MKFaizi Registered User Posts: 1145 (4/3/04 3:21 pm) Reply 	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The women fear having a child by the wrong man. <hr/> The only way a woman can fear having a child by the wrong man is to be dependent on the man. A "wrong" man will leave her to raise the child on her own. But she will do that anyway -- with a so called right man -- paper doll -- to take out the trash and work on the car and otherwise fawn and pander to her whim; to become womanly or less than womanly. If a woman's reason is to have a child with a "right" man, then, she is

bargaining too low. There is no such thing as a right man. There is no such thing as a man. The dream of man is as much fantasy as woman.

Every man wants a freak. Every woman wants a provider.

Sexual relationships are no win situations. If we want children, we are better off going to sperm banks or to surrogates.

A petri dish would be preferable.

Being a parent, however, I cannot imagine how anyone in his right mind could actually want children. I was not in my right mind when I conceived my two and gave birth to them.

Children consume you. They eat you alive. A parent is at the mercy of the school system and the correctional system. If your kid does something wrong, you are responsible. Look at the parents of those Columbine boys.

When I was a kid, I was best friends with a girl whose brother became a mass murderer. Everyone knew that the brother had a homicidal streak. I stayed at her house often. The parents were very decent people. Not terribly religious. Not perverted.

I think it's just the luck of the draw.

Knowing all that I know now, I would not take the chance. Having kids puts you very much at odds with authority.

Authority -- the law; police; order -- is a very big thing in my geographical area. The school system here is extremely fearful of thirteen year olds. My daughter was suspended for wearing a bandana -- a symbol of gang activity. The school took her to court for striking matches inside the pockets of her pants. The judge dismissed the charges.

A kid I know got suspended for a day for chewing gum. When he mouthed off about it, they nearly had him arrested.

But he is a "bad" kid. If a "good" kid is caught chewing gum, that is all right.

Don't have kids. Raising kids is a lesson that no one really needs.

Faizi

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1064
(4/4/04 12:29 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Paint it black y'all.

Ducky M
Posts: 15
(4/4/04 3:09 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

Such is the way with the idea that everyone should have lots of children. It helped build a cultural base 2000 years ago, but WE'RE OVERPOPULATED NOW. WE ARE ALREADY FILLED TO THE BRIM WITH CHILDREN WHO ARE ABANDONED.

---

Amen. At least one person here is truly enlightened! :lol

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 107
(4/4/04 4:52 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

The only way a woman can fear having a child by the wrong man is to be dependent on the man. A "wrong" man will leave her to raise the child on her own. But she will do that anyway -- with a so called right man -- paper doll -- to take out the trash and work on the car and otherwise fawn and pander to her whim; to become womanly or less than womanly.

If a woman's reason is to have a child with a "right" man, then, she is bargaining too low. There is no such thing as a right man. There is no such thing as a man. The dream of man is as much fantasy as woman.

Every man wants a freak. Every woman wants a provider.

Sexual relationships are no win situations. If we want children, we are better off going to sperm banks or to surrogates.

A petri dish would be preferable.

Being a parent, however, I cannot imagine how anyone in his right mind could actually want children. I was not in my right mind when I conceived my two and gave birth to them.

Children consume you. They eat you alive. A parent is at the mercy of the school system and the correctional system. If your kid does something wrong, you are responsible. Look at the parents of those Columbine boys.

When I was a kid, I was best friends with a girl whose brother became a mass murderer. Everyone knew that the brother had a homicidal streak. I stayed at her house often. The parents were very decent people. Not terribly religious. Not perverted.

I think it's just the luck of the draw.

Knowing all that I know now, I would not take the chance. Having kids puts you very much at odds with authority.

Authority -- the law; police; order -- is a very big thing in my geographical area. The school system here is extremely fearful of thirteen year olds. My daughter was suspended for wearing a bandana -- a symbol of gang activity. The school took her to court for striking matches inside the pockets of her pants. The judge dismissed the charges.

A kid I know got suspended for a day for chewing gum. When he mouthed off about it, they nearly had him arrested.

But he is a "bad" kid. If a "good" kid is caught chewing gum, that is all right.

Don't have kids. Raising kids is a lesson that no one really needs.

Faizi

---

You need a tissue for that issue?

This is not Wisdom, it's whining, it's a tantrum.

And no, I am not offended by your pseudo bluntness.

But I am calling you on your attempt at passing off this pathetic self-pity as Philosophy.

Quote:

---

Children consume you. They eat you alive.

---

Jesus christ...Get over yourself, you fuck'n egomaniac.

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 1147

(4/4/04 3:16 pm)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

All right.

I am bored to tears here anyway. I did not write here for several months so it does not bother me in the least to stop writing here again.

It all just gets old. Very old.

Faizi

Canadian Zoetrope

Registered User

Posts: 43

(4/4/04 4:58 pm)

Reply

New Post Bah!

---

There is no 'enlightenment'!

it's just a concept, if you see the Buddha, KILL him!

heh

congrats on the child.

:)

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 1053

(4/4/04 9:21 pm)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

mle30

Does that apply to Mother Theresa, Buddha, or Jesus?

What about all the poor schmucks who wasted their time being nuns, or monks, or priests?? I guess all that devotion to G-d was wasted because they didn't have kids....

---

All those kind of people sacrifice their lives to build a bridge. To show the way.

Signs posts and bridges are inanimate.

The enlightened are above that.

Quote:

---

DEL, you can tout child-rearing all you want, but the dogma behind "be fruitful and multiply" becoming as outdated . . . . .

---

Why do you chose to say "becoming" and not become?

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1054
(4/4/04 9:34 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

MKFaizi

. . . . I was not in my right mind when I conceived my two and gave birth to them. . .

---

Do you really think you are in the right mind now?

Quote:

MKFaizi

If a woman's reason is to have a child with a "right" man, then, she is bargaining too low. There is no such thing as a right man. There is no such thing as a man. The dream of man is as much fantasy as woman.

---

Until you come to recognize the concept and significance of Man and Woman you and your children are unfortunate.

Quote:

MKFaizi

Children consume you. They eat you alive.

---

You are what you eat and a much more.

Quote:

MKFaizi

It all just gets old. Very old.

---

Willing yourself and your children into the grave?

You need a Man.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 110

(4/5/04 4:58 am)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

All right.

I am bored to tears here anyway. I did not write here for several months so it does not bother me in the least to stop writing here again.

It all just gets old. Very old.

Faizi

---

Well since I can barley contain my boredom and disgust with this nauseating pity-party you call a reply.

And as I choke back the welling tears, I will, in a very motherly-type fashion, regurgitate some Golden Oldies.

Please apply one or more of the following quotes that are most applicable to your situation.

Faizi says:

Quote:

---

You always want to leave when the heat gets turned up a notch.

Coward.

I am happy to be your Judas. If you insist on crucifixion,

I will gladly nail you to the cross.

I am sorry for offending... I honestly - stupidly - thought that he might be up to self examination. Clearly, I am a clod and do not belong here among the ineffectual elite and jokers.

It is my fault that I continually discount the delicate sensitivity of others.

I mistook this forum for a philosophy forum. My bad.

This is not a philosophy forum. This is a forum of agendas.

I thought this was the place for the very serious thought. I reckon not.

Got it.

---

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1542

(4/5/04 5:40 am)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Other than Marsha, who here actually has children?

Tharan

Dave Toast Registered User Posts: 1065 (4/5/04 7:34 am) Reply 	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> Or some insight? Something to offer, other than psychological case-study material? Even just honesty; the honesty to pause before you hit the Add Reply button and truly examine your motivations?
birdofhermes Registered User Posts: 1499 (4/5/04 10:46 am) Reply 	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> David has a son, you have a daughter, I have three. I can certainly attest to the supreme stupidity of having children. Most foolish thing you could possibly do. Gosh, I wish I could have another one.
Rairun Registered User Posts: 245 (4/5/04 11:08 am) Reply	New Post ... <hr/> I don't think it's foolish to have children, but before doing it, you should consider a few things: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>- do you really want to work your ass off to support some kid?</li><li>- do you want to spend years of your life with someone that you don't even know yet?</li><li>- do you want to give up your ability to take a 180 turn in your life, even if you feel like you have to?</li></ul> I know I don't. That's worse than marrying a dependent person.
drowden Forum Host Posts: 1683 (4/5/04 1:41 pm) Reply 	New Post Re: ... <hr/> I have nearly 7 billion children. I don't need any more. Dan Rowden

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 94
(4/5/04 1:45 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: ...

---

I have a son, he taught me alot, I choose to raise him on my own. I was very young, not making excuses though, for only in my naivete would I have undertaken such a task. My life has been enriched by his birth.

He is a young man struggling to find his own way, a son can melt a mothers heart with ease and this ability grows over the years, for me it was necessary to put distance between him and I once he became a certain age.

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 113
(4/6/04 6:26 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

Or some insight?

Something to offer, other than psychological case-study material?

Even just honesty; the honesty to pause before you hit the Add Reply button and truly examine your motivations?

---

Will this do, Dave?

Quote:

---

[Scholars Version] Why do you notice the sliver in your friend's eye, but overlook the timber in your own? How can you say to your friend, "Let me get the sliver out of your eye, when there is that timber in your own? You phony, first take the timber out of your own eye and then you'll see well enough to remove the sliver from your friends eye.

[King James Version] And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, "Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?" Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

[New English Bible] Why do you look at the speck of sawdust in your brother's eye, with never a thought for the great plank in your own? Or how can you say to your brother, "let me take the speck out of your eye", when all the time there is that plank in your own? You hypocrite! First take the plank out of your own eye, and then you will see clearly to take the speck out of your brother's.

Matthew 7:3 - 7:5

---

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1057
(4/6/04 6:37 am)
Reply

New Post my naivete

---

Quote:

---

silentsal

I was very young, not making excuses though, for only in my naivete would I have undertaken such a task. My life has been enriched by his birth.

---

Does that mean. . .
Your naivete has enriched your life and
Your intelligence has impoverished it?

silentsal Registered User Posts: 95 (4/6/04 9:02 am) Reply	New Post Re: my naivete <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Does that mean. . . Your naivete has enriched your life and Your intelligence has impoverished it? <hr/> Interesting question, the simple answer may be yes.
DEL Registered User Posts: 1060 (4/6/04 5:13 pm) Reply	New Post Re: my naivete <hr/> Very good. That is the correct answer.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment - You need to have children

New Topic

Add Reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Author	Comment
DEL Registered User Posts: 1081 (4/18/04 1:01 am) Reply	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> Quote: <hr/> MKFaizi The only way a woman can fear having a child by the wrong man is to be dependent on the man. A "wrong" man will leave her to raise the child on her own. <hr/> Do you think it is more balanced to say the "wrong" man will leave the "wrong" woman to raise the child on her own? Should we consider a child raised in such circumstances to be doomed? If not why not?

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1151
(4/19/04 11:28 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

I could not care less. I am listening to Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan. I can never become one of a religion but, if I had to do it, I would be a Sufi -- a real Sufi, not a Sears Sufi.

www.nusratfateh.com/

Go to devotional songs and listen to Allah Hoo.

The language does not matter. In fact, I think it is better that I cannot understand all of it. Without the words, one can more easily understand the passion for "God" who is infinite.

