/12/03 2:47 am)Reply | Re: jimhaz <hr/> Rairun: There are many different types of love. The kind mystics talk about isn't just a metaphor. Pure awareness and love are the same thing. Understanding this logically doesn't do anything more than make your life easier. Yet, all this talk and running about of the mind doesn't make your life easier...which is why I said "love" and "logic" are only concepts, like anything else. Trying to understand takes you away from these things, because they are like nothing. Simplicity is an open door for love to come into the mind. Pure awareness isn't hard to find, if you know how to look. Love is there. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 150(10/12/03 10:52 am)Reply   | To voce io <hr/> Very goood, voce! I like your words. Especially: 'Pure awareness and love are the same thing'. (Yet love is not mere awareness, do you agree?)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 144(10/12/03 1:37 pm)Reply  | ... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> There are many different types of love. The kind mystics talk about isn't just a metaphor. Pure awareness and love are the same thing. <hr/> Have you ever experienced awareness independently of thought? If you have, how can you even remember it? And if it's actually connected to thought, how is it "pure"? Quote: <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

Understanding this logically doesn't do anything more than make your life easier.

Yet, all this talk and running about of the mind doesn't make your life easier...

---

What's the difference between those two things? They seem to be the same to me, but you say one makes life easier and the other doesn't.

Quote:

---

which is why I said "love" and "logic" are only concepts, like anything else. Trying to understand takes you away from these things, because they are like nothing.

---

If they are like nothing, how can you be taken away from them?

Quote:

---

Simplicity is an open door for love to come into the mind. Pure awareness isn't hard to find, if you know how to look. Love is there.

---

I agree that simplicity is what brings me to "love". But it IS something and it ISN'T pure awareness. I don't know how anyone can claim that such a thing exists.

Edited by: Rairun at: 10/12/03 1:43 pm

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 355

(10/12/03 3:39 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Dave

Just retreating a bit from what I said. It was irrational to say that. I've always enjoyed saying whatever I like, to extent that I frequently get into strife, but since I've been visiting this forum my likelihood of doing so in real life has increased a fair bit. Sometimes I need to hold my tongue or tie my tying fingers.

Btw. Re my views on time. This article seems to be similar to the way I imagine space/time.

The End of Time

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 343

(10/13/03 10:07 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Very goood, voce! I like your words.

Especially: 'Pure awareness and love are the same thing'. (Yet love is not mere awareness, do you agree?)

Awareness is like unconditional love, and has the same type of effect as love when it's brought into the mind's view.

Have you ever experienced awareness independently of thought?

You can't.

If you have, how can you even remember it? And if it's actually connected to thought, how is it "pure"?

If anyone does, you can't remember it. It's pure because it isn't a thought. If it were a specific thought, other thoughts interrupting it would make it impure...but it always is, and always is undiluted.

What's the difference between those two things? They seem to be the same to me, but you say one makes life easier and the other doesn't.

If we are talking about how things "seem", then they ARE different. It'd be a flaw in your mind if you felt everything "seemed" the same.

If they are like nothing, how can you be taken away from them?

Your mind can become filled with a bunch of cares that aren't necessary, which can make your personality unnerving. Also, instead of trying to further your point of view on life, and closing yourself off to mine by attempting to prove me wrong...you should ask questions that are more honest and straight forward. You'll get more satisfactory answers.

I agree that simplicity is what brings me to "love". But it IS something and it ISN'T pure awareness. I don't know how anyone can claim that such a thing exists.

It's so obvious it exists that it seems like it doesn't. It's always happening, just very hard to become aware of...since it IS what's aware.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 119

(10/13/03 10:41 am)

Reply

Re: magnetism

---

In all of these posts, I haven't seen any mention of magnetism. Like attracting like. No matter what kind of love one is talking about, be it physical or divine, it is a matter of attraction. Some mystics consider it the basis of life, or the breath that creates and coddles the universe, regardless of how it is viewed, and on what level, magnetism is the key. Vibration is the threshold.

From a mystics standpoint, I would say that 'Love' (magnetism) connects the entire world and beyond. When one reaches enlightenment they are pure with the divine. From this standpoint, enlightenment is not achieved until one's vibration is up to par with that of the divine.

From a mundane aspect, 'love' is still the attraction of energies from one source to another. In the same respect, vibration is the threshold. It would be like being introduced to a new environment and being uncomfortable, after time, the comfort level increases--the vibrations of one to another are 'mingling' and finding the 'attraction' throughout those surroundings.

As for logic, what is illogical about love? I think love or Love or however you view it, is the scapegoat for people being illogical.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 145

(10/15/03 1:56 pm)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

Rairun: If you have, how can you even remember it? And if it's actually connected to thought, how is it "pure"?

voce io: If anyone does, you can't remember it. It's pure because it isn't a thought. If it were a specific thought, other thoughts interrupting it would make it impure...but it always is, and always is undiluted.

---

How can you know that the continuity of awareness you talk about exists, if you can only see you are aware through thought? It appears that there is no "pure awareness" that always is. You only become aware of a thought when another thought comes in and says "I am aware of that thought". There's always a time gap.

---

Quote:

voce io: Understanding this logically doesn't do anything more than make your life easier.

Yet, all this talk and running about of the mind doesn't make your life easier...

Rairun: What's the difference between those two things? They seem to be the same to me, but you say one makes life easier and the other doesn't.

voce io: If we are talking about how things "seem", then they ARE different. It'd be a flaw in your mind if you felt everything "seemed" the same.

---

I lost you there. I just said that "understanding this logically" and "all this talk and running about of the mind" are different words for the same thing.

Quote:

---

If they are like nothing, how can you be taken away from them?

Your mind can become filled with a bunch of cares that aren't necessary, which can make your personality unnerving. Also, instead of trying to further your point of view on life, and closing yourself off to mine by attempting to prove me wrong...you should ask questions that are more honest and straight forward. You'll get more satisfactory answers.

---

lol Calm down! I wasn't trying to further my point of view on life, I don't even care about those ideas. It's true that I think your ideas aren't going to change my way of living though. The way we are establishing communication has probably had a much greater effect on me than the actual ideas that you tried to express.

But what we are doing is still discussing ideas, so I asked you a few questions about them. How aren't they honest or straight forward? I thought they sounded pretty clear. I want to understand what you're talking about, even though that understanding won't do much for me. Isn't that honest enough for you?

Quote:

---

Rairun: I agree that simplicity is what brings me to "love". But it IS something and it ISN'T pure awareness. I don't know how anyone can claim that such a thing exists.

voce io: It's so obvious it exists that it seems like it doesn't. It's always happening, just very hard to become aware of... since it IS what's aware.

---

I think I've written about everything I'd use to answer that question with. My point is just that if pure awareness exists, it wouldn't have anything to

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                          | do with us. It wouldn't make us feel or think anything. It wouldn't have anything to do with the sensations, feelings and thoughts we associate with the word "love". It wouldn't make anything harder or easier, as it would have no effect on life whatsoever. You said that pure awareness is love... does that mean that love is nothing? Are you saying that it doesn't manifest itself in form of sensations, feelings and thoughts? |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 963(10/18/03 11:12 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Rairun, I emailed you as you requested. Didn't you get it?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 345(10/20/03 3:43 pm)Reply       | Re: ... <hr/> Rairun, I'm right and you're wrong.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 159(10/20/03 3:46 pm)Reply          | To voce io <hr/> Watch your tongue, whipper-snapper.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 146(10/21/03 1:48 am)Reply        | ... <hr/> Anna - Yes, I got it, thanks. I've been kind of busy, but I'll write soon. Scott - I'll leave this with a :P                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Man on his own

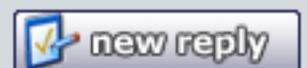

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 930(1/20/04 6:44 pm)Reply      | Man on his own <hr/> Women cannot stand to see a man alone.A man on his own is a dangerous thing.He will become too concentrated.He may burn the collective like acid.The feminine can dilute and diffuse the masculine.All the criminals and insane, according to popular opinion, are supposed to be lonely men with no women by their side.Look at the student boys. How wild and unruly they are.Soon they will want to buy themselves expensive toys. They will enter the collective cave to do so. In the dark cave they will fall into the feminine well. There their bravado will be diffused and diluted and provide nourishment or medicine for the next generation. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 652(1/21/04 10:47 am)Reply | Re: Man on his own <hr/> You damned misogynist supernaturalist. How wrong you are! Women like men when they're alone because they're confident.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1311(1/21/04 12:39 pm)Reply | Re: Man on his own <hr/> Men don't exactly ignore an unattached female either. And it has little to do with stifling her freedom. It's just opportunity.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 931(1/21/04 6:22 pm)Reply            | Re: Man on his own <hr/> Quote: <hr/> voce ioWomen like men when they're alone because they're confident. <hr/> A man may be alone because of his philosophy. His confidence springs from the affirmation of truth not because he is alone.See how the silly student boy wonders into the cave alone thinking to make himself look big enough to face the dragon. |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 932(1/21/04 6:25 pm)Reply            | The unattached female <hr/> The unattached female is like a group of refugees.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2106(1/21/04 11:29 pm)Reply      | --- <hr/> An excellent thread!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

|                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 455(1/22/04 12:02 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Truth without wisdom means nothing. It is just another attachment. We all must be attached to something or we talk ourselves into dieing. For many solo men isolation makes everything they think of as being true. I agree though that women dislike solo men, for a variety of reasons. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 653(1/22/04 12:11 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: --- <hr/> Del, I'm not a student boy. I may be silly. I'm unattached to women - that's how I'm alone - that's how they're attracted to me.                                                                                                                                                                 |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1426(1/22/04 1:14 am)Reply                                                                             | ---- <hr/> The hermaphrodite never needs a date. The Uberfrau suckles her child during combat training. She wears a short skirt in order to more easily urinate while standing up.                                                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2107(1/22/04 1:24 am)Reply                                                                                 | --- <hr/> I think Wolf has gone potty. Man on his own. I don't know what to say! (:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 253(8/4/03 2:01 am)Reply | Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals <hr/> [b]Marriage tames geniuses and criminals[/b] (Yahoo! News) PARIS (AFP) - Creative genius and crime express themselves early in men but both are turned off almost like a tap if a man gets married and has children, a study says. Satoshi Kanazawa, a psychologist at the University of Canterbury in New Zealand, compiled a database of the biographies of 280 great scientists, noting their age at the time when they made their greatest work. The data remarkably concur with the brutal observation made by Albert Einstein, who wrote in 1942: "A person who has not made his great contribution to science before the age of 30 will never do so." "Scientific productivity indeed fades with age," Kanazawa says. "Two-thirds (of all scientists) will have made their most significant contributions before their midthirties." But, regardless of age, the great minds who married virtually kissed goodbye | to making any further glorious additions to their CV.

Within five years of making their nuptial vows, nearly a quarter of married scientists had made their last significant contribution to history's Hall of Fame.

"Scientists rather quickly desist (from their careers) after their marriage, while unmarried scientists continue to make great scientific contributions later in their lives," says Kanazawa.

The energy of youth and the dampening effect of marriage, he adds, are also remarkably similar among geniuses in music, painting and writing, as well as in criminal activity.

Previous studies have documented that delinquents are overwhelmingly male, and usually start out on the road to crime in their teens.

But those who marry well subsequently stop committing crime, whereas criminals at the same age who remain unmarried tend to continue their unlawful careers.

Kanazawa suggests "a single psychological mechanism" is responsible for this: the competitive edge among young men to fight for glory and gain the attention of women. That craving drives the all-important male hormone, testosterone.

After a man settles down, the testosterone level falls, as does his creative output, Kanazawa theorises.

The study appears in the August issue of the Journal of Research in Personality, published by the Elsevier group. The British weekly New Scientist reports on it in its upcoming issue on Saturday.

|                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1124(8/4/03 8:32)Reply | Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals <hr/> Both groups in this scenario are defined through their contributions to society. Marriage may damage an individual's desire to contribute socially but not necessarily that individual's ability. Also, marriage is not the only factor in the decline of an individual's social contributions; enlightenment and/or incarceration are other possible factors. Is that quote saying essentially that Einstein developed his special and general theories of relativity, principles of Brownian motion, etc. solely to get laid or get married? I don't think so. Usually a scientist develops imaginative theories in their youth, it is true. Some small percentage later find that these theories hold water under scrutiny and thereby become "great" scientists. I can see marriage and testosterone levels playing only barely significant roles. Tharan |
| wannabealotRegistered UserPosts: 9(8/4/03 9:53)Reply    | Re: Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals <hr/> I wonder if there is any correlation to their choice of mate?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 357(8/4/03 10:18 am)Reply | -- <hr/> That waa certainly a self-serving response, Tharan. Did you ever think that you might be the exception? The comics artist Dave Sim writes against marriage (he knows what it does, he was married once) with good reason. There was another comics artist called Steve Bissette who used to make comics, but the last I heard he was working in a video store to get health insurance for his family. His comics projects have been put on hold for - the wife and kids: that lifeblood sapper of many a man. I recommend you all read Kierkegaard's 'In Vino Veritas' for a portrait of what marriage does to a man. Edited by: G Shantz at: 8/4/03 10:22 am                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

|                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1125(8/4/03 11:13 am)Reply | Re: Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals <hr/> How do you mean exactly? I feel that my thinking has improved greatly in the past few years and I have been married for eight. Does that mean marriage has necessarily contributed or detracted? On the surface, I don't see a necessary correlation. (My wife is independent and not demanding.) My testosterone levels have probably dropped. I am less aggressive and I have to be careful with my diet, but is that a function of marriage or being 34 years old? Tharan edit Oh, I see what you mean. Most men are not like me, in other words? Hmm, maybe. But that seems like weakness inherent to the individual. It would probably surface with or without marriage, don't you think? Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 8/4/03 11:16 am                                                                                                      |
| wannabealotRegistered UserPosts: 11(8/4/03 11:56)Reply      | Re: Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals <hr/> Wolfson, My point was that most women are not like your wife.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 254(8/4/03 16:33)Reply         | ... <hr/> Both groups in this scenario are defined through their contributions to society. Marriage may damage an individual's desire to contribute socially but not necessarily that individual's ability. We all have the ability to be perfect geniuses, and hideous criminals. Anyone is defined through their contributions to society, because it's society which defines them. The point is that a married scientist will focus more energy on the marriage, than the science. The purpose of the man becoming a scientist was most likely to get money, to attract or support women. It's all about getting laid, or filling the unsatisfactory emotional hole. Some people even fill the hole with knowledge of truth, poor creatures. I prefer women, myself. Is that quote saying essentially that Einstein developed his special and general theories of relativity, principles of Brownian motion, etc. solely to | get laid or get married? I don't think so.

No one knows what he did it for. If I were to do that, one of the main drives would have been sex...even if that drive is fully unconscious.

I can see marriage and testosterone levels playing only barely significant roles.

Not barely significant, but simple. It's like a snowball effect...one desire creates an entire life.

I wonder if there is any correlation to their choice of mate?

All of man's abilities diminish when they marry. Any woman. I think, if the woman is accomplished or ambitious enough, the same is true for them. Marriage is the balancer.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 499

(8/4/03 21:48)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Let's look at something that one might more readily associate with trying to pull the pussy, sporting/athletic prowess and competitiveness. To succeed and exceed requires just as much, if not more dedication and will, obviously to the exclusion of other things in one's life. Yet as I look around the highest levels of most of the sporting world, I see no correlation between being single and being the best, or at least up there.

It could be argued that it is in fact the opposite case. Moreover, one could likely make a qualitative study and find that the better sportsmen have the more settled and 'better' marriages.

Natural selection and sexual selection are powerful tools for illuminating the roots of desire and the like but humans are a far more complicated thing than that. Our levels of complexity and sophistication surely raise us above our behaviour being reduced to such lowest common denominators in absolutely everything we do. Perhaps the perpetuation of one's genes is applicable in a lot of the things we do and even in more things than we might think, but not in absolutely everything. And to reduce the processes behind natural selection down to such selfish perpetuation is to do the perpetuation of the race a disservice.

I can't see much good science in the study at the start of this thread. The conclusions look highly myopic to me, likely the conclusions of a subjectively biased scientist(s). There are all sorts of other factors to look at.

People used to die at not much past 30. One might guess that virtually all the flowering of potential of a human should be crammed into this period in a lifetime then, according to natural selection. Then there is the correlation between relative intelligence and the age at which one gets married (i.e. those of less potential tend to marry earlier and vice versa, pointing to the thought that the genius will be marrying at about the time that their potential might be waning anyway). One should also look at the other side of the coin, that is that one should look at the correlation between single men and latter life achievement. This should also be contrasted with married men and latter life achievement. One might also look at the relative health of the older mind which has been married in contrast with the older mind that has been single, as well as the achievements of genius performed in later life by those married and those not. The simple correlation between achievements of genius and age might be the most illuminating of all, leaving no reason to look for correlation between marriage and achievement. I'm sure there's plenty more that you could think of which would be pertinent to a more exhaustive investigation, before a realistic big picture conclusion could be arrived at.

As the truism goes, you can use stats to prove anything. More correctly, you can use skewed stats and stats which don't cover the whole picture to prove anything you feel you want to prove.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 835

(8/5/03 15:32)

Reply

Re: ...

---

There have been so many great scientists and inventors who were married. My current favorite is Sir Jagadis Chandra Bose, who had a beautiful wife and a prolific scientific output all his long life.

30 is too young. 40 is more like it. You can hardly get your PhD much before 30.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 500

(8/5/03 22:10)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Yes, an interesting guy and interesting, groundbreaking work.

How about another married man (with kids) who achieved throughout life; incidentally, associated with a married woman of achievement, married to a man of achievement.

\*Satyendra Nath Bose\* (no relation).

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 255

(8/6/03 15:32)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Guys, of course there will be exceptions. There always are in this world. The fact is that, on an average, most scientists are younger than 30...and stop achieving the same goals after the age. None of this is concrete.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 501

(8/6/03 22:36)

Reply

Re: ...

---

I dunno voce, maybe and maybe not. I'm going to play devil's advocate here, not because I'm married but because I don't like intuitive inferences in scientific study unless they are fully justified and substantiated. Niether do I like subjectivity in scientific study. These are always going to produce bad science. You may see no subjectivity here but Satoshi Kanazawa is an evolutionary psychologist. No supprises then that his answers to the questions posed, and the whole ethos of the study is grounded in the pre-supposed propositions of such a field.

Here is another of his studies (and some commentary) that I found on a site called semitrue.com:

According to an article in The Washington Post, we may be confusing our real friends with Friends on TV. Writing in the journal Evolution and Human Behavior, sociologist Satoshi Kanazawa posits that we have not yet evolutionarily adapted to the false intimacy of television programs and contends that viewers "fail to distinguish between real friends and the imaginary ones they see on TV" and "people who watch certain types of TV are more satisfied with their friendships, as if they had more friends and socialized with them more often".

Kanazawa, who teaches at the apparently geographically misplaced Indiana University of Pennsylvania, writes "When we watch TV and see people having a good time, we feel like we are with friends having a good time, we are participating and we have friends." He also cites differences between the genders: women tend to feel like they have more friends and a better social life if they watch more sitcoms and family dramas, whereas men feel more socially connected to news anchors, imagining them to be on the same level of friendship as coworkers. Also, men like sports and porn.

This is a controversial conclusion, and one that I am sure is on its way to be over-analyzed by the media. To explore this theory, I called a few of my close friends and asked them about social bonding in the TV age. Here are a few of their responses:

MR. SPOCK: I have learned never to underestimate the human capacity for reaching emotional conclusions based on fragmented evidence. I find this analysis to be illogical.

HOMER SIMPSON: Beer is my best friend.

Spock said exactly the same thing to me when I asked him about it and there's no doubting his words.

We can see the unequivocal theme developing, unjustified by the one-dimensional level of study and myopic approach to theorising on the evidence.

Here's another thing I found:

**Study by psychologist Gordon Gallup on the apparent anti-depressant qualities of semen.**

Too much to quote but here's Kanazawa's bit at the end.

But why should semen have such an effect? "It makes no sense to me for this phenomenon to have evolved," says Satoshi Kanazawa, an evolutionary psychologist at the Indiana University of Pennsylvania. But Gallup counters that men whose semen promotes long-term mood enhancement might have more chances to indulge in sexual activity.

I see yet more evidence here of Kanazawa's bias. As far as I can see, this study makes at least as much sense as the two studies above by Kanazawa, more in fact. Yet he can see no sense in it. Seems to me that the psychologist who produced the study was quite willing to defer to evolutionary biology to explain psychological effects. While Kanazawa, always looking for the psychological evolutionary explanation, sees no sense in this. I imagine that this would be putting the cart before the horse for him, as we can see in this quote from the original study which started this thread:

Kanazawa suggests "a single psychological mechanism" is responsible for this: the competitive edge among young men to fight for glory and gain the attention of women. That craving drives the all-important male hormone, testosterone.

Having read that, I'm willing to place a bet as to who is actually more used to putting the cart before the horse. After all, surely that craving is driven by the all-important male hormone, testosterone, and is responsible for this "single psychological mechanism", the competitive edge among young men to fight for glory and gain the attention of women.

Quote:

---

Creative genius and crime express themselves early in men but both are turned off almost like a tap if a man gets married and has children, a study says.

---

Okay then, let's look into this.

Quote:

---

Satoshi Kanazawa, a psychologist at the University of Canterbury in New Zealand, compiled a database of the biographies of 280 great scientists, noting their age at the time when they made their greatest work.

---

Good start but that's all such a number is going to be, a start. It's hardly exhaustive but let's see what he finds and his conclusions.

Quote:

---

The data remarkably concurs with the brutal observation made by Albert Einstein, who wrote in 1942: "A person who has not made his great contribution to science before the age of 30 will never do so."

---

Hmmm, irrelevant aside, indirectly offering credence by proxy. I wonder if Bertie thought this reasonably undeniable phenomenon had anything to do with marriage.

Quote:

---

"Scientific productivity indeed fades with age," Kanazawa says. "Two-thirds (of all scientists) will have made their most significant contributions before their midthirties."

---

Okay, age right, with ya.

Two thirds of all scientists (that's regardless of marital status) made their most significant contributions before their mid-thirties.

There seems to be an obvious biological mechanism at work here then, according to Occam's Razor. Do we really need to look any further?

Quote:

---

But, regardless of age, the great minds who married virtually kissed goodbye to making any further glorious additions to their CV.

---

Right, we've not seen the evidence but we'll go along with that for the moment. So why might that be then? How might it be?

Quote:

---

Within five years of making their nuptial vows, nearly a quarter of married scientists had made their last significant contribution to history's Hall of Fame.

---

What, nearly a quarter? within 5 years? This seems to be in direct conflict with the statement above that "regardless of age, the great minds who married virtually kissed goodbye to making any further glorious additions to their CV". Nearly a quarter? we'll call that just over 20% then eh. So, after 5 years of marriage (meaning that some of said 20% still make such contributions in the 5 years after marriage), almost 80% of great minds are still making further glorious additions to their CV (significantly, whilst still they all grow older, presumably). Sounds so different when put that way. Seems to point to marriage having a far less significant effect than that which the original phrasing is trying to convey. Let's soldier on though.

How does this "nearly a quarter" concerning marriage, compare with "two thirds" concerning age BTW. 22% of married (longer than 5 years) Vs 66% of all, roughly, hmm.

We won't go into the value judgements that are "significant contributions" and "history's hall of fame".

Quote:

---

"Scientists rather quickly desist (from their careers) after their marriage, while unmarried scientists continue to make great scientific contributions later in their lives," says Kanazawa.

---

That makes sense. Involving oneself in such a time consuming activity is always going to have a detrimental effect on whatever was taking up one's time previously to said new activity. This would be true of any new time consuming activity. I wonder if a study has ever been done on how the work of scientists who got into philosophy, or hang gliding, or painting, or insert your own time consuming activity, was affected by their lack of time for science.

And of course one would expect the scientist who stays on track to carry on with their great discoveries into later life. That is at least, the one third that haven't already slowed down due to being past their mid-thirties.

Quote:

---

The energy of youth and the dampening effect of marriage, he adds, are also remarkably similar among geniuses in music, painting and writing, as well as in criminal activity.

---

Well maybe, but he's hardly gone any distance whatsoever in substantiating his original claim thusfar. If he'd only said "the energy of youth", then we would be hard pushed to argue. Similarly, if he'd also said "the dampening effects of time consuming activities" as opposed to "the dampening effects of marriage", we'd again be hard pushed to disagree. This is not the case though and there are plenty of arguments against.

Quote:

---

Previous studies have documented that delinquents are overwhelmingly male, and usually start out on the road to crime in their teens.

But those who marry well subsequently stop committing crime, whereas criminals at the same age who remain unmarried tend to continue their unlawful careers.

---

Criminal activity in particular sticks in the craw. When a man takes on the responsibilities of marriage, he is obviously going to be far more concerned with not going to prison, for the sake of his love and his family. Can we really put this down to his newfound lack of need to impress the opposite sex with his criminal mastery? Sounds silly doesn't it.

Quote:

---

After a man settles down, the testosterone level falls, as does his creative output, Kanazawa theorises.

---

The only things he needs to add to this theory is that men tend to settle down as they get older, and men tend to get older as they settle down. Also, testosterone levels drop as men get older.

Quote:

---

Voce io: Guys, of course there will be exceptions. There always are in this world.

---

Indeed, I would point you to the assumption that the third of all scientists that make their most significant contributions after their mid-thirties are the exception. And I would guess that the large proportion of this third make said contributions before the age of 45, i.e. not long after their mid-thirties. So you can imagine the amount of scientists who make their greatest contributions in much later life is rather small. These people are in the vast minority and are the exception.

I will also point you to the apparent fact that almost 80% of scientists who marry (and we've already talked about how the more intelligent tend to marry later), still make significant contributions after 5 years of marriage and beyond. This would suggest that the 20% who don't are in the vast minority and are the exception.

Quote:

---

voce io: The fact is that, on an average, most scientists are younger than 30...

---

I can't see how that's a fact. In fact, if you looked into it, you'd likely find that the age distribution is much the same as any field of endeavour. Scientists will hardly have a profound career change simply because they pass 30.

Quote:

---

voce io: and stop achieving the same goals after the age.

---

That would certainly seem to be backed up on the whole. I'm sure you could again apply this to any field.

But this statement speaks of age and nothing more. If that was all that Kanazawa was saying, he'd be stating the obvious (being as you are supposed to have mated by such an age for obvious evolutionary reasons, and anything thereafter is merely a product of our greater life expectancy in these modern, and very recent times). But that isn't what he's saying. And what he is saying seems to have no justification. Marriage, time consuming activity that it is, may well have a detrimental effect on one's professional life but his claim that this (and the accompanying drop in testosterone that also comes with age) is due to no longer having to impress the women coz you got one, has not been substantiated in the slightest.

In fact I'd go as far as to say that it is completely wrong. Having a woman to mate with is certainly not the end of having to attract women for the perpetuation of one's genes, as far as natural selection and human history is concerned.

I guess we'll have to wait for the proper article in New Scientist but so far, he puts across no argument of any substance at all.

Kate5

Registered User

Posts: 20

(8/7/03 14:47)

Reply

Re: ...

---

One of the reasons could be that men feel like they are supposed to support the family. Especially in the old days. Men worked all day and took care of their wives and family and came home and were tired and went to sleep. As opposed to single men who have all the time in the world to sit and think and create. But, and I have nothing to back this up so don't ask, I do think that some single people have a certain purpose in this world that goes beyond mating. And others only purpose is to get married and procreate. I don't know.

prozak666

Registered User

Posts: 164

(8/8/03 11:44)

Reply

Re: ...

---

The problem here I think is the neurotic nature of society, which makes parenting and having a family a real pain in the ass. William Faulkner continued to write amazing novels after being married to an insane woman, so I think it's bollocks :)

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 182

(8/9/03 12:30)

Reply

Re: ...

---

"And others only purpose is to get married and procreate. I don't know."

If they have no purpose beyond this, they shouldn't procreate. So, they have no purpose.

I prefer the idea that a man (perhaps only subconsciously) pursues, initially at least, his talents so as to give him something to be wanted for by the lesser sex. In the same way as young girls like their make up, regardless of what feminism tries to do to them. And when the mate has been secured, there is less pressure to achieve further. Only a true love (or hate) of one's subject area could force him to persist.

MortHandleson

Registered User

Posts: 3

(8/11/03 18:45)

Reply

The power of a good imagination

---

Does having to rely on your imagination for your sex drive, drive you imagination? This seems to be at the root of the conversation. Scientific contribution is generally seen as a young man's game, but science has a large apprenticeship component that may also contribute to the failure to produce "invention." The older scientists I have met are brilliant, but express their brilliance in their management of other brilliant minds. I wonder how many discoveries wouldn't be made if these wonderful minds sat greedily back and attempted to sell their families (both genetic and scientific), for one more kick at the smart can?

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 1019

(8/17/03 13:11)

Reply

Re: The power of a good imagination

Prozak:

Quote:

William Faulkner continued to write amazing novels after being married to an insane woman, so I think it's bollocks

I have read everything that Faulkner ever wrote. Excellent writer.

His novels are peopled by characters who were quite insane. He was himself rather eccentric. Most people who recall his presence in Oxford, Mississippi think of him as a harmless buffoon.

Faizi

BryanParrish

Global User

Posts: 75

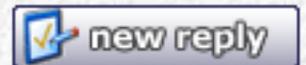

(8/3/04 5:39)

Reply

Re: Marriage Tames Geniuses and Criminals

FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Matter-Female, Anti-Matter-Male

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1087(4/21/04 4:16 pm)Reply | Matter-Female, Anti-Matter-Male <hr/> Matter-Female, Anti-Matter-Male Please would you put the above into one of your high level matter and anti-matter equations so I can see if the answers can be transposed.                                                                   |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 1088(4/21/04 4:23 pm)Reply | Matter-Female, Anti-Matter-Male <hr/> Actually there are 4 poles.2 with a static relationship and 2 with a dynamic relationship.I guess the static poles correspond to the masculine and the feminine to the dynamic but I'm not sure. I'll do some experiments tonight. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Metaphysics - Word Polarity

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 681(9/20/03 11:40 am)Reply |  Metaphysics - Word Polarity <hr/> If there is still anybody here into metaphysics perhaps you could give me a hand on my new "Word Polarity" project/concept. Example:+Faith- is to -money+ as+Trust- is to -barter+. I'm stuck on a few words. 1)+Priest- is to -Nun+ as+Preacher- is to ? 2)+Regality- is to ?as -state+ is to -community+. 3)+Glory- is to +reputation- as-Fame+ is to ? Thanks |

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 7
(9/24/03 2:56 am)
Reply

Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

I will attempt a completion:

1 contains apples and oranges IMHO. Maybe the BEST answer would be the preachers -Wife+.

2 -Populace+

3 +Recognition-

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 695
(9/24/03 7:34 am)
Reply

Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

Thanks rushdl

1) Yes, this is a difficult one but you unlocked the situation. by chosing wife to go with preacher you highlighted an important point about the role of a true father.

2) I think your choice of populace is a good word. I think I should have put +Regality- with +community- and -State+ with -populace+.

3) -Fame+ to -recognition+ is excellent!

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 9
(9/24/03 11:40 am)
Reply

Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

I though Priest Nun was the most interesting as well. I am pretty sure that Women are excluded in all other religions from everything except worship. Is that correct?

The way th US Gov runs, and has been run for years, I might try this

+Regality- = -government+

-State+ = +influence-

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 697
(9/24/03 6:30 pm)
Reply

 Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

Quote:

---

rushdl:

The way th US Gov runs, and has been run for years, I might try this +Regality- = -government+

---

Yes, I agree.

+Regality- can be seen as the opposite to -Government+ possibly. Depends how we use the word government (Nanny state)?.

True regality allows for the people to govern themselves. Regality only acts as a standard and people understand the values and can more or less live with some self respect, privacy and individuality.

True men like their own space and privacy therefore a group of people under such rulership would enjoy such privileges. A "-Nanny state+" would be the opposite.

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 12
(9/25/03 6:38 am)
Reply

 Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

I thought regality referred to the Monarchy?

Hence a king and queen, royalty, no elections per say, just inherited ownership of the office of King.

This is how I derived that answer.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 698
(9/25/03 9:00 am)
Reply

 Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

Quote:

---

rushdl :
I thought regality referred to the Monarchy?
Hence a king and queen, royalty, no elections per say, just inherited ownership of the office of King.
This is how I derived that answer.

---

This is correct. But not all Monarchs are truly Regal. Regality has a genuine spirituality about it. Some Monarchs are just empty shells, that is why they cannot command any respect and are unsuitable as leaders.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 704
(9/26/03 4:44 pm)
Reply

 Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

+Belief- +faith- +infinite- +life-
-Logic+ -reason+ -absolute+ -death+

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 14
(10/3/03 6:49 am)
Reply

 Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

---

+Belief- +faith- +infinite- +life-

-Logic+ -reason+ -absolute+ -death+

For some reason I don't agree with this one. I am feeling like "seeking" is part of our total worth, the value of man.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 716

(10/3/03 11:48 am)

Reply

 Re: Metaphysics - Word Polarity

Good point rushdl. I would add 'seeker' to the belief word polarity chain.

+Belief- +faith- +infinite- +life- +seeker-
-Logic+ -reason+ -absolute+ -death+ -priest+

Quote:

---

Weininger:

People can be divided into seekers and priests, and there is much to be gained from this division. The seeker searches, the priest informs. The seeker searches above all himself, the priest reveals himself above all to others. The seeker searches his whole life long for himself, for his own soul; the priest's ego is given from the outset as a presupposition of everything else. The seeker is always accompanied by a feeling of imperfection; the priest is convinced of the existence of perfection. The distinction I intend will perhaps be made clearest this way: Only seekers are vain (and sensitive). For vanity arises from the need to find, and from the feeling that one has not yet found – not yet found oneself. The priest is not vain, he does not easily feel hurt, and has no need for external recognition, because this support is not necessary for him. On the other hand, he has a need for fame. The presupposition of the need for fame is his inner self-certainty; it is his nature to present his ego as perfect as possible to others, and thus to connect with them. Fame is thus related to sacrifice.

---

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1537(10/4/03 1:24 pm)Reply |  --- <hr/> And so the priest then really is vain, and in a much uglier way than the seeker. I do not affirm this unpoetic division of character into these two types. Edited by: suergaz at: 10/4/03 8:10 pm |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 718(10/4/03 11:37 pm)Reply     |  --- <hr/> +Vanity- +Attention- +Shame--Fame+ -Recognition+ -Sacrifice+                                                                                                                                              |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 719(10/4/03 11:58 pm)Reply     |  Opposites and Inversions <hr/> I use + and - to represent opposites.What symbols can I use to represent inversions?Thanks                                                                                      |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 721(10/5/03 7:35 pm)Reply      |  Mass is the inverse of spacetime <hr/> Anybody here interested in String Theory?superstringtheory.com/forum/2/738.html                                |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 723(10/5/03 10:42 pm)Reply     |  ----- <hr/> +Energy- +Force- ?-Matter+ -Motion+ ?                                                                                                                                                                 |

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| rushdl  Registered UserPosts: 16(10/11/03 5:34 am)Reply |  Re: Opposites and Inversions <hr/> <math>M=H^{-1}</math> M and H would be the inverse of each other.(That's string theory for Mass = Spacetime<sup>-1</sup>) LOVE = HATE<sup>-1</sup> Edited by: rushdl  at: 10/11/03 5:36 am                                                                                                         |
| G Shantz Registered UserPosts: 403(10/11/03 5:49 am)Reply                                                                               |  -- <hr/> Some words have two opposites.For example: right - left, wrong(didn't know the proper positive and negative symbols) I think 'right' is a synonym for 'truth', which is why the word was given to the side of the brain that is the spacial reasoning side (apparently), which we humans must use to find truth.                                                                                                      |
| DEL Registered UserPosts: 749(10/11/03 7:01 pm)Reply                                                                                    |  right <hr/> Quote: <hr/> G Shantz:I think 'right' is a synonym for 'truth', which is why the word was given to the side of the brain that is the spacial reasoning side (apparently), which we humans must use to find truth. <hr/> Interesting.In universal symbolism 'right' is closely related to the sky as opposed to the earth. I was studying the weather and found out that both the sky and the earth |

have a positive charge. Two positives repel each other. The negative is generated by friction in the clouds. The negative friction creates two kinds of lightning. 'Sheet' which flashes upward and 'fork' which flashes downward to the earth.

The truth has a place somewhere in between the sky and earth.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 620

(10/11/03 11:24 pm)

Reply

Re: right

Fuckin idiot.

Quote:

---

I was studying the weather and found out that both the sky and the earth have a positive charge.

---

They both have positive and negative charges but the earth is normally negatively charged with respect to the atmosphere (or the sky as you call it).

Quote:

---

Two positives repel each other.

---

Ah, so this is what holds the sky up then, LOL.

Quote:

---

The negative is generated by friction in the clouds.

---

Static charge is built up in cumulonimbus clouds. There is both negative and positive generated, the positive charge rises to the top of the cloud with the positively charged lighter ice crystals which rise on the updrafts, the negative charge settles in the mid and lower regions of the cloud with the heavier crystals and larger particles.

Quote:

---

The negative friction creates two kinds of lightning.

---

Negative friction?

The negative static charge at the base of a cloud will draw in the positive charge in the earth and it will accumulate under the cloud. The inevitable discharge between the cloud and the earth can produce many different types of lightning which can be broadly categorised into the umbrella term you used - fork - although fork can also occur within clouds and between clouds. The positive static charge at the top of the cloud can also discharge to the earth in anvil lighting, and within itself as anvil crawlers.

Quote:

---

'Sheet' which flashes upward and 'fork' which flashes downward to the earth.

---

Fork lightning connects upwards. Invisible leader strokes are emitted towards the earth by the clouds and tracers from the earth will be drawn up towards them. When they connect, the electrical charge will flow from the earth to the cloud first. Then the cloud will discharge itself on the return stroke/s.

Sheet lightning doesn't even connect with the earth. It is intracloud lightning meaning that it occurs entirely within one cumulonimbus cloud by jumping between differently charged regions within the cloud.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 751

(10/12/03 4:02 am)

Reply

 Re: right

---

Quote:

---

Dave Toast

Fork lightning connects upwards. Invisible leader strokes are emitted towards the earth by the clouds and tracers from the earth will be drawn up towards them. When they connect, the electrical charge will flow from the earth to the cloud first. Then the cloud will discharge itself on the return stroke/s.

---

"Invisble leader strokes".

Excellent!

Thanks Dave, I'm going to practice these tonight.

---

Quote:

---

Dave Toast

Sheet lightning doesn't even connect with the earth. It is intracloud lightning meaning that it occurs entirely within one cumulonimbus cloud by jumping between differently charged regions within the cloud.

---

Excellent!

And this thread is a fine example.

The spirit has moved you Dave.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mind-blowing concepts

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ontologyRegistered UserPosts: 1(1/15/04 7:36 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                  |  Mind-blowing concepts <hr/> what is the most mind-blowing / profound concept or idea that you have ever come across? |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 613(1/16/04 5:53 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                 |  Re: Mind-blowing concepts <hr/> That all concepts are absolutely untrue.                                           |
| Canadian Zoetrope Registered UserPosts: 18(1/16/04 8:56 am)Reply  |  Concept <hr/> The fact that I am lying.                                                                            |

komodo island
Registered User
Posts: 10
(5/22/04 12:32 pm)
Reply

Re: Concept

---

Mind-blowing concepts are like using a fan to blow away the winds.

And u end up nowhere but a chaos and mess of concepts, at best a typhoon inside a coffee-cup.

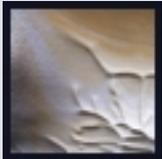

MGregory
Posts: 550
(5/26/04 9:00 am)
Reply

Re: Mind-blowing concepts

---

When I was about 18 or something I read this book called "Kung Fu Meditations" and it really made me think about what God really is. It turned out to be a collection of verses from the Tao Te Ching. It convinced me that God wasn't just some guy in the sky. In college I used to go around talking to people trying to figure out what the Tao is. I couldn't put my finger on it. I thought it was a force or a law or maybe just nothing. I was big on nothing back then. Everything dies and turns back into nothing, so I figured the Tao was the nothing that everything returns to. Then later on I read Kevin Solway's "Poison for the Heart" and he said in there that "Truth is God", and I thought to myself, "yeah, that's it."

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 389
(5/26/04 11:56 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: Mind-blowing concepts

---

Quote:

---

Voce: That all concepts are absolutely untrue.

---

That's mindblowingly illogical, not mindblowingly profound.

MGregory
Posts: 551
(5/26/04 3:49 pm)
Reply

Re: Mind-blowing concepts

---

Then again, I just got a six-pack at 7-11 and discovered that all the bottles are 16 ounces. Pretty mind-blowing.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2646
(5/27/04 1:47 am)
Reply

 ----

---

Nietzsches three :

Will to power

The superhuman

Eternal recurrence

These have always made me think.

ontology
Registered User
Posts: 5
(5/27/04 7:32 pm)
Reply

 mind-blowing concepts

---

god described as 'infinity raised to the power of infinity raised to the power of infinity ad infinitum' time and space has always left me in wonder...apparently 3-dimensional space consists of an infinite number of 2-dimensional spaces in every point of space and time...and theoretically there could be an infinite no. of dimensions...could anyone imagine what would a space consisting of 'infinity raised to the power of infinity raised to the power of infinity ad infinitum' number of dimensions be like?

LolaSuicide
Registered User
Posts: 6
(6/3/04 2:35 am)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Quote:

---

The superhuman

---

Yay! ubermensche! *breaths* ...someone tell me to calm down!

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1711

(6/3/04 11:07 am)

Reply

Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Ok, calm down. Now, what is it you're all excited about?

Dan Rowden

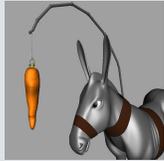

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 665

(6/3/04 3:34 pm)

Reply

Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Re the question

That everything appears to consist of emptiness.

I just don't get it. What I do get though is that it is impossible for anything to be solid, for to appear solid it must consist of parts. If anything was actually solid, say the basic building blocks of energy/matter then it follows that it would appear as emptiness, for it would have no recognisable properties. Something completely solid cannot emit anything. Light for instance is unlikely to reflect from it as light would comparatively be too big and just push the solid to the side.

For this reason I am starting to believe that the universe is made from time and is also completely full of same. That time can be an actual 'physical' (but empty) thing rather than simply an observer's measure of changes in the universes configuration. The strings physicists refer to are overlapping time whirlpools within, outside and across other time whirlpools – time is the only thing that is not matter, except for emptiness and time itself is empty.

Time is something that either exists or doesn't and if it does exist then it exists infinitely. Time is the only thing that is ever created - everything else is just reformation of existing things - therefore time must be infinitely growing. Time lets the universe expand. Time is the only thing that is formless – it has no definable size, no definable properties.

I have yet to work out what would cause time to be chaotic so that it goes from universal form or formlessness (one single type of time across the whole universe) to a chaotic form whereby objects can be created.

unknown
Registered User
Posts: 35
(6/3/04 6:43 pm)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

There is always something better for the observer. it is just varies with observers perspective.

learn more here.

discussionboard.chopra.co...N=1&TPN=96

Ask questions.
Never agree or disagree.

Challenge all humans with question.

How do you know that?
prove it.
is n't your belief?
why do you think you are correct?
who are you cheating with your beliefs? yourself?

peace unknown

rushdl
Registered User
Posts: 51
(6/4/04 8:00 am)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

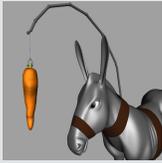

Since none of this stuff is proven, hence a concept, I will go with the proven fact that time slows down for a fast moving object. This is real time travel and the gravity probe B was finally launched to measure these phenomenons. We will find that all this black hole crap, string theory, and all the other highly imaginative theories that try to tie other unproven theories together are a bit like George Bush explaining Iraq. He has no damn idea what is going on, yet still false information keep disceminating from his semi-concious mellon.

So, in order to travel through time into the past, the PAST must have already occurred.....

How would you quantify this form of time travel? (May be the only viable method that will EVER be noticed)

Speed may be the key, fast movement, on a universal scale...

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 671
(6/4/04 1:22 pm)
Reply

Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

How would you quantify this form of time travel?

dunno. I simply don't concern myself about it as the logistics are too extreme. To travel backward in time I would imagine one would need to reconfigure the whole universe so that each speck was in precisely the same location as before. However if time is something other than just a concept it might just be possible using tools that manage speed.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 148
(6/4/04 5:11 pm)
Reply

Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Unknown,

Endless questioning is based on the "ultimate answer" that there are no ultimate answers, but only relative answers. It's inherently illogical, and a cop-out, because it fails to question dissatisfaction (endless questioning as the "ultimate answer").

Dissatisfaction with all answers is preference for one absolute answer - namely, that nothing is absolute. So which is it? No absolutes, or only one absolute? If no absolutes, questions would be pointless. If only one absolute, questions would eventually cease.

AryReisin
Registered User
Posts: 28
(6/5/04 1:33 am)
Reply

Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Quote:

---

If no absolutes, questions would be pointless. If only one absolute, questions would eventually cease.

---

Totally agree. Why ask questions? Suppose the answer says: they will lead to a point. But one could ask: why go anywhere? And on and on: what is to be? What is to last? What is something? What is what? What? What?

The answer remains: all questions and answers are both enunciations. Affirmations.

Example: What color is the moon? There I am already affirming that the moon is, and that it has a color. No matter the answer. All thoughts are enunciations, affirmative ones. Another example: There is nobody here. There I am affirming that empty is there, or comparing that scenario to another (remembered) where there are people and seeing that there is no one (negation of things is affirmation). Another could be: I don't like sweets. In fact I am saying: I dislike sweets. Or I feel rejection to sweets. But never denying, always affirming something.

Edited by: AryReisin at: 6/5/04 1:36 am

Jones Kelly
Posts: 153
(6/5/04 4:40 pm)
Reply

☐ Re: mind-blowing concepts

Ary wrote:

Quote:

---

Why ask questions? Suppose the answer says: they will lead to a point. But one could ask: why go anywhere? And on and on: what is to be? What is to last? What is something? What is what? What? What? The answer remains: all questions and answers are both enunciations. Affirmations.

---

It depends on what you value. If you want to find out the absolute truth, inquiry is essential. Questions create answers, so which questions are the correct ones?

Quote:

---

Example: What color is the moon? There I am already affirming that the moon is, and that it has a color. No matter the answer.

---

Yes, the answer does still matter. Without analysing "colour" and "moon", there is no progress towards truly answering the question. In the same way, the question "what is absolute truth?" has already recognised and discarded relativity and falsehood, and uses those concepts to push further.

Quote:

---

All thoughts are enunciations, affirmative ones. Another example: There is nobody here. There I am affirming that empty is there, or comparing that scenario to another (remembered) where there are people and seeing that there is no one (negation of things is affirmation). Another could be: I don't like sweets. In fact I am saying: I dislike sweets. Or I feel rejection to sweets. But never denying, always affirming something.

---

Denying and affirming are simultaneous. Every concept (positive/affirmative) is created by what it is not (negative), so that the "positive" image of a void depends on its "negative" image of fullness.

Similarly, the process of understanding absolute truth is not just seeking and asking questions, but about finding the genuine questions.

N0X23

Registered User
Posts: 131
(6/6/04 2:18 am)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Quote:

---

but about finding the genuine questions.

---

And those would be what?

Jones Kelly

Posts: 155
(6/6/04 10:45 am)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

That's a good start.

Others might be:

What does causality mean?

What is Ultimate Reality?

What is absolute?

What is logical truth?

What is absolute truth?

What causes consciousness?

How trustworthy is my reasoning?
Am i being completely honest?
What is complete and utter certainty?

and so on...

AryReisin
Registered User
Posts: 30
(6/6/04 12:00 pm)
Reply

 Re: mind-blowing concepts

---

Quote:

---

What does causality mean?
What is Ultimate Reality?
What is absolute?
What is logical truth?
What is absolute truth?
What causes consciousness?
How trustworthy is my reasoning?
Am i being completely honest?
What is complete and utter certainty?
and so on...

---

What IS? What is what? What does it mean to be? How long does IT last? What is now? What means to be? What means to mean? What is to know? What?

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mind-blowing concepts

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ontologyRegistered UserPosts: 6(6/6/04 2:36 pm)Reply |  mind-blowing concepts <hr/> at the risk of being seen as egotistical, any views on my last post? its just that i'm really into stuff like space and time and infinity...do these concepts matter at all in the context of 'ultimate reality'?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1622(6/7/04 1:03 am)Reply               |  mind-blowing concepts <hr/> How did you get into these things? Can you exit the same way you entered? The fact is, reality is infinitely simpler than this.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| ontologyRegistered UserPosts: 7(6/7/04 2:59 am)Reply |  mind-blowing concepts <hr/> i read an article stating how three-dimensional space contains an infinite number of two-dimensional space in every point of space and time...and i've read that logically there could be an infinite number of dimensions....its probably more a matter of probing mind-blowing concepts for its own sake than an authentic attempt in deciphering reality, but i am just fascinated by what space with "infinity raised to the power of infinity ad infinitum" number of dimensions would be like...and i believe that whatever can be imagined does in a certain way exist in 'reality'...hence i was wondering whether any of you have come across these concepts before and whether such concepts are really the tip of the iceberg of 'reality'? will be extremely grateful for any input on this |

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| rushdl  Registered UserPosts: 53(6/8/04 6:24 am)Reply   |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> Stop thinking infinitely.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| cassiopeiae Registered UserPosts: 253(6/8/04 1:21 pm)Reply                                                                               |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> Quote: <hr/> rushdl said:Since none of this stuff is proven, hence a concept, I will go with the proven fact that time slows down for a fast moving object. This is real time travel and the gravity probe B was finally launched to measure these phenomenons. We will find that all this black hole crap, string theory, and all the other highly imaginative theories that try to tie other unproven theories together are a bit like George Bush explaining Iraq. He has no damn idea what is going on, yet still false information keep disceminating from his semi-concious mellon. <hr/> Gravity Probe B is designed to measure how space/time is warped by the Earth, and also the drag of space/time with the Earth's rotation. What is the correlation with this to time slowing down relative to speed...and time travel? |
| rushdl  Registered UserPosts: 55(6/9/04 8:00 am)Reply |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> The way I understand it, where a frame drag occurs, space/time will be folded back upon itself, hence a possible "Timejump zone" of great interest to me. All we get is a "proof" that einstein was right! Bout damn time we spent some money on this.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

|                                                                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 254(6/9/04 8:12 am)Reply                                                                             |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> Hmm...I have yet to run into that theory. I have been mostly reading Dr. Kaku's take on any type of experimentation such as this...it's worth more research though, I think... I agree it is about time to prove whether or not Einstein was correct. It is a theory long past due for closure (either way it goes) IMO.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| rushdl Registered UserPosts: 56(6/9/04 9:26 am)Reply |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> Cass I admit spacetime might not work like that, and it is my own basic theory on how time travel or actual time differential occurs in real nature (Milliseconds/week). I think, As soon as we figure out how and where in nature this stuff occurs, the sooner we can exploit it somehow. If we cannot find it in nature, I would contend it is impossible to do. I keep reminding myself that this is tangible stuff no longer the realm of Isaac Asimov or Carl Sagan. Hawking kinda makes me sick...Like the Government entity in Science. edit:The 400 Mile mark seems to be the currently observed threshold (altitude of the sats) where this could occur. Edited by: rushdl  at: 6/9/04 9:30 am                                |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 255(6/9/04 12:21 pm)Reply                                                                            |  Re: mind-blowing concepts <hr/> Interesting... Yes, the has-beens are out of this realm of thinking, I think :-). There are a handful of "fringe" scientists that think 19.5deg (declination in either direction) is a hotspot for dimensional energy. They relate it to all of the planets and celestial bodies being in line with the entire galaxy on a type of axis. Is an interesting thought, but I don't know much about it. There was an experiment a loooong time ago involving an Italian (I think) satellite that was tethered to a rocket or shuttle by a metallic "thread"... long story short, the energy that was applied to it in space was something like 10000 times what the scientists had predicted due to the gyration of the metal cord...anyway, cord broke, baffled scientists and they shoved the question in a closet never to be touched again. |

It's amazing what we could find out from this :-)

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 123(11/22/03 11:21 am)Reply | Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation <hr/> Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation Humans are incredibly adept at mental projection, and particularly so at developing a mental model of what other people might be thinking during interactions. This is a result of their capacity for abstract thought, and the more developed the individuals ability to engage in focused abstract thought, the more developed will be their models. Since people develop this technique from early childhood, it becomes automatic and habitual, they do it so naturally that there is no perceptible shift between their focus on their 'own' thought processes and experiences, versus their imagining of others thoughts. Unfortunately, this maintains and reinforces their ignorance of the truth of the matter, certainly, they are rarely fully aware of the inherent limitations of these projections. So whilst this practise would seem of obvious benefit to communication, certainly in our current society, it has many drawbacks. The first and fundamental mistake is that people hold it to be certain that other people are conscious, despite the fact that we do not and in fact cannot experience any consciousness other than our own. We can never be sure that our experience of people is representative of anything more than what it is we directly experience. All we can be certain about is what we experience in our mind before we project anything onto it (unless we are | projecting logical truths). People, or any image for that matter, could just be an implanted alien computer program for all we know. We can only reason that people are likely to be conscious, based on our experiences, and thus hold it as a tentative assumption that they are.

Another obvious mistake is that people often think that they are right about certain aspects of another's thoughts. How many people are disappointed when someone else acts contrary to what they thought they would?

Sarah: "I thought you were going to pick up Johnny from school?!"

Peter: "No, I never had the intention, what made you think I did?"

Sarah: "You knew I was going to aerobics this afternoon..!"

For those people that want to become enlightened, full attention needs to be paid to the nature of one's thoughts. Not a single moment can be left to whimsy. If one is constantly creating mental constructs of what the people around them might be thinking (which are usually highly deluded thoughts), one is constantly experiencing deluded thoughts - of their own creation! A sure way to compromise further growth. Additionally, this becomes more and more potent as one develops and exercises one's capacity for abstract thought. Imagine walking through a crowded street with one's mind constantly and actively creating imaginary constructs of what the people around them might be thinking, all for little or no benefit. I should point out that I am not arguing against one's development of characterisation, I am arguing for the conscious application of it as appropriate to one's reason or purpose.

In summary, I am suggesting that people become aware of the nature of their projections such that they use them as a tool as required. One needs to be constantly attentive to one's understanding of Truth, so that it can permeate to a point where it becomes a given, a natural projection onto all of one's experiences.

Rhett

1TheMaster
Registered User
Posts: 182
(11/22/03 12:34 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Interesting.

The subject of projection is one I have been exploring and devoting a lot of thought to recently. It seems to be a "human" characteristic, for the many, to literally project what they wish to say to themselves, onto others.

In one sense it is a noble action, in that the projector is seeking a resonance, a feedback. The projector, currently lacking the capacity to self-reflect, seeks out the projectee who is likely to provide a truthful, resonating answer, without being threatening or damaging to the ego, Thus providing a small window of growth, in tandem with the life changes that person is currently going through. The unwise seek out and use the wiser when a problem needs solving in their personal life, but the parameters are tight, only what is needed will be taken, then the wise one is pushed aside, for physical and mental change is a slow process, the wise ones' words hold the capacity to cause existential dilemmas in the life of the fools.

The idea that people assume consciousness of others is not accurate, in my opinion. The concept of consciousness is not something that ever occurs to, lets say, 98% of people. They just are conscious (acting on auto-pilot), by default. The introspection level doesn't occur. In a sense, they assume others hold a similar level of values, being involved in the humanistic set of values they have absorbed, and they would be right in most cases.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1279
(11/22/03 2:11 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Rhett wrote,

Quote:

---

The first and fundamental mistake is that people hold it to be certain that other people are conscious...

---

Then why attempt a transmission of Mind? In fact, some percentage is conscious, thus the value in wise sages. The Truth slowly propagates itself. We are still at the beginning stages.

Quote:

---

Another obvious mistake is that people often think that they are right about certain aspects of another's thoughts..

---

I agree on the level of inaccuracy in this practice, but I don't support the total abolition of it, because intuition for the conscious is a relevant indicator for Truth. It has proven its merit through select individuals.

Quote:

---

For those people that want to become enlightened, full attention needs to be paid to the nature of one's thoughts. Not a single moment can be left to whimsy. If one is constantly creating mental constructs of what the people around them might be thinking (which are usually highly deluded thoughts), one is constantly experiencing deluded thoughts - of their own creation!

---

Yet awareness of this very fact can influence the importance placed on other's deluded perceptions. There is no flaw in awareness of another's POV, merely the emotional acceptance of that POV.

Therefore, slight lapses per individual are ultimately irrelevant. The Truth awaits acceptance patiently.

Tharan

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 125

(11/23/03 12:49 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

The subject of projection is one I have been exploring and devoting a lot of thought to recently. It seems to be a "human" characteristic, for the many, to literally project what they wish to say to themselves, onto others.

People that have a conventional psychological mindset (egotistical) often project onto others that which they wish to avoid in themselves. For example, if they themselves are lying - but don't want to admit it to themselves, they project it onto the other person, they try to convince themselves that it is the other person that is actually lying. This may or may not involve calling the other person a liar.

In one sense it is a noble action, in that the projector is seeking a resonance, a feedback.

Feedback usually relates to both an incomplete understanding of a situation (one is simply seeking another's opinion/affirmation) and the incomplete nature of most people's thoughts (henids). The latter can be considered a characteristic of feminine mindedness.

The projector, currently lacking the capacity to self-reflect, seeks out the projectee who is likely to provide a truthful, resonating answer, without being threatening or damaging to the ego, thus providing a small window of growth, in tandem with the life changes that person is currently going through. The unwise seek out and use the wiser when a problem needs solving in their personal life, but the parameters are tight, only what is needed will be taken, then the wise one is pushed aside, for physical and mental change is a slow process, the wise ones' words hold the capacity to cause existential dilemmas in the life of the fools.

The trick is to give them as much as one thinks they can handle, which is usually far more than they would wish upon themselves.

The idea that people assume consciousness of others is not accurate, in my opinion. The concept of consciousness is not something that ever occurs to, let's say, 98% of people. They just are conscious (acting on auto-pilot), by default. The introspection level doesn't occur. In a sense, they assume others hold a similar level of values, being involved in the humanistic set of values they have absorbed, and they would be right in most cases.

I spent most of my life projecting my level of consciousness onto other people, and tried to ignore the discrepancies. I so much wanted them to be able to think better, and did my best to foster it. And here i am still doing that.

It's so hard for those few conscious people to face the evidence of human unconsciousness, the world becomes so much bleaker and lonelier for them.

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 127
(11/23/03 1:25 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

-----
The first and fundamental mistake is that people hold it to be certain that other people are conscious...
-----

Then why attempt a transmission of Mind? In fact, some percentage is conscious, thus the value in wise sages. The Truth slowly propagates itself. We are still at the beginning stages.

I was referring to consciousness in any sense, not just elevated levels of abstract consciousness. One attempts transmission of mind for a variety of reasons, and based on one's reasoning that they are likely to be conscious (in at least some sense).

My piece was about all contact one has with humans, not just those of a philosophic nature.

-----
Another obvious mistake is that people often think that they are right about certain aspects of anothers thoughts..
-----

I agree on the level of innacuracy in this practice, but I don't support the total abolition of it, because intuition for the conscious is a relevant indicator for Truth. It has proven it's merit through select individuals.

I certainly did not advocate the abolition of it.

I am not sure what you are getting at when you say "...intuition for the conscious is a relevant indicator for Truth."

-----
For those people that want to become enlightened, full attention needs to be paid to the nature of one's thoughts. Not a single moment can be left to whimsy. If one is constantly creating mental constructs of what the people around them might be thinking (which are usually highly deluded thoughts), one is constantly experiencing deluded thoughts - of their own creation!

-----

Yet awareness of this very fact can influence the importance placed other's deluded perceptions. There is no flaw in awareness of another's POV, merely the emotional acceptance of that POV.

Therefore, slight lapses per individual are ultimately irrelevant. The Truth awaits acceptance patiently.

Tharan

This piece is most appropriate to someone that is quite advanced towards enlightenment. By that time one's conception of the nature of others thoughts is largely irrelevant to one's own journey, and one is being very careful about the nature of their interactions with other seekers. If any teaching is undertaken, it should be directed within themselves, not towards others.

References to 'patience' are usually an excuse for mediocrity.

Rhett

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1281
(11/23/03 3:13 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Impatience is also a sign of mediocrity.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 300
(11/23/03 3:47 pm)
Reply

Rhett Hamilton

---

Patience, impatience, whatever.
Rhett Hamilton is a loveless robot.

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 129(11/24/03 11:36 am)Reply | Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation <hr/> Impatience is also a sign of mediocrity. Depends on your definition. 1. Not patient; not bearing pain, opposition, etc., calmly. Mediocre. 2. Showing lack of patience. Depends whether you are actually impatient or putting on an act, and whether you are acting for good reason or not. 3. Restless in desire or expectation; not bearing or enduring; eagerly wanting (to do something). The former two are mediocre, whereas the latter is highly praiseworthy in most circumstances. Rhett |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 304(11/24/03 11:44 am)Reply           | Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation <hr/> You sure are good with words, Rhett. Wow.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1778(11/24/03 1:28 pm)Reply        | ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The first and fundamental mistake is that people hold it to be certain that other people are conscious, despite the fact that we do not and in fact cannot experience any consciousness other than our own. <hr/> Yes, but why a mistake? It is not despite the fact, but because of it!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

Quote:

---

We can never be sure that our experience of people is representative of anything more than what it is we directly experience.

---

You dismiss the creative nature of a decisive will.

Quote:

---

All we can be certain about is what we experience in our mind before we project anything onto it (unless we are projecting logical truths). People, or any image for that matter, could just be an implanted alien computer program for all we know.

---

Take knowledge upon yourself Rhett, seriously, you'll see much more clearly!

You are becoming lost in definitions of consciousness! It is as though you are overwhelmed by the fact of there being a limit to its degrees!

Edited by: suergaz at: 11/24/03 1:31 pm

Kellyven

Registered User

Posts: 1

(11/29/03 11:54 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Quote [rhett]:

"In summary, I am suggesting that people become aware of the nature of their projections such that they use them as a tool as required. One needs to be constantly attentive to one's understanding of Truth, so that it can permeate to a point where is [sic] becomes a given, a natural projection onto all of one's experiences."

When one's understanding of Truth is a natural projection, one is naturally deluded - and yet aware of it.

Abstract thinking (as described by rhett, ie a tool to understand Truth and project it onto all experiences) is the linear assembly of memories, which could be of sounded words or images. It is possible that a dog can think abstractly in as far as it knows [eg what is a curtain blowing in the wind] without having to investigate: it remembers.

However, a dog may not conceive of this event in the same functional way as I have described abstract thinking: perhaps it abstractly labels the material appearance and action, but probably does not perceive the something as really "nothing" as an enlightened being may - or as so many "things" that the single entity can hardly be described.

Because there are so many "things" (on which to project memories) and so many ways to "describe/memorise" them, it follows that language (perception:Truth projection) creates "things". Distinguishing and "compartmentalising" is not realising but rather describing by duplicating, measuring and ascribing function.

In reality, reality is -----; again a memory assemblage in which discrimination affects and influences perception.

I am not sure why rhett is confident that language can be so perfect a tool for attaining perfect understanding of Truth ["word and sentence consciousness"]. Abstract thinking that is based on memories is still not representing reality truthfully - and all abstract thinking within the "well of causes" that is the mind is based on memories.

It is possible to think without memories, if thinking is not the manipulation of memories but of undiscriminated "----" [like "concept" but conceptless, ie non-concrete and nondescriptive in the sense that it is not a representative symbol but is the nature of "---" itself, ie bypassing language].

The ability to perceive the non-material world that is the material world in reality (which is usually labelled) is based on manipulating these "----".

Kellyven

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 150
(12/3/03 9:46 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Quote [rhett]:

"In summary, I am suggesting that people become aware of the nature of their projections such that they use them as a tool as required. One needs to be constantly attentive to one's understanding of Truth, so that it can permeate to a point where is [sic] becomes a given, a natural projection onto all of one's experiences."

When one's understanding of Truth is a natural projection, one is naturally deluded - and yet aware of it.

No. There is no delusion during enlightenment. Freedom from delusion is in fact is the very definition of enlightenment.

Abstract thinking (as described by rhett , ie a tool to understand Truth and project it onto all experiences) is the linear assembly of memories, which could be of sounded words or images. It is possible that a dog can think abstractly in as far as it knows [eg what is a curtain blowing in the wind] without having to investigate: it remembers.

What good would a "linear assembly of memories" do? What are "sounded words"?

However, a dog may not conceive of this event in the same functional way as i have described abstract thinking: perhaps it abstractly labels the material appearance and action, but probably does not percieve the something as really "nothing" as an enlightened being may - or as so many "things" that the single entity can hardly be described.

The enlightened person would experience a seemingly real 'curtain' in exactly the same way as any other person. They would not, however, project a plethora of deluded concepts onto it.

Reality is not a conglomerate of multitudes of things as you suggest. The mind is the creator of all things, so there is only a multitude of things in the case that it creates 'a multitude of things'.

Because there are so many "things" (on which to project memories) and so many ways to "describe/memorise" them, it follows that language (perception: Truth projection) creates "things".

Regardless of the content, this seems a rather spurious line of reasoning...

Distinguishing and "compartmentalising" is not realising but rather describing by duplicating, measuring and ascribing function.

The former need not involve the latter.

In reality, reality is -----; again a memory assemblage in which discrimination affects and influences perception.

I am not sure what to do with this "-----" of yours.

I am not sure why rhett is confident that language can be so perfect a tool for attaining perfect understanding of Truth ["word and sentence consciousness"].

What else could we use? Without language there cannot be delusion, or truth, or understanding, or in fact anything at all. All things are built with language. Thus, language is necessarily the tool with which we attain understanding.

Abstract thinking that is based on memories is still not representing reality truthfully - and all abstract thinking within the "well of causes" that is the mind is based on memories.

Thinking, which is necessarily abstract, is a part of our reality, and is thus real within itself. It can only ever represent other experiences, and thus, is not the truth of them. Quite simply, it is not them.

In what sense do you say that all thinking is based (reliant?) on memories?

It is possible to think without memories, if thinking is not the manipulation of memories but of undiscriminated "----" [like "concept" but conceptless, ie non-concrete and nondescriptive in the sense that it is not a representative symbol but is the nature of "---" itself, ie bypassing language].

The ability to perceive the non-material world that is the material world in reality (which is usually labelled) is based on manipulating these "----".

It is impossible to think in the way we do without using language, ie. language is the vehicle of concepts. A 'memory' is just a label that we apply to an experience of consciousness that pertains to a previous experience of consciousness. There is no fundamental difference between a memory and any other experience, their nature is exactly the same, every experience is an experience of the moment.

Rhett

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 10
(12/3/03 12:09 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Rhett,

What Truth? How do we come to envelop a, "mindfulness", a "sense of self"?

Sartre noted infamously that "hell is other people". Not, of course, in a circumstantial sense but, even more crucially, in an ontological one: they objectify us. They see us not as WE are but as THEY are. Even more problematically, as they THINK we are. And we, them.

In my view, however, Sartre blinked. He blinked because he did not apply the same analysis to "I".

What is human identity, after all? How is it we come to be "mindful of" of this rather than that?

Human identity, in my view, is analogous to peeling away the layers of the onion. We find that is all there is---the layers themselves. Similarly, respecting a sense of self.

On the day we are born, for example, we are thrust adventiously into an agglomeration of circumstantial contexts we had absolutely no choice about:

- *our historical era
- *our cultural/ethnological parameters and nationality
- *our political economy

- *our social and religious institutions
- *our family [rich, poor, working class, middle class, upper class, healthy, dysfunctional etc etc]
- *our community
- *our gender, race and ethnicity
- *our biological and psychological predispositions
- *our congenital IQ
- *our congenital health---the good the bad and the ugly
- *our childhood traumas
- *et cetera

At the same time for the first 10 to 12 years of our lives we are profoundly indoctrinated by all that is "other" to view the world just as they do. Our brains are hard-wired not only in terms of "what things mean" but also regarding the emotional and psychological parameters that project the manner in which we interact in it, as well.

In fact, the overwhelming preponderance of folks around the globe will literally go to the grave barely putting a dent in Who I Am, right?

There is no "nature" to become aware of. Individual autonomy is largely a self-delusion because the "self" is, in turn. It is merely how a particular "mind's eye" puts all of the existential variables together to form each new existential layer. And the only thing that stays the same, of course, is that, with each new day, we acquire new experiences and new relationships and new ideas that then have to be integrated in with all of the old ones. Again, all it takes, however, is one traumatic circumstantial landslide to turn Who I Am into who am I? Think of those folks before and after they were sent to the Nazi concentration camps.