Faizi

Edited by: MKFaizi at: 4/19/04 11:57 am

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1083
(4/20/04 8:03 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

MKFaizi
Go to devotional songs and listen to Allah Hoo.

The language does not matter. In fact, I think it is better that I cannot understand all of it. Without the words, one can more easily understand the passion for "God" who is infinite.

---

I spent some time in Saudi Arabia on business. I was a consultant for the development of a shopping mall. Everything closed 5 times a day for prayer and they played the voice of an Egyptian man singing the call to prayer every day. This man's voice was really great. I asked for a copy of the tape before I left for home. Everyone looked at me strange and laughed. Nevertheless they gave me a copy of the tape.

In Saudi Arabia the society appeared to be based around children.

repent1 Registered User Posts: 44 (4/20/04 11:58 am) Reply	New Post .. <hr/> In Saudi Arabia the society appeared to be based around children and oil. And on the matter, I think any experience is good if it leads to higher truths. Including having children, going on trips, listening to good music...
DEL Registered User Posts: 1084 (4/20/04 4:24 pm) Reply	New Post Enlightenment - 2 Paths <hr/> I am now convinced that there are two paths to enlightenment and 2 types of enlightenment. It is the confusion between the opposing characteristics of each path that causes people to fail.
DEL Registered User Posts: 1085 (4/20/04 4:31 pm) Reply	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> Children are absolutely necessary for enlightenment. Either physical children or spiritual children. No children = No enlightenment But warning do it wrong and you get the opposite effect.
silentsal Registered User Posts: 99 (4/21/04 1:44 am) Reply	New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children <hr/> Faizi Thanks for the link Del Two kinds of enlightenment? I once thought there were two also, now I don't.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1086
(4/21/04 6:42 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

Quote:

silentsal
Two kinds of enlightenment? I once thought there were two also, now I don't.

That's interesting. What changed your mind?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 99
(4/22/04 12:48 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

Quote:

What changed your mind?

enlightenment is not a thing, nor is it something you do, our true nature is an Awareness that flows. This awareness is the same awareness that flowed through Jesus and Buddha -it is in the functioning of enlightenment that appearances of individuality or uniqueness occur, using the mind becomes an option : some choose to use the mind, some don't.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1089
(4/27/04 5:49 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

silentsal
it is in the functioning of enlightenment that appearances of individuality or uniqueness occur, using the mind becomes an option : some choose to use the mind, some don't.

---

Are you refering to the enlightened when you say "some"?
Do you mean some enlightened people use their minds and others do not?

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 104
(4/27/04 4:23 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

Do you mean some enlightened people use their minds and others do not?

---

it appears so

Overlord
Registered User
Posts: 3
(4/28/04 10:34 am)
Reply

New Post Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Enlightenment - You need to have children The childless cannot attain full enlightenment.

They can be only ministers and preservers of enlightenment wisdom and knowledge. Like librarians.

Their role is valuable and important but the childless all lack the ability to see the absolute truth and have infinite wisdom.

It is the characteristic of eunuchs to be contentious.

The abandoned woman also has the same traits and fullfills the same duty.

The childless.

They have logic but cannot reason, so they argue.
They have luck but cannot have faith, so delight in randomness.

-----
Oh yeah, you have kids you'll get enlightened all right!
As for the childless.... ignorance may be bliss.....
And having kids is not going to give you the "ability to see the absolute truth and have infinite wisdom". Most likely the opposite is true.

And true eunuchs don't have the hormones to be contentious.

And as for the abandoned woman becoming contentious.....
I'm pretty sure you're badly mixing up cause and effect!

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1155
(4/29/04 12:03 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

There is only one kind of enlightenment but it manifests itself in a thousand different ways.

Faizi

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1156
(4/29/04 12:33 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

There is only one path to enlightenment but the roads to the path are many.

I am groovin' to Allah Hoo at the moment. Nusrat had a fantastic voice.

Pakistan has nothing to do with Saudi Arabia, by the way. Pakistanis are a very passionate people. Overly emotional and overly colorful but there is something to be said for that. If one is consciously passionate about the infinite, then one naturally drops the emotion and color in favor of a pure passion.

I admire the passion for "God" and the surrender to that thing. That is pure Islam, not this bullshit political thing that is going on throughout the world now -- Jihad and His/Her-slam. Dying for a political figurehead is not sacrificing oneself for the infinite. It's bullshit based on the usual religious bullshit promises -- virgins in Heaven; a set of wings; a halo and a harp.

Sufism is a false sect like all sects are false sects -- like Buddhism and Christianity. But beneath the facade, there is some truth and wisdom. It's not Mohammad or Ali or Jesus or Sidharrtha.

It's God, stupid. Just not the God of Man.

Faizi

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1095
(5/4/04 6:09 am)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

MKFaizi

It's God, stupid. Just not the God of Man.

---

"It's God, stupid."

Sounds like:

- You are stupid because you don't know God.
- I know God but you do not, stupid.
- I'm not stupid because I know God and you don't
- God and I and not stupid but you are.

Such talk has a kind of terminal energy.

It sounds like death is close by.

Something is due to be launch into oblivion.

We shall see.

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1157
(5/5/04 2:24 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

I definitely do not care what you think -- if, indeed, what you spew can be called thinking. I am not interested in it.

Death is always close by -- for all of us. That is a given from the time that we draw our first breath.

Woo hoo.

So much for death.

There is no philosophy in death. There is philosophy only in life.

Faizi

MKFaizi

Registered User

Posts: 1158

(5/5/04 2:44 pm)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Addendum:

Your reasoning is shallow and dull. If you had something worthwhile saying, you would have understanding of the value of imagination and of the value of wit.

Without thorough investigation and thought, imagination and wit are without value.

All things that are not thoroughly thought through are without value.

Cheap wisdom has no value.

You are cheap.

I do not say that with malice. I have no wish to engage in discussion with you. I am simply stating fact based on your provisions.

This forum is currently very lacking in inspiration.

Faizi

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 648

(5/5/04 3:47 pm)

Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Is there anything that you would desire to discuss?

For example, do you feel inclined to comment on this post I made on another forum

Individual freedoms speeds up human evolution (or at least does not unnecessarily hamper it). The purpose of life in evolutionary terms is to create greater and greater degrees of consciousness of the universe, either by quantity or quality. We wish to be immortal, not so much because we fear death but because we want more time.

The human herd has found the best way to do this is by technology. Groups that hold the most advanced technology require different herd groups to cooperate, where such cooperation does not exist then it sends herd members out to negate this interference. Some of them are sacrificed for this purpose.

Individual freedoms allow individuals to be more selfish (for instance, abortion) and to undertake measures to satisfy themselves even if at the cost of other 'weaker' members of the herd (trade) – but individual resource competition must be consistent with the overarching needs of the whole herd and allow the whole herd to slowly progress (that's why we have jail). These freedoms allow greater diversity and randomness of thought and thus allows far quicker technological development when compared to herds controlled by a single or select authorities who restrict the thoughts to traditional ways. Such traditions are generally created to protect the ruling class and allow a limited number to experience more consciousness.

So yes it is worth fighting for, if you can get someone else as within your group to do the fighting for you by offering them rewards. It helps them some people have soldier ant genes.

It is for these reasons that I support the war in Iraq and why I do not wish for Islam (as it is now) to ever become the dominant world religion.

If not, what about this one

Biggier:

Who said it couldn't be entertaining right?

No-one. I post here partly for entertainment myself – ie something that relieves boredom. And yes, it is an ego trip when you feel you've put words together that are original and incisive (even when one is jsut fooling themselves).

My blustering ways are by and large just posturing. I love polemics. I love coming into a discussion venue and pointing to the center field fence. All but daring folks to try to strike me out. Philosophically, that is.

So you just want competition rather than to learn, like playing footy without trying to improve your skills. A hobby.

If I come upon a particularly dexterous mind, I can find myself twisting slowly, slowly in the wind.

I interpret this as meaning - you acknowledge that the QRS have very skilful minds, but you cannot come around to their point of view, not perhaps because it is logically wrong, but because the change would be too great for you.

You know, like Bush and Cheney and Rumsfeld are now. But then how dexterous can their minds be, right?

Much greater than yours. They have more power than you and basically power is what underlies everything we desire. Without it you are nothing - it is all a matter of degree.

Not that my post above does not make an important point about the Rhett Quinns of this world. But let's face it, they are just---philosophically---fatuous fools I suspect. Hardly the Mein Kampf type. Although I wouldn't be surprised if some women reading their crap didn't think so given their reactionary pathriarchal prattle.

I don't have a problem with the QRS way of thinking. I think it is what they need and it is constructive for them and for me as well. I get the impression I would actually feel more satisfied with life in thinking the way they do, unfortunately though, apart from opening up my mind a lot I just don't get anything solid enough out of their ultimate reality to make it a way of life.

Lately I've been thinking that they just have brain damage. There is some segment of their brain that doesn't work as it was designed to. Instantly you'll think this as being a complete negative, but actually I don't. I have a feeling that most important folks in history like have had similar issues. I think nearly all great geniuses have brain damage. I also know that the human brain contains areas that are no longer relevant, they are hangovers from the 2 million years of our earlier development – if their brain damage is in these areas then it is not unreasonable that such damage is actually positive. Damage in one area of the brain is often compensated by other areas.

But surely, you say, that has nothing to do with the URs that are bandied about in here, right? The philosophical kind, after all, are so much purer and benignant. They only want you to agree that their Concepts are True. That has nothing to do with the way we actually live your lives, does it?

Yes we all want to influence others, we wouldn't be posting here if we didn't. I'm sure the QRS & Rhett, as well as myself, as well as you, want to make others think like ourselves. We all know that philosophy induces changes on one's life, because it changes the way you converse with people face to face and it changes your interests.

But in my view all of these metaphysical mutations are dangerous. They are invariably attached to authoritarian personalities. Which means that even if their own mindless mush doesn't become the official party line, they are more than willing to reconsider others. After all, what counts in the end is the Evangelical Truth itself, right? His, hers, theirs...whatever.

Not if one first does everything possible to remove all emotions, not just negative ones. If you leave the positive emotions in place then they end up becoming twisted because your ego remains focussed on itself rather than the universe. They are smiling assassins in a way.

Our constitutional rights might disappear from our courts, while torture might reappear in our interrogation cells. The worst of it is that government would not have to impose tyranny on a cowed populace. We would demand it for our own protection. And if the institutions of our democracy were unable to protect us from our enemies, we might even go further, taking the law into our own hands."

The latter is the crucial point. If such conspiracies were true then they would only be temporary in nature as the population would in time rise up. However it is much more difficult to take freedoms away from people who are used to them. I know last century we had democracy that became communist or dictator lead and so on, but I think times have changes. The resistance would be too great nowadays. There would come a point where the line would be crossed.

What Michael Ignatieff probably got his inspiration for such comments from was this Edward Griffin stuff:

www.freedomforceinternational.org/freedom.cfm?fuseaction=issues

Part 1: The Chasm

Part 2: Secret Organizations and Hidden Agendas

Part 3: Days of Infamy

Part 4: The War on Terrorism

These documents are a fascinating read.

A couple of extracts:

“Collectivists and individualists both agree that human rights are important, but they differ over how important and especially over what is presumed to be the origin of those rights. There are only two possibilities in this debate. Either man’s rights are intrinsic to his being, or they are extrinsic, meaning that either he possesses them at birth or they are given to him afterward.

In other words, they are either hardware or software. Individualists believe they are hardware. Collectivists believe they are software.

If rights are given to the individual after birth, then who has the power to do that?

Collectivists believe that is a function of government. Individualists are nervous about that assumption because, if the state has the power to grant rights, it also has the power to take them away, and that concept is incompatible with personal liberty.”

“There are other agendas at work; agendas that are far less praiseworthy; agendas that, in fact, are just the opposite of what we are told. The purpose of this presentation is to prove that, what is unfolding today is, not a war on terrorism to defend freedom, but a war on freedom that requires the defense of terrorism.”

To me it really is a struggle between the collectivists and the individuals. I believe all human conflict is. I also agree with Mr Griffin that people will use underhand and indirect shadow methods to get the outcomes that they want. What I don't particularly agree with is that there is necessarily anything conspiratorially sinister in this, and even if there is, that a) we westerners might be better off or b) that if things get bad enough we will rebel.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 5/5/04 3:48 pm

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 1106
(5/10/04 5:17 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

---

Quote:

---

Faizi

I do not say that with malice. I have no wish to engage in discussion with you. I am simply stating fact based on your provisions.

This forum is currently very lacking in inspiration.

---

The masculine inspiration is apparently weak.
And inspiration is not feminine.

komodo island
Registered User
Posts: 3
(5/21/04 5:29 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Enlightenment - You need to have children

Enlightenment - You need to have doggies.

A puppy to lick your face with unconditional love, to piss and shit on the floor, to tear off and mess up everything in your room, to bark at you for not walking with her, to bite your hands and feet, to wake up your innate animal instincts, to sleep and eat with you, to wander far away and not following your steps, ... to do everything that makes you feel at a loss as to what to feel - angry or funny, frustrated or happy ... whatever.. whatever.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Click Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Author	Comment
primus meridian Registered User Posts: 1 (2/29/04 3:05 am) Reply 	Enlightenment <hr/> Jesus of Nazareth was enlightened; Buddha was enlightened; Francis Bacon was enlightened; and many others have displayed either full or partial qualities of enlightenment over the course of the human saga. What is Enlightenment, you ask? To me, the term 'enlightenment' is a very literal term, actually meaning, in my own words, 'the state of conscious awareness of the Light within.' What is Light, you ask? Light is spiritual awareness, therefore Light is also Love. I have personally seen fleeting glimpses of the Light, and my particular lifestream has developed a sufficient awareness, over the course of many embodiments, as to somewhat understand the limitations of the reasonings of man without Spirit. The limitations are infinite. The end goal of life, as I've learned, is to complete our earthly mission and/or true purpose, i.e. the goal that our Divine Self/God Presence originally sought to accomplish upon manifesting in this plane, and to learn and ascend into higher octaves of existence. These higher planes are liberty itself, and in order to have the authority to access them we must be the epitome of all righteousness, knowledge, truth, love and responsibility, and of all the virtues which we would normally hold up as the light of propriety. Naturally, in order to complete our earthly mission, we must first know what it is; and in order to acquire this particular gnosis, naturally we would have to have the insight and ability to analyze the past of our own lifestream, down to the very root of descent into this plane; not unlike accessing the Akashic records of ourselves, as has been coined by many.

I'll leave it at that for now. I hope this post is accepted.

Peace and Love.

Edited by: primus meridian at: 2/29/04 3:08 am

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1491

(2/29/04 3:30 am)

Reply

Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

What is Light, you ask? Light is spiritual awareness, therefore Light is also Love.

---

With love comes hate. The two are inseparable. Local love (of say your child, for instance) can turn to hate if the object of affection is taken away or destroyed.

Light is love, you say. So darkness is hate? How does your definition of Light coincide/differ from the known properties of the physical substance commonly known as light?

These delusional categories you visualize as real show that you still have some work to do. Enlightenment is lack of delusion.

Quote:

---

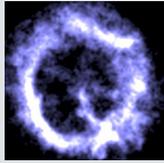

The end goal of life, as I've learned, is to complete our earthly mission and/or true purpose, i.e. the goal that our Divine Self/ God Presence originally sought to accomplish upon manifesting in this plane, and to learn and ascend into higher octaves of existence.

---

Prove this please.

Tharan

primus meridian
Registered User
Posts: 2
(2/29/04 3:38 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Tharan, and your quickness to call my "categories" delusional shows your road ahead plainly. Do I still have some works to do? I'm here aren't I? Here I've given you the outline of my belief, and out of the words I've posted you can't decipher the fact that I know I have more work to do? Is English your native language? I'm not yet ascended, so of course I have some work to do.

Darkness is indeed hate inasmuch as darkness is ignorance. Ignorance is hate, for Light is love.

Mystics of all ages have glimpsed a "spiritual spectrum" behind the physical spectrum. Radiant colors, more pure and rare than those found on earth, emanate from a brilliant, "inner" divine light. Just as a ray of sunlight passing through a prism refracts into seven colors, spiritual light splits into seven colors, or "rays" - each of which has specific divine qualities.

MGregory
Posts: 436
(2/29/04 4:14 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

primus meridian: Jesus of Nazareth was enlightened; Buddha was enlightened; Francis Bacon was enlightened; and many others have displayed either full or partial qualities of enlightenment over the course of the human saga. What is Enlightenment, you ask? To me, the term 'enlightenment' is a very literal term, actually meaning, in my own words, 'the state of conscious awareness of the Light within.' What is Light, you ask? Light is spiritual awareness, therefore Light is also Love.

---

What is the difference between conscious awareness and spiritual awareness? Can a person be spiritually aware without being consciously aware? Also, what is Love? Are you talking about ordinary love or what?

primus meridian
Posts: 3
(2/29/04 4:50 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Conscious and spiritual awareness are one and the same, which is why Love is Light. Light is spiritual awareness, so spiritual awareness is also Love.

The more conscious of spiritual things we become, the more enlightened we become. As our consciousness increases in awareness, so does our capacity to love. The opposite of love, therefore, is ignorance.

Edited by: primus meridian at: 2/29/04 4:53 am

MGregory
Posts: 437
(2/29/04 5:03 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

Conscious and spiritual awareness are one and the same, which is why Love is Light. Light is spiritual awareness, so spiritual awareness is also Love.

---

So what this amounts to is that Love is awareness.

Quote:

---

The more conscious of spiritual things we become, the more enlightened we become. As our consciousness increases in awareness, so does our capacity to love. The opposite of love, therefore, is ignorance.

---

So as our awareness increases, so does our capacity for awareness. The opposite of awareness is ignorance, which is presumably the lack of awareness? What is it that we are supposed to be aware of? What's a "spiritual thing"?

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1492
(2/29/04 5:39 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

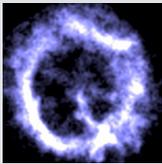

The more conscious of spiritual things we become, the more enlightened we become. As our consciousness increases in awareness, so does our capacity to love. The opposite of love, therefore, is ignorance.

---

Yes, define "spiritual things" please.

Tharan

primus meridian
Posts: 4
(2/29/04 5:50 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

I would say that we are to be sufficiently in search of spirituality. The opposite of spirituality is carnality, so we must throw aside our carnal self and embrace our divine self. It's easier said than done, and even harder to explain in words.

In simpler terms, we can look at the carnal self as being the ego. As a means of identifying the ego, and overthrowing its reign over our minds and hearts, I will here layout a few characteristics of it: The ego is selfish, greedy and needy. It looks for the glorification of self and nothing but the self, and it is adamantly opposed to freedom. It deceives, flatters, lies, fights, bickers, hates and even becomes violent at times, all of which are of a carnal nature.

MGregory
Posts: 440
(2/29/04 6:17 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

So what is the carnal self and what is the divine self? How are they related to one another?

primus meridian

Posts: 5

(2/29/04 10:41 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Well the divine self is the opposite of the characteristics I just listed.

(It must be opposite day)

Edited by: primus meridian at: 2/29/04 10:42 am

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 765

(2/29/04 10:54 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

I can agree with the ideas here. They're presented by an unenlightened person, though, so of course they're going to be a bit off...it's still pretty much right, though.

MGregory

Posts: 443

(2/29/04 11:58 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

Well the divine self is the opposite of the characteristics I just listed.

---

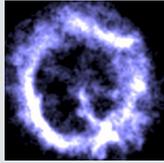

Well, yeah, they're characteristics, but what I'm asking is what are they characteristics of? Are you saying we can throw off these characteristics without getting rid of the cause of these characteristics?

primus meridian

Posts: 6

(3/1/04 5:13 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

I can agree with the ideas here. They're presented by an unenlightened person, though, so of course they're going to be a bit off...it's still pretty much right, though.

---

Voce, I take it you consider yourself enlightened. Tell me, what makes you think this?

Quote:

---

Well, yeah, they're characteristics, but what I'm asking is what are they characteristics of? Are you saying we can throw off these characteristics without getting rid of the cause of these characteristics?

---

They're characteristics of ego, as I said, MGreg. Despite the cause of our angers or frustrations, or whatever else which might cause us to respond in an egotistical manner, the only way to escape the endless cycle of this causality, specifically on an individual level, but also in maintenance of the whole, is by throwing them off, or, by turning the other cheek. If you can "turn the other cheek" in every aspect of life, you will become yourself a Christ.

Peace out.

primus meridian

Posts: 7

(3/1/04 5:15 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Before I finish, let me just add one more characteristic of ego. It is actually the mother of all of them. It goes by the name of 'pride.'

If you can always throw all pride aside, you have mastered this life and you are on the road to ultimate ascension.

Edited by: primus meridian at: 3/1/04 5:16 am

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 773

(3/1/04 5:31 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Voce, I take it you consider yourself enlightened. Tell me, what makes you think this?

Well, there are definitions of enlightenment, and I seem to fit into them. They hold true for me.

MGregory

Posts: 447

(3/1/04 7:54 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Quote:

---

primus meridian: If you can always throw all pride aside, you have mastered this life and you are on the road to ultimate ascension.

---

How do you go about throwing pride aside and how will you know when it is completely gone?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2237
(3/1/04 9:55 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

P: Voce, I take it you consider yourself enlightened. Tell me, what makes you think this?

VI: Well, there are definitions of enlightenment, and I seem to fit into them. They hold true for me.

---

Enlightenment (n): A blissful state attained by middle class American adolescents who read a few spiritual books, make one or two advances in their reasoning, misunderstand the nature of emptiness, begin to stagnate and aimlessly go with the flow, and block out all disturbing thoughts.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 777
(3/1/04 10:56 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Well, I guess I don't fit all definitions.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 780
(3/1/04 11:07 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

I'd like to break this apart a bit...

Enlightenment (n): A blissful state attained by middle class American adolescents

What does being an American, or in the middle class, have anything to do with being enlightened or not?

who read a few spiritual books

Do you really know how many I've read? If I read none, would I be better off or worse off? Why? If I read 1,000 spiritual books, or read 1..what difference does it make?

make one or two advances in their reasoning

A person either thinks rationally, or doesn't. There aren't advancements.

misunderstand the nature of emptiness

How have I misunderstood "the nature of emptiness"?

begin to stagnate and aimlessly go with the flow

What shows that I've turned aimless and stagnant? How am I going with the flow? What flow? Did I begin with aim and passion? What was I aiming at then, and why was I so passionate about that aim?

and block out all disturbing thoughts.