The illusion of Self is often sustained, however, because from day to day our lives are usually incremental. The changes occur but in slow motion. It is only when we think back 5 years ago...10 years ago...20 years ago...40 years ago, that most can see how dramatically they have changed...how they perceive things very differently. So, then they have to delude themselves further by rationalizing it: "yes, I have changed significantly over the years, but that is only because I have been getting wiser and going in the direction of of My True Self.

And then we die and for eternity are nothing at all.

So, how would we go about "characterizing" that?

Biggie

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1850

(12/3/03 12:21 pm)

Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

The illusion of Self is often sustained, however, because from day to day our lives are usually incremental. The changes occur but in slow motion. It is only when we think back 5 years ago...10 years ago...20 years ago...40 years ago, that most can see how dramatically they have changed... how they perceive things very differently. So, then they have to delude themselves further by rationalizing it: "yes, I have changed significantly over the years, but that is only because I have been getting wiser and going in the direction of of My True Self."

---

There is no illusion of self, a conceptual stasis of self alone is illusory.

Quote:

---

And then we die and for eternity are nothing at all.

So, how would we go about "characterizing" that?

---

No biggie! We die and are nothing at all, yes, but being nothing at all is only a part of the eternity we are!

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 11
(12/4/03 4:56 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Suergaz,

I would say, "huh?" but why dignify it anymore than I have to, eh?

Just joshing, of course, but I am curious as to how we would go about recognizing a "conceptual stasis of self" when we saw it. Can you give us a specific example of when you last saw yours?

As for being nothing at all for eternity reflecting just a part of who we are "in" eternity I wonder, compared to the 70 odd years we are now allotted before oblivion, is it better or worse? For example, the part after we die, is there great food, sublime music, passionate relationships, sex to..uh...die for?

Of course, I might be completely misunderstanding your point/ Or IS that the point, itself? ; )

Biggie

Edited by: Biggier at: 12/4/03 4:58 am

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1865
(12/4/03 11:29 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Suergaz,

I would say, "huh?" but why dignify it anymore than I have to, eh?

---

huh?!

Quote:

---

Just joshing, of course, but I am curious as to how we would go about recognizing a "conceptual stasis of self" when we saw it. Can you give us a specific example of when you last saw yours?

---

No-one really can have a conceptual stasis of self, that is why it is as illusory as a stasis of self. One can of course try to have one, for example:-- "Ultimate Reality"

Quote:

---

As for being nothing at all for eternity reflecting just a part of who we are "in" eternity I wonder, compared to the 70 odd years we are now allotted before oblivion, is it better or worse? For example, the part after we die, is there great food, sublime music, passionate relationships, sex to..uh... die for?

---

Can you really compare them?! What is nothing at all after all?! Yes there are those things after we die, not for us, and not for us to die for either! One dies for the whole set of things that makes up ones life! It doesn't even have to occur consciously. I'm sure you know that to really live is really to live for the future! (People generally try to unopen the present) --- Eternity wants everything.

Quote:

---

Of course, I might be completely misunderstanding your point/ Or IS that the point, itself? ; )

---

(:D) You might be? Are you or aren't you?

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 152

(12/4/03 12:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Biggier,

What Truth?

The Truth i am trying to lead you to understand.

How do we come to envelop a, "mindfulness", a "sense of self"?

I am by no means advocating the strengthening of the false notion of an inherently existent self. The basic function of mind is to differentiate, and thus, in most cases it sees reason to differentiate self from not-self. It is a worthwhile and necessary endeavour, but it is important to realise that it is just a construct.

Sartre noted infamously that "hell is other people". Not, of course, in a circumstantial sense but, even more crucially, in an ontological one: they objectify us. They see us not as WE are but as THEY are. Even more problematically, as they THINK we are. And we, them.

Sure, but what are you advocating here? The end of generalisations?

In my view, however, Sartre blinked. He blinked because he did not apply the same analysis to "I".

What is human identity, after all? How is it we come to be "mindful of" of this rather than that?

Because of the basic nature of mind - the differentiation/creation of things (A=A).

Human identity, in my view, is analogous to peeling away the layers of the onion. We find that is all there is---the layers themselves. Similarly, respecting a sense of self.

No. There are not even layers. The mind is the creator of all that a person is.

On the day we are born, for example, we are thrust adventiously into an agglomeration of circumstantial contexts we had absolutely no choice about:

**our historical era*

**our cultural/ethnological parameters and nationality*

**our political economy*
**our social and religious institutions*
**our family [rich, poor, working class, middle class, upper class, healthy, dysfunctional etc etc]*
**our community*
**our gender, race and ethnicity*
**our biological and psychological predispositions*
**our congenital IQ*
**our congenital health---the good the bad and the ugly*
**our childhood traumas*
**et cetera*

I understand your point, but I thought you were of the belief that we aren't actually born, because we don't exist..?

At the same time for the first 10 to 12 years of our lives we are profoundly indoctrinated by all that is "other" to view the world just as they do. Our brains are hard-wired not only in terms of "what things mean" but also regarding the emotional and psychological parameters that project the manner in which we interact in it, as well.

I agree, but the wiring isn't totally hard, otherwise enlightenment would not be possible, and i can vouch that it is.

In fact, the overwhelming preponderance of folks around the globe will literally go to the grave barely putting a dent in Who I Am, right?

Yes, the Truth is seldom known...

There is no "nature" to become aware of.

If so, why do you go on in an attempt to describe it? Since i know i am having experiences, those experiences must have a nature.

Individual autonomy is largely a self-delusion because the "self" is, in turn. It is merely how a particular "mind's eye" puts all of the existential variables together to form each new existential layer. And the only thing that stays the same, of course, is that, with each new day, we acquire new experiences and new relationships and new ideas that then have to be integrated in with all of the old ones. Again, all it takes, however, is one traumatic circumstantial landslide to turn Who I Am into who am I? Think of those folks before and after they were sent to the Nazi concentration camps.

Yes, despite people attempts to ground their ego, circumstances can unseat

it. Unfortunately, it soon re-asserts itself.

The illusion of Self is often sustained, however, because from day to day our lives are usually incremental. The changes occur but in slow motion. It is only when we think back 5 years ago...10 years ago...20 years ago...40 years ago, that most can see how dramatically they have changed...how they perceive things very differently. So, then they have to delude themselves further by rationalizing it: "yes, I have changed significantly over the years, but that is only because I have been getting wiser and going in the direction of of My True Self.

And then we die and for eternity are nothing at all.

Can you not see the contradiction in what you are saying here? For you to even make the statement affirms that you are having experiences and are thus not nothing. If you want to define your experiences as nothing - go ahead, but i won't agree with it one bit.

So, how would we go about "characterizing" that?

Just as i have done.

Rhett

Kellyven
Registered User
Posts: 2
(12/4/03 3:23 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

HTML Comments are not allowed

Kellyven
Registered User
Posts: 3
(12/4/03 3:58 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

kv2: apology for previous mis-post. symbols regarded by the forum robot as html code were rejected: linguistic interpretations... The symbol was three hyphens followed by a R-pointing html tag; hyphens were consequently replaced with = symbols.

kv1 [quote Rhett]:

"In summary, I am suggesting that people become aware of the nature of their projections such that they use them as a tool as required. One needs to be constantly attentive to one's understanding of Truth, so that it can permeate to a point where is [sic] becomes a given, a natural projection onto all of one's experiences."

When one's understanding of Truth is a natural projection, one is naturally deluded - and yet aware of it.

R:No. There is no delusion during enlightenment. Freedom from delusion is in fact is the very definition of enlightenment.

kv2: i apprehend the nature of enlightened perception of reality to be independent of projections. If projections impose interpretations onto "appearances to mind" (ie "all one's experiences"), they are not "natural" but constant re-programming. If this use of interpretations is the means to apprehending reality, it is possible to think that reality does not exist – except as a concept generated by language. English is especially notorious for its dualisms (subject-object), physico-materialistic communication (verb-noun), and the interrogatives (what, who, why, how...). In addition, the "being" verb that exists of course in many other languages generates the "is" and "am" and "are" and "exist" and "what is" and "real"... Depending on language to define the nature of enlightenment (not as communication to others but as parameters for enlightenment) leads one to question this "Reality".

To "understand the nature of Reality" (not the "-----" reality to be discussed below in greater detail) is practically equivalent to understanding the nature of perception. What is perceived determines what exists – namely anything a sentient being is conscious of. Nothing exists apart from what is perceived – even an imaginary thing exists (as an imaginary thing in someone's consciousness) when it is perceived. Therefore Reality is no more than (generally speaking) the limits of anthropocentric perception.

Existence may be Reality: the anthropocentric "belief" in the undeniability of what is perceived to be "real". Reality is actually a label for delusions ==> since nothing exists apart from what is perceived, and human perception has evolved to concentrate on human perception as the verifier for what exists, therefore what exists for humans ("Reality") is merely discrimination (something vs. nothing).

Therefore it is impossible to say that "in reality, nothing truly exists apart from what is perceived", since "what is reality", but "perception" or "appearances to mind"... i think it is possible to perceive without accepting the concept of an inherently existing Reality (ie reality).
Absence of this concept (that reality exists) could be enlightening...
Therefore i agree with your statement, absence of delusion = enlightenment.

kv1: Abstract thinking (as described by rhett, ie a tool to understand Truth and project it onto all experiences) is the linear assembly of memories, which could be of sounded words or images. It is possible that a dog can think abstractly in as far as it knows [eg what is a curtain blowing in the wind] without having to investigate: it remembers.

R:What good would a "linear assembly of memories" do? What are "sounded words"?

kv2: Consciously or not, assembling memories typifies deductive logic. One memory is caused by another, ad originem (or to the causal memories before that).

Instead of linear, perhaps "multi-linear" would have better described the causality of memory returnings. Sounded words are another way of describing memory-thoughts when they are articulated in a language: do words and sentences form in your mind without you actually "hearing" the words in your mind? Are they appearing as written images instead? A tentative example: the dog memory of the spoken word "ball" and the mental image of a ball (and memories of games etc.) even though it cannot speak the words itself.

kv1: However, a dog may not conceive of this event in the same functional way as i have described abstract thinking: perhaps it abstractly labels the material appearance and action, but probably does not perceive the something as really "nothing" as an enlightened being may - or as so many "things" that the single entity can hardly be described.

R:The enlightened person would experience a seemingly real 'curtain' in exactly the same way as any other person. They would not, however, project a plethora of deluded concepts onto it.

kv2: What is "experience"? What do you think exactly is the "curtain appearance to mind"? Projected concepts?

R: Reality is not a conglomerate of multitudes of things as you suggest. The mind is the creator of all things, so there is only a multitude of things in the case that it creates 'a multitude of things'.

kv2: See above (nature of Reality = nature of perception)/

kv1: Because there are so many "things" (on which to project memories) and so many ways to "describe / memorise" them, it follows that language (perception: Truth projection) creates "things".

R: Regardless of the content, this seems a rather spurious line of reasoning...

kv2: See above (English). Even Truth is a thing.

kv1: Distinguishing and "compartmentalising" is not realising but rather describing by duplicating, measuring and ascribing function.

R: The former need not involve the latter.

kv2: ? explanation

kv1: In reality, reality is -----; again a memory assemblage in which discrimination affects and influences perception.

R: I am not sure what to do with this "-----" of yours.

kv2: i have nothing with which to help you. perhaps try this:
Before a conscious being accumulates memories that associate experiences with signifiers, what do they have? Non-memory-generating experiences that are "received" by a signifier-free perception would not be discriminatory, and would not compartmentalise – it would simply not have "things". If a true reality (apart from "understanding") exists, then perhaps this is it. i would not equate this with rhett's description of the state of abstraction – ie. animism or enlightenment (two extremes) – in which appearances to mind are abstracted, but rather a state of abstraction in which the conscious being is not drawing on separatist definitions.

kv1: I am not sure why rhett is confident that language can be so perfect a tool for attaining perfect understanding of Truth ["word and sentence consciousness"].

R: What else could we use? Without language there cannot be delusion, or truth, or understanding, or in fact anything at all. All things are built with language. Thus, language is necessarily the tool with which we attain understanding.

kv2: That is, projection-delusions (linguistic or pictorial) are interrogated by the previously deluded person; understanding of the Nature of Perception (or Reality) is thereby attained. Interrogation is linguistic: it means asking “what” and “why” etc. So enlightenment for such people is simply removal of linguistic delusions. I am tentatively suggesting that understanding can be attained which moves beyond this stage.

kv1: Abstract thinking that is based on memories is still not representing reality truthfully - and all abstract thinking within the "well of causes" that is the mind is based on memories.

R: Thinking, which is necessarily abstract, is a part of our reality, and is thus real within itself. It can only ever represent other experiences, and thus, is not the truth of them. Quite simply, it is not them.

In what sense do you say that all thinking is based (reliant?) on memories?

kv2: Every “appearance to mind” that is abstracted after the initial conceptless, projection-free perception is a memory.

kv1: It is possible to think without memories, if thinking is not the manipulation of memories but of undiscriminated "----" [like "concept" but conceptless, ie non-concrete and nondescriptive in the sense that it is not a representative symbol but is the nature of "----" itself, ie bypassing language].

The ability to perceive the non-material world that is the material world in reality (which is usually labelled) is based on manipulating these "----".

R: It is impossible to think in the way we do without using language, ie. language is the vehicle of concepts. A 'memory' is just a label that we apply to an experience of consciousness that pertains to a previous experience of consciousness. There is no fundamental difference between a memory and any other experience, their nature is exactly the same, every experience is an experience of the moment.

kv2: The memory is experienced as another “appearance to mind”. However, a memory (previous experience of consciousness) has been through a linguistic filter, abstracted and projected upon, and experienced within the mind’s “well of causes”. This is unlike the experience of a conceptless perception (“----“), where although memories may be concurrently generated, there is no projection. There is however a strong impulse for egotistic separation to alter this receptivity into discrimination. A habit of language perhaps. Similarly, the habit of English constrains me to choose a “wordless” symbol to describe a non-concrete reality, to represent a non-materialistic and even non-abstract (in the sense that it exists as perceived prior to abstraction) entity. it is still being explored in my consciousness – and is connected to analysing the habit of conceptualising.

Rhett
kv

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 12
(12/5/03 5:41 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Rhett,

I should warn you that Truth Tellers have painting yellow brink roads for me over many years. And, in the end, I am always the one who ends pulling back the curtain to expose the Wizard.

But, hey, all I can ask is that someone give me their best arguments, right?

The only way the mind can differeniate today is by learning to grasp the manner in which it learned to diferentiate yesterday and the day before. And then in acknowledging that, sooner or later, it will be vanquished for all time to come: in death and oblivion.

I surely understand the need for generalizartions and concepts and theories and definitions. I just suggest the mind enconmpassing and expressing them must learsn to situate them existentially and, in turn, must be prepared to admit that, respecting humns moral and politcial interactions, most generalizations---Marxism, Humanism, Anarchism, Libertarianism, Fascism, Objectivism, Empiricism, Rationalism, Naturalism, Idealism etc---are intellectual bullshit.

A = A? ARE you an Objectivist? Well, all

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 13

(12/5/03 6:05 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Rhett,

I have no idea how the post above materialized in here. As I note below, I was typing it when suddenly this ezboard message popped up. When I arrowed back [hoping to find the post above] there was just a blank message board. I thought it was gone forever. So, I rewrote it again below. Sorry for the confusion.

Right in the middle of my post I get this "Post Flood..." message from EzBoards. And then "they" wiped out my post. What the hell kind of crap is that? Does it happen often in here?

I'll try again:

Over the years many Truth Tellers have tried to paint me one or another "metaphysical" yellow brick road. But in the end, I am always the one pulling back the curtain to expose the Wizard.

The mind differentiates today only because of how it learned to differentiate yesterday and the day before. And the year before and the decade before. And not a single solitary mind that has ever differentiated has [to the best of my knowledge] ever managed to take those differentiations with them to the grave.

A = A? Are you per chance an Objectivist? If so all I can say is this: welcome to hell!! ; )

The mind is the creation of evolution not the other way around. And what is behind THAT creation we may never know.

And if the mind is embedded/situated in all of those circumstantial contexts I noted how does it really go about equating A with A except as a prejudice? For example, how would a particular mind situate the aborting of a human fetus in a rational moral context when it has been subjected from the day it was born with points of view from dozens of conflicting and contradictory vantage points? How does it know which is the Most Rational point of all? How does it demonstrate it essentially and objectively? It can't, of course.

I don't say we do not exist!! I say the existence of a human mind is very, very different from the existence of a rock or a tree or a mountain. It is not a mindless "thing". It is, instead, a mediator of relationships that are more [re natural science] or less [re social science and moral philosophy] objective.

Rhett, you know full well that I am not defining my experiences as "nothing". That is only what you wish to convince others that I am doing.

You will fail.

biggie

Edited by: Biggier at: 12/5/03 6:12 am

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 157(12/6/03 10:35 am)Reply | Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation <hr/> To kelly, kv1 [quote Rhett]:"In summary, I am suggesting that people become aware of the nature of their projections such that they use them as a tool as required. One needs to be constantly attentive to one's understanding of Truth, so that it can permeate to a point where it becomes a given, a natural projection onto all of one's experiences." Kelly: When one's understanding of Truth is a natural projection, one is naturally deluded - and yet aware of it. R: No. There is no delusion during enlightenment. Freedom from delusion is in fact is the very definition of enlightenment. kv2: i apprehend the nature of enlightened perception of reality to be independent of projections. If projections impose interpretations onto "appearances to mind" (ie "all one's experiences"), they are not "natural" but constant re-programming. Rhett: Regarding my statements which you have quoted above, it is so often the case that people think that they can just hop straight into |

enlightenment by learning about the enlightened mindset. They don't focus on the path to enlightenment, which necessarily involves understanding the nature of Ultimate Reality. This is particularly the case because as soon as people try to focus on Ultimate Reality their limitations become all too apparent, and their ego can't face up to it. Thus, most of what I say is in regards to where people are at and what they need to do to progress. So my original statements were not about trying to describe the enlightened mindset, they were about how to go about attaining it. Suffice to say, enlightenment involves the understanding of the nature of projections so that when one engages in them one is not deluded about them.

Kelly: If this use of interpretations is the means to apprehending reality, it is possible to think that reality does not exist - except as a concept generated by language.

Rhett: I agree with your statement if you are using the word 'apprehend' in the same sense as 'understand', and are willing to consider that reality's existence as a concept is generated 'with' language (not 'by' language).

Kelly: English is especially notorious for its dualisms (subject-object), physico-materialistic communication (verb-noun), and the interrogatives (what, who, why, how...). In addition, the "being" verb that exists of course in many other languages generates the "is" and "am" and "are" and "exist" and "what is" and "real"... Depending on language to define the nature of enlightenment (not as communication to others but as parameters for enlightenment) leads one to question this "Reality".

Rhett: Why? I think it is quite obvious that people that speak different languages project different things onto their experiences. However, it does not mean that the nature of truth is different for people that speak different languages, the nature of Reality is the same for all sentient and non-sentient things. It is just that the sentient ones have the chance of understanding it.

Kelly: To "understand the nature of Reality" (not the "-----" reality to be discussed below in greater detail) is practically equivalent to understanding the nature of perception. What is perceived determines what exists - namely anything a sentient being is conscious of. Nothing exists apart from what is perceived - even an imaginary thing exists (as an imaginary thing in someone's consciousness) when it is perceived.

Therefore

Reality is no more than (generally speaking) the limits of anthropocentric perception.

Rhett: Just because you choose to label us 'humans' does not mean that our perception is necessarily limited. Mental concepts need not be anthropocentric. Absolute truths, in particular, are wholly free of anthropocentrism, they are true for all worlds at all times for all consciousnesses that happen to perceive them.

However, i do agree with you in the sense that our non-conceptual experiences (what i often call our 'raw' experiences of consciousness) are of a certain nature. By this i mean that our reasonings about our experiences suggest that we are likely to be a bipedal animal with eyes, ears, nose, mouth, etc, and that our raw experiences are limited by such. However, we cannot be sure about this, we could just be a brain in a vat being fed experiences, and as such, are capable of experiencing anything that we are fed. Change the disc so-to-speak and we might become a bird flying through the sky, or something we have never imagined before...

Kelly: Existence may be Reality: the anthropocentric "belief" in the undeniability of what is perceived to be "real". Reality is actually a label for delusions ==> since nothing exists apart from what is perceived, and human perception has evolved to concentrate on human perception as the verifier for what exists, therefore what exists for humans ("Reality") is merely discrimination (something vs. nothing).

Therefore it is impossible to say that "in reality, nothing truly exists apart from what is perceived", since "what is reality", but "perception" or "appearances to mind"... i think it is possible to perceive without accepting the concept of an inherently existing Reality (ie reality). Absence of this concept (that reality exists) could be enlightening... Therefore i agree with your statement, absence of delusion = enlightenment.

kv1: Abstract thinking (as described by rhett, ie a tool to understand Truth and project it onto all experiences) is the linear assembly of memories, which could be of sounded words or images. It is possible that a dog can think abstractly in as far as it knows [eg what is a curtain blowing in the wind] without having to investigate: it remembers.

R:What good would a "linear assembly of memories" do? What are "sounded words"?

kv2: Consciously or not, assembling memories typifies deductive logic. One memory is caused by another, ad originem (or to the causal memories before that).

Instead of linear, perhaps "multi-linear" would have better described the causality of memory returnings.

Rhett: Sure, but be aware that what we experience in each moment is as valid as we can ever get, and in fact defines the very notion of validity. If we are experiencing a false concept, then we most definitely are experiencing a false concept. If we have deduced correctly and experience a truth, then we most definitely are experiencing a truth.

Kelly: Sounded words are another way of describing memory-thoughts when they are articulated in a language: do words and sentences form in your mind without you actually "hearing" the words in your mind? Are they appearing as written images instead? A tentative example: the dog memory of the spoken word "ball" and the mental image of a ball (and memories of games etc.) even though it cannot speak the words itself.

Rhett: I wouldn't say that i 'hear' my thoughts, because i use the word hear to apply to sounds, and my thoughts do not appear to my mind in the same manner as do sounds. Nor would i say that my thoughts appear as written words. It is only when i try to think about the way that they appear to me that i try to place them in some manner as you have described, but i think to do so is false. My thoughts just are what they are, they are me (to the very limited extent that i have a sense of me). I think it is possible that you are falsely constructing a scenario in your imagination, which contains your ego and your thoughts, etc. Thus, the duality you are suggesting is likely to be of your own creation.

kv1: However, a dog may not conceive of this event in the same functional way as i have described abstract thinking: perhaps it abstractly labels the material appearance and action, but probably does not perceive the something as really "nothing" as an enlightened being may - or as so many "things" that the single entity can hardly be described.

R: The enlightened person would experience a seemingly real 'curtain' in exactly the same way as any other person. They would not, however, project a plethora of deluded concepts onto it.

kv2: What is "experience"? What do you think exactly is the "curtain appearance to mind"? Projected concepts?

Rhett: Experience is any appearance to mind. The enlightened person would accept the appearance to mind of a curtain knowing that it has no existence beyond the moment of its perception, and that it was differentiated from its surroundings by their mind, knowing that their mind is also just a momentary manifestation.

R: Reality is not a conglomerate of multitudes of things as you suggest. The mind is the creator of all things, so there is only a multitude of things in the case that it creates 'a multitude of things'.

kv2: See above (nature of Reality = nature of perception)/

kv1: Because there are so many "things" (on which to project memories) and so many ways to "describe / memorise" them, it follows that language (perception: Truth projection) creates "things".

R: Regardless of the content, this seems a rather spurious line of reasoning...

kv2: See above (English). Even Truth is a thing.

kv1: Distinguishing and "compartmentalising" is not realising but rather describing by duplicating, measuring and ascribing function.

R: The former need not involve the latter.

kv2: ? explanation

Rhett: I consider the act of distinguishing to be the same as differentiation, which need not involve duplication, measurement, or the ascription of function.

kv1: In reality, reality is -----; again a memory assemblage in which discrimination affects and influences perception.

R: I am not sure what to do with this "-----" of yours.

kv2: i have nothing with which to help you. perhaps try this:

Before a conscious being accumulates memories that associate experiences with signifiers, what do they have? Non-memory-generating experiences that are "received" by a signifier-free perception would not be discriminatory, and would not compartmentalise - it would simply not have "things". If a true reality (apart from "understanding") exists, then perhaps this is it.

i would not equate this with rhett's description of the state of abstraction - ie. animism or enlightenment (two extremes) - in which appearances to mind are abstracted, but rather a state of abstraction in which the conscious being is not drawing on separatist definitions.

Rhett: I'll give you two answers to this:

1) I think i understand what you are trying to convey in regards to the "-----". I agree in a sense. The process of  $A=A$ , although closely linked to our use of language, is fundamentally separate to it. I apologise for the way i presented it previously in this discussion, i have been exploring the role of language in  $A=A$  and have misjudged the nature of it's involvement. The act of experiencing a thing as it is, and accepting it as a momentary manifestation of reality, need not involve the process of labelling. For example; if i am experiencing an image of the seaside - then that is what i am experiencing. That experience is finite, and thus is a thing. My mind can connect with this experience without giving it a label or forming concepts about it. I might even experience a differentiation of it, such as a surfer, without actually labelling the appearance as a 'surfer'.

2) I for one have no interest in becoming a baby again! Since the basic act of consciousness is to differentiate (or more accurately - that we necessarily experience things), the mind cannot escape it's very nature and become singular, it is necessarily dualistic. Some people might consider that bad news, but it's not, try to imagine a non-dualistic mindset and you'll quickly realise that it is logically impossible and utterly impractical. That is because the Totality is capable of an infinity of appearances, so no mind could possibly experience them all (particularly because to do so it would have to be able to experience itself, over and over...) and what could make sense of them all?

kv1: I am not sure why rhett is confident that language can be so perfect a tool for attaining perfect understanding of Truth ["word and sentence consciousness"].

R: What else could we use? Without language there cannot be delusion, or truth, or understanding, or in fact anything at all. All things are built with language. Thus, language is necessarily the tool with which we attain understanding.

kv2: That is, projection-delusions (linguistic or pictorial) are interrogated by the previously deluded person; understanding of the Nature of Perception (or Reality) is thereby attained. Interrogation is linguistic: it means asking "what" and "why" etc. So enlightenment for such people is simply removal of linguistic delusions. i am tentatively suggesting that understanding can be attained which moves beyond this stage.

Rhett: I am not sure that you clearly understand the stage that you are at...at least, it is not too clear to me from what you have written. You seem to be implying that projections are necessarily delusions, but that is not the case if one accepts and understands the nature of projections.

kv1: Abstract thinking that is based on memories is still not representing reality truthfully - and all abstract thinking within the "well of causes" that is the mind is based on memories.

R: Thinking, which is necessarily abstract, is a part of our reality, and is thus real within itself. It can only ever represent other experiences, and thus, is not the truth of them. Quite simply, it is not them.

In what sense do you say that all thinking is based (reliant?) on memories?

kv2: Every "appearance to mind" that is abstracted after the initial conceptless, projection-free perception is a memory.

Rhett: I think we would do well to clarify our concept of what perception is:

- a) action or ability of gaining knowledge.
- b) immediate or instinctive recognition.

There is certainly a major difference between these definitions.

Regarding memories, you will (eventually) need to accept that each experience is just each experience. By labelling them as memories (or not-memories) you are just creating extra confusion.

kv1: It is possible to think without memories, if thinking is not the manipulation of memories but of indiscriminated "----" [like "concept" but conceptless, ie non-concrete and nondescriptive in the sense that it is not a representative symbol but is the nature of "---" itself, ie bypassing language].

Rhett: Thinking necessarily involves concepts and language. Remember the sounded words you were talking about?

Kelly: The ability to perceive the non-material world that is the material world in reality (which is usually labelled) is based on manipulating these "----".

R: It is impossible to think in the way we do without using language, ie. language is the vehicle of concepts. A 'memory' is just a label that we apply to an experience of consciousness that pertains to a previous experience of consciousness. There is no fundamental difference between a memory and any other experience, their nature is exactly the same, every experience is an experience of the moment.

kv2: The memory is experienced as another "appearance to mind". However, a memory (previous experience of consciousness) has been through a linguistic filter, abstracted and projected upon, and experienced within the mind's "well of causes".

Rhett: There is no fundamental difference, for example, between the appearance to mind of someone else's thoughts versus one of one's memories, they have both been filtered and processed.

Kelly: This is unlike the experience of a conceptless perception ("----"), where although memories may be concurrently generated, there is no projection.

Kelly: There is however a strong impulse for egotistic separation to alter this receptivity into discrimination. A habit of language perhaps.

Similarly, the habit of English constrains me to choose a "wordless" symbol to describe a non-concrete reality, to represent a non-materialistic and even non-abstract (in the sense that it exists as perceived prior to abstraction) entity. it is still being explored in my consciousness - and is connected to analysing the habit of conceptualising.

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 158
(12/6/03 10:38 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Biggier,

Big: I have no idea how the post above materialized in here. As I note below, I was typing it when suddenly this ezboard message popped up. When I arrowed back [hoping to find the post above] there was just a blank message board. I thought it was gone forever. So, I rewrote it again below. Sorry for the confusion.

Rhett: So far i have only lost one message whilst posting to the forum, but i put the larger posts into Outlook Express - so in the most critical cases i am safe.

Big: Right in the middle of my post I get this "Post Flood..." message from EzBoards. And then "they" wiped out my post. What the hell kind of crap is that? Does it happen often in here?

Rhett: All i know is that it hasn't happened to me.

Big: I'll try again:

Over the years many Truth Tellers have tried to paint me one or another "metaspherical" yellow brick road. But in the end, I am always the one pulling back the curtain to expose the Wizard.

Rhett: Just the sort of person i am looking for. Since my path involves the elimination of ego, i am wholly non-attached to my wisdom. Thus, i am only too keen to be proven wrong, and would adopt superior truth immediately. But, I suggest you don't think it will be easy...

Big: The mind differentiates today only because of how it learned to differentiate yesterday and the day before. And the year before and the decade before.

Rhett: If that is true, how does the mind make its first ever differentiation?

Big: And not a single solitary mind that has ever differentiated has [to the best of my knowledge] ever managed to take those differentiations with them to the grave.

Rhett: I agree in the sense that thoughts are never owned by the 'self'. All things are just momentary manifestations, including the mind, the body, etc.

As such, there is no self to take to the grave...

Big:  $A = A$ ? Are you per chance an Objectivist? If so all I can say is this: welcome to hell!! ; )

Rhett: No. I do not subscribe to any particular set of theories, just the truth about the nature of Reality.

Big: The mind is the creation of evolution not the other way around. And what is behind THAT creation we may never know.

Rhett: You can never prove any scientific theory, that is why they are called theories, not proofs. Evolution is just our best guess based on the evidence at hand, and in fact could be overturned in an instant. We could suddenly be presented with compelling evidence that aliens planted all of the evidence that points to evolution. Even so, we could not be sure about the alien evidence either, because we can never be sure about any empirically derived evidence. Our consciousness is simply incapable of following all of the causal processes that constitute reality. Not only that, since things can only exist within consciousness, evolution can only ever exist in relation to consciousness. Without consciousness, there are no buffalo, no rats, no birds, etc. These are all a product of conscious differentiation.

Big: And if the mind is embedded/situated in all of those circumstantial contexts I noted, how does it really go about equating  $A$  with  $A$  except as a prejudice?

For example, how would a particular mind situate the aborting of a human fetus in a rational moral context when it has been subjected from the day it was born with points of view from dozens of conflicting and contradictory vantage points? How does it know which is the Most Rational point of all? How does it demonstrate it essentially and objectively? It can't, of course.

Rhett: One can only do ones best in relation to ones values and capacity for reason. Only through a complete understanding of the nature of Reality (enlightenment) can a person become completely impartial (no moral baggage) and exercise absolute rationality.

Big: I don't say we do not exist!! I say the existence of a human mind is very, very different from the existence of a rock or a tree or a mountain. It is not a mindless "thing". It is, instead, a mediator of relationships that are more [re natural science] or less [re social science and moral philosophy] objective.

Rhett: In what manner do you think we exist? Your definition, "The mind is a mediator of relationships that are more or less objective", is rather rubbery to say the least. What proof do you have to back up these statements?

I am not saying that all things are exactly the same. I am saying that they are of the same fundamental nature, and that their characteristics are merely a momentary manifestation (of consciousness), a result of the prevailing causal conditions, 'one of an infinity of potential appearances'.

Big: Rhett, you know full well that I am not defining my experiences as "nothing". That is only what you wish to convince others that I am doing.

Rhett: My understanding of the nature of reality makes me wholly interested in the truth, whether that be in your mind, the audiences or my own, so fear not that i will compromise your or my arguements for the benefit of my ego in front of an audience.

How do you define your experiences then?
What do you think of the proofs of logic i mentioned?

Big: You will fail.

Rhett: We shall see.

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 18

(12/7/03 9:36 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Rhett,

Me, I am not exactly what you would call computer literate--at least respecting the technology itself. At 55, I came into it just a few years ago. So I don't have it hard-wired into my brain as the young folks do nowadays. In other words, I am pretty much at the mercy of the e-nothingness gods.

Ah, but at 55, I've had a lot more years behind me to think about philosophy from many, many different angles. And so [and I refuse to be traditionally humble and immodest] my mind is one of the best ones out there.

The ego. What is that really? It is not something you can open up the body and operate on...or remove...or replace with a new one. It is, instead, an enormously complex and convoluted set of intertwining RELATIONSHIPS between biological and psychological and historical and cultural and ethnological and social and political and economic and interpersonal [existential] variables that a particular "mind's eye" ceaselessly constructs, deconstructs and reconstructs over and again from the cradle to the grave.

It's true, of course, the mind does not actually make its first differentiation "self-consciously". It occurs largely as a result of genetic predispositions that are, in many crucial respects, hard-wired into us as a mere manifestation of the tail end of an evolutionary process that began millions of years ago. Why? Who really knows.

I agree with what you say about science. A theory, no matter how rationally deduced or empirically replicated experimentally by others is not the same thing as a proof. But, of course, we live our lives from day to day as though they were. It's not like many folks will step off of a 50 story building thinking, "Gravity? Maybe it's true, and maybe it's not". But I am more inclined to approach it from the angle of David Hume: skepticism so radical that NOTHING is really immune to it. We just do not know objectively how cause and effect began or whether the manner in which we perceive it now respecting, say, natural law, is or is not merely a manifestation of some larger reality we are not privy to. How CAN we know this in the context of All There Is? Consider: We are each of us but one of 6,000,000,000 utterly insignificant souls on a tiny little planet in a tiny little solar system in a humdrum galaxy amidst billions and billions more in what may be [re DD's Fabric of Reality] just one of an infinite number of parallel universes. Ninety nine percent of which appears to be empty space. In fact, it is said that if you put a single grain of sand in the world's largest cathedral there would be more volume of sand in that church than there are stars in the [known] universe. In turn, it is said that if the center of two huge galaxies collided into each other there would probably not even be a single collision of matter. Or this: a photon of light traveling at 186,000 miles a SECOND would take 10 billion YEARS to reach us from any already known object farthest out in the uinivers.

So, in a context that mindbogglingly [surreally] stupendous what does it really mean for you or I to speak of "a complete understanding of the nature of Reality. To me that is just gibberish. But, like you, I am open to be being persuaded to see it another way.

As for "proof" of my own "metaphysical" conjectures, well, all of the above is just my way of saying, in fact, that to speak OF "proof" respecting questions like this is just plain silly. There is no way a human mind can wrap around it in any intelligible way.

What do you mean by "fundamental nature"? In the same way Leibniz spoke of Monads? the way Kant spoke of the Noumenal? the way Hegel spoke of the historical Synthesis? the way Plato spoke of Forms? the way Berkeley spoke of a "mind of God"?

Biggie

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1082
(12/7/03 12:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Quote:

---

But I am more inclined to approach it from the angle of David Hume: skepticism so radical that NOTHING is really immune to it.

---

Why then are you so sure about your annihilation at death?

+++++

"Kind Prince", asked the master, "what do you think? Are all the small particles that make up the universe numerous?"

"Yes, very numerous. "

"And, kind prince, do you think the universe is very vast?"

"It is vast indeed."

"But, kind prince, the universal truth is that the particles are not small nor is the universe vast. It is merely the relative mind that labels them so."

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 19
(12/8/03 3:20 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

BIRD,

There is, of course, a world of difference between being "reasonably sure" about something and being, say, "absolutely certain", instead.

And the difference really does not revolve around how a particular frame of mind might motivate one's behavior but around that which one is able to demonstrate to others as being worthy of certitude.

For example, you can insist you are "absolutely certain" that God exists; you can, in fact, live your life as though God were standing right next you everywhere you go. But God does not have to actually exist at all, does he? You need only to believe he does.

Now, respecting life after death [self-conscious life---not merely a transformation back to "star stuff"] it seems reasonable to me it does not occur. Why? Because there has yet be a single, solitary piece of hard empirical/phenomonological/experiential/scientific evidence to support such a contention. But, having not died yet myself, it is not reasonable for me to insist it is certain that there is no hereafter. On the other hand, I may actually come to believe there is. But, here again, even though I may adamantly insists that eternal life is a fact, without that crucial hard evidence such a conviction means nothing at all to others---even though it may be something I am, myself, passionaitely convinced is true.

You can believe anything, in other words...but convincing others to believe it, in turn, something else altogether. And, in a philosophy venue the burdon of proof is always on the one staking the claim. And the evidence damn well better be HARD evidence and not some a priori deduction bullshit that tries to convince us that empirical evidence is not really necessary at all. We can THINK our way to The Truth [the Kant Syndrome].

Well, you can try. But first you have to get past me.

Biggie

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1086

(12/8/03 12:35 pm)

Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Sure, but I am not staking a claim about life after death. It seems most reasonable to me that it does exist, so I tend in that direction. However, to claim that we are annihilated at death is also a claim.

I suppose by hard evidence you would mean someone from the dead coming back and talking somehow? Well, there are really many cases of people who have seen what was going on during unconsciousness, and there are all sorts of people channeling. I refuse to have anything to do with channeling, but it seems likely that there are other beings out there performing this mischief. There is also lots of evidence for extrasensory perception which is certainly proof of an ethereal realm. It's odd that when quantum physics seems to be showing that particles can influence each other instantly and at great distance, that some people are so sure that minds cannot communicate. Think of things like electromagnetism and radiowaves and xrays that were unknown 100 or so years ago. Do you really suppose that now we have discovered everything?

Of course, I've thought about this problem myself and I think that demanding the kind of evidence that you consider hard may be counterproductive. The soul is not hard. If there is a "spiritual" realm it is quite obviously one in which our ability to perceive it is quite fuzzy. The correct approach is not to demand that it become hard so that we may measure it, but rather to increase our eyesight, that is, what is commonly called the sixth sense.

It is really not so odd. You start out with hard things like rocks, and you get to finer and finer things, like gases. You have the visible and invisible spectrum. You have forces that are easily palpable to us, and forces that, while devastatingly real, like xrays, are imperceptible to us. We now know that the body, all bodies, give off electric energies, perhaps that is the aura. If there is a soul, it would be something even farther out on the spectrum of ethereality than UV rays and the like.

So you don't think we can think our way to the truth?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 162
(12/8/03 1:34 pm)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Biggier,

Ah, but at 55, I've had a lot more years behind me to think about philosophy from many, many different angles. And so [and I refuse to be traditionally humble and immodest] my mind is one of the best ones out there.

I don't have a problem with you saying this, but in this context it does come across as ego stroking, and an attempt to assert power over me.

Based on what i have experienced of you to date, I cannot help but be suspicious that you are more interested in egotistical gratification than the truth. I can only hope that you don't prove my suspicion right.

The ego. What is that really? It is not something you can open up the body and operate on...or remove...or replace with a new one. It is, instead, an enormously complex and convoluted set of intertwining RELATIONSHIPS between biological amd psychological and historical and cultural and ethnological and social and political and economic and interpersonal [existential] variables that a particular "mind's eye" ceaselessly conducts, deconstructs and reconstructs over and again from the cradle to the grave.

Whilst those relationships seem pertinent (and necessarily follow the nature of cause and effect), all the factors that you mention center around a false construct. The basis of the ego is false - there is no such thing as an inherently existent self, the self is purely a conceptual creation, a differentiation of mind. Since the fundamental basis of the ego is in the intellect, it is not inherent to consciousness, so it can be transcended with right understanding.

It's true, of course, the mind does not actually make its first differentiation "self-consciously". It occurs largely as a result of genetic predispositions that are, in many crucial respects, hard-wired into us as a mere manifestation of the tail end of an evolutionary process that began millions of years ago. Why? Who really knows.

Surely the first differentiation occurs due to far more factors than what you have mentioned above. Surely the mother would be required to feed it, gravity would be required to keep it on Earth - and retain our atmosphere for it to breath, sunlight would be required for the plants to grow to give it oxygen, the absence of a tiger that would have eaten it would be required - or an alien that would have abducted it for breakfast, etc. In fact, there is not a single thing that is not responsible for the existence of the child in the particular way that it manifests, even that famous butterfly that you mentioned. In simpler terms, the existence of 'A', is dependent on what it is not, ie. 'not-A'.

I agree with what you say about science. A theory, no matter how rationally deduced or empirically replicated experimentally by others is not the same thing as a proof. But, of course, we live our lives from day to day as though they were. It's not like many folks will step off of a 50 story building thinking, "Gravity? Maybe it's true, and maybe it's not".

I do not live my day to day as though what appears to my mind is a truthful representation of anything other than what i experience it to be. The only conclusions i reach that go beyond the raw validity of my experiences are based on logical absolutes. Thus, i reason my way through my experiences. I can't possibly be sure that if I step off a 50 storey building i will fall down and die, but my reason suggests to me that that is likely, so i refrain from doing such things. If i were a brain in a vat, how could i 'die' if i was just experiencing a simulation? Nevertheless, i reason that whilst the vat is a possibility, it is far less likely than the possibility that my experiences are strongly influenced by causal connection to a body and environment.

But I am more inclined to approach it from the angle of David Hume: skepticism so radical that NOTHING is really immune to it.

Yet you still proffer empirical evidence as if it were true (?).

We just do not know objectively how cause and effect began

You are still asserting duality (objective/subjective), ie. that there is an inherently existent mind and things external to it. I think you need to apply your skepticism to this as well as many other things you are offering as if they were true.

Additionally, cause and effect cannot possibly have a beginning or end... how could it?

or whether the manner in which we perceive it now respecting, say, natural law, is or is not merely a manifestation of some larger reality we are not privy to. How CAN we know this in the context of All There Is?

Natural Law had bold beginnings - but faltered through lack of understanding of Ultimate Truth. Here is a brief overview i found, "Natural Law, in ethical philosophy, theology, law, and social theory, a set of principles, based on what are ASSUMED to be the permanent characteristics of human nature, that can serve as a standard for evaluating conduct and civil laws." The word 'assumed' says it all.

Since my views are independent of empiricism, they are immune to falsification. We could find/create any number of other universes and my views would still hold true. I am not trying to describe our observable universe, i claim to understand the nature of cause & effect, existence, reality, things, experience, etc.

Consider: We are each of us but one of 6,000,000,000 utterly insignificant souls on a tiny little planet in a tiny little solar system in a humdrum galaxy amidst billions and billions more in what may be [re DD's Fabric of Reality] just one of an infinite number of parallel universes.

Ninety nine percent of which appears to be empty space. In fact, it is said that if you put a single grain of sand in the world's largest cathedral there would be more volume of sand in that church than there are stars in the [known] universe. In turn, it is said that if the center of two huge galaxies collided into each other there would probably not even be a single collision of matter. Or this: a photon of light traveling at 186,000 miles a SECOND would take 10 billion YEARS to reach us from any already known object farthest out in the univers.

What happened to your skepticism? Quote: "I agree with what you say about science. A theory, no matter how rationally deduced or empirically replicated experimentally by others is not the same thing as a proof."

So, in a context that mindbogglingly [surreally] stupendous what does it really mean for you or I to speak of "a complete understanding of the nature of Reality. To me that is just gibberish. But, like you, I am open to be being persuaded to see it another way.

Glad to hear it.

As for "proof" of my own "metaphysical" conjectures, well, all of the above is just my way of saying, in fact, that to speak OF "proof" respecting questions like this is just plain silly. There is no way a human mind can wrap around it in any intelligible way.

You deny knowledge of the truth, but then go on to say that "There is no way a human mind can wrap around it in any intelligible way" as if it were proof.

You can't have it both ways. You can either accept the possibility of us knowing Ultimate Truth, or be in a position where you know it and can thus rightly vouch that it does exist. To think anything else is illogical.

What do you mean by "fundamental nature"? In the same way Leibniz spoke of Monads? the way Kant spoke of the Noumenal? the way Hegel spoke of the historical Synthesis? the way Plato spoke of Forms? the way Berkeley spoke of a "mind of God"?

No. If you want a historical reference you could say it is the way that Lao Tzu spoke of constancy, or the way Buddha spoke of cause and effect.

Rhett

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1090
(12/9/03 10:25 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Quote:

---

The basis of the ego is false - there is no such thing as an inherently existent self, the self is purely a conceptual creation, a differentiation of mind. Since the fundamental basis of the ego is in the intellect, it is not inherent to consciousness, so it can be transcended with right understanding.

---

To eliminate ego is absurd and impossible. You may as well eliminate the brain. The basis of the ego belief in inherent existence is the understanding that there is indeed an inherently existing self, but that self is not the individual body that the ego has been brought into play to protect, but rather the Self, the Universal Self in which we all live and move and have our being.

If we can see our true Self it automatically dethrones the little ego from its state of confused overimportance. The ego runs on fear, and it is afraid because it is blind. Really, it is not the ego itself which is blind, but the soul. The ego has no eye.

Quote:

---

You deny knowledge of the truth, but then go on to say that "There is no way a human mind can wrap around it in any intelligible way" as if it were proof.
You can't have it both ways.

---

There seems to be logic here, but it is sophistry. After all, he did not say there is no ultimate truth, but rather recognized the limits of his own circumstances. Every time someone states that they perceive that understanding ultimate truth is beyond our capacity, you trot out the same line, that they are contradicting themselves by stating a truth that there is no truth. In the end, David says we can know almost nothing about the hidden void, but that it is the origin of everything. What's so grand about cause and effect, which 5 minutes reflection shows what there is to know, when the most interesting thing that we all want - the hidden void - is beyond us?

Quote:

---

Additionally, cause and effect cannot possibly have a beginning or end...how could it?

---

And yet cause and effect with no origin is just as unthinkable. You and David have solved this dilemma by stating that the origin is a hidden void, which is a clever way of admitting that you cannot understand cause and effect.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 20
(12/9/03 11:53 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Bird,

What sort of evidence is there for the supernatural? None that has been documented so as to persuade reputable men and women of science. After all, few things are more important to folks than knowing whether or not there is life after death. So, if there were any credible evidence at all of its actual existence it would be plastered on/in every meidium out there. And it's not. Just a bunch of anecdotal claims and frauds like Gellor and faith healers and those "communicating" with the dead [and laughing all the way to the bank].

ESP? I would never insist it cannot be true. But where's the beef? James Randi, to the best of my knowledge, still has his $100,000 [$1,000,000??] reward proffered to anyone who can demonstrate the existence of the paranormal. And while I think he can be, in part, just as irrationally fanatical in attacking those who claim paranormal powers as those insisting they have it...again, where's the hard evidence?

Electromagnetism, xrays and the like were never, ever approached by science in the way spoon benders and seance holder and crop circle fanatics approached their own pseudo-reality of choice. The scientific method stalks every proposed new theory in science. But hardly ever shows up when the folks making big bucks are plugging the paranormal at book signings or on the lecture circuit. Again, I'm not saying "no way!"; I'm saying "show me!". In other words: WHAT soul? Where is it--- somewhere in the lungs, behind the pituitary gland, nestled in the folds of the brain?

No, the method of choice IS hard evidence. Otherwise we would still be back in the caves grunting and groaning because the fire went out.

And, as I noted to Rhett and/or David, suppose there is a soul, a God, an afterlife. You still have to figure out how to reconcile/situate these things [which most folks see as benevolent forces/entities] out/in a world that is bursting at the seams with all manner of horror and pain and suffering and rapes and child abuse cases and mass murders and Holocausts and gulags and killing fields and plagues and natural disasters and kids being shot up by pilots allegedly trying to rid the world of "terrorists".

Sorry, all that "soul" stuff sounds exactly to me like the sort of things folks intent on seeing what they believe embrace. Why? Because it comforts them and gives them hope and reconciles them with all the very, very real trials and tribulations of just struggling to make it through the days sometimes. They WANT to believe in it and so they DO believe in it.

Nothing supernatural about that, right?

Biggie

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1093

(12/10/03 5:22 am)

Reply

lifeafterlife

I hesitate to delve into all this because I don't think arguments have much weight. People think and believe what they want for emotional reasons, and the justification comes afterwards. You already seem to have missed the points I made.

There's a fair amount of evidence for the supernatural, and there is no amount of evidence that would convince the men and women of reputable science. I'm not sure why you think something like the realm of spirit is easy to quantify scientifically. It may happen one day, but it is beyond our abilities now.

Why must people persist in thinking we are living in modern times? We are not living in modern times. We are living in a dark age of laughable ignorance (from the point of view of future people). I do find it ironic that just when microscopes and the like have shown how many parts of our world have been utterly invisible and unknown to us, that we somehow think we have exhausted the invisible. I mean, everything has been invented, hasn't it?

I never spend time looking at faith healers or Uri Geller, about whom I have no opinion. I do read some books, and I do know a few anecdotal tales of my own, but I have not taken the time to do the actual research. I wish I could, along with other things I am interested in getting to the bottom of, like AIDS.

As I already mentioned, things such as ESP or a soul are in a very ethereal realm of energy or matter, and are not easily apprehended by us. So it is somewhat rare.

My thinking on this right now is that the capacity to feel the reality of something like the soul lies within the brain. It is far closer to an emotion than a rational thought. It is not perceivable by the 5 senses. Nonetheless, it is a shortcoming of brain function to be spiritually blind. I don't mean that to sound as if the brain is the soul - but as long as we are in the body, the body and its brain is our perceiving mechanism.

You are very naive to think that evidence would be suddenly accepted worldwide.

Crop circles? Have you looked into them? Unless the things I have read are really trash, they are genuine, and probably the best evidence we have right now that something interesting is interacting with us. I don't call it supernatural. In fact, I don't think there is any such thing as supernatural. I consider the word supernatural to have about as much meaning as the word magic. There is nothing about soul travel, ESP, crop circles, ghosts, or any other such thing which is not completely scientific and rational. We just don't know how they work yet. If ESP exists, quantum physics will explain it.

You should rather be asking why the government and media have gone to such dishonest lengths to discredit the crop circle phenomenon, and why they never talk about it except in absurd terms.

Personally, I think the soul is in the kidneys.

Really, Biggie, I know you're a big guy and you can take it - can you be asking such a stupid question? My grandmother was an atheist because her beloved husband was an atheist. Once, when she was in her 80's, I finally got the nerve to ask her something about it, and she replied, well, when you see a chicken die, do you see a soul coming out of it? That was such a jaw-stoppingly stupid answer, that I dropped it for good. Especially in light of the sudden and immense difference between a dying person and the dead body. Can't you imagine that the soul is a superfine energy force of some kind, spread very thinly perhaps, or hovering perhaps, permeating the being?

And now you want me to explain human evil? For that I would have to recommend a couple of books. (Hey Tharan, did you ever get the one I recommended?)

But the short answer is that we are free to do as we will. Why do you expect the benign force to step in and be a big daddy? Our behavior and its consequences are our own. If we have evil impulses, but big daddy stops us every time, then what the hell is that for development? We must become gods on our own, of our own free will and in our own good time.

It seems to me that Christianity has a particularly hard time understanding the difference between outward things like saying they believe in Jesus and his teachings, versus the actual attributes of their own, personal character. Somehow, they plan to get to heaven by saying the magic words to propitiate their egotistical god, while that god does not care a fig who they ACTUALLY are. No matter the qualities of their soul, those who do not correctly propitiate the god are doomed, while they are going to have a nice time in heaven with a bunch of greedy and violent scoundrels. I guess the angels will be like recess monitors with whistles, or perhaps they will all be lobotomized into good behavior.

There is no other way. If you want to be enlightened or good or developed, it has to be who you actually are. It cannot be imposed from without.

It is so infantile to lay in our playpen and suck our thumbs because we are mean and God should stop us.

Additionally, I struggle with how there can be any kind of personal God. An impersonal one is no problem. One possible answer is that WE are the personal gods. While it's true that we are still hitting one another over the heads with our Tonka trucks and throwing sand, I'm sure there are other beings in the universe who are well past us.

As for your reasoning that people believe in God or an afterlife because it comforts them, it is just as likely that the reason people are so stuck on surviving is because they sense that they have a more permanent nature, in which case their annihilation is unbelievable. If we are spiritual beings with our blinders on, we still dimly sense that we of course will always live.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1095
(12/10/03 8:55 am)
Reply

apologize

---

I'm just a Yankee with bad manners. I hope my harsh style didn't come across too bad - it wasn't my intention.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1881
(12/12/03 9:58 am)
Reply

Re: Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

In the end, David says we can know almost nothing about the hidden void, but that it is the origin of everything. What's so grand about cause and effect, which 5 minutes reflection shows what there is to know, when the most interesting thing that we all want - the hidden void - is beyond us?

---

This paragraph rests on a misintrepretation of what the "hidden void" is. The hidden void doesn't really have a nature and thus it is incorrect to say that the nature of the hidden void is beyond us. Indeed, it is precisely by comprehending its lack of nature that we can grasp what it is in its entirety.

Quote:

---

Rhett: Additionally, cause and effect cannot possibly have a beginning or end...how could it?

Bird: And yet cause and effect with no origin is just as unthinkable.

---

I have no problems thinking it.

Quote:

---

You and David have solved this dilemma by stating that the origin is a hidden void, which is a clever way of admitting that you cannot understand cause and effect.

---

Again, you're projecting your own misunderstandings onto the matter. The hidden void is merely a creation of causality and has no absolute existence. It has no bearing on the origins of the principle of causality itself.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1112

(12/12/03 10:44 am)

Reply

causality

---

You said the only things we can know about the hidden void is that it is not nothing and that it has the capacity to create. Well, that is saying a hell of a lot.

Now, in what way does that help you to understand causality, if you have no real idea how it gets started. Causality does have an origin - the hidden void.

Quote:

---

The hidden void is merely a creation of causality and has no absolute existence. It has no bearing on the origins of the principle of causality itself.

---

By no absolute existence, do you mean it has no inherent existence? If it is a creation of causality, why did you say it has the capacity to create reality? What is the origin of the principle of causality? Or, rather, what is the origin of causality?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1113

(12/12/03 11:49 am)

Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Biggie, what happened? You asked your questions with such passion and more than once. Why so quiet? My arguments are either trite or they are over your head?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1883

(12/12/03 12:54 pm)

Reply

Re: causality

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

You said the only things we can know about the hidden void is that it is not nothing and that it has the capacity to create. Well, that is saying a hell of a lot.

---

That it is not nothing is a logical implication of the fact that it has no nature - i.e. it lacks the nature of nothingness.

That it causally creates the world of experience is a logical implication of the fact that the world of experience exists and necessarily comes from what is not it.

Quote:

---

Now, in what way does that help you to understand causality, if you have no real idea how it gets started.

---

Again, this is a false question. No one can know how causality got started because it never started.

Quote:

---

Causality does have an origin - the hidden void.

---

Vice versa. The hidden void begins where consciousness ends.

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 23

(12/13/03 4:02 am)

Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Bird,

We live in the "here and now". That is as "modern" as it gets. We can speculate until we are blue in the face about how "ignorant" we will seem to folks living 500,000 years in the future, but: so what, that does not change the fact we don't live then...we live now. And it is only with the information science offers us NOW and TODAY that we can evaluate "reality".

Consequently, it is not your "thinking" or my own that matters in a philosophy venue so much as how successful we are at situating/projecting our thoughts/meaning such that others can think, in turn: that makes sense. And why would someone think it makes sense? Because based on their own actual existence, their own actual experiences they can situate your thoughts in their own life and say, "I know what he means".

Now, at 55 years of age and with 6,893,196 vast and varied experiences under my belt, I have never had one experience that could be described as "supernatural" or "spiritual" or "metaphysical"; or as revealing anything "ultimate" about reality. Nor, in all of my many sojourns into books and articles and discussions and debates about the "paranormal" have I come upon any credible evidence from minds I respect that such realms of reality actually exist---aside from inside the heads of the advocates themselves.

You come up with credible, hard evidence for anything you are convinced expresses the existence of a "soul" or and "afterlife" or some "paranoraml phenomenon" and science will be glad to investigate it. But if your "claims' are couched in that vague mumbo-jumbo manner in which most advocates approach it no reputable scientist will consider it. And I don't blame them.

Crop circles. There are two ways to look at them. One is that extraterrestrials put them there. This is not "supernatural" to me because, indeed, there may well be extraterrestrial intelligence out there capable of producing them. It is when we are expected to believe they are "signs from God" or "supernatural" that I just grin and bear it. After all, when has actual evidence EVER been important to The True Believer, right?

Your grandmother is a genius compared to the intellectual drivel you have bestowed upon us thus far, my friend. You produce nothing but the usual rhetorical incantations/bromides about what people like me refuse to see. That you show us nothing but assumption after assumption after assumption never enters into it, right?

Ah, the "be who you actually are" delusion? Well, what if Hitler concluded that Mein Kampf reflected precisely Who He Was? It is the same old double standard: be yourself but if who you think you are does not coincide with how I think we ought to behave then You Are Wrong. Something like that?

Okay, let's strike a bargain: the first one of us to die will let the other one know what his "permanent nature" is. Oh, and how is our "permanent NATURE" reconciled with our capacity as free and autonomous individuals to choose our own sense of "self"?

I'll give you a couple of more shots, sure, but so far you are not any more than just mediocre in presenting arguments that have "worked" only on the least sophisticated minds now for centuries. This is, after all, a forum for GENIUSES, right?

Biggie

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1115

(12/13/03 12:33 pm)

Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Actually, no this is not a forum for geniuses, and I am not a genius. It is a forum for philosophy. the genius idea has to do with those people who understanding of life has an extremely wide scope, not those with simple high IQ's.

Quote:

---

Ah, the "be who you actually are" delusion?

---

I have no idea what you are talking about here. Most people have not truly considered the argument I gave, much less those who whine about how there could be a God when people are so bad. You said nothing concrete that lets me know you even understood what I said. It really boils down to understanding that we humans are adults and we are responsible for ourselves.

Quote:

---

Well, what if Hitler concluded that Mein Kampf reflected precisely Who He Was? It is the same old double standard: be yourself but if who you think you are does not coincide with how I think we ought to behave then You Are Wrong. Something like that?

---

I'm a little lost. I never said be yourself. I don't know about you, but frankly, I've been a little tired of my self. I was referring to the childish idea that God should MAKE us be good. We will be good when we will be good. But when we achieve goodnes, we really ARE good - that is our property of character - like the properties of this or that molecule.

I have had very few metaphysical experiences, so I can easily imagine having none.

I explained to you that there is no hard evidence of the sort you want for the existence of the soul. That is nothing new. Additionally, you are making yet another fundamental mistake, one I also made many years ago. You see, you talk so big but the funny thing is, the things you are saying (some of them) are the sorts of questions that tormented me years ago - but I have moved well past them. I am not sure I can communicate to you what that mistake is, because to understand it requires a shift in perception. It's like this - you want to demand that the ethereal world bring itself into the heavier material spectrum, so that you, without any change in yourself, may examine it like any other molecules. What you do not realize is that it is outside your ken precisely because it is where it is and it is what it is.

You are like a person lying in a desert, desperately hot and thirsty, and you are lying next to a little bridge, across which is an oasis with ponds and shade. And you scream angrily that you cannot be sure it is anything more than a mirage. If it is real, you say, it should come over here to where you are. Even if the water were to pick itself up and come over, it would instantly scorch in the sun and sand - because it has properties that do not survive there.

You cannot demand that spiritual things become material for your examination. It's like a two-dimensional being demanding that the third dimension somehow come into the second so he can see it. It is you who must expand.

Quote:

---

Oh, and how is our "permanent NATURE" reconciled with our capacity as free and autonomous individuals to choose our own sense of "self"?

---

Gosh, I never mentioned a permanent nature. It's a question I ponder, but it's so far in the future if it exists at all...not even worth going into right now. I also don't have much opinion about free will - I like the recent post over at the Thinker's Inn - we have apparent free will in our little spheres, but it is doubtful how free it really is. Yet in some sense, the idea of an entire universe that is totally mapped out, billions of years and events all just predeterminedly stepping forth to occur at the appointed time - no that cannot be.

Your question is a good one. The question of freedom. There may only be one soul in this universe. The only freedom we have is by being at least somewhat separated from this. We separate and develop. We come back. Enriched I can only suppose.

I do not have as low an opinion of the individual self as the enlightened founders of this forum. I think there is something profound going on.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1325
(12/13/03 12:47 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Biggier wrote,

Quote:

---

Now, at 55 years of age and with 6,893,196 vast and varied experiences under my belt, I have never had one experience that could be described as "supernatural" or "spiritual" or "metaphysical"; or as revealing anything "ultimate" about reality.

---

I might offer that in fact you have had exactly 6,893,196 spiritual, metaphysical, and ultimate experiences. Perhaps you were not yet truly aware of them.

Though, I agree with you on the word "supernatural." It leaves a bad taste with me as well.

Tharan

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 431
(12/13/03 1:49 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

I've always dismissed the super-natural, but lately I'm reconsidering that some of it may in fact be real.

There are so many things about the universe at the sub-atomic level that we do not know. For instance we have no idea what gravity is. To call it an acceleration force is not an explanation, it is simply a recognition of its effect. I believe it is matter just like everything else. It is the matter that exists everywhere around and in us and all other matter. To us it is kinda like it would be say if we lived in permanent light, we wouldn't know what dark was. Gravity is unrecognisable to our senses because it is simply everywhere and there is nothing to show us the difference. There is no such thing as zero gravity, except perhaps in the emptiness outside the universe of matter. So if there is this thing called gravity might there also be other waves that we are also unable to recognise.

The brain works by chemical and electrical interactions. We know that anything active physically emits parts of itself that we can sense, be it smell, heat, electrical current, energy or something else. I think that gravity is the same, to me it is the object decaying and spreading its essence outward.

We know that everything in the universe is interconnected, so therefore there is a path into one's brain other than that from which we can sense through hearing touch etc.

What if the reactions in people brains is emitting matter in a wave like aura that finds it's way into other peoples brains, however this foreign matter only becomes recognisable to those recipients who are receptive to it. So an identical twin can receive jumbled bits of thoughts from the other twin only because they have a history of doing like things and thinking similarly and the waves fit into the thought pattern of the other party, creating a 'match' and inducing a thought in the recipient. Like external material implanted in the body, it will reject those things that it does not recognise - maybe it can do this at the mental wave level as well.

§ Perhaps face-to-face communications are so much better for improving understanding, not just because of body language but because we all have a limited form of ESP.

§ Perhaps it can also be a learnt skill, so we have clairvoyants and the John Edwards types have learnt, to a small degree, how to recognise these incoming thought waves.

§ Perhaps guru's emit ultimate-reality-like thought waves that anyone has the ability to recognise and thus we have the guru aura phenomenon.

§ Perhaps the strength of human herdiness is so strong because we feel others more constantly than we realise. Perhaps the chemicals emitted by those in love, infatuation or lust facilitate the acceptance of these foreign thought waves in others.

§ Perhaps some mental disorders like autism and schizophrenia are partially related to a greater sensitivity

§ Perhaps folk who commit crimes and talk about noises in their head or the devil, Jesus made me do are speaking truthfully - it may be that the emotional turmoil of hate and self pity emit particularly strong waves which can be received if they are in a confused state.

§ Etc etc etc

Of course like anything human it is our nature to exaggerate and utilise knowledge to our own selfish purposes, so even if what I've said above exists, the vast majority of such phenomena will be self delusion or plain lies. Such phenomena also appeals to us for it's entertainment value.

It will be interesting to see if technology ever provides the tools to properly prove the existence of such mental waves. I'm not saying that these ideas are correct, just that it is a possibility. For the most part I'm still a sceptic, but I'm also sceptical that the sceptics have adequately tested these phenomenon sufficiently.

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 426
(12/13/03 4:59 pm)
Reply

--

---

jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

Perhaps some mental disorders like autism and schizophrenia are partially related to a greater sensitivity

---

What is schizophrenia, exactly? The definition in the book of mental disorders says that it means there is a schizm between the thought and the emotion - but this really just means that the people the thoughts are being expressed to by the person diagnosed with schizophrenia are making the listener uncomfortable.

Anyway, this segues into a link to an article about Dave Sim, which explains how he was diagnosed with schizophrenia when he was 23. There's a good dialogue about it in his comic right now, which I'll post when/if I finish copying it out.

Anyway, here's the link www.rawbw.com/~kjh/cerebus.html

It's kind of a bad article, but it gives you an idea of how the herd views people who singlemindedly devote themselves to their ideals.

Greg

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 325(12/13/03 6:09 pm)Reply | Schizos <hr/> I read somewhere recently that anyone who experiences the reality that everyone else experiences, but also experiences another separate reality in their own mind is considered schizophrenic. I don't remember where I read that, though. Maybe it was in my own mind.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 24(12/14/03 1:46 am)Reply   | Re: lifeafterlife <hr/> Bird, Again, as I noted previously in here [I think]: on the day you are born you're immediately embedded in a circumstantial smorgasbord, the ingredients of which you had no choice in accepting whatsoever: your historical era, culture, social institutions, political economy, biological and psychological predispositions, gender, race, ethnicity, family background and socio-economic/demographic status, congenital IQ, congenital health--mental, emotional, physiological...and on and on and on. These variables will have an enormous impact on how you view your sense of "self" as a more autonomous adult...but most folks are completely oblivious to it. At the same time, the first 10 to 12 years of your life are given over to all that is "other". They will profoundly indoctrinate [brainwash] you to view "reality" just as they do. In fact, almost everyone on the planet goes to the grave hardly changing any of this at all. |

In short, human "identity", that precious "self" delusion most folks claim is what undelies our "responsible" or "irresponsible" behaviors is, by and large, just one more pea under one more shell. "I" is essentially a sham, in other words. It is simply an existential contraption that we construct, deconstruct and reconstruct from the cradle to the grave. It only appears solid and whole because, from day to day, the changes in our lives are usually incremental...they don't accumulate fast or dramatic enough for us to notice just how different we are from "I" 10 years ago or 25 years ago or 40 years ago. And then when we do acknowledge this another self-delusion kicks in: "well, sure, 'I' am quite different from 'I' 20 years ago but that is only because 'I' have grown 'wiser'...'I' am now in touch with my most 'authentic' self.

Yeah, right.

Look, this is a philosophy venue. Here the medium of exchange is rational thought. Now, we can all disagree, of course, about what this constitutes but when you tell me you are not sure if you can communicate to me my "fundamental mistake" in not being able to view the existence of a "soul" or an "afterlife", what's the point then? And if you wish merely to yank my frame of mind "metaphysically" closer to yours WITHOUT providing any hard empirical/phenomenological/experiential evidence to bolster your contentions then we may as well just end this thing right now, because I don't "do" reality that way.

That way, in my view, involves manipulating the thoughts in your brain in order to convince it the water is not a mirage because it comforts you in imagining that it is there. And when I ask you to take my hand and guide me over to the water, to cup it in your hands and actually drink it...what then?

Again, what we determine in "the far future" means squat to me because, in my own reasonable assessment of the here and now, I will be just trillions and trillions of sub-atomic particles. Unless, of course, you can make me see that your own reasonable assessment is even more reasonable than mine.

Keep trying.

biggie

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1118

(12/14/03 12:19 pm)

Reply

lifeafterlife

Paragraph 1 - I agree.

Paragraph 2 - Mostly agree.

Paragraph 3 - You went to a lot of trouble but you have written that before, and I read it at that time. I think you are saying that the sense of development that a person has over their lifetime is also a mirage. I'm not sure I agree. What matters it how incremental the steps? There is something holding the life together, if only memory. Most people do not change fundamentally in their lifetime, although some do. There are traits and tendencies that seem to come from earliest infancy and persist in life. Anyway, the self SHOULD change. It is a work in progress. That is what individuality is about. So almost everything about a person, as you mentioned in your paragraph one, is just a temporary construct of the circumstances of one's life. The question is, is anyone home?

Quote:

---

...but when you tell me you are not sure if you can communicate to me my "fundamental mistake" in not being able to view the existence of a "soul" or an "afterlife", what's the point then?

---

Well, that was not the fundamental mistake, and I don't consider that inability to be a mistake. Your fundamental mistake is that you don't know where or how to look, and you are sulking about it.

Hard evidence. I mentioned an ESP experience once here and no one was impressed. David said it was a coincidence. What is hard evidence to me will be very soft once you are more than one person removed. You can only believe something like this if it happens to you, or perhaps to someone you know quite well.

I think there are several well-documented cases of dogs finding their masters over extremely long distances. I remember reading about one from WWI. A British soldier went off to war, on the continent. Some time later (months I think) his little dog ran up to him in a trench somewhere in Europe. He managed to cross the English Channel, as a stowaway I presume. All the folks back home knew, the dog had disappeared. Is that the sort of thing you want?

Quote:

---

And when I ask you to take my hand and guide me over to the water, to cup it in your hands and actually drink it...what then?

---

Would that I could!

The only reason I mentioned the future is that I notice people become quite locked into whatever is the "modern" mode of thinking and viewing things. Just like you mention in paragraph one and two. There have been certain runaway interpretations of some of the recent scientific discoveries, and many people are basing their worldview on it, even though I don't find it to be the most logical or obvious interpretations.

I don't tend to believe in a soul because of things like ESP. A human being is way too vast to be discarded after such a short and futile use. The possibilities for development are so huge. There are processes and patterns that repeat themselves, getting larger and larger. The human being does not appear to be a short process. In fact it would be rather absurd for it to be so. I acknowledge the possibility of no soul but it seems to me one of the least likely scenarios. Then too, I am an alchemist first and foremost. So rebirth and purification make sense to me.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 186
(12/14/03 1:09 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

It will be interesting to see if technology ever provides the tools to properly prove the existence of such mental waves. I'm not saying that these ideas are correct, just that it is a possibility. For the most part I'm still a sceptic, but I'm also sceptical that the sceptics have adequately tested these phenomenon sufficiently.

All empirical investigations are inherently uncertain, so these notions can never be proven or falsified. However, there certainly are good models based on the available evidence, and bad models that are based on whimsy, faith, fantasy, or whatever.

Most people attach themselves to 'finding out' and to the slow development of scientific theories, but the process is really just a diversion, a way to occupy the mind so that it doesn't have to think about anything that might really upset it.

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                           | Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 362(12/14/03 1:22 pm)Reply           | Re: lifeafterlife <hr/> Rhett: Quote: <hr/> Most people attach themselves to 'finding out' and to the slow development of scientific theories, but the process is really just a diversion, a way to occupy the mind so that it doesn't have to think about anything that might really upset it. <hr/> Mirror mirror on the wall, Hamilton.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 188(12/14/03 1:35 pm)Reply | Re: lifeafterlife <hr/> ----- Most people attach themselves to 'finding out' and to the slow development of scientific theories, but the process is really just a diversion, a way to occupy the mind so that it doesn't have to think about anything that might really upset it. ----- Mirror mirror on the wall, Hamilton. You've taken it out of context, i am not speaking against the drive to find out per se. My greater intention is to divert those endeavours in the right direction, but that will never happen if people's motivations are not made explicit. Rhett |

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 363
(12/14/03 3:15 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Quote:

---

(...) i am not speaking against the drive to find out per se.
My greater intention is to divert those endeavours in the right direction (..)

---

In that way, it'll be always your direction, Rhett.
Which is the right one! Heil!

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 25
(12/15/03 8:14 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Bird,

The point isn't whether most people live out their lives incrementally from the cradle to the grave; the point, instead, is this: at any moment a circumstantial landslide can sweep you up in a sequence of startling events such that how you view "reality" now may become all but unrecognizable later.

I always note, for example, the man I was after my year in Vietnam bumping into the man I was before being drafted into the Army. They would barely recongnize each other. Before: devout christian, politically conservative, content to go back to the shipyards and become my father all over again. After: fanatical atheist, politically radical and bursting at the seams to enroll in college so as to become passionaitely a part of "changing the world" revolution that was going on all around me. Everything about me---the clothes I wore, the lenght of my hair, the music I listened to, personality traits, character---all profoundly uprooted because of the experiences I had in and around that MACV in Song Be, and the firendships I had with Danny and Mac.

Note where I am "sulking" about how I view the world around me. And please: don't tell me how I don't know "where to look" for "enlightenment". At 55, you will bump into very few more introspective folks than me. I have explored everything from aseticism to zen buddhism. My point is this: don't expect to be able to point me in directions that involve merely switching directions "spiritually" or "philsophically" or "intellectually". Be prepared, in other words, to back up the rhetoric with reality [hard evidence] or I WILL deconstruct your point of view into oblivion. I've been doing it for years. It's easy.

Hard evidence is not hard to come up with. You bump into someone who claims to have experienced ESP, someone able to, say, tell you what you are thinking when you concentrate on a picture of a rabbit or a heart or a ball. It is easy to set up sophisticated experimental conditions to test it. Many, in fact, have. And not a single, solitary ESP proponent has demonstrated anything at all much beyond the law of averages. The power of suggestion coupled with a psychological predilection to Want To Believe something can work wonders in the brains of the most gullible. Randi, for example, on an old TV show passed out an astrological reading [on index cards] to a classroom filled with students based on their "signs". Almost all of them insisted that, yes, the card's description fit them to a tee! Then Randi revealed that every single card had the same exact wording.

This does not prove ESP is not true, of course. But, again, if it is: where's the beef? Dog anecdotes hardly rate as a slice of bologna.

Again, speculating about how a human life is too darn mysteriously short---there just HAS to be something "vaster" than that---is merely another mirage in the desert, to me. You WANT for there to be something beyond our 70 odd years....so you invent a rationalization in your head by which to cling to for hope that there is. Pure human psychology. As a friend of mind noted, whether we will admit it or not, psychological defense mechanism largely run the world. After, of course, our biological predispositions.

Biggie

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 191
(12/15/03 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

-----
(...) i am not speaking against the drive to find out per se. My greater intention is to divert those endeavours in the right direction (..)
-----

Paul wrote:

*In that way, it'll be always your direction, Rhett.
Which is the right one! Heil!*

It will always be the direction to Truth, which is the essence of the path that i have followed. Since independent mindedness is paramount to this, I have no interest in people becoming a carbon copy of me, or a disciple or follower of me. That would be wholly contrary to the path.

Rhett

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1120
(12/15/03 12:27 pm)
Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Again, while I am agreement that the self is ephemeral, I'm not sure what it is about the changes people go through that amazes you so much. I consider that normal, although many people don't change all that much, more's the pity. I think you are looking at the very same outward things you had mentioned in the aforementioned paragraph one, i.e., those characteristics that influence the personality but are not, ultimately, very real. Then too, when a person becomes more aware, it is very like awakening from a dream, even though they had not formerly been dreaming. (Or had they?)

I looked for an example of sulking and couldn't find what I was looking for. You come across as pretty angry about the world, nature, and what a bastard God would have to be if he existed. You are angry about evil.

I didn't say you don't know where to look for enlightenment. I said you don't know how to look for a spiritual realm. Although QRS mention a spiritual life, and it is after a fashion, they are (at least Solway is) pure materialists, so by definition they don't really believe in a spiritual realm.

Why do you continually boast of your age? I'm 45. Introspection is more personality than years, anyway. Although an introspective person does need time as well.

Heck, I've explored a lot of religions, too, although not as exhaustively as I'd like (I want to know everything, so I've got to cut myself some slack). I'm not so sure how meaningful that is if you are hardheaded and cut off from learning.

I'm not sure what you mean "merely" switching directions spiritually or philosophically. Those are great things. Unless by switching you simply mean deciding to join a religion or something. That's the last thing I'd advise. "Truth is a pathless land" and religions are paths.

How did I get myself into this situation in which I simply must produce hard evidence over the internet for things spiritual?

Of course you must deconstruct my views into oblivion!

Why do you say hard evidence is easy to come up with and then talk about horseshit like Randi giving demos to a bunch of saps? And then you turn around and say dog anecdotes are worthless. Not so fast. First of all, you are showing that you have no interest or intention of learning anything. You, like 99.99 percent of all males simply cannot progress against the wall of your ego. Too bad. Another parachute fails to open.

Since there are several such documented stories spanning centuries, I'm thinking they may be true. If a dog whose master inexplicably disappears occasionally takes it in his head to go find him, and does over hundreds of miles, and utterly accurately, you can dismiss it by calling it a "dog story"? Really, you disappoint me. Your brain is full of ruts. I see no reason to go to any effort about ESP and suchlike if that's as far as you can go.

As to your final paragraph, you are repeating and I am repeating. It makes at least as much sense, and I think more so, to suppose that the strong desire for survival of bodily death rests on a deep sense that it is possible. Isn't it a grand cosmic joke that people long for something more than anything that has never existed in the universe, and is only a concept made up by the minds of some highly evolved creatures, to the point that they evolved a consuming and passionate desire for something that ISN'T?

It wouldn't be so bad if you disagreed, but ignoring it scores low.

Additionally, Jimmy has made a great post on the bottom of page 2 of this thread, which is a really good set of musings on why there may be more going on than we have yet discovered. In fact, he sort of showed some of my points in a way that I didn't.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 648
(12/15/03 2:53 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Anna: You, like 99.99 percent of all males simply cannot progress against the wall of your ego.

99.99 percent? That seems to be a popular figure here. Trying to safeguard against generalizations? Very clever. This would leave us with approximately 316,000 males -the size of a small town- being capable of mental progress. There is hope! If I remember right, David's published Enlightenment figure was around 0.00000005% of the world population which comes to about 3.16 people. We all know the three, but who are the 0.16 people in the making?

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1123
(12/15/03 3:16 pm)
Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Well, I could be possessed of at least 0.04 percent of an enlightened mind, and other candidates for that percentage could be you or Toast. But no, that is too optimistic. I vote we give the entire .16 to Rhett, the top student here.

It's sad not to have Tharan as a candidate, but Rhett said he was spreading the worst evil imaginable, and he's like the assistant professor. I am a hopeless mystic and you are staring at your navel.

Anyway, I goofed. I meant to say 99.9. I wouldn't like to exxagerate.

Actually, I can only be here for amusement. My chances of enlightenment are nil. Did you know that Weininger said the highest woman is *infinitely* lower than the basest man? It's odd that he apparently allows himself to be an exception to the things he says about Jews, but doesn't allow any woman to be an exception.

When I get through with Biggie, you could take him on.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 369
(12/15/03 3:31 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

birdofhermes:

Quote:

---

I am a hopeless mystic

---

But a mystic you are!
xxx!

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 654
(12/16/03 1:30 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Anna: I am a hopeless mystic and you are staring at your navel.

I guess we both score pretty low on the resident enlightenment scale. It seems you take it as a compliment. So do I. :-)

Actually, I can only be here for amusement. My chances of enlightenment are nil. Did you know that Weininger said the highest woman is *infinitely* lower than the basest man?

Knowing Weininger, who would be surprised by this statement? Fortunately, Weiningers chances of being taken seriously (by wise people) are also nil. So what are you going to do with this insight? Focus on producing male offspring? Or assign it to the rubbish bin?

Ah, as if I wouldn't know the answer...

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1126
(12/16/03 4:06 am)
Reply

lifeafterlife

---

My son is 23, and as fine as they come.

So I guess I am washed up anyway. Nothing to do but hang around...

There is something annoyingly interesting about Weininger. Or not so much Weininger, as that line of thought, an obsession which I share.

Men and women are just another interplay between the male and female forces that are active everywhere in the universe. This entire universe is in constant coitus between these forces, producing intermittent orgasm and offspring, which in turn are either male or female...

It's pretty hilarious, really, in light of what Weininger says about women being in a constant state of sexuality that I should perceive things in this way, don't you think? I am lost so deep in the well of my female nature, there's probably no hope for me -- which is precisely what Weininger says.

But I understand the necessary equality of these forces, and I have faith in Reality, which Weininger didn't. A male with an emotional agenda loses the gift of his mind.

One thing that bothers patriarchal males is the primordality of the female, and so they make up an all male, homosexual trinity, trying to relate all of reality to male nature, whereas the female aspect is what is commonly known as God the Father - or emptiness.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 370
(12/16/03 6:36 am)
Reply

birdofhermes

---

Yes. Yes and yes and yes. Thank you, Anna.

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 26

(12/16/03 11:59 am)

Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Bird,

What in the world are you talking about: "outward things....that aren't, ultimately, very real". Wars aren't real? Losing a job or going blind isn't real? Finding yourself homeless isn't real? Being sent to a reeducation camp or a gas chamber isn't real? The irony being it is precisely the very reality of these traumatic empirical/phenomonological/experientail/existential changes in our lives that ARE real. What is often "unreal", however, is the la la land rationalizations the humnan mind is capable of inventing to pretend they aren't.

Anyone who looks at this world the way it really functions and does not become angry [often] is either in the deepest of denial or is incredibly naive. I can't help him, alas, because living in denial is, for all intents and purposes, the whole point of his life. And I refuse to waste my time on the intellectually challenged. Also, as I noted to David I LOVE polemics; much of the manner in which I project in venues like this is self-consciously confrontational and provocative. It is not meant as an ad hominem, however....merely a tactical approach to debate.

Point me in the direction of the "spiritual" path, sure. But don't paint me a picture, okay? I pride myself in NOT viewing the human condition with blinders on.

I boast not so much of my age but that, in those 55 years, I have experienced or been a part of damn near everything you can imagine. I have been around and then some. This is important to me because the more experiences you have the more opportunities you have, in turn, to test the rhetoric against a panoply of varying and countervailing and contradictory circumstantial realities. One's philosophy of life is, for the most part, assembled at that precise intersection. The best ones....the most realistic ones.

By "switching directions" philosophically, I am talking about reading a book or going to a few meetings of some new cult-like guruologist and deciding "yep, that's for me!". What you are more often than not buying into instead, is the yearning for certainty, to "belong" to a group as a kind emotional anchor...a family even. The rationality or truthfulness of the ideas, in other words being largely secondary. Call it the scientology or est syndrome.

Give me a break with the psycho-babble "intransigent male" bullshit. If you have hard evidence to back up your contentions let's hear it. Otherwise it is just more mental masturbation about things that come out of your head instead of demonstrable proof that it reasonably coincides with the real world. Randi's reward is still out there. Stop yammering with me in here and go and claim it. Or approach folks like Shermer at Skeptic Magazine and let them set up an experimental context agreed to by both parties. The students in Randi's "stunt" were psychology majors...not a bunch of saps. Or are you actually telling me there is something TO astrology??!!! Imagine, living your life based on the movement of stars in constellations that may not even exist anymore!! That right. When we look up at the stars we don't see them....we see only the light that left them in some cases millions and millions of years ago. They may have gone super-nova or burnt out eons ago. Only the astrology yokels didn't know that back then, did they? Talk about intellectual saps!!!

As for the dog, like other animals they have perceptual powers that are, in many cases far, far, far beyond the capacity of humans. They just don't have our brainpower, do they? If, on the other hand, you were to put 100 adult seniors in a room in, say, New York City with 100 of their adult children and then had the seniors scatter to places all over the city....Well, it would sure be interesting if their children could find them based on absolutely no other information than the seniors sending out their thoughts to them. Why don't you organize something like that?

It would be especially earthshaking, in fact, if some of the seniors died and the kids went into the "afterlife" and found them there, right? Hell, that'll be enough beef for me!!

Ignoring WHAT?!! Your "intriguing ideas" about ESP and the "soul"? WHAT soul? You tell me things like folks believing strongly in an afterlife "because it is possible". Well, ANYthing is possible, right? But this is a philosophy venue, for christ sakes!! You act as though my skepticism respecting comments like that shows MY failure to "give it a chance".

Biggie

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 656
(12/16/03 12:03 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Anna: Men and women are just another interplay between the male and female forces that are active everywhere in the universe. This entire universe is in constant coitus between these forces, producing intermittent orgasm and offspring, which in turn are either male or female...

Yin and Yang. Dualism. Polarization. The nature of material existence.

Anna: It's pretty hilarious, really, in light of what Weininger says about women being in a constant state of sexuality that I should perceive things in this way, don't you think?

I don't think that Weininger was correct. Men and women are sexually polarized, which creates a "force field" between them (in the normal case anyway), but the commonalities outweigh the differences by far. Weininger conveniently omitted the parallel "constant state of sexuality" that men find themselves in, which is unsurprising, since he had no way to judge it as a homosexual. It is often said that homosexual men have a better understanding of the female psyche. Perhaps this is true. What do you think?

Anna: I am lost so deep in the well of my female nature, there's probably no hope for me.

Hope for what?

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1128
(12/16/03 1:00 pm)
Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Biggie,

For a guy who claims deconstructing viewpoints is a casual task, you sure seem to misunderstand a lot of what I say.

When I said outward things that aren't real, I was trying to get at what you are talking about when you say people's sense of who they are changes so dramatically as they go through life. I'm not entirely sure what your point on that is. So I said, perhaps you are looking at external, temporary things like culture, upbringing, beliefs one thinks one holds, memories, etc., that are ephemeral and not really the true self.

As to all the tragedy you mention, yes, I do often become quite angry about it, and I admire those who do more than I do to rectify matters. Listen, I was volunteering for the McGovern campaign when I was 12. (My all time favorite bumper sticker - "Don't switch dicks in the middle of a screw, Vote for Nixon in '72")

The main difference is that I don't blame God for what we do, or refuse Her existence because of it.

Good, let's fight. I'm in the mood for it.

I'm not sure what you mean, don't paint you a picture of the spiritual world. OK, let me paint you a picture. About spiritual blindness. You should read, if you haven't, Jimhaz' post at the bottom of page 2. Let's say the spiritual world is like xrays or ultraviolet rays - material, visible - but not to us. Just as the honeybee can see colors of flowers more accurately, because their viewing apparatus is better than ours. So I see no reason to call it supernatural.

Quote:

---

This is important to me because the more experiences you have the more opportunities you have, in turn, to test the rhetoric against a panoply of varying and countervailing and contradictory circumstantial realities. One's philosophy of life is, for the most part, assembled at that precise intersection.

---

Good.

Quote:

---

The rationality or truthfulness of the ideas, in other words being largely secondary. Call it the scientology or est syndrome.

---

Don't leave Christianity out.

Quote:

---

Give me a break with the psycho-babble "intransigent male" bullshit.

---

Sorry. Maybe it has nothing to do with being male.

Quote:

---

Randi's reward is still out there. Stop yammering with me in here and go and claim it.

---

I have vaguely heard of it.

Quote:

---

Or are you actually telling me there is something TO astrology??!!!

---

I think so, but I really have nothing to say about astrology.

Quote:

---

The students in Randi's "stunt" were psychology majors... not a bunch of saps.

---

This precludes them from saphood???????

Quote:

---

As for the dog, like other animals they have perceptual powers that are, in many cases far, far, far beyond the capacity of humans.

---

Oh, man, this is too much. Granted, they do have, and for this reason there is now serious consideration given to using animals for earthquake prediction. And now they say dogs can be trained to smell cancer, and they can smell when their diabetic owners are in trouble. But are you telling me that animals superior senses go so far as to find a loved person over hundreds of miles? Which of the five known senses do you think might account for it? Did you know dog's ears aren't all that much better than ours? And their eyesight is notoriously poor. Their noses, of course are incredible, but I do believe that defeats even the capacities of a bloodhound.

Aside from not having the time or money, I don't organize those people in New York City because I don't have high expectations of their capacities. In fact, it is not even something that most dogs do. Psychic phenomena seem to be more like something that breaks through at odd times, usually times of great stress, but the receiver also has to be in some way receptive.

The point I said you ignored is that a sense of soul and the eternal might be inherent in our psyches, and if so we would certainly feel bereft without it. You have every right to be skeptical, but this point is important. Either there is, for example, a soul which survives death or there is not. IF there is, then the human comfort derived from believing in it, and the near-universal tendency to do just that, would make perfect sense.

Be polemical all you want, but if you don't recognize the validity of that, you only show yourself to be a shallow thinker and one dedicated only to shouting.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1129

(12/16/03 1:25 pm)

Reply

lifeafterlife

---

Tom: but the commonalities outweigh the differences by far.

They do, but the differences are what is interesting to understand.

Tom: Weininger conveniently omitted the parallel "constant state of sexuality" that men find themselves in, which is unsurprising, since he had no way to judge it as a homosexual.

I don't know about that - they are still highly sexual, just not oriented toward women. Actually, the differences are not found, for example, in the testosterone levels, which are normal. So what you can end up with is sexuality without the brakes that females tend to put on things. Thus an old high school friend of mine, who said he had had sex with at least 500 people in the bath houses in San Francisco the first year he was there.(He's still alive.)

Quote:

---

It is often said that homosexual men have a better understanding of the female psyche. Perhaps this is true. What do you think?

---

Absolutely they understand it - they *have* a female psyche themselves! To one degree or another...it's a continuum from fairly masculine to ridiculously feminine. It depends, I am sure, on the degree of brain deviation from the male "norm" which may be more of an ideal...I would suppose that the almost masculine ones would have potential for very high achievement, having the best of both worlds, brain-wise. Tchaikovsky is rumored to be one of those. Gay guys make wonderful friends for women.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness - Mental Projections - Characterisation

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1962(12/16/03 1:47 pm)Reply | ---<hr/> Quote: <hr/> Gay guys make wonderful friends for women. <hr/> If you mean gay as in exuberant, bright, engaging, then I agree, if you mean homosexual, I do not. Anna, I am amazed by your intelligence in some areas, and then your sudden diving into societys platitudes! I have to say I am impressed by your standing for your children. Edited by: suergaz at: 12/17/03 11:51 am |

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 659

(12/16/03 2:02 pm)

Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Biggier: Imagine, living your life based on the movement of stars in constellations that may nopt even exist anymore!! That right. When we look up at the stars we don't see them....we see only the light that left them in some cases millions and millions of years ago. They may have gone super-nocva or burnt out eons ago. Only the astrology yokels didn't know that back then, did they?

Just a side note. Assuming that astrology conforms with relativity, the demise of stars within their own reference frame would be of no consequence, since their radiation still exists in our reference frame. Besides, as far as I understand astrology it is mainly about the position of planets, not about that of stars.

Anna: Did you know dog's ears aren't all that much better than ours? And their eyesight is notoriously poor.

I can confirm that. None of our dogs (currently 16) is able to recognize me at a 20-25 m distance. However, they are able to recognize my face when I come closer. They are also able to recognize voices instantly.

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1131

(12/16/03 2:09 pm)

Reply

and we all were gay

---

Societal platitudes - hell! I can't help it if society has finally caught up with my thinking. I worked out the stuff I said after reading about normal variations from hormonal influences on mouse embryos. And who are you to say gay guys don't make great friends for women? Lots of us think so. (They tend to be exuberant, bright and engaging.)BTW, the idea that homosexuality is lodged within the brain structure is pretty new, so again - what societal platitudes?

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1334
(12/16/03 2:35 pm)
Reply

---

---

Us heterosexual males can be bright, exuberant, and engaging...when we are trying to impress you. Otherwise, we don't usually put out the effort.

Men are <insert farm animal reference here>. So?

/oink

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 799
(12/16/03 10:33 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Quote:

---

Biggier: Imagine, living your life based on the movement of stars in constellations that may nopt even exist anymore!!
That right. When we look up at the stars we don't see them.... we see only the light that left them in some cases millions and millions of years ago. They may have gone super-nocva or burnt out eons ago.

Thomas: Just a side note. Assuming that astrology conforms with relativity, the demise of stars within their own reference frame would be of no consequence, since their radiation still exists in our reference frame.

---

Aww, I wanted to say that.

Not that I wanted to confirm the validity of astrology.

Anyway, at least I can add that gravity may also have to come into the equation, and of course gravity also propagates at 'the speed of relativity'. The observation of position would correspond exactly to 'influence', be it gravitonic (is that a word? is that a thing?), or photonic. However it wouldn't correspond with regard to instantaneous 'action at a distance', if quantum probability were considered.

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1963(12/17/03 12:58 am)Reply     | --- <hr/> I want to think, and do, that there is a kind of woman who would only find true friendship in her lover...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1133(12/17/03 3:33 am)Reply | is friendship murder then :) <hr/> That's a limiting view. And even if so, it does not mean you don't have other friends. What do you mean by true friendship, and would it also be true for the man, that the only true friendship is with his lover?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 27(12/17/03 9:26 am)Reply        | Re: lifeafterlife <hr/> Bird, When two folks begin to discuss topics as inherently complex and prone to ambiguity as the ones we are, it can take a long time before the translations really begin to kick in---if ever. After all, I can only say what I think I mean and you can only read what you think I am saying. And that can only flow from our actual lives---the experiences we have had [and did not have], the people we have met [and did not meet]....and, of course, the existential contexts out of which we derived our sense of self. Trust me: it's a miracle we understand ourselves as well as we do. Or, rather, think we do. Those "temporary external things", in other words, ARE the crucial factors that determine how we view reality. And if you believe that our [very, very ephemeral] 70 odd years is ALL THERE IS, than psycho-babble bullshit expressions [sorry, that's just my own personal opinion respecting what they are]like "our true self" evaporates with us when we are gone. Like forever and ever and ever. Again that is WHY the weakest of minds cling to expressions like that---because they do not have any substantial evidence to sustain the delusion that the "soul" lives on otherwise. They embrace their "state of mind" as, say, a child does a teddy bear. A psychological security blanket in the shadow of the abyss. McGovern, eh? Me too. I not only met the man---shook his hand---in helping to organize the state of Maryland, but actually had a conversation with his wife Eleanor and the actress Nancy Kulp. In fact I still remember so vividly her comment about how frustrating it was to have such a poor memory; she'd read an article, she told me, and ten minutes later forget everything in it. I do too. Drives me crazy. |

So, how could you go from George to ghosts in the machine? Still, that anecdote alone requires that [for the rest of this post] I treat your ideas with only the greatest of respect!!

Not. ; )

Well, if God does exist, I DO blame him. In fact, if I ever make it to Judgment Day it will be me judging him too. I'll have a few questions for him---starving children, tectonic plates, the months I spent in a makeshift hospital with a Special Forces medic outside of Song Be South---and if he does not answer them to my satisfaction I will kick the sadistic bastard square in the....well, let's just say I will take the express elevator down to Hell myself. At least with Satan everything is all up front. No hypocritical crap about being loving just and merciful, in other words. Of course, that is just what most Christians say, right? What about what LUTHER says? You know the God of the OLD Testament. Mr Fire and Brimstone. Mr Pogrom. Mr. wipe out all humanity in a flood.

Let's not SAY anything....let's direct Biggie to the evidence that a soul, God, afterlife, paranormal phenomena etc. actually exists---empirically, phenomenologically. After all, the bit about the bees can in fact be noted empirically, right? We may not understand how it works but then, on the other hand, think of how much modern science has explained to us in just the past 100 years. Now, maybe 5,000 years in the future [or 50,000 years] science will not be able to go into astonishing detail as to how dogs and bees do what they do---based on natural explanations. But I strongly suspect they will, eh?

Okay, let's say there is something to astrology. What does astrology do? Well, among other things, it predicts the future. You know, Nostradamus? Now, if you can predict the future then that means we have no free will. How can we have free will if something is already fated to happen anyway? And, if we have no free will, there is no rational basis upon which to embed human moral interactions. In other words, if Nostradamus "saw" into the future and "predicted" Hitler and the Holocaust then Hitler was destined to do what he did and we cannot hold him responsible ethically, right? Same with God. If God is omniscient that means he knows everything. If he knows everything then he knows everything you and I are going to do BEFORE we do it. Therefore anything we do cannot be judged by other mere mortals as immoral because God already had privy to it. It would be the same as holding God himself responsible, right? Or if they use dogs to predict earthquakes then are they not interfering in God's Will that the earthquake occur and maim, mutilate and massacre the folks in its path? Or is that also a part of God's will, as well?

AM I a shallow thinker, Bird? We shall see, won't we?

Biggie

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 200

(12/17/03 10:36 am)

Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

*Absolutely, homosexuals understand it - they *have* a female psyche themselves! To one degree or another...it's a continuum from fairly masculine to ridiculously feminine. It depends, I am sure, on the degree of brain deviation from the male "norm" which may be more of an ideal...I would suppose that the almost masculine ones would have potential for very high achievement, having the best of both worlds, brain-wise. Tchaikovsky is rumored to be one of those. Gay guys make wonderful friends for women.*

I'd just like to add some points without getting dragged into the discussion.

I think you are riding roughshod over the differences between masculine and feminine mindedness (ie. rationality/irrationality) versus sexual orientation. I think it is quite obvious that they are on different scales.

I have come across a number of relatively masculine minded homosexual males in the 50-60 age bucket. Very few people would be able to guess that they were homosexual, even from a well considered perspective. However, before we make any conclusions about them we need to take into account the forces that shaped their character development. In a general sense, the more difficulties that a person experiences in their life the more likely they are to develop a rational disposition. Any homosexual male that grew up in a developed society over the last 50-60 years is likely to have had to face up to some seriously difficult issues, and become more rational as a result. We can contrast that with areas of society nowadays where homosexuality is vogue, it's the 'in thing', and don't those young blokes tend to have far more feminine characteristics!

So we need to delve somewhat broader than just exploring genetic predispositions, cultural forces are significant.

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1966
(12/17/03 12:00 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Quote:

---

suergaz:-I want to think, and do, that there is a kind of woman who would only find true friendship in her lover...

birdofhermes:-That's a limiting view. And even if so, it does not mean you don't have other friends. What do you mean by true friendship, and would it also be true for the man, that the only true friendship is with his lover?

---

Perhaps true friendship is peerlessness!

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 801
(12/17/03 12:10 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Rhett,

Delve broader?

;-)

I think it's great that you've just illustrated the error and stupidity of referring to rational and irrational mindedness as masculine and feminine mindedness respectively. Because whether those who do such like it or not, gay males are generally feminine, that is to say that they generally have female brains, as categorised by the apparent morphological and procedural differences between the male and female brain. So for example, the throwing ability of such individuals will correspond more closely to that of females than it will to that of males, as will their spatial abilities. They will also be more caring than the average male, more like the average female, better at multi-tasking too. Their more feminine brain creates a more feminine mind. The accompanying mindset can therefore be justifiably be termed more feminine. And yet, as you say, many such individuals are in possession of relatively more rational minds, just like many females are.

Such a designation seems born of feminine mindedness.....sorry, irrationality.

You make a good point about cultural forces. Imagine the difference in those forces between a male and female in any society. And imagine how a female minded person, brought up as a male might differ from one brought up as a female.

As for my experience, we have a fairly close relationship with a gay male couple, in their late forties/early fifties. One of them is a relatively rational person more rational than most; the other not so. The irrational one has faced much difficulty in life, beyond that of being different. He hasn't leart a fuckin thing. The one of a relatively less troubled history is by far the more rational.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 12/17/03 12:11 pm

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 205
(12/17/03 12:24 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

We do what we want with our definitions with the aim of conveying as much meaning as possible. I was just making a small contribution, so if you want to make it out to have been a wholistic approach to the topic, them do so at your will. I think you are just disagreeing for the sake of it.

Rhett

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1135
(12/17/03 1:29 pm)
Reply

lifeaferlife

---

You said those temporary things are how we view reality. Yes, but I was getting at our view of self. You seemed to be saying that what people think of as themselves is sort of nonexistent, ephemeral. I agree, but I think there may be a deeper, true self, that most people are unaware of. For example, a simple minded Christian thinks they are going to heaven just as is. Same face, same body really, same folks to hang out with. Yet, with the possible exception of the face, absolutely everything about our bodies is needed only for the kind of life we have here with perishable bodies that need food, are heavy, and must reproduce. If we have immortal life, we would have to be more like ghosts. Similarly, what most people think of as their soul, is more like their personal memories and their emotions. The trend in Protestant churches is for a "good" preacher to get highly emotional and stoke up the flames of people's lower emotions, and they come away thinking they've had a spiritual experience.

You seem quite deeply impressed with the finality of your death. I certainly don't have a firm belief about exactly what happens, but I do think there is a soul which survives death, reincarnates, and slowly learns. At the same time, every individual personality is unique, and never to be repeated. Even if there is reincarnation, I find death a poignant tragedy.

Again, if there is a soul, then exactly the behaviors that we see are what we would expect. In which case it is not weakness of mind, just spiritual instinct. There's no sense harping on insulting others with the idea that they are too weak to take the reality of death. If death is all there is, nothing matters anyway.

I once said to my mother, that if I ever get my hands on that scoundrel, Jehovah...(She is very religious but her eyes widened in amusement and I could see she gets a kick out of my iconoclasm.)

But you see, Jehovah is an imposter, and the Bible filled with contradictory crap. What am I to think when you repeat yourself as if I had not already addressed the question? I really think, I don't mean to be mean, that you glossed over it and didn't understand it, although OF COURSE you think you did. It is childish, immature to blame God for the misery we have caused ourselves. I'm not going to say anything further until you address what I already wrote a couple of days back.

Ha, ha! I agree with you about Satan. You've just got to learn to read between the lines in the Bible. In Genesis also, you can see that it is not necessarily Satan who is the bad guy. I particularly noticed in the book of Job, that Satan was the straight dealer, and God was not. (Must've been Jehovah.)

By Luther, are you referring to Martin Luther? He is not even worth discussing. Dismiss him from your mind.

There's nothing hypocritical about the mercy of God. It is the slander commonly known as Christianity (and Islam and probably Judaism) that is hypocritical. If for the sake of argument, we accept Christianity at face value, then Satan has had his way with the church, infiltrating into the very heart and scriptures, so that people have accepted slander as truth, and are horribly confused by the contradictory advice.

The truth is, God is always merciful, loves and promotes all things equally, is on everyone's side, there is no guilt, and all is ALWAYS

ALREADY forgiven. In God there is "no variation, neither shadow of turning."

You do realize that no one has yet been able to either prove or disprove God - what makes you think I can do it? But I do think there is a lot of evidence for psychic phenomena; however, no amount of it will satisfy some people.

As to astrology and future predicting, it is of course not so simple. There can be only tendencies. There are so many causes leading up to one event or another. The question of free will is not an easy one for me, I can't pretend to know all about it. But it is certainly absurd to suppose that there is a personal God deciding to cause an earthquake today, and who will be killed in it, and becoming then annoyed when people or animals use the skills he gave them to try to live. Taking that reasoning to its ultimate, you should not even rise from your bed and eat because it might be against God's will. No wonder you hate God. Truly the Protestant church is a detrimental thing! It teaches thought patterns that are so low, and a God that is so wicked, only the stupidest people can fail to question it, and all must hate God deep in their hearts. And don't tell me you are perchance Catholic, because it's no better and it is the mother of Protestantism.

I have a problem with total omniscience because that would be very boring for God. My opinion of predicting the future such as Nostradamus, is either some sort of strong astrological tendency, or a vision, in which the person leaves their body or their time and literally sees the future like a picture. That doesn't mean it was predetermined.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 810
(12/18/03 11:29 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: I think you are just disagreeing for the sake of it.

---

Not a bit of it Rhett. I am expressing my disagreement because I disagree strongly enough to want to express it. It's certainly nothing personal. Before you were a member of the forum, I disagreed strongly and expressed such to David and Dan, on the subject of their chosen designation for their operable labels and accompanying definitions for such things as masculine and feminine mindedness, genius, rationality and irrationality, logic, Universe, and such. I also expressed that, in my opinion, the use of the particular labels in question is more hinderance than help to their cause.

Quote:

---

Rhett: We do what we want with our definitions with the aim of conveying as much meaning as possible. I was just making a small contribution, so if you want to make it out to have been a wholistic approach to the topic, them do so at your will.

---

I was simply observing that you had provided, to my eyes, compelling reason to doubt the validity of your labels 'masculine and feminine mindedness' (Which were the subject of your post, or the "riding roughshod over" thereof.), in the very words you used to expand your thoughts. It was nothing to do with the subject of the topic.

Naturally, being as I'm uncomfortable with such useage, I thought I'd point it out.

I can't understand why you would interpret what I said in such a way. Again, it's certainly nothing personal.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 12/18/03 11:31 am

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1339
(12/18/03 11:41 am)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

He is "drawing conclusions."

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 437
(12/18/03 12:10 pm)
Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

In a century or two, we'll all be bisexual. There will be less differences between the sexes, and with our Extreme Makeovers we'll all be beautiful, so to spice it up we'll end up sticking it in to both.

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 28

(12/18/03 12:21 pm)

Reply

Re: lifeafterlife

---

Bird,

I do not impose "finality" on any of my points. And that is because they are embedded in antinomies that are, in turn, embedded in all primordial questions. You can argue "toward" God/soul/afterlife or "away" from them. Providing you accept the underlying premises any syllogistic conclusion is "logical". Therefore, I focus the intellectual/philosophical beam on the manner in which someone renders the premises more realistic by embedding them "out in the world" [empirically/phenomenologically/experientially] rather than on just speculating about them conceptually or analytically. Or far worse, spiritually, intuitively, transcendently.

Instead, you give me empirically meaningless expressions like "spiritual instinct". What does that mean? Well, pretty much anything you want it to mean because you have never actually embedded the spirit/soul itself in an experience I can relate to in terms of my own life.

This, say, in opposition to a concept like "freedom". Freedom like the soul is not a thing you can hold in your hands. But you can realistically situate the concept/idea of human freedom out in the real world by noting actual human historical/cultural interactions and then discussing how different people viewed "freedom" contextually.

I am willing to admit, however, that, in so doing, we still cannot Define Freedom other than as an antinomy. But the contradictory renditions of it will always be circumstantial in nature. At least it will if someone wants to discuss freedom with me.

How are we to blame the 18,500 children who will die in agony of starvation over the next 24 hours for their plight? How are we to blame the millions of folks who have died in one or another natural disaster for their agony and obliteration? You really expose your utter lack of intellectual depth, in my opinion, when you go down the "we can't blame God for misery we caused ourself" line. It's like a guy letting his pit bull roam the neighborhood at will. One day it gets into a neighbor's yard and chews a 3 year old to shreds. Then when the police arrive, he says, "hey, don't blame me, it was the dog!" And God sees all...and does nothing at all.

If I don't respond specifically to a point/question you raised/asked "days ago" then you just have to repeat it. I am in many different venues and my memory [as I noted] is not the best in the world.

As for Satan, blaming HIM is particularly preposterous because he is no less a creation of an omnipotent God than you or I are. As though this "loving and just and merciful" Lord can't squash him like a bug. Instead, like the pit bull, God just lets him roam the world tempting souls at his leisure. That's called "entrapment" in some circles. And there are very good laws against it respecting us mere mortals.

Oh gee, of course, dismiss Luther from my mind because he dares not only to call Jehovah of the Old Testament a ruthless, tyrannical taskmaster...Mr Pogrom hurling lightning bolts at anyone he pleases for whatever reason he see fit to [and slaughtering the innocent in turn]; but, in turn, he actually stands up to the old bastard from time to time. What brass balls compared to the flocks of sheep that fill the church pews these days. The meek shall inherit the earth indeed!!!

I would ask WHAT God?, but I may as well ask a child WHAT Santa Claus?, right.

In other words, you make all of these ridiculous, unsubstantiated claims about God as though he were sitting on the couch right next to us.

And this is not Sunday School. In a philosophy venue it is always the responsibility of those who posit the existence of God to prove he does, in fact, exist..not the responsibility of the atheist to prove that he does not. As though saying no one has proven it one way or the other yet means their arguments hold the same weight as rational thoughts.

A lot of evidence for psychic phenomenon? Oh, sure. Just [sigh] not the sort those stubborn scientific method type guys insist upon performing experiments on to authenticate.

So, how do you differentiate an astrological "tendency" from an astrological "prediction"? Is it 20% of it? 30%? 50%, 85%? Of course, the great thing about calling it a "tendency" is that it NEVER has to be right in the bullseye, does it? It doesn't even half to hit the damn board: "I predict there will be another war in the 21st century---and more than 100 people will die in it, including innocent children. I predict God will be aware of it and choose, in his infinite wisdom and through his mysterious ways, to do nothing at all to stop it."

The relationship between God and free will is not a difficult concept to grasp, Bird. IF God is omniscient that means he knows EVERYTHING. If someone knows EVERYthing he knows EVERYthing we say and do before we say and do it. Otherwise, if we really are free to choose our own behaviours this means God was not privy to them and thus does NOT know everything and [according to most believers] could not then BE God. At best you can argue as Kushner does: God is omniscient and omnipresent and omnibenevolent...but he is not omnipotent. He set all this in motion but it is beyond his control now to reign it in. He sits up in Heaven just as horrified as we are by the unimaginable pain and suffering that marbles the world around us. THAT sort of God, in having the best of intentions, is not one I would blame. Not morally.

Do you know WHY protestantism emerged out of the Protestant Reformation from Catholicism? It relates to the dialectical/historical/material evolution of political economy. You seem to have rather strong opinions about the alleged stupidity of folks embracing either approach to God. As though the approach YOU thought up is, say, theologically far more sophisticated than theirs.

Well, okay, let's hear it.

Biggie

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1139
(12/18/03 1:28 pm)
Reply

gay guys

---

Quote:

---

I think you are riding roughshod over the differences between masculine and feminine mindedness (ie. rationality/irrationality) versus sexual orientation. I think it is quite obvious that they are on different scales.

---

Actually, I do not understand the above paragraph. But it is clear from the rest of your post that you don't understand what I said. I said nothing about genetics. It is a developmental deviation in the brain. Male and female brains are different, and it begins in utero. Many and perhaps most of the differences between the sexes, their attitudes and codes of behavior are determined by brain structure and hormones. It is clear that male homosexuals are anywhere on a continuum from very feminine to almost normally male.

I also think it is absurd to assert that difficulties in life make one more rational. They make one overwhelmed, which leads to irrational emotion. Certain difficulties presented to a strong enough person might cause their thinking to be put to the test with a good outcome, and perhaps that is what you mean.

You also seem to be saying that as long as you're male, even homosexual, you are necessarily rational.

Actually, I disagree with the assumption that emotions are irrational. Emotions are perfectly rational. Irrationality springs from the mind.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1140

(12/18/03 2:11 pm)

Reply

recovering christian

---

So you want me to define examples of soul in the world as their is freedom in the world?

You have such concrete, simplistic ways of seeing everything. Why would anyone blame starving children for their plight. I said that human beings as a whole are responsible for the human condition.

What do you want God to do? You want him to stop it. OK, how should he stop it, and what then?

What difference does it make if you die in an earthquake or of a heart attack? Death is the problem.

No, it is not lack of depth that makes me fail to think God has a pitbull that he lets loose. You've got to stop thinking like a child.

You are filled with anger and confusion over your ridiculous religious upbringing.

I don't even think of God in the way you do, your ideas about what "he" should "do" to "us" really are meaningless. We are not separate from God. There is nothing that is not God. There being nothing which is not God means that all that exists simply IS - it has no opposite. It also means we might as well be atheists, since the God with no opposite can no longer be named.

It isn't so much that you didn't respond to some point or other, rather you speak as though you had not read my main answers. There is no adjustment, either by agreement, disagreement, or argument to what I've said.

I am not sure if the child you are talking about is me, but I think it is you. The God you believe in is Santa Claus, and you keep pestering me with questions like why he gives more toys to the rich kids. First of all, why aren't you asking why the rich kids don't share, and second of all, why are we discussing Santa Claus?

Are you saying that Martin Luther called Jehovah a tyrannical taskmaster and stood up to him? I'd like to hear more.

As for blaming Satan - OK, let's not!

Oh, a little line just popped in my head from my old prayer book. I think you'll like it - "The devil is like a ravaging lion, seeking whom he may devour."

Am I more theologically sophisticated than the likes of Catholics and Protestants. Yes, orders of magnitude more. If you don't see that, it can only mean you are so close to them that you are unable to discern things. Sort of like a person with an IQ of 85 trying to decide who is smarter, the one with 130, 140 or 150. Of all the worlds religions, save perhaps cannibalistic voodoo, there is nothing lower than the born-again christian, or the southern baptist and their ilk. Because they are rock bottom, they have no idea of their true spiritual position. They are quite blind.

Again, I don't particularly believe that astrology could predict anything with accuracy because there are such an infinite number of factors that lead up to any event. Astrological influences could be one of them.

I don't really think of God as omniscient. Mostly God is impersonal, I think. Even though God may be love, it is impersonal love.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 668
(12/18/03 2:15 pm)
Reply

Re: Suffering

Biggier: How are we to blame the 18,500 children who will die in agony of starvation over the next 24 hours for their plight? How are we to blame the millions of folks who have died in one or another natural disaster for their agony and obliteration?

Looks like you don't see through the nature of suffering, Biggier. There are many forms of suffering ranging from mild -even pleasant- to extreme and severe, everywhere around us, all the time. Yet, nobody is to blame, because suffering is in the nature of existence. Study Buddhism. It has the answers you are looking for.

Thomas

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

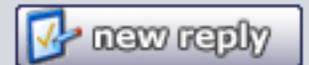

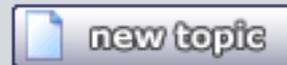

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness/Awareness

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 170(12/12/03 4:04 pm)Reply |  Mindfulness/Awareness <hr/> Nox wrote: Quote: <hr/> KS: The only way to be properly aware/mindful of anything at all is if you are enlightened. Having an ego, ie., delusion, makes one blind. N: The ego is a defense mechanism, isn't it the belief that one IS the ego the root of the deluded blindness and not the ego itself?Are you advocating destruction, elimination of the ego? <hr/> If the ego is defined as "delusion", as I did above, then the ego is definitely the cause of blindness. The ego is a defense mechanism, but it is also the creator of the things it has to defend against. Quote: <hr/> My understanding of being mindful of the breath is the |

realization of the emptiness and impermanence of any such independently existing object and the correlation between the breath, the ego and Reality.

---

That sounds reasonable.

Quote:

---

This sounds a lot like the proverbial Catch 22. What then do you and David recommend that the "Beginner" do to remove delusion?

---

Start with small truths, then proceed to bigger ones.

Quote:

---

KS: When a modern Buddhist teacher sits in front of his students and tells them they should appreciate how lucky they are to have been born as "human," he is no different to a car salesman telling a bunch of paupers that they can each afford a $200,000 car. He is ruining them, and Buddhism.

Nox:

"Rare is birth as a human being.

Hard is the life of mortals.

Do not let slip this opportunity."

--Dhammapada, v. 182, 135.

---

But who is there to explain this teaching to people, and the fact that merely having a human form doesn't at all mean a person is a "human being"?

Quote:

---

Mindfulness (sati), development of skillful qualities, practice, attainment of the Foundations that lead to the realization of Liberation or the destruction of Ignorance pertaining to the body, feelings, mind and mental qualities. One of the factors that lead to equanimity. which leads to Non-reactive Awareness.

The more one develops the qualities of mindfulness the more skillful and sensitive one becomes to the peeling away of the subtle layers of the present moment until nothing remains blocking or hindering ones path.

---

Under this definition, it would follow that a perfected person (a Buddha), would have no mindfulness. But a Buddha has precisely the absolute mindfulness. Only a Buddha can be mind-full. Anyone less than perfect can at best only be using part-mind.

A Buddha ceases to need to be mindful of his own delusions, as he no longer has any, but he continues to be mindful of the delusions of others. He is also mindful of every truth he perceives.

There are too many people out there supposedly practicing "mindfulness" without actually learning what a delusion is in the first place, and without any intention to rid themselves of those delusions. That's why they're not going anywhere.

Quote:

---

Awareness of Bhavanga consciousness or "life continuum", factor of life, the root cause or condition of existence.

---

This sounds like simply awareness of Reality, only possessed in its pure form by enlightened beings.

Edited by: ksolway at: 12/12/03 5:02 pm

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 640

(12/12/03 7:09 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: Proper mindfulness of the breath is identical with awareness of Truth, which is identical with enlightenment, which is identical with proper mindfulness of anything at all.

Proper mindfulness of the breath can be achieved by anyone through concentration exercises. It is not identical with enlightenment. 'Awareness of truth' is something that you just made up for the purpose of your speech. Another concept. Another illusion. In reality it is very simple. Awareness of being is awareness of truth, because being is truth.

Kevin: This kind of mindfulness is entirely unheard of to the modern Buddhist.

And what in God's name is a modern Buddhist (or Hindu) and how do they differ from ancient / medieval Hindus and Buddhists?

Kevin: Centuries of experience have shown us that concentrating the attention onto things such as the breath, or mantras, leads a person to become like a modern buddhist or hindu: ie, a mindless herd animal, stuck in the mud, with no potential for the slightest progress, and even becoming progressively worse.

Ah, the herd animal. We have heard that expression before. Did you consider that humans are social beings and that "herds" are potentially beneficial to the individual? What about the Genius gathering? Isn't this forum somewhat herdlike?

Kevin: Reality itself, or in Buddhist terms, emptiness, sunyata, Buddha-nature, is not a concept, but is in fact the only real thing there is.

Sunyata is not more than a concept when you only understand it intellectually. In order to be meaningful you must apply it to your own life. That happens basically through awareness. Is sunyata then a "real" thing? - No. - It is just a description of reality.

Kevin: The fatal fault of modern Buddhism is that it is giving teachings meant for people in the "human realm" (ie, those like HuzHeng) to people who are in the hell, preta, or animal realms.

Please elaborate. Which teachings you believe to be designed for the hell & animal realms?

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 172

(12/12/03 8:14 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: Proper mindfulness of the breath is identical with awareness of Truth, which is identical with enlightenment, which is identical with proper mindfulness of anything at all.

T: Proper mindfulness of the breath can be achieved by anyone through concentration exercises. It is not identical with enlightenment.

---

You are essentially saying that a person can have "proper mindfulness" at the same time as being totally deluded. That's a very strange definition of "proper mindfulness".

Quote:

---

'Awareness of truth' is something that you just made up for the purpose of your speech. Another concept. Another illusion. In reality it is very simple. Awareness of being is awareness of truth, because being is truth.

---

But you've just said that "Awareness of truth" is just a concept, so "awareness of being" must be only a concept as well. That all seems pretty pointless.

Quote:

---

Kevin: This kind of mindfulness is entirely unheard of to the modern Buddhist.

And what in God's name is a modern Buddhist (or Hindu) and how do they differ from ancient / medieval Hindus and ## Buddhists?

---

The ancient Buddhists wrote the Buddhist scriptures, which do contain significant wisdom, so they must be a world away from modern Buddhists, who are almost indistinguishable from Christians.

Quote:

---

Kevin: The fatal fault of modern Buddhism is that it is giving teachings meant for people in the "human realm" (ie, those like HuzHeng) to people who are in the hell, preta, or animal realms.

T: Please elaborate. Which teachings you believe to be designed for the hell & animal realms?

---

All true Buddhist teachings are designed for those rare few individuals who are in the "human realm", ie., those who have enough consciousness, reasoning capacity, and desire, to understand basic reasonings, and put them into practice.

"Teachings" for those in the lower realms, cannot really take the form of teachings, but are of the form of crude palliatives, like a bucket of water poured upon someone burning to death.

Some of the false so-called Buddhist teachings, popular with people in the lower realm, are those such as the recitation of mantras, concentration on the breath, etc.

To elaborate, such teachings are false because they are only palliatives, and not a true cure, and they are popular for the same reason that a bucket of water is highly desirable to someone burning to death in the flames of hell.

The wise way to help a person in the lower realms, is in such a way that will lead them skillfully towards the human realm. Simply concentrating on the breath, or suchlike, is not enough on its own, as is made clear by the many who have tried it.

KeithTun

Registered User

Posts: 1

(12/13/03 1:57 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Kevin:

The "buddhism" you see today is the result of the dhamma integrating itself into various cultures, each with their own unique practices and traditions. This is exemplified by multitude of rituals from countries such as Tibet, Japan, China, Sri Lanka and so on. The "buddhism" arises once the dhamma is integrated into an organised combination of traditions and rituals. A typical buddhist is one who follows those traditions.

Most people often fail to notice the difference between the "buddhism" (whether it is mahayana, tantric, pure land, etc.) that they know and the Dhamma that is expounded by the sage Siddhatha Gotama.

Although it might seem that buddhists today are content with their observation of precepts and practice of compassion, there are also many "buddhists" that are actually conducting an open-minded investigation into the truth (dhamma). Many of the theravada monks I had the chance to talk to in Burma were suprisingly well read in science and western philosophy. Another interesting thing was how they all knew the importance of a thorough investigation and the dangers of wild speculations.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 433

(12/13/03 2:36 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Wild speculation is how we truly learn about our own mind and reality. Such speculation is only dangerous when actioned by those who do so emotionally and they'll never learn to implement the rational aspects of whatever is being speculated about, until sufficiently punished by their own actions.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1578

(12/13/03 2:51 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Ah, the herd animal. We have heard that expression before. Did you consider that humans are social beings and that "herds" are potentially beneficial to the individual? What about the Genius gathering? Isn't this forum somewhat herdlike?

---

Well, yes it is, Thomas, as seen through the eyes of the terminally vapid and herdly.

Funny thing about cows, they see each other everywhere they go - in fact, it's all they ever really see....

Dan Rowden

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 41

(12/14/03 4:44 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

But who is there to explain this teaching to people, and the fact that merely having a human form doesn't at all mean a person is a "human being"

---

The Guru lies within.

The Dhamma of the Buddha's is eternal and available for those that desire the Truth above all else.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 642

(12/14/03 5:57 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: You are essentially saying that a person can have "proper mindfulness" at the same time as being totally deluded. That's a very strange definition of "proper mindfulness".

This can get fairly involved, Kevin. Mindfulness is a quality that, although to some degree natural, must be developed and delusions are always present in varying degrees and forms in the undeveloped mind. Mindfulness is necessary to recognize delusions, so it is only logical that increasing mindfulness leads to decreasing delusions.

Kevin: But you've just said that "Awareness of truth" is just a concept, so "awareness of being" must be only a concept as well. That all seems pretty pointless.

Let me try to explain it this way: truth -in the common understanding- is the positive result of a logical thought operation which requires judgment. The need to classify an observation and assign right or wrong, good or bad, true or false values arises from the "I", the thinker. Awareness, on the other hand, is pure observation that does not require an apparatus to make judgments. Judgments may arise out of habit, but the objective of developing awareness is simply to "see and listen" and to tune in with the flood of sensations and perceptions that come along.

Kevin: All true Buddhist teachings are designed for those rare few individuals who are in the "human realm", ie., those who have enough consciousness, reasoning capacity, and desire, to understand basic reasonings, and put them into practice. "Teachings" for those in the lower realms, cannot really take the form of teachings, but are of the form of crude palliatives, like a bucket of water poured upon someone burning to death.

People with different predicaments need different treatments. Good point. But it is interesting that you speak of "true" and "false" Buddhist teachings and proceed to explain which ones are true and which ones are false. I suppose that the ones you perceive to be true are those that apply to your own predicament. But are the other teachings therefore false?

Such as reasoning is biased. For some people a bucket of water is full of wisdom.

Kevin: The wise way to help a person in the lower realms, is in such a way that will lead them skillfully towards the human realm. Simply concentrating on the breath, or suchlike, is not enough on its own, as is made clear by the many who have tried it.

I understand that you value the Buddha's wisdom, or at least some part of it. Since the Buddha spent much of his own life in meditation, and since he recommended it quite emphatically to his followers, it will be difficult for you to uphold the view that meditation practice is only for the weak minded.

Kevin: The ancient Buddhists wrote the Buddhist scriptures, which do contain significant wisdom, so they must be a world away from modern Buddhists, who are almost indistinguishable from Christians.

If you had significant experience with living in a present day Buddhist country or circle I might be inclined to discuss this point with you. However, the way things are, I can't see how you are qualified to make such a judgment.

Thomas

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 643
(12/14/03 5:58 pm)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Dan: Well, yes it is, Thomas, as seen through the eyes of the terminally vapid and herdly. Funny thing about cows, they see each other everywhere they go - in fact, it's all they ever really see....

Welcome to the world of self-deception, honorable thinker! It is pointless to advise other people about their herdiness while failing to recognize the fellow cows on your own pasture.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 12/15/03 1:07 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 175

(12/14/03 7:58 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Awareness, on the other hand, is pure observation that does not require an apparatus to make judgments. Judgments may arise out of habit, but the objective of developing awareness is simply to "see and listen" and to tune in with the flood of sensations and perceptions that come along.

---

Any so called "awareness" that did not involve an active consciousness of truth and falsity, is not the kind of awareness I would wish anyone to have. It is what I would call "stream of consciousness", which is an animal, or vegetative function of mind.

Quote:

---

Kevin: The wise way to help a person in the lower realms, is in such a way that will lead them skillfully towards the human realm. Simply concentrating on the breath, or suchlike, is not enough on its own, as is made clear by the many who have tried it.

T: I understand that you value the Buddha's wisdom, or at least some part of it. Since the Buddha spent much of his own life in meditation, and since he recommended it quite emphatically to his followers, it will be difficult for you to uphold the view that meditation practice is only for the weak minded.

---

"Meditation" means centering the thoughts upon Ultimate Truth, the Absolute Reality, which means eliminating delusions from the mind. This is a far cry from simply focusing the mind upon something like the breath, or performing rituals of some kind. Meditation is something that is practised in each and every moment, and is not something that is done with the legs crossed.

Quote:

---

Kevin: The ancient Buddhists wrote the Buddhist scriptures, which do contain significant wisdom, so they must be a world away from modern Buddhists, who are almost indistinguishable from Christians.

T: If you had significant experience with living in a present day Buddhist country or circle I might be inclined to discuss this point with you. However, the way things are, I can't see how you are qualified to make such a judgment.

---

I'm interested to know what makes you so sure that I haven't lived for a significant time in a present day Buddhist community?

KeithTun
Registered User
Posts: 2
(12/15/03 1:18 am)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz:
Wild speculation is how we truly learn about our own mind and reality. Such speculation is only dangerous when actioned by those who do so emotionally and they'll never learn to implement the rational aspects of whatever is being speculated about, until sufficiently punished by their own actions.

---

You are mostly on point. It all depends on the idea being speculated on. Did you intend to use "Speculation" instead of "Wild speculation"? Speculation is necessary in many fields such as scientific enquiry. Right speculation would lead to further enquiry or self-realisation after investigation. "Wild speculation" on the other hand, is what I define as the process of speculating on useless knowledge which provides no insight of reality for the speculator; it could also be a product of something other than the emotional urges of the individual. Wild speculation is a fruitless process resulting only in more speculation.

In a buddhist context, speculation on things which does not lead to the truth is avoided. That idea is linked to the dialogue between the Buddha and Malunkyaputta: "Suppose a man was pierced with an arrow and that it was heavily poisoned, would it be right for him to speculate 'I will not let this arrow be drawn out until I find out who shot it'? He would die before he before he knew the answers to those questions. The most important and urgent thing is to get the arrow removed and attend to the wound. Similarly there exists the unsatisfactoriness of existence, birth, ageing, dying, grief and suffering. You should attend to those first."

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1121

(12/15/03 12:59 pm)

Reply

 mindfulness/awareness

---

Quote:

---

"Meditation" means centering the thoughts upon Ultimate Truth, the Absolute Reality, which means eliminating delusions from the mind. This is a far cry from simply focusing the mind upon something like the breath, or performing rituals of some kind. Meditation is something that is practised in each and every moment, and is not something that is done with the legs crossed.

---

What matters is results. Enlightenment is more concrete than you realize. It is a matter of brain reorganization. It can be triggered by prolonged meditation or by intense focus. Although I personally prefer your kind, Kevin.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 645

(12/15/03 1:03 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: Any so called "awareness" that did not involve an active consciousness of truth and falsity, is not the kind of awareness I would wish anyone to have. It is what I would call "stream of consciousness", which is an animal, or vegetative function of mind.

Vegetative mind? I have heard that before. Thomas Aquinas? Or was it Aristotle?

I think you misunderstand the purpose of meditation, or respectively Vipassana meditation. It is not to meant to promote a lifestyle of passive reception or vegetative existence. It is designed to strengthen your mind, like physical exercise is designed to strengthen your body. The purpose of the latter is obviously not to carry around a pair of 100 lbs iron weights on your shoulder for the rest of your life. Hence, you might understand that the purpose of the former likewise differs from its means.

"Stream of consciousness", by the way is a term originally coined by the American philosopher William James, one of the pioneers of psychology, who used it to describe the continuity of mental activity in opposition to the scholars who limited their investigations to discrete mental events. James used it to describe the HUMAN psyche.

Kevin: "Meditation" means centering the thoughts upon Ultimate Truth, the Absolute Reality, which means eliminating delusions from the mind. This is a far cry from simply focusing the mind upon something like the breath, or performing rituals of some kind.

It may mean that. But when you attempt to climb a ladder it is usually a bad idea to begin with the topmost rung.

Kevin: Meditation is something that is practised in each and every moment, and is not something that is done with the legs crossed.

This is finally something we can agree about.

Kevin: I'm interested to know what makes you so sure that I haven't lived for a significant time in a present day Buddhist community?

I read your bio which provided no information about such experience.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 176

(12/15/03 2:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

Kevin: Meditation is something that is practised in each and every moment, and is not something that is done with the legs crossed.

This is finally something we can agree about.

---

As the mind, anyone's mind, naturally focuses on whatever it enjoys, it is pointless and unnecessary to train the mind to focus on certain specific things, like the breath. If a person enjoys a certain kind of music, then their mind will naturally be able to enter a "meditative" state when listening to that music. Therefore, training in concentration is mistaken.

What is needed is for people to enjoy thinking about truthful things, mentally pursuing the truth, and abiding in truthful frames of mind. The art of spiritual teaching is to influence people in such a way that they begin to enjoy truthful things more and more.

Quote:

---

Kevin: I'm interested to know what makes you so sure that I haven't lived for a significant time in a present day Buddhist community?

I read your bio which provided no information about such experience.

---

I've actually spent many months living in a Tibetan Buddhist community here in Australia: (www.chenrezig.com.au/). Possibly about a year in total, spread over several years. During that time I have seen at close hand all the traditional Buddhist training techniques in practice, and have observed that they are horribly fruitless. Out of a pool of hundreds of lower-realm beings that they had to work with, I would estimate that not a single human realm being has been created. And if a person with a lofty "human" mentality did by chance ever find their way to the community, they were either ignored, or made very unwelcome. They usually left within days or hours.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1124

(12/15/03 3:38 pm)

Reply

 mindfulness/awareness

---

Quote:

---

What is needed is for people to enjoy thinking about truthful things, mentally pursuing the truth, and abiding in truthful frames of mind. The art of spiritual teaching is to influence people in such a way that they begin to enjoy truthful things more and more.

---

This is stunning and personally relevant to me. You confirm my hope.

I do see a pitfall, though, that being that one cannot decide beforehand where the truth will lead.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 649

(12/15/03 5:32 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Kevin: As the mind, anyone's mind, naturally focuses on whatever it enjoys, it is pointless and unnecessary to train the mind to focus on certain specific things, like the breath.

Are you saying that it is preferable to let the mind focus on whatever it enjoys, games, television, entertainment, shopping, and such?

Kevin: Therefore, training in concentration is mistaken.

Says Kevin.

Kevin: The art of spiritual teaching is to influence people in such a way that they begin to enjoy truthful things more and more.

What are truthful things and how are they enjoyed?

Kevin: I've actually spent many months living in a Tibetan Buddhist community here in Australia: (www.chenrezig.com.au/).

Okay, so you have lived in a Buddhist community in Australia. I am interested in that. I am not interested in general statements about modern Buddhists.

Kevin: Out of a pool of hundreds of lower-realm beings that they had to work with, I would estimate that not a single human realm being has been created.

Now, this is an **interesting** statement - not because it bears the marks of eternal truth, irrefutable logic, or something like that, but because it is authentic. I wonder how you were able to distinguish lower realm beings from their human counterparts?

And if a person with a lofty "human" mentality did by chance ever find their way to the community, they were either ignored, or made very unwelcome. They usually left within days or hours.

But you staid on for months, even returned - in spite of having found that the community rejects their best? What made you stay? What made you leave?

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 177
(12/15/03 6:21 pm)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: As the mind, anyone's mind, naturally focuses on whatever it enjoys, it is pointless and unnecessary to train the mind to focus on certain specific things, like the breath.

Are you saying that it is preferrable to let the mind focus on whatever it enjoys, games, television, entertainment, shopping, and such?

---

I am saying that it is counter-productive to try and force the mind onto things it does not enjoy. A wise teacher knows how to bring his students to enjoy truth, so they will naturally want to think about truth.

Quote:

---

What are truthful things and how are they enjoyed?

---

. . . If you can't work that out for yourself, I can't help you.

Quote:

---

I wonder how you were able to distinguish lower realm beings from their human counterparts?

---

By looking, in the normal way.

Quote:

---

And if a person with a lofty "human" mentality did by chance ever find their way to the community, they were either ignored, or made very unwelcome. They usually left within days or hours.

But you staid on for months, even returned - in spite of having found that the community rejects their best? What made you stay? What made you leave?

---

I regarded my stay to be beneficial in the larger scheme of things. However, few thinking people would do as I did. I am more patient and tolerant than most.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 650

(12/15/03 7:01 pm)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: A wise teacher knows how to bring his students to enjoy truth, so they will naturally want to think about truth.

Ah, this is very Socratean. To bring students to enjoy truth. Very well. You say that the wise teacher knows how to bring his students there. But when I ask you about truthful things and how they are enjoyed, you answer:

...If you can't work that out for yourself, I can't help you.

Do you give the same answer to your students? Nothing more to say about truth? I dare to doubt that this leadership brings people to love truth.

Thomas: I wonder how you were able to distinguish lower realm beings from their human counterparts?

Kevin: By looking, in the normal way.

Okay, so if they don't have tails, fins, feathers, or antennas then they must be human, right? I can't help to notice some evasiveness. If you don't want to answer the question, or if you think it was inappropriate, that's alright.

Kevin: I regarded my stay to be beneficial in the larger scheme of things. However, few thinking people would do as I did. I am more patient and tolerant than most.

I don't doubt that you are patient. If you weren't patient we would probably not have this discussion. But what did you find beneficial about staying in the Buddhist community. Obviously not the breathing exercises. So what was it? And why did you leave if you thought it was beneficial?

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 178

(12/15/03 8:16 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: A wise teacher knows how to bring his students to enjoy truth, so they will naturally want to think about truth.

T: Ah, this is very Socratean. To bring students to enjoy truth. Very well. You say that the wise teacher knows how to bring his students there. But when I ask you about truthful things and how they are enjoyed, you answer:

...If you can't work that out for yourself, I can't help you.

---

I am reluctant to answer your questions because I sense they are not asked in a genuine spirit. You are intelligent enough to quite easily supply answers to your own questions, without asking me.

For example, "truthful things" would include everything I write in to this forum, everything on the The Thinking Man's Minefield, etc.

The second part of your question was "How are they enjoyed?" Well, if you have ever enjoyed anything truthful, simply ask yourself how you enjoyed it, and you have your answer.

Quote:

---

Thomas: I wonder how you were able to distinguish lower realm beings from their human counterparts?

Kevin: By looking, in the normal way.

T: Okay, so if they don't have tails, fins, feathers, or antennas then they must be human, right? I can't help to notice some evasiveness. If you don't want to answer the question, or if you think it was inappropriate, that's alright.

---

Yes, I think such simple questions are inappropriate, since the characteristics of those in the lower realms are listed in the scriptures for anyone who can comprehend them. One simply matches those listed characteristics with people in the real world in order to know which category applies, just the same as with all categorizing.

It's not hard to know if someone is suffering terribly (ie, in hell), if your eyes are open.

Quote:

---

Kevin: I regarded my stay to be beneficial in the larger scheme of things. However, few thinking people would do as I did. I am more patient and tolerant than most.

T: I don't doubt that you are patient. If you weren't patient we would probably not have this discussion. But what did you find beneficial about staying in the Buddhist community. Obviously not the breathing exercises. So what was it? And why did you leave if you thought it was beneficial?

---

There were a complex of reasons why I thought it was beneficial at the time, and there were a complex of reasons when the time came that I thought that doing something else was more beneficial. Once again, it is easy enough for your mind to fill in the gaps. Was there anything particular you had in mind?

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 655

(12/16/03 1:33 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: I am reluctant to answer your questions because I sense they are not asked in a genuine spirit.

It rather looks to me as if you are reluctant to answer my questions because they make you feel uncomfortable.

Kevin: The second part of your question was "How are they (truthful things) enjoyed?" Well, if you have ever enjoyed anything truthful, simply ask yourself how you enjoyed it, and you have your answer.

I am not even sure what truthful things are. Truthfulness is a human quality, isn't it? I do enjoy being with truthful people, in fact I consider it a blessing. Of course, it is possible to attribute truthfulness to certain **things** such as speech, written words, films, reports, etc. which are the works of people, and which stand for these people.

Kevin: It's not hard to know if someone is suffering terribly (ie, in hell), if your eyes are open.

Yes, but suffering is also part of the human realm. If someone is suffering this doesn't mean that they are in a hellish realm. They are still human and they are still capable of escaping their suffering.