What disturbing thoughts have I blocked out? How do you know if I've blocked them out or not?

aapma

Registered User

Posts: 2

(3/2/04 4:28 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

---

Is there really such a thing as an ego that we have to set aside to become enlightened?

Is it not that we have been unknowingly manipulated into a false self by our parents, teachers and peers as we were taught by them through our growing years?

What was or is the perfect or bad childhood, how does any person define it, easy for a bad one, the bad memories stay with you constantly until you rid your self of them, what about the good, or perfect ones? What is it that makes a person feel that their childhood was good or perfect?, good job, money, no problems in their life.

Is it not a change of life, circumstances or happenings that make many people look at their life, no matter what they thought about there childhood and from their some look further until there is no going back because of the benefits of their new awareness of who they are and the different way of thinking.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1647

(3/2/04 12:39 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment

I'd like to know why Francis Bacon was listed as an example of an enlightened person...

Jesus and Buddha I get, but Bacon?

Dan Rowden

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

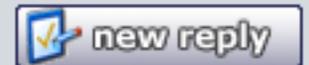

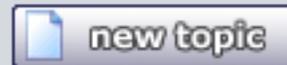

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Author	Comment
MGregory Posts: 459 (3/2/04 12:43 pm) Reply 	Re: Enlightenment <hr/> Maybe it's a koan :-)
winston rumfoord Posts: 8 (3/2/04 3:52 pm) Reply	Dig it man... <hr/> You either believe you are a manifestation of God's perfect love or you don't. And if you don't that's cool too, God won't be trippin on you for that, trust me.  That's enlightenment.  As for a soul returning to do it's life's work and not 'ascending' until it does... please!  "We are here to fart around. Don't let anyone tell you differently." K. Vonnegut  or  "Life's a garden. Dig it." Joe Dirt

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 72
(3/2/04 4:18 pm)
Reply

Re: Dig it man...

---

Quote:

---

As for a soul returning to do it's life's work and not 'ascending' until it does...please!

---

I agree life's work? forget about the soul and get into spirit :)

Quote:

---

"We are here to fart around. Don't let anyone tell you differently." K. Vonnegut or

"Life's a garden. Dig it." Joe Dirt

---

yeah! these I can feel

Enlightenment? - well I really have no idea about that all I know is I won't be trippin if you don't feel the love

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2496
(3/2/04 11:09 pm)
Reply

---

---

I felt some love on my leg from a dog I nearly tripped on in someones garden while farting around, and was quite enlightened.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2497
(3/2/04 11:12 pm)
Reply

---

---

This is true. Except I don't know what I meant when I said I was quite enlightened. I was repulsed. It was one of those jack russell things.

1Mike S Registered User Posts: 3 (3/5/04 12:50 am) Reply	Re: Enlightenment <hr/> voce wrote: Quote: <hr/> Do you really know how many I've read? If I read none, would I be better off or worse off? Why? If I read 1,000 spiritual books, or read 1..what difference does it make? <hr/> If you read 1,000 books, then you would be totally lost in all the metaphysical aspects of them and completely miss the reality that is "hidden" in many writings.
voce io Registered User Posts: 793 (3/5/04 4:22 am) Reply	... <hr/> Maybe.
1Mike S Registered User Posts: 4 (3/5/04 7:17 am) Reply	Re: ... <hr/> I'm pretty sure that if you have read that many books and have not found what life is about, then you're lost (I know you haven't, but think about the WHY of anyone who did/does).
primus meridian Posts: 8 (3/8/04 2:14 am) Reply 	Re: ... <hr/> I enjoy going through the posts in this forum. To me enlightenment is attainable to anyone, even me. I've seen fleeting glimpses here and there of the Light, enough even that I can know that the term 'enlightenment' is a very literal term; that literally, God's Light and Spirit descends upon you and rests on the top of your crown and in your heart; you're also 'lighter' in terms of weight, as Light as a feather. Therefore the term 'enlightenment' is a very clear, concise, complete and literal term.

MGregory
Posts: 488
(3/8/04 6:39 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

That sounds like an ordinary altered state of consciousness.

MGregory
Posts: 489
(3/8/04 6:54 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Did you happen to feel this light state when reading about Jesus, the Buddha, and Francis Bacon?

wounded bird
Posts: 14
(3/13/04 11:30 pm)
Reply

Reply

---

This has always been my idea of Enlightenment which probably to most of you means that I am definitely unenlightened. It seems to me that those of you who are "enlightened" or at least understand it know that it is already there and has been. Like it is a space within screaming to get out and dispense and disperse with this human thing that is its container. The container that keeps it from flowing and being.

XXX Static X gave me analogy in another thread and it seemed as though this is what he was trying to say, but then again, I could be mistaken.

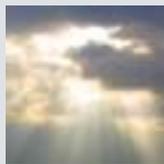

So to do any "good" works in an unenlightened state would then mean that these were done by the self rather than allowing this enlightened being to do as it will because it was thought. Do those who believe they are enlightened just live and attribute everything they do to this enlightened being? In other words, if you are in a "god" state do you do no wrong? Or is wrong part and parcel of this whole thing in that there is no wrong, all is good because all emanates through God? One last chance to clear up my bad way of asking things...Do all things emanate from God, both good and bad, so it matters not what you do for it is all God? If so, is there any consequence...I guess not.

MGregory

Posts: 527

(3/14/04 8:52 am)

Reply

Re: Reply

---

Quote:

This has always been my idea of Enlightenment which probably to most of you means that I am definitely unenlightened. It seems to me that those of you who are "enlightened" or at least understand it know that it is already there and has been. Like it is a space within screaming to get out and dispense and disperse with this human thing that is its container. The container that keeps it from flowing and being.

---

Different people have different definitions of enlightenment, but my understanding of it is that it is a state free of false thoughts. By diligently using one's reason, one can eliminate all the causes of violence, greed, pride, hatred, love, etc., from oneself and live with a consciousness full of God. This is done by ruthlessly analyzing the nature of existence, until one sees that all finite entities in Nature (God) have no independent existence, and seeing that in Truth there is only God and that all finite things are temporary illusions that have no real existence apart from Nature. It is a radical change in one's perspective and interpretation of Reality, yet it is extremely subtle and difficult to grasp. It's definitely not something inside of us that is kicking and screaming to get out, it's more of a transformation of oneself into God by first learning to value God over all else, which, although some people seem to be better than others at it, is a very difficult thing for people to do. But as Jesus said, no one can serve two masters, so it's very essential to be uncompromising in one's relationship to God.

---

Quote:

So to do any "good" works in an unenlightened state would then mean that these were done by the self rather than allowing this enlightened being to do as it will because it was thought. Do those who believe they are enlightened just live and attribute everything they do to this enlightened being? In other words, if you are in a "god" state do you do no wrong? Or is wrong part and parcel of this whole thing in that there is no wrong, all is good because all emanates through God? One last chance to clear up my bad way of asking things...Do all things emanate from God, both good and bad, so it matters not what you do for it is all God? If so, is there any consequence...I guess not.

---

Well, unenlightened people act from egotism, by definition, so everything they do reinforces egotism in others. The enlightened act out of their uncompromising relationship to God, so their actions always lead people to God, although the unenlightened may not necessarily see it because their view of the world is upside-down. They see their ego as God and God as their ego, basically.

wounded bird

Posts: 15

(3/15/04 12:53 am)

Reply

MGregory Post

---

Quote:

---

Different people have different definitions of enlightenment, but my understanding of it is that it is a state free of false thoughts. By diligently using one's reason, one can eliminate all the causes of violence, greed, pride, hatred, love, etc., from oneself and live with a consciousness full of God.

---

This, to me, makes quite a bit of sense and hopefully what all of mankind seeks to do.

Quote:

---

This is done by ruthlessly analyzing the nature of existence, until one sees that all finite entities in Nature (God) have no independent existence, and seeing that in Truth there is only God and that all finite things are temporary illusions that have no real existence apart from Nature. It is a radical change in one's perspective and interpretation of Reality, yet it is extremely subtle and difficult to grasp.

---

My father talked to me one day about God and infinity. He has never really spoken about his beliefs before this time. He understands God to be this way...or let me say the sentence he said as it may be prone to several interpretations: God is infinite. We cannot understand infinity because our minds cannot grasp the concept. This very moment we are in WILL happen again exactly as it is based on the definition of infinity.

I have often said that we are brought back time and again to issues that we cannot get through until we “see the light”, as it were, however, I meant this in our own lifetime, not LIFETIMES. I suppose I cannot see to understand the concept of infinity either. Mainly because I am a Christian and believe in what Christ talked about.

So, how do you believe: is it once you reach this “enlightened” stage, do you join God and get out of the loop or is then that you are enlightened and when the loop comes back around you are in it and can help others become that way as a teacher now instead of a student? Or do you have some other idea about infinity?

So, in short, do you believe that all things are God? Interesting concept that I was debating with someone on a Philosophy Forum a while back. Theoretically, after arguing I got to where it made sense as matter is neither created nor destroyed only altered in form...but then again, that is science, and God is...well, God. We may never be able to understand Him until we are there.

Quote:

---

It's definitely not something inside of us that is kicking and screaming to get out, it's more of a transformation of oneself into God by first learning to value God over all else, which, although some people seem to be better than others at it, is a very difficult thing for people to do. But as Jesus said, no one can serve two masters, so it's very essential to be uncompromising in one's relationship to God.

---

You see, I believe in some ways it is something trying to come to the forefront. If you believe that God lives within, which I do...it's called a soul/spirit. This soul/spirit is to be fed in ways, many ways similar to what you have just discussed. However, this self of ours, our container prohibits us through thought, act and deed to become this enlightened being that we are to be. In essence, we are not allowing our “true self”, that is, the soul/spirit to take over.

It is in sickness that I have found that I am no longer a force to be reckoned, I have been beaten by my health knowing that I am no longer the strong, proud, haughty being that I once was. I am abandoning something very important to me from my “old life”, almost my lifeblood, to venture out into this unknown world similar to that of one who is starting life over again...a person out of college, so to speak. True, I have a safety net, but it is the most difficult and frightening thing I have ever done in my life...it was a throwing away of my very identity. I was given many, many chances to take it back (I believe it is God doing so), but I feel more free than I have in my life.

So you see, I think we all go through stages, but to become truly enlightened requires our very death, not by our own hand, but the hand of God for He created the self what He wants back is the perfected soul/spirit.

Quote:

---

They see their ego as God and God as their ego, basically.

---

You may still see my explanation as this, but if you do let me warn you that I also believe mightily in prayer and its power over all things. No, not the pray for Aunt Matilda to get over her cold, but prayer that is yielding to God and His will. The one thing from my illness that I have learned is that we are weak and can be knocked off with the bluster of the wind. WE ARE NOTHING. We must yield to that power that guides us onward to the goal which is returning to him.

So, are we flush with each other or do you still have issues with me? I very much appreciate your kindness in trying to help me understand this for a lot of people say many words but they aren't clarifying. XXX Static X used an analogy that is pretty much in line with what you said, so two for two are some decent odds.

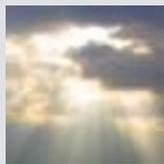

THANK YOU!!!!!!

MGregory

Posts: 532

(3/15/04 12:04 pm)

Reply

Re: MGregory Post

---

Quote:

---

Matt: Different people have different definitions of enlightenment, but my understanding of it is that it is a state free of false thoughts. By diligently using one's reason, one can eliminate all the causes of violence, greed, pride, hatred, love, etc., from oneself and live with a consciousness full of God.

wounded bird: This, to me, makes quite a bit of sense and hopefully what all of mankind seeks to do.

---

Well, as far as I can tell, very few people seek this, because people look at their ego, or parts of it at least, and think if it as God. In other words, they chop up God conceptually, and in doing so, destroy Him.

Quote:

---

My father talked to me one day about God and infinity. He has never really spoken about his beliefs before this time. He understands God to be this way...or let me say the sentence he said as it may be prone to several interpretations: God is infinite. We cannot understand infinity because our minds cannot grasp the concept. This very moment we are in WILL happen again exactly as it is based on the definition of infinity.

---

I agree with your father that God is infinite, except that I believe our minds can understand it, because we are immersed in it and we are it. But I think you are right that the Infinite cannot be captured in a concept. The concept is just a finger pointing to the moon.

Quote:

---

So, how do you believe: is it once you reach this "enlightened" stage, do you join God and get out of the loop or is then that you are enlightened and when the loop comes back around you are in it and can help others become that way as a teacher now instead of a student? Or do you have some other idea about infinity?

---

I think "the loop" is seen to be God, so there is no getting out and returning. This follows directly from the fact that God is infinite, so there are no limits that can be crossed at all. The limit is in our understanding, which is always composed of God, it's just that we cannot see God directly until we are enlightened.

Quote:

---

So, in short, do you believe that all things are God? Interesting concept that I was debating with someone on a Philosophy Forum a while back. Theoretically, after arguing I got to where it made sense as matter is neither created nor destroyed only altered in form...but then again, that is science, and God is...well, God. We may never be able to understand Him until we are there.

---

Yes, I believe all things are God. In fact, I know that this is the case because I define the word "God" to mean the totality, the unity of all things. Science will never find God because science is about chopping things up and categorizing them, which is the exact opposite of what one has to do to approach God. Approaching God involves discovering how it is that we are unconsciously chopping up Reality and coming to know that this is false and why it is false, so we can continue to do this in order to live without forgetting about God.

Quote:

---

You see, I believe in some ways it is something trying to come to the forefront. If you believe that God lives within, which I do...it's called a soul/spirit. This soul/spirit is to be fed in ways, many ways similar to what you have just discussed. However, this self of ours, our container prohibits us through thought, act and deed to become this enlightened being that we are to be. In essence, we are not allowing our "true self", that is, the soul/spirit to take over.

---

I believe that God is within, without, everywhere. To me the soul is the will to know God, and I think everyone has the seed of this within them, it's just that it is rarely developed and most people spend their lives destroying it, so in this sense it can be said that most people don't have souls. A dark thought perhaps, but I think of it as simply God's Will, and so is just another perfect manifestation of God.

Quote:

---

True, I have a safety net, but it is the most difficult and frightening thing I have ever done in my life...it was a throwing away of my very identity. I was given many, many chances to take it back (I believe it is God doing so), but I feel more free than I have in my life.

---

I agree things like that can be very frightening and dreadful at first.

Quote:

---

So you see, I think we all go through stages, but to become truly enlightened requires our very death, not by our own hand, but the hand of God for He created the self what He wants back is the perfected soul/spirit.

---

Well, I'm not Christian in the ordinary sense of the word, so this may sound strange, but I don't think God actually "wants" anything. For one, God is perfect, because He is Infinite, so there is nothing outside of God to compare Him with in order to make Him imperfect. Secondly, for Him to want something, He would have to have consciousness, which He cannot have because He is Infinite, and consciousness requires finitude, it requires limits. Specifically, it requires the ability to focus on an object (a part of the Totality) at the exclusion of all else. God needs no such ability, since He is everything. If "want" can be applied to God, then it is only in a metaphorical sense, in that the price of knowing God is fixed as absolute and cannot be changed. And that price is one's ego, which is very much a kind of death. God accepts nothing but your entire life as a sacrifice. This is what I think Jesus was talking about.

Quote:

---

You may still see my explanation as this, but if you do let me warn you that I also believe mightily in prayer and its power over all things. No, not the pray for Aunt Matilda to get over her cold, but prayer that is yielding to God and His will.

---

I believe in that, too, only I don't think of it as something done at one's bedside, which is what I think of when I hear the word "prayer", but I think of it as something that needs to be done continuously for it to have any effect on oneself. I think of God and His Will as being the same thing.

Quote:

---

The one thing from my illness that I have learned is that we are weak and can be knocked off with the bluster of the wind. WE ARE NOTHING. We must yield to that power that guides us onward to the goal which is returning to him.

---

I think we have to actively create the power the guides us to Him, because it is our nature to want to avoid it.

Quote:

---

So, are we flush with each other or do you still have issues with me?

---

Well, I may disagree, I may try a shock tactic or two, but I am only trying to challenge/humble people and myself. I think people need to follow their own souls, as it were. I wouldn't recommend believing in anything I or anyone else tells you. I think a person needs to develop their own understanding through deep thinking, and belief tends to short-circuit understanding. I think a little bit of true understanding is better than a lot of belief, since understanding is capable of growing and belief really can't. And if it is really off-the-wall it can even require a lot of effort to maintain.

Quote:

---

I very much appreciate your kindness in trying to help me understand this for a lot of people say many words but they aren't clarifying.

---

You're welcome, but I kind of see it as practice, too, so it's not entirely unselfish. Or perhaps an escape :-)

Quote:

---

XXX Static X used an analogy that is pretty much in line with what you said, so two for two are some decent odds.

---

I am undecided about XXX Static X. I honestly don't know what he is trying to say.

wounded bird
Posts: 16
(3/15/04 1:18 pm)
Reply

MGregory Post #2

---

Quote:

---

The limit is in our understanding, which is always composed of God, it's just that we cannot see God directly until we are enlightened

---

Have you ever met, personally, an enlightened being?

Quote:

---

I don't think God actually "wants" anything. For one, God is perfect, because He is Infinite, so there is nothing outside of God to compare Him with in order to make Him imperfect. Secondly, for Him to want something, He would have to have consciousness, which He cannot have because He is Infinite, and consciousness requires finitude, it requires limits. Specifically, it requires the ability to focus on an object (a part of the Totality) at the exclusion of all else. God needs no such ability, since He is everything. If "want" can be applied to God, then it is only in a metaphorical sense, in that the price of knowing God is fixed as absolute and cannot be changed. And that price is one's ego, which is very much a kind of death. God accepts nothing but your entire life as a sacrifice. This is what I think Jesus was talking about.

---

My father says that about God as well, so in some ways this makes Jesus an interesting study. I am a Christian but not a go to church practicing one either...I suppose I have fallen away from organized religion because it just doesn't make sense anymore. Further, I get involved in these conversations with people around where I live and they quote the Bible, which in and of itself has been translated several times from the original, and was written way after the fact of events. Some are even made up to explain how something came to be, and it is taken literally. They quote about dogmatic ideas that have nothing to do with what Christ was about. He followed the rules in order to not lead rule followers astray unless it made no sense to do so...such as the healing on the Sabbath and the eating of the corn on the Sabbath because they were hungry, etc...

So, do you have issues reconciling what you know is right to what you do in life? Does it tear you up or do you take human frailty in stride as part of the process? I guess what I mean is that full sacrifice of your life and will is very difficult. Wake up calls happen, but the question is do people listen, do they heed the call? It is frightening, it is difficult but once done will the next chapter unfold?

I still may not be making a bit of sense, but this goes to doing God's Will, how do you know what that is...or is living in the present moment and addressing what is in front of you in the manner you speak God's Will? You speak of actively creating the power to guide us to Him, but is that in works or just living?

Quote:

---

I believe in that, too, only I don't think of it as something done at one's bedside, which is what I think of when I hear the word "prayer", but I think of it as something that needs to be done continuously for it to have any effect on oneself. I think of God and His Will as being the same thing.

---

As to the bedside, me neither, prayer is a continual conversation...but God = His Will, now that's one to think about. Another person that I had a discussion with naturally brought up the "made in his image and likeness", a quote that came from OT. I'm just not quite sure that we CAN quantify

God, especially based on OT writings, but God = His Will is an interesting concept for what was Jesus Christ but His Will. Of Course, Jesus was God incarnate..MGregory, you have given me some truly intriguing bits to chew on here. *smile*

Quote:

---

I think we have to actively create the power the guides us to Him, because it is our nature to want to avoid it.

---

Why do you say this - the avoidance part?

Quote:

---

I think a little bit of true understanding is better than a lot of belief, since understanding is capable of growing and belief really can't.

---

Belief is believing in something out of faith. Understanding takes knowledge, and knowledge one can get through study and research. But, as you know, understanding is not knowledge, is it? Understanding is something else that has an essence about it. Once you begin to understand something, you realize it is more than a fact, it has essence to it, so you begin to have a belief in it, and sometimes it is not easy to explain why. So, you see, to me, understanding is the catalyst with knowledge to making a belief exist, which then makes beliefs better than just understanding because you've moved from point A (lack of knowledge) to point B (knowledge by belief)...or enlightenment. Maybe my argument is flawed, if so, help me out.

If I understand XXX Static X, he is simply saying the same things you have said, but in a parable...but I may not have "understood" him like I thought. Although, they do get pretty rough on here sometimes. *smile*

Edited by: wounded bird at: 3/15/04 9:47 pm

MGregory

Posts: 540

(3/16/04 11:51 pm)

Reply

Re: MGregory Post #2

---

Quote:

---

Have you ever met, personally, an enlightened being?

---

Nope.

---

Quote:

---

I get involved in these conversations with people around where I live and they quote the Bible, which in and of itself has been translated several times from the original, and was written way after the fact of events.

---

Yes, this is why it's important not to rely on these things for one's knowledge of God, because we can never know where these things came from. One's reason is really the only reliable source of knowledge. That's not to say we can't learn from people and books like the Bible, but we need to be very critical of them and make certain that what they are saying is true. For one, we could be misunderstanding it, and two, people and books are generally full of shit! :-) We have to be very careful, since even one slight mistake will turn you away from Truth and from God. There is no such thing as a partial understanding of God, so it's crucial to develop a healthy love of Truth, so we don't grow attached to our errors.

---

Quote:

---

So, do you have issues reconciling what you know is right to what you do in life? Does it tear you up or do you take human frailty in stride as part of the process? I guess what I mean is that full sacrifice of your life and will is very difficult. Wake up calls happen, but the question is do people listen, do they heed the call? It is frightening, it is difficult but once done will the next chapter unfold?

---

I think we have to be honest about what our limitations are and strive to overcome them. It's entirely up to Nature whether we are successful in this or not, so it wouldn't be truthful to blame ourselves if we fail. I think if anything they serve as a reminder that we should always humble ourselves before God.