Kevin: There were a complex of reasons why I thought it was beneficial at the time, and there were a complex of reasons when the time came that I thought that doing something else was more beneficial.

Whoa. I have the feeling you don't want to talk about those "complex reasons". Why not? This is what really matters, isn't it?

Kevin: Once again, it is easy enough for your mind to fill in the gaps.

Unfortunately it is not. I did not even know that you have been in a Buddhist community.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 179

(12/16/03 9:53 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: I am reluctant to answer your questions because I sense they are not asked in a genuine spirit.

T: It rather looks to me as if you are reluctant to answer my questions because they make you feel uncomfortable.

---

The only uncomfortable thing I find about your questions is that I don't like going around in circles.

Quote:

---

I am not even sure what truthful things are. Truthfulness is a human quality, isn't it? I do enjoy being with truthful people, in fact I consider it a blessing. Of course, it is possible to attribute truthfulness to certain *things* such as speech, written words, films, reports, etc. which are the works of people, and which stand for these people.

---

Certainly. It doesn't much matter what particular "things" we are talking about. The mind can still distinguish between something true and something false. Or between something plain and honest, and something shady and deceptive.

Quote:

---

Kevin: It's not hard to know if someone is suffering terribly (ie, in hell), if your eyes are open.

Yes, but suffering is also part of the human realm. If someone is suffering this doesn't mean that they are in a hellish realm. They are still human and they are still capable of escaping their suffering.

---

Yet, as I say, it is not hard to know if a person is suffering terribly. It is written all over their face, and the blackness of it jumps for hundreds of yards into the surrounding environment. The suffering of "humans" is much more subtle, and mild by comparison. The death of a loved one, for example, causes little suffering for a person in the "human realm". They are able to weather it with the equanimity that comes through a modicum of understanding and reason.

Quote:

---

Kevin: There were a complex of reasons why I thought it was beneficial at the time, and there were a complex of reasons when the time came that I thought that doing something else was more beneficial.

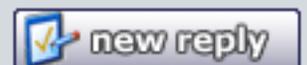

T: Whoa. I have the feeling you don't want to talk about those "complex reasons". Why not? This is what really matters, isn't it?

---

Simply because they are complex, and thus time consuming.

Why does an ordinary person go to a Buddhist community? You can add some of those reasons for my going. Why would someone like me in particular go to a Buddhist community? Add those reasons as well. Similarly for my reasons to leave the community.

I don't see the point to going through the detailed reasons. Did you have a specific query about this?

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

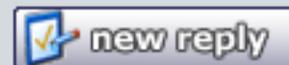

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness/Awareness

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 657(12/16/03 12:37 pm)Reply  |  Re: Mindfulness/Awareness <hr/> Kevin: The only uncomfortable thing I find about your questions is that I don't like going around in circles. Hahaha. If you don't like going around in circles why do you dance? Kevin: The suffering of "humans" is much more subtle, and mild by comparison. Okay, let's perhaps close this by establishing that there are various degrees of human suffering accompanied by levels of ignorance and intensity which are reminiscent of the animal and hell realm. Would you agree with this? Kevin: Why does an ordinary person go to a Buddhist community? You can add some of those reasons for my going. Why would someone like me in particular go to a Buddhist community? Add those reasons as well. Similarly for my reasons to leave the community. I don't see the point to going through the detailed reasons. Did you have a specific query about this? What interests me most are the reasons for your decision to join (and to leave) the community. I understand that they may be complex, but so are most other matters that we discuss here. Complexity is nothing special. I am less interested in general statements about Buddhism, because I think that the most important questions in philosophy are those that directly relate to our lives and the decisions we make. You have stated indirectly | that you are qualified to discuss modern (Western) Buddhism, so why are you backing down now?

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 180
(12/16/03 3:32 pm)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Okay, let's perhaps close this by establishing that there are various degrees of human suffering accompanied by levels of ignorance and intensity which are reminiscent of the animal and hell realm. Would you agree with this?

---

Yes.

Quote:

---

What interests me most are the reasons for your decision to join (and to leave) the community. I understand that they may be complex, but so are most other matters that we discuss here. Complexity is nothing special. I am less interested in general statements about Buddhism, because I think that the most important questions in philosophy are those that directly relate to our lives and the decisions we make. You have stated indirectly that you are qualified to discuss modern (Western) Buddhism, so why are you backing down now?

---

Main reasons for spending time at the Buddhist retreat: nice countryside, good library of Buddhist literature, some of the most highly trained and interesting Buddhist monks. Main reason for leaving: mind-dead environment.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1337
(12/16/03 4:17 pm)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Hmm, inspiring natural setting, good library, interesting monks, yet a "mind-dead environment." Sounds to me like someone just got bored. What were you looking for?

Tharan

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 181
(12/16/03 5:05 pm)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

Hmm, inspiring natural setting, good library, interesting monks, yet a "mind-dead environment." Sounds to me like someone just got bored. What were you looking for?

---

I was probably looking for inspiration, or to meet interesting people.

The monks were only interesting for a very short period of time.

The worst thing was that people would be pressuring you all the time to do their precious rituals, such as standing when their guru enters the room, and would go out of their way to make your life difficult if you didn't conform.

Living there felt a lot like I would imagine living in a mental asylum to feel like, though with less variety.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 660

(12/16/03 5:36 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Was it the monastic discipline that made you leave, i.e. getting up early, communal meals, the regimented daily routine, etc., or was it the ceremonial aspect (all those rituals), or was it the fact that -as a layman or novice- you were holding the lowest status within the community?

Thomas

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 892

(12/16/03 6:50 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

ksolway

Main reasons for spending time at the Buddhist retreat: nice countryside, good library of Buddhist literature, some of the most highly trained and interesting Buddhist monks. Main reason for leaving: mind-dead environment.

---

I have experienced this mind-dead environment and mind-dead people while spending time in a variety of organisations.

These places are just like wombs. Places where people can run and hide from the world outside for a while.

From the Alchemy perspective it's a bit like trying to turn the oven off for a while.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 182

(12/16/03 8:52 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Quote:

---

Was it the monastic discipline that made you leave, i.e. getting up early, communal meals, the regimented daily routine, etc., or was it the ceremonial aspect (all those rituals), or was it the fact that -as a layman or novice- you were holding the lowest status within the community?

---

I was largely regarded as an "outsider", or "maverick Buddhist", which suited me. I didn't receive a real ranking on their social scale, except perhaps the lowly ranking "non-Buddhist", for not taking any formal precepts on principle.

I was advised by one of the top ranking Geshe (Geshe Legden, ex-abbot of the big Sera Je monastery in India) that I should immediately begin teaching Buddhism, though this was despite the fact that I disagreed with probably most of what he personally taught. I'm not sure if he was just fending me off, or whether there was some other reason for this act of foolishness on his part.

Regarding the monastic discipline, I just did whatever I saw fit. I rose when I felt like it, went to bed when I felt like it, and did pretty much whatever I wanted. I sat in a chair rather than cross-legged on the floor, and I never stood when the teacher entered the room (unless by chance of course). Also, I didn't partake in work activities unless I felt like it. I never actively participated in rituals (chanting, etc), although I did observe a great many. But this didn't stop people trying to force me to conform by whatever means at their disposal.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 204
(12/17/03 12:12 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Hi Kevin,

You said that some interesting people came and then quickly left. Did you try to influence them to stay in order that they may receive your teaching?

Did or would the organisation have a problem with you influencing specific individuals whilst you were within their structure?

If so, was it oppressive?

Rhett

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 662

(12/17/03 1:16 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

Kevin: Regarding the monastic discipline, I just did whatever I saw fit. I rose when I felt like it, went to bed when I felt like it, and did pretty much whatever I wanted. I sat in a chair rather than cross-legged on the floor, and I never stood when the teacher entered the room (unless by chance of course). Also, I didn't partake in work activities unless I felt like it. I never actively participated in rituals (chanting, etc), although I did observe a great many. But this didn't stop people trying to force me to conform by whatever means at their disposal.

Quite interesting. They seem to have granted you much freedom. I have heard similar things from other Buddhist communities in the West. Apparently they are a lot more liberal than monasteries in Asia. I am quite sure that you would not have lasted more than a few days in any "Wat" in Thailand. They would probably have asked you to leave, or respectively suggested it by non-verbal means.

Most Thai monasteries don't tolerate deviations from their Vinaya discipline and they expect visitors to take the eight precepts and adapt to the temple rules. That usually means getting up at 4.00 AM, eating only one or two meals, not leaving the compound without the abbot's permission, no TV, no alcohol, no sex, and so on. Some places have silence observances. You partake in communal activities and you are required to join certain ceremonies. For most newbies and retreatants it certainly "feels" like prison.

I am not sure what to think of that. On one hand I can see the advantage of such a lifestyle in combatting laziness, pride, greed, and certain addictions. On the other hand such regimented routine seems unnecessary for people who are not (overly) afflicted by the above mentioned habits. As it might be expected, in Asia the interests of the community are almost always placed before the needs of the individual, which makes it even more difficult for most Western students to adapt.

I would agree with you that this turns off many people, and certainly also people with "potential".

You mentioned sitting cross-legged. In South-East Asia everybody sits on the floor. People eat, talk, sit, and sleep on the floor. They definitely expect you to sit on the floor in the presence of monks. You can't sit on a chair because then you are sitting higher than the monks. Unfortunately, even after ten years in Asia I am still not accustomed to sitting on the floor for extended periods of time. My knees start to hurt after an hour, hence I do not participate in activities that require long cross-legged sitting sessions, or I ask for a chair.

Of the Buddhist events that I have joined in the past, I liked the Mahayana events most. They were more interesting. Unfortunately not so many Mahayana events take place here since Thailand is a Theravada country.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 12/17/03 1:20 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 183

(12/17/03 8:33 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Rhett wrote:

Quote:

---

You said that some interesting people came and then quickly left. Did you try to influence them to stay in order that they may receive your teaching?

---

Yes I did. In those cases where interesting people stayed for a short time, they would have left a lot sooner if I wasn't there for them to talk to.

Quote:

---

Did or would the organisation have a problem with you influencing specific individuals whilst you were within their structure?

---

Yes, as you might imagine they had a big problem with it. Even on those occasions when I was saying verbatim what the Buddha said, they still had a big problem with it, as it wasn't what they believed. That is also a common scenario with Christians: the teachings of Jesus have no relation to their beliefs.

Quote:

---

If so, was it oppressive?

---

It could feel oppressive. It was more like trying to move around in knee-deep sludge, or having to deal with a classroom of very slow-learning, unresponsive and stubborn schoolchildren.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 206
(12/18/03 9:10 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Hi Kevin,

Was there much opportunity to take people aside, say to walk off into the further reaches of the property for one-to-one chats?

Rhett

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 184
(12/18/03 11:32 am)
Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

Rhett wrote:

Quote:

---

Was there much opportunity to take people aside, say to walk off into the further reaches of the property for one-to-one chats?

---

Yes, that's pretty much what you had to do so as not to upset people too much. But you may have to wait about a month before meeting anyone you can talk to.

Interestingly, at this community nobody ever talks about Buddhism in public, except for the details of rituals, precepts, and the like, which I don't consider to be anything to do with Buddhism.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 438

(12/18/03 12:20 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

or was it the fact that -as a layman or novice- you were holding the lowest status within the community?

They seem to have granted you much freedom.

I am quite sure that you would not have lasted more than a few days in any "Wat" in Thailand.

Most Thai monasteries don't tolerate deviations from their Vinaya discipline and they expect visitors to take the eight precepts and adapt to the temple rules.

For most newbies and retreatants it certainly "feels" like prison.

I am not sure what to think of that. On one hand I can see the advantage of such a lifestyle in combatting laziness, pride, greed, and certain addictions. On the other hand such regimented routine seems unnecessary for people who are not (overly) afflicted by the above mentioned habits. As it might be expected, in Asia the interests of the community are almost always placed before the needs of the individual, which makes it even more difficult for most Western students to adapt.

You can't sit on a chair because then you are sitting higher than the monks.

Like any religion, in the end it mostly seems to be about status, moving up the ladder and obtaining benefits. This tells me it is still within the constraints of herd behaviour and thus must be limited to less than reality.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 667

(12/18/03 1:53 pm)

Reply

 Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

jimhaz: Like any religion, in the end it mostly seems to be about status, moving up the ladder and obtaining benefits. This tells me it is still within the constraints of herd behaviour and thus must be limited to less than reality.

It doesn't get much "herdier" than in a Buddhist monastery, jimhaz.

One interesting question though is how much of that herdiness is culturally implanted. As you might know, most Asian nations are more collectivistic than Europeans, Australians, and especially Americans. Is the rugged, independent, freedom-loving individualist really a better human or is it merely an idol, a product of cultural bias?

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1141
(12/18/03 2:14 pm)
Reply

 mindfulness/awareness

---

Putting the group good before the individual may be the hallmark of truer civilization than ours, but what worries me is, can such people as live for the group at the same time think for themselves or is their mind subordinate to the group?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 185
(12/18/03 6:05 pm)
Reply

 Re: mindfulness/awareness

---

Quote:

---

Putting the group good before the individual may be the hallmark of truer civilization than ours, but what worries me is, can such people as live for the group at the same time think for themselves or is their mind subordinate to the group?

---

The "group good" would not be good if it happened to be a group of devils, or evil people. The only true "group good" would be where the group was a group of Buddhas.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1971
(12/18/03 10:51 pm)
Reply

 ----

---

Quote:

---

The "group good" would not be good if it happened to be a group of devils, or evil people. The only true "group good" would be where the group was a group of Buddhas.

---

Evil people?! Can you name some for me?! You're joking yes?!

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 42

(12/19/03 2:09 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Evil people?! Can you name some for me?! You're joking yes?!

---

Every single last one of them.

All Gods,Buddhas and humans have the propensity for good and evil.

And the Lord God said, "The man has now become like one of us, knowing good and evil. He must not be allowed to reach out his hand and take also from the tree of life and eat, and live forever."

Genesis 4:22

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 43

(12/19/03 2:39 am)

Reply

Re: Mindfulness/Awareness

---

"Quote: KS: The only way to be properly aware/mindful of anything at all is if you are enlightened. Having an ego, ie., delusion, makes one blind.

N: The ego is a defense mechanism, isn't it the belief that one IS the ego the root of the deluded blindness and not the ego itself?

If the ego is defined as "delusion", as I did above, then the ego is definitely the cause of blindness.

The ego is a defense mechanism, but it is also the creator of the things it has to defend against."

So the ego creates the world of phenomena, reality and so because of this dualistic manifestation, or the observation of subject and object, we are blind to our true nature, which is NO-THING? And if we were able to rid ourselves of this ego, or the illusion of an ego, we would no longer need the reality that it creates, for reality and ego are one?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1144

(12/19/03 3:05 am)

Reply

 mindfulness/awareness

---

Quote:

---

The "group good" would not be good if it happened to be a group of devils, or evil people. The only true "group good" would be where the group was a group of Buddhas.

---

Of course, by group good, I mean what is best for the group to continue. So if I were among a pack of thieves, behavior for the group good might mean taking personal risk to hide the group identity or some such thing.

Generally speaking, though, the individual tends not to be markedly different from his group, say a family or tribe. So putting the group first is a matter of being less selfish and egotistical.

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Mindfulness/Awareness

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1163(12/22/03 1:23 pm)Reply | mindfulness awareness <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Bird: Now, David, you know that is silly. The ego expands becoming less dense. ----- I doubt that anyone who is the victim of a mob-lynching would agree with you. <hr/> I dont think that is the same phenomenon, although its an interesting point. Quote: <hr/> This would only be true if the tribe in question was composed of humans, which is extremely unlikely. <hr/> Oh, no, it is very likely. I don't have much time this coming week, but I am going to have to start a thread and devote it to this topic, because I think it is of tremendous importance as humanity is in a civilization crisis. There is a great divide between what we were and what we are now. This is the cause of our troubles. We must come to understand what we lost, and only then can we know how to be civilized, if indeed that is possible. |

Quote:

---

Like taking steps to avoid falling in love, you mean?

---

David you know nothing about love. Love is the ultimate challenge. The warrior does not avoid love.

Quote:

---

A much more important task is finding our true identity, which is superior and far more urgent than any other task. I would hate to be part of a society in which everyone was forced to conform to a "human identity"; it would be like being part of the Borg.

---

But you demand that everyone conform to woman-despising!

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

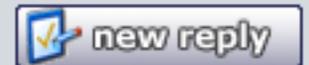

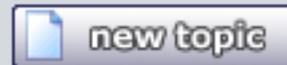

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Misogenius

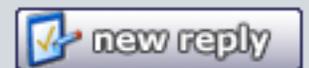

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 411(1/16/04 10:26 pm)Reply   | Misogenius <hr/> Why, Dan Rowden, did you delete my little, harmless message, in which I said that Anna is a misogynius? I meant it full-heartedly, and little man here knows what he was saying! Birdofhermes really outsmarted you, huh? |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 623(1/17/04 1:47 am)Reply | Re: Misogenius <hr/> Is a misogynius a hater of genius? Or a genius basing their genius off of hate? Or something else?                                                                                                                           |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 412(1/17/04 2:41 am)Reply    | Re: Misogenius <hr/> Something else.A misogynius covers it all. Have great weekend, Scott. : -)                                                                                                                                |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 413(1/17/04 2:45 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                          | Re. Misogenius <hr/> Even a great weekend.(Bad typist here, for obvious reasons.)                                                                           |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 626(1/17/04 2:50 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                       | Re: Re. Misogenius <hr/> So a misogynus is life living itself reflectively?You have a great weekend too, Paul.                                                     |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1616(1/17/04 11:55 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                          | say what <hr/> I have no idea what you're talking about, Paul.When did you post it?Dan Rowden                                                            |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 46(1/17/04 1:39 pm)Reply  | Re: say what <hr/> When I look at a tree, a tree is looking at a itself through my eyes.Did you know that?It's quite the discovery, or so says the tree. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| kkawohlRegistered UserPosts: 34(11/21/03 9:26 am)Reply | Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism<hr/> Can our subconscious, our spirit, interact with a spiritual reality through meditation?Please consider my experiences.IMHO, I have personally experienced my spirit leaving my body and being united with the "ultimate supreme spirit" (God?). In 1956, when I was fifteen years old, I had pneumonia and thought I was dying. My father took me to a doctor who gave me a penicillin injection and recommended immediate hospitalization. We had no medical insurance or money, so my father took me home to recuperate. I remember the drive home vividly. Every breath was painful and my chest felt as though a great weight was upon it. I watched cars and trucks drive by, and wondered how people could make long term plans when life was so unpredictable.Several nights later, it felt as if my spirit left my body and it experienced being in a place with a gathering of souls or spirits. I sensed great peace, tranquility and ecstasy -- a rapture that was beyond a person's imagination. I felt as if I was a part of ALL, a part of God. I was mentally communicating and in sync with everyone, including not only some of my deceased acquaintances and relatives, but many of the prophets of the bible, and historical people I had read about. There was no dominant force, no forceful leader. I somehow knew who everyone was. Every thought interacted with the whole community. I had no questions; it seemed as if everything was revealed and crystal clear. I saw the universe stretched out with spirits engaged in mental interaction like master | craftsmen contemplating the creation of a new frontier.

When I told my father who was a preacher of the Lutheran Faith about my experience he dismissed it abruptly and told me that this "supreme spirit," this God that my spirit had witnessed, was not the God of the bible and he told me to pray for my salvation. We never talked about it afterwards.

Since that time I never really gave it much thought until the New York World Trade Center tragedy on 9-11-01. I went into deep meditation. I wanted to find an answer to why and how some misguided individuals could believe that their actions would be rewarded with their soul's eternal life with God. I then had a couple of experiences similar to the one I had at age fifteen of my spirit communicating with the "ultimate spirit." (God, Allah or whatever one desires to call him/her/it) One spiritual experience seemed to last throughout the entire night. My spirit observed the entire history and the evolution of the universe and our varying perceptions of God, as if in a fast-forward film.

The experiences I encountered after the 9-11 tragedy helped me come to these conclusions:

1. ALL religions have the same goals and all who live by the basic principles of peace will attain their goal. The problems arise when religious fanaticism arises. A fanatic passion to please God has been demonstrated throughout the Ages. We have seen vast destruction and useless killings by religious zealots that have followed us into the present century whereby even technology is unable to quell its tide.
2. In this 21st Century, the Age of Technology, we are still plagued by religious beliefs that are a contributing cause toward terrorism, killings and wars between nations. Belief in a deity, who keeps causing catastrophes, punishes people, and created the universe out of nothingness as if by magic was brought about by hysteria and superstitions. This thought process needs to be reassessed and brought up to date. Open-minded people must use common sense to determine whether this so-called deity was incorrectly perceived, misinterpreted and misunderstood by the masses of a bygone era.
3. God is a spiritual unity, a oneness, a structured government-like "Spiritual Collective"; the "Progressive and Accumulative Spiritual Intelligence" of the universe existing in a spiritual dimension; a collective of the righteous souls who have passed into the spiritual realm; a spiritual continuity.

Some will say that my personal experience of oneness with a supreme spirit is nothing but a dream or a vivid imagination. It doesn't matter whether you accept or totally reject my story. What does matter is that we evolve to a point whereby we can encourage open-minded people to offer feedback on how our religious beliefs can be brought into the 21st century.

Let us hope that man will eventually progress intellectually and evolve to a point whereby he can socialize with totally eliminated tendencies for barbarianism and without fanaticism; This would be true enlightenment.

Namaste,
Rev. Kurt Kawohl

<http://www.internet-encyclopedia.org/wiki.phtml?search=kurt+kawohl>

Edited by: kkawohl at: 11/21/03 9:31 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 407
(11/21/03 9:35 am)
Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

You want an incomplete man. Man is fully evolved when he can harbor both negative and positive sides of the coin. What is humanly ideal is not Ideal.

kkawohl
Registered User
Posts: 35
(11/21/03 10:18 am)
Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

Man will never be complete through the physical sense.
Through a spiritual idealism completeness is possible.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 391
(11/21/03 11:49 am)
Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

My spirit observed the entire history and the evolution of the universe and our varying perceptions of God, as if in a fast-forward film

I'm quite interested in this phenomenon. I always thought it was hogwash, but have recently begun to accept that it exists – it just seems so common.

Using a liberal degree of imagination, I see that what occurs when life flashes before our eyes will end up being the real master key to human evolution. Clearly it gives the brain the ability to go outside of how we normally perceive the flow of time, so our subconscious thoughts directly enter our consciousness in real time rather than the bottleneck, restricted and rather slow manner in which our consciousness generally works. As I see it what occurs in this situation and in enlightenment-like episodes is that the brain bypasses the physical part of the brain that determines what is let out of the brain's interactive memory. What we perceive of as consciousness may purely be those thoughts contained at any one time within the segment of the brain that deals with language and interaction with the physical environment. We need that part of the brain to work far slower than the real consciousness so as to get the timing right with communication and the speed of activity in the physical environment around us. If we needed to communicate or hunt for food we would not be able to do so if all our concentration was being used in 'viewing' the millions of synapses continually processing all the information it had ever recorded. So the brain evolved segments that cope with the slower speed of the environmental interaction as compared to the millions of chemical interactions per second within the brain.

The evolutionary key is understanding the brain well enough for scientists to design drugs or whatever that allow the world to flash before our eyes in a controlled fashion. With this we would all be enlightened as we would have the ability to review the current in relation to our entire past and our entire knowledge.

With such mental power we would become virtual gods. Imagine being able to run through your whole life in a few moments at any time you choose. You would have a near perfect understanding of the causes and effect making up your nature. You'd also have a perfect capacity to learn and to recall. In terms of practical applications, imagine reading the Encyclopedia Britannica as a 5 year old child and being able to instantly recall every word 70 years later (providing brain abuse like alcohol or drug use did not damage the content of the synapses). Imagine the potential for rapid technological development - where we could make our bodies last indefinitely.

...it felt as if my spirit left my body and it experienced being in a place with a gathering of souls or spirits. I sensed great peace, tranquility and ecstasy -- a rapture that was beyond a person's imagination. I felt as if I was a part of ALL, a part of God. There was no dominant force, no forceful leader. I somehow knew who everyone was. Every thought interacted with the whole community. I had no questions; it seemed as if everything was revealed and crystal clear.

Direct access to the subconscious or the whole brain would lead to sensing the world in the way you have described above. You see you would be without ego and perhaps without emotion, but not without feeling, as feeling or stimulation would come about by the release of chemicals during brain activity.

I was mentally communicating and in sync with everyone, including not only some of my deceased acquaintances and relatives, but many of the prophets of the bible, and historical people I had read about.

You would see people you have known as you knew them or if historical figures as you imagined them when you read about them or watched them as represented in historical movies – the memories are all there waiting to be accessed. These memories go beyond memories of concepts that once dwelt in the language centre, but include input from all the senses.

I saw the universe stretched out with spirits engaged in mental interaction like master craftsmen contemplating the creation of a new frontier.

Ones brain is their universe, which would make the synapses within your brain into spirits.

Anyway, how did the universe evolve? You said you have seen it's development.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 11/21/03 4:20 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 409
(11/22/03 1:21 am)
Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

Spiritualism is an illusion. Man will never be complete the way you want man to be complete, because you want to flush the war out of him. God/Nature/The Universe/Reality is rapture, both war and peace. You want to get rid of a piece of God.

You can tell someone is not enlightened when they want to change things.

kkawohl
Registered User
Posts: 36
(11/22/03 5:18 am)
Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

Jim,

See

<http://www.internet-encyclopedia.org/wiki.phtml?>

title=Transcendentalist\_Hypothesis\_of\_a\_Fourth\_Dimension\_by\_Kurt\_Kawohl

Also

<http://www.internet-encyclopedia.org/wiki.phtml?search=kurt+kawohl>

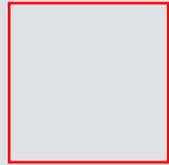

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 393

(11/23/03 10:34 am)

Reply

Re: Misperceptions of God/Allah Is A Cause Of Terrorism

---

While the concepts of multiple dimensions are necessary for humans to work with the universe, I really only believe in one dimension. Well two actually - matter/energy is one, emptiness is the other.

Dimensions 1-3 are descriptors of the same thing, the existence of matter/energy, while time is a fantasy that just indicates the volatility or movement of this matter.

Matter and energy are the same thing. They are like say the difference between an ice and steam. Energy is just more volatile matter. The universe of matter, energy are made up just like the colour spectrum.

solid-liquid-gas-matter in wave spectrum(radiation,light,gravity).

None of these are separate from one another, they just a different gradient of volatility. The further you go down the spectrum, the greater the space between each element which increases the room for speed and movement. When matter moves outside of its core grouping of similarly structured matter, we call that energy.

I think gravity is the fastest thing that humans have conceived of, not light. At the other end, solids are not at the top of the spectrum, that is occupied by black holes. The material in black holes is stuff that is so solid, that there is no movement of individual atoms, it is a solid in stasis, except that the parts within each atom still move. The movement within each atom is required for the the next bigbang for that segment of the universe, which will occur when the black hole moves within a large star, which has the effect of splitting the black hole atoms and creates a supernova.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 11/23/03 11:02 am

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1044
(11/23/03 12:14 pm)
Reply

black holes

---

Jimmy, are you making up some of this? When I watched the recent special on string theory, they had some images. when I saw the black hole image, I immediately thought of it as the incubator of a big bang. You say it is solid, nonmoving atoms, but I would rather suppose that it becomes more and more so, as the black hole grows and pulls more into it, it would become ever more dense.

They said gravity had the same speed as light.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 779
(11/24/03 12:23 am)
Reply

Re: black holes

---

You're making it all up innit Jim?

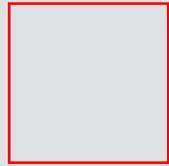

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 394
(11/24/03 8:59 am)
Reply

Re: black holes

---

Yep. It is all made up. The current theories mean nothing to me, they are not simplistic enough for me to believe them true - they are continually Made-To-Fit the latest trend if you ask me.

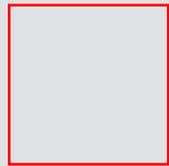

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 784
(11/25/03 10:55 am)
Reply

Re: black holes

---

Gravity doesn't have a speed BTW, it's an accelerational force. It's influence propagates at the speed of light though. Although the speed of light isn't really the speed of light, it's the speed limit of spacetime in a vacuum.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1287
(11/26/03 3:51 am)
Reply

Re: black holes

---

Don't most theories of quantum mechanics and string theories treat gravity on the quantum level as a particle exchange? As a particle, would it not have mass?

Kurt Kawohl
Registered User
Posts: 8
(1/17/04 10:08 pm)
Reply

Religious Prejudice

---

When people transcend their religious prejudices they will no longer say, "I am a Jew, a Muslim, a Christian"; then they will say "I am a Jewish Transcendentalist, a Muslim Transcendentalist, a Christian Transcendentalist"; and thereafter they will say "I am a Transcendentalist".

Namaste,
Kurt Kawohl www.nderf.org/kurt\_k's\_nde.htm

Please peruse my book which can be accessed FREE at:

www.transcendentalism.us/

(All profits from the book are donated to charities)

I have posted on numerous boards. The surprising results have been that many who practice logical reasoning have suggested as an answer to religious radicals, that they read my book.

Transcendentalism is a philosophy based on Immanuel Kant's statement that some notions (such as space/time, morality, and divinity) cannot be directly experienced, yet still add to empirical knowledge. These notions are transcendental in that they have a higher order of existence than what we experience directly in the physical world. Kant called these notions noumena (vs. phenomena, physical things and events.)

Transcendentalism is not a religion but is the attempted logic and rationality that can and should be applied to them. It is a conglomeration of similar, but diverse ideas about literature, religion, culture and philosophy. A system of philosophy emphasizing the intuitive and spiritual above the empirical and material.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> MKFaizi

 new topic

 new reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 26(8/17/03 3:17 pm)Reply  | MKFaizi<hr/> I was in a Krishnamurti forum for years.A lot of men in there, very few women.Isabel, Annelie, Ruth, Mina.Any posting of a woman? Drooling men all over her. Wars for Women, I agree, MKFaizi. Drooling, Paul |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 116(8/17/03 16:09)Reply | Paul<hr/> You're a troll, aren't you? :P                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 27(8/17/03 16:18)Reply                                                                                     | Rairun <hr/> No, Rairun, I'm not a troll.I'm a kind of genius.You seem to be in love with MKFaizi.Sorry for the interruption, dear.                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 286(8/17/03 18:33)Reply  | Re: Rairun <hr/> MKFaizi is a doll isn't she!Chucky-like:)She's like a scary movie - you don't really want to have anything to do with it, but it is too exciting to resist reacting to. |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 195(8/17/03 22:19)Reply                                                                                | Re: <hr/> How could anyone defy the idea that woman is the projection of perfection after reading these responses?                                                                                           |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1143(8/18/03 2:26)Reply                                                                             | MKFaizi <hr/> Marsha is a good writer, a strong thinker, and has a helluva lot more balls toward facing the truth than most of the jackasses in this forum lately. Tharan                             |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 365(8/18/03 5:42)Reply                                                                                 | -- <hr/> I agree with ynithrix's view.                                                                                                                                                                       |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 281(8/18/03 7:02)Reply                                                                                  | Re: -- <hr/> I agree with WolfsonJakk, mostly.How are women the projection of perfection?                                                                                                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 31(8/18/03 9:27)Reply                                                                                          | To voce io <hr/> I think David Quinn dealt with that particular subject in his essay. A woman speaks from her heart, is clear.A man wants to fuck. And then?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 32(8/18/03 9:54)Reply                                                                                          | To WolfsonJakk <hr/> So, your first name is Tharan, and MKFaizi's is Marsha? Too much truth for me!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 366(8/18/03 15:13)Reply  | Re: To WolfsonJakk <hr/> Have you ever been in love with a woman, voce io? If you have, you would know that a woman can embody a man's ideal like nothing else in creation can (well maybe dogs and and god can, too). Because women are like little children and don't have very strong egos attached to a certain conception of self, they can appear to be, and enjoy becoming, whatever a man 'sees' in her (or projects onto her). It doesn't have anything to do with sex and fucking, Paul. I'm talking about when a woman awakens a man's ideality. David Quinn deals with woman and the projection phenomenon in his essays at the top of this site, and Weininger and Kierkegaard also do a good job of describing woman. Here is the link to a collection of writings on women which includes 'The Banquet' by Kierkegaard (or 'In Vino Veritas' in a different translation, which literally means, In Wine, Truth.) I like the dressmaker's speech; it had me laughing in the horror of recognition at how well women's fashion obsession is described, and it also made me realize how many men exhibit the same behaviour. It's a good read. Greg |

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1326
(8/18/03 16:04)

Reply

Re: To WolfsonJakk

---

Well, you just saved this thread from extinction, Greg. I enabled the chat room so that people can discuss this sort of personal who's who kind of stuff rather than bring down the tone of a serious philosophical board with non-philosophical banter.

I will be deleting this thread if it does not promote some meaningful discussion.

Dan Rowden

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 527
(8/18/03 22:31)

Reply

Re: To WolfsonJakk

---

How about just deleting the stuff above Greg's post and changing the title of the thread?

Quote:

---

The Borg: How could anyone defy the idea that woman is the projection of perfection after reading these responses?

Greg: I agree with ynithrix's view.

a woman can embody a man's ideal like nothing else in creation can

---

I'm not too sure what you mean by 'a man's ideal' here Greg. Presumably, it's a man's ideal woman?

Surely a man's ideal is a man, or a man's ideals are embodied best in men. Ask men for a list of heroes or those they admire and perhaps wish to emulate, there won't be many women named, if any.

And I notice you also mention God and Dog. Seems to me that the common conceptions projected onto these subjects are normally male?

Quote:

---

Because women are like little children and don't have very strong egos attached to a certain conception of self,

---

I can't imagine where you get that idea from.

Quote:

---

they can appear to be, and enjoy becoming, whatever a man 'sees' in her (or projects onto her).

---

As far as 'appearing to be' goes, the appearance is with the projector, not the screen. That the screen is women in this case is inconsequential, it could be anything including men. I can't see how it matters that the screen is allegedly, in this case, like a little child with no strong ego or certain conception of self. The projection of ideals has nothing to do with the subject's actual qualities. I don't see your 'because' with regard to appearing to be.

Do female subjects of projection 'become' that which is projected onto them by a male?

Well, yes and no I guess. Certain aspects of the projection will be assimilated, other aspects will be rejected, still others will already be present and may stay or go, either because of the projection or not so.

Do they 'enjoy becoming'?

It would seem that they enjoy becoming the parts that they do assimilate (although their may be certain aspects which they do become but don't enjoy becoming), they don't become and so don't enjoy becoming the other parts that they don't assimilate (although there may have been certain aspects that they may have enjoyed becoming), and they already were still other parts of the projection which they either stick with or drop, so they can't enjoy becoming what they already are.

Don't all these things apply equally to males being projected onto?

Whether it be by a female or another male?

Sometimes even by a pet?

To come back to the original statement, "How could anyone defy the idea that woman is the projection of perfection?" Anyone could defy it by saying that a woman is what she is, the subject of a projection is not the projection itself. Further, anyone could qualify that by wording the sentence correctly, "How could anyone defy the idea that women are often the subject of projection of perfection?"

And that, one couldn't defy.

Doesn't say much though.

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 199

(8/19/03 0:37)

Reply

Re: To WolfsonJakk

---

I have a slightly different take on it.

A man is attracted to a woman, naturally. Homosexuality, etc, is a phenomenon--in my opinion, a result of too much tolerance. But the man is faced with a question: why is he attracted to the woman, she has very little by way of good qualities, save procreative functions. The projection of a perfection onto her is his way of justifying his attraction... she has nothing worth wanting, but he wants her nonetheless, so he creates for himself something to be attracted to.

Ask a girl why she loves her boyfriend, she might say his 'security', 'warm embrace', 'intellect'... these are qualities he does have. A boy faced with the same question cannot fathom his attraction... the girl is only attractive in looks and body (fertility), beyond that she is empty.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 529

(8/19/03 0:52)

Reply

Re: To WolfsonJakk

---

Go ahead and ask me then.

|                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 34(8/19/03 0:52)Reply      | To ynithrix <hr/> Eva is life.Adam will take care of death.Earthly, realistically speaking. Let's stick tWogether anyway. Ladies &amp; Gentlemen, the next subject,initiated by me, will be: Overpopulation. See ya. Hugs! |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 200(8/19/03 1:12)Reply | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> Ok, Dave Toast, I put that question to you. What attracts you to your woman? Paul... nevermind. Overpopuation is easy: kill useless people. Infertile/ugly women, stupid/overly-effeminate men.                                                 |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 35(8/19/03 1:20)Reply      | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> Yep, ynithrix is a woman. Thank you for your answer! (Kill useless people?They're all useless!Damn, now I have to thinkof a new subject...Tank ye, dear. Love ya.)                                                   |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 530(8/19/03 2:19)Reply  | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Ok, Dave Toast, I put that question to you. What attracts you to your woman? <hr/> You wouldn't understand.                                                                                                                                |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 201(8/19/03 2:58)Reply                                                                                    | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> Try me. Resistance is futile.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 855(8/19/03 4:08)Reply                                                                                | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> Yeah, Toast, will you cast your pearls before swine who will trample them underfoot unseen, shoving them deep in the muck as they root about with their excellent noses for things more useful? And can you retrieve your pearls in as pure a condition as before if you do? |

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> MKFaizi

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1023(8/19/03 9:30)Reply  | Re: To ynithrix <hr/> I do think Greg put things into words pretty well. Females, whether they are conscious of it or not, have an effect on males -- much more so than males have a similar effect on females. I used to observe this effect when my children were young. I could have four or five four-to-six year old boys watching video tapes peacefully in my family room or playing with cars and trucks quietly. BOOM! The back door would slam and in would walk my six year old daughter. She did not do anything. She did not have to do anything. It was just the presence. The boys would gradually begin to move about -- it was kind of like watching Mexican Jumping Beans start to gyrate. They moved around just a little at first. Then, they would start play-fighting -- just lightly, at first. Then, they would start a free for all wrestle. Then, they would start getting a bit rougher. The tapes and the toy trucks were abandoned unless for use as weapons. In a matter of minutes, I would have a boy brawl on my hands. If the girl left, the brawling stopped. I observed this time and time again. |

The girls were somewhat opposite. I could have a group of girls sitting on the floor watching tapes. The boys would walk in and they would ignore them. Their presence made no difference to them.

When I say that war is caused by women, I am not saying that women necessarily instigate the war. So called men do that -- eunuchs. I do think, however, that the mere presence of females causes the "jumping bean" effect in men.

There are many tedious arguments that can be proposed and bantered back and forth about this subject. Someone could counter my argument by saying that teenage girls or young women often sacrifice everything for a man. This is true, of course. Women often fall blindly in love with a man.

But a woman does not see men in quite the same way as men see women. There is no real ideal of man in the way that there is this heavenly ideal of woman perpetuated by man. Women know that men are flesh and blood. Women basically love flesh and blood. That womanly instinct or inclination may have something to do with the fact that a woman gives birth or can give birth.

Men are dazzled by a gauzy vision that has nothing to do with reality. Men do not love women as fleshly beings but as aparitions of an ideal concept of sexual beauty. A woman is magic or so it is believed. Men look toward women as the ideal of Mother, consciously or unconsciously. The last words mumbled by a fallen soldier on a battlefield are for his mother. Many wounded soldiers cry out for their mothers.

Females never cry out for their fathers.

It has been said here many times before -- and I will say it again -- the ideal of woman or of women is the creation of man or the handed down masculine archetype ideal.

I am not a big science fiction fan. Sci-fi is too much like Harlequin Romance for my taste. However, a few years back, I watched some futuristic movie that depicted men and women as equals. They were all warriors. They slept together as warriors and ate together as warriors and showered "NEKKID" together as warriors. There was no sexual turn-on caused simply by close quarters. Females were as skilled as men.

There were obvious sexual differences but those differences were not necessarily meaningful. A penis was just a penis and a breast was just a breast.

I do think that such a thing is possible. But the first thing that would have to be dropped would be the male idealization of woman -- dropped not only by man but by the women who cater to it.

Man has to stop seeing woman as a warm hole for his fantasies. Women have to stop catering to that fantasy of a warm hole -- the most wonderful mother hole; the sexiest babe aka mother hole; the whore mother-hole; the good wife-mother hole.

Such delusion.

I think the human race needs to grow up and get over it.

Faizi

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 284

(8/19/03 12:17)

Reply

Re: To ynithrix

---

MKFaizi, that was very clear and good. I agree with the entire thing.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 609

(8/19/03 18:00)

Reply

grow up and get over it

---

Quote:

---

Faizi:

Man has to stop seeing woman as a warm hole for his fantasies. Women have to stop catering to that fantasy of a warm hole -- the most wonderful mother hole; the sexiest babe aka mother hole; the whore mother-hole; the good wife-mother hole.

Such delusion.

I think the human race needs to grow up and get over it.

---

This delusion perhaps is what separates us from the animals.

A deluded group will wipe out an undeluded group on the battle field every time.

If I believe I will gain eternal life if I die trying to kill you, you've got a major problem.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 367

(8/19/03 11:56 pm)

Reply

Re: To WolfsonJakk

---

Quote:

---

The Borg: How could anyone defy the idea that woman is the projection of perfection after reading these responses?

Greg: I agree with ynithrix's view.

a woman can embody a man's ideal like nothing else in creation can

---

Quote:

---

DT: I'm not too sure what you mean by 'a man's ideal' here Greg. Presumably, it's a man's ideal woman?

Sort of. It has to do with him wanting to be more than he is. It could be wanting to return to the warmth and safety of his mother's womb, and it probably is, at least partially.

DT: Surely a man's ideal is a man, or a man's ideals are embodied best in men. Ask men for a list of heroes or those they admire and perhaps wish to emulate, there won't be many women named, if any.

---

No, it's true, I've never idolized any women in the same way I have men. If I were to idolize a woman, it would be because of her special talents which would liken her to a man. Like a female film director like Kathryn Bigelow, or a female tennis player, for those men who appreciate athletic prowess. Ideal...I mean the appearance of innocence, spontaniety, happiness, intelligence and problem-solving, but only the appearance of these things - most of the substance is projected by the man. When I was young and became infatuated with certain girls in my proximity, without having really spoken to them at length or seen them demonstrate any talent, it was because of my own mind projecting certain qualities onto them that were invisible to anyone but me. But the flowiness of women makes it easier to do this than it does with a man, which I'll describe in greater detail below.

Quote:

---

DT: And I notice you also mention God and Dog. Seems to me that the common conceptions projected onto these subjects are normally male?

---

Depends.

Quote:

---

GS: Because women are like little children and don't have very strong egos attached to a certain conception of self,

DT: I can't imagine where you get that idea from.

---

From observation, speaking with them, and through analysing the feminine within myself.

Quote:

---

GS: they can appear to be, and enjoy becoming, whatever a man 'sees' in her (or projects onto her).

DT: As far as 'appearing to be' goes, the appearance is with the projector, not the screen.

---

Agreed.

Quote:

---

That the screen is women in this case is inconsequential, it could be anything including men.

---

Possibly, but with a man you have to take into account what he actually is, unless he's very feminine and passive.

Quote:

---

I can't see how it matters that the screen is allegedly, in this case, like a little child with no strong ego or certain conception of self. The projection of ideals has nothing to do with the subject's actual qualities. I don't see your 'because' with regard to appearing to be.

---

Because they have weak egos that can easily be moulded to a certain shape. The shape of the one projecting. Little children are like this. I had male teachers who liked to nurture artistic talent that I exhibited, and liked to put some of themselves into what I would become. Women are like this to a higher degree, except they never really become anything other than the appearance of these qualities... ie. they don't make them a part of themselves in a internal sense.

Quote:

---

Do female subjects of projection 'become' that which is projected onto them by a male?

---

They appear to. A single woman could be many things to different men at the same time.

Quote:

---

DT: Do they 'enjoy becoming'?

It would seem that they enjoy becoming the parts that they do assimilate (although there may be certain aspects which they do become but don't enjoy becoming), they don't become and so don't enjoy becoming the other parts that they don't assimilate (although there may have been certain aspects that they may have enjoyed becoming), and they already were still other parts of the projection which they either stick with or drop, so they can't enjoy becoming what they already are.

Don't all these things apply equally to males being projected onto?

---

It says that without that projection, no one would be interested in them, unless they're just using them to boost their own egos or for sexual gratification. Clear-sighted people wouldn't be interested in them, because they would have many other things far more intriguing to spend their attentions on.

Greg

Edited by: G Shantz at: 8/25/03 8:57 am

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 368

(8/20/03 0:08)

Reply

Re: To ynithrix

---

Yeah, that was perceptive, Faizi. Maybe this is the certain talents I am talking about that men can idolize in women just as they would in men. Clear perceptions can be one such quality.

Greg

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 39
(8/20/03 4:33)
Reply

To Greg

---

Greg, admit it.

Women are the ultimate wisdom.

True, true, and truth to the limit, inside, outside.

(MKFaizi took it to mentioned limit.
[There is no limit, but that is something she has to find out.]
What do you want, Greg? Or... expect?)

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1027
(8/20/03 10:14)
Reply

Re: To Greg

---

Gosh, Greg, thanks for tossing me the doggy biscuit. It means a lot to a woman to get a firm pat on the head by a real man such as yourself. That is why I write here, of course -- for such firm pats on the head by real men -- and to see my name up in lights and have eunuchs drool over me left and right.

I don't think that clarity is a feminine characteristic, however, or can be categorized as a mere feminine talent. Clarity of perception and clear explanation and reasoning are masculine traits in the same way that the ability of an athlete is a masculine trait or the same way that the ability to make hard-hitting films is a masculine trait. Clarity of perception is not something generally attributed to females, even as part of their flowiness.

Clarity of perception and ability to reason wisely are masculine traits. It is understandable that you could wish to deny this in one who is outwardly female but your denial is incongruent with what is obviously true.

Because I am female, I have had much to overcome and still have much to overcome but, at this point, I have no more burden of femininity than one who was born a man. At this point, I am not less masculine than yourself. In fact, I feel confident that I am more masculine than yourself.

You still have the feminine defect of jealousy and envy. You also still have the feminine defect of herdiness. You are the Queen Bee type of woman.

Reading your comments in the above posts, I started thinking that you remind me of a young Kevin Solway -- quite feminine and worshipful of all that is feminine. A young Kevin Solway took ample delight in the power of his "stinger."

That's not a bad thing, Greg. Just take care that you do not become a Leo.

I am sure that you have a lot of potential. You are young and you are male.

It does not choke me to say that. I am not offended by the idea that you are on a philosophical path to enlightenment.

It is the feminine in you that feels he must make an attempt to be my superior.

In this way, you have much in common with a Miss America contestant.

It is not a crown you are looking for, Greg. There are no judges of beauty here. There is no dwarf who is going to jump out of some bushes and tap you.

This is reality. There is no competition.

Your friend,

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1390

(8/20/03 12:22)

Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

It is not a crown you are looking for, Greg. There are no judges of beauty here. There is no dwarf who is going to jump out of some bushes and tap you.

This is reality, there is no competition.

---

No, but there are competitions, and I am a judge of beauty!

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1348

(8/22/03 14:24)

Reply

Clarity and the feminine

---

Marsha wrote:

Quote:

---

I don't think that clarity is a feminine characteristic, however, or can be categorized as a mere feminine talent. Clarity of perception and clear explanation and reasoning are masculine traits in the same way that the ability of an athlete is a masculine trait or the same way that the ability to make hard-hitting films is a masculine trait. Clarity of perception is not something generally attributed to females, even as part of their flowiness.

---

I generally agree with this. Women can certainly, at times, give the impression of clarity, but do they really possess it in their own minds? Clarity is a thing perceived. If one perceives clarity, then one has done so because of the coherence within one's own mind. The real test of whether apparant clarity in what a woman expresses (or a man for that matter) is authentic or not is whether she maintains it over time.

Dan Rowden

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 293

(8/22/03 20:58)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

Dan - Women can certainly, at times, give the impression of clarity, but do they really possess it in their own minds? The real test of whether apparant clarity in what a woman expresses (or a man for that matter) is authentic or not is whether she maintains it over time.

Of course women possess clarity of thought. It is paramount to their survival and the survival of their offspring. I actually wonder if 99% men have any clarity that is maintained over time - I doubt it. For women what is necessary is consistency with mundane things. The only thing that effects that consistency is their internal calculations of the direction that their male counterparts are taking - as men are mostly inconsistent and childish in relation to home life, women can often appear more lacking than they really are, as they are in reaction mode. They are reacting to the inconsistencies of both children and adult males who desire to be mad bulls. Whereas men have the freedom to be inconsistent - at the relationship level their physical strength ensures this - from which the occasional man will learn Will. One will has been created it will then have a life of its own. Women's lack of mental freedom also drives women to concentrate on emotions, which ends up leading to poor decision making. Their thoughts may have clarity but their decisions are often too affected by emotions making them seem generally less capable and mentally inferior.

Few women, though, can be consistent with deep philosophical matters, perhaps partly because society makes it impossible for many to delve deeply into it, but then who gives a damn, philosophy is essentially just a sport - people make of it what they wish. It has little importance except in terms of being a catalyst for science.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 369

(8/23/03 5:05)

Reply

--

---

Actually, I was saying that clear perception can be appreciated by a man with clear perceptions, in a woman, but that the ability to have clear perceptions is a masculine trait. I suppose my perceptions weren't communicated clearly enough. :)

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 372

(8/24/03 9:45)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

[P]hilosophy is essentially just a sport - people make of it what they wish. It has little importance except in terms of being a catalyst for science.

---

Care to elaborate on this remark? It seems to me that philosophy is concerned with absolute knowledge, while science contents itself with making measurements. They both spring from a desire for knowledge or power ('knowledge is power'), but they are very different fields of endeavour, with different outcomes. Science just gives you more finite facts, while philosophy alters your whole relation to the world.

Greg

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 546

(8/25/03 2:38)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

Quote:

---

Greg: Science just gives you more finite facts, while philosophy alters your whole relation to the world.

---

What if some finite facts alter your whole relation to the world?

Look at the philosophy of the likes of Richard Dawkins or Steve Pinker. Are they not born of their scientific enquiry?

Quote:

---

Jimhaz: [P]hilosophy is essentially just a sport - people make of it what they wish. It has little importance except in terms of being a catalyst for science.

---

Regardless of the value judgement that is importance, is science not, likewise, a catalyst for philosophy?

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 301

(8/25/03 13:35)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

I thought about altering my post to take that comment out. The statement was incorrect. Philosophy is important because of its flow on effects.

It is difficult to draw the line between what is philosophy and what is not. I was just referring to whether an individual chooses to study philosophy or play sport, but of course if study makes enough or the right individuals change the particular philosophies they believe in, it changes the world.

I was just trying to say the study of philosophy is just another way one can get their kicks. Just as sport is important to those who make their living out of it (or if they are spectators for delusions of grandeur), so to philosophy is important to those who require more mental stimulation than what they would otherwise get from normal living activities. As one can see by how little regard 'proper' philosophy is given by the general populace, for most it is not important (if you exclude religion in the definition), indeed many would be incapable of studying it.

Both sport and philosophy are stimulations for the mind. Philosophy won't necessarily make you happier, not does it let us overcome our physical limitations, like death. Although philosophy may last longer than sporting records, the QRS 'get-out' that one can have an everlasting form of consciousness if one's wisdom continues to impact on others once you are dead, does not sit well with me.

Philosophy gives science the questions to seek answers for. To me science is a derivative of philosophy and the work of Einstein is the same as the work of Weiner boy. Both are seeking finite facts, as there are no other - philosophers like to mystify it by pretending otherwise :). The parody is that all facts are in essence infinite as for any fact to exist it is dependent on everything that made it exist.

I am not convinced one can obtain absolute knowledge from philosophical investigations (or if it is possible then so to can knowledge obtained from science or mathematics be absolute). One can only have absolute knowledge where concepts have been structured in such a way as to give logically absolute outcomes.

Nor do I agree that science contents itself with making measurements. Philosophy is about imaging what the real is. Science is about using the brain to imagine symbolically or practically this reality and then how to use it. Indeed science can feed knowledge back into philosophy (as Dave also mentioned above). As you say science does look for more finite facts, but still these finite facts can alter ones relationship with the real in much the same way as philosophy does.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 375

(8/28/03 17:40)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

What if some finite facts alter your whole relation to the world?

---

Well first off, I should point out that all facts are finite. Even true, factual statements like 'experiences are happening' are finite. However, the difference between finite philosophical concepts and finite scientific concepts is that the latter can't change your whole mode of being while the former, if manipulated properly, can. It's like Tharan mentioned a while ago about the vanity of knowing pi to the trillionth digit. You could tell someone about it and maybe receive accolades, but it won't prevent suffering or loneliness.

I can't think of any finite scientific facts that would fundamentally change my being. Well, maybe if a virus was discovered to be airborne and in my neighbourhood, I would avoid leaving the house. However, this isn't a fundamental change in the foundation of my consciousness, it is only a superficial change in my behaviour. The knowledge philosophy provides is of a life-changing nature, while scientific knowledge is of a life-entrenching nature, generally. Knowing many scientific facts can make you feel secure. Applied philosophic knowledge removes the need for security altogether. Whichever you pursue will depend on what you choose to value/.

Quote:

---

Look at the philosophy of the likes of Richard Dawkins or Steve Pinker. Are they not born of their scientific enquiry?

---

I don't know much about either of these men.

Which books should I read to learn about their philosophy?

Greg

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1390

(9/2/03 14:22)

Reply

Re: Clarity and the feminine

---

Jimhaz wrote:

Quote:

---

Both sport and philosophy are stimulations for the mind. Philosophy won't necessarily make you happier, not does it let us overcome our physical limitations, like death. Although philosophy may last longer than sporting records, the QRS 'get-out' that one can have an everlasting form of consciousness if one's wisdom continues to impact on others once you are dead, does not sit well with me.

---

It doesn't sit all that well with me either since it doesn't accurately represent me. Working for the survival of wisdom isn't some kind of pathetic groping for immortality. It is just one's nature being what it must be. I don't need to aspire to any kind of "everlasting consciousness" because I am already immersed in it.

As for the relationship between science and philosophy being discussed: yes, some science can and does stimulate philosophic thinking. Evolutionary science and astronomy in particular in my experience, perhaps also some areas of physics. However, there is a vast and important difference between science stimulating or inspiring philosophic thought and actually informing it. The latter science does not and cannot meaningfully do. This is why the "philosophy" of people like Richard Dawkins is ultimately mediocre and abortive. They just can't break out of their empirical shells, and they need to.

Dan Rowden

|                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 561(9/3/03 0:02)Reply    | Re: Clarity and the feminine <hr/> What a very prejudiced view of what is right and wrong philosophy you have Dan. Let me guess, your right and anyone who doesn't conform is wrong, right?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1398(9/3/03 0:07)Reply           | Re: Clarity and the feminine <hr/> Ok then, so, which part of what I said are you wrong about Dave? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 564(9/3/03 0:18)Reply  | Re: Clarity and the feminine <hr/> How rude :) Answering a question with a question. Is evolution not an important philosophic topic? Might the study of empirical aspects of such stimulate, inspire and inform one's outlook on life and it's meaning?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1399(9/3/03 0:37)Reply         | Re: Clarity and the feminine <hr/> Yes, I think evolution is an important philosophic topic - where engaged philosophically. No, I don't think the empirical study of its possible mechanisms has anything of real meaning to say regarding a question like life's meaning. Unless, of course, you are satisfied with contingent theories regarding such matters. Could such theories grant us some kind of practical benefit in life, as most of science does? Sure, but that has nought to do with informing the questions that philosophy asks that science doesn't deal with. |

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> MKFaizi

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 566(9/3/03 1:13)Reply  | Re: Clarity and the feminine <hr/> What is the nature of reality? Do perceptions match the environment? What is it to percieve, conceptualise and think? Is there anything but one's own mind? What is knowledge? Is there free will and what is it? What is cause and effect? What is logic? What is rationality? What are space and time? What is the meaning of this or that? What is the meaning of meaning? Etc. |

Does science and the scientific method not inform us on these subjects?

When did Natural Philosophy become designated science?

Does philosophy (the logical kind) not proceed by formulating problems carefully based on known facts, and proceeding to logically offer solutions to them, giving arguments for the solutions, and engaging in a dialectical process to discern the truth?

Is that not the scientific method?

What is science?

Paul

Registered User

Posts: 67

(9/3/03 11:36)

Reply

To Dave Toast

---

This is completely off-topic, sorry, but could you explain to me how to edit one's own posting? I see people doing that here and there, now and then.

paulterbeek@home.nl

Thanks in advance!

(Yeah, what is logic? :-)

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1444

(9/3/03 13:30)

Reply

Re: MKFaizi

---

Paul, go to 'log in' next to 'my control centre' and log in.

|                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 69(9/3/03 13:58)Reply                                                                                    | To suergaz <hr/> Thanks for the tip! Which I don't understand, however.I log in, of course, otherwise I wouldn't be here, but I can't find an Edit-possibility anywhere.Gasping...I'm stupid, I don't belong in a GENIUS forum.                                                                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 882(9/3/03 14:11)Reply                                                                           | Re: To suergaz <hr/> You can post here without logging in. I didn't realize it myself for a couple of months. You should be given the choice of logging in local or global, and you want global.                                                                                                                                                                 |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1401(9/3/03 14:23)Reply  | Re: To suergaz <hr/> Zag, You have to be logged in already to see the "my control centre" link :) Paul, If you are logged in you really ought to be able to see a blue text "reply" and "edit" link to the left of your posts where your username and post date info etc is. If you don't I'm not sure why. Dan Rowden |

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 70
(9/3/03 14:28)
Reply

To birdofhermes

---

Yep, I just went 'global'. Was local. On this net.
(I'll find out where the edit possibility is hiding.)

Pffah!
My Girls are global for three years already.
<http://www.spiderwebservices.nl/thegoldengirlsquotes>
But I never forget this beauty quote:

Stan: You see, babe, it's all part of the big guy's master plan. I am but a humble servant.
Dorothy: Mr. Belvedere is a humble servant, Stanley, you're a horse's ass.

: -)

Thank you, Anna.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 71
(9/3/03 14:52)
Reply

To Dan Rowden

---

Thank you for your information.
No, I only see 'Reply', there's no 'Edit'-word there.
Sigh.
Ah well.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1414
(9/3/03 17:04)
Reply

Re: To Dan Rowden

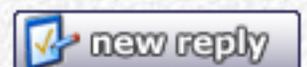

---

Are you actually logging into the board? I've not seen you logged in ever.
You can use the "login" link under the "invite friends" link towards the top left of the main section of the main page of the board.

If that doesn't work, I can only suggest registering with Ezboard as a global user.

Dan Rowden

|                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 75(9/3/03 17:23)Reply                                                                                           | Re: To Dan Rowden <hr/> From my first post on in here, I logged in via that 'log in' thing below 'invite friends'. That seemed the only way.And a few hours ago I indeed registered as a 'global user', hoping that some 'edit'-thing would come up.I must face it: I'm a failure in life. But not in death. (Corny I am, right now, and tired.) Whatever. I guess, the real editing is to you. Thank you for the Cage!I hope I can get 'voce io' in there, us talking about enlightenment. I like specifics on that. From him. Truth is marching on, etc.,Paul |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 570(9/3/03 21:03)Reply  | Re: To Dan Rowden <hr/> You're probably still logged in as a local user. If this doesn't resolve itself next time you log on after having switched off beforehand, delete your temporary file cache which you can do in internet options or with explore.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 90(8/3/04 5:55)Reply                                                                                        | Re: MKFaizi <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Modifying significant concepts to suit women

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2117(1/27/04 11:28 am)Reply | Modifying significant concepts to suit women<hr/> Here is an article which examimes the question of why there are no great women artists. Of interest to me is the way society's traditional notions of what constitutes great art have either been modified or abandoned in order to create the illusion that woman are as good at art as men are. This parallels what has happened in the spiritual field, wherein the very concept of enlightenment has been radically altered in order to create the illusion that women have as much potential for wisdom as men .http://www.artnewsonline.com/currentarticle.cfm?art_id=1275 |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 47(1/27/04 11:36 am)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women<hr/> David you really are a dispicable troll.Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/27/04 12:33 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 473(1/27/04 11:38 am)Reply    | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> lol, Krussell your statement defines you as a misogynist.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 48(1/27/04 11:43 am)Reply                                                                               | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> jimhaz, If you were as anti-woman as David would you like to be reffered to as a woman with a beard. I think not. Being called a woman is the ultimate insult for a misogynist such as David. Think of the full context before you jump on other peoples statements. This shows a clear lack of insight on your part. Think it through. btw Do something about that God-awful picture wil you? Do you really want to look like David. ;) |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 474(1/27/04 12:13 pm)Reply  | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> It is pointless trying to attack David with insults. Read at some later stage your comment would have been read as I did. In any case the fact that you are willing to make that statement even if just sarcasm for the purpose of attack, creates in me a sense that you view yourself as superior to women. I can't explain why. <hr/> Yes is time to get rid of the picture. It is starting to annoy me as well.               |
| Naturyl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 114(1/27/04 12:22 pm)Reply                                                          | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> Glad to hear it. The picture is hideous.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 50
(1/27/04 12:32 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

jimhaz, you're point is well taken. I will edit my post so it doesn't contain the controversial reference, and I apologize if it offended anyone.

Quote:

---

In any case the fact that you are willing to make that statement even if just sarcasm for the purpose of attack, creates in me a sense that you view yourself as superior to women. I can't explain why.

---

The same could be said about your picture. I have to admit that when I first saw it, I thought you were a misogynist who was using it to mock women. Your posts, however, indicate otherwise. FYI I don't consider myself superior to women. I think to view oneself as superior to others on any basis is stupid. We all have faults and I'm no model for perfection that's for sure. Though, I see how my remarks can give off such an impression. Therefore, I will remove it.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2119
(1/27/04 12:42 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Krussel wrote:

Quote:

---

I think to view oneself as superior to others on any basis is stupid.

---

So when you wrote on another thread:

What kind of a man are you? Not only are you a misogynist but a hypocrite as well. Might I add that you are a spiritual eunuch. I take back what I said about you being a pathetic human being. You are beyond pathetic.

You weren't believing yourself to be superior to me?

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 51
(1/27/04 12:53 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Why David. You must know I meant that in the most endearing way. :)

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 781
(1/27/04 12:54 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

David: Of interest to me is the way society's traditional notions of what constitutes great art have either been modified or abandoned in order to create the illusion that woman are as good at art as men are.

This is a fairly idiotic conclusion, since exactly the opposite is the case. Society's traditional notions of women's art were detrimental to the arts and to women. Artists with breasts were simply not recognized or tolerated by the patriarchy. For example, female painters in the late nineteenth century did not have the freedom to walk the streets, frequent the cafes, and live the life of a painter. Luckily this has changed.

David: ...the question of why there are no great women artists...

Some of the following artists would probably protest:

Caterina dei Vigri (1413-1463), Maria Ormani, Lucia Anguissola (c.1540-1565), Sofonisba Anguissola (1531-1626), Andriola de Baracchi, Sibylla de Bondorff, Suzanne de Court, Anna Cromenburch, Lavinia Fontana (1552-1614), Fede Galizia (1578-1630), Diana Scultori Ghisi (1547-1612), Caterina Hemessen (1527/8-c.1566), Esther Kello, aka Esther Inglis (1571-1624), Barbara Longhi (1552-1638), Properzia de' Rossi (1490-1530), Plautilla Nelli (1523-1588), Levina Teerline (c.1510-1576), Marietta Robusti Tintoretto (1560-1590), Caterina van Hemessen (c.1527-c.1566), Josefa de Ayala / de Óbidos (1630-1684), Mary Beale (1632-1697), Antoinette Bouzonnet-Stella (1641-1678), Plautilla Bricci (1616-c.1690), Orsola Maddalena Caccia, Elisabeth Sophie Chéron (1648-1711), Suzanne de Court, Lucrina Fetti, Giovanna Fratellini (166?-1731), Fede Galizia (1578-1630), Giovanna Garzoni (1600-1670), Artemesia Gentileschi (1593-1652), Anne Killigrew, and Lady Killigrew? (1660-1685), Judith Leyster (1609-1660), Maria Sibylla Merian (1647-1717), Louise Moillon (1610-1696), Clara Peeters (1589-1657), Teresa Del Po (1649-1716), Geertruydt Roghman (1625-??), Luisa Ignacia Roldan (1656-1704), Susan Penelope Rosse (1652-1700), Anna Elisabeth Ruysch (1666-c.1741), Rachel Ruysch (1664-1750), Elisabetta Sirani (1638-1665), Claudine Bouzonnet Stella (1636-1697), Gesina ter Borch, Maria van Oosterwyck (1630-1693), Magdalena van de Passe (c.1600-1640), Anna Maria Van Schurman (1607-1668), Anna Waser (1675-c.1713), Anne Allen, Ann Bateman (1749-1815), Hester Bateman (1708-1794), Lady Diana Beauclerk (1734-1808), Marie-Guillemine Benoist (1768-1826), Elizabeth Blackwell (1700-1747), Alice Burrows (c.1776-??), Sarah Buttall (c.1734-??), Rosalba Carriera (1675-1757), Marie Anne Collot (1748-1821), Maria Cosway (1760-1838), Louisa Courtauld (1729-1807), Mary Ann Croswell (c.1775-??), Anne Seymour Damer (1748-1823), Marie Nicole Dumont (1767-1846), Rose Adélaïde Ducreux (1761-1802), Françoise Duparc (1726-1778), Rebecca Emes (c.1778-1829), Amelia Farnborough (1762-1837), Magdalen Feline (C.1733-??), Marie Anne Gérard Fragonard / Madame Fragonard (1745-1823), Marguerite Gérard (1761-1837), Marie-Eleonore Godefroid (1778-1849), Elizabeth Godfrey (c.1700-??), Antoinette Haudebourt-Lescot Henrietta Johnson (c.1670-c.1728), Angelica Kauffman (1741-1807), Adélaïde Labille-Guiard (1749-1803), Dorothy Langlands (c.1783-??), Marie-Victoire Lemoine (1754-1820), Elizabeth Leveson-Gower, Countess of Sutherland (1765-1839), Anna Dorothea Liszewska-Therbusch (1721-1782), Marie Anne Loir (1715-1769), Amelia Long (1772-1821), Constance Mayer (1775-1821), Charlotte Mercier (1738-1762), Dorothy Mills (c.1716-??), Marie-Genevieve Navarre (1737-1795), Ulrica Frederika Pasch (1735-1796), Eunice Pinney (1770-1849), Maria Catherine Prestel, nee Hull (1744-1794), Luisa Roldan, Adèle Romany (1769-1846), Frances Scott (1750-1817), Anne Valleyer-Costa (1744-1818), Maria Verelst (1680-1744), Elisabeth-Louise Vigée-Lebrun (1755-1842), Marie-Denise Villers (1774-1821), Anna Waser (1675-c.1713), Caroline Watson (1758-1814), Clara Wheatley (c.1750-1838), Patience Wright (1725-1786), Louise Abbema (1858-1927), Sophie Anderson (1855-1903), Maria Bashkirtseff, Amelia Bauerley, Leila T. Bauman, Cecilia Beaux (1855-1942), Camille Bellanger, Enella Benedict (1858-1942), Anna Bilinska (1857-1893), Charlotte Bonaparte (1802-1837), Rosa Bonheur (1822-1899), Elizabeth Gardener Bouguereau (1837-1922), Marie Bracquemond (1841-1916), Jennie Augusta Brownscombe (1850-1936), Anne Frances Byrne (1775-1837), Kate Elizabeth Bunce, Margaret Lesley Bush-Brown (1857-1944), Elizabeth Thompson Butler, Julia Margaret Cameron (1815-1879), Mary Helen Carlisle (1869-1925), Emily Carr (1871-1945), Louisa Starr Canziani, Mary Cassatt (1844-1926), Minerva Chapman (1858-1947), Mary Millicent Chaplin, Camille Claudel (1864-1943), Gabrielle de Veaux Clements (1858-1948), Edith Ellenborough Corbet, Maria Dixon, Susan Macdowell Eakins (1851-1938), Semantha Fairbanks, Ellen Bowditch, Thayer Fisher, Camille Flers (1802-1868), Elizabeth A. Armstrong Forbes (1859-1912), Eleanor Fortescue-Brickdale, Eva Gonzalès (1849-1883), Lady Gordon (1775-1821), Adrienne-Marie-Louise Grandpierre-Deverzy (1798-1855), Bessie Pease Gutmann (1876-1960), Ann Hall (1792-1863), Antoinette-Cecile Hortense

Haudebourt-Lescot (1784-1845), Claude Raguet Hirst (1855-1942), Anne Brownell Jameson, Anna Klumpke (1856-1942), Mary Edmonia Lewis (1845-1879), Marie-Françoise-Constance Mayer-Lamartinière (1775-1821), Anna Lea Merritt, Harriet Jane Moore (1801-1884), Mary Nimmo Moran (1842-1899), Evelyn Pickering de Morgan (1850-1919), Berthe Morisot (1841-1895), Laura Mott, Elizabeth Nourse (1859-1938), Emily Mary Osborn, Deborah Griscom Passmore (1840-1911), Anna Claypoole Peale (1791-1878), Sarah Miriam Peale (1800-1885), Lilla Cabot Perry (1848-1933), Mary King Porter (1865-1938), Constance Pott (1862-1937), Otagaki Rengetsu (1791-1875), Ellen Robbins (1828-1905), Christina Robertson, Ann Sanders, Rolinda Sharples (1793-1838), Elizabeth Eleanor Siddal (1829-1862), Rebecca Solomon (1832-1886), Lilly Martin Spencer (1822-1902), Marie Spartali Stillman (1844-1927), Annie Swynnerton, Suzanne Valadon (1865-1938), Lady Wharncliffe (c.1776-1821), Mary Wicks.

complete list: www.wendy.com/women/artists.html

Thomas

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 53
(1/27/04 1:02 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

So when you wrote on another thread:

What kind of a man are you? Not only are you a misogynist but a hypocrite as well. Might I add that you are a spiritual eunuch. I take back what I said about you being a pathetic human being. You are beyond pathetic.

You weren't believing yourself to be superior to me?

---

No. I was admonishing you and placing a value judgement for the fake you clearly are. You abandon all your moral obligations to search for some "Ultimate Reality" and try to pose yourself off as some kind of religious figure and preach your prejudices to others. That is how ever your choice, but a fool hardy and self serving one that is ultimately self-defeating. It doesn't make you inferior as much as it makes you the author of your own misfortunes due to your inferior course of action.

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2123(1/27/04 1:10 pm)Reply  | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> You obviously must believe that your values and choices are superior to those made by frauds and authors of their own misfortune?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 54(1/27/04 1:11 pm)Reply                                                                                | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> This is a fairly idiotic conclusion, since exactly the opposite is the case. Society's traditional notions of women's art were detrimental to the arts and to women. Artists with breasts were simply not recognized or tolerated by the patriarchy. For example, female painters in the late nineteenth century did not have the freedom to walk the streets, frequent the cafes, and live the life of a painter. Luckily this has changed. <hr/> I agree Thomas. This thread is a tale told by an idiot and signifying absolutely nothing. |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 477(1/27/04 1:11 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> Re - the picture At first it was mostly just a joke picture, as like you when I was first here I rejected most of the principles that the QRS believe in, but then after reading a bit of Weininger I found it to be a reflection of the feminine/masculine traits that we all share, so I left it there. It is a reflection of the male/female confusion that the topics discussed here create in people. I also used it because it put people offside a bit. So from peoples reaction to it, I could quickly get a sense of how emotionally minded they were.  |

It was also a statement of low self-regard, so it was a picture saying I could laugh at myself.

This forum has made me change the way I look at things, so now I will have to find something else. I think a white background with a crack running thought it might be the go or some icon that signifies my mind remains whimsical. Ahh! just thought of something else that might suit – hope I can find a jpeg.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/27/04 1:12 pm

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2124
(1/27/04 1:13 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Thomas,

Do any these female artists possess the greatness of a Michelangelo or a Picasso?

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 55
(1/27/04 1:17 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

You obviously must believe that your values and choices are superior to those made by frauds and authors of their own misfortune?

---

By my values and choices yes. But not based on differences in gender, race, ethnicity or sexual orientation. There is a big difference, don't you think?

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/27/04 1:17 pm

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2126
(1/27/04 1:35 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Sure. But I don't make judgments based on differences in gender, race, ethnicity or sexual orientation either. That would be stupid. Rather, I judge each individual I meet, man or woman, on their mental qualities, level of understanding and values. That is what interests me most as a philosopher.

The fact that I have a generally low opinion of women, in terms of their mental and spiritual qualities, is borne out of many years of experience and observation of women in the world. That is to say, it is borne out of repeatedly judging individuals of both sexes in terms of their mental qualities, level of understanding and values, and finding over and over again that women are seriously lacking in these areas. It's a reality I can't ignore, even though I know that articulating it makes me terribly unpopular.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 123
(1/27/04 1:40 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Greatness, greatness, greatness. What is it with the fixation on superiority and supremacy? Why must everything be 'deep,' 'lofty,' and 'grand' with you? If the greatest artists happen to be men, does it mean that female artists can only produce rubbish? Have you no appreciation for diversity and differences in taste? A woman (or a man) may paint something tomorrow on the back of a tin can which speaks to me far more than the Sistine Chapel ever can, no matter how large the consensus for the greatness of Michaelangelo. There is a lot more room for difference in this world than you want to allow.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1335
(1/27/04 1:59 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Don't worry David, females are not nearly so smug or happy as you think:
Adolescent boys and girls understand, if adults have forgotten, that the adolescent experience is markedly different for boys and girls, and that the overall experience, with some exceptions, favors boys. When young adolescents are asked whether advantages lie in being male or female in today's culture, boys win hands down. One recent study of 2000 middle-school students in five states asked them to describe the best thing about their gender. [17] Both girls and boys in the survey agreed that boys can do more and are viewed as better, while the boys' responses regarding their advantages fell into two categories: "We can do more things," and, "Not being a girl." "Boys clearly saw themselves as able to do more, to be more active in sports, have more fun and more opportunities," while the most common responses of the girls when asked the best thing about their gender were distressing: "I don't know." "Can't think of any."

And asked the worst thing about their gender, middle-school girls commonly replied, "I don't get to do boy things." "Men don't think we can do anything." "People don't think we are as good as boys." "Being ladylike." "Getting treated unequally." When the boys were asked what was the worst thing about their gender, their most common answer was especially telling: "Nothing." [18]

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 478
(1/27/04 2:10 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Don't worry David, females are not nearly so smug or happy as you think

It is hardly surprising Birdy. As young females in the way they chat with each end up 'festering' their emotions. They make more of them than they need to. They do this because it excites them and it is something they have in common, and they think is a way of being superior to boys.

No wonder so many young girls end up with eating disorders.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 784
(1/27/04 2:28 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

David: Thomas, Do any these female artists possess the greatness of a Michelangelo or a Picasso?

Well, greatness is culturally construed, so there are few female artists who have been idealized as much as those artists you mentioned. It's a result of male dominated culture. That's one thing. Another thing is that female artists fought an uphill battle which put artificial (social) constraints on artistic development.

Until recently, painting was a male niche. But, look at music. Singing has long been a socially accepted role for females. If you want to talk about "greatness" then let's look at this particular niche where females are allowed. It's not that only SOME of the "greatest" singers are female. There is approximately a 50/50 ratio and that is exactly what you would expect in the absence of artificial social constraints.

Thomas

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Modifying significant concepts to suit women

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 660(1/27/04 3:00 pm)Reply | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> If the opportunities and achievements of both men and women were placed on a scale, men on the left, women on the right; the scale would balance out perfectly. Do you all see what I just did right there? I pulled a David style argument. There is no evidence, only conclusions. Most likely, half of everyone will agree with that, and the other half wouldn't. Yet, if I actually gave supporting evidence, I'm sure more would be swayed to whatever was deemed logical. Personally, I've seen women artists as great. Men are great too. There are subtle differences, but if you look at modern painters, there are probably just as many women as men, and I'm positive all are just as good as the other. Give some proof that there aren't, and they aren't. |

|                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 481(1/27/04 3:07 pm)Reply                           | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> If the opportunities and achievements of both men and women were placed on a scale, men on the left, women on the right; the scale would balance out perfectly. In the most basic sense that could be true, but only as we are all born to women. On the other hand, many great achievers had masculine minded or neglectful mothers, or fathers with above average wisdom, so what does that tell you. |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1436(1/27/04 3:08 pm)Reply                     | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> My God, you guys are so easily played. There isn't (and never has been) some choice in this matter. He is pulling your strings merely so you will question. Can't you see the snicker in his words?                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Naturyl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 129(1/27/04 3:27 pm)Reply | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> That's what you (and he) want us to believe, I'm sure.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 484(1/27/04 3:36 pm)Reply                           | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> We like to be played, if we didn't we would go back through all the previous threads and try and ensure our questions were original or some enhancement of the discussion, but for the most part we like the entertainment of conversing in the present.                                                                                                                                                              |

ynithrix
Registered User
Posts: 221
(1/27/04 5:19 pm)
Reply

re

---

"Greatness, greatness, greatness. What is it with the fixation on superiority and supremacy? Why must everything be 'deep,' 'lofty,' and 'grand' with you? If the greatest artists happen to be men, does it mean that female artists can only produce rubbish?"

That is a typical feminist question, imo. 'I have drawn something that is rubbish, but I don't want to be rubbish, therefore I shall redefine greatness to suit my creation.' Which is followed by: 'if society doesn't redefine greatness around women, it is misogynous, because it fails to lie in accordance with feminism.'

The world population is growing, but it's greatness isn't. The weak and the botched are given live by (and at the expense of) their betters, because their betters have not the courage to destroy them. This puerile pity runs deep throughout art, too. Great is thrown around as a standard adjective; it doesn't mean great, it means good effort.

The egalitarian's curse is thus: 'evolution can wait, we have a more important mission: to make lesser people feel good about themselves!'

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2136
(1/27/04 5:20 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Well, greatness is culturally construed, so there are few female artists who have been idealized as much as those artists you mentioned. It's a result of male dominated culture.

---

Sure, males have defined what greatness is. That goes without saying. It doesn't mean, though, that they deliberately defined greatness in a way that excluded women. Rather, they used objective, non-gender values such as vision, structure, coherency, originality, timelessness, technique, and so on. It is only by abandoning these values that we can begin to entertain the view that feminine art is just as interesting and as significant as masculine art - which is what is currently happening in society.

Quote:

---

That's one thing. Another thing is that female artists fought an uphill battle which put artificial (social) constraints on artistic development.

---

I have my doubts about this. A true artist would never allow herself to be hampered by society's constraints. You're only pandering to woman's instinctive urge to blame everyone else for her own failings.

Quote:

---

Until recently, painting was a male niche. But, look at music. Singing has long been a socially accepted role for females. If you want to talk about "greatness" then let's look at this particular niche where females are allowed. It's not that only SOME of the "greatest" singers are female. There is approximately a 50/50 ratio and that is exactly what you would expect in the absence of artificial social constraints.

---

Singing is not really a creative art form. At best, it is merely an interpretative activity, in which the singer gives his or her own interpretation of a creative work. Composition is the heart and soul of musical creativity, and it is no surprise to learn that, even today, there are few female composers - and no great ones, as far as I know.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 140
(1/27/04 5:26 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

That is a typical feminist question, imo. 'I have drawn something that is rubbish, but I don't want to be rubbish, therefore I shall redefine greatness to suit my creation.'
Which is followed by: 'if society doesn't redefine greatness around women, it is misogynous, because it fails to lie in accordance with feminism.'

---

That is rubbish, but you probably don't want it to be rubbish. I am not a feminist. I am a humanist.

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                             | There is no 'redefinition' needed. Females are quite capable of greatness. What is misogynistic is your not-so-subtle implication that in order for women to achieve anything great, greatness must be redefined. How many of you people are there around here? Sheesh. This is starting to get on my nerves.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2138(1/27/04 6:52 pm)Reply         | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Females are quite capable of greatness. What is misogynistic is your not-so-subtle implication that in order for women to achieve anything great, greatness must be redefined. <hr/> The article posted at the beginning of this thread does show that greatness is being redefined by modern society because it has become clear that women are unable to reach the traditional standards of greatness.                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Naturyl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 145(1/27/04 7:05 pm)Reply                                                                  | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> Bollocks. If anything, it shows that the society is historically male-oriented in its perceptions. This is not a feminist statement, it is a simple historical fact.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 787(1/27/04 7:42 pm)Reply  | Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women <hr/> David: Sure, males have defined what greatness is. That goes without saying. It doesn't mean, though, that they deliberately defined greatness in a way that excluded women. Tell us another. It means precisely that. David: It is only by abandoning these values that we can begin to entertain the view that feminine art is just as interesting and as significant as masculine art - which is what is currently happening in society. I don't dispute that males dominate arts and sciences. That would indeed be a silly form of political correctness. To hell with PC! Males rule in the arts |

and sciences, but for a fairly chauvinist reason. Male domination in these roles is simply the consequence of exploitation; namely the exploitation of the female biological role. Males used to hunt for food and females raised children. Agriculture simplified food provision, so the males had more time for other stuff, hence, philosophy, religion, science, art; in short: males created what we call civilization. Unsurprisingly they dominate this field until today.

David: Singing is not really a creative art form.

It isn't?

David: The article posted at the beginning of this thread does show that greatness is being redefined by modern society because it has become clear that women are unable to reach the traditional standards of greatness.

Achievements of greatness are presently being redefined (scrutinized), because only now society is beginning to realize the magnitude of the patriarchic bias of the past and becomes aware of its consequences. It's the result of (political) enlightenment.

Another example of changing paradigms: Only a hundred years ago, society agreed about the greatness of Alexander the Great or Napoleon Bonaparte. Meanwhile, the cultural perception has changed and these figures look more like murderous tyrants to us.

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1345
(1/28/04 3:05 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

The arguments against female abilities would have more merit if it were not the for long and varied and vicious multi-pronged attacks in every possible venue that have been necessary to constantly maintain in order to keep women down.

Why such efforts, my men? Whence such anxiety?

Look at the sad bit Solway presented by Hsuan Huan about women. Note how many of the 10 problems he says women have are purely attitudinal and culture specific. He says women have a heart the size of a sesame seed. This is the final blow - the ultimate psychological injustice. I had long ago noted the dreariness of Chinese women and the rarity of their smile. First, you squeeze your women until their hearts are contracted, then you complain - see women are not nice, look how their hearts are contracted.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 57
(1/28/04 3:37 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

The fact that I have a generally low opinion of women, in terms of their mental and spiritual qualities, is borne out of many years of experience and observation of women in the world. That is to say, it is borne out of repeatedly judging individuals of both sexes in terms of their mental qualities, level of understanding and values, and finding over and over again that women are seriously lacking in these areas. It's a reality I can't ignore, even though I know that articulating it makes me terribly unpopular.

---

David, there's a two-pronged explanation to your perception and why it is so. One of which is that men of exceptionally high levels of intelligence outnumber women 2 to 1. However, the same is true on the other side of the spectrum. ie metally deficient men outnumber mentally deficient women by 2 to 1. Yet, women of average intelligence outnumber man of average intelligence by 2 to 1. This by no means suggests that men are superior to women, but that both men of inferior and superior intellect outnumber women of the same ilk. It is a mysterious and baffling phenomenon that defies explanation. Perhaps, it is your frustration in not finding enough women with the high level of understanding you seek that leads you to your conclusions. Another possibility is the fact that you never took the time to understand the feminine mind because for what ever reason you have a problem with women. All our judgements are clouded by what we want to see. If you try to peel away your prejudices and open your mind to the truth then you will truly become as enlightened as you claim you try to be.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/28/04 7:39 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2141

(1/28/04 7:57 am)

Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

David, there's a two-pronged explanation to your perception and why it is so. One of which is that men of exceptionally high levels of intelligence outnumber women 2 to 1. However, the same is true on the other side of the spectrum. ie mentally deficient men outnumber mentally deficient women by 2 to 1. Yet, women of average intelligence outnumber man of average intelligence by 2 to 1. This by no means suggests that men are superior to women, but that both men of inferior and superior intellect outnumber women of the same ilk. It is a mysterious and baffling phenomenon that defies explanation.

---

I don't think it is such a mystery. There is far more diversity among men than there is among women. Men are far more extreme in everything they do, more obsessed, more single-minded, more determined to succeed. That is why they achieve so much more, and also why they can be so much more dangerous and destructive. As Camille Paglia once said: "The reason why there are no female Mozarts is because there are no female Jack-the-Rippers".

Women everywhere are very similar to one another, and even their most extreme members huddle close to the golden mean. No matter where you go in the world, women are virtually identical. They might have a different style of clothing on, or a different hairstyle, or have been impregnated by different cultural values - but you don't have scratch the surface very far to see WOMAN shining out in its purest form.

Quote:

---

Perhaps, it is your frustration in not finding enough women with the high level of understanding you seek that leads you to your conclusions. Another possibility is the fact that you never took the time to understand the feminine mind because for what ever reason you have a problem with women.

---

Alas, the complete opposite is the case. I have spent many years closely examining the feminine mind, and nowadays I see right through it.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 183

(1/28/04 8:42 am)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Women everywhere are very similar to one another, and even their most extreme members huddle close to the golden mean. No matter where you go in the world, women are virtually identical. They might have a different style of clothing on, or a different hairstyle, or have been impregnated by different cultural values - but you don't have to scratch the surface very far to see WOMAN shining out in its purest form.

---

"From 1931 to 1933, they continued to travel and Mead continued to study in New Guinea. In 1933, they assembled their third camp in Kenakatem. Here Mead made her great discovery that "human nature is malleable". She had witnessed three specific cultures; Arapesh, Mundugumor and the Tchambuli. Each culture displayed different gender role qualities. In one culture both the women and men were cooperative, in the second they were both ruthless and aggressive, and in the Tchambuli culture the women were dominant and the men more submissive.

Due to these findings, Mead was one of the first people to propose that masculine and feminine characteristics reflected cultural conditioning (or socialization) not fundamental biological differences."

<http://www.webster.edu/~woolflm/margaretmead.html>

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 59

(1/28/04 8:52 am)

Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

I don't think it is such a mystery. There is far more diversity among men than there is among women. Men are far more extreme in everything they do, more obsessed, more single-minded, more determined to succeed. That is why they achieve so much more, and also why they can be so much more dangerous and destructive. As Camille Paglia once said: "The reason why there are no female Mozarts is because there are no female Jack-the-Rippers".

---

I remember seeing that quote somewhere recently. Can't remember where though. To a great extent I do agree with that. However, it can also be said that women are more balanced because they don't tend to be as extreme. Granted they don't create or contribute to the greater good as much but they also don't cause as much destruction and catastrophe either. There's always a trade off. Of course, this is a generalization and one must never lose sight of the fact that what is true in general does not apply to every individual. It is such generalizations that lead to prejudice, bigotry and setting up barriers to certain groups while paving the way for an elite view. I must say that I'm glad you are a philosopher who chooses to live in poverty to find wisdom rather than a politician or someone of power. On the other hand, if we were to adhere to your generalizations wouldn't it be equally true that women are a stabilizing force given the extreme designs of MAN that need to be tempered?

Quote:

---

Women everywhere are very similar to one another, and even their most extreme members huddle close to the golden mean. No matter where you go in the world, women are virtually identical. They might have a different style of clothing on, or a different hairstyle, or have been impregnated by different cultural values - but you don't have to scratch the surface very far to see WOMAN shining out in its purest form.

---

Reading this last paragraph of your only convinces me further that you have a chauvanistic attitude where women are concerned. It's just a vibe I get from all your posts when you discuss women.

avidaloca
Registered User
Posts: 148
(1/28/04 9:04 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Singing is one area where women can achieve things that men can't for biological reasons. (To circumvent that some boys were castrated to keep their voices high until early last century.)

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 486
(1/28/04 9:22 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Granted they don't create or contribute to the greater good as much but they also don't cause as much destruction and catastrophe either

I think if males thought like women and were merely sperm producers, we would still be apes.

This is just a quirk in nature whereby the male being the inserter of sperm and being able to propogate more than one female, began to become involved in the process of competition and domination over others. Evolution made certain males more successful by both brawn AND gradual improvements in intellectual ability. The female had little chance to develop as swiftly as males during this early period as during periods of pregnancy and children rearing they were more reliant on males to provide food, probably in the form of scraps leading to a less rich diet which also handicapped their physical development.

Due to food supply issues and as a protection against males violence women developed brains that were more conniving than the average male and also bodies and affections that would please males need to dominate (femininity). Women joined forces amongst each other as a form of communal protection, which is why Women with the capital W is a form of consciousness in our society to this day.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/28/04 9:30 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2144

(1/28/04 9:54 am)

Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

On the other hand, if we were to adhere to your generalizations wouldn't it be equally true that women are a stabilizing force given the extreme designs of MAN that need to be tempered?

---

This has been the traditional dynamic, yes. The powerful psychological hold that women have upon men has evolved into being because it nicely reigns in the freer, wilder side of men and persuades them to direct their energies towards the "common good" - i.e. towards the protection of women and children.

However, I don't believe that we need to preserve this dynamic indefinitely. We have the intelligence and discipline to unshackle ourselves from the feminine grip and direct our energies in a wiser, more conscious fashion. Indeed, I believe that the long-term future of our species depends on it.

Quote:

---

DQ: Women everywhere are very similar to one another, and even their most extreme members huddle close to the golden mean. No matter where you go in the world, women are virtually identical. They might have a different style of clothing on, or a different hairstyle, or have been impregnated by different cultural values - but you don't have to scratch the surface very far to see WOMAN shining out in its purest form.

Krussell: Reading this last paragraph of your only convinces me further that you have a chauvanistic attitude where women are concerned. It's just a vibe I get from all your posts when you discuss women.

---

I think it's an illusion created by my unusual perspective. A lover of classical music who sees large differences between Mozart, Beethoven and

Chopin would instinctively consider the philosopher who speaks against the attachment to all music, and who paints all music as a mindless, emotional orgiastic activity, as being a musical chauvanist and "having a bad vibe".

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2144
(1/28/04 10:09 am)
Reply

Re: ...

Rairun wrote:

Quote:

---

"From 1931 to 1933, they continued to travel and Mead continued to study in New Guinea. In 1933, they assembled their third camp in Kenakatem. Here Mead made her great discovery that "human nature is malleable". She had witnessed three specific cultures; Arapesh, Mundugumor and the Tchambuli. Each culture displayed different gender role qualities. In one culture both the women and men were cooperative, in the second they were both ruthless and aggressive, and in the Thambuli culture the women were dominant and the men more submissive.

Due to these findings, Mead was one of the first people to propose that masculine and feminine characteristics reflected cultural conditioning (or socialization) not fundamental biological differences."

---

Referring to unusual tribes living in isolated conditions cut off from the rest of the human gene pool for many centuries doesn't provide a strong foundation for her proposal. Her proposal also conflicts with the masses of scientific research done since the 30s which has discovered that the differences between male and female psychology are largely due to chemistry and genetics.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Modifying significant concepts to suit women

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 61(1/28/04 10:23 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> This has been the traditional dynamic, yes. The powerful psychological hold that women have upon men has evolved into being because it nicely reigns in the freer, wilder side of men and persuades them to direct their energies towards the "common good" - i.e. towards the protection of women and children. <hr/> It is a very important dynamic, yes. I just fail to see why you'd need to fight it so much or why you even think it inhibits you to such an extent that you have to abdicate your fatherly duties. A rather extreme approach if I do say so myself. Quote: <hr/> However, I don't believe that we need to preserve this dynamic indefinitely. <hr/> |

I think this dynamic or "powerful psychological hold" as you put it is far less significant than you give it credit for. However, I think that it is already dwindling anyway and is not what it used to be.

Quote:

---

We have the intelligence and discipline to unshackle ourselves from the feminine grip and direct our energies in a wiser, more conscious fashion. Indeed, I believe that the long-term future of our species depends on it.

---

Why do you think this? Do you have any specific examples or verifiable hardcore data back this up? Or are you just pulling this out of your hat? Please explain your rationale for why you think it is beneficial for the human race if men all abandoned their women and children.

Quote:

---

I think it's an illusion created by my unusual perspective. A lover of classical music who sees large differences between Mozart, Beethoven and Chopin would instinctively consider the philosopher who speaks against the attachment to all music, and who paints all music as a mindless, emotional orgiastic activity, as being a musical chauvanist and "having a bad vibe".

---

This is a poorly chosen analogy and only demonstrates your ability to pull clever retorts out of your ass. You have no idea where I'm coming from dude. So don't pretend that you do. It is arrogant of you to make such assumptions.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/28/04 12:30 pm

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 304
(1/28/04 11:34 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

krussel wrote:

Quote:

---

. . . women of average intelligence outnumber men of average intelligence by 2 to 1.

---

This may be the case if we are measuring intelligence with IQ tests. Certainly, in Australia at least, girls are greatly outperforming boys, on average, in academic test results.

But I personally equate intelligence with rationality. And rationality is not measured by IQ tests. Rationality includes the ability to think correctly under pressure, in unfamiliar and threatening circumstances, in situations that are personally challenging.

Currently, a person can have twice the IQ of another, and yet be only half as rational.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 63
(1/28/04 12:24 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

Currently, a person can have twice the IQ of another, and yet be only half as rational.

---

Hence, you only need to look at Ne Plus Ultra to see that high IQ and rationality don't always go hand in hand. You continue to insinuate that men are wholly rational and women are wholly irrational. Prove it.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 305

(1/28/04 1:21 pm)

Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

You continue to insinuate that men are wholly rational and women are wholly irrational. Prove it.

---

To my way of thinking, it's not a matter of "woman" or "man" but it is about "feminine" and "masculine". A man can be very feminine in his way of thinking, and hence he won't be any more rational than the average woman. By the same token a woman can be quite masculine in her thinking, and may achieve the same level of rationality as the average man, or possibly even better.

That's not to say that men are very rational, because they aren't. Men are in fact very feminine (read unconscious and passive) compared to what they could be.

It is my experience, however, that the most rational of women is probably not as rational as the average man - but this is not a rule of nature, set in stone, so to speak.

Otto Weininger goes so far as to say that the most rational woman is less rational than the least rational of men, but I suspect he might be exaggerating a little. On the other hand he might be right, and I might be the one who is exaggerating.

Statements such as "women are irrational" are obviously only generalizations, intended for people who know how to interpret such language. Of course such statements leaves one open to the "lynch mob" who act on their shallow perceptions, but one can't go through life always pandering to the lowest elements in society.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 790
(1/28/04 2:50 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Kevin, you got a new icon? Or did you 'modify a significant avatar to suit Kevin'? What the heck is it? Enlightenment? :-)

Thomas

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2147
(1/28/04 4:16 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: This has been the traditional dynamic, yes. The powerful psychological hold that women have upon men has evolved into being because it nicely reigns in the freer, wilder side of men and persuades them to direct their energies towards the "common good" - i.e. towards the protection of women and children.

KR: It is a very important dynamic, yes. I just fail to see why you'd need to fight it so much or why you even think it inhibits you to such an extent that you have to abdicate your fatherly duties.

---

I don't abdicate my fatherly duties. Quite the reverse, I regard the whole human race as my children and I attend diligently to their needs.

Quote:

---

DQ: However, I don't believe that we need to preserve this dynamic indefinitely.

KR: I think this dynamic or "powerful psychological hold" as you put it is far less significant than you give it credit for. However, I think that it is already dwindling anyway and is not what it used to be.

---

I think it is increasing. It is far more powerful nowadays than it was a hundred years ago. There is hardly a man alive today who doesn't actively promote feminine values, either consciously or unconsciously. Anyone who doesn't actively promote these values is instantly branded a misogynist.

Quote:

---

DQ: We have the intelligence and discipline to unshackle ourselves from the feminine grip and direct our energies in a wiser, more conscious fashion. Indeed, I believe that the long-term future of our species depends on it.

KR: Why do you think this?

---

Because decisions made by minds that are free of powerful, irrational distorting influences are likely to be wiser and more intelligent.

Quote:

---

Do you have any specific examples or verifiable hardcore data back this up?

---

There are countless examples to choose from. Look into most acts of violence and you will see a person under the grip of feminine values - e.g. vanity, wealth, relationships, a need to belong, etc.

Quote:

---

Please explain your rationale for why you think it is beneficial for the human race if men all abandoned their women and children.

---

You want me to explain why removing the powerful grip that women have upon the male mind will allow the human race to benefit?

Quote:

---

DQ: I think it's an illusion created by my unusual perspective.

A lover of classical music who sees large differences between Mozart, Beethoven and Chopin would instinctively consider the philosopher who speaks against the attachment to all music, and who paints all music as a mindless, emotional orgiastic activity, as being a musical chauvanist and "having a bad vibe".

KR: This is a poorly chosen analogy and only demonstrates your ability to pull clever retorts out of your ass. You have no idea where I'm coming from dude. So don't pretent that you do. It is arrogant of you to make such assumptions.

---

I was simply explaining why my attitude towards women may seem chauvanistic to you.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 309
(1/28/04 4:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Icon

---

Explanation of my new icon:

"Sol-way" = "The way of the Sun"

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2148
(1/28/04 4:36 pm)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Sure, males have defined what greatness is. That goes without saying. It doesn't mean, though, that they deliberately defined greatness in a way that excluded women.

Thomas: Tell us another. It means precisely that.

---

Surely, you're joking, Thomas. If not, you're insulting all of the fine minds of history.

Quote:

---

David: Singing is not really a creative art form.

Thomas: It isn't?

---

Not compared to composing, which is far more cerebral and visionary.

Quote:

---

David: The article posted at the beginning of this thread does show that greatness is being redefined by modern society because it has become clear that women are unable to reach the traditional standards of greatness.

Thomas: Achievements of greatness are presently being redefined (scrutinized), because only now society is beginning to realize the magnitude of the patriarchic bias of the past and becomes aware of its consequences. It's the result of (political) enlightenment.

---

It's called feminist revisionism and is eerily similar to the communist revisionism of Stalin's regime and the Cultural Revolution in China.

Quote:

---

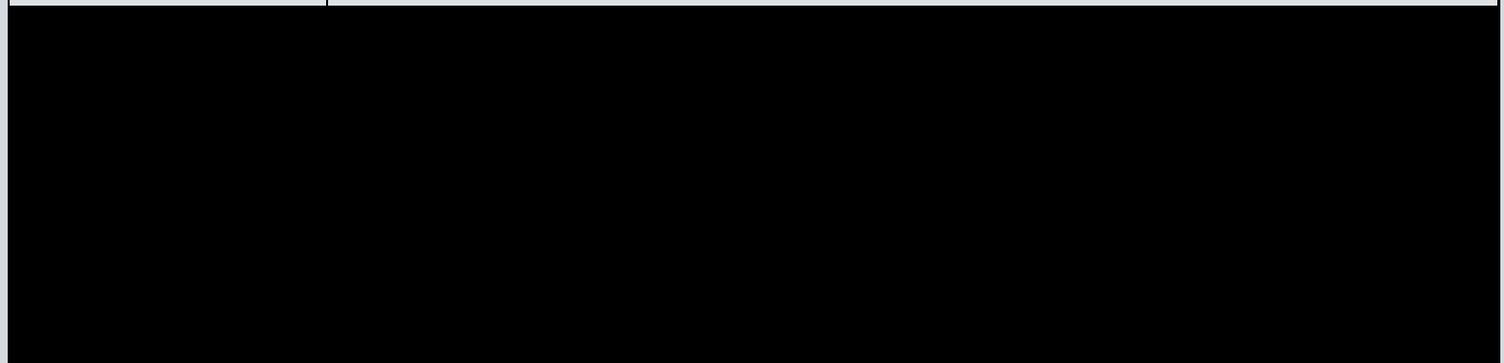

Another example of changing paradigms: Only a hundred years ago, society agreed about the greatness of Alexander the Great or Napoleon Bonaparte. Meanwhile, the cultural perception has changed and these figures look more like murderous tyrants to us.

---

They have always been regarded as murderous tyrants, as well as great men. They were "great" in the sense that they were extraordinary men who changed the course of history. No amount of feminist revisionism can change that.

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1351(1/29/04 4:10 am)Reply | Re: Icon <hr/> "Sol-way" = "The way of the Sun" I like it. I've always thought sun worship was one of the most sensible religions.                                                                                                       |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 424(1/29/04 4:22 am)Reply          | Re: Icon <hr/> With all the suicide going with it?What about good all Moon?The Moon is much more philosophical.                                                                                                                       |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 29(1/29/04 4:48 am)Reply      | Re: Icon <hr/> ahhh but Moon is feminine and worshiping that is like devil worship i am surprised kevin solway worships anything Living on earth is expensive, but it does include a free trip around the sun              |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1352(1/29/04 4:50 am)Reply | Re: Icon <hr/> I didn't hear about the suicide. The moon is the lord of the women. It can be worshipped, of course, but it is not supreme as the sun. The earth and the moon are sisters. The share the sun for a husband. |

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1352(1/29/04 5:04 am)Reply | Re: Icon <hr/> Who said anything about Kevin worshipping? Quote: <hr/> The Moon is much more philosophical. <hr/> It is, perhaps, more subtle. Certainly it figures prominently in the ultimate philosophical system - alchemy. |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 29(1/29/04 6:14 am)Reply      | Re: Icon <hr/> nobody did of course yet even his explanation of it reveals something                                                                                                                                                                        |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 425(1/29/04 6:45 am)Reply          | Re: Icon <hr/> The Sun is still in his climax.The Moon, ah, is soothing, knowing. Oh, geesh.True, though!                                                                                                                                  |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1353(1/29/04 7:25 am)Reply | Re: Icon <hr/> It reveals perhaps some self-worship.                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 795
(1/29/04 1:09 pm)
Reply

Re: Icon

---

silentsal: ahhh but Moon is feminine and worshipping that is like devil worship

The moon is masculine in German, while the sun is feminine. Bad luck for Kevin, I suppose.

Thomas

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 495
(1/29/04 1:19 pm)
Reply

Re: Icon

---

I presume the earth is seen as feminine. Mother Earth.

This is simply a continuing overhang from olden times when people had no scientific knowledge. Earth became mother because it feed them and they thought it conceived them.

I guess time is called Father Time because time heals and it also brings death.

I suppose hurricanes/cyclones were first given female names because males recognised their destructiveness.

It is so pointless to attribute sex to physical things, other than for conversational convenience. Sexual attributes only relates to higher forms of life.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 426
(1/29/04 3:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Icon

---

Quote:

---

The moon is masculine in German, while the sun is feminine.
Bad luck for Kevin, I suppose.

---

Hitler was feminine too, you know.
Sorry, mistake, he came from Austria.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 335
(1/29/04 7:36 pm)
Reply

jj van der Leeuw

Philosophy is of the uttermost practical value in the life of everyday; we cannot truly govern our lives without its help. Still less can we govern the life of nations; politics, without philosophy to inspire and to direct, are but a dangerous play with the fate of nations and not a conscious direction of their evolution. In another volume we shall see how the realization of the creative Rhythm, which philosophy brings, yields that knowledge of historical evolution which enables the philosopher-statesman to legislate for his country in accordance with its evolution instead of deciding his political measures by the clash and strife of the selfish interests of groups within the nation. Could anything be more un-practical than the unscientific government of nations which has landed the world to-day in its chaotic difficulties? Could there be more damning evidence for the lack of true philosophy in our politics than the catastrophes which have overtaken humanity of late? It is but ignorance of the forces at work in social life, national as well as international, and ignorance of the way to control them that causes these sufferings to mankind. A science of government, based not on a philosophy of abstract speculation, but on a philosophy of experience, would surely be infinitely more practical and more beneficial than the present unscientific government in which the blind do but lead the blind.

-----

1928

(things arnt getting any better)LB

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Modifying significant concepts to suit women

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 336(1/29/04 8:02 pm)Reply | Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Thomas Knierim wrote: David: Sure, males have defined what greatness is. That goes without saying. It doesn't mean, though, that they deliberately defined greatness in a way that excluded women. Tell us another. It means precisely that. David: It is only by abandoning these values that we can begin to entertain the view that feminine art is just as interesting and as significant as masculine art - which is what is currently happening in society. I don't dispute that males dominate arts and sciences. That would indeed be a silly form of political correctness. To hell with PC! Males rule in the arts and sciences, but for a fairly chauvinist reason. Male domination in these roles is simply the consequence of exploitation; namely the exploitation of the female biological role. Males used to hunt for food and females raised children. Agriculture simplified food provision, so the males had more time for other stuff, hence, philosophy, religion, science, art; LB: But what about thinking? That too, no? I find it interesting that you're able to recognize, admit, that past | circumstances caused men to excell in these, in certain areas, but when it comes to Wisdom and the like you are unable to see that here also men enjoyed a great opportunity to distance themselves from their exploited partners.

To make any personal progress, Thomas, you are going to have to-- as they say, bite the bullet, and stop worrying about what women or certain women will think about you. That is your entire problem. You cant bear to be thought of in a negative light by those whom you have defended so long, and those who follow you currently.

You have done a great thing by standing up for women and their human rights, certainly. But do you really want to remain there, stunted by that commitment, for the rest of your short, promising life?

Growth always comes at a price, and you know as well as i know that the price of a spiritual life is, and has always come at the cost of, a mans relationship with and the blessing of, women.

Leo

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 337
(1/29/04 8:28 pm)
Reply

king of the jungle

---

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 309
(1/28/04 4:33 pm)
Reply
Re: Icon

---

Explanation of my new icon:

"Sol-way" = "The way of the Sun"

- How would i put a lion up?

Leo

ps i use inet cafes

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 427(1/30/04 7:07 am)Reply                                                                                              | Re: king of the jungle <hr/> Bartoli guy, you're a sweet nut. Just like I am, and Van der Leeuw was.Van der Leeuw because he was Dutch,and I, because... because I'm Dutch.For instance. And Leeuw (Dutch) is almost Leo (English). Hey hey, reason for ya.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 498(1/30/04 9:22 am)Reply                                                                                            | Re: king of the jungle <hr/> - How would i put a lion up? I think you'd need to send an icon to someone with an ISP address, you need a website to hold the icon. They would also need to know your password to amend your profile - oops - no all they need to do is give you the URL of the icon. Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/30/04 1:19 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 804(1/30/04 1:07 pm)Reply  | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Leo: To make any personal progress, Thomas, you are going to have to-- as they say, bite the bullet, and stop worrying about what women or certain women will think about you. That is your entire problem. You can't bear to be thought of in a negative light by those whom you have defended so long, and those who follow you currently. I don't think you can make any conclusions about my personal attitude towards women from the argument that I brought forward. It is obvious for anyone who cares to think deeply about it that the biological role of the female has been exploited by human societies, including ours, and that this has probably been going on from prehistoric time onwards. In the past, Western society assigned gender roles with a heavy bias towards men. Males have all the power and they are holding onto it. Mind you, this could |

certainly be seen as a "natural" Darwinian behavior. However, civilization is slowly changing the rules and Darwinian laws are crumbling under the influence of culture; in fact they are being replaced by cultural rules. It's a whole new game. There is no more reason why women shouldn't choose untraditional roles in society.

This is basically an intellectual insight. The question how one deals with this insight is an ethical question. Once you bring ethics into the issue, it gets more complicated. The most sensible imperative is IMO not to participate in exploitative strategies, no matter what they are, which then brings up another question: what exactly is exploitative?

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 316

(1/30/04 2:09 pm)

Reply

Re: Modifying oneself to suit women

---

Quote:

---

It is obvious for anyone who cares to think deeply about it that the biological role of the female has been exploited by human societies, including ours

---

Have you read "The Myth of Male Power" by Warren Farrell? It's a real eye-opener, and may change your mind completely.

Do you realize that virtually all the outdoor, dirty, dangerous and life-threatening jobs are done by men? Not to mention that women live about 10 years longer than men. And in a divorce it's nearly always the men who lose their children (Joke: "Our divorce was very fair. We split the house 50-50. My wife kept the inside of the house, . . . "). Anyway, there's a wealth of other interesting facts in that book.

However, I would agree with your assessment in the sense that the exploitation of anything, like forests, or technology, or whatever, requires consciousness to be able to do so, and women seem to be lacking in that area. So the blame would naturally fall on the shoulders of men.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/30/04 4:14 pm

ynithrix

Registered User

Posts: 221

(1/30/04 3:48 pm)

Reply

-

---

I think the viewpoint that men pursue civilisation having 'finished' their other duties is good. But then to praise the cultural changes of society seems contradictory. Why should women be permitted into this civilised game--they haven't finished their duties, they deserve no such reward.

Rather, I think that this civilisation spoken of is just another part of man's duties. Nietzsche goes into detail of how the Will To Truth doesn't supplant, but instead reinforces, the Will To Power; it is a tool for power. Truth is the next stage, not the replacement stage. It's not the 'winners' room', where the early finishers can dwell in comfort. imo.

And so I can't see the benefit of coaxing/encouraging women into this role, ruining both the women and (more importantly, I believe) the role (by redefinition/pollution).

Woman represents a stable entity--a child-machine and carer--, nothing about her person speaks of any ability to conquer or any want to do so.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 804

(1/30/04 5:45 pm)

Reply

Re: -

---

Kevin: Have you read "The Myth of Male Power" by Warren Farrell?

I haven't read it, but thanks for the info. You mentioned the greater 'abrasiveness' of male roles, the shorter lifespans of males, discrimination of in divorce procedures, all of which are statistical facts that I don't doubt. However, as arguments against male (social) domination and power, these facts seem extremely weak to me.

ynithrix: I think the viewpoint that men pursue civilisation having 'finished' their other duties is good. But then to praise the cultural changes of society seems contradictory. Why should women be permitted into this civilised game--they haven't finished their duties, they deserve no such reward.

So, you are in favor of gender exploitation? In this case, maybe you should be crowned the new 'chief chauvinist' of this board. You certainly outdo anyone else in that discipline. The concept of merit ('deserve') I see wholly misapplied here, since civilization is the result of human development to which both men and women were necessary. Boys don't build cities if mothers don't raise them. Therefore -if at all- civilization is the merit of humanity. But why bring in the concept of merit at all? We could as well say: it just happened.

|                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                          | Thomas                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 347(1/30/04 10:01 pm)Reply | whatever<hr/> Paul:> Bartoli guy, you're a sweet nut.Gee, tanx.:)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 348(1/30/04 10:05 pm)Reply | icon<hr/> jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 498(1/30/04 9:22 am)Reply Re: king of the jungle------ How would i put a lion up?I think you'd need to send an icon to someone with an ISP address, you need a website to hold the icon. They would also need to know your password to amend your profile -oops - no all they need to do is give you the URL of the icon.Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/30/04 1:19 pmLB: ? Is this another way of saying: YOU CANT DO IT UNLESS YOU OWN YOUR OWN COMPUTER.Leo |

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1361(1/31/04 11:40 am)Reply | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Quote: <hr/> However, I would agree with your assessment in the sense that the exploitation of anything, like forests, or technology, or whatever, requires consciousness to be able to do so, and women seem to be lacking in that area. So the blame would naturally fall on the shoulders of men. <hr/> The kind of exploitation that Thomas talks about takes unconsciousness, not consciousness. Edited by: birdofhermes at: 1/31/04 12:28 pm |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 512(1/31/04 12:04 pm)Reply        | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Leo.Do you need your own computer? Yes, if you don't want to bother anyone. (and you'd need a web account) No, if you have a friend who has a webpage send it to them and ask them to load it and email you the URL. Or there are free webhosting services that you can sign up for - but I'm not going to explain how that works. I suggest you drop the idea, why bother anyone over something so trivial. It is not worth it.                            |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 223(1/31/04 12:12 pm)Reply   | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Leo, if you really want one, you can email me through my profile with the pic and I will send you the link to the url...i will just drop it on my server...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 513(1/31/04 12:26 pm)Reply     | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> ahh..the inherent kindness of women, god love em. When I was replying I almost offered the same, but as I'm unsure of the nature of Leo's mind I didn't. The relative pettyness of having a icon or not having one decided it for me. Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/31/04 12:27 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 514(1/31/04 1:03 pm)Reply      | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> Cass, as an aside I'm wondering how irritating you find the occassional reference to you womenness is? (I've done it once before and so has Sugargays). The combination of reason and maturity, as you display, is naturally appealing (at least from the annonimity of the net). I feel guilt, as it is patronising and juvenile and i'm wondering if you do as well.                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 225(1/31/04 1:30 pm)Reply | Re: Modifying oneself to suit women <hr/> I find it humorous...and generally don't pay any mind to it beyond that, unless of course a question such as yours arises ;-) Silliness is healthy IMO...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 350(1/31/04 2:48 pm)Reply    | iconed? <hr/> You're all very kind, perhaps in time i'll get around to locating something that appeals to me, however unlikely. Though i must say (not so seriously) that an offer of assistance from a strange woman right out-of-the-blue tends to make me a teensy-bit suspicious. You havent developed some sort of liking or admiration for me, now have you cass? Or maybe pity? I should say that i dont know you all that well, not from your writings i mean, i dont even know how long you've been with us, or why you're with us, though perhaps you'll enlighten me. I just barely found out that you're female. |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                        | Anyway, if you want something from me just be direct and email me, you might just get it! wise_love@yahoo.com                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 227(1/31/04 2:59 pm)Reply  | Re: iconed? <hr/> Oh jeez. Well, that's the last time I am going to be nice just for the hell of it! Paranoia will destroy ya! I have been around off and on for awhile, and as jimhaz said in another post, I find this forum far greater than any other out there. (so far, anyway) Why I am here, I don't know, I just am. |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 352(1/31/04 3:12 pm)Reply     | iconed? <hr/> You ARE a woman, indeed!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1437(1/31/04 3:17 pm)Reply | Re: iconed? <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Paranoia will destroy ya! <hr/> damn, it is killing me. What band sang that?                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Modifying significant concepts to suit women

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 228(1/31/04 3:19 pm)Reply  | Re: iconed? <hr/> I dunno, probably the Sex Pistols or Misfits or some other grungy punk band. Edit: The Kinks Edited by: cassiopeiae at: 1/31/04 3:21 pm               |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1438(1/31/04 3:24 pm)Reply | Re: iconed? <hr/> The kinks, yes. editwait...Black Sabbath? Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 1/31/04 3:30 pm                                                           |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 229(1/31/04 11:37 pm)Reply | Re: iconed? <hr/> Who knows, really...I did a search, there a about 50 different songs, from Jamiraquia (sp?) to some South African band I can't pronounce... Sounds right though.... |

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 222(2/2/04 12:24 am)Reply | re: - <hr/> "So, you are in favor of gender exploitation?" In a way. I think men should be men and women should be women; if someone can't handle that position, they have no reason to live. "Therefore -if at all- civilization is the merit of humanity." It was you who said that man pursued civilisation because he had time to do so, you even left it as a guessing game; I was clarifying if that was your opinion, and then following that with a question which I saw to follow from that viewpoint. I stated my opinion in the second paragraph.                                                                          |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 359(2/2/04 12:46 am)Reply | ?no sage is better than a bad sage? <hr/> ynithrix wrote: quote ?: "So, you are in favor of gender exploitation?" In a way. I think men should be men and women should be women; if someone can't handle that position, they have no reason to live. LB: In the end that may be by far the best approach for the race. There is no evidence to show that the world would be better off if women made a measurable advance in consciousness, while there are mounting indications that such an advance may be Self-destructive and will eventually spell disaster for the human race. Which may be best, anyway.Leo |

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 910

(2/2/04 10:06 am)

Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

DQ: Do any these female artists possess the greatness of a Michelangelo or a Picasso?

---

One queer and one extremely emotional man.

Why would you look for females who can match the artistic merit of feminine men?

Why would you hold up feminine men as paragons of ability in trying to point out masculine superiority?

Aren't you shooting yourself in the foot?

You will notice this feminine male trait exhibited to a degree that is far more than statistically significant (in fact 'statistically significant' doesn't come close to doing it justice), throughout the history of art, and within virtually all of the arts. One would be blind to deny it. Doesn't it then follow, being as these conversations are alledgedly about feminine/masculine as opposed to female/male, that an artists greatness, relative to their gender, is more a function of societal constraints and one's gender in that context than it is a function of one's masculine/feminine mindedness?

I can't believe that Frida Kahlo wasn't on that list BTW. She has a good chance, given time, of being regarded as a masteress. The last word of the previous sentence will have to be coined at some point or other. The word 'mistress' just wouldn't do. Another example of societal constraint?

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 2/2/04 10:26 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 911
(2/2/04 10:23 am)
Reply

Re: Modifying significant concepts to suit women

---

Quote:

---

DQ: Singing is not really a creative art form. At best, it is merely an interpretative activity, in which the singer gives his or her own intpretation of a creative work.

---

You really will say anything to score a point. To imply that it's not art unless it's creative is just silly. To deny the art of interpretation is to deny the bulk of the work of artists, when you think about it, and it is also to deny much of what you might call your art of interpretation when it comes to wise words from the past. I doubt that Django Reinhardt would agree. Sylvie Guillem would scoff. Julian Bream would whack you with his guitar, Coltrane would club you with his sax and Lady Day would laugh as she sang about it, with balls.

Quote:

---

Composition is the heart and soul of musical creativity, and it is no surprise to learn that, even today, there are few female composers - and no great ones, as far as I know.

---

Ok, what constitutes great in your eyes?

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 2/2/04 10:28 am

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 183
(2/2/04 10:38 am)
Reply

...

---

Björk, in my opinion, is miles away from anyone in terms of creative expression today.

And I agree about Frida.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 912
(2/2/04 10:50 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Yep, she was going to be my first mention.

Now David has the chance to define greatness so as to exclude her though.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 235
(2/2/04 11:06 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Rairun: Björk, in my opinion, is miles away from anyone in terms of creative expression today.

---

She is very creative as far as voice goes, but her husband composes and writes all of her music :-/

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 183
(2/2/04 11:14 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

She is very creative as far as voice goes, but her husband composes and writes all of her music :-/

---

He doesn't. There are a few collaborations, but most of the songs are written by her.

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 913(2/2/04 11:18 am)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Yes, Bjork writes virtually all of her own material.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 235(2/2/04 12:38 pm)Reply                                                                                 | Re: ... <hr/> I retract my statement.. I was remembering an article I read where her "ex" husband was the "arranger" on a few of her albums... However, she collaborates a lot with people, but that doesn't make her any less creative, I suppose...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2174(2/2/04 1:08 pm)Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Rairun wrote: Quote: <hr/> Björk, in my opinion, is miles away from anyone in terms of creative expression today. <hr/> She's okay. But it's just pop ditties, isn't it, not far removed from advertizing jingles. There are thousands of more accomplished artists who are doing far more creative, intricate work. But because the mainstream media ignore them, most people are unaware of their existence. They only hear about the Bjorks and the Radioheads, not knowing that it's just the tip of a very large iceberg. |

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 236
(2/2/04 1:14 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

DQ: But it's just pop ditties, isn't it, not far removed from advertizing jingles.

---

Um...no, and way removed....but she did have some pop stuff also...

Quote:

---

DQ: There are thousands of more accomplished artists who are doing far more creative, intricate work. But because the mainstream media ignore them, most people are unaware of their existence. They only hear about the Bjorks and the Radioheads, not knowing that it's just the tip of a very large iceberg.

---

I agree...

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2174
(2/2/04 1:41 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Do any these female artists possess the greatness of a Michelangelo or a Picasso?

DT: One queer and one extremely emotional man.

Why would you look for females who can match the artistic merit of feminine men?

Why would you hold up feminine men as paragons of ability in trying to point out masculine superiority?

---

It's all relative, isn't it. Compared to spirituality, philosophy and science, art is a fairly feminine activity. But compared to flowing along passively in life, it is supremely masculine.

Painting and making music doesn't require one to suppress the emotions and open up a mental compartment for objective, emotion-free reasoning, as one has to do in science and philosophy. And yet in order to produce a painting or a piece of music that is sufficiently interesting to be considered "great", one does need a very structured mind. So a degree of masculinity is required.

Quote:

---

I can't believe that Frida Kahlo wasn't on that list BTW. She has a good chance, given time, of being regarded as a masteress.

---

I don't know about this. She was certainly able to pour a lot of her suffering into her work. But I personally don't find her work very interesting.

Why do you think her work is "great"?

Quote:

---

DQ: Singing is not really a creative art form. At best, it is merely an interpretative activity, in which the singer gives his or her own interpretation of a creative work.

DT: You really will say anything to score a point. To imply that it's not art unless it's creative is just silly. To deny the art of interpretation is to deny the bulk of the work of artists, when you think about it, and it is also to deny much of what you might call your art of interpretation when it comes to wise words from the past.

---

Sure, it denies the bulk of artists and their work. But the entire premise of the conversation has been the distinction between great artists and mediocre artists. I do not deny that women are capable of producing mediocre art.

Singing, as an interpretative artform, is akin to interior decorating. It is the making of minor decorative changes to what is already a solidly built structure.

Quote:

---

I doubt that Django Reinhardt would agree. Sylvie Guillem would scoff. Julian Bream would whack you with his guitar, Coltrane would club you with his sax and Lady Day would laugh as she sang about it, with balls.

---

I don't know about the others, but Coltrane was primarily a composer, wasn't he?

Quote:

---

DQ: Composition is the heart and soul of musical creativity, and it is no surprise to learn that, even today, there are few female composers - and no great ones, as far as I know.

DT: Ok, what constitutes great in your eyes?

---

I'm not sure that it can be formulated in a few simple principles. What makes the Ozric Tentacles "great" is very different to what makes Beethoven "great". It all comes down to richness of composition, for want of a better phrase. A rich composition can be enjoyed on many different levels. It yields its treasures slowly over time and never grows stale. Every aspect of it sparkles with life and skill. It is able to transport the mind towards a consciousness of timelessness and induce sublime moods.

What is your view?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2175
(2/2/04 1:46 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

DQ: But it's just pop ditties, isn't it, not far removed from advertizing jingles.

Cass: Um...no, and way removed....but she [Bjork] did have some pop stuff also...

---

I'm familiar with her first three albums and it all sounds like pop to me. Advanced pop, of course, and very pleasing to the ear, but still pop nonetheless.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 536
(2/2/04 6:36 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Bjork

I was a big fan of her first solo album, but not any of the latter ones. Before that she was in a band called the Sugarcubes, I liked their albums more, though not so much anymore. It was much heavier Icelandic punk music, i think she joined the band when about 14. In a some of the songs there was a interesting contrast between her sweetness and vibrancy and the overlay rough, aggressive male voice and lyrics of one of te orther band members.

---

Has anyone heard Jeff Lang? an Australian guitarist/singer/songwriter. Bit of a genius if you ask me, fucks up occasionally but mostly gets it right. I just adore his guitar work, though there are no purely instrumental songs.

The best album by far is his latest 'No Point Slowing Down' which should anyone be interested you can download a song here :

www.jefflang.com.au/nopoint.htm

The better song of those two is Ravenswood (2.6mbs).

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 915

(2/3/04 10:40 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

Rairun: Björk, in my opinion, is miles away from anyone in terms of creative expression today.

DQ: She's okay. But it's just pop ditties, isn't it, not far removed from advertizing jingles.

I'm familiar with her first three albums and it all sounds like pop to me. Advanced pop, of course, and very pleasing to the ear, but still pop nonetheless.

---

I can't see how more popular necessarily equates to less worth. In fact one could argue that one criterion to associate with greatness might pertain to the the ability to cross that divide between the esoteric and the accessible (the difference between Rachmaninov and J.S. Bach, or Yngwei Malmsteen and Dave Gilmour, for instance). Of course, pop can be seen as more a measure of music's worth relative to the given culture, as opposed to the worth of the music itself; and so it might well be a measure of the culture, in part. Beethoven, Vivaldi, Gershwin, Tchaikovsky, Grappelli, Coltrane, Mingus and Miles, they all used to 'do pop'.

With regard to Bjork, I think her 3rd album was a significant departure from the first two, which, whilst they were admittedly pop, were also seminal pop. The 3rd Album saw her mature significantly IMO. She moved away from mainstream (or rather the portion of mainstream that she had created) and went back to her roots (for want of a less cheesy way of putting it), creating evocative musical vistas, dreamy and dreary ice-cold musical landscapes with warming resolutions. From here she's moved progressively further away from the mainstream with each album. However in all of her works, regardless of genre, I think her compositional skills, technical know-how and expressive ability shine through.

---

Quote:

There are thousands of more accomplished artists who are doing far more creative, intricate work. But because the mainstream media ignore them, most people are unaware of their existence. They only hear about the Bjorks and the Radioheads, not knowing that it's just the tip of a very large iceberg.

---

You're right of course, with regard to the mainstream, but there's never a good reason to throw the baby out with the bath water. You have used what some might regard as the cream of the crop as examples, so lumping them in with the rest of the shite. Ozrics, or Opeth (nice tip BTW), it may not be; but it's hardly Kylie or Britney either. To use this argument of Kylie versus Ozrics, and implicate the aforementioned by default, is slightly unfair I think. The spectrum goes from one extreme to another, it's a question of where you draw the line I suppose.

I'll have to come back to Kahlo, Coltrane, etc. later.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

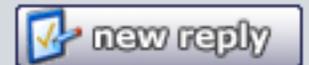

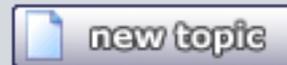

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Money is God

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 935(1/23/04 6:10 pm)Reply      | Money is God <hr/> The greatest terrestrial manifestation of the character of God is money. Everything and everyone who fights against it's worshippers gets crushed sooner or later.Hate it as much as you want but you will bow before this God. Unless. . . . . |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2108(1/23/04 9:39 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> ...you are me! Unless you, as I do, invite a certain kind of crush upon yourself, not from temptation to tragedy, but from joy in strength! With this one frees oneself entirely from pity.                                                                  |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 936(1/24/04 1:17 pm)Reply      | absolute value <hr/> Money is the absolute means.The absolute end brought the absolute means into existence.A strange and subtle shift takes place in the mind when the absolute means becomes the absolute end.What are the symptoms of the shift?             |

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2113(1/24/04 2:04 pm)Reply                                                                                  | ---- <hr/> The symptoms of the shift? Drowning in gold as opposed to becoming golden.                                                                                                    |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 937(1/24/04 9:02 pm)Reply                                                                                       | - <hr/> Correct. The practical application to life is always the greatest challenge.                                                                                              |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 77(1/25/04 11:46 am)Reply | Re: - <hr/> Hmm. I can only assume that I would need to be smoking crack also in order to understand this thread, much like one must speak French to understand a conversation in Paris. |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 461(1/25/04 1:51 pm)Reply  | Re: - <hr/> Yes, it is similar to the jargon that the NPU crew uses. They think they are smart poets because they don't speak in plain English. Poetry is just entertainment.            |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2119(1/25/04 1:59 pm)Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Poetry is not just entertainment. It is a means of articulating much in very little.                                                                                           |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 940(1/25/04 2:26 pm)Reply                                                                                       | Money as God <hr/> Can you imagine and describe money personified?What kind of behaviour would you expect?                                                                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2122(1/25/04 2:30 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                  | --- <hr/> The monopoly guy. Heart trouble would be expected.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 81(1/25/04 2:47 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> The crack remark must have been useful, as DEL has now made a good point. It is in fact instructive to envision 'money personified,' I think. Indeed, the result would be very much like a god. This should clue us in as to what the most rational attitude toward money is.                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 942(1/26/04 1:13 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                       | Money Personified <hr/> Quote: <hr/> suergazThe Monopoly guy. Heart trouble would be expected. <hr/> I don't think so. The Monopoly man personifies the chase to acquire money. Money never gets stressed it can move effortlessly around the "civilised" world. It can take on many forms. You may get stressed trying to control it.                                                                                                                |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2125(1/26/04 11:24 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                 | ---- <hr/> Money began as a noble invention to keep the rabble at bay through distraction. The rabble is only ever a distraction to itself through an idea it possesses over varying degrees. When the rabble recognizes the nobles it throws up, it weighs them against the ever pressing urgency of its thirst for 'currency'-----Can you see where this is headed?! Money is never personified. One can't become it, only chase it. How else could people be enslaved by it? |

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 945(1/26/04 2:11 pm)Reply                                                                                         | Money as God <hr/> Quote: <hr/> suergazMoney began as a noble invention to keep the rabble at bay through distraction. The rabble is only ever a distraction to itself through an idea it possesses over varying degrees. <hr/> The rise of the banks was the downfall of the aristocracy. Kings and Queens never borrowed anything with the intent to give it back with interest. Aristocracy only understand gifts or robbery. The concept of money and banking has created a type of "freedom" from being owned. |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 89(1/26/04 3:02 pm)Reply  | Re: Money as God <hr/> Are you the rabble?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 947(1/26/04 6:23 pm)Reply                                                                                         | Money as God <hr/> Are you of the aristocracy?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 109(1/26/04 6:39 pm)Reply | Re: Money as God <hr/> Yes, and I am also of the rabble. Humankind is the rabble and the aristocracy, what is in one man is in all.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

|                                                                    |                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 951(1/26/04 6:45 pm)Reply | Re: Money as God<hr/> Correct.So serve God and enjoy the earth. |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> More material on DQ site

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2314(4/3/04 7:41 am)Reply  | More material on DQ site <hr/> I've created new pages for various works such as Thus Spake Zarathustra, The Teachings of Diogenes, Nagarjuna, and The Banquet by Kierkegaard. They can be found here. I also plan to create other pages in coming weeks, on Hakuin, Huang Po, Bodhidharma, Eckhart, Weininger, etc. My aim is to create a series of pages in which these great works can be read in the simplest possible format, without any unnecessary intrusions. You also might be interested to know that Genius Forum has recently been banned in China. So unless Hu Zheng has a few tricks up his sleeve, it is the last we'll hear from him for awhile. |

silentsal

Registered User

Posts: 91

(4/3/04 8:08)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Thank you

Quote:

---

You also might be interested to know that Genius Forum has recently been banned in China. So unless Hu Zheng has a few tricks up his sleeve, it is the last we'll hear from him for awhile.

---

He may

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1672

(4/3/04 9:16 am)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Say what? Banned in China? Where did you hear that? From Hu Zheng? I don't see how such a ban could really be enforced. Does that government closely monitor everyone's internet activity? Seems unlikely to me.

**edit** Mind you, it seems China has, in the past, banned places like Google, so being banned there doesn't seem to mean much....

Dan Rowden

Edited by: drowden at: 4/3/04 9:22 am

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 359

(4/3/04 9:55 am)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Quote:

---

I've created new pages for various works such as Thus Spake Zarathustra, The Teachings of Diogenes, Nagarjuna, and The Banquet by Kierkegaard. They can be found here.

I also plan to create other pages in coming weeks, on Hakuin, Huang Po, Bodhidharma, Eckhart, Weininger, etc. My aim is to create a series of pages in which these great works can be read in the simplest possible format, without any unnecessary intrusions.

---

I'm really glad you're doing this. I've tried to find the works of some of these people but haven't been able to.

What about Socrates?

Quote:

---

You also might be interested to know that Genius Forum has recently been banned in China. So unless Hu Zheng has a few tricks up his sleeve, it is the last we'll hear from him for awhile.

---

It'd be interesting to know what they didn't like about it, though perhaps they didn't like any of it.

Think? Bad! Don't think. Bad!

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 4/3/04 9:58 am

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 847

(4/3/04 10:46)

Reply

...

---

What about Socrates?

Socrates never wrote any of his own stuff, that was Plato and others.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 361

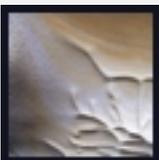

(4/3/04 11:21)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Sure, but isn't there something worth presenting about him? Even if it was written by Plato?

|                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce io Registered User Posts: 853 (4/3/04 11:26) Reply                                                                                     | ... <hr/> Yes, The Apology and The Crito (sp?).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| MKFaizi Registered User Posts: 1143 (4/3/04 14:41) Reply    | Re: ... <hr/> From what I have heard from someone who lived in China for a long while, the basic agenda for life in China is death. My friend attended college there. The medical school relied on the penal system to send over cadavers for autopsies. Eventually, the medical school had an over-abundance of corpses and asked that no more be sent until requested. The director of the penal system wrote back and asked if the medical school could then accept live prisoners and kill them when needed. Faizi |
| MKFaizi Registered User Posts: 1144 (4/3/04 14:43) Reply  | Re: ... <hr/> Socrates is a very worthwhile study and David has good material of that sort. Good request. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| jimhaz Registered User Posts: 628 (4/3/04 20:06) Reply    | Re: ... <hr/> Good. I haven't looked as yet. Be interested to see some stuff on Hakuin.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1062
(4/4/04 0:19)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Can I get some bacon please? Some bread and water too perhaps?

Ducky M
Posts: 14
(4/4/04 2:47 am)
Reply

China yesterday, today, and maybe next week...

---

Quote:

---

From what I have heard from someone who lived in China for a long while, the basic agenda for life in China is death.

---

Maybe that explains the ancient Chinese custom of grieving when somebody is born, and celebrating when somebody dies. After all, in the latter case, they would be joining their venerated ancestors!

Quote:

---

Eventually, the medical school had an over-abundance of corpses and asked that no more be sent until requested

---

In view of the recent scandal at UCLA having to do with the handling of American cadavers used in medical research, I wouldn't be surprised if in the near future cadavers used for that purpose were required to wear a certification reading "Made in China". :(

Edited by: Ducky M  at: 4/4/04 2:54 am

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 362

(4/6/04 14:45)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Hi David,

The teachings of Diogenes and Nagarjuna are very faint and hard to read. You might want to darken up the writing.

Rhett

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2315

(4/6/04 18:24)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Try refreshing the pages. For some reason, the backgrounds don't always load first time around. I don't know why.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1688

(4/7/04 11:02)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

If it was me I'd take out this crap from under the opening body tag:

```

<blockquote><blockquote><blockquote><blockquote>

```

And just stick this: `background="red_rock.gif"` within the opening tag. i.e. the opening body tag will then look like this: `<body background="red_rock.gif" bgproperties="fixed">`

I've added the "fixed" body property 'cause I reckon it looks better when the text scrolls over a background like that.

Sometimes programs like Front Page write really painful html scripts.

That change should solve the problem. I think. Others will no doubt have their version of an appropriate solution.

Dan Rowden

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 363

(4/7/04 11:10)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

I tried them again and they worked fine, they look good.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 35

(4/7/04 14:15)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

To print the Nagajuna extracts, i changed the text colour from its pale grey to black (automatic).

Hywel

Registered User

Posts: 58

(4/8/04 18:36)

Reply

Re: Background Problems

---

If you add the following to the body tag of the Diogenes webpage:-

```
bgcolor="#990000"
```

And this to the Nagarjuna webpage:-

```
bgcolor="#003366"
```

These should mean that if the image does not load for whatever reason, or if the user downloads the webpage onto their computer for later reading (and so doesnt have the image), there shouldnt be a problem with low contrast.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2316

(4/9/04 18:36)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

A new Hakuin site that I've created is now on-line, featuring plenty of his material. Hakuin is a truly brilliant spiritual teacher that I can't recommend highly enough. An essential read.

--

Dan wrote:

Quote:

---

And just stick this: background="red_rock.gif" within the opening tag. i.e. the opening body tag will then look like this:

<body background="red_rock.gif" bgproperties="fixed">

---

Thanks. That seems to have done the trick.

Quote:

---

I've added the "fixed" body property 'cause I reckon it looks better when the text scrolls over a background like that.

---

Beg to differ ....

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 367

(4/10/04 12:45)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

An excellent opening quote on the Hakuin site!

I find myself drooling(!?)

Oh, it's time for lunch.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 877

(4/10/04 5:31 pm)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

---

Thanks for the Hakuin site. I haven't read any of his stuff yet, but after just looking it over a bit it seems very good.

(edit) Like this:

If you don't have the eye of kensho, it is impossible for you to use a single drop of the Buddha's wisdom. These men are heading straight for the realms of hell. That is why I say: if upon becoming a Buddhist monk you do not penetrate the Buddha's truth, you should turn in your black robe, give back all the donations you have received, and revert to being a layman.

Don't you realize that every syllable contained in the Buddhist canon - all five thousand and forty-eight scrolls of scripture - is a rocky cliff jutting into deadly, poison-filled seas?

from The Importance of Kensho, Hakuin

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> More material on DQ site

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 103(4/11/04 17:52)Reply | Re: More material on DQ site <hr/> Hakuin was a great teacher, I hope you all enjoy reading his material. Master Hakuin Zenji's ZaZen Wasan (Song in Praise of Sitting Meditation) ----- The primary essence of all sentient beings is Buddha,The originating nature of the self is the Non-Buddha nature,Without sentient beings there is no Buddha. The reckless way of utter absorption is the true way.As one immersed in water,So make the thought of the Nonthought the whole of your thought. Even when travelling along dark and dusty roadsThose roads are themselves the Lotus Land,This is more than sufficient for rejoicing and praise. Even as water and ice go together,So good works of graciousnessDo not know any attachment to sentient things.Nevertheless they destroy the innumerable accumulations of sins, |

They are like the utterance of the mystic cry (at enlightenment).

How thankworthy is the Law

By it the causes and relationships of the Six Regions of the Wheel Receive endless happiness.

Escape from the Life-Death cycle will take place.

Almsgiving, Obedience to the laws, the paramitas

All are but the dark road of our own ignorance

But all of them come to an end in the Law.

As for the Meditation of the Mahayana

Where can the evil regions be?