Quote:

---

I still may not be making a bit of sense, but this goes to doing God's Will, how do you know what that is...or is living in the present moment and addressing what is in front of you in the manner you speak God's Will? You speak of actively creating the power to guide us to Him, but is that in works or just living?

---

I'd say works and living are the same thing. In my mind, Truth is God, so reasoning gives us Truth initially and faith empowers it. I tried to describe my idea of faith below.

Quote:

---

...but God = His Will, now that's one to think about.

---

Well, God is cause and effect. If you think about it, you'll see it can't be otherwise.

Quote:

---

Matt: I think we have to actively create the power the guides us to Him, because it is our nature to want to avoid it.

wounded bird: Why do you say this - the avoidance part?

---

Well, it's just a fact :-) We want to be happy, for example, but our happiness precludes God. We want to be loved, but love precludes God too. We want to be important, but our importance precludes God. Everything normally considered human has to be abandoned to know God, that's what I meant by "sacrificing oneself". One has to literally become God and learn to live above this world and everything in it, so this is why we have a very strong tendency to avoid it. It goes against our survival instincts and everything we grew up with and so forth.

Quote:

---

Matt: I think a little bit of true understanding is better than a lot of belief, since understanding is capable of growing and belief really can't.

wounded bird: Belief is believing in something out of faith. Understanding takes knowledge, and knowledge one can get through study and research. But, as you know, understanding is not knowledge, is it? Understanding is something else that has an essence about it. Once you begin to understand something, you realize it is more than a fact, it has essence to it, so you begin to have a belief in it, and sometimes it is not easy to explain why. So, you see, to me, understanding is the catalyst with knowledge to making a belief exist, which then makes beliefs better than just understanding because you've moved from point A (lack of knowledge) to point B (knowledge by belief)...or enlightenment. Maybe my argument is flawed, if so, help me out.

---

Sorry, I was talking about beliefs that aren't true. I think I pretty much agree with you, but let me explain how I think of it to be sure that we don't falsely agree with one another.

There are two kinds of knowledge, scientific knowledge (knowledge about the world, like whether something is hot or cold), and spiritual knowledge, which is knowledge of God (universal knowledge). In other words, there is knowledge about finite things, and knowledge about the Infinite. Now, we need to know about the things around us to survive, so it's good to know about those things, but I'm going to talk about spiritual knowledge from here on out.

We can have some piece of spiritual knowledge, like 'all things are caused', and accept it on the surface, but we may not have a deep understanding of it, and we may not even really believe it, may not even want to believe it, but we might only think we do. For example, if everything is caused, then it follows that people have no free will at all, and that a person is just an empty collection of causes with nothing beyond them. They are no different to a machine or a leaf in the wind in that respect. Everything a person does has causes because there is nothing whatsoever that exists that is not caused.

We generally don't like to believe things like that, but this is the transforming type of knowledge that draws us to God. It seems obvious, at least to me, that if people are actually not real and just a collection of causes, then it becomes impossible to become angry with them or love them, but it's difficult to see at first, because, as I said, we don't like to believe in these things. So we have to think about these things carefully, meditate on them, and assimilate them into ourselves and into the rest of our knowledge. The more we think about things like this, the deeper our understanding becomes and the more we will be able to believe in it.

So understanding and belief kind of go hand in hand. You should never believe in something unless you are certain that it is true. We inherit many beliefs that are not true, so part of all this, the biggest part perhaps, is rooting out all these false beliefs. The belief that we will die is a good example. There is no way to be certain of this, so there is no reason to believe that it is certain. Some scientist could suddenly discover the secret to immortality or something. This possibility in itself is enough to know that death is uncertain. Only universal knowledge is certain, knowledge based on experience is never certain, since there is no way of knowing what is impossible for Nature to accomplish. There is no reason to think that any event or explanation is impossible.

Now faith is a higher form of belief, which I think of as understanding in action. This is the most difficult part about it, because now not only do we have to fully understand God, but we have act on that understanding. I say "we have to", but we don't really have to do anything, I just mean we have to in order to become closer to God. So faith means acting in accordance with one's knowledge of God, which intensifies one's understanding and belief in Truth, and also drags the people around you up to God with you, which they probably won't appreciate :-). So having faith is probably the most difficult part about it. Faith is living in accordance with reason.

Quote:

---

Although, they do get pretty rough on here sometimes.
*smile*

---

All in good fun :-)

wounded bird

Posts: 18

(3/17/04 9:05 am)

Reply

MGregory Post #3

---

MGregory, you are ok, you know that?

As to meeting an enlightened person, I can't say that I have either especially since I'm not sure any of us are truly enlightened until we make the final sacrifice of death...letting go of life itself. Gladly going when the Father calls us to go...no fighting. However, I have met a man who is closer than most and he is an extraordinary person. He is a priest. He is one of those people who radiate the Light. One reason why I get tired of organized religion, you finally find someone who is worth listening to and they transfer him to some town in obscurity when he needs to be talking to the many. Although, I've just shown how "un"enlightened I truly am for who am I to question His Will.

As an aside, we are both on the same page on beliefs. We all start out with our parent's belief system but then gradually find our own way to the Truth.

Thank you so very much for sharing and taking time out of your life to discuss enlightenment with me. There are so many terms and "righteous" leaders abounding with their own disciples. I think I have understood enlightenment but I just never called it that word before. Each time I see something new on the spiritual side of things, I am curious to find out how it differs from what I know or believe.

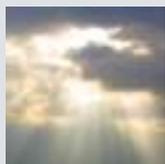

With your explanation, I don't feel there is any difference than that all mankind should be chasing after, however, there are others who make it out to be something all together unlike what you said, and it doesn't seem "all in good fun". Perhaps I am too sensitive, but you did help me out with what I sought, so therefore, I shall be moving along. Thanks again!

MGregory

Posts: 546

(3/17/04 8:54 pm)

Reply

Re: MGregory Post #3

---

Ok, take care.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 888
(3/18/04 2:08 pm)
Reply

Re: MGregory Post #3

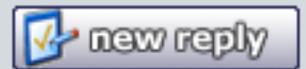

MGregory: There is no such thing as a partial understanding of God, so it's crucial to develop a healthy love of Truth, so we don't grow attached to our errors.

Truth seeking is the path of the philosopher. I think it is a valid path to enlightenment, but does it lead all the way to the destination? One might doubt it. Another path is that of love and devotion; and it is arguable which of the two paths is superior. The path of love certainly reduces the potential for errors. We are often wrong about what is truth, but we are seldomly wrong about what is love.

Thomas

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM > Enlightenment

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Author	Comment
birdofhermes Registered User Posts: 1474 (3/18/04 3:05 pm) Reply 	Re: MGregory Post #3 <hr/> Can't I have both?
MGregory Posts: 548 (3/18/04 6:50 pm) Reply 	Re: MGregory Post #3 <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Thomas: Truth seeking is the path of the philosopher. I think it is a valid path to enlightenment, but does it lead all the way to the destination? One might doubt it. Another path is that of love and devotion; and it is arguable which of the two paths is superior. The path of love certainly reduces the potential for errors. We are often wrong about what is truth, but we are seldomly wrong about what is love. <hr/> Reason and devotion are two parts of the same path. Using reason without devotion to Truth leads to science. Using devotion without

	reason leads to religion. One needs to reason about Truth and be devoted to Truth. Edited by: MGregory at: 3/18/04 6:52 pm
Canadian Zoetrope  Registered User Posts: 34 (3/21/04 7:15 am) Reply 	Enlightenment. <hr/> Enlightenment is the exposition of our dualistic mindset and the inherent fallacy of said mindset. It is the discovery not of the concept of enlightenment, but the reality of what is. It can be called the cell in which we are all prisoners, but which we also police.
Thomas Knierim Registered User Posts: 899 (3/21/04 1:29 pm) Reply	Re: Enlightenment. <hr/> MGregory: Using reason without devotion to Truth leads to science. Using devotion without reason leads to religion. Come on, these are pretty wild generalizations. I don't believe that you are un-reasonable enough to hold such a stereotypical view. Thomas

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > The Thinkers' Inn
- > Enlightenment in Two Steps

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Author	Comment
 Captain Nemo Underwater  Registered User Posts: 448 (4/28/04 11:34 am) Reply ezSupporter 	Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> mind ego universe enlightenment
Dave Toast Registered User Posts: 1089 (4/29/04 7:29 am) Reply 	Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> That's a bit mad mate. Last night, being as this place sucks so hard, I was googling around for forums of the type and I noticed quite a few references to 'enlightenment in two steps' or 'two easy steps', 'so many easy steps', etc. I passed them all over thinking they'd be intentional or unintentional jokes. I searched a few other related things, one of which was to check up on me old Captain Nemo Underwater to see what he's up to these days, for the first time in a long time. Neither search was particularly fruitful so I checked back here before switching off. And voila, this post. I tried to answer last night but EZboard had started doing their thing.

Nice straightforward words BTW.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User
Posts: 449
(4/29/04 8:14 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Toasty,

I also had you in mind when I sent this over. The universe is a wonderful place and it is quite beyond me how it does this sort of thing. But it DOES IT to point out something important.

Good to see you here! How's it going?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1090
(4/29/04 8:38 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

It is as it is mate.

All good ;-)

I've been noticing those important things being pointed out on a regular occasion lately. Or rather I've been noticing on a more regular occasion.

How are you, still a racist biker? ;-P

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1094
(4/29/04 8:58 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Have you heard that 'Burning for Buddy' BTW?

And I'm still pimping Ozrics, you should get their new CD, 'Spirals in Hyperspace'.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 450

(4/29/04 10:24 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

I see my site is still down. Haven't heard any new Ozrics.

What part of England are you in? Is the weather normal for you at this time? Here in Seattle things are unusually warm - all up and down the West Coast. All of my fruit trees are way ahead of schedule. Back East they are freezing.

Have you been hearing about the North Atlantic Ocean current coming to a stop? I think all of this is due to unusual activity of the sun. I've been saying that now for a few years. Recently I've read that the whole solar system is warming up. An interesting time indeed!

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1564

(4/29/04 10:38 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

I've been saying that now for a few years.
Recently I've read that the whole solar system is warming up.

---

I think the actual forecast was partly cloudy, with chance of rain.

Tharan

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1095

(4/29/04 12:19 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Pretty normal April weather here, warm one minute, cold the next, always with the April showers.

I've heard about the possibility of the Gulf Stream 'switching off' and some of the more alarmist reports sound pretty shitty for most of Northern Europe. But I've also heard conflicting reports which say that the rise in temperature required to melt enough of the polar cap to sufficiently desalinate enough water would be more than sufficient to make the question more how we are to handle the heat, as opposed to the cold.