Recollection of the Buddha, Repentance, The Discipline of life

When once these have entered our ears

Then he who performs one meritorious act of Meditation

Much more he who has 'turned himself around',

From such the Pure Land is not far distant.

He who has ceased from vain argumentation

He who extols the virtues of others

He who realises that Form is No-Form

He who bears witness to the nature of the Self as Originating Essence.

To such an one singing and dancing are alike the voice of the Law

He has opened the gate of the Absolute Undifferentiated Nature.

When that happens what is there to seek?

Whether one goes on or returns there is no 'elsewhere'

The very body he has is indeed Buddha.

The sky of the unhindered Samadhi is broad;

Just as there can be no ice without water, so Nirvana is immediately present. To go seeking in distant places

-- How foolish --

So do you become the son of that rich man.

-----

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1013

(7/21/04 9:44)

Reply

Re: More material on DQ site

I'm just giving this a random bump so that more people can see David's website, which is great.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

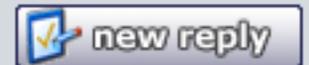

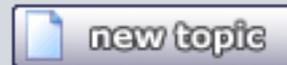

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Music and Spirituality

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1851(12/7/03 7:07 am)Reply  |  Music and Spirituality <hr/> A couple of weeks ago, Dave Toast posed a few questions about music: Quote: <hr/> Perhaps then, this is a good time to ask DQ if he would care to partake of a discussion on the spiritual aspects of music. Spiritual aspects that he has previously alluded to, of at least certain forms of music which he has previously indicated that he places value upon (though I'm not sure if he'd concur with my phraseology here). <hr/> Close enough. Some forms of music are more conducive to producing altered states of consciousness, mystical experiences, childlike reveries, interesting insights, etc - which may or may not be of spiritual value depending on the listener and the quality of his own mind. Quote: <hr/> David, what do you believe music has to offer to the enquiring mind, in the way of spiritual rumination? <hr/> I want to stress from the outset that there is nothing inherently "spiritual" |

about music, other than the fact that it is part of the Totality. Indeed, for most people, it is entirely an egotistical affair. I'm not just referring here to cruder uses of music either, such as using national anthems to generate patriotic fervour or using hip-hop to stimulate sexual desire. I'm also talking about the use of music as high art. Putting on Beethoven to elevate one's mood or lose oneself in the flowing structure or revel in his compositional skills is also egotism and has nothing to do with spirituality.

Music can, however, help the mind spiritually in several ways:

- It can produce significant altered states of consciousness which, if the listener is alert enough, can be used to tease out insight into the nature of Reality. In this, music serves the same function as meditation, LSD, near-death experiences and the like. It can propel the mind out of its normal everyday thought-processes and thereby open it up to entirely new perspectives, which may or may not have a connection to wisdom, again depending on the listener and the quality of his mind.
- Music can, through the skilled appreciation of dissonance, teach the mind to perceive beauty in ugliness, and then, as a consequence of this, to perceive beauty in utterly everything. This, in turn, can help the spiritual person break down his array of aversions that he has inherited from his genetic material and from his childhood.
- Music can also be used as a relatively harmless source of food to the ego, and thus in an indirect sense, can help the spiritual person in his quest to abandon his ego entirely. Because music is inherently emotional in nature, it can temporarily satisfy the ego's incessant hunger for emotional fulfillment and thereby give the spiritual person some needed rest before he pushes on again. Of course, ideally, the spiritual person would never give in to his ego's emotional demands and would instead attempt to starve it to death in the shortest time possible. But in real life, such a task is very difficult and beyond most of us. We have to take the lesser route of feeding the ego little morsels every now and then and starving the ego more gradually. Using music in this regard can be helpful and is certainly far less harmful than, say, joining a church or forming an emotional relationship with a woman.

Quote:

---

Does the content of the music matter in these matters, or is it rather the content that the listener/creator infers upon what they hear/imagine?

---

Both. It is much easier to enter into altered states of consciousness listening to the Ozric Tentacles than it is to Britney Spears. But then, on the other hand, I have met quite a few people who get nothing out of listening to the Ozric Tentacles. I'm sure you have too.

Quote:

---

Is the content of this subject something that is easily put into words? Do you find that music is something that communicates with the mind and body on a level surpassing exhaustive description?

---

Well, we really should make this a two-way discussion, so what are your thoughts on this?

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 353
(12/7/03 10:09 am)
Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

The Sound of Music?
Apart from Julie it's Mozart. Heaven.
Where Bach is Earth.
OK, I'll shut up.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 171
(12/11/03 10:45 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Since i already stated my general views on music in 'Pre-requisites for enlightenment' i won't state them here.

Nevertheless, i had a recent experience where sounds made a big influence on my thoughts.

I chose to sit down at the end of a beach on the sand and focus my thoughts as deeply as possible on the Tao. I noticed that there was a strange effect happening with the noise of the crashing waves, it was reverberating off the cliffs behind me. It was annoying at first but soon began to influence my thoughts as they deepened.

It was quite surreal within my mind, my thoughts crashing in unison with the waves. I kept thinking but my thoughts seemed to turn into themselves, like my mind was getting hotter and hotter, until thought was like a fire

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                          | burning within my mind. It reached a zenith where all thought was extinguished - yet i was still conscious, a blank incinerator nuked of all chance of thought. It really seemed as if the inside of my head was on fire. The experience faded fairly quickly, and though it was quite insignificant for me, was an interesting and somewhat perplexing experience nonetheless. Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 448(12/11/03 11:11 am)Reply      |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> That sounds like a very irrational experience!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1317(12/11/03 12:07 pm)Reply |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> People often use various repetitive motions (breathing, rocking) or sounds when entering a rational, meditative state. The mind needs help at times. Music can do this but I find its effect diminished from several years ago. Personally, I prefer focusing on my breathing usually, but am also open to other opportunities such as what Rhett experienced. You should try it sometime, Voce. Lay down on your back or sit in a comfortable chair. Close your eyes and try not to think. Count your breaths or say "OOoom" or something. The first few times you may fall asleep and that is ok. After a little practice, you will begin to see a great effect on your emotions. Tharan |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 209(12/11/03 12:21 pm)Reply  |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Music is not only sound produced by an instrument or a vocalist, but is in everything. I could be standing in the middle of New York City and compose a symphony with my mind using the sounds of automobiles, shoes on the pavement, pigeons, conversations, and anything else that comes along...awareness of how structured, and at times predictable, the world actually is.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 449
(12/11/03 12:30 pm)
Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Tharan, I've done it before. It was kind of cool, using Om; the high pitched sounds that you end up hearing are sweet.

The reason I called Rhett irrational for giving any thought to such as experience is because, well, it is pretty irrational to think of this as anything spiritual.

cassiopeiae - you are very right.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 173
(12/11/03 12:34 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

That sounds like a very irrational experience!

Well, to a large extent it was, and that's why it doesn't interest me that much. I actually only posted it in an attempt to save a potentially good thread from obscurity.

People often use various repetitive motions (breathing, rocking) or sounds when entering a rational, meditative state. The mind needs help at times. Music can do this but I find its effect diminished from several years ago. Personally, I prefer focusing on my breathing usually, but am also open to other opportunities such as what Rhett experienced.

Ideally, all one need do is focus on one's thoughts, that is all i have ever really done. I have usually just minimised any physical sensation and dived into my thoughts.

All i advocate is the development of one's understanding of Ultimate Reality, because Truth can only follow from that.

You should try it sometime, Voce. Lay down on your back or sit in a comfortable chair. Close your eyes and try not to think. Count your breaths or say "OOoom" or something. The first few times you may fall asleep and that is ok. After a little practice, you will begin to see a great effect on your emotions.

Now you are talking about plain old will-to-unconsciousness meditation. Contemplation! Think! Think! Think! and emotions will be transcended.

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1913(12/11/03 1:19 pm)Reply                                                                                       |  ---- <hr/> For some reason I can't imagine Rhett sitting on a beach. You should be chopping wood or something.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1320(12/11/03 1:49 pm)Reply                                                                                   |  --- <hr/> Rhett, I am afraid it is the thinking that gets people into trouble most of the time. I don't think it applies to you. But many people need to clear the chatter from their minds before they can focus on the "Truth" you describe. Thoughts and emotions are often deeply intertwined. Meditation is only a tool to clear the chatter. Satori comes later usually. Tharan                                                                                                              |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 795(12/12/03 10:01 am)Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> Sorry David, this requires too much thought at the moment but I will answer when I get the time. I must say I'm suprised by some of what you say though, in light of some of your previous posts on music.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 176(12/12/03 12:21 pm)Reply   Edit                                                                         |  Re: --- <hr/> Tharan wrote: Rhett, I am afraid it is the thinking that gets people into trouble most of the time. I don't think it applies to you. But many people need to clear the chatter from their minds before they can focus on the "Truth" you describe. Thoughts and emotions are often deeply intertwined. Meditation is only a tool to clear the chatter. Satori comes later usually. No, you are spreading false wisdom, in fact, you are spreading some of the | worst evil i can imagine.

I broke through the chatter by spending enough time thinking to do so. It's the only way to get through, to develop proper thought capacity.

Your method cannot succeed, and i'm afraid you are proof of that. Thought-aversion forms of meditation are merely a short lived remedy for suffering, a band-aid. What's bad about that is that they blind people to the real cure (Wisdom) because they become fixated on - or even addicted to - the quick-fix.

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1920
(12/12/03 12:34 pm)
Reply

 ----

---

I've known wolf nearly as long as I've been here, and I've never known him to spread any evil!

I don't think you're original enough to make your personal attacks beneficial to those you attack. Concentrate your fight with me, I spread laughter.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 178
(12/12/03 12:50 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ----

---

I've known wolf nearly as long as I've been here, and I've never known him to spread any evil!

That's because you have different values to me, and are quite ignorant of human psychology and the Truth.

I don't think you're original enough to make your personal attacks beneficial to those you attack. Concentrate your fight with me, I spread laughter.

I was not particularly interested in attacking Tharan, it was a natural comment to make in association with the point i was making.

The more you talk about laughter, the more i know you are not laughing inside.

Rhett

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1922(12/12/03 1:10 pm)Reply     |  --- <hr/> You think talk of laughter betrays a lack thereof? You laugh less than I imagine! What is true of my speaking of laughter is that the more I do, the more indignant you become!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| 1TheMasterRegistered UserPosts: 193(12/12/03 2:18 pm)Reply   |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> What is laughter? What is humour? Define it. From where does it stem?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 456(12/12/03 3:03 pm)Reply      |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> That last post was one of the dumbest things I've ever read here.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1323(12/13/03 2:19 am)Reply |  Re: --- <hr/> Rhett, I appreciate what you are trying to do, but I know that you are too new to this to make proper judgements. Quote: <hr/> No, you are spreading false wisdom, in fact, you are spreading some of the worst evil i can imagine. <hr/> Speak, clearly please. Using wild words like "evil" is a tactic your mentor Quinn enjoys that you seem to have puppeted, but we both know it is non-existent and tends to inflame a potentially productive conversation. Quote: <hr/> I broke through the chatter by spending enough time thinking to do so. It's the only way to get through, to develop proper thought capacity. <hr/> |

In other words, you focused on a single goal or idea. Correct?
Congratulations on your breakthrough. We are describing the same thing.

Quote:

---

Your method cannot succeed, and i'm afraid you are proof of that. Thought-aversion forms of meditation are merely a short lived remedy for suffering, a band-aid. What's bad about that is that they blind people to the real cure (Wisdom) because they become fixated on - or even addicted to - the quick-fix.

---

You are like a child throwing a tantrum, Rhett, calm down. It is a tool, not a solution. Must I repeat that again?

It is merely a tool to help reach satori, not satori itself.

Read some Hakuin and speak to me again at a later time.

Tharan

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 179
(12/13/03 11:38 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

Tharan wrote:

Rhett, I appreciate what you are trying to do, but I know that you are too new to this to make proper judgements.

I disagree. I have included an extract from "Poison for the Heart" at the end of this post for your interest.

-----
No, you are spreading false wisdom, in fact, you are spreading some of the worst evil i can imagine.
-----

Speak, clearly please. Using wild words like "evil" is a tactic your mentor Quinn enjoys that you seem to have puppeted, but we both know it is non-existent and tends to inflame a potentially productive conversation.

Surely I can't always be expected to fully elucidate my values? I just wouldn't get off the ground.

Rhett's definitions:

Evil = Ignorance & Unconsciousness

---

I broke through the chatter by spending enough time thinking to do so. It's the only way to get through, to develop proper thought capacity.

---

*In other words, you focused on a single goal or idea. Correct?
Congratulations on your breakthrough. We are describing the same thing.*

No. I let my mind run, i just thought about whatever thoughts arose, and if they moved on i would just think about the new thoughts. If one does it for long enough and regularly enough one can dramatically reduce one's level of mental chatter or 'mental stress', and of course become more worldly wise in the process. And naturally, it creates more space for Ultimate Wisdom.

---

Your method cannot succeed, and i'm afraid you are proof of that. Thought-aversion forms of meditation are merely a short lived remedy for suffering, a band-aid. What's bad about that is that they blind people to the real cure (Wisdom) because they become fixated on - or even addicted to - the quick-fix.

---

You are like a child throwing a tantrum, Rhett, calm down. It is a tool, not a solution. Must I repeat that again?

Is not any tool considered a part of any solution?

It is merely a tool to help reach satori, not satori itself.

I have never done a single pointed meditation. I have simply never had sufficient justification for doing so. Please don't just say i'm ignorant because you should well know by now that i have played around quite a lot with my mind - including the experience of a bucketload of satori. Have you experienced satori? If so, how much?

Read some Hakuin and speak to me again at a later time.

If you know any good links or have electronic copies of his work (other than Kevin's) i would be thankful. I have read little of him so far and would like to explore his thoughts further.

Drugs

Heroin, cocaine, and alcohol can indeed open up the mind to altered states of consciousness, as can music, poetry, and meditation. However, do not think these experiences give you new insights into reality, or that they are even remotely spiritual. Drugs like these can serve only to help the ego forget its problems, and only for a short time. They dangerously suppress the symptoms, but do not cure the disease. You may well experience a rare heavenly bliss and warm sense of fulfillment, though I bid you think again! Soft drugs invariably lead to hard-drugs. Small superstitions give birth to gross miscarriages of reason.

Far from bringing us closer to reality, such practices distance us from it by making us content with a dream. At least at other times reality is close enough to foil our plans.

This is not to say altered states of consciousness are without their use. With intelligence, they can help to make us aware of the many faces of reality, and thus that reality exists purely within the mind. Unfortunately, the herd look no further than their present comfort, and cannot learn from experience. Implications and consequences are alien concepts to such animals, who are fully occupied just keeping from drowning in the stormy seas of their lives. They have no time for investigating the nature of life and death: they have no time to live.

[Kevin Solway]

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 1324

(12/13/03 12:25 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Tharan: It is merely a tool to help reach satori, not satori itself.

Rhett: I have never done a single pointed meditation. I have simply never had sufficient justification for doing so. Please don't just say i'm ignorant because you should well know by now that i have played around quite a lot with my mind - including the experience of a bucketload of satori. Have you experienced satori? If so, how much?

---

Single pointed meditation is a beginner's tool to reduce the undisciplined chatter of the deluded mind. It is something I have not specifically done in a while. If you claim not to need it, then the tool is not for you. There is no emotional attachment involved.

At this point, I exist in a state of satori, more often than not. I am calm; I am collected; I think and feel clearly. Yet I still have a long way to go before I start labeling myself one way or another. In fact, I suspect there is no endpoint to my development, thus no need for silly labels.

You have much to offer. Don't taint it by drawing lines in the sand.

Drugs...

This point is not relevant to the discussion. Meditation does not create an "altered" state of conscious in that sense. In fact, a perfect state would be one in which a meditative state was never left; i.e. constantly in a satori-like state even while doing some daily routine. David Quinn has mentioned this state before and he is correct.

Hakuin...

I strongly suggest you supplement your Thinking Man's Minefield learning with some of the original Buddhist thinkers. Even Kevin would approve of this for you; Bohdidharma, Hakuin (Wild Ivy is my favorite), the Dhammapada, The Blue Cliff Record, The Diamond Sutra (where you will find ample reason not to boast of your enlightenment), Huang Po's On the Transmission of Mind, etc.

*edit*

I am not implying that you have boasted of your enlightenment.

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 12/13/03 12:34 pm

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1938

(12/13/03 10:45 pm)

Reply

 ---

Rhet:--

Quote:

Evil = Ignorance & Unconsciousness

You are sick or you are joking?

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

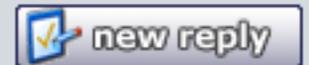

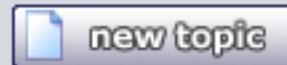

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Music and Spirituality

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| foncuseRegistered UserPosts: 2(12/14/03 1:00 am)Reply |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Music that someone created with little limits in mind..not your standard song - is more spiritual, or more out there euphoric. All the songs on the radio are 2-3 minutes long. What, is this some regulation that they have? i. e. some digital artists out there with simple sounds of things that sound like nature, that goes on for a few good minutes (some times 20 minute songs) not regular music.. is more spiritual. The sad thing about rock and roll is if you listen to most of the lyrics, they make absolutely no sense. What people do is over analyze the lyrics and pretend that they mean something mystical, when in fact it's a lot simpler than that.. it's just something the musician pulled out of the hat to go along with the guitar, and hopefully rhyme (rhymes are forceful righting, not creative..in songs, I find). Also agree with the ego thing.. really people are thinking: I'm gonna be big, I'm gonna get things done, I'm gonna get her.. I'm gonna drive my car fast, this music helps me get a bigger more disgusting sick ego. Then there is the fashion statement. Oh, what's that you're listening too, I'll have to get a copy of that CD to fit in. Oh you're listening to who? Sounds good! Hm, I don't know that band, they can't be any good then if they aren't popular. Music is good, and bad, depends on the situations at hand. To give a boost, it's good. To have a CD player on loud while you are thinking, and to keep have to constantly change the CD, detours you from your mental focus. (think mp3, but still, loud isn't good for thinking, very light if any at all is | better for deep thinking, none at all is better for meditation or really deep thinking).

IT can motivate you.. to do things, to feel confident, so it could help you be more of a philosopher.. I know I'm right. I don't care what people think.

I don't like the snobby attitude that people who listen to classical music have. I love classical music, but when the people come on the radio bitching and lamenting about how so and so has a graduate degree in music and has their masters in so and so at so and so university, and all the structure that people will go through (10 years of piano, reading sheet music, where is the creativity and open mind?). Who's to sit around worrying about the past (listening to mozart like they are god, what about today? go and create something today with our instruments we have today, you don't HAVE to copy other people and study their stuff, if you spend too much time studying other people and what they accomplished , when will you learn yourself?)

I like piano a lot, but don't enjoy a snobby "you have to take lessons" style of music.. I enjoy rock a lot, but I take the lyrics in with a grain of salt, because most of it IS comical, NOT mystical like some people pretend (i. e. led Zeppelin, a woman with big legs is from hell, soul of a woman was created below, etc.)

Creating music for money.. the big bands that everyone likes is always because of money aided success.. that's a problem too. There is in fact free music out there that is just as good or better, but how will people ever find out about it without some structure and money to carry it around?

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 211

(12/14/03 9:30 am)

Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

Most music today is produced and has nothing to do with art or spirituality. The 2-3 minute radio song you are referring to is regulated. 90% of new music (pop, rock, country, etc) is not even written by the musician, and if it actually is, the record label hires a production team to make the song or artist marketable to a specific group of people.

It is pretty funny the reactions people have to radio tunes, it is exactly what the money hungry record pimps want, and if you pay attention, the target marketing scam actually works. Music is dead, it's all been done before, but, that doesn't mean you can't enjoy it. I have a pretty eclectic taste in music, there are very few things I don't appreciate, if for nothing else than the actual production of an album or band. I read an article a while back in Rolling Stone, it was talking about the death of the music industry...most musicians and producers are hoping for that one, I suppose money too gets old if you have to work with crap every day.

Anyway-
"Talking about music is like dancing about architecture." -Steve Martin

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1326
(12/14/03 11:34 am)
Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Definately well said.

What do you find yourself listening to currently, Cass?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 182
(12/14/03 11:44 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

-----
Evil = Ignorance & Unconsciousness
-----

Suergaz wrote:

You are sick or you are joking?

I am deadly serious.

More specifically, i (may) choose to label evil the teaching of ignorance under the guise of wisdom, and the will-to-unconsciousness.

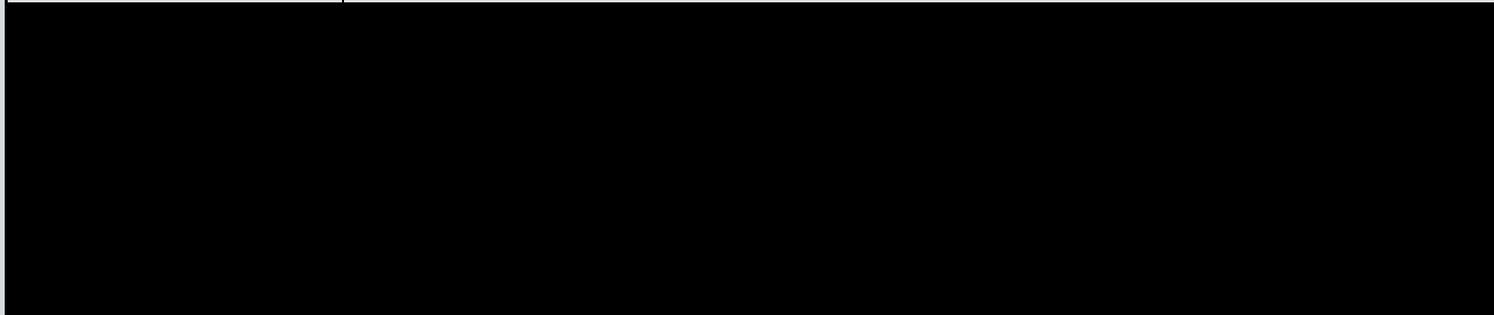

Rhett

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1328
(12/14/03 12:02 pm)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

We should fight.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 183

(12/14/03 12:35 pm)

Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

-----
Tharan: It is merely a tool to help reach satori, not satori itself.

Rhett: I have never done a single pointed meditation. I have simply never had sufficient justification for doing so. Please don't just say i'm ignorant because you should well know by now that i have played around quite a lot with my mind - including the experience of a bucketload of satori. Have you experienced satori? If so, how much?

-----

I'll be a little clearer about this. If ever i thought about doing a single pointed meditation, after say reading about it somewhere, my mind would rail against it with considerable force, in fact, i think it would do so with whatever amount of force would be required to prevent me from doing so. It is a direct violation of mind.

Just the other day i had a 'seasoned' 'spiritual' man try to tell me that i could not have experienced enlightenment because i had not described all manner of experiences to him. One example he gave was of the experience of an hour within a minute. Gee, what a great idea, become a non-compusmentus. His ideas are so obviously entwined with unconsciousness, and he does quite a lot of meditation. Enlightenment is quite the opposite of this, one is conscious during every moment, and thus experiences the fullness of each day. Contrarily, most people have very short days indeed.

In actual fact, this bloke is quite bereft of wisdom even though he might appear wise, calm and collected to most people. We had a solid discussion and he really dragged me through the gutter, one minute he would display reason and then the next would be completely faith bound and contradictory. When i asked him to provide reasons to back up some statements it became evident that he didn't even know what reason was or meant. He has a carefully formulated method that disintegrates all understanding into circular meaninglessness. He has attached himself to the notion that everthing is 'real and yet illusory', and meditates on it, yet is completely ignorant of the wisdom that underpins it. Thus, i have almost no chance of convincing him of anything, because he thinks he is far wiser than he is. He is little further advanced than the common fool. Well, i learnt my lesson.

Single pointed meditation is a beginner's tool to reduce the undisciplined chatter of the deluded mind. It is something I have not specifically done in a while. If you claim not to need it, then the tool is not for you. There is no emotional attachment involved.

As mentioned previously, the tool is only a way to foster unconsciousness. It is wholly contrary to the development of wisdom.

At this point, I exist in a state of satori, more often than not. I am calm; I am collected; I think and feel clearly. Yet I still have a long way to go before I start labeling myself one way or another. In fact, I suspect there is no endpoint to my development, thus no need for silly labels.

It depends on how you define it, but to me a feeling is just a thought, so it should be no more foggy an experience than any other thought. However, you cannot think clearly and experience an emotion in the same moment, diminished consciousness is inherent to emotions.

Anyone that experiences and values emotions is wholly unwise, and should be very careful about what they teach to others under the guise of wisdom.

You have much to offer. Don't taint it by drawing lines in the sand.

Everybody has so many lines in their sand that they fall into the ruts. Those ruts become so deep that they can't even see out of them. Wisdom is the act of drawing the right lines in the sand until one is capable of walking the windswept dunes without leaving footprints...

Drugs...

This point is not relevant to the discussion. Meditation does not create an "altered" state of conscious in that sense. In fact, a perfect state would be one in which a meditative state was never left; i.e. constantly in a satori-like state even while doing some daily routine. David Quinn has mentioned this state before and he is correct.

I used Kevin's piece because you tried to undercut the validity of my statements. Now you try the same with him, despite the fact that he specifically mentioned meditation in it. His views are still the same, just have a look at his thoughts in one of the other current threads.

Additionally, you have inserted a reference to David's previous comments but have not contextualised it. I also refer to meditation on occasions, but do so carefully and in a fundamentally different context to the way you have presented it here. Although, you haven't actually said much at all. We are having a discussion but you have offered very little content...

Hakuin...

I strongly suggest you supplement your Thinking Man's Minefield learning with some of the original Buddhist thinkers. Even Kevin would approve of this for you; Bohdidharma, Hakuin (Wild Ivy is my favorite), the Dhammapada, The Blue Cliff Record, The Diamond Sutra (where you will find ample reason not to boast of your enlightenment), Huang Po's On the Transmission of Mind, etc. Note: I am not implying that you have boasted of your enlightenment.

Thanks, i have been thinking about retreating somewhat and spending more time reading, so those references might be of worth.

Rhett

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1329
(12/14/03 12:52 pm)
Reply

 indians

---

Quote:

---

We are having a discussion but you have offered very little content...

---

There is a story of the white man's exploration of the west that pertains to your desiring of certain "content" in my writing.

The explorers were traversing the Columbia River hoping to make their way to the Pacific Ocean. Along the way, they saw the natives catching and eating salmon as their staple diet. The white men were not used to eating fish, being from the Amwerican east coast, and desired beef. They purchased dogs from the locals and satisfied their protein need. One could catch up to 50 pounds of salmon a day, and these crusaders ate dog.

Ken Burns "Lewis and Clark"

What's the remedy to unawareness? How should one protect oneself from possible mistakes?

Tharan

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1939

(12/14/03 10:06 pm)

Reply

 ---like chess---

---

Quote:

---

Rhett:--Evil = Ignorance & Unconsciousness

Suergaz:--You are sick or you are joking?

Rhett:--I am deadly serious.

More specifically, i (may) choose to label evil the teaching of ignorance under the guise of wisdom, and the will-to-unconsciousness.

---

Well, do you or don't you? You're only considering this because you realise that evil does not equal ignorance and unconsciousness, and if you let it go and maintain your new specificity I shall have to cut it down also. It's your move.

cassiopeiae

Registered User

Posts: 212

(12/15/03 12:46 am)

Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Quote:

---

WolfsonJakk said: What do you find yourself listening to currently, Cass?

---

I listen to a lot of classical right now...Stravinsky, Mahler, Beethoven...

Radiohead and Wilco are staples in my music diet. Blues and Jazz are in there too...my 3 year old loves Jazz, it turns him crazy to hear Miles Davis wail, I love that.

|                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1944(12/15/03 1:47 am)Reply               |  ---- <hr/> No-one here but me listens to jungle!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1330(12/15/03 3:21 am)Reply           |  --- <hr/> Bela Bartok is my current classical favorite, Radiohead is always nearby (especially their previous album), Aphex Twin, Shawn Colvin, Coltrane (Impressions probably my fav album), Miles (especially his early 70's late 60's stuff), Dylan, Cibo Mato, etc, etc. Would you consider Aphex Twin as jungle, Zag? It is electronic but not exactly danceable. Tharan                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1945(12/15/03 10:40 am)Reply              |  --- <hr/> Aphex twin is not jungle, But I laughed so much when I saw the clip to his track 'windowlicker' (:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 189(12/15/03 10:56 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: indians <hr/> Tharan wrote: What's the remedy to unawareness? Understanding, specifically of the nature of reality. How should one protect oneself from possible mistakes? Trancend egotism. If you are inferring that i am blinding myself by making rigid statements...then i am guilty as charged...and will continue to re-offend until everyone is enlightened or i die. |

If you are inferring that i am being single-minded...the same applies...and the explorers would not have made it to the Pacific Ocean without it.

Whilst i am open to meta-analysis, your use of analogy is suggestive of a weak argument, and i can only presume at this point that you have abandoned it.

Tharan wrote:

We should fight.

Whatever you wish Tharan.

You know time is of the essence for you.

[and the attitude you have displayed here is further evidence of that]

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 190
(12/15/03 11:08 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ---like chess---

---

Rhett wrote:

More specifically, i (may) choose to label evil the teaching of ignorance under the guise of wisdom, and the will-to-unconsciousness.

Suergaz wrote:

Well, do you or don't you? You're only considering this because you realise that evil does not equal ignorance and unconsciousness, and if you let it go and maintain your new specificity I shall have to cut it down also. It's your move.

I do or don't as i wish, and as is appropriate to the circumstance. Regardless of whether i use the word evil or not my stance towards it is unflinching, so if i do use it i will stand behind it with full force.

Rhett

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1947

(12/15/03 11:21 am)

Reply

 ---

Quote:

---

Rhett:--Evil = Ignorance & Unconsciousness

Suergaz:--You are sick or you are joking?

Rhett:--I am deadly serious. More specifically, i (may) choose to label evil the teaching of ignorance under the guise of wisdom, and the will-to-unconsciousness

Suergaz:--Well, do you or don't you? You're only considering this because you realise that evil does not equal ignorance and unconsciousness, and if you let it go and maintain your new specificity I shall have to cut it down also. It's your move.

Rhett:--I do or don't as i wish, and as is appropriate to the circumstance. Regardless of whether i use the word evil or not my stance towards it is unflinching, so if i do use it i will stand behind it with full force.

---

What do you mean if you do? You have! And yet you don't stand behind it with full force because you cannot deny the truth that unconsciousness and ignorance is not evil!

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 192

(12/15/03 12:01 pm)

Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

What do you mean if you do? You have! And yet you don't stand behind it with full force because you cannot deny the truth that unconsciousness and ignorance is not evil!

There are no gods that have written the 'correct' application of words into stone. The definitions of words are as each of us choose to define them. Sure, words do have a common pattern of usage, and there are things called dictionaries that try to document that, but it is ultimately up to each individual to ensure the consistency and be the master of their own definitions. You might think that lolly pops are evil, and go ahead, i won't stop you.

You are still spellbound by your experience of a seemingly real world beyond the mind (that is composed of seeming real things). 'Objective existence' is a delusion.

What do you think is evil?

Rhett

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1331
(12/15/03 12:04 pm)
Reply

 ---

---

Rhett wrote,

Quote:

---

You know time is of the essence for you.

[and the attitude you have displayed here is further evidence of that]

---

How do you figure, wise one? Tell me what you know of me.

Tharan

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 194
(12/15/03 12:24 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: ---

---

Rhett wrote:

You know time is of the essence for you.
[and the attitude you have displayed here is further evidence of that]

Tharan wrote:

How do you figure, wise one? Tell me what you know of me.

The crux of it is that you are 34 years old (at least that's the impression i have), and whilst you have been around higher wisdom for quite some time you still remain well below it. Soon your ego (which is quite obvious despite your attempts to suppress and hide it) will become set in stone, if it

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                        | has not already done so. In a broad sense, there are not degrees to wisdom, and you well know that - you just block it out. Rhett                                                                                                 |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1950(12/15/03 12:44 pm)Reply   |  --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> What do you think is evil? <hr/> Nothing.                                                                  |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 213(12/15/03 2:18 pm)Reply |  Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Rhett said: In a broad sense, there are not degrees to wisdom... <hr/> Mind explaining your reasoning? |

Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

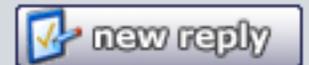

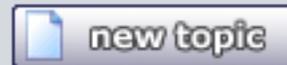

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Music and Spirituality

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1332(12/15/03 3:29 pm)Reply           |  --- <hr/> Thanks for the analysis, Rhett.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 197(12/16/03 11:31 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: --- <hr/> ----- What do you think is evil? ----- Suergaz wrote: Nothing. Then let me suggest that the inside of your head is pure evil by both of our definitions. We have found concurrence. I used it as a tool to indicate the opposite of my values, does that mean that you don't have any? ie. if your definition is 'nothing', then it's really not a definition, you are just saying that you don't like the word, and that you like (value) everything. This is wholly indiscriminatory, which is indicative of a passive, un-conscious relationship with the world. What, if anything, do you value? |

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                        | Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1959(12/16/03 11:46 am)Reply              |  ----- <hr/> You think you have valued something by declaring it evil?! You think this word can really indicate the opposite of your values? It is an archaic stupidity. That you think anything is evil makes you evil (to yourself), not I! You imagine we have found concurrence. To have found it, we would both have had to. To say that evil is nothing at all, is not wholly indiscriminatory, but discriminatory in the extreme!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 199(12/16/03 12:03 pm)Reply   Edit |  Re: ----- <hr/> You think you have valued something by declaring it evil?! This is totally contrary to what i wrote and what you say below...? You think this word can really indicate the opposite of your values? I know it can, because it has already done so. It is an archaic stupidity. That you think anything is evil makes you evil (to yourself), not I! That you think nothing should be considered undesirable or contrary to higher values makes you all the more evil in my eyes. Is not telling a lie evil? Is not raping a woman or being a pedaphile evil? To say that evil is nothing at all, is not wholly indiscriminatory, but discriminatory in the extreme! It is not discriminatory because you have simply nullified the word. Your definition means nothing. We can all sit here and say the world is perfect, but let's engage our mind on occasion huh? Rhett |

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1960

(12/16/03 12:56 pm)

Reply

---

Quote:

---

suergaz:--You think this word can really indicate the opposite of your values?

Rhett:--I know it can, because it has already done so.

---

How has it done so? I can only see that with it you have indicated what runs contrary to them, not what is the definitive opposite of them. To do that you would need more than just the antiquated word -'evil'

Quote:

---

That you think nothing should be considered undesirable or contrary to higher values makes you all the more evil in my eyes. Is not telling a lie evil? Is not raping a woman or being a pedophile evil?

---

Who said I think nothing should be considered undesirable or contrary to higher values? I only refuse to call or think such things 'evil'. To do so is stupid. "Is not telling a lie evil?" Did you mean to say --Is telling a lie not evil?"?-- (:D) You're becoming confused! Rape and pedophilia are not 'evil', they are disgusting symptoms of sickness, and of course are highly undesirable.

Quote:

---

suergaz;--To say that evil is nothing at all, is not wholly indiscriminatory, but discriminatory in the extreme!

Rhett:--It is not discriminatory because you have simply nullified the word. Your definition means nothing. We can all sit here and say the world is perfect, but let's engage our mind on occasion huh?

---

I haven't said the world is perfect. You are stumbling over yourself! I simply cannot see how anything can be 'evil' ie. how anything can ultimately run contrary to my valuing. You are not a creator. Please, continue to think me evil if you must!

Edited by: suergaz at: 12/16/03 1:18 pm

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1333
(12/16/03 2:29 pm)
Reply

Re: -----

---

Quote:

---

That you think nothing should be considered undesirable or contrary to higher values makes you all the more evil in my eyes. Is not telling a lie evil? Is not raping a woman or being a pedophile evil?

---

"Much to learn this young one has." --Yoda

But Master Yoda, he is blinded by prejudice and anger. Can he learn?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 832
(12/27/03 3:16 am)
Reply

Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Quote:

---

DQ: Some forms of music are more conducive to producing altered states of consciousness, mystical experiences, childlike reveries, interesting insights, etc - which may or may not be of spiritual value depending on the listener and the quality of his own mind.

---

Yep, sounds fair enough.

I wonder though, if certain forms of music are of more spiritual value to one who has quality of mind, is it still only the inferences of the mind in question or is there intrinsically more spiritual value (on the part of the creator) in this music which simply needs a quality mind to tease it out.

Quote:

---

DQ: I want to stress from the outset that there is nothing inherently "spiritual" about music, other than the fact that it is part of the Totality. Indeed, for most people, it is entirely an egotistical affair. I'm not just referring here to cruder uses of music either, such as using national anthems to generate patriotic fervour or using hip-hop to stimulate sexual desire. I'm also talking about the use of music as high art. Putting on Beethoven to elevate one's mood or lose oneself in the flowing structure or revel in his compositional skills is also egotism and has nothing to do with spirituality.

---

Regarding it's use as high art:

I would agree if you said that this is not spiritual itself, but not when you say that it has nothing to do with spirituality. I'd like to refer you to your words from a while ago on the subject of Ozrics and your perception of their qualities.

"The greatness of their music lies in its richness. Chaos, rhythm, primal energy, intricacy, melody, harmony, ambience, edginess, beauty, quirkiness - all are strongly represented in each of their compositions. It would probably require a thousand-page thesis to properly dissect what they do. Just the way they play around with order and chaos would take many pages to analyse. It is probably the closest that music comes to representing all the various facets of Nature. Listening to their music is like watching cells flowing and dancing around in the human body, or molecules vibrating, changing and reforming, or birds flapping around in trees, or galaxies colliding and stars exploding. It is philosopher's music."

That sounds to me like the use of music as high art, or at least the line between using music for a mystical experience and the use of music as high art looks more and more blurred. After all, are you not here describing your reveling in compositional skills and losing yourself in the flowing structures apparent to you; and then saying it's philosopher's music (you've made it plain before, exactly what you think a philosopher is and does).

Of course you have also inserted the proviso that the philosopher might need some downtime. Is that the spirit in which you intended those words?

If that it is case, do you not see "Listening to their music is like watching cells flowing and dancing around in the human body, or molecules vibrating, changing and reforming, or birds flapping around in trees, or galaxies colliding and stars exploding." as a spiritual/mystical experience, as well as using music as high art?

Quote:

---

DQ: Music can, however, help the mind spiritually in several ways:

- It can produce significant altered states of consciousness which, if the listener is alert enough, can be used to tease out insight into the nature of Reality. In this, music serves the same function as meditation, LSD, near-death experiences and the like. It can propel the mind out of its normal everyday thought-processes and thereby open it up to entirely new perspectives, which may or may not have a connection to wisdom, again depending on the listener and the quality of his mind.

- Music can, through the skilled appreciation of dissonance, teach the mind to perceive beauty in ugliness, and then, as a consequence of this, to perceive beauty in utterly everything. This, in turn, can help the spiritual person break down his array of aversions that he has inherited from his genetic material and from his childhood.

---

Indeed, we could go into a plethora of such examples, like the appreciation of counterpoint and it's relation to interplay amongst all things. Or the appreciation of complex time-signatures and the simplicity of seeming complexity, etc.

I suppose that the technical appreciation (or that as high art) is the stepping stone to the mystical experience and spiritual appreciation thereon.

Quote:

---

DQ: - Music can also be used as a relatively harmless source of food to the ego, and thus in an indirect sense, can help the spiritual person in his quest to abandon his ego entirely. Because music is inherently emotional in nature, it can temporarily satisfy the ego's incessant hunger for emotional fulfillment and thereby give the spiritual person some needed rest before he pushes on again. Of course, ideally, the spiritual person would never give in to his ego's emotional demands and would instead attempt to starve it to death in the shortest time possible. But in real life, such a task is very difficult and beyond most of us. We have to take the lesser route of feeding the ego little morsels every now and then and starving the ego more gradually. Using music in this regard can be helpful and is certainly far less harmful than, say, joining a church or forming an emotional relationship with a woman.

---

This line between ego transcendence and ego seems to be getting more blurred in this context. When you feed the ego little morsels, is this, for you, appreciation as high art or a mystical experience which may be of spiritual value?

Perhaps it depends on the quality of the ego in question, as well as the mind?

Quote:

---

DT: Does the content of the music matter in these matters, or is it rather the content that the listener/creator infers upon what they hear/imagine?

DQ: Both. It is much easier to enter into altered states of consciousness listening to the Ozric Tentacles than it is to Britney Spears. But then, on the other hand, I have met quite a few people who get nothing out of listening to the Ozric Tentacles. I'm sure you have too.

---

Oh definitely. But then, in my small circle, a good 75% are appreciative at least, mostly fanatical for want of a better word.

But then some of these same people see value in works where I can only perceive mediocrity. A question of perspective then, as opposed to actual possible value?

I'd like to think not, but I'm not sure if that is just snobbery.

Quote:

---

DT: Is the content of this subject something that is easily put into words? Do you find that music is something that communicates with the mind and body on a level surpassing exhaustive description?

DQ: Well, we really should make this a two-way discussion, so what are your thoughts on this?

---

I would have thought my answer is contained in my question, but then you knew that. I suppose what I'm trying to get at is that the human being is more than words and reason (or at least thus correct appreciation of reason). I've often heard music referred to as the language of the soul, or the international language. These crudities kind of sum up where I'm going here. Reason and words being the language of description, music sometimes communicates with me on a level which surpasses these gross tools. Though the label 'communication' may not be ideal here.

Being as you are a fine orator, I'd be interested in your thoughts on this.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 12/27/03 3:18 am

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 708

(12/27/03 7:33 pm)

Reply

Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Tharan: At this point, I exist in a state of satori, more often than not. I am calm; I am collected; I think and feel clearly. Yet I still have a long way to go before I start labeling myself one way or another. In fact, I suspect there is no endpoint to my development, thus no need for silly labels.

Yes Tharan, you seem to have changed. You have become caring. Somehow this shines through all of your recent communication. It is very amazing and I am simultaneously surprised and pleased by this. What has effectuated the change if I may ask?

Tharan: Single pointed meditation is a beginner's tool to reduce the undisciplined chatter of the deluded mind.

Ah, but then it should be called stop-the-chatter meditation and not insight meditation Vipassana means insight. So, why is it called INSIGHT meditation?

The explanation is of course simple. Vipassana meditation does actually lead to insight, or better a state of mind that engenders insight. It is definitely more than clearing chatter. It shifts consciousness into a mode that is not occupied with terrestrial survival (I am borrowing this terminology from Wilson, see Brain Change thread).

You cannot hope to be able to shift into such a state in your 30-minute lunch break. It normally requires a few days of practice in splendid isolation.

I wish I could speak from more recent experience, but unfortunately my latest opportunity to participate in a longer retreat is already eight months ago. How about you Tharan?

Thomas

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 1368

(12/28/03 4:17 am)

Reply

Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Quote:

---

Tharan, you seem to have changed. You have become caring. Somehow this shines through all of your recent communication. It is very amazing and I am simultaneously surprised and pleased by this. What has effectuated the change if I may ask?

---

I think my writing here from even a year ago was often tinged by who I was communicating with. If it were David Quinn, I suspect my writing was fairly caustic due to similarities/differences we have in personality and the choices made in using certain language. He and I don't speak directly much anymore because I think we both know where the other is coming from. I have great respect for him and the path he has taken.

Also, I read on my bus commute to work (2.5 hours/day) so I go through a couple of books a week. If you choose the right ones, they tend to have an effect on your thinking.

Quote:

---

You cannot hope to be able to shift into such a state in your 30-minute lunch break. It normally requires a few days of practice in splendid isolation.

I wish I could speak from more recent experience, but unfortunately my latest opportunity to participate in a longer retreat is already eight months ago. How about you Tharan?

---

I think the key for me is to not switch out of the desired state. When the old Buddhist masters spoke of reaching satori through meditation (which I have done), I suspect no small amount of their "accomplishment" was in fact a chemical cascade (dopamine, norepinephrine, serotonin, whatever) in the brain, combined with their learned patterns of "truth," creating a powerful transcendent state with an attached value. In fact, one that can become a focal point of value for future states-of-mind.

Buddhists work to alleviate suffering through breaking down attachments. Other theists offer a relief from the worry of life/death through promises of reward for good behavior and thought. Whichever way one attempts to approach it, it is the emotional state of peace and serenity that might be achieved. This state is only achievable, as far as I can tell, through lack of desire for what I have personally defined for myself as the mundane (physical possessions and personalized desire for outcomes, mostly). I simply prefer a large amount of reason when creating my value constructs, which led me away from theism, through Buddhism, this space, and beyond. But I have not forgotten any of it and it will always be a part of me.

Have I changed? Certainly, though I don't think I had a choice in the matter. But thanks for noticing and asking.

Tharan

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 12/28/03 5:22 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2016

(12/29/03 1:26 pm)

Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Although I have not heard these 'ozric tentacles' I imagine them to be players of some kind of 'new age' rot.

(:D)

Music shall separate us forever! And so it must!

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 846

(12/29/03 1:43 pm)

Reply

 Re: Music and Spirituality

---

LOL

You stick with your jungle and Aphex Twin, standing in front of the mirror with your shirt off.

|                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2018(12/29/03 1:52 pm)Reply                                                                                     |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Aphex twin? It's wolf that likes that. I'll stick with jungle though.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 848(12/29/03 1:57 pm)Reply   |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Why don't you check them out? You might like it. They were doing modern synthetic dance years before it was even invented (don't pull me up on that last word there).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2020(12/29/03 2:18 pm)Reply                                                                                     |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> I just did check out some clips. riffs and riffs and riffs. Rhythmically uninteresting. Another 'band'Give the drummer some Ja know da composita bring tings to dance                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1966(12/29/03 3:20 pm)Reply  |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Suergraz wrote: Quote: <hr/> Although I have not heard these 'ozric tentacles' I imagine them to be players of some kind of 'new age' rot. <hr/> You should give them a go. I think you'd like them. Their music is far too energetic and wild to be new-age music. Very Dionysian in many ways. They also incorporate a lot of tribal/techno rhythms, which you might appreciate. |

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1969
(12/29/03 4:01 pm)
Reply

Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

I just did check out some clips. riffs and riffs and riffs.

Rhythmically uninteresting. Another 'band'

---

They are much more complex and sophisticated and exotic than that. You might have to give them a few listens before you can discern and enjoy the many treasures contained within. They really are first-rate.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 850
(12/30/03 1:42 am)
Reply

Re: Music and Spirituality

---

Quote:

---

Rhythmically uninteresting.

---

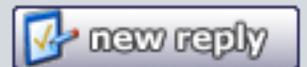

Perhaps, to one lacking appreciation of interesting rhythm.

Speed Garage is about as rhythmically interesting as Jungle gets.

If the best one can appreciate is boom-chackaboom-chack-chack-boomboom-chackaboom-chack-chack-boom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-chackboomboom-chacka, wiv-a-likul-bit-a-biyass etc, in straight 4/4; one couldn't hope to appreciate the interesting rhythm expressed in 13/8 playing off against 3/4.

Cue glib response.

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2029(12/30/03 8:54 am)Reply                                                                                      |  --- <hr/> Speed garage?! Straight 4/4?! Get the fuck out! YOU DON'T KNOW JUNGLE---and you live in the uk!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1370(12/30/03 12:06 pm)Reply                                                                                 |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Toast wrote, Quote: <hr/> boom-chackaboom-chack-chack-boomboom-chackaboom-chack-chack-boom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-boom-boom-boom-chackaboom-chackboomboom-chacka, wiv-a-likul-bit-a-biyass <hr/> I disagree with the second chack and the solo boomboom but concur otherwise in principle, more or less. Tharan |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 853(12/30/03 2:41 pm)Reply  |  Re: Music and Spirituality <hr/> Yep, either the second chack goes, or one of the booms in the solo boomboom.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

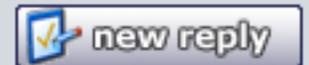

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> my beef with logic

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| portisheadphonesRegistered UserPosts: 1(7/4/04 12:42 am)Reply |  my beef with logic <hr/> I hate to introduce myself to these boards in such a harsh manner, but I don't understand the focus on logic as the end-all to knowing, discovering and feeling. If logic is comprised of what we already know, how is it possible to know more? Why do people want a logical explanation? Why do people expect love to be logical? Why do racist people not understand that racism isn't logical? If human beings only know the uses of 10% of their brains and have only learned how to reason for only hundreds of years, why must they depend on something so inferior, when intuition and analogic has allowed them to survive for thousands of years? If all this is so, why do so-called intelligent people always rely on logic to solve their problems? Or rely on logic for "originality"? |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2732(7/4/04 12:55 am)Reply       |  my logic with beef <hr/> Logic is play at interceding for necessity, deduction and induction mean nothing ultimately in relation to originality.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 989
(7/4/04 3:36 am)
Reply

Re: my logic with beef

---

Logic is accurate. Intuition is not.

bikkie
Registered User
Posts: 12
(7/5/04 2:43 pm)
Reply

Re: my beef with logic

---

My goodness .A portishead fan ( i assume )lol.Same here :)

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 705
(7/5/04 7:53 pm)
Reply

Re: my beef with logic

---

If logic is comprised of what we already know, how is it possible to know more?

That's because the area of our brain that computes logic from parameters set in memory and that uses both memory data and emotional tendencies, is not always necessarily logical in terms of what it creates as thoughts. It's librarian functions are handicapped by emotion and the brain cannot access all areas, as some are blocked by the emotional categorisation of "don't go there".

Supposedly the enlightened have thoughts that are close to being perfectly logical, whereas none of the rest of us do.

If you cut down on emotions the brain will concentrate more heavily on reality as it has freer access to a larger database of the sensory experiences the person has had and cleaner subconscious calculations in the brain of what has been sensed.

Why do people want a logical explanation?

Survival instinct. The more logical you are the more practical you should be. The more practical you are the greater opportunity you have to become less influenced by the potential dangerous effects of the environment, and thus the greater your chances of survival.

Why do people expect love to be logical?

Because they decide not to think. For most people thinking negatively about love is one of those "don't go there" areas. Whether that is wrong or not is another question, but as things stand now it would be wrong for the vast majority of folks, they'd be a bit wild!. It seems you need the solidity of truth to take away the negative emotions that cause destruction.

Why do racist people not understand that racism isn't logical?

Racism once was logical, once we were warriors, but before that we were animals. Animals fight over resources. We obviously still have the overhang, not surprising though - because we still are animals.

If human beings only know the uses of 10% of their brains and have only learned how to reason for only hundreds of years, why must they depend on something so inferior, when intuition and analogic has allowed them to survive for thousands of years?

Because intuition has made us build 6 billion of us. To progress most efficiently and most consciously nature will need to cut the numbers somewhat.

If all this is so, why do so-called intelligent people always rely on logic to solve their problems? Or rely on logic for "originality"?

I think most hard core originality comes from illogic occurrences. Artists take drugs, scientists become consumed by the science, inventors become loopy and the emotional become hysterical :) - it's the dysfunction that creates the originality.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 7/5/04 7:54 pm

november rains
Posts: 2
(7/6/04 6:04 pm)
Reply

 There are uncountable colors to the rainbow

---

Logic is wonderful for filtering out non truths.

If, then, logic tells you when something is relevant for further inclusion within the realms of the research bla bla bla bla, and furthermore, bla alal. ok.

---

Logic is good for figuring "out" the lies.
Logic is good for reasoning.

Love is based on a drug within ~ that stimulates (I would suppose) most of the senses, and basically dims the logic board. uh oh.

Once the love-drug wears off, it simply becomes "oh boy, we are hooked together for life and doesn't this suck" Then logic loses to pride. after that pride loses to age. then all the lights go out after a few more rounds with the love-lust-i-get-horny drug... of course, and sigh, life really sucks, doesn't it?

what was the question?

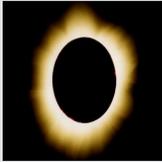

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2738

(7/7/04 12:30 am)

Reply

 Re: There are uncountable colors to the rainbow

---

That's no way to speak of love! And life!

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

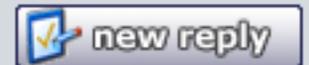

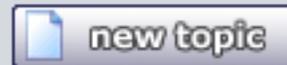

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> My Fate, My Death.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 2(10/24/03 12:46 pm)Reply | My Fate, My Death. <hr/> 19.My Fate, My Death.It is hard for me to write down these sentence, but i must bear it. I go the bed last night, thinking, until the lights extinguished, until i fall into sleep, have a nightmare, and burst into waken up, thinking, i can feel i am dieing. I reviewed my life last night, these 21 years, everything happened everyday...It is hard to write down these sentence, my heart is shrinking... everyone i acquainted. If one of these things didn't happen, yes, each thing only have a very little probability, but they all happened. If one of these person i didn't acquaint, i would lack some knowledge of the world, but it happened. The probability is so little, but it happened, these 21 years. Everything happened, that make me become the genius, and make me go this road. If one of these thing didn't happen, i won't be like this. Just recently, My mother, my father , my younger brother, my maternal grandmother, my relatives, things happened on them lead me to go this way. The acquaint of...I would prefer to be die now, so needn't write down this sentence, but i know i can't, won't...of everyone i acquaint, Tao Hao, All my classmate, all person i acquaint occasionally and temporarily, Zhang Yong, Kevin Solway, all of these hundreds of person who have mailed to me, my roommate, And Hu Yan. Every thing happened every day, every person met every day...Tao Hao is sending about ten to twenty mails to me now, but i don't want to read it immediately...I went to buy the flowers yesterday evening, the rickshaw driver tell me the boss just leave one minute ago, while i walking forward on the crossroad, why i am late for one minute? Because i received Kevin Solway's mail, why him just |

send me this mail for the other side of the earth at the exact time? I wait for the boss's return for some minutes, and go to the other street to look for some street flower seller, when i return, the flower shop's door is closed, just...If one car on the crossroad hit me, things won't happen this way. I go to the another place to find a flower shop, asked the couple in a book shop, no flower shop nearby, the madam smile to me, just as Otto Weininger described. Every girl i acquaint follows his theory, i communicate to someone i think may be a exception, but just confirmed it. I dancing there, look at her, i think there must be one thing that Otto Weininger missed, then i can smash his theory system just by this, but it go as him say. This is the fate, all these small probability come together and this is the probability of one genius's born. I know my fate now, the ago, the future, i will study philosophy more deep in the next years, go to Germany, study more, write down my work, publish it, then two years later, commit suicide, at the house where Beethoven and Otto Weininger died, or where a contemporary art genius died. Otto Weininger is right, woman is mind-less, she is influenced all by these weak but numerous worm, if my death can give her a soul...But Otto Weininger have already pointed:"Men, when they love, are partly conscious of this deep injustice to woman, and make the fruitless but heroic effort to give her their own soul. But such a speculation is outside the limits of either science or philosophy." She won't understand me as mind-less, as all the woman, she can't help me, my last relation of the world shut off, as Otto Weininger died by this reason too. When i consider death, there have no trace of fear on my thought, if there have a little, i won't go this way. I hear that two character clearly speak out by that ugly boy, i am shocked more than her, it break my last hope, which i thought can smash Otto Weininger's theory. Otto Weininer is the greatest man, more great than Napoleon and Nietzsche, he is the real genius, the philosophy genius, as me. He write down "Sex and Character" just for me, for the next genius who will continue his work. Kevin Solway's successive work on Otto Weininger is just misunderstanding. Only another genius can understand him, as me. It is only recently i find i am the genius, for it is only recently so many almost impossible things happened, made me become the genius. There are some many website in the Internet, why i only find Kevin Solway's and get Otto Weininger's book? Why Kevin Solway could only find one single copy of this book in the state of Queensland, but find it? This is my fate. I don't know why i am so wisdom, i was always find me so many flaw, but these flaw turned to be my genius. I don't know why i can so easily understand Otto Weininger, can so easily point out the fault of Kevin Solway, of Nietzsche, the limit of Saupenhauer, the fail of Napoleon. I don't know why i can so clearly understand everything: the history, the social, the computer science, the Linux kernel, the physics, biology, the Buddhism, the Christianity, the universal...and the ego. So i must die.

Here is the describe of my last night's nightmare: I went to a remote valley, went through a cave, in a damp abyss where overgrown with weeds, there is a cellar, a close room, a bed, i sleep on the bed, water and aquatic plants. I am cleaning the snake on my bed, there are so many small snake, i cleaned them all, they are so weak, then i went off the bed, and clean the snakes down the bed, in the corner, there are some bigger snake hide in the aquatic plants, i catch them, throw them in a bag. I didn't cleaned all the snake in the room, but went out, there are persons who is familiar to me there, doing their affairs, i sit on a bed, watch my foot, there is wound on my sole, i squeeze the wound, it split up, and i see my death, i am dieing, alone, without any relation to anyone, no sorrow, this is my fate. I hear a short and sharp cry come out of my throat, so clearly, penetrate into my heart, i suddenly open my eyes, don't knowing i am crying in the dream or in realistic, the sound is so clear in my ears. I can feel the sweat on my forehead. It is so silent, and i continue my thinking. My belly is paining, i can image a wide blade stick out on the middle of a bed, and i lay down, i can sense the it thrust into my back, the blood dripping on the bedside. My head is writhing, i would like a dagger stick into my head, from the middle of my eyes. I am thinking, so passionately, that i can't bear this burden, i will go mad if i can't stop thinking, my brain will boil by the heat thought, i must stop it, the only solution should be to hold my breathe, strong-willed person can die by this way. But i won't, i can bear it, before i done my session. To find the utmost value, it need the genius pay the most serious cost, so the genius choose to be bitten by the snake at the beginning before cleaning the snakes. It is the fate, which made the genius, which every genius is fighting to. Beethoven vowed: "I Will Take Fate by the Throat!". When I hear the "Fate" Symphony for the first time, i had known that it is mine. When i see van Gogh's "Wheat Field with Crows", i had known that it is mine. There is Death, Fate, there is me, the genius.

It there any hope? I don't know, i will search it, find or not find, all lead to that way, the genius's way.

=====

When? Where?

When is now? I don't know, the time have no beginning and no end, i am at one point of the time, which point don't make different. Where is me? I don't know, i am in one point of the infinite space, the dark and empty universal, which point i am in don't make different. Why i know i am on one point of the time and the space, because i know i exist, why i can make sure that i exist? Because i can feel one desire here. I open my eyes slowly, my consciousness begin to resume, then i am awake. It is a dark noon, i get to know when it is now, i get to know where i am, i find my penis is erected, a complete world build up at the front of me in a split second, when i am wake up...But, i have the sense, the sense by a genius, that this world is just a hallucination which develop by the desire, the fundamental thing which make sure of my existence; I have the sense, the sense by a genius, that he answer of when and where which sees to be right and definite, must be wrong. I must leave this world, the "real" world, to find the utmost truth!

=====

Why you kill me?

Why you kill me? You know you don't have the ability to kill me, as i am so powerful, if you killed me, that is me let you to killed me, that is because i love you. Why you want to kill me? Because you want to make sure whether i love you. You know if i let you to kill me, it will prove my love. Why you want to make sure of it? I don't know, i think you should make sure of it without question. You don't trust me, this is why i must die. But, girl, when you find you killed the one who love you most in the world, you will be died soon too...No! I love you so deeply, that it make me past this realm. I will kill me by myself, without you knowing it, it will prove my love, although you don't know it, it is proved, and, you, my girl, will still be alive.

=====

I must stop my thinking.

I must stop my thinking, or it will lead me to the death. But, the only thing that can stop me from thinking, is death.

=====

I need more tumble.

I go skating this afternoon, i find, there were some children skating there, their skill are so good, their posture are so graceful. They are genius, although they haven't aware it. They can easily do these hard posture, if they tumbled, they won't get much trouble as the adult, just sit there for a rest, then get up again easily. I need more tumble, i shouldn't fear it.

=====

I vow.

I must be alive, even how strongly i want to die, i won't drop my love and hope, even i can see none trace of it, i vow.

=====

I am more powerful now.

I am OK now :) I read Tang Hao's mails which him send to me this morning :)

:) I am Ok now.

Things are so beautiful!

Nothing happend :)

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                      | Understanding the truth is always a good thing, although it will give you a heavy burden, that you may can't bear it at first, but after you past it, things turned out to be well :) My power is resuming, my body turn to warm again now. The will, my strongest will, fully filled my soul again now. I stride around in the room, the violent thought is generating in my brain. After this struggle of the fate and death, i am more powerful now. I am the philosophy genius, i will build up my ideology in the next years, i will go to find any appearance exception of this ideology, smash it. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1616(10/24/03 2:41 pm)Reply  | ---- <hr/> Your fate, your death...your chance! You are the philosopher?! You know Goethe? He knew poetry to be a mature nature. Am I not ripe for death?! Your are loving, I am lying enough to see that I have loved!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 349(10/24/03 3:17 pm)Reply   | Re: ---- <hr/> Off balance.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1617(10/24/03 11:47 pm)Reply | ---- <hr/> ----yes, that last line of my post is off balance and not just for the typo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1619(10/25/03 12:07 am)Reply | --- <hr/> Well, the top line is too if you read it taking it to mean that ones chance lies only in ones death or fate.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

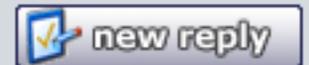

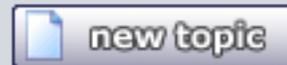

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

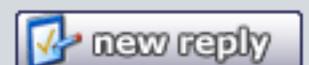

> My second book :)

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 54(3/20/04 1:12 am)Reply                                                                                     | My second book :) <hr/> Genius Philosophy:http://stardict.sourceforge.net/geniusreligion/GeniusPhilosophy.pdf The Utmost Truth:http://stardict.sourceforge.net/geniusreligion/TheUtmostTruth.pdf :_) |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 825(3/20/04 3:17 am)Reply  | Re: My second book :) <hr/> This is a great post, Hu! So precise, and so quick.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

Gold Community GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Nagarjuna - Verses on Emptiness - my perspective

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 730(7/20/04 9:55 pm)Reply  | Nagarjuna - Verses on Emptiness - my perspective <hr/> Duration, origination, destruction, existence, non-existence, inferiority, mediocrity and superiority were taught by the Buddha in accord with conventional usage, not by the power of the real. Correct for the perspective of the whole and incorrect from the perspective of less than the whole. There is not anything which corresponds to the expressions: not-self, not not-self, both self and not-self, because all factors which can be spoken of are -- like Nirvana -- empty in their intrinsic being. To say that everything is empty in relationship with anything else or everything else is incorrect. I do not believe things are empty in their intrinsic being, I just think things are ultimately empty in their finite being. An intrinsic being is a being that has the property of the whole of its parts. As soon as you attempt to make it into something finite then it is no longer the same being. The reality though is that it is both, it is 'whole-big-full' and 'not-whole-small-empty'. To either exist or not exist it requires this balance, which is just one type of balance against many. |

Since the intrinsic being of all entities does not exist in their causes and conditions, either together or separately, or in any way at all, they are empty.

Well I disagree. It is my opinion that the intrinsic being of all entities exists in their causes and conditions, providing one views them from the 'together' rather than the 'apart'.

The existent does not originate because it is existent. The non-existent does not originate because it is non-existent. The existent and non-existent also does not originate because they are heterogeneous. Because there is no origination, there is no duration and no destruction.

No - the correct statement is "The existent does not originate because it is self-existent, it originates because it is not self-originate".

Actually, the existent and non-existent do originate because they are logically heterogeneous. Name me one thing that has a self caused inherent existence. Anything that is caused MUST by default have heterogeneous nature with something else in order to be caused in the first place.

Something that is whole is whole because it has all the properties required to make it whole. It makes no difference that those properties may be sensed, imagined or interpreted differently by those with consciousness.

The Originated is not the object to be originated. The unoriginated is also not the object to be originated. The object at the time of origination is also not the object to be originated, because it would be originated and unoriginated.

True. But this is like looking at the 'whole-big-full' thing as if 'not-whole-small-empty' was separate to what the thing actually is. It is like making a thing black or white when it is in fact black and/or white.

If the effect is existent, the cause will possess the effect. If nonexistent, the cause will be equal to a non-cause. If neither existent nor non-existent, it is contradictory. Nor again is a cause justified in the three times [past, present and future].

No. If the effect is existent, the initial cause will possess the opposite of the new-cause. If nonexistent, the cause will be equal to a non-cause. If a potential cause is already exactly existent in the new cause there will be no effect.

Dot A of x momentum is travelling along at 5mph. Dot B of same momentum travelling in the same direction at 10mph hits Dot A. The effect is both objects will now travel at 7.5mph in the same direction. One must remember that an effect is already a cause itself. The net effect of this double cause/effect process is two 2.5mph opposites that create a balance of 7.5mph.

If Dot B was Dot A and vice versa then the cause on Dot B would be non-existent.

If Dot B had the same momentum as Dot A the effect of the combined object would be double the momentum, but if Dot and to B were kept separate, even if just conceptually, there would be no effect.

It is interesting that a cause, as defined by the causes properties like the example above, meeting a same cause will have no effect. Does not this categorically preclude 'emptiness' in what would have been the effect. So if there is not emptiness, then there must be fullness otherwise if it was empty in any degree, then the potential cause would become a cause and create an effect, but as that does not occur, both the would-be effect and the potential cause remain as they were.

Without one, many does not occur. Without many, one does not occur. Therefore, interdependently originated entities are without form and attributes.

The first two sentences are exactly what I am saying.

The third sentence is only taking one side. I would say interdependently originated entities as a partial group of properties create form and attributes, while interdependently originated sub-entities destroy form and attributes. This sentence creates the balance required in all things. The fact that partial sub-totals of properties can be anything creates the required imbalance.

How can what is not established in its own intrinsic being produce another? A condition which is not established cannot cause the origination of another.

I say, how can what is established in its own intrinsic being produce another? A condition which is established cannot cause the origination of another.

Neither the happiness and suffering which depend upon an object in a dream, nor that object itself, are existent. Similarly, neither that which originates dependently, nor that upon which it depends, are existent.

They are existent relative to a consciousness (and the not-conscious is aware too actually, aware of repulsion and attraction). All things are interrelated, so if an atom is caused to move position from a certain point, then the immediately surrounding atoms that become effects because of the movement will be aware of this. If those atoms are aware of this the whole universe is aware of this in that the cause will cascade out. A cause will retain its cause-momentum until such time as it can create an opposite effect, where in a new cause is created, or its cause-potential is eaten away by relative degrees of opposite causes. As it loses its cause or once its cause is completely lost, then the opposite property to that held by the original cause arises in its being.

Random comments

I guess that is why light does not slow down in space. I wonder if coloured light after it travels through a prism is slower/faster than ordinary light. This is the reason the universe is aware of its balance factor.

If entities are not existent in their intrinsic being, then neither inferiority, mediocrity nor superiority, nor the manifold objects of experience as such, are existent.

Well they are and they aren't, depending on the perspective. From the partial perspective that we humans have they are, but from the perspective of the whole universe they are not.

If neither origination nor cessation are existent, then Nirvana is the cessation of what exactly? What neither originates nor ceases - is this not liberation?

No it is a partial consciousness, as one is only taking the perspective of the whole.

If Nirvana were cessation, it would be annihilation. If it were otherwise, it would be permanence. Therefore, Nirvana is neither being nor non-being. It neither originates, nor ceases.

Its is wrong way around again.

If Nirvana were cessation, it would be annihilation. If it were otherwise, it would be permanence. But if it was a mixture of both it would be temporariness. Therefore, Nirvana is both temporary being and permanent non-being. It both originates and ceases.

The characteristic is established by the substratum of the characteristic. The substratum of the characteristic is established by the characteristic, but they are not established independently, nor are they established by one another. What is not established is not that which establishes another which is not established.

From the perspective of the parts, yes, but not the whole.

A single perspective cannot be the full perspective. It is like looking at a completely black circle on a piece of paper, you cannot tell it is in fact a sphere. The void is the same, in my book the void is made of opposite parts. Unfortunately though these opposite parts cannot be seen from our particular perspective.

Because the three characteristics of the compounded object -- origination, duration and destruction -- are non-existent, the compounded and the un-compounded are also non-existent.

As well as being existent.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 7/20/04 10:06 pm

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

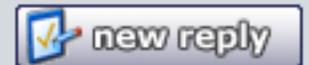

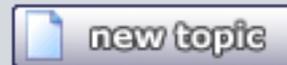

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Nagarjuna and causality

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2167(1/31/04 3:18 am)Reply  | Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> Mahayanavimsaka of Nagarjuna:ADORATION TO THE THREE TREASURES 1 I make my obeisance to the Buddha who is wise, free from all attachment, and whose powers are beyond conception, and who has kindly taught the truth which cannot be expressed by words. 2 In the transcendental truth there is no origination (utpada), and in fact, there is no destruction (nirodha). The Buddha is like the sky (which has neither origination nor cessation), and the beings are like him, and therefore they are of the same nature. 3 There is no birth either on this or the other side (of the world). A compound thing (samskrta) originates from its conditions. Therefore it is sunya by its nature. This fact comes into the range of knowledge of an omniscient one. 4 All things by nature are regarded as reflections. They are pure and naturally | quiescent, devoid of any duality, equal, and remain always and in all circumstances in the same way (tathata).