There certainly does seem to have been a lot of unusual activity heading our way from the sun in recent years, the most activity on record. The Northern Lights could be seen quite a way down the UK last year, where they are normally only viewable from the Shetland Isles, way off the northern coast of Scotland. I think you're probably right about this unusual activity being the main cause of warming.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 451

(4/29/04 2:28 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

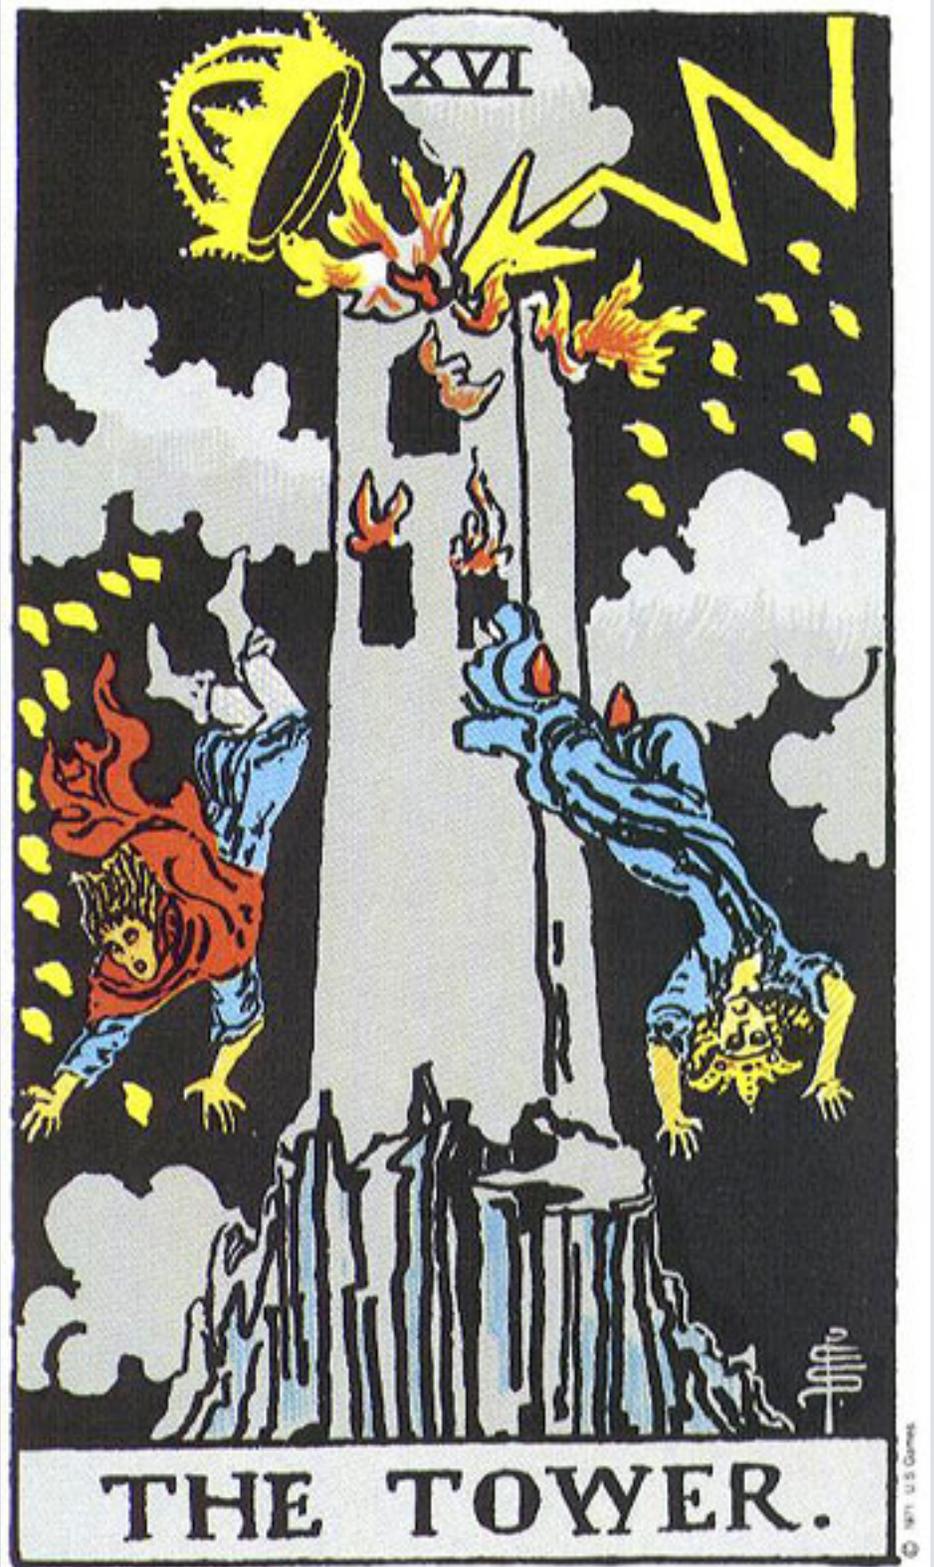

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

I'm a great believer in 'as above, so below' and the symbolic nature of the world. It functions as a subconscious, and sends synchronicity all around us as individuals - and collectively. This is why and how divination systems work....and the connections between us also. The world is god - utterly beyond the Buddha to comprehend. God cannot even comprehend himself! His own magic.

911 was a highly 'symbolic' event. It is mirrored in the tarot card, 'the tower.' It is symbolic of a great power that is being brought to judgment. What is more symbolic of human arrogance than the Two Towers? It is like a monument to the ego - a monument boasting control of the world economic system. It is almost like a great "F YOU" on the horizon. The fact that god took it out should tell you something.

The comet Hale-Bopp was certainly a similar ominous alert. Really, the 'grand sign.' Almost everyone saw it and said, "Wow."

The events all over the world are indications of a 'nervousness' in humans at this time. They are all symbolic of great change and 'a new world order.' But this order is not the one that is being planned by the evil doers. I am predicting that this year will stun the world. It is a time for inner 'gravitas.'

You know that cocky smirk on GW Bush's face? It won't be there anymore after this Summer.

I often have the image of a 'black sun' in my mind. That black cross reminds me of it. It certainly has had spiritual significance for me, but I also feel it says something about the sun and the end times for this age. And, I feel I was born at this time to witness the fall of Babylon. It is also a perfect time to seek enlightenment....

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1096

(4/29/04 3:48 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Wasn't that the Tower of Babel though, that 'God' took out?

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1565

(4/29/04 5:14 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

The events all over the world are indications of a 'nervousness' in humans at this time. They are all symbolic of great change and 'a new world order.' But this order is not the one that is being planned by the evil doers. I am predicting that this year will stun the world. It is a time for inner 'gravitas.'

---

I am glad I moved to Seattle.

The world is always stunned. Perhaps become awake? Where will you be in this sea change?

Quote:

---

I often have the image of a 'black sun' in my mind. That black cross reminds me of it. It certainly has had spiritual significance for me, but I also feel it says something about the sun and the end times for this age. And, I feel I was born at this time to witness the fall of Babylon. It is also a perfect time to seek enlightenment....

---

What ends, begins. Yet we did a duck-and-cover drill at work yesterday. I thought about which one of these.... uhh... never mind. It was fun.

Tharan

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 452

(4/30/04 1:30 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Wasn't that the Tower of Babel though, that 'God' took out?

---

Yes, it is a common theme in the history of man's folly. He becomes arrogant and cruel, then tries to subdue everyone, builds a tower....and is wiped out. It is in the mechanics of the 'subconscious mind' that is the world - or as I say 'god.' Archetypes, repeated themes etc. When you harm others or nature, you are very literally harming yourself. In time this takes the shape of catastrophe.

The world itself is real and beautiful. I see god everywhere. It is man's delusion that is NOT real. You can't blame god or the world. It is like a child who thinks a monster is under his bed. He goes mad, screams and runs all over the house breaking everything in a panic. His delusion is NOT real. There is no monster under his bed.

I guess I am saying that, really, 'god' does not do this or that - it is man who does it to himself.

Edited by: Captain Nemo Underwater  at: 4/30/04 1:32 am

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1097

(4/30/04 2:19 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

All powerful and yet powerless. God and man.

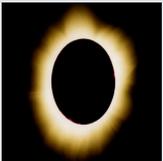

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2615

(4/30/04 3:03 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Only a human comet could signal me to action

Spectators dismissed as they don't have the gist!

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 453

(4/30/04 11:28 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Now we're back:

enlightenment in two steps

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 454

(5/7/04 1:35 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

You know that cocky smirk on GW Bush's face? It won't be there anymore after this Summer.

---

Was I right? Have you seen the photos?

HansReinhardt

Registered User

Posts: 10

(5/8/04 5:04 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

The Buddha perceives the world as god - as a great miracle, an adventure, an unfathomable mystery, a thing of intense beauty – equal to and as unsolvable and unknowable as the Buddha himself.

---

Interesting. If the Buddha perceived the world as god, then it wouldn't be an unfathomable mystery. Unless you are saying that the world is greater than god, at which point the Buddha wouldn't really be a god, but just confused, which isn't really enlightenment.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 455

(5/9/04 10:50 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Interesting. If the Buddha perceived the world as god, then it wouldn't be an unfathomable mystery. Unless you are saying that the world is greater than god, at which point the Buddha wouldn't really be a god, but just confused, which isn't really enlightenmen

---

God is unfathomable. Buddha is unfathomable. God cannot even know the fullness of his own nature. The universe is God striving to know himself - a task that is not possible.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1499

(5/9/04 12:07 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Cap'n! Nice to have you back.

You might want to have a look at a book called The Orion Prophecy. It's about the sun causing pole shift.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 456

(5/9/04 2:08 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Hi Birdy,

Yes, I've come back from the dead. I almost died last Christmas.

Here is something I found on a review of Orion (speaking of the author):

Quote:

---

He read other books, including The Path of

The Pole by Hapgood; John Anthony West's Serpent in the Sky; and Keepers of Genesis by Hancock and Bauval. These authors provided evidence that, at the end of the last Ice Age, a race of people settled in Egypt following a catastrophe in which their own homeland disappeared (i.e. Atlantis). The Sphinx and pyramids were remnants of those times, about 10,500 years ago, and encoded into them was information about the catastrophe. West and Hancock and Bauval all thought that there was a Hall of Records buried at Giza, which would contain detailed records of the Atlantean civilization and the catastrophe that ended it.

---

Some of this stuff has been on my mind lately. I'm completely convinced that the Giza Pyramid, Stonehedge and some other sites were constructed AFTER an enormous global catastrophe. They were made after the poles had slipped to reorient the global position of the earth with the heavens and to encode certain geographic facts. The people who did this were a remnant of the great global culture who were even more advanced than our present one. Before the earth's poles slipped, the earth was not tilted and people lived at the North pole. The whole globe was like an eternal spring, covered by a canopy which protected people from harmful cosmic radiation. People lived longer and were much healthier. Wiser too. Enlightenment was sort of a normal thing that you worked toward as you grew older. Many of us lived in that age. For instance, when I was young I had a clear memory of UFO's in the sky. I never knew if I had come from a different planet, or an ancient earthly culture which had these things, or if I were seeing some sort of future vision.

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1568

(5/9/04 2:49 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

Quote:

---

The people who did this were a remnant of the great global culture who were even more advanced than our present one.

---

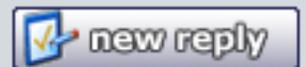

...And yet died out as a result of a mere magnetic shift leaving only stone remnants behind. You are aware that the magnetic north pole and the geographical north pole are not the same, right? The earth's magnetic field is constantly moving around a bit, and has reversed itself on more than a few occasions in the past 3-4 billion years.