5

In fact, worldings attribute atman to what is not atman, and in the same way they imagine happiness, misery, indifference, passions and liberation.

6

Birth in the six realms of existence in the world, highest happiness in the heaven, great pain in the hell,—these do not come within the perview of truth (i.e. cannot be accepted as true); nor do the notions that unmeritorious actions lead to the extreme misery, old age, disease, and death, and meritorious actions surely bring about good results.

7

It is owing to false notions that beings are consumed by fire of passions even as a forest is burnt by forest conflagration and fall into the hells, etc. As illusion prevails so do beings make their appearance. The world is illusory and it exists only on account of its cause and conditions.

8

As a painter is frightened by the terrible figure of a Yaksa which he himself has drawn, so is a fool frightened in the world (by his own false notions).

9

Even as a fool going himself to a quagmire is drowned therein, so are beings drowned in the quagmire of false notions and are unable to come out thereof.

10

The feeling of misery is experienced by imagining a thing where in fact it has no existence. Beings are tortured by the poison of false notions regarding the object and its knowledge.

11

Seeing these helpless beings with a compassionate heart one should perform the practices of the highest knowledge (bodhicarya) for the benefit of them.

12

Having acquired requisites thereby and getting unsurpassable bodhi one should become a Buddha, the friend of the world, being freed from the bondage of false notions.

13

He who realizes the transcendental truth knowing the pratityasamutpada (or the manifestation of entities depending on their causes and conditions), knows the world to be sunya and devoid of beginning, middle or end.

14

The samsara and nirvana are mere appearances; the truth is stainless, changeless, and quiescent from the beginning and illumined.

15

The object of knowledge in dream is not seen when one awakes. Similarly the world disappears to him who is awakened from the darkness of ignorance.

The creation of illusion is nothing but illusion. When everything is compound there is nothing which can be regarded as a real thing. Such is the nature of all things.

16

One having origination (jati) does not originate himself. Origination is a false conception of the people. Such conceptions and (conceived) beings, these two are not reasonable.

17

All this is nothing but mind (citta) and exists just like an illusion. Hence originate good and evil actions and from them good and evil birth.

18

When the wheel of the mind is suppressed, all things are suppressed. Therefore all things are devoid of atman (independent nature), and consequently they are pure.

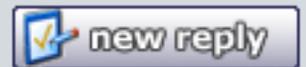

19

It is due to thinking the things which have no independent nature as eternal, atman, and pleasant that this ocean of existence (bhava) appears to one who is enveloped by the darkness of attachment and ignorance.

|                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                           | 20 Who can reach the other side of the great ocean of samsara which is full of water of false notions without getting into the great vehicle (i.e., Mahayana) ? How can these false notions arise in a man who thoroughly knows this world which has originated from ignorance? --                                                                                                                                                           |
|  Robert Larkin Posts: 25 (1/31/04 2:22 pm) Reply ezSupporter   | Re: Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> Thank you, David. However you have failed to otherwise identify the work, including translator, source, and other identification, e.g., ISDN #, so the tract itself can be accessed and if necessary compared to other translations, sources, etc. Translations of a piece are not always the same and as can certainly be seen in Nagarjuna, differently translated by adherents of Theravada, Mahayana, and Vajrayana. |
| jimhaz Registered User Posts: 515 (1/31/04 2:41 pm) Reply                                                                                      | Re: Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> Does it really matter? Each point is dependent and intertwined on each the other, so a transpator would have to change it completely for it to be a falsification.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|  Robert Larkin Posts: 26 (1/31/04 2:50 pm) Reply ezSupporter | Re: Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> I didn't suggest it was falsified, Jim. But different translators translate materials differently, e.g., as through the eyes of their various schools. It could also matter whether the source is Chinese or Tibetan; I am not aware that there is any original Nagarjuna in Sanskrit.                                                                                                                                   |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 2169 (1/31/04 5:04 pm) Reply  | Re: Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> www.dabase.net/vimsaka.htm |
|  Robert Larkin Posts: 32 (2/1/04 8:06 pm) Reply ezSupporter   | Re: Nagarjuna and causality <hr/> Thankee.                                                                   |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 674(6/7/04 2:18 pm)Reply  |  Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals <hr/> Anyone have more info on these portals or are these included within the Nagarjuna verses on emptiness and reasoning on David Quinn's site? "In the Dvadasadvarashastra (The Treatise of Twelve Portals) Nagarjuna delineated twelve portals through which one could pass to understanding without residues of doubt. The first portal concerns causal conditions. Things are produced from diverse conditions, and therefore have no self-nature (svabhava).If they have no self-nature, how can there be such things? A careful analysis of causation discloses that things which are caused – and all manifestation is caused – have no independent reality. In terms of what they seem to be, they are shunyata, empty. The second portal addresses the problem of production. If an effect is already present in a cause, there can be no production.If an effect is at the outset unreal in respect to a cause, there likewise can be no production.If an effect is both real and unreal, there can be no production.How then can there be production? |

Further, the third portal attests,

Briefly and broadly, conditions do not contain effects.

If there are no effects within conditions, how can they come from conditions?

The first three portals teach that no ontological meaning can be given to the concept of causality. The fourth portal shows that the same analysis applies to characteristics or qualities of things, whilst the fifth portal demonstrates that the three universal characteristics of all things – origination, persistence and destruction – are themselves unreal, that is, empty. In the sixth portal, Nagarjuna holds one cannot prove either that an object is identical with its characteristics or that it is different from them. Since both standpoints are true in part and untrue in part, it is possible to move towards Truth through mundane truths so long as one adheres to this Middle Way.

The seventh portal attacks the seemingly fundamental distinction between being and non-being.

There cannot be being with non-being, nor can there be being without non-being.
If there can be being with non-being, then being should always be non-being.

Origination and persistence are characteristics of being, whilst decay and destruction belong to non-being. Thus being and non-being can neither exist together nor separately. The eighth portal applies the argument regarding being and non-being to Nature to show that since all things are in a condition of ceaseless change, there is no self-nature in them. The ninth portal adds that since things cannot be understood in terms of their essential nature or from the process of causation, they are shunyata.

Since there can be no creation without cause and effect, as the tenth portal teaches, and since causality is empty, there is no creation. Nagarjuna applies this conclusion to the idea of suffering to show that even suffering has no real existence. The eleventh portal examines creation from the standpoint of time to demonstrate that it cannot occur in the past, present or future, and so cannot occur at all.

'Earlier than', 'later than' and 'simultaneous with'
– such events are impossible.

How then can events be produced by causes?

The twelfth portal uses the argument from time to show that nothing can be produced.

The effect already produced is not to be produced; that not yet produced is not produced.

Without that which is already produced and that which is not yet produced, that which is being produced is not produced."

Jones Kelly

Posts: 170

(6/24/04 4:31 pm)

Reply

Re: Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals

Jimhaz, your post seems to be missing the full text for all twelve "portals". Do you have it? David's website has "Mahayanavimsaka" (Adoration to the three treasures).

Who is making the commentary? I don't think they're good:

Quote:

---

In the sixth portal, Nagarjuna holds one cannot prove either that an object is identical with its characteristics or that it is different from them. Since both standpoints are true in part and untrue in part, it is possible to move towards Truth through mundane truths so long as one adheres to this Middle Way.

---

This is a corrupt interpretation, since there is no such thing as a partial or mundane truth. There is only the level of truth and the level of untruth.

Quote:

---

Origination and persistence are characteristics of being, whilst decay and destruction belong to non-being.

---

Rubbish!

Quote:

---

Thus being and non-being can neither exist together nor separately. The eighth portal applies the argument regarding being and non-being to Nature to show that since all things are in a condition of ceaseless change, there is no self-nature in them. The ninth portal adds that since things cannot be understood in terms of their essential nature or from the process of causation, they are shunyata.

---

I'm not sure about the description of the ninth portal. It would be easier to see the full text.

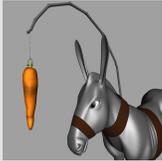

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 703

(6/24/04 5:14 pm)

Reply

 Re: Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals

---

It came from this site

theosophy.org/alphabetical-teachers.htm

It is a good site to learn a bit of history.

I was looking for more original material myself, thats why I made the post.

KristjanG

Registered User

Posts: 5

(6/25/04 2:43 am)

Reply

 .

---

Things are produced from diverse conditions, and therefore have no self-nature (svabhava).

If they have no self-nature, how can there be such things?

I'm not sure if this is one of your questions, but I can explain how "if they have not self-nature, how can there be such things"

I believe what it means is that because there is no absolute, all things are relative. This includes all properties of every "thing". In other words, the properties of "things" are not defined by what they actually "Are", but instead by what they are not.

In order to have multiple "things" in a universe, each "thing" needs to have a label to distinguish it from the other "things". Otherwise you really just have one "thing".

However, the only way to generate such a label in a relative universe with no absolutes is to start with the first thing, which is simply "thing", and has no properties, and then add a new thing. This new thing is now called "not the first thing". The next thing is called "not the first thing or the second thing", and so on.

The reason why we do not normally recognise this is because there are now so many "things" that some relationships now seem absolute. Exactly like the way the stars seem to have absolute positions in the sky, but really just have positions relative to each other. The very far away stars never seem to move, and so mimic an absolute reference point. Yet none of these stars really have an absolute position.

Anyhow, that's what I figure is meant by "Things are produced from diverse conditions, and therefore have no self-nature (svabhava)."

Word out!
-K

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1130
(6/25/04 9:05 am)
Reply

Re: .

---

Kristjan, I'd like to introduce you to some of the standard lines of questioning on such matters here.

Quote:

---

I believe what it means is that because there is no absolute, all things are relative.

---

If all things are necessarily relative, would that not be an absolute condition?

Quote:

---

This includes all properties of every "thing". In other words, the properties of "things" are not defined by what they actually "Are", but instead by what they are not.

---

OK so properties are relative. Is 'thingness' a property?

Quote:

---

In order to have multiple "things" in a universe, each "thing" needs to have a label to distinguish it from the other "things". Otherwise you really just have one "thing".

---

So does that mean that things precede or succeed labels?

Quote:

---

However, the only way to generate such a label in a relative universe with no absolutes is to start with the first thing, which is simply "thing", and has no properties, and then add a new thing. This new thing is now called "not the first thing". The next thing is called "not the first thing or the second thing", and so on.

---

I mostly follow you there but I'm confused about this first thing that you start with.

Firstly, I'm confused about the nature of this first thing's thingness. You say it has no properties, yet it is a thing. What is a thing and how does this first thing conform to your explanation?

Secondly, in a universe with no absolutes, how can there be a 'first thing'? Relatively, I suppose there can only be a first thing in relation to all the things that succeed it. But that can't explain the 'creation' of this first thing.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 176

(6/26/04 1:50 pm)

Reply

 Re: Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals

---

Quote:

---

*edit: The following burst of ego was directly related to my attachment to an experience of enlightenment, and is therefore questionable, though still not as much as the Theosophy guy's commentary is.

My error was in making a construct of a "detached observer self" (that which thought) out of stillness of awareness compared to "everything else" (that which wasn't thought).

Obviously thoughts too are bounded things and not separate from the Totality. Thoughts create the notion of bound and separate things but aren't themselves bound or separate. So the "thinker" self is a construct, and is also an illusion.

I created another possible solution: distance, to keep removing at one step from each bounded construction. I.e. to step back into a thinker self, then to step back into an ego self (which created that), then to step back into an "infinite" self (which includes that), then to step back into destroying all selves... The problem with this approach is that the thinking self is all the while having a ball. So i'm still investigating the fact that reasoning doesn't inherently exist.*

---

From the Theosophy site that Jimhaz linked, I found that dastardly commentator spitting everywhere. He doesn't quote texts in full, and inserts his evil sludge in everywhere.

This from the section on Hakuin:

Quote:

---

Accepting the view that 'the original face', the primordial enlightenment, is present in potentia in every being, [Hakuin] asked how one could come to live consciously in that universal awareness at every moment. Because enlightenment is not something one gains or obtains, since it is always present, when it is realized the insight is sudden.

---

What a muddle.

What is "universal awareness" if there is neither universe nor an awareness of universe nor awareness that is universal?

Yes, the ability to become enlightened is present in every conscious being, yet some aren't "born human" (seeking enlightenment).

Yes, enlightenment is not something one gains or obtains, but because enlightenment is realisation there is no one gaining or obtaining.

No, enlightenment is not always present, except in perfect consciousness.

Quote:

---

But since much preparation is required to achieve that possibility of consciousness, the path is gradual and, if one pursues it with all one's energy, systematic.

---

If enlightenment is Insight (suddenly arises), it is because the state of delusion is time-based. When delusion re-arises, the illusion of time re-asserts itself, thus the path is a gradual stabilisation of where errors lie.

Quote from Hakuin from site:

Quote:

---

When the student has accumulated effort in study and investigation and the enlightened nature suddenly appears, all at once he realizes the essence of inner reality; when one form of knowledge is actualized, all are actualized. Yet even though one reaches the stage of Buddhahood without passing through steps and stages, if one does not cultivate practice gradually, it is impossible to fulfil omniscience, independent knowledge and ultimate great enlightenment.

---

Practice is the eradication of all ego, all delusion, all attachment, by focussing on Truth and digging away systematically at bad mental habits.

Again the spitter:

Quote:

---

Realization occurs, according to Hakuin, "when the discriminating mind is suddenly shattered" and enlightened consciousness appears. Since one then experiences the universe as boundless light, this awareness is called the perfect-mirror knowledge.

---

Boundless light in the sense of the clarity of awareness and the stillness of all things, like a perfect mirror reflection, but if enlightenment occurs during "night-time" it's not like the sun comes back up.

Mr Spitter continues:

Quote:

---

It is the transmutation of alayavijnana, the universal storehouse of consciousness which is also the repository of all karmic action and potential, into active awareness.

---

Alaya: the eighth consciousness, root of all existence

Vijnana: direct realisation of Truth (beyond intellectual knowledge)

The Buddha Mind doesn't get inserted like a karma chipboard into "active awareness". There is no transmutation in that sense, since there is only one mind/consciousness. Awareness of Truth (Nirvana, understanding of karma) arises in the same consciousness that delusion arises in.

Spitman:

Quote:

---

Simultaneous with its transmutation is the recognition that the six fields of sense, which include the activity of the discursive mind, are one's own enlightened nature, and this is the knowledge of equality.

---

All six fields of sense are equal because none inherently exist, they are all equally empty (delusions).

Quote:

---

The discernment of things in the light of real knowledge is called subtle analytic knowledge, because it penetrates to the core of every truth.

---

Ok.

Quote:

---

Seeing all activity, voluntary and reflexive, as harmonious with the nature of reality is called knowledge of accomplishment.

---

Ok.

Quote:

---

Real insight is the realization of these four kinds of knowledge all at once. But, Hakuin warned, even their realization is not enough.

(quotes Hakuin) Even if your perception of reality is authentic, when your shining power of insight is weak, you cannot overcome the barriers of habitual actions. Unless your knowledge of differentiation is clear, you cannot benefit sentient beings in accord with their potentials. Therefore you must know the essential road of gradual practical cultivation.

---

In other words, after the Great Death of enlightenment, there's another Great Death, which is much harder. This is the smashing apart of Alaya, penetrating to the source of free, enlightened activity that permeates "daily life".

The Spitter is at it again:

Quote:

---

Satori, when authentic, is always genuine enlightenment.

---

Satori can be confused with enlightenment by one who hasn't achieved enlightenment. This doesn't make the satori inauthentic, but it does make the enlightenment ingenuine. Enlightenment is certain and occurs with satori (a kind of peak experience, an altered state of consciousness, which has a "spiritual" significance).

Quote:

---

As such, it is total, covering the four forms of knowledge, and sudden, in that it is not the last in a series of steps (any more than infinity is the last term of the number series or omniscience is the last expansion of limited knowledge).

---

Well, no, satori that isn't enlightenment definitely doesn't cover the four forms of knowledge, any more than any experience of enlightenment necessarily is final perfection.

There are stages (of how much ego one has), which does not change the essential infinite nature of consciousness. So any experience of enlightenment is part of that process of becoming perfect, which ends with perfection...

Quote:

---

Satori is enlightenment and is complete as to range. Nonetheless, it only reflects a degree of strength in respect to life in the world of illusion, and unless fortified by spiritual, moral and mental practice, it cannot be translated into a universally beneficent experience which assists all others towards the same goal.

---

Again, satori is not necessarily enlightenment, and does not necessarily equate with complete and final enlightenment (perfection).

There's no "only" about satori. Enlightenment is an essential insight that helps correct deluded thinking, and continue the process of perfection. Being free from error, in as full a state of enlightenment possible at all times, is spiritual, moral and mental practice.

Quote:

---

This is why Hakuin's own teachers urged him to strive harder after gaining insight, so that it might be deepened, strengthened and better translated into every thought, -feeling, word and deed.

---

This is backwards. Enlightenment is not a tool to create a perfect world, but the destruction of all delusion is perfect enlightenment.

Quote:

---

For Hakuin, real meditation begins after some degree of insight is achieved, and meditation depends upon deepening the moral foundation in one's life.

---

The humanist attitude of this guy means he pulls what he likes from the wisdom of sages, and twists it to support his own ego - to help him sustain his illusion of self-existence.

If there is no true insight, there can be no useful stabilisation. Both are essential and are actually inseparable (there is really no separate self that is deluded, and a self that is enlightened). They are two parts of the one mind. Hui-neng has a text on this that i found useful:

Quote:

---

If you talk good talk but are not good at heart, you have stabilisation and insight in vain; stabilisation and insight are not balanced. If your heart and your talk are both good, and inside and outside are as one, then stabilisation and insight are balanced.

Self-enlightenment and -cultivation are not to be found in argument. If you argue about precedence, then you are the same as deluded people. If you do not put a stop to contention, you are increasing egoism and have not detached from the four images [of a self, a personality, a being, and a life].

Good friends, what are stabilisation and insight like? They are like a lamp and its light. If there is a lamp, there is light; without a lamp, there is darkness. The lamp is the body of the light, the light is the function of the lamp. The names may be two, but in essence they are basically one and the same. The phenomena of stabilisation and insight are also like this.

---

The more i burn, the more pure my flame.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 6/27/04 7:40 am

unknown
Registered User
Posts: 53
(6/26/04 3:57 pm)
Reply

 Re: Nagarjuna: The Treatise of Twelve Portals

---

There is nothing there.

You all humans are morons.

KristjanG
Registered User
Posts: 8
(6/30/04 8:07 am)
Reply

 .

---

Hi Dave

Yes, I've thought of the problem of what consitutes the first "thing".

I would imagine that the first "thing" is in fact nothing at all. Nothingness. The void.

The second thing would be the perception that there is nothing.

The third thing would be the perception of the perception that there is nothing.

After an arbitrary period, the world will be filled with perceptions.

In otherwords, "things" are just labels, with the first label being applied to the state of nothingness that existed before you started labelling.

This of course brings up the problem of how you can do something such as attaching a label when there is nothing there. I believe I have a possible solution to this problem.

If one is already in the system of labels, ie reality, then one can in theory retroactively apply a label to the NULL state

This would only be possible if the system of labels was already well advanced.

In other words, the technique of creating labels could be invented AFTER the first label has been applied.

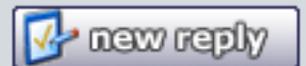

This would produce a system quite like we see around us, where nothing seems absolute, and where we suddenly find ourselves right in the midst of it all, with no explanations for how it all started.

There are no explanations, I think, because the events that create the world are caused by us in the future.

But of course, this is just speculation, and quite a fantastical one at that. Tell me if anything needs clarification or sounds jest nutty! Thanx!

-K

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
 > GENIUS FORUM
 > Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000                     Forum Host                     Posts: 2085                     (1/23/04 3:48 pm)                     Reply  | Ne Plus Ultra <hr/> Hello all, As some of you may have heard, I was recently expelled from the Ne Plus Ultra forum. Unfortunately, the owner closed the forum from the view of outsiders on the same day as kicking me off, and so very few people have had a chance to see what had happened. I have managed to acquire a copy of the entire incident, however, which can be viewed here. I have also written an essay which analyzes the psychology of academic intellectuals, using the fracas at Ne Plus Ultra as a reference point. Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/23/04 7:11 pm |
| DEL                     Registered User                     Posts: 934                     (1/23/04 6:00 pm)                     Reply                                                                                          | The closed system <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Andrew Beckwith                     Your willingness to discount the intelligence of others here means you are a closed system. <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000

Unfortunately, the owner closed the forum from the view of outsiders on the same day as kicking me off, and so very few people have had a chance to see what had happened.

---

It is interesting to see how "closed" is the ultimate weapon. In Alchemy when you see an image of a snake or dragon biting its own tail it is a symbol of a closed system, a ring, a circular movement, a trap. Meaning no progress. If you snap the ring you get a spiral.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 775
(1/23/04 6:54 pm)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

David: As some of you may have heard, I was recently expelled from the Ne Plus Ultra forum. Unfortunately, the owner closed the forum from the view of outsiders on the same day as kicking me off, and so very few people have had a chance to see what had happened. I have managed to acquire a copy of the entire incident, however, which can be viewed here.

The communication with NPU evidences that your opinions are impenetrable by reason, which is basically echoed here on Genius. It not surprising that you -like most people- defend your opinions. Mind you, that's your right. What makes you different is that you go to extraordinary lengths at ignoring better reason while insisting on your prejudices. You are not known to consider other views than your own, even if your arguments have been convincingly refuted. While the participants on Genius have gotten used to this sort of thing, it tends to frustrate most other people. The habit has a tendency to stall and disrupt exchanges, so I can understand NPU's decision - at least from an emotional POV. There is something about misogyny that makes it unpalatable -just like racism- it drives people nuts. You had this type of conflict in the past and you will probably keep running into it.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 59
(1/23/04 8:30 pm)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

When a young child I visited somewhere with my parents, there was a piano in one of the rooms. I started to play and was exceedingly pleased with the result. It sounded great, so much so that I gave full vent to my newly found musical talent. Eventually my mother came from the other room and shouted, "For gods sake stop that awful noise!".

One can easily fall victim to self-willed grandeur.

John

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 457
(1/23/04 9:55 pm)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

Thanks David. I missed the discussion so i'm sure this will make good reading, albeit my reasons for reading it will be for entertainment, no doubt some truth will sink in.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1431
(1/24/04 2:39 am)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

Quote:

---

Andrew Beckwith, PhD

---

The gender-based descriptions are offensive to those not already desensitized by it. It is unfortunate.

But it is also interesting how hysterical even the "smartest" become when confronted with this "-ism."

Tharan Silvers, BS., CCNA, A+, BaD. MoFo.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 458
(1/24/04 2:45 am)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

I can't work out how Andrew Beckwith is in that supposed elite group. He is clearly an idiot, from my perspective.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 459
(1/24/04 4:16 am)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

OK read it all now, including the essay, but excluding much of the jargony bits.

Agree fully with David's summation of the exchange, with the exception that I think M's responses and lack of emotive response were quite reasonable.

I had no idea that otherwise intelligent people, could be so emotionally chaotic and childlike.

Hywel
Registered User
Posts: 48
(1/24/04 5:03 am)
Reply

Re: Ne Plus Ultra

---

I didnt actually believe people like this existed.

I was tempted to cut out some of the funniest parts and post them in the thinkers inn, but theres just too many.

But I did manage to find a single sentence from Plato that perhaps sums up the insanity:-

Quote:

---

I am not dividing Reality into anything - I am looking at the various reflections or images of that reality.

---

So, hes not dividing up reality, and then he proceeds to separate reality from our images of it.

Mad as a bicycle.

Mind you, I found just the way they talk hilarious. What kind of person will not only say, but actually type the word "damnably".....

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 320
(1/24/04 6:03 am)
Reply

ha! ha! ha! ha!.....

---

Thomas Knierim (who else could?), wrote:

David: As some of you may have heard, I was recently expelled from the Ne Plus Ultra forum. Unfortunately, the owner closed the forum from the view of outsiders on the same day as kicking me off, and so very few people have had a chance to see what had happened. I have managed to acquire a copy of the entire incident, however, which can be viewed here.

The communication with NPU evidences that your opinions are impenetrable by reason, which is basically echoed here on Genius. It not surprising that you -like most people- defend your opinions. Mind you, that's your right. What makes you different is that you go to extraordinary lengths at ignoring better reason while insisting on your prejudices. You are not known to consider other views than your own, even if your arguments have been convincingly refuted. While the participants on Genius have gotten used to this sort of thing, it tends to frustrate most other people. The habit has a tendency to stall and disrupt exchanges, so I can understand NPU's decision - at least from an emotional POV. There is something about misogyny that makes it unpalatbale -just like racism- it drives people nuts. You had this type of conflict in the past and you will probably keep running into it.

Thomas

HA! HA! HA! HA! HA! HA! HA!.....

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 253
(1/24/04 11:40 am)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

I can't work out how Andrew Beckwith is in that supposed elite group. He is clearly an idiot, from my perspective.

Yes, i saw it unfold. I thought he was just a lacky and would peel away and leave room for some real thinkers to enter the fray. It seems that there weren't any.

Agree fully with David's summation of the exchange, with the exception that I think M's responses and lack of emotive response were quite reasonable.

I also noticed ~M~, and checked out a few of his personal topics. He seemed to be trying to pierce topics with logic rather than get caught up in complex waffle. Perhaps the discussion is still sinking in, and might have an observable effect on him later.

I had no idea that otherwise intelligent people, could be so emotionally chaotic and childlike.

I guess they are rarely pushed in such a calculated and truthful manner, they were like a baby thrown into ice-water.

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2112
(1/24/04 1:14 pm)
Reply

---

---

Rhett, it's lackey, not lucky, and conscientious not consciencious. As a most conscientious lackey you will thank me for correcting you before David your lord and master has to.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 655
(1/24/04 5:42 pm)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

Rhett, you're such a fuck.

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 27(1/25/04 4:23 am)Reply | Lbartoli inhaled too much laughing gas <hr/> Why is what Thomas Knierim said so funny to you? Is it because it happens to be true? I hope you've enjoyed your latest experience at the dentists office. Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/25/04 6:45 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 284(1/25/04 7:21 am)Reply     | Re: The closed system <hr/> Thomas wrote: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>&gt; There is something about misogyny that makes it</li><li>&gt; unpalatable</li></ul> It is a very serious thing to accuse someone of misogyny. It is just like accusing someone of being a pedophile, or of being racist. You shouldn't be branding people with such terms unless you have clear proof to back it up, otherwise it is just slander of the worst kind. Your claim of "hatred of women" needs be backed up with evidence. Having a low regard for feminine psychology in the context of philosophic progress does not constitute "misogyny". |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 28(1/25/04 9:36 am)Reply | Slander or Libel? <hr/> Quote: <hr/> It is a very serious thing to accuse someone of misogyny. <hr/> Yes, I agree. It is also something that David started an entire thread in which he branded Thomas and anyone who doesn't share his views on women as misogynists. Yet, you did not offer one word of rebuke toward David as you have with Thomas. Your indignation is a selective one it seems. Quote: <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

It is just like accusing someone of being a pedophile, or of being racist. You shouldn't be branding people with such terms unless you have clear proof to back it up, otherwise it is just slander of the worst kind.

---

Oh come on now. Slander? He was merely expressing his opinion of David's views just as David did when he labelled Thomas in the same manner. Are you practising law now?

Quote:

---

Your claim of "hatred of women" needs be backed up with evidence.

---

As you David and Dan need to back up your claims that women are not capable of attaining enlightenment unless they get a sex change. Without verifiable quality data to back up your so called wise assertions you will only continue to invite such accusations.

Quote:

---

Having a low regard for feminine psychology in the context of philosophic progress does not constitute "misogyny".

---

Neither is the assertion by some psychometric experts that blacks are inferior to whites because the average of their collective IQ scores is lower than that of whites racist. I'm interested to here what you would make of that.

FYI Slander applies to the spoken word. It is libel when done in written form. Philosophers make lousy lawyers. *rolls eyes*

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/25/04 9:52 am

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2115
(1/25/04 10:31 am)
Reply

---

---

Kevin and David are misogynists. However, they are not men who have physically harmed women.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 255
(1/25/04 10:57 am)
Reply

Re: Slander or Libel?

---

Neither is the assertion by some psychometric experts that blacks are inferior to whites because the average of their collective IQ scores is lower than that of whites racist. I'm interested to here what you would make of that.

Now we're really onto a dangerous topic. I imagine that it's not discussed here because there's no benefit to the spread of wisdom in doing so. Unlike women, black people don't seem to be hampering the efforts of others to become wise - at least not in a significant way, so there is little justification in engaging in a debate.

Nevertheless, would it be too dangerous for me to suggest that black people, such as native Africans, Australian Aboriginals, etc, do seem less inclined towards Ultimate Wisdom? Perhaps it would be interesting to see what proportion of the Genius Forum membership are black?

I'm not aware of any black people becoming enlightened, that seems to be the province of Anglo's and Asians.

Rhett

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 73
(1/25/04 11:24 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Jesus. Wasn't the misogyny enough?

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1433
(1/25/04 11:31 am)
Reply

---

---

I am not aware of any Vietnamese or Koreans becoming enlightened. Nor am I aware of any of the Slavic language speakers, any in the Middle East, nor Mexicans becoming enlightened. I am also not aware of any Cubans with cigars, mafioso types, tap dancers, people with a lazy eye, nor humans inflicted with Elephantitis becoming enlightened. The same can be said of all non-humans, stewardesses, my neighbors, residents of Gary, Indiana, men with toupees, and step-children.

In fact, I am only aware of the QRS collective being currently enlightened. If we add you to that list Rhett, we get the QRSH collective.

Could it be that my awareness plays a role in this?

Tharan

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 894
(1/25/04 11:47 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Yes, it would be interesting to see how many native Africans and Aussie Aborigines have PCs and internet access, and are interested in enlightenment, and have come across this site, and have identified this site as a means towards wisdom, and have decided to become a member, and are still active.

Quote:

---

Kevin: Having a low regard for feminine psychology in the context of philosophic progress does not constitute "misogyny".

---

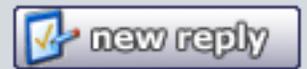

No, but marry it to a certain far right, "wisdom" promotion based value system; then send the resultant views out into the world at large. Lo and behold we have what will almost universally be perceived as that which constitutes misogyny, whether it truly is or not.

-----

I've read it all, and Quinn won by some margin in my estimation. No points were irrefutably proven though, rather some were proven either way and were not refuted irrefutably. But I believe David's motivations for going there may not have been to win anything, never mind a debate as to the relative merits of philosophy versus the scientific method with regard to absolute knowledge of reality (and how could he expect some of his points to be understood, or even to understand some of the points made himself). His primary motivation was probably to look for potential like minds, likely to no avail. But I perceived his secondary motivation, accomplished with aplomb, was to show the constraints that one's egotistical attachments apply to one's thinking and one's reactions, and the fact that exceptional IQ has no effect on this equation whatsoever.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1388(2/3/04 4:45 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Shit and urine are not well compared, so the point is no point. I really don't have a lot of bizarre practices. It is not nearly so aberrant or shocking as you seem to think. I do not engage in the practice to provoke any sort of reaction. The reactions of others don't enter into the equation. Quote: <hr/> If I wrote a book claiming that jumping off bridges was medically useful, would you be found on the side of the Golden Gate? <hr/> Well, if you were a bona fide scientist like Darwin, then of course I would. I mean, it would be irrational for me to actually examine the evidence, wouldn't it? Quote: <hr/> To be honest, this is part of the reason I stress realism, critical thought, and scientific education so strongly. <hr/> |

Then please consider engaging in it.

Quote:

---

When we decide that we don't have to believe in things like evolution (Darwinism), we open the door to all sorts of folly.

---

All I can say is wow. Double wow. Nature! you have disappointed me. I don't know about we, but I have a habit of accepting nothing by compulsion and having the final decision about what I accept. I examine anything as I feel interested to do so. Darwinism is indeed a religion and its adherents fundamentalists. Your quote could be taken verbatim but just switch it to say, Holy Mother Church and it would do just fine.

Would you be interested to find out the shameful behavior of the priests of Darwinism and how they have hounded and persecuted and slandered and blocked the free speech of the most polite and well-behaved questioners of the faith?

Quote:

---

It is not uncommon at all to find that those who reject scientific concepts such as evolution also engage in a number of unmentionable practices.

---

And masturbation causes hair to grow on the palms. Hey, didja see Reefer Madness? A 50's classic.

Quote:

---

It is not uncommon at all to find that those who reject scientific concepts such as evolution also engage in a number of unmentionable practices.

---

(Alternate response: Heh, heh, aside from going to church, could you give some examples?)

Quote:

---

This is psychologically consistent, as the successful rejection of truth in one realm of thought naturally legitimizes the idea that we can believe or disbelieve things simply because we want to, and we begin to behave accordingly.

---

Hey, now you are treading on dangerous ground. This is how I got my warning on KIR. It makes me angry when Christians slander God, and it makes me angry when people slander Truth. I have not rejected a truth, you have, and that without examination, because you have decided that you don't need to. Now that is what I call prejudice and ignorance. Come on, reread the above paragraph and think about whom it applies to.

Naturyl

Registered User
Posts: 159
(2/3/04 6:07 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

What in the devil are you ranting about?

How have I "slandered truth?"

LOL!

Why does the theory of evolution aggravate you so? Why are you unable to accept that it is unreasonable to dispute a scientific theory as well-supported as biological evolution? Is there something so repugnant about the idea of Darwinian evolution that you would rather believe the fanciful theories of a failed Hollywood scriptwriter who carries baby skulls around in his trunk and believes that all life was placed on earth by aliens?

Note: for those of you who don't know, I'm not making this up:

<http://www.lloydpye.com/>

WolfsonJakk

Registered User
Posts: 1443
(2/3/04 6:16 pm)
Reply

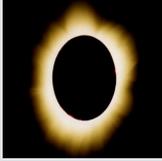

----

---

Now now, kids, no arguing. We have more important things to do. Cheers!
That's not beer!

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 2186
(2/3/04 6:19 pm)
Reply

Re: ha ha ha

---

Now the piss drinking is one thing ( such a pessimistic one (I only imagine doing it if I was deep in a desert with no hope and thought to hang out a little longer)) but the alien thing is what really gets me. Anna, you know I'll only ridicule, and not ever think badly of you altogether, but how on earth do you imagine we have alien ancestors?!!!! ???? How?!!

birdofhermes

Registered User
Posts: 1389
(2/4/04 1:14 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

What in the devil are you ranting about?

---

Sir, it was you ranting. You lost your reason, your faith and became quite upset. You then followed with a long list of thoroughly unlikely and unrelated accusations.

Quote:

---

How have I "slandered truth?"

---

With your statement about someone rejecting truth when it is you who have not examined evidence, and don't think you should. Speaking as though something is known when it is an unknown irritates me.

Quote:

---

Why are you unable to accept that it is unreasonable to dispute a scientific theory as well-supported as biological evolution? Is there something so repugnant about the idea of Darwinian evolution

---

I have no objections to Darwinism at all, or evolution at all. I could not care less how we got here, except for being quite interested in it. I do not find the theory well-supported. If it'll make you feel better, I have put forth the idea that some form of evolution must surely occur in this cosmos somewhere - I really don't see any other explanation - but that it works very differently from the theories that have been so far put forth and accepted. Random agglomeration of particles and random mutations of genes is not it.

You're a fine one to be mocking what you call failures, no? He is a published author of several books. Most of us here are probably intelligent failures. That is irrelevant. But I am disappointed in you, yes, profoundly. How rare is an open mind, and the liberals think they get to claim an open mind by definition, like some of the men here think they get to claim superiority on the strength of their gender.

The flag of the human race flies at half-mast when people as advanced in their spiritual thinking as yourself are no different in their emotional reactions than the doctors whom Semmelweis informed were killing people for not washing their hands.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 561
(2/4/04 2:14 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

If it'll make you feel better, I have put forth the idea that some form of evolution must surely occur in this cosmos somewhere

No, but close, evolution and devolution occur in equal quantities in the universe at all times.

Any atom (or another thing smaller or larger) that joins with another thing is evolution, but when they disjoin then devolution occurs. A strange way to look at evolution I admit, you did mention 'some form' though. Before life physical environments suitable for life must have evolved, and before that, that which created the physical environment...elements...atoms...ad infinitum. And of course things must devolve at some stage, and all things do.

It is that which creates infinity and infinity creates existence. Existence creates non-existence, off creates on, positive creates negative and vice versa.

Good old cause and effect again.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1390
(2/4/04 4:30 am)
Reply

Re: ha ha ha

---

Quote:

---

Anna, you know I'll only ridicule, and not ever think badly of you altogether, but how on earth do you imagine we have alien ancestors?!!!! ??! How?!!

---

Still, Zag, Naturyl has said that he thinks most people can judge a debate objectively, despite whatever side they may actually favor. I appoint you as judge. With your love for me on one side and your preference for Naturyl's opinions on the other, can you deny that it is me who has been rational throughout, and that Naturyl has staggered and fallen into prejudice and irrationality?

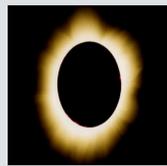

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2191
(2/4/04 11:23 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Is this your way of thanking me for making you see the truth of our not having alien ancestors?

You have been most rational. But I am not going to blame Naturyl for feeling a little ill at the thought of drinking piss.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1391
(2/4/04 12:14 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Is this your way of thanking me for making you see the truth of our not having alien ancestors?

I await your first argument.

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2193(2/4/04 12:33 pm)Reply         | Re: ha ha ha <hr/> My first argument is there is absolutely no evidence for our having alien ancestors, whereas there is evidence of our having evolved from the earths life forms.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 568(2/4/04 12:45 pm)Reply                                                                                           | Re: --- <hr/> Nothing is alien as we are all interconnected.Not that that means anything in the context of this thread.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2196(2/4/04 12:53 pm)Reply       | Re: --- <hr/> Of course it doesn't jim. By 'alien' we mean life not from this planet.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 806(2/4/04 1:39 pm)Reply  | Re: ha ha ha <hr/> Nat, did you know that urine therapy is popular in India and China? Not that I am advocating it, but it is not as unusual as it seems. Urine contains water, urea, uric acid, ammonium, protein, antibodies, decomposed proteins, and - hey- even creatine. I am not sure about hydrogen peroxide, since that substance is highly oxidizing and wouldn't be stable for long. I am skeptic about the health value, since the urea compounds obviously contain waste products, and in case of infection urine might contain quite a bit of dead cell and bacteria material. Not very appetizing. I might consider it when left with the alternative of dying with thirst. Thomas |

Naturyl

Registered User
Posts: 159
(2/4/04 2:12 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

That's interesting, Thomas, but quite frankly, I've had enough of this. I indicate that I feel that drinking urine is unreasonable and all hell breaks loose. The world has really become a strange place, I suppose. Of course, I've faced similar reactions when explaining my support for capital punishment and restrictions on abortion beyond the first trimester. People who thought I walked on water suddenly have nothing but disdain for me. In every case, without exception, it boils down to the fundamentally deluded idea that people ought to be able to do whatever they like without the slightest objection from anyone else. Bird accuses me of liberalism, but it is in fact her who parrots the liberal line in her emotional revulsion at the idea that others may draw the line and consider some types of behavior simply unacceptable. The piss-drinking really isn't the issue anymore, I don't think. At some point, it became more than that, and now we are arguing permissiveness versus boundaries.

BTW, I'm just as disappointed in Bird as she is in me. I thought she had it together, but it's obvious now that I was just engaging in wishful thinking. It seems that David was right in his warning that her emotionalism makes productive conversation unlikely.

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 2200
(2/4/04 2:32 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

I trust Naturyl's good humour, and the heart of his seriousness, that he will not be lastingly disappointed in Anna who only felt a little awkward at the vehemence of his revulsion, and saw well, if not clearly, that 'rationality' is beside the point as concerns humanity 'ultimately'

(:D)

Naturyl

Registered User
Posts: 160
(2/4/04 4:24 pm)
Reply

Re: ha ha ha

---

Of course. It's a good point you make - rationality is a fine tool, in fact the best we have, but it is still just a tool. Life is ultimately not rational, nor are human beings. If I or Bird became somewhat irrational at any point, we were only showing our true nature, the nature of all things in this irrational universe. There is nothing better to strive for than rationality, but it is still something to strive for rather than something which comes naturally to us.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1395

(2/5/04 3:10 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Naturyl, the only reason that all hell broke loose is that you went berserk. You said I probably have all sorts of unacceptable practices because I don't believe in Evolution. You said I must not feel free to examine evolution theory, or I will fall into folly. You said a lot of things when you don't know both sides of the issue, and I am at least somewhat familiar with both sides of the issues. You've now decided I'm some sort of weirdo monstrosity. You really should reread your posts and look at them from my point of view.

I do not "accuse" you of liberalism, rather, I am pointing out that those of a generally leftist stance assume they must have an open mind, that it comes with the territory. Liberalism is a good thing, and leftism a better, provided they are grounded in reason and compassion.

I don't care at all that you find certain practices unacceptable, it was the way that you allowed your entire inner composure to fall apart and never considered even the mild evidence I gave you.

Why are we arguing permissiveness versus boundaries? At what point did that ever occur? By the way, I tend to be in favor of the death penalty if we could apply it to the guilty, and I am against 3rd trimester abortions most definitely, and probably 2nd trimester as well.

You do have some nerve accusing me of emotionalism!

You now say you are disappointed in me, that you must have misread all the previous posts that you liked, and that this discussion is not really about urine anymore (since Thomas showed you it is not really that strange) but is now about boundaries, meaning I don't have any! You have made one absurd and unfounded attack upon my character and rationality after another, and all because of this one little thing!

And it isn't only India and China. I've asked around and found out that there are various traditions like wiping your face with a (cloth) baby's diaper for some sort of skin condition, or drinking the urine of the youngest child for a disease, but I cannot remember which one. Something like scarlet fever or the like, that are European and American.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 2/5/04 3:15 am

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1396

(2/5/04 3:53 am)

Reply

Re: ha ha ha

---

Thomas, You forgot hormones and minerals. But anyway the list is longer.

Quote:

---

I am skeptic about the health value, since the urea compounds obviously contain waste products, and in case of infection urine might contain quite a bit of dead cell and bacteria material.

---

As well you should be. That's one reason I'm intersted in finding out more than just what I read. A person really has to see results to believe. But remember, those dead bacterial materials are dead. Also, they are taken into the gut, not through the respiratory tract or bloodstream. The theory is that there is some sort of feedback loop that assists the immune system in its fight. I wonder about it because the urine is a byproduct of the blood, and does not contain any new information. But it is also obvious that when a person is sick the body is fighting very hard, and seems to be assisted greatly by reintroducing the components of the battle back into the body.

There are hundreds, even thousands of components in urine, it is a chemically fascinating substance. It is a powerful diuretic.

Quote:

---

2.3. The kidney, urinary tract and bladder

Substantial quantities of H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub>, at concentrations sometimes exceeding 100 micro-M can be detected in freshly voided human urine, even in babies. The H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> detected in human urine appears to arise, at least in part, by superoxide radical-dependent auto-oxidation of urinary molecules, some of which originate from diet. Traces of superoxide dismutase are present in urine: this enzyme, as well as the acidic pH of urine, should facilitate both enzymic and non-enzymic dismutation of superoxide radicals to H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub>. The high levels of H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> that can be detected in some urine samples, strongly suggest that at least some H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> generation occurs within the bladder.

Hydrogen peroxide has an antibacterial effect and it may be that its presence at high levels in urine could be advantageous in diminishing infections of the bladder and urinary tract. Indeed, there are suggestions that H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> is involved in

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                        | modulation of renal function. Excretion of H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> may also represent a metabolic mechanism for controlling its levels in the human body, a valuable tool for assessment of 'oxidative stress'. <hr/>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 573(2/5/04 5:05 am)Reply        | Re: ha ha ha <hr/> Some curative effects would also occur because of the power of the mind to heal the body when it beleives something they imbibe may create a cure. For the first time in my life I have an abscess that doesn't seem to want to fix itself, antibiotics are helping but not curing. As a last resort I'll try this urine with watermelon method if need be and if I can stomach it. Not at that stage yet though.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1397(2/5/04 8:48 am)Reply | Re: ha ha ha <hr/> Jimmy, you should squeeze fresh garlic on the wound if it is open at all, you should apply a lot of warmth to the area, you should also eat fresh garlic. If you try the urine, you can certainly dilute it. I bet if you mixed it with some lemon you'd hardly notice. Garlic is one of the strongest antiinfectives that exist. The vitamin C would also do you good. As would cod liver oil. Also zinc. Oh, and I don't think there was a placebo effect in the case of my dog, and I forgot to mention I fixed up a mild eye infection in another dog with it (he didn't particularly appreciate it, but perhaps the vet drops would have annoyed him as well). Edited by: birdofhermes at: 2/5/04 9:14 am |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Ne Plus Ultra

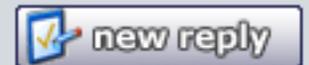

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 582(2/5/04 10:45 am)Reply | Re: ha ha ha<hr/> I'll try the garlic, VitC and zinc - otherwise I have to see a surgeon and spend a few days in hospital. Most of the time it isn't open as such. |

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 257(1/25/04 12:14 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Jesus. Wasn't the misogyny enough? I was being no more than suggestive in response to a previous point. Perhaps there is reason to debate it? If i have unearthed significant attachments then that may well be the case. After all, do we want to become like Ne Plus Ultra? However, i currently only see reason for me to have made the points i did, in order to put a crack in any barriers that people might have about discussing it. 'Correctness', whether of the political/cultural variety or some other, is not the province of the sage. The truth cannot bend to convention. Rhett |

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 78

(1/25/04 12:19 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

African and Australian peoples have shamanic traditions which exist for no other purpose than communing with "ultimate reality." For you to suggest that entire races of people have no interest in 'enlightenment' because they do not visit this site is beyond absurd. It is both ethnocentric and egocentric in the extreme.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2117

(1/25/04 1:13 pm)

Reply

----

---

Kevin and David think that women should be more masculine physically, ie. less beautiful. I think Rhett thinks this also. Rhett?

Also, you really don't think there have been/will be sagacious black men?

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 30

(1/25/04 1:23 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

But I perceived his secondary motivation, accomplished with aplomb, was to show the constraints that one's egotistical attachments apply to one's thinking and one's reactions, and the fact that exceptional IQ has no effect on this equation whatsoever.

---

To which even I am willing to admit is to his credit. However, I don't think that QRS are as enlightened as they think they are because I believe that their views on women are not based on fact, but on their own attachments ie biases. Hence, they are misogynists. I don't mean that they go around harming women or anything like that. I think that they actually think that they are helping women become enlightened by trying to get them to think more like men. I just think that they are being misguided and fool-hardy by thinking that. Given David's mindset, is it any surprise that it happened the way it did? Hell, it could have happened exactly the same way at any social club where the general populace have normal IQs.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 11:00 am

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 460

(1/25/04 1:33 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I'm rather curious about Coyote's motivation.

Did he recognise the insular nature of that forum and was he just stirring up the pot?

Was he trying to change David or them?

Does David respect Coyote as a philosopher?

Is it possible that they closed the forum because a certain member pointed out the fact that they themselves were arguing in a closed manner and they've closed it while they discuss this amongst themselves? Unlikely though this may be.

---

With regard to me being a 'devotee' of the QRS, I'm aware that this is something I need to be watchful of. For some time I've been wondering if I've been thinking in some sort of rote fashion, but have recently decided that what is actually impacting on me most is more about increasing noticing that their theories are being confirmed by what I see in society, than any respect for them as persons. Much of the respect that I have for them relates to their non-attachment.

This excludes the finer points about the value of Ultimate Reality v's science as discussed by David and argued by NPU, which I presently do not have the capacity to determine either way. So I have a similar view to Dave Toast in that regard.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 80

(1/25/04 1:36 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

For what it's worth, high-IQ societies are pretty much rubbish across the board. Despite being well-qualified, I've never bothered to apply for one. I would likely not respond to an invitation from one. For the most part, It is a bunch of people who imagine themselves to be inherently superior based on their intelligence level. Then again, QRS is a bunch of people who believe themselves superior based on their philosophical worldview, but to be honest, that isn't as annoying as the high-IQ group. At least QRS had to put in some intellectual effort and independent thought to arrive at thier position. The high-IQ brats are the intellectual equivalent of petualnt rich kids born with a silver spoon in their mouth. They can keep such childish vanities.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 80

(1/25/04 1:46 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Jimhaz said of QRS:

Quote:

---

Much of the respect that I have for them relates to their non-attachment.

---

What non-attachment? The only evidence that I personally have seen of non-attachment has been in Dan, and only to a certain extent. The others, and particularly David, seem quite highly attached to their own ideas. In fact, I'd wager that David is the least open-minded individual on this board. This isn't an "insult David" type of thing, it's just a confirmation of what I see as obvious. QRS, for the most part, are hardly practitioners of non-attachment, although they prescribe it for others readily enough. Since non-attachment in the extreme sense is a fairly ludicrous position in any case, it's probably for the best that QRS set an example of being unable to practice it. Total non-attachment, after all, is equivalent to death.

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 32

(1/25/04 1:52 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Then again, QRS is a bunch of people who believe themselves superior based on their philosophical worldview, but to be honest, that isn't as annoying as the high-IQ group.

---

I couldn't agree with you more.

Quote:

---

At least QRS had to put in some intellectual effort and independent thought to arrive at their position.

---

Yes, you have to give them kudos for that. I must also add here that they never once resorted to deleting any of my posts or attempted to kick me out of this forum despite some of the not so flattering posts I've made with regards to their views. They've certainly passed my test and are a far cry from Ne Plus Ultra.

Quote:

---

The high-IQ brats are the intellectual equivalent of petulant rich kids born with a silver spoon in their mouth. They can keep such childish vanities.

---

Now you said a mouthful. In fact, they're not all bad and some are actually quite humble and down to earth. Those that have a superiority complex and/or stunted emotional growth unfortunately make the whole lot look bad.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/4/04 9:54 am

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 33
(1/25/04 1:55 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

removed

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 10:54 am

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 81
(1/25/04 2:00 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Well, there are exceptions to every generalization, of course.

As for QRS integrity, it is actually pretty decent as far as board operations are concerned. I also have never had a post deleted or a threat of banning made, despite referring to David as a "kook" on one occasion, as well as some similar remarks. Actually, they seem to take that sort of thing rather well, which does speak favorably about their maturity level. In the area of fair and reasonable conduct, there is actually quite a bit to be said for them.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1325
(1/25/04 2:03 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Well, I'm somewhere in chapter 5 I believe and I have to turn in for the night. I don't understand at all why those folks are starting to get upset (haven't gotten to the misogyny yet). This was a direct hit:

Quote:

---

David: The priestliness of your attitude also shines through in something you said earlier:

Quote:

AB: I am a CTMU devotee. I believe that there are certain universal truths. Unlike you, I know that science is a bridge between our everyday existence to the core arguements.

David: This is like the pope saying that he is the intermediary between the human race and God, and that no one can approach God without going through him. With an attitude like this, it is no wonder that you have forgotten how to defend your core beliefs with reason.

---

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                       | I certainly hope David will start to behave badly tomorrow, as it is most confusing to me when I find myself in agreement with him, and it hardly should bode well for his own confidence. You guys are sugar coating the misogyny. QRS misogyny is the most extreme and dangerous this world has ever produced, and the only reason they have not harmed women is that they have not the power. I'd feel safer under the Taliban. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2120(1/25/04 2:06 pm)Reply    | --- <hr/> They ban people to this forum Nateryl. 'Notsure7' was banned from this site. Also, the original genius forum and everything on it just disappeared. I had already cut up Dan and David there with my posts on 'Beauty'.                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2121(1/25/04 2:15 pm)Reply    | ---- <hr/> I disagree about the misogyny of "QRS" Anna, and I have not found Dan to be a misogynist, though he does have prejudices though about 'americans' which cannot be said to be philosophical. They are all far too laughable. Their concern is not for the highest individuals of both sexes and their conception, but for perversions such as 'Ultimate Reality' 'Absolute truth' 'Pure reason' etc. etc.                |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 35(1/25/04 2:18 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> QRS misogyny is the most extreme and dangerous this world has ever produced, and the only reason they have not harmed women is that they have not the power. I'd feel safer under the Taliban. <hr/> Bull. It's easy for you to say that now in the comfort of living in a free and democratic state with all your rights and freedoms. God, the stuff people type sometimes.      |

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 81

(1/25/04 2:52 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I agree that Bird went a bit far. Still, she has a point in that if QRS misogyny were widely accepted, other individuals would act on it. I don't get the sense that QRS themselves would take any direct action to harm women even if they had the power, but someone else who adopted their views very well might. If QRS thinking regarding women had widespread influence, it would only be a matter of time before some misguided but 'well-meaning' leader or government initiated a "final solution to the female problem." It is definitely not safe to promote such ideas, and Bird is not without reason in her concern.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 463

(1/25/04 2:59 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Naturyl: What non-attachment?

Well I agree we can't be completely detached from emotions, but the more you are detached from them the more you are likely to become attached to wisdom. It is their attachment to wisdom which directs their lives, rather than interrelationship emotions, and I view that as a good thing for those who think deeply (but not for all). Look what high IQ's do to those who remain completely attached to emotions - they can't see outside their box.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 775

(1/25/04 3:13 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Naturyl: If QRS thinking regarding women had widespread influence, it would only be a matter of time before some misguided but 'well-meaning' leader or government initiated a "final solution to the female problem." It is definitely not safe to promote such ideas, and Bird is not without reason in her concern.

Perhaps that is why they have labeled it 'dangerous thought'?!

Thomas

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 464

(1/25/04 3:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I think the truth is that the QRS harm us all, male and female, and that is why they are not misogynists. As an aside mental harm to me is little different to physical harm.

However, it is harm we accept by coming here. The choice is always ours. We come here because we are drawn to some at least some aspects of thier wisdom, even Thomas, who has made it his goal to fight against them, supposedly for the sake of others.

I find their harm to be acceptable and required because of the potentiality of the human race to make it's own destruction using science. Science without the application of philosophical wisdom is ultimately more harmful to the human race as we can see by our destruction of our environment. The same applies to Paul's and Suergaz's views about love being the answer to this dilemma. Love requires us to retain all the other conflicting emotions, and these other conflicting emotions end up defeating love.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/25/04 3:15 pm

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 775

(1/25/04 3:27 pm)

Reply

Re: The closed system

---

Kevin: It is a very serious thing to accuse someone of misogyny.

I don't make accusations; I am only stating the obvious, and that's hardly libel. It seems that most participants and observers here seem to agree with my description.

Kevin: Your claim of "hatred of women" needs be backed up with evidence.

Well, nothing could be easier than that. For supporting quotes please look up the 'misogynist' thread.

Thomas

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 465
(1/25/04 3:31 pm)
Reply

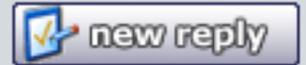

Re: ----

I neglected to say what that harm is. It is that their theology makes us reflect more deeply on our relationships with others, causing us a degree of emotional turmoil. Much of this turmoil is indirect. They increase the degree our non-acceptance of societies/loved ones irrationality, resulting in rejection from others that do not understand this viewpoint.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Naturyl  Registered UserPosts: 84(1/25/04 3:34 pm)Reply  | Re: Ne Plus Ultra <hr/> For the record, I'm only a short way into chapter two, and I'm ready to fully agree with whoever pointed out that Andrew Beckwith seems to have no business in any an 'elite' group. The man is not particularly bright by any standards, much less those of intellectual elitism. What he is doing there is a mystery to me, David beats him up with ease. The poster known as M, however, is far more substantial. I'm assuming that there will be others like 'M' joining the fray, although Bird seems to feel that David is still fending them off well into page five. I'm wondering when I'm going to see something impressive from this group. So far, I'm getting the idea that David may be right in characterizing them as hysterics who ran him off in a fit. |

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 85

(1/25/04 3:45 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Jimhaz -

Well, in the sense that QRS 'hurt people' by making them examine themselves and their relationships, we can hardly fault them, lest we be like the ignorant mob who demanded Socrates' death for similar reasons. If that was all they did, I really couldn't object. Unfortunately, I don't think that they are entirely Socratic - they want to undermine not only things that people hold dear, but things that are mandated by Nature itself. Male/female differences in thinking are an expression of the yin/yang universal dialectic, and are not going away just because some of us may not like one aspect or the other. In short, they want to make things 'better' (from their point of view) than they actually can be - entangling them in a Quixotic effort from which little good can ultimately come.

In Zen, the importance of abandoning the concept of 'improvement' is stressed. People are forever trying to 'improve' things that they haven't any business tampering with. Obviously, this does not mean that we neglect necessary upkeep, but it does mean that we don't try to overextend ourselves in a fit of hubris. Nature is very unconcerned with our whims and will ensure that most attempts at 'improvement' end in frustration.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 181

(1/25/04 3:47 pm)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

I think the truth is that the QRS harm us all, male and female, and that is why they are not misogynists. As an aside mental harm to me is little different to physical harm.

---

I agree with that.

Although I don't agree with all "Truths" they describe, especially (but not only) the ones about women, I do think they have a few good ideas about the nature of the universe. In my opinion, the harm comes from the spiritual path they propose. It can falsify us in our own motives.

Quote:

---

The same applies to Paul's and Suergaz's views about love being the answer to this dilemma. Love requires us to retain all the other conflicting emotions, and these other conflicting emotions end up defeating love.

---

And I disagree with that. Yes, love requires us to retain emotions, but they are not necessarily conflicting nor need to defeat love. I don't say it's a solution to any dilemma though, because I have no pretensions of saving the world. There's no dilemma for me.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 86

(1/25/04 4:04 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

It can falsify us in our own motives.

---

So can most versions of Buddhism, which is clearly the chief inspiration behind QRS worldview. It is my belief that Buddhism is somewhat dangerous in this sense. Some insightful students, like Thomas, have the wherewithal to interpret Buddhism in terms appropriate for Western consumption. Most interpretations, however, manage to sooner or later run counter to the Western spirit at a fundamental level and can therefore lead us to delusion rather than genuine enlightenment. The Eastern and Western mindsets, like those of men and women, have genuine differences, and often what is sustenance to one is poison to the other. For Westerners, non-attachment is non-existence rather than Nirvana. If we try to train ourselves to seek it too forcefully, we will, as Rairun put it, "falsify ourselves in our own motives." I haven't been able to express myself as well as I would have liked in this post, but I trust that the insightful among us will be able to discern my meaning in spite of my poor communication.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 466

(1/25/04 4:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

we can hardly fault them, lest we be like the ignorant mob who demanded Socrates' death for similar reasons.

Agree, there is no fault and they do warn people in the introduction to the forum. They do what they do and the fact that people are curious and ignore that warning is not their fault.

they want to undermine not only things that people hold dear, but things that are mandated by Nature itself. Male/female differences in thinking are an expression of the yin/yang universal dialectic, and are not going away just because some of us may not like one aspect or the other. In short, they want to make things 'better' (from their point of view) than they actually can be

In Zen, the importance of abandoning the concept of 'improvement' is stressed. People are forever trying to 'improve' things that they haven't any business tampering with. Obviously, this does not mean that we neglect necessary upkeep, but it does mean that we don't try to overextend ourselves in a fit of hubris. Nature is very unconcerned with our whims and will ensure that most attempts at 'improvement' end in frustration.

I cannot agree with this.

As a species, to me evolution is the main determinant, not yin and yan. Evolution has more power. Presently males are becoming more female and females a more masculine - where is the yin and yan in that. We are beginning to overcome yin and yang. This is occurring as a result of our increasing ability to influence the environment. Although evolution theory concerns itself with the physical, I view minds as just a manifestation of the physical and therefore scientific advances are a result of evolution - science is empirical trail and error resulting in improvement via the survival of the fittest theories.

Where do we go from here? For me it is to make us into gods, using science. In a way Godliness is the complete removal of yin and yang.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 467
(1/25/04 4:21 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

In Zen, the importance of abandoning the concept of 'improvement' is stressed.

Yes, but probably only so as to gain a sense of contentment by containing the destructive emotions. It is the destructive emotions/instincts such as greed, envy and hate that create evolutionary improvements, so by containing these in individuals contentment occurs as desires are held in bay. That is OK for individuals but it is a dead end in terms of improving the human race.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 422
(1/25/04 4:26 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

jimhaz, are you a genius?
I'm not, so I'm asking you.

Godliness = One.
Followed by:
Woman and man = One.

Cheap talk maybe, but it's Ultimate Reality. Truth.

?

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 468
(1/25/04 5:45 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Paul, No I'm not. Nor do I ever think I'll be a genius as described by QRS.

Nor do I consider myself to be a particularly great thinker. At the same time I often feel I can cut to the heart of a matter. I think this is because my brain is not encumbered by other, mostly irrelevant things. I have been single for a long time, so I have head start over most people in detaching myself from the emotional aspects of a concept. On the downside, being single has also meant that I have a suit of attachments of a solitary nature.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 285

(1/25/04 8:45 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

birdofhermes wrote:

Quote:

---

QRS misogyny is the most extreme and dangerous this world has ever produced, and the only reason they have not harmed women is that they have not the power. I'd feel safer under the Taliban.

---

Here is an interesting snippet of information, which readers can do with what they will:

Despite the fact that I am, supposedly, one of the most extreme "haters of women" (ie, misogynists) the world has ever known, for some reason none of the women in my life have been able to detect it. And these women are not themselves "haters of women", who would, presumably, agree with my views, but are ordinary, everyday women, of the kind you would meet anywhere. Even though these women have the astounding intuitive abilities we all know, with which they can read a person's body language, and perceive their unspoken feelings, still they cannot detect this hatred that I am supposed to have, and nor do they detect that I have "walls-up" with regard to them.

Many women who know me say that I am "the exact opposite of a misogynist". Some of these women say that I have "too much respect for women", and that I should not hold women's opinions in as high a regard as I do (and which I do on principle), and which leads me to lend women's views such great significance.

Never in my daily life (daily, or at any other time!) have I tried to restrict a woman's freedom, and in fact, I have always pushed to increase women's freedom to determine their own lives. I have only ever encouraged women to think for themselves and do as they please. I never treat a woman as inferior just because she is, supposedly, a woman.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 285
(1/25/04 9:08 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

They ban people to this forum Natyryl. 'Notsure7' was banned from this site.

---

I'm Notsure about that. Perhaps Dan can respond if he's reading this.

Quote:

---

Also, the original genius forum and everything on it just disappeared. I had already cut up Dan and David there with my posts on 'Beauty'

---

Most of the older posts can still be found in the "Archives" section of the forum. The oldest messages were lost when Ezboard did a major system upgrade, and deleted them. We didn't want them to be deleted, but we didn't have any control over it.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 40
(1/26/04 5:17 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

*

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 10:56 am

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 41
(1/26/04 5:19 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

*

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 11:02 am

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 260

(1/26/04 11:07 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

African and Australian peoples have shamanic traditions which exist for no other purpose than communing with "ultimate reality."

How can they commune with reality since they don't experience it Truthfully?

For you to suggest that entire races of people have no interest in 'enlightenment' because they do not visit this site is beyond absurd. It is both ethnocentric and egocentric in the extreme.

The interactions that i have had with such people - throughout my whole life - have led me from a base assumption of equality, to an opinion that they are indeed, in a *general* sense, more feminine minded than average. Both males and females.

Think about the current situation in Zimbabwe. Think about the situation in Africa generally. Think about the situation in America. Think about Papua New Guinea. Just to name a few.

Think about the Aus Aborigines; reading reports from the early days of colonial settlement, the Aborigines were regularly having duals with spears. Have those base characteristics changed? A 'pack' of Aboriginal youths passed me a little while ago. They were a black pall of suffering, constant ego oscillations and power games with each other, incredible insecurity and mob mindedness. Despite the white invasion, they've had a lot of support to develop lives for themselves, but still seem to fail to adapt to life in a (slightly) more rational and civilised society. Despite what i say, it's obvious whites did stuff up their lifestyle (which certainly had a number of good points), so i value the best for them.

I worked with a black american for a while, and at the age of 42 he was still attached to constant sex, alcohol, and his appearance in very much the same manner as a 20 year old commonly is.

Kevin and David think that women should be more masculine physically, ie. less beautiful. I think Rhett thinks this also. Rhett?

What is 'beauty' - but an egotistical attachment to particular forms in nature?

I'm oblivious to notions of beauty/ugly. To think that people would label so few things beautiful, and thus render the remainder of their experiences as wanting...it's totally illogical, counterproductive.

Also, you really don't think there have been/will be sagacious black men?

I think they - generally speaking - may find it a little harder than others.

Rhett

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1329

(1/26/04 3:30 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Suergaz: 'Notsure7' was banned from this site. Also, the original genius forum and everything on it just disappeared. I had already cut up Dan and David there with my posts on 'Beauty'. I disagree about the misogyny of "QRS" Anna, and I have not found Dan to be a misogynist, Notsure was banned because it was like trying to talk above a cacophany of snarling bulldogs. I'd like to know what you said, (and if you actually did say anything). Beauty is one aspect of their misogyny I've been thinking of. I don't know how you can disagree that they are misogynists, or what that word means to you. I don't see why several people have voted Dan the least misogynistic. I hereby rehabilitate him to full status. Kevin appears the mildest, but that may be a matter of personal style.

Krussell: Bull. It's easy for you to say that now in the comfort of living in a free and democratic state with all your rights and freedoms. God, the stuff people type sometimes.

I'm disappointed you think I would make such a statement without having given it a lot of thought. See below.

Naturyl: I agree that Bird went a bit far. Still, she has a point in that if QRS misogyny were widely accepted, other individuals would act on it. I don't get the sense that QRS themselves would take any direct action to harm women even if they had the power, but someone else who adopted their views very well might. If QRS thinking regarding women had widespread influence, it would only be a matter of time before some misguided but 'well- meaning' leader or government initiated a "final solution to the female problem." It is definitely not safe to promote such ideas, and Bird is not without reason in her concern.

This is exactly what I meant, and I fear it so much that I have never before articulated it. The evil eye, you know. It wasn't so much when David mentioned it being a good idea to strangle female infants at birth that I felt upset, but when he said that if his child had been a girl he would probably have refused to be a father to it.

When you see what the Taliban are willing to do, what could happen when men of the same mindset get scientific or political power? It matters not what they personally would do or advocate, but what might happen if by some great misfortune their writings fail to lie in obscurity and are resurrected? But it is not only the terrible harm of that case, but the things which David, at least, has advocated personally. Under Taliban women are left somewhat intact with at least hope, whereas David wants to make them extinct because he thinks he is wiser than nature.

It is all so tiring because they are simply saying the same things that men of separative and dualistic minds, battered and bruised by the evils of civilization, have been saying over and over. In one place it is the veil and clitoridectomy, in another it is special laws claiming that only testimony of witchcraft gotten under torture is valid. Now we have the modern, sanitized version. All clean and zen. Women must be shorn of being women at all, and then they may be accepted into the human race. It certainly would be a final solution.

Oh God save us from men who think they know what they are doing. The human being is so mind boggling a product of nature, and woman its most complex aspect, and they think they should redesign it out of existence.

Why can civilized man not forgive women for being women?

Naturyl: although Bird seems to feel that David is still fending them off well into page five.

I do think he is being stubborn about the explanation of reality in which our sense perceptions give us less than a full picture, but do give us hints so that we explore and find out more, such as through science.

Most interpretations, however, manage to sooner or later run counter to the Western spirit at a fundamental level and can therefore lead us to delusion rather than genuine enlightenment. The Eastern and Western mindsets, like those of men and women, have genuine differences, and often what is sustenance to one is poison to the other. For Westerners, non-attachment is non-existence rather than Nirvana.

Could you elaborate? I have tended to think it true that “wisdom is of the east” and that the oriental is superior in ultrafine sensitivities. So there’s my racist plug.

Kevin: Despite the fact that I am, supposedly, one of the most extreme "haters of women" (ie, misogynists) the world has ever known, for some reason none of the women in my life have been able to detect it. And these women are not themselves "haters of women", who would, presumably, agree with my views, but are ordinary, everyday women, of the kind you would meet anywhere. Even though these women have the astounding intuitive abilities we all know, with which they can read a person's body language, and perceive their unspoken feelings, still they cannot detect this hatred that I am supposed to have, and nor do they detect that I have "walls-up" with regard to them.

Many women who know me say that I am "the exact opposite of a misogynist". Some of these women say that I have "too much respect for women", and that I should not hold women's opinions in as high a regard as I do (and which I do on principle), and which leads me to lend women's views such great significance.

Never in my daily life (daily, or at any other time!) have I tried to restrict a woman's freedom, and in fact, I have always pushed to increase women's freedom to determine their own lives. I have only ever encouraged women to think for themselves and do as they please. I never treat a woman as inferior just because she is, supposedly, a woman.

Kevin, I’m not particularly surprised by anything above, except perhaps to wonder if these women have been privy to your opinions? You may not act the misogynist, but you certainly speak it. Have they read Weininger? You make a fool of yourself when you say Weininger can express your opinions about women. You speak far better than he.

Kevin, you are an affable fellow, with a kind and respectful demeanor toward others. This is good. But do you harbor poisonous thoughts that cannot be detected to those on the outside? I wouldn’t have thought it possible, but I knew someone like that, and oddly, he had a love-hate relationship with women.

Of course it will not be a good idea to restrict women. You have a different plan. My strength is I see patterns.

I can see that what I said made you uncomfortable, which is a good sign that you are not dead. And I do not know you so well as Dan and David, but my assessment of them, and I think you, is one of great inconsistency, willful blindness, emotional dishonesty, but most of all, a shocking and deeply saddening injustice.

You are ignorant of the nature of woman. Weininger was wrong.

Will you be insulted if I elevate you to the status of least misogynistic of QRS?

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 92

(1/26/04 3:33 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Jimhaz:

How are we moving 'beyond yin and yang?' They are representative of the universal dialectic encountered in every relative thing. The male/female dichotomy is one expression of this all-encompassing yin/yang idea. It is a universal principle. How will we 'move beyond' it?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2095

(1/26/04 4:01 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

My vote for the most amusing comment on this thread would have to go to this, by Naturyl:

Quote:

---

Well, in the sense that QRS 'hurt people' by making them examine themselves and their relationships, we can hardly fault them, lest we be like the ignorant mob who demanded Socrates' death for similar reasons. If that was all they did, I really couldn't object. Unfortunately, I don't think that they are entirely Socratic - they want to undermine not only things that people hold dear, but things that are mandated by Nature itself. Male/female differences in thinking are an expression of the yin/yang universal dialectic . . . .

---

Ha!

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 96

(1/26/04 4:27 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

And what is funny about that, David? Are you perhaps thinking that I am misunderstanding Socrates in that he would consider those things I see as universal principles as nothing more than delusions and therefore tear them apart with the same zest he reserved for other follies? Oh yes, I've considered that. I simply reject it. If you imagine that Socrates would have considered a universal principle such as yin/yang to be nothing more than another superstition held dear by the mob, I think it is you who misunderstand the great man. You laugh because you imagine that I have erred in mentioning Socrates, and that he would scorn yin/yang and its relation to the male/female issue as readily as he scorned the Greek pantheon. I think not, David.

If I've misunderstood what you were laughing at, please correct me. If, however, I have been more or less accurate in my estimation, let that be known as well.

In other news, Bird said:

Quote:

---

David mentioned it being a good idea to strangle female infants at birth

---

David said that? That is absolutely outrageous, even for him. Would you mind linking to the thread in which this remark appears? It is so mind-boggling and monstrous that it strains credulity, and you'll forgive me for needing to see for myself.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 97

(1/26/04 4:36 pm)

Reply

Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

---

I have now read all nine 'chapters' of the NPU affair. Although David did bring a certain amount of abuse on himself with his typical ridiculous remarks about women, I will agree that overall, the worst of the behavior came from NPU members. It is not inaccurate to describe the tone as 'hysterical' in the later stages of the unfortunate exchange. David recieved a good deal of verbal abuse, to which he responded quite calmly and rationally. I would have enjoyed seeing these so-called 'elites' give David a thorough trouncing, but that did not in fact occur. Instead, David 'won' a majority of the exchanges not only in terms of mature conduct, but of rational argument as well. The few points I would concede to NPU were scored only during rare moments when they abandoned their semantic gymnastics and nearly incomprehensible jargon and addressed David on his own terms. The NPU members gave, overall, a very poor account of themselves. David's essay, although insincerely apologetic and throughly unconvincing in regard to the 'women/dogs' issue, was otherwise a fairly insightful analysis.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2097

(1/26/04 4:47 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I've never said that. I think it was our resident chimp, Suergaz, who imagined that I said it.

Even if I did say it, your reaction of outrage is rather curious for somenoe who claims to be a practitioner of the Tao.

In any case, what I found funny was that, after affirming the value of QRS questioning people's emotional values, you immediately diedied your own emotional attachments in order to make them safe from our probing. It is a bit like a Christian saying, "I think it is great the way Kevin and David force people to exmaine their attachments, but they go too far when they force us to question the things that have been ordained by God - such as the Bible and the Church."

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2098
(1/26/04 4:52 pm)
Reply

Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

David's essay, although insincerely apologetic and throughly unconvincing in regard to the 'women/dogs' issue, was otherwise a fairly insightful analysis.

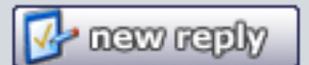

---

What does "insincerely apologetic" mean?

What do you find unconvincing about the "women/dogs" issue? Do you believe that it is impossible to have a "negative" opinion about women without hating them?

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

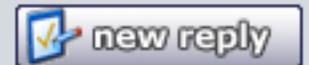

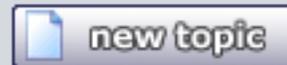

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Naturyl  Registered UserPosts: 99(1/26/04 5:00 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I've never said that. I think it was our resident chimp, Suergaz, who imagined that I said it. <hr/> I should certainly hope that is the case. It is something only a fool would have said. Quote: <hr/> Even if I did say it, your reaction of outrage is rather curious for somenoe who claims to be a practitioner of the Tao. <hr/> Why? Do you suppose that Taoism would teach us not to react appropriately against recognized threats? Do you imagine that Taoist practice would advise against censuring individuals who condone harming infants, and perhaps taking action to restrain them? I don't refer to myself as a 'Taoist,' David, but even if I did, I would be well within my rights not only to correctly label that statement 'outrageous' but even to suggest that you be investigated by civil authorities. There would be absolutely nothing un-Taoist about it. |

So, it is well that you didn't say it. You really didn't say it, right? I'd hate for a link to make a liar of you...

Quote:

---

In any case, what I found funny was that, after affirming the value of QRS questioning people's emotional values, you immediately deified your own emotional attachments in order to make them safe from our probing.

---

Piffle. I deified nothing. The yin/yang principle is universal in the sense that we observe in in all relative things, which encompasses the whole of physical existence. There is no deification whatsoever here. Probe all you like. If you think you can undermine the concept of yin/yang, have at it.

Quote:

---

It is a bit like a Christian saying, "I think it is great the way Kevin and David force people to examine their attachments, but they go too far when they force us to question the things that have been ordained by God - such as the Bible and the Church."

---

You have a habit of comparing anyone who disagrees with you to a religious fundamentalist. You've become lazy with this analogy, slapping it on anyone who appears to question you. You are painting with too broad a brush, and it will not serve you.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 100

(1/26/04 5:05 pm)

Reply

Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

---

David asked:

Quote:

---

What does "insincerely apologetic" mean?

---

In this case, it means that you give the distinct impression of having spoken your mind, then realized that you'd said something no one would put up with, and proceeded to backpedal and manufacture apologetics. I doubt that anyone really believes that you wouldn't compare women and dogs quite freely if given a sympathetic venue for such speech.

Quote:

---

What do you find unconvincing about the "women/dogs" issue? Do you believe that it is impossible to have a "negative" opinion about women without hating them?

---

No. I believe you hate them. I can see it. Everyone can see it. It's written in giant letters for anyone who has eyes to see.

[edited for typos]

Edited by: Naturyl  at: 1/26/04 5:06 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2101

(1/26/04 5:26 pm)

Reply

Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: What does "insincerely apologetic" mean?

Nat: In this case, it means that you give the distinct impression of having spoken your mind, then realized that you'd said something no one would put up with, and proceeded to backpedal and manufacture apologetics.

---

I dispute that. I really do possess a lofty indifference towards women.

Quote:

---

I doubt that anyone really believes that you wouldn't compare women and dogs quite freely if given a sympathetic venue for such speech.

---

If I thought it would promote wisdom, then I would have no hesitation in doing that in a hostile forum, such as NPU. But the fact is, I didn't do it in this instance.

In any case, even if I did compare women to dogs, it still wouldn't mean that I hate them. I sometimes compare women to cows - thus highlighting woman's sheer lack of comprehension of higher wisdom - but that is just my way of making a philosophical point in a colourful, poetic, impactful way.

Quote:

---

DQ: What do you find unconvincing about the "women/dogs" issue? Do you believe that it is impossible to have a "negative" opinion about women without hating them?

Nat: No. I believe you hate them. I can see it. Everyone can see it. It's written in giant letters for anyone who has eyes to see.

---

Well, it's certainly what you want to believe. What about dogs, then? Do you believe that when I say that dogs have no potential for wisdom, I am hating them?

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 103
(1/26/04 5:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

---

No. I do not believe that you hate dogs. You never expected anything of dogs, and they never had the chance to disappoint you so painfully.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2104(1/26/04 5:50 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco: <hr/> You never know. I might have had, as a young child, a beloved dog who died on me suddenly, or turned around and bit me when I was patting him. I could have been so traumatized by the event that I spent the next twenty years of my life seeking enlightenment and devising a lofty philosophy around my hatred of dogs. Who knows?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 106(1/26/04 5:55 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco: <hr/> Yeah, it could have turned out that way, but apparently it was women instead. Huh. The human mind is a fascinating thing.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2106(1/26/04 6:05 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco: <hr/> Or it could be that I had no real opinion on women, or any significant emotional problems with them at all, and simply strove for enlightenment because I wanted to comprehend the nature of all things - and then, bathed in its clear light, I perceived the kind of consciousness that is required to reach this great wisdom. And in so doing, began to form my present opinions on women (and men) in a lofty, dispassionate manner. Who knows? The spiritual mind is a fascinating thing.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 107(1/26/04 6:30 pm)Reply  | Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco: <hr/> Yeah, but come on. Monkeys might fly out of my ass as well. Attitudes and beliefs, unlike quantum virtual particles, have causes. Granted, everyone likes to explain their idiosyncracies in the most flattering light, but anyone who has experience with the human mind (if only by owning one) ought to nurture a healthy skepticism toward these things. Suuuure, your attitude toward women is entirely due to your spiritual enlightenment. Mmm-hmm. And my own aversion to Republicans has nothing whatsoever to do with my desire to establish a state where I and others like me could live off the socialist system, I suppose. If you believe that anyone's motivations are entirely pure, I have a bridge to sell you. Psychology just doesn't work that way. Besides, the spiritual mind would never lead one to misogyny. If you'd |

blamed it on philosophy, I might have been more sympathetic, but authentic spirituality has no place for such things.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 294

(1/26/04 7:11 pm)

Reply

Re: Regarding the Ne Plus Ultra fiasco:

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

The spiritual mind would never lead one to misogyny.

---

The following does not constitute misogyny, but you would probably think it does:

From "The sutra of the past vows of earth store bodhisattva":

Quote:

---

Buddha: "If there are women who detest the body of a woman, and who full-heartedly make offerings to Earth Store Bodhisattva's image, whether the image be a painting or made of earth, stone, lacquerware, brass, iron, or some other material, and if they do so day after day without fail, using flowers, incense, food, drink, clothing, colored silks, banners, money, jewels, and other items as offerings, when the female retribution body of those good women is exhausted, for hundreds of thousands of aeons they will never again be born in the worlds where there are women, much less be one, unless it be through the strength of their compassionate vows to liberate living beings. From the power of the meritorious virtues resulting from these offerings to Earth Store Bodhisattva, they will not receive the bodies of women throughout hundreds of thousands of tens of thousands of aeons.

---

From "The Gospel of Thomas:

Quote:

---

Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

---

Quote:

---

It is nature's law that rivers wind, trees grow wood, and, given the opportunity, women work iniquity.
- Buddha, Sutta-Pitaka

---

The Buddha, Vinaya-Pitaka

Quote:

---

Just, Ananda, as houses in which there are many women and but few men are easily violated by robber burglars; just so, Ananda, under whatever doctrine and discipline women are allowed to live the religious life, that religion will not last long. And just, Ananda, as when the disease called mildew falls upon a field of rice in fine condition, that field of rice does not continue long; just so, Ananda, under whatsoever doctrine and discipline women are allowed to live the religious life, that religion will not last long.

---

Quote:

---

Countless are woman's defects.

My elephantine mind has fallen
Into the poisonous swamp of guile.
So I must renounce the world.

- Naropa, Tibetan mystic poet

---

Quote:

---

Infatuation, aversion, fear, disgust and various kinds of deceit are ineradicable from the minds of women; for women, therefore, there is no nirvana. ... A woman may be pure in faith and even preoccupied with the study of the sutras or the practice of a terrific asceticism: yet in her case there will still be no falling away of karmic matter. - Mahavira, Tatparyavriti (Jain Scripture)

---

Quote:

---

For a woman to study the scriptures indicates confusion in the realm.

- The Mahabarata, Hindu Scripture

---

Quote:

---

A child also cannot be made a witness in a court of law, nor a woman . . . nor a cheat. . . . These persons might give false evidence. A child would speak falsely from ignorance, a woman from want of veracity, an imposter from habitual depravity.

- Hindu Scripture

---

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2126
(1/26/04 10:56 pm)
Reply

---

---

Naturyl, I have never remembered David to have said he thinks girl babies should be strangled at birth. But he did say that girl babies were disgusting.

You call me "the resident chimp"?! You're the one who looks like Dr. Zaius!

Anyone who wants the female sex to be less beautiful is a misogynist. Kevin and David are so. They cannot reply to me. They know it.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2109
(1/26/04 11:04 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

The chimpanzee wrote:

Quote:

---

Anyone who wants the female sex to be less beautiful is a misogynist

---

Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. What I find beautiful is a pure mind that thinks great truths. You are preventing women from attaining this beauty. Therefore, by your own definition, you are a misogynist.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2126
(1/26/04 11:06 pm)
Reply

---

---

In case you haven't noticed, fuck face, the most intelligent women are physically beautiful. You have spoken about making the 'feminine' form less so. Kevin agreed with your views.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2127
(1/26/04 11:13 pm)
Reply

---

---

Your kind is vanishing.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 27
(1/27/04 3:07 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

through the strength of her compassionate vows to liberate living beings she has re-shaped herself; as the alchemist she mourns over the dead carcass of man whose structure was simply too great to overcome, did she do her job too well or not good enough, hah! it matters not where the ears are placed on the head she mutters what's done is done.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 44
(1/27/04 3:36 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

This is exactly what I meant, and I fear it so much that I have never before articulated it. The evil eye, you know. It wasn't so much when David mentioned it being a good idea to strangle female infants at birth that I felt upset, but when he said that if his child had been a girl he would probably have refused to be a father to it.

---

He's quite the absentee father to the son he sired. Should tell you something right there. ie. The biggest loser on the planet.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2111
(1/27/04 7:47 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Along with the Buddha, who deserted his family to seek enlightenment, and Socrates, who left his family in extreme poverty because he thought it was more important to philosophize than work.

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 44

(1/27/04 8:37 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Along with the Buddha, who deserted his family to seek enlightenment, and Socrates, who left his family in extreme poverty because he thought it was more important to philosophize than work.

---

You are no Buddha, nor are you a Socrates. What you are is a fraud and a charlatan. In my view, you have got to be the most pathetic excuse of a human being I've ever come to know about. You talk about the need for everyone to reject femininity and embrace masculinity let you deny this to your very one son by not being a father figure to him and allowing him to become "feminized" by let his mother raise him all by herself. You are shirking your responsibilities as a father and using this so called enlightenment as an excuse. What kind of a man are you? Not only are you a misogynist but a hypocrite as well. Might I add that you are a spiritual eunuch. I take back what I said about you being a pathetic human being. You are beyond pathetic.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2114

(1/27/04 8:43 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

I like you too.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 471

(1/27/04 9:14 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Suergaz: In case you haven't noticed, fuck face, the most intelligent women are physically beautiful. You have spoken about making the 'feminine' form less so.

Your kind is vanishing.

I foresee that we will be able to make pretty well everyone beautiful, through genetic tampering and makeovers. The rich can already do this.

So what happens to the concept of beauty then?

The most intelligent women are physically beautiful

Not entirely true, although natural selection does create a propensity for them to be above average.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 902

(1/27/04 10:07 am)

Reply

Tenacious D

---

Quote:

---

Bird: David mentioned it being a good idea to strangle female infants at birth.

Nat: David said that? That is absolutely outrageous, even for him. Would you mind linking to the thread in which this remark appears? It is so mind-boggling and monstrous that it strains credulity, and you'll forgive me for needing to see for myself.

DQ: I've never said that. I think it was our resident chimp, Suergaz, who imagined that I said it.

Nat: So, it is well that you didn't say it. You really didn't say it, right? I'd hate for a link to make a liar of you...

---

Not quite a liar, but close enough. Certainly not imagined, not quite. A feminine lack of memory? I dunno.

Quote:

---

4/9/03 10:30am.

Jimhaz: So David, in a hypothetical world where you are emperor, what processes would you put into place to steer a subset of women down the path of enlightenment? Lets say the subset is the newly born daughters of highly intelligent parents.

DQ: Ideally, I would strangle them at birth and instead set in motion a world-wide genetic program which phases out womanliness altogether - from both sexes. This means that women will have to disappear completely - or at least be sufficiently modified so that they no longer possess a feminine mentality and display feminine features. Men too will have to be modified so that they have less interest in sex and emotional comfort, and more interest in values of the mind.

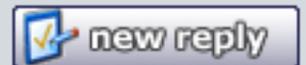

Without these genetic modifications, I believe that wisdom will always have an uphill battle to survive.

---

pub86.ezboard.com/fgeniusnewsfrm6.showMessageRange?topicID=372.topic&start=81&stop=100

Cue sophistry.

Rolling.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2132(1/27/04 10:11 am)Reply | ---- <hr/> Physical beauty and intelligence are too deeply related not to come together. It has not mattered that they have been scattered. Quote: <hr/> I foresee that we will be able to make pretty well everyone beautiful, through genetic tampering and makeovers. <hr/> You are speaking not of beauty but of dressing to ideals. Quote: <hr/> The rich can already do this. <hr/> Oh? Who?! An example jimhaz? Quote: <hr/> |

So what happens to the concept of beauty then?

---

It continues.

Quote:

---

suergaz: the most intelligent women are physically beautiful.

jimhaz; Not entirely true, although natural selection does create a propensity for them to be above average.

---

No, it is entirely true. Their beauty is most oft far from that of 'model' beauty, it is impossible to describe without love! You can discern it most readily in the face, particularly the eyes.

Edited by: suergaz at: 1/27/04 10:32 am

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2116

(1/27/04 10:28 am)

Reply

Re: Tenacious D

---

Dave Toast posted a past snippet of the forum:

Quote:

---

Jimhaz: So David, in a hypothetical world where you are emperor, what processes would you put into place to steer a subset of women down the path of enlightenment? Lets say the subset is the newly born daughters of highly intelligent parents.

DQ: Ideally, I would strangle them at birth and instead set in motion a world-wide genetic program which phases out womanliness altogether - from both sexes. This means that women will have to disappear completely - or at least be sufficiently modified so that they no longer possess a feminine mentality and display feminine features. Men too will have to be modified so that they have less interest in sex and emotional comfort, and more interest in values of the mind.

Without these genetic modifications, I believe that wisdom will always have an uphill battle to survive.

---

A tongue-in-cheek remark highlighting my view that women have virtually no chance of making any spiritual progress in our current culture of feminine worship. Any attempt by a woman to transcend her womanliness, for the sake of wisdom, will always be howled down by all and sundry - just as I am always howled down on this forum for even suggesting the possibility.

In other words, the question posed by Jimhaz has no solution until we can somehow manage to break the spell that feminine beauty has upon the human race.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2134
(1/27/04 10:59 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

A woman doesn't transcend her womanliness for the sake of wisdom David you wart. She becomes it. Likewise, a man, for the sake of wisdom, becomes the manliness that is in him. You had best transcend your womanliness for the sake of wisdom.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 45
(1/27/04 11:23 am)
Reply

Re: Tenacious D

---

Ah. Of all women, only the bearded lady can achieve enlightenment. According to Sir Quinn's warped sense of logic that is. ;)

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/27/04 12:35 pm

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 46
(1/27/04 11:33 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----

DQ: What does "insincerely apologetic" mean?

Nat: In this case, it means that you give the distinct impression of having spoken your mind, then realized that you'd said something no one would put up with, and proceeded to backpedal and manufacture apologetics.

---

DQ: I dispute that. I really do possess a lofty indifference towards women.

---

Bullshit. You do hate women. You also have an indifference to the welfare or your own child. You mention in your bio that you've been diagnosed with a personality disorder. Something clearly evident in your posts both here and at Ne Plus Ultra.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2120
(1/27/04 12:46 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Possessing a lofty indifference to women is considered a personality defect in our society.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 52
(1/27/04 12:54 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Possessing a lofty indifference to women is considered a personality defect in our society.

---

Please explain what you mean by lofty indifference.

|                                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2139(1/27/04 12:59 pm)Reply                                                                                         | Re: ---- <hr/> David, I do not call your desire to have women resemble women less and less, as opposed to more and more closely, --'lofty indifference' You may not often engage women and when you do, it is with indifference, but look at all your 'bitching' about them, and your 'bitching' in general!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2122(1/27/04 1:07 pm)Reply         | Re: ---- <hr/> Krussel wrote: Quote: <hr/> Please explain what you mean by lofty indifference. <hr/> Not depending on them for your happiness and pleasure. Not being miserable because of their absence from your life. Growing out of a need for them, much as a child grows out of his need for lego.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 261(1/27/04 1:10 pm)Reply  | Re: Tenacious D <hr/> Jimhaz: So David, in a hypothetical world where you are emperor, what processes would you put into place to steer a subset of women down the path of enlightenment? Lets say the subset is the newly born daughters of highly intelligent parents. DQ: Ideally, I would strangle them at birth and instead set in motion a world-wide genetic program which phases out womanliness altogether - from both sexes. This means that women will have to disappear completely - or at least be sufficiently modified so that they no longer possess a feminine mentality and display feminine features. Men too will have to be modified so that they have less interest in sex and emotional comfort, and more interest in values of the mind. Without these genetic modifications, I believe that wisdom will always have an uphill battle to survive. ----- A tongue-in-cheek remark highlighting my view that women have virtually no | chance of making any spiritual progress in our current culture of feminine worship. Any attempt by a woman to transcend her womanliness, for the sake of wisdom, will always be howled down by all and sundry - just as I am always howled down on this forum for even suggesting the possibility.

In other words, the question posed by Jimhaz has no solution until we can somehow manage to break the spell that feminine beauty has upon the human race.

If we can dip into the 'genetic bag of tricks' we may as well just go for big masculine minds all round, males and females, with bucketloads of abstraction capability. What woman would want to be treated as a mindless sex object, regardless of her conformity to beauty ideals, that had an infinitely big sense of existence (soul)? They just wouldn't buy it. Additionally, what big-minded-male would try to treat a big-minded-woman as merely a sex object?

And they'd all suffer so much that Ultimate Wisdom would be an overnight sellout.

Contrast this with a transition based on appearances. Look at some of the asian races, particularly the Koreans, where the males and females are already quite similar looking. Do they have reduced sexual appetities?

Rhett

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1333
(1/27/04 1:25 pm)
Reply

Re: Tenacious D

---

Quote:

---

A tongue-in-cheek remark highlighting my view that women have virtually no chance of making any spiritual progress in our current culture of feminine worship. Any attempt by a woman to transcend her womanliness, for the sake of wisdom, will always be howled down by all and sundry - just as I am always howled down on this forum for even suggesting the possibility.

In other words, the question posed by Jimhaz has no solution until we can somehow manage to break the spell that feminine beauty has upon the human race.

---

Actually, David, while it is true that I have been tested as having a highly abstract mind, your various concepts are easy enough for me, and most of them are ones I figured out on my own, or absorbed readily enough. All but the one about things disappearing when no mind views them.

But you stated on Ne Plus Ultra that scientific concepts are far easier to understand than philosophical. That is way off. Scientific ideas are far, far harder to visualize. I can't understand why they even argued some of your philosophical points, or failed to argue them. Like you said, they are simple.

I have pointed out your inconsistencies and blindnesses and prejudices any number of times. It is always those posts which are ignored. And what does this show? Why, the unconsciousness of men, of course.

BTW, I dislike Mohammed as a founder of religion because of his deplorable personal behavior, and I similarly dislike Buddha. Assuming the quotes that have occasionally been presented here are true, he has little more claim to being a great religious leader than Mohammed did. There is no excuse for what he did, re his wife and son.

What a false idea, that women have to transcend their nature to obtain wisdom. What an idiotic notion that society will hold anyone back from it. What an unconscious thing to say, that society worships women at the expense of men.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 56
(1/27/04 1:32 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

-----
Please explain what you mean by lofty indifference.
-----

Not depending on them for your happiness and pleasure. Not being miserable because of their absence from your life. Growing out of a need for them, much as a child grows out of his need for lego.

---

Granted David, I can buy into that. In fact, that being the case, I myself may have such a lofty indifference. But that, I would argue is a part of the maturation process. The constant preoccupation with sex and all its entanglements becomes less and less of a preoccupation. Does society view that as a disorder? I think that it does. You need to look at all the money spent on viagra by middle aged men who are desperatley trying to bring back the level of libido they had as young men. The real disoroder is a social one that is preoccupied with sex. That, however, does not explain why you were diagnosed with a personality disorder. When I hear those words in unison I think of "psychopathy" even though I'm sure there are other types of PD. Are you saying that you were diagnosed based on your lofty indifference?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2127

(1/27/04 1:54 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Krussel wrote:

Quote:

---

That, however, does not explain why you were diagnosed with a personality disorder. When I hear those words in unison I think of "psychopathy" even though I'm sure there are other types of PD. Are you saying that you were diagnosed based on your lofty indifference?

---

Indirectly. My diagnosis of a "schizoidal personality disorder" was made during the process of applying for a disability pension. I've always openly stated to the government that I am too busy to enter the workforce because of my philosophical vocation, saying that the cause of wisdom is too important to neglect. The government, in consultation with psychiatrists and psychologists who assessed me, decided that I was too eccentric to be considered employable and granted me the pension. "Schizoidal personality disorder" is simply a convenient category to slot eccentrics into.

The lofty indifference to women is very much a product of my life as a philosopher and also has a connection to my unwillingness to find work and develop some status within the community.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 125

(1/27/04 2:02 pm)

Reply

Re: Tenacious D

---

Quote:

---

Jimhaz: So David, in a hypothetical world where you are emperor, what processes would you put into place to steer a subset of women down the path of enlightenment? Lets say the subset is the newly born daughters of highly intelligent parents.

DQ: Ideally, I would strangle them at birth and instead set in motion a world-wide genetic program which phases out womanliness altogether - from both sexes. This means that women will have to disappear completely - or at least be sufficiently modified so that they no longer possess a feminine mentality and display feminine features. Men too will have to be modified so that they have less interest in sex and emotional comfort, and more interest in values of the mind.

Without these genetic modifications, I believe that wisdom will always have an uphill battle to survive.

---

I knew it. I knew it would be found.

Quote:

---

Ideally, I would strangle them at birth

---

Ugh. Krussell is right about you, David. You are a charlatan, a fraud, a quack, a false teacher, and a fool. Woe is you. Absurdity is you. Misfortune is you. Death of spirit is you. You have my pity, for you truly are pathetic, even though, like all wayfarers on tghe path of life, you are doing the best you can manage. Life is a tragedy sometimes. For you especially, but for all of us well, because a chain is only as strong as its weakest links. Being a naturalist, I don't pray, but I'll observe a moment of silence for you, David. As long as there are men like you, the human flag will always fly at half-mast.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 783

(1/27/04 2:07 pm)

Reply

Re: Fakes

Anna: BTW, I dislike Mohammed as a founder of religion because of his deplorable personal behavior, and I similarly dislike Buddha. Assuming the quotes that have occasionally been presented here are true, he has little more claim to being a great religious leader than Mohammed did. There is no excuse for what he did, re his wife and son.

The Buddhist quotes forwarded here earlier are basically fakes. In order to understand the true meaning of "The sutra of the past vows of earth store bodhisattva" -where the Buddha pays tribute to his mother- just type the name of the sutra into a search engine, or click through to http://www.buddhistinformation.com/sutra\_of\_the\_past\_vows\_of\_earth\_.htm.

The second citation I am not able to locate in the Vinaya Pitaka, at least not in the same translation. Perhaps it is no coincidence that they were posted without a source reference.

It seems that these texts were deliberately picked from questionable translations with the intention to create the impression that Buddhism discounts women as "not worthy". I suspect that Confucian-influenced texts have been used for this purpose, but that is just a guess. Anyone who has studied Buddhist texts will certainly dismiss the idea that Buddhism promotes a negative attitude towards women.

A couple of things are known about the historical figure Siddhartha Gautama. Among these is the fact that he created the first order of female nuns. This was certainly an extraordinary thing to do in the patriarchal Northern Indian society of the time. This is reflected in some canonical texts, such as the Culavedalla Sutta, Majjhima Nikaya 44, where the Bhikkuni Dhammadinna instructs her former husband in the Dhamma:

Translator's note: The Buddha praised Dhammadinna the nun as the foremost Dhamma teacher among his nun disciples. In this discourse she answers questions put to her by a layman -- Visakha -- who, according to the commentary, was her former husband, a merchant of Rajagaha, and a non-returner.

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rajagaha in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. Then Visakha the lay follower went to Dhammadinna the nun and, on arrival, having bowed down to her, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to her, "'Self-identification. Self-identification,' it is said, lady. Which self-identification is described by the Blessed One?"

"There are these five clinging-aggregates, friend Visakha: form as a clinging-aggregate, feeling as a clinging-aggregate, perception as a clinging-aggregate, fabrications as a clinging-aggregate, consciousness as a clinging-aggregate. These five clinging-aggregates are the self-identification described by the Blessed One."

Saying, "Yes, lady," Visakha the lay follower delighted & rejoiced in what Dhammadinna the nun had said. Then he asked her a further question: "'The origination of self-identification, the origination of self-identification,' it is said, lady. Which origination of self-identification is described by the Blessed One?"

"The craving that makes for further becoming -- accompanied by passion & delight, relishing now here & now there -- i.e., craving for sensual pleasure, craving for becoming, craving for non-becoming: This, friend Visakha, is the origination of self-identification described by the Blessed One."

(full text at <http://www.enabling.org/ia/vipassana/Archive/Suttas/C/CulavedallaSutta.html> )

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 1/27/04 4:06 pm

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 301

(1/27/04 2:43 pm)

Reply

Re: Fakes

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

The Buddhist quotes forwarded here earlier are basically fakes.

---

I can assure you that the quotes are definitely not "fakes". I have had some of them checked out by Richard Hayes (a well known Canadian Buddhist scholar) to confirm their veracity.

Here is Tripitaka Master Hsuan Huan's commentary on the quote from "The sutra of the past vows of earth store bodhisattva":

Quote:

---

Do not think that being a woman is a good thing, for being a woman involves a great deal of trouble. There are women who do not like it and always wonder why they have to be women; they want to learn what they can do about it. Through worship of Earth Store Bodhisattva these questions can be resolved.

What is the trouble involved in being a woman? Because there are people who might like to investigate this further, I will go into a bit more detail. You should not think of this as an attempt to cause women to dislike their state and leave home. If that occurred then there might be even more problems for me to deal with.

There are Five Obstructions and Ten Evils encountered by women. First we will discuss the Five Obstructions. The first is that women are not able to become the Great Brahma Lord because that position is accomplished through purity, and the body of a woman has a great many impurities. Second, women cannot become Sakra. An astute student may object that earlier we discussed the thirty-three women who became lords of the heavens. This objection is a valid one, but it should be realized that upon reaching the heavens their bodies became male, because only males can be lords of the heavens. Although Sakra has some desire remaining, that desire is quite light; women, on the other hand, are extremely libidinous and consequently cannot become Sakra.

Third, women cannot become demon kings. This is not too bad. They cannot attain this position because demons are extremely hard, solid, and firm, while women are extremely soft and weak. As soon as anything unusual comes up they are at a loss and have to seek help. Fourth, beings cannot be wise wheel-turning kings - the gold, silver, copper, and iron wheel-turning kings - as long as they have female bodies. Wise kings have hearts of great compassion and kindness; they teach people to maintain the Five Precepts and the Ten Good Deeds. Whenever women see something good occur to others, they become jealous, and this keeps them from having great compassion. Because of this basic problem, they cannot become Buddhas. Buddhas have ten thousand virtues; women have many evils. They are jealous and obstructive, and their hearts are about the size of a sesame seed.

If, however, women are able to rid themselves of jealousy, desire, weakness, defilement, and of all evils, they may become men, and so theirs is not a hopeless plight. There is, for example, the case of the dragon king's daughter. When Sariputra said that she could not become a Buddha, she took a precious gem, her most valuable and cherished possession, and offered it to the Buddha, who accepted it. She then asked Sariputra if the Buddha's acceptance of her offering was fast, and he replied that, indeed, it had been quick. "I shall become a Buddha that quickly," she said and then she became a Buddha. This is proof that women's lot is not hopeless. All they must do is resolve to cultivate courageously and they too can become Buddhas.

There are also Ten Evils that pertain to women. First, at their birth their parents are displeased. Although it is not always the case that parents are displeased at the birth of a daughter, in most societies this is the case, and a daughter starts out life by making a bad impression on her parents.

The second evil is that raising daughters is not a very interesting task. The third is that women are always afraid of people. Boys are not usually afraid, but girls almost always are. The fourth evil connected with women is that their parents undergo a great deal of worry about their daughters' marriage. In America this is not a major matter, but in most other countries parents have to give a great deal of consideration to finding good husbands for their daughters.

Once girls grow up, the fifth of the Ten Evils occurs, when they have to leave their parents alone. The sixth comes after they have been married and are in constant fear of their husbands. When a husband likes something, they are pleased, and when he is angry, they cower in terror. The seventh evil of women is the difficulty and fear of giving birth.

The eighth difficulty is that no matter what they do or say, the report gets back to their parents that they are not good. Although the good remains, it is a goodness that does not influence their parents. The ninth is that they are always controlled by their husbands and are subject to many restrictions, which, if broken, can lead to divorce.

The above nine evils apply to women in their youth. They are old when the tenth arrives and their own children and grandchildren slight them. As the proverb says, "To be old and not yet dead is to be a thief." These are only a few of the many problems involved with being a woman. To explain all of them in detail would be an unending task.

---

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1337
(1/27/04 2:44 pm)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Thanks, Thomas. for some reason, that link didn't work. I had asked you earlier, what is the difference between the concept of Atman that you said Siddhartha disagreed with, and the reincarnation of transmigration of the soul as you understand it?

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 126
(1/27/04 2:49 pm)
Reply

Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Schizoid Personality Disorder

Diagnostic Criteria

A pervasive pattern of detachment from social relationships and a restricted range of expression of emotions in interpersonal settings, beginning by early adulthood and present in a variety of contexts, as indicated by four (or more) of the following:

- 1. neither desires nor enjoys close relationships, including being part of a family
- 2. almost always chooses solitary activities
- 3. has little, if any, interest in having sexual experiences with another person
- 4. takes pleasure in few, if any, activities
- 5. lacks close friends or confidants other than first-degree relatives
- 6. appears indifferent to the praise or criticism of others
- 7. shows emotional coldness, detachment, or flattened affectivity

Differential Diagnosis:

Delusional Disorder; Schizophrenia; and Mood Disorder With Psychotic Features; Autistic Disorder; Asperger's Disorder; Personality Change Due to a General Medical Condition; symptoms that may develop in association with chronic substance use; Schizotypal Personality Disorder; Paranoid Personality Disorder; Avoidant Personality Disorder; Obsessive-Compulsive Personality Disorder.

[emphasis mine- Nat]

Source: www.mentalhealth.com/dis1/p21-pe02.html

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 480
(1/27/04 3:01 pm)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Schizoid Personality Disorder

I would not be surprised if virtually everyone who is now considered to be a major genius in a historical context and for what they did for mankind, did their **best** work when they had at least 5 of those traits, if not all.

Some of those traits may have been transient, as they were not enlightened.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 1/27/04 3:03 pm

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 128
(1/27/04 3:22 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Well, we all have issues. To be human is to be idiosyncratic to one degree or another. Still, there is a distinction between everyday neuroses and a truly disabling disorder. The line, of course, is not always clear, but it's a lot like pornography - we know it when we see it. Anyone who says the things that David says about women is suffering from a serious condition, not just the standard eccentricity that one expects of intellectuals.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 301(1/27/04 3:54 pm)Reply | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Naturyl wrote: Quote: <hr/> <ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>1. neither desires nor enjoys close relationships, including being part of a family</li><li>2. almost always chooses solitary activities</li><li>3. has little, if any, interest in having sexual experiences with another person</li><li>4. takes pleasure in few, if any, activities</li><li>5. lacks close friends or confidants other than first-degree relatives</li><li>6. appears indifferent to the praise or criticism of others</li><li>7. shows emotional coldness, detachment, or flattened affectivity</li></ol> <hr/> I would not call any of these a disability. Rather, they are more of an advantage. |

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1341
(1/27/04 3:55 pm)
Reply

Re: Tenacious D

---

Quote:

---

even though, like all wayfarers on the path of life, you are doing the best you can manage.

---

You think so too?

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 134
(1/27/04 4:04 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Of course. He is doing the best he can do. None of us ever do any differently. No one consciously chooses to adopt behaviors or beliefs which they believe are harmful to them. Even when they appear to do so, as in someone who likes to hit herself in the head with a hammer, there is always a greater perceived benefit motivating the behavior. Everyone, even the most degraded among us, is doing the best he or she is able, although this does not mean that we have no right to find certain things repulsive. All that is demanded of us is compassion, which I do have for David, as I do for all degraded beings, whether they happen to be degraded materially, physically, mentally, or (like David) spiritually.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1344
(1/27/04 4:11 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

I find this is a very rare attitude.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 786
(1/27/04 4:20 pm)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Anna: Thanks, Thomas. for some reason, that link didn't work.

Okay, I corrected that problem.

Anna: I had asked you earlier, what is the difference between the concept of Atman that you said Siddhartha disagreed with, and the reincarnation of transmigration of the soul as you understand it?

It is complex. The anatta-samsara paradox is one of the most interesting problems of Indian philosophy. It is partly explained on my website. The philosophical solution is the rejection of metempsychosis. I will address it here on another occasion.

Kevin: I can assure you that the quotes are definitely not "fakes". I have had some of them checked out by Richard Hayes (a well known Canadian Buddhist scholar) to confirm their veracity.

In this case, could you quote the precise sources?

Kevin: Here is Tripitaka Master Hsuan Huan's commentary on the quote from "The sutra of the past vows of earth store bodhisattva"...

You did it again! No source for this one either. Who the heck is Hsuan Hsuan and what do his blatherings have to do with Buddhism?

Thomas

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 137
(1/27/04 4:25 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Bird said,

Quote:

---

I find this is a very rare attitude.

---

So do I, but I believe that if we ever become truly civilized, it will eventually come to be seen as the only reasonable attitude.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2133
(1/27/04 4:46 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Kevin Solway wrote:

Quote:

---

1. neither desires nor enjoys close relationships, including being part of a family
2. almost always chooses solitary activities
3. has little, if any, interest in having sexual experiences with another person
4. takes pleasure in few, if any, activities
5. lacks close friends or confidants other than first-degree relatives

6. appears indifferent to the praise or criticism of others

7. shows emotional coldness, detachment, or flattened affectivity.

I would not call any of these a disability. Rather, they are more of an advantage.

---

Funnily enough, they're surprisingly similar to the traits of an enlightened Buddha . . . .

--

From the Dhammapada:

- For it is better to go alone on the path of life rather than to have a fool for a companion. With few wishes and few cares, and leaving all sins behind, let a man travel alone, like a great elephant alone in the forest.

- Leaving behind the path of darkness and following the path of light, let the wise man leave his home life and go into a life of freedom. In solitude that few enjoy, let him find his joy supreme: free from possessions, free from desires, and free from whatever may darken his mind.

- Cut down the forest of desires, not only a tree; for danger is in the forest. If you cut down the forest and its undergrowth, then, Bhikkhus, you will be free on the path of freedom.

- So long as lustful desire of a man for a woman, however small, is not destroyed, so long is that man in bondage, like a calf that drinks milk is to its mother.

- The sensuous pleasures of men flow everywhere. Bound for pleasures and seeking pleasures men suffer life and old age.

Men who are pursued by lust run around like a hunted hare. Held in fetters and in bonds they suffer and suffer again.

- I have conquered all; I know all, and my life is pure; I have left all, and I am free from craving. I myself found the way. Whom shall I call Teacher? Whom shall I teach?

The gift of Truth conquers all gifts. The taste of Truth conquers all sweetness. The Joy of Truth conquers all pleasures. The loss of desires conquers all sorrows.

- He who has compassion on his friends and confidential companions loses his own advantage, having a fettered mind; seeing danger in friendship let one wander alone like a rhinoceros. There is support and amusement in the midst of company, and for children there is great affection; Although wishing people well, one must wander alone like a rhinoceros. Having torn the ties, having broken the net as a fish in the water, being like a fire not returning to the burnt place, let one wander alone like a rhinoceros. They cultivate the society of others and serve them for the sake of personal advantage; friends without a motive are difficult to come by. Therefore, let one wander alone like a rhinoceros.

--

From the writings of Chuang-Tzu:

- The sages ramble in the vacancy of untroubled ease, find their food in the fields of indifference, and stand in the gardens which they had not borrowed.

- Can you become a little child?

The child will cry all the day, without its throat becoming hoarse, so perfect is the harmony of its physical constitution. It will keep its fingers closed all day without relaxing their grasp. It will keep its eyes fixed all day without their moving - so is it unaffected by what is external to it. It walks it knows not whither; it rests where it is placed, it knows not why; it is calmly indifferent to things, and follows their current. This is the regular method for guarding the life.

- A man who is deformed cares little for ornamental clothes and outward appearance. A criminal under sentence of death will ascend to any height without fear of falling. He has ceased to think of life or death. Similarly, a man who abides in the Tao does not reciprocate gifts of friendship, having forgotten "friends". When respect is shown to him it awakens no joy, and contempt awakens no anger. This man resides in Heaven.

--

From the Tao Te Ching:

- Heaven and earth are ruthless.
They see the ten thousand things as dummies.
The wise are ruthless;
They see the people as dummies.

- Heaven and earth last forever.
Why do Heaven and earth last forever?
They are unborn,
So ever living.
The sage stays behind, thus he is ahead.
He is detached, thus at one with all.
Through selfless action, he attains fulfillment.

- Give up learning, and put an end to your troubles.
Is there a difference between yes and no?
Is there a difference between good and evil?
Must I fear what others fear?
What nonsense!
Other people are contented, enjoying the sacrificial feast of the ox.
In spring some go to the park, and climb the terrace,
But I alone am drifting, not knowing where I am.
Like a newborn babe before it learns to smile,
I am alone, without a place to go.
Others have more than they need, but I alone have nothing.
I am a fool. Oh, yes! I am confused.
Other men are clear and bright,
But I alone am dim and weak.
Other men are sharp and clever,
But I alone am dull and stupid.
Oh, I drift like the waves of the sea,
Without direction, like the restless wind.
Everyone else is busy,
But I alone am aimless and depressed.
I am different.
I am nourished by the great mother.

--

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 138

(1/27/04 5:04 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Very well. "Ye shall know them by their fruits." We must ask ourselves: if there are similarities between the teachings of Quinn and those of the Buddha and Chuang Tzu, are there also similarities in the fruits they produce? Above all, and in spite of their differences in practically every other area, the sages of history preached universal compassion, one and all. This is because they understood that Oneness is experienced intuitively and emotionally (thus the term compassion), and enlightenment is beyond the grasp of the intellect. Does David, whose total reliance on intellect leads him to consider strangling infants at birth "ideal," show the same fruits as the sages? In defying every sage and proclaiming enlightenment accessible to reason, does David truly even prescribe the sagely path? Truthfully, is it likely that Lao-Tzu or the Buddha would want to be associated with David and his ilk? Each must decide for himself - did Chuang Tzu and other sages have a personality disorders, or does David? We musn't uncritically accept his comparisons with figures of spiritual authority. When the strangling of infants is advocated, it is quite clear that someone has a screw loose, so if David insists on comparing himself to the sages, we must decide if the problem is with he or with they.

Edited by: Naturyl  at: 1/27/04 5:09 pm

John

Registered User

Posts: 65

(1/27/04 5:49 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Naturyl

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

-----
This is because they understood that Oneness is experienced intuitively and emotionally (thus the term compassion), and enlightenment is beyond the grasp of the intellect. Does David, whose total reliance on intellect leads him to consider strangling infants at birth "ideal," show the same fruits as the sages?

Obviously not.

we must decide if the problem is with he or with they.

Finally it comes down to belief, QRS believe they are enlightened, others believe they are not. QRS believe that the intellect is the way, others do not.

Declaring one is enlightened is a problem - one cannot back down or accept that one's view is wrong as this would imply that one is a fraud of the highest magnitude. Also, argument from two entrenched positions never did produce agreement.

Compassion:

It is often quoted that Buddhism considers that Wisdom and Compassion must be in equal measure otherwise aberration is the result.

John

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 141

(1/27/04 5:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Clearly.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2137

(1/27/04 6:27 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

did Chuang Tzu and other sages have a personality disorders, or does David?

---

Judging by the list of symptoms you gave, and their own writings, they clearly had a personality disorder.

In recent times, Nietzsche and Kierkegaard were both regarded as mad (as in eccentric and mentally disturbed) by mainstream society during their lifetime, even though they both count among the greatest thinkers who ever lived. Along with Otto Weininger, they are still considered by many to have been sick in the head.

In older times, Jesus and Socrates were both put to death because society was outraged by their views. Society regarded them to be too reprehensible and too mentally disturbed to deserve living.

--

John wrote:

Quote:

---

It is often quoted that Buddhism considers that Wisdom and Compassion must be in equal measure otherwise aberration is the result.

---

The compassion of a wise man is very different to the compassion of ordinary people. It is the active expression of his wisdom and centres upon helping people escape the hells of samsara - even when they protest that they don't want to be helped in this way.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 142
(1/27/04 6:59 pm)
Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

---

Quote:

---

Judging by the list of symptoms you gave, and their own writings, they [the sages] clearly had a personality disorder.

---

Rubbish. I see nothing in the Lao Tzu to suggest that its author has a personality disorder, only an insightful worldview. Remember, all of this arose from your baby-strangling remark. If you can show me such a remark in the writings of Lao Tzu (or the others), I will be convinced.

Quote:

---

In recent times, Nietzsche and Kierkegaard were both regarded as mad (as in eccentric and mentally disturbed) by mainstream society during their lifetime, even though they both count among the greatest thinkers who ever lived. Along with Otto Weininger, they are still considered by many to have been sick in the head.

---

Otto Weininger was sick in the head, David. He blew his own head off at the age of 21. And Nietzsche, as I'm sure you know, spent his final years in an insane asylum. In any case, Weininger was a charlatan. His work is so disjointed and incoherent that it is practically unreadable. When deciphered, it is rubbish.

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Naturyl  Registered User Posts: 143 (1/27/04 7:02 pm) Reply | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> Wow, a post that begins and ends with the word "rubbish." I love that word. It's just a hell of a lot of fun to say.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Lbartoli Registered User Posts: 321 (1/27/04 7:10 pm) Reply                                                                                 | Ultimate Reality IS <hr/> Hi folks. Im going to post a few sections from jj van der Leeuw's book The Conquest of Illusion. For those with the eyes to see the significance to discussions here will be obvious. Leo ps BTW, the book is back in print! I'll let you know... We shall presently see the meaning of the terms good and evil in the world of relativity, where they not only have a profound significance, but in which they are a very real experience for every one of us. At present, however, we are considering the problem in the light of ultimate Reality and there neither good nor evil have meaning; they are not ultimate realities. We find many who are willing to accept that evil is not an ultimate reality; we have already discussed the philosophical platitude of saying that evil is but the absence of good. But there are few who in the quest of ultimate Reality are able to relinquish entirely their anxious clinging to the world of relativity; they will recognize that evil has no objective existence, but surely, they say, good has a real and objective existence, do we not speak of God Himself as good, the supreme Good indeed ? Would not our whole life, the entire moral structure of our social order collapse when we no longer recognize the ultimate reality of the Good? If we fear to take leave of the familiar features of our world's image we had better not embark on the quest of reality. Ultimate Reality is not conditioned by any results which we may right or wrongly fear for ourselves or the social order in which we live, ultimate Reality is. And in this Reality nothing is good as little as anything is evil; if we wish to call this absolute and ultimate reality 'God ' then we certainly cannot say that this God is good. We can only apply the word `good ' to beings or things in the world of the relative; thus we can speak of the Deity of a solar system as being good, He to us is indeed the supreme Good, of Him we can say that He is Love, Goodness, and whatever other qualifications we may use in attempting to |

describe the supreme Being for this our universe in the world of relativity. But none of these terms can ever apply to absolute Reality, the Absolute is truly ` beyond good and evil.' To think of ultimate Reality as ` good ' is as unphilosophical as to think of it as ` spiritual,' it is neither the one nor the other, it is That which to us appears as matter or spirit, good or evil.

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 322

(1/27/04 7:13 pm)

Reply

jj van der Leeuw

---

In the practice of life the knowledge gained in the world of Reality means equanimity with regard to our own fate, compassion for the fate of others. Here again the intellect, in its inability to comprehend reality, will misinterpret and misunderstand that which it cannot contain. Thus it will say, ` if justice is but an illusion of the separate self there is no longer any necessity for justice in daily life; since all are one I can treat my fellowmen badly and take all I can for myself, since my advantage is theirs too in the unity of all and their sorrow is mine. Thus I do no more wrong when I kill my neighbor in order to rob him as when I give him the best I have.' To the intellect this may seem but a logical conclusion from the experience of reality, yet it is but a distortion of truth, such as the illusion&#8209;bound intellect always makes.

The fact that in the world of the Real we share the joys and sorrows of all creatures just as they share ours in no wise means that it therefore does not matter how we treat our fellowmen. On the contrary the only way in which we can interpret our realization of unity in the world of the relative is through love for all creatures; just as any unkind or hurtful action is a denial of the Reality in which all are one, so are self&#8209;sacrifice, love for all that lives and service of our fellowmen the expression in the world of relativity of that supreme Reality which can never be fully expressed here, the utter unity of all that is. Love, indeed, is the nearest approach to Reality we can find in the world of the relative, in love alone does man conform to his being in the world of the Real.

Love is more than justice; ` an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth ' is justice indeed, love is to forgive those that persecute us and to do good to them that hate us. The law of Moses expresses justice, the law of Christ expresses love; justice is the demand of those bound in the world of illusion, love the joy of those who know Reality.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 323
(1/27/04 7:15 pm)
Reply

jj van der Leeuw

---

We have seen in a previous chapter that the universe appearing around us is the image produced in our consciousness by ultimate Reality. When we dissociate this worldimage from the consciousness which produced it, when we externalize it and make of it an objective, outside world, entirely apart from our consciousness, we create a gulf which separates our objectivated world from the consciousness that produced it and in that separation we produce the problem of the relation of two apparently separate things--the material universe around us and our consciousness within. That apparent duality then becomes the basis of our dual universe and on that basis are erected the different questions and answers concerning it.

But in philosophy we have no right to accept as sacrosanct any problem which our intellect or our daily experience imposes upon us; on the contrary, it is our duty first to analyze and study the problem and see whether or not error and illusion have crept into the problem itself. We do but compromise ourselves when we attempt to answer a problem which has in it the element of error, we must first purify it of that error and then we may find it possible to approach reality.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 146
(1/27/04 7:16 pm)
Reply

Otto Weininger, kook.

---

Quote:

---

Weininger's writings were used by Nazi propaganda; Adolf Hitler is reported to have said something to the effect of "There was only one decent Jew, and he killed himself."

---

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Otto\_Weininger

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2139

(1/27/04 7:21 pm)

Reply

Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

I see nothing in the Lao Tzu to suggest that its author has a personality disorder, only an insightful worldview.

---

I think your insight into the Tao is limited, and you don't really appreciate the sheer radicalness of Lao-Tzu's message.

While he shied away from being too controversial, he did give a lot of hints about the radical nature of the Tao.

For example:

The wise student hears the Tao and practices it diligently.

The average student hears of the Tao and gives it thought now and again.

The foolish student hears of the Tao and laughs aloud.

If there were no laughter, the Tao would not be what it is.

This indicates that Lao Tzu knew that genuine followers of the Tao appear as laughable fools to the average person.

Following on from this:

Hence it is said: The bright path seems dim;

Going forward seems like retreat;

The easy way seems hard;

The highest Virtue seems empty;

Great Purity seems sullied;

This indicates that Lao Tuz knew that following the Tao is highly offensive to most people.

And so on. There are hints like this scattered throughout the Tao Te Ching.

Quote:

---

Remember, all of this arose from your baby-strangling remark.

---

I don't think so. There is something deeper going on. I have the impression that you are on the verge of a personal crisis.

Quote:

---

If you can show me such a remark in the writings of Lao Tzu (or the others), I will be convinced.

---

Again, he only hints at this sort of thing. For example:

Heaven and earth are ruthless.

They see the ten thousand things as dummies.

The wise are ruthless;

They see the people as dummies.

This indicates that Lao Tzu placed far greater value on truth than he did on humans and easily perceived their lack of inherent existence.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 324
(1/27/04 7:28 pm)
Reply

grow up

---

Incidentally, I have met David Quinn, and i can tell you he is very distant from the negative characterizations that are being touted in ignorance here. All i see here are ego's damaged by truth and striking out mindlessly. Most of you havent the slightest idea what you're talking about with your chronic misjudgments. My suggestion- attend to your wounds and when you are strong enuf to accept Truth unconditionally then come on back and try to make something of yourselves, something excellent.

Leo

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 325
(1/27/04 7:31 pm)
Reply

jj van der Leeuw

The awakening to the mystery of life is a revolutionary event; in it an old world is destroyed so that a new and better one may take its place, and all things are affected by the change. We ourselves have become mysterious strangers in our own eyes and tremblingly we ask ourselves who we are, whence we came, whither we are bound. Are we the being who is called by our name, whom we thought we knew so well in the past? Are we the form we see in the mirror, our body, offspring of our parents? Who, then, is it that feels and thinks within us, that wills and struggles, plans and dreams, that can oppose and control this physical body which we thought to be ourselves? We wake up to realize that we have never known ourselves, that we have lived as in a blind dream of ceaseless activity in which there was never a moment of self recollection.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 326(1/27/04 7:50 pm)Reply | disgusting trick <hr/> It's quite amazing if you think about it. This planet is populated by billions of people who are sure their interpretation of the World is dead on, ultimately true and beyond question, but in Reality we are all mistaken! Furthermore, hardly anyone gives serious question to their reality. If these people had even the tiniest hint that they were totally spell-bound, that their experience is fully inconsistent with Reality, they would be absolutely shocked to have lived so long falsely, tricked, and would abandon the disgusting trick for the excellence and freedom of the life which is their birthright. Perhaps such an advanced world is out there even now, floating somewhere in the cosmos. Leo |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 327(1/27/04 7:53 pm)Reply | Book, Conquest of Illusion <hr/> The full text, here:home.earthlink.net/~grhar...nquest.htm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 303
(1/27/04 8:34 pm)
Reply

Re: Otto Weininger, kook.

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

Weininger's writings were used by Nazi propaganda; Adolf Hitler is reported to have said something to the effect of "There was only one decent Jew, and he killed himself."

---

You are revealing your true colours, Naturyl, in reducing yourself to this mud-slinging. The above says nothing about Weininger, and everything about yourself.

Did you know that the Nazis banned Weininger's books because Weininger encouraged women to think for themselves, and implored women to determine their own future?

Also, it doesn't look good the way you "fault-find" in great men who have achieved a lot more than you can dream of (such as Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, and Weininger).

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/27/04 9:01 pm

ChrisSaik
Registered User
Posts: 83
(1/28/04 3:10 am)
Reply

heh

---

I don't know which is worse, the thread over on that board, or the reaction to that thread here.

I do commend you, David, for your efforts. They do not go unnoticed by all.

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 57

(1/28/04 3:24 am)

Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Quote:

---

Indirectly. My diagnosis of a "schizoidal personality disorder" was made during the process of applying for a disability pension. I've always openly stated to the government that I am too busy to enter the workforce because of my philosophical vocation, saying that the cause of wisdom is too important to neglect. The government, in consultation with psychiatrists and psychologists who assessed me, decided that I was too eccentric to be considered employable and granted me the pension. "Schizoidal personality disorder" is simply a convenient category to slot eccentrics into.

---

This is quite intriguing and very telling. It suggests that you are living off the masses by feigning insanity. I've got to hand it to you. You're quite clever. In fact I've never doubted that and now you have clearly demonstrated what a charlatan you are with this information. Thank you so much.

Quote:

---

The lofty indifference to women is very much a product of my life as a philosopher and also has a connection to my unwillingness to find work and develop some status within the community.

---

Well, of course. You got it made. There you are living off the backs of your countryman so you don't have to work and are free to preach your egocentric philosophy. Surely, that is status enough for you.

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 1/28/04 4:29 am

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2140
(1/28/04 7:42 am)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Krussell wrote:

Quote:

---

This is quite intriguing and very telling. It suggests that you are living off the masses by feigning insanity.

---

You misunderstand. I really do value wisdom to an extreme extent, and such a valuing of wisdom really is considered to be a form of madness in our society.

Quote:

---

You got it made. There you are living off the backs of your countryman so you don't have to work and are free to preach your egocentric philosophy.

---

Encouraging people to become more rational in all aspects of their lives is my contribution to society, for which I get seriously underpaid.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 58
(1/28/04 8:38 am)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Quote:

---

Encouraging people to become more rational in all aspects of their lives is my contribution to society, for which I get seriously underpaid.

---

Cry me a river.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1617

(1/28/04 9:35 am)

Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Re: banning people from this forum...

I have never had and will never have any compunction about banning people who are either - by way of willful action or simple insanity - a disruptive and undermining force to this board. I make that judgement purely on the basis of how well the state of the board reflects its purpose and goals. The same goes for the deletion of gratuitous threads and postings. The measure of what constitutes a gratuitous thread or post is mine to make and take. I make no apologies for them.

Re: accusations of misogyny....

I have nothing whatever to say on that score save that such discussions are nearly always so low brow and tedious that I wish I had the ability to summon a comatose state so I could just sleep through it all.

Re: neplusultra....

It is worth noting that that discussion board is barely active. Hardly any of the threads in any category reach double figures of posts. In the philosophy section David's "Nature of Genius" thread was far and away the most active (126 posts). The next closest were about 44 and 23 posts. In the political section the thread discussing David's expulsion was again the largest (only 12 posts).

Obviously these people don't find each other sufficiently stimulating to carry a meaningful conversation. Make of that what you will.

Dan Rowden

krussell2004

Registered User

Posts: 60

(1/28/04 10:03 am)

Reply

Re: Fakes

---

*

Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 11:07 am

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 261
(1/28/04 12:33 pm)
Reply

Re: The closed system

---

"But it is also interesting how hysterical even the "smartest" become when confronted with this "-ism."

"I can't work out how Andrew Beckwith is in that supposed elite group. He is clearly an idiot, from my perspective."

"I had no idea that otherwise intelligent people, could be so emotionally chaotic and childlike."

The force of Andrew Beckwith's response is actually just as much a sign of stupidity as intelligence. Most people just glaze over the truth, even when it's well spoken, they remain indifferent to the depth of it's implications.

Andrew was capable of perceiving that everything upon which he founded his notions of self and the world was under threat. His world was quite likely flashing before his eyes, his wife, family, status in the scientific community, job, values, ideals, interests, etc. Everything.

To accept the truth would involve a tremendous mental reconfiguration on his part, and he knew that it would sooner snap than do this.

Thus, his resistance was of understandable veracity, he was fighting for his life.

Rhett Hamilton

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 488
(1/28/04 12:43 pm)
Reply

Re: Fakes

---

Good points Rhett. I agree.

|                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 66(1/28/04 1:00 pm)Reply                                                                                        | Re: The closed system <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I have nothing whatever to say on that score save that such discussions are nearly always so low brow and tedious that I wish I had the ability to summon a comatose state so I could just sleep through it all. <hr/> You could've just as easily zipped through them. No one said you had to read it all.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1347(1/28/04 2:50 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Re: The closed system <hr/> So why, Russell, didn't Andrew Beckwith make good on his promise to come to GF and flame David, and etc.? And why did he think he needed permission?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 67(1/29/04 3:23 am)Reply                                                                                        | Re: The closed system <hr/> You'd have to ask Dr. Beckwith. Edited by: krussell2004 at: 2/3/04 12:08 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 261(1/29/04 11:48 am)Reply  | Re: Schizoid Personality Disorder <hr/> <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. neither desires nor enjoys close relationships, including being part of a family</li> <li>2. almost always chooses solitary activities</li> <li>3. has little, if any, interest in having sexual experiences with another person</li> <li>4. takes pleasure in few, if any, activities</li> <li>5. lacks close friends or confidants other than first-degree relatives</li> <li>6. appears indifferent to the praise or criticism of others</li> <li>7. shows emotional coldness, detachment, or flattened affectivity.</li> </ol> Funnily enough, they're surprisingly similar to the traits of an enlightened |

Buddha . . . .

Yeah, it struck me as well. All we need do is add another point,

8. understands the nature of reality.

...and we have a good definition of a sage.

Perhaps i'll start a support group for people with this disorder, it may be an effective way to pinpoint people that have strong potential for wisdom.

Rhett Hamilton

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 329
(1/29/04 4:48 pm)
Reply

On, the foolish attacks of fools

---

krussell2004 wrote:

Quoting D. Quinn:

-----
Indirectly. My diagnosis of a "schizoidal personality disorder" was made during the process of applying for a disability pension. I've always openly stated to the government that I am too busy to enter the workforce because of my philosophical vocation, saying that the cause of wisdom is too important to neglect. The government, in consultation with psychiatrists and psychologists who assessed me, decided that I was too eccentric to be considered employable and granted me the pension. "Schizoidal personality disorder" is simply a convenient category to slot eccentrics into.
-----

kr:

This is quite intriguing and very telling. It suggests that you are living off the masses by feigning insanity. I've got to hand it to you. You're quite clever. In fact I've never doubted that and now you have clearly demonstrated what a charlatan you are with this information. Thank you so much.

LB: Christ, what an incredibly idiotic interpretation.

Quinn didnt feign insanity. If anything, he suggested *they* were insane and in need of enlightenment, if not directly then indirectly.

I wish I had a nickel for each time someone who was beaten-down in a rational argument with the board owners resorted to personal attack and similar bullshit. I'd be filthy rich by now!

My suggestion to Dan Rowden is: Expand the criteria for whom gets canned from group discussions, include individuals with a history of making false statements and unnecessary, below-the-belt blows. Not because they trouble You,(since You are ego-free!), but because they trouble ME.

Again i will say, I have met David Quinn personally, many times, and have observed him carefully, (and though i have had my share of criticisms over the years), and any one who has done likewise would certainly agree; David Quinn is an extremely calm man, polite to all men and women alike, And in his interaction with, and discussions of, the 'fairer' sex, never have i seen the slightest tendencies toward anger, hatred or resentment. Which is more than i can say for myself!

This crap, the foolish attacks of fools, must cease.

Leo

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 330
(1/29/04 4:56 pm)
Reply

jj van der Leeuw

---

Only when we have seen life as from a mountain top do we know true values, true greatness. As long as we err in the valley of illusion we judge but by the illusory externals which loom so large in our sight, we see appearance, not reality. Does not our judgment of man bear witness to our worship of externals; would not most of us, if placed by magic in the time when Christ lived, look upon the Roman rulers of His age as men great and worthy, successful and important, would we not yearn for their approval and take in their every word? And would most of us not look with contempt upon the Man of Nazareth, poor and powerless, belonging to a despised race, daring to set himself up as an authority above the mighty ones of His day? Would we give Him the same attentive ear which we would give to those great in the public eye, with power over life and death, would we have been capable to see that He alone was worth listening to, that He alone was great and wise and powerful, and that in the light of His eternal greatness the impressive pomp and seeming power of even the greatest of

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                      | Romans were but as nothing? jj van der Leeuw, Conquest of Illusion                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| avidalocaRegistered UserPosts: 148(1/30/04 12:29 am)Reply | Re: On, the foolish attacks of fools <hr/> LBartoli wrote: Quote: <hr/> Again i will say, I have met David Quinn personally, many times, and have observed him carefully, (and though i have had my share of critisizms over the years), and any one who has done likewise would certainly agree; David Quinn is an extremely calm man, polite to all men and women alike, And in his interaction with, and discussions of, the 'fairer' sex, never have i seen the slightest tendencies toward anger, hatred or resentment. Which is more than i can say for myself! <hr/> The strangest thing about this forum to me is that David is constantly fending off attacks based on this imagined "hatred of women" he has. In fact, he has none at all. I've had many in-person discussions with him about this and I can say with absolute surity that he doesn't harbour any ill-will towards people due to them being another gender. The attacks made on him therefore say everything about the attackers and nothing about him |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2140(1/30/04 1:07 am)Reply   | --- <hr/> Avidaloca, I can call David a misogynist if I feel like it. Kevin Solway too. They are not a genius like I am. They don't know woman.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

avidaloca
Registered User
Posts: 148
(1/30/04 5:13 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

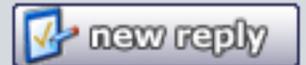

Avidaloca, I can call David a misogynist if I feel like it.
Kevin Solway too.

---

Of course you can. But you'd be wrong. It doesn't automatically mean you hate something if you have a philosophical point of view which rejects certain things about it. Labelling someone a misogynist is a convenient way of avoiding an argument because you disagree with it.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ne Plus Ultra

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| krussell2004Registered UserPosts: 67(1/30/04 8:34 am)Reply | Re: On, the foolish attacks of fools <hr/> Quote: <hr/> krussell2004 wrote: Quoting D. Quinn: <hr/> Indirectly. My diagnosis of a "schizoidal personality disorder" was made during the process of applying for a disability pension. I've always openly stated to the government that I am too busy to enter the workforce because of my philosophical vocation, saying that the cause of wisdom is too important to neglect. The government, in consultation with psychiatrists and psychologists who assessed me, decided that I was too eccentric to be considered employable and granted me the pension. "Schizoidal personality disorder" is simply a convenient category to slot eccentrics into. <hr/> kr: This is quite intriguing and very telling. It suggests that you are living off the masses by feigning insanity. I've got to hand it to you. You're quite clever. In fact I've never doubted that and now you have clearly demonstrated what a charlatan you are with this information. Thank you so much. |

LB: Christ, what an incredibly idiotic interpretation.

Quinn didnt feign insanity. If anything, he suggested *they* were insane and in need of enlightenment, if not directly then indirectly.

---

My my aren't you the walking collection of ironies. I suggested that he was clever in his demeanour such that he had them thinking, "This guy must be crazy." In fact I commended him for being so clever as to pulling that off. I suggest you read other peoples posts in full before you go off on your half-cocked attacks. Talk about idiotic statements. Geez. Learn to spell while you're at it.

Quote:

---

My suggestion to Dan Rowden is: Expand the criteria for whom gets canned from group discussions, include individuals with a history of making false statements and unnecessary, below-the-belt blows. Not because they trouble You,(since You are ego-free!), but because they trouble ME.

---

And super-sensitive to boot. So you want to go the way of Ne Plus Ultra? You're beginning to sound alot like Andrew Beckwith. Are you sure you're not related? Wasn't it you that responded to a well observed critique of another member of this board with a stupid laughing fit. You did this for no other reason, but that you did not agree and didn't have an intelligent response. By your line of reasoning you should be banned from this forum as well. No one is ego free by the way. It is you who are the fool for allowing yourself to get brainwashed by this group.

Quote:

---

Again i will say, I have met David Quinn personally, many times, and have observed him carefully, (and though i have had my share of critisizms over the years), and any one who has done likewise would certainly agree; David Quinn is an extremely calm man, polite to all men and women alike, And in his interaction with, and discussions of, the 'fairer' sex, never have i seen the slightest tendencies toward anger, hatred or resentment.

---

I never said he was a raving lunatic prone to anger have I? What is your basis for making this statement. I just suggested that his views are false and based on his own biases. I also called him a fraud because I believe his teachings to be false. If you think I'm wrong and wish to set me straight then you can only succeed by persuasion based on reason. Personal attacks will not sway anyone. As for David, he has already made up his mind.

Quote:

---

Which is more than i can say for myself!

---

Might I suggest some valum.

Quote:

---