On the other hand, I could see John Travolta in a lead role; Battlefield: Middle Earth. With his arch enemy Captain Nemo Underwater and his mysterious sub-optical heat rays, the battle is waged for the souls of the human peasants. I've got my popcorn. :)

Tharan

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > The Thinkers' Inn
- > Enlightenment in Two Steps

Author	Comment
 Captain Nemo Underwater  Registered User Posts: 457 (5/10/04 1:09 am) Reply ezSupporter 	Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> I don't think the earth was tilted 23 degrees back then. It would be better to say that the earth was knocked over. That is what I am saying. That would do it. Not a simple magnetic shift. Much much worse than that.
drowden Forum Host Posts: 1698 (5/11/04 12:58 pm) Reply 	Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> Hey Nemo, I have allowed you one thread here, the purpose of which was to advertise your own board. Two is pure spam, hence my deletion of your "Real Intelligence" thread. If you want to advertise more of your board please do it here in this thread. Dan Rowden

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 459

(5/12/04 12:51 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Actually, my board is my own record to keep stuff. I do the same thing with a motorcycle 'blog' I have. EZ board makes it easy to have a journal this way even though the format is a discussion board.

I provided links to my articles there because it is easy. I could also copy them and put them here as though I have no board. It makes no difference to me. I don't make much of an effort to bring people to my site, although some of the stuff may be of interest to a couple people who come here. To be honest, my site is a record of some of my thoughts so that I can figure out how to eventually explain to my own son what I believe in. It is available for people to take pot shots at it so as to refine my own wording and methods.

I told Birdy that I had no more interest in discussing enlightenment, but the idea came to me to post some thoughts on Julius Evola's excellent book, 'The Doctrine of Awakening.' I noticed right away that what I posted had some relevance to what Toast had been thinking. I recommend the book, and thought maybe someone here would pick it up. The new postings on my site under 'Buddhism' are just quotes from the book. I intended to get to that material. So, if I am advertising something, it is his book.

I won't put up any more links as that is seen as spam. Actually, I probably will leave again for a year or so since no one seems available to discuss any of this now. But, world events will soon become far more interesting than discussing books. 10-4 good buddy - 'till next time.

Oh, I've been riding my Moto Guzzi around quite a bit. Very zen I might add. I keep running into guys with degrees in philosophy! No kidding, it is very odd. I tell them about your site and maybe they will come here to mix it up with you guys. I think you'd like them, they have all the formal training that would make them more interesting.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1700

(5/13/04 9:23 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

I've never met a person with formal philosophical "training" that I thought was especially interesting. People with degrees in "philosophy" are a dime a dozen nowadays; it means little. Actually, it means less than little.

Dan Rowden

HansReinhardt

Registered User

Posts: 20

(5/13/04 1:45 pm)

Reply

re

---

Yes. Learning stuff is bullshit.

It's much better to just make stuff up and be a guru.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1704

(5/14/04 10:57 am)

Reply

Re: re

---

No, it's not better to make stuff up and be a guru, but really, any half-wit can "learn stuff".

"Erudition: dust shaken out of a book into an empty skull."

Dan Rowden

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 652

(5/14/04 3:41 pm)

Reply

Re: re

---

To anything there are only a few exceptions. Learning does set the groundwork for true originality, but we humans take the easiest immediate course, so few get to place their stake on original ground.

komodo island
Registered User
Posts: 2
(5/21/04 4:31 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Enlightenment in 3 steps:

1. Self-abandonment
2. Self-oblivion
3. Self-obliteration

N0X23
Registered User
Posts: 119
(5/27/04 2:51 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Enlightenment in 3 steps:

1. Self-abandonment
  2. Self-oblivion
  3. Self-obliteration
-

Weird..So how can a self do that to itself...What does it use to accomplish these things...itself?

 Captain Nemo Underwater
Registered User
Posts: 471
(5/28/04 1:11 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

In 'normal' consciousness, what is called the 'self' is a collection of bodily and psychological states. In higher, mystical knowledge, what is considered the 'self' is the 'Purusha' or pure 'witness consciousness' otherwise known AS consciousness, or 'awareness.' This could hardly be destroyed. When one is able to 'see' this, one is also aware that there IS NO self. Thus, the self cannot be abandoned or obliterated since it never existed.

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1592

(5/28/04 2:36 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

OMG, I agree with Nemo!

(See Marsha, emotion and logic in one)

Tharan

AryReisin

Registered User

Posts: 4

(5/29/04 2:27 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

In 'normal' consciousness, what is called the 'self' is a collection of bodily and psychological states.

---

Can this I be destroyed? How?

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 121

(5/30/04 2:00 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

In higher, mystical knowledge,

---

What exactly is "higher, mystical knowledge"?

Knowledge is gained thru familiar association which results in experience and yet something mystical is a meaning or reality that is not apprehended thru the intellect or any of the senses.

I'm sensing a contradiction in terms here.

Could you explain how one gains this seemingly contradictory mystical knowledge, that you are referring to?

Quote:

---

When one is able to 'see' this, one is also aware that there IS NO self.

---

NO self...the mantra of the Vedanta. This Neo-Vedantic conception of Atman, seems to be one of the predominant tar-babies of Philosophy.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 472

(5/30/04 10:23 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Can this I be destroyed? How?

---

This is always the question, and I am sure I will answer this a million times in different lives in the same way. Someone else once said, "There is nothing to be attained." This is my experience as well. There is nothing to be added and nothing to be destroyed.

The difference between an enlightened person and an unenlightened person is a very subtle change of perspective. All this pretending that something has changed and that the enlightened one is something very different from others is all baloney - just another ego game.

And yet, your question is the correct question for the seeker. It is front and center in importance. A real seeker who is ready should want to dissolve or 'destroy' the 'I' or the attachment to the ego because he realizes that such attachment is pain. This is fuel for the fire.

In enlightenment, all of these psychological states parading as a self are now seen as objective conditions, not subjective ones. It is a simple matter of seeing correctly. I no longer have a subjective 'I' as you THINK you have. And yet, I still act like you - going to movies and laughing, going to the dentist, riding a motorcycle, eating pizza, bullshitting etc. I also talk and write like a 'normal' person and use the word 'I.' Nothing has changed, and yet I am not deceived that any of it is mine any longer. That is the difference, and it is a VERY subtle one indeed.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 473

(5/30/04 10:53 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Knowledge is gained thru familiar association which results in experience and yet something mystical is a meaning or reality that is not apprehended thru the intellect or any of the senses.

I'm sensing a contradiction in terms here.

---

The key here is 'familiar association.' Mystical experience is also now 'familiar association' because it is a normal, but previously unknown, aspect of one's senses and intellect. Hence, it is NEW knowledge obtained in the same way other fresh experience is obtained. So, 'mystical' simply means 'new' or a new way to gain 'experience.'

Quote:

---

NO self....the mantra of the Vedanta. This Neo-Vedantic conception of Atman, seems to be one of the predominant tar-babies of Philosophy

---

I think you are a little confused. 'No self' is a doctrine of Buddhism. 'Atman' or 'Supreme Self' is a doctrine of Vedanta. There is no 'Neo-Vedantic conception of Atman.' The 'Supreme Self' or Atman has always been spoken of by the Vedantans. Is this what you mean by 'tar baby' - that Vedantans always speak of the Self?

I endorse BOTH ideas! Contradictory, no? Paradox is us. There IS a 'Purusha' or Supreme Witness, and an enlightened person sees it. Thus, he may speak of himself as the Supreme Self one minute and as having 'no self' the next. It's easy once you solve the puzzle.

Edited by: Captain Nemo Underwater 🍌 at: 5/31/04 1:00 am

AryReisin

Registered User

Posts: 7

(5/30/04 1:15 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

The difference between an enlightened person and an unenlightened person is a very subtle change of perspective.

---

What made the perspective change, no matter how subtle it is?

Quote:

---

"There is nothing to be attained." This is my experience as well. There is nothing to be added and nothing to be destroyed.

---

Anything to be done or to be omitted? What did you do, or happened to you? I can understand that maybe because you don't identify with me then you don't feel pity nor anything like that. But just as answering what time is it, could you answer and help me do everything I can do or not do? Even if it is worthless, because I can't help it. It would be like pointing someone where certain street is. And if they are already there, which would be here, then you say: look up, there is the signboard (or whatever is called in english, where it's displayed the named of the street and the number). And if that street doesn't exist or that number doesn't exist, then you say: Sorry, it doesn't exist.

Or it is not in this neighborhood. Or maybe this comparison just doesn't apply. I don't know, you are the enlightened one, not me. So, I am very interested in your "help".

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 475

(5/31/04 1:08 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

What made the perspective change, no matter how subtle it is?

---

Just as your body is doing things 'behind the scenes' to keep you alive without your knowledge, so, too, does the psychological world operate (ask Freud or Jung). Similarly, deep insights are 'worked up' in the subconscious. Many great creative discoveries in science and math are 'put together' in this way and then 'appear' to ones' conscious mind later. But if you look at these scientists, you will find that they did their homework. They have thought about the 'problem' a lot, but couldn't figure it out. They never gave up and they didn't get too bummed-out about it. In your case, you must read much material that pertains to 'enlightenment.' Don't restrict yourself to one master or one path. Look at all of them and compare. You must take long walks thinking about it. It should be on your mind often. While doing this, you should live a normal life and not get overly depressed or crazy about this.

AryReisin

Registered User

Posts: 9

(5/31/04 2:38 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Don't restrict yourself to one master or one path. Look at all of them and compare. You must take long walks thinking about it. It should be on your mind often.

---

In the other topic I told what masters I've read, mostly J.K. and U.G.K.

I use to think about this very very often. And so far the best "I"ve got of it is to occupy oneself with this very own moment's movements: noises, sounds, colours, etc. Not remembering past moments. Because without remembering one cannot suffer nor be bored. Unless there is a physical unconfort like when being sick.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 123

(5/31/04 11:17 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

I think you are a little confused. 'No self' is a doctrine of Buddhism. 'Atman' or 'Supreme Self' is a doctrine of Vedanta.

---

Quote:

---

Is this what you mean by 'tar baby'

---

No. This is what I mean...

Quote:

---

I think you are a little confused. 'No self' is a doctrine of Buddhism.

---

...Ironic to say the least.

Just out of curiosity, how exactly did you come to this conclusion?

Quote:

---

I endorse BOTH ideas! Contradictory, no?
Paradox is us.

---

Yes, the endorsement of any idea/concept, leads to paradoxical contradictions, but this is by no means representative of "us".

Quote:

---

There IS a 'Purusha' or Supreme Witness, and an enlightened person sees it.

---

How does an enlightened person see that which he supposedly is?

Quote:

---

Thus, he may speak of himself as the Supreme Self one minute and as having 'no self' the next. It's easy once you solve the puzzle.

---

Well, Good luck on solving your puzzle.

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User

Posts: 478

(6/1/04 10:44 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

If I thought there was a sincere question in there anywhere, I'd answer it.

Page 1 2 3 4

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - The Thinkers' Inn - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > The Thinkers' Inn
- > Enlightenment in Two Steps

Author	Comment
N0X23  Registered User Posts: 124 (6/1/04 2:34 pm) Reply 	Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Just out of curiosity, how exactly did you come to this conclusion? <hr/> Yes, I sincerely would like to know how you came to the conclusion that the teaching of NO self is Buddhist doctrine, as you have claimed it is.
WolfsonJakk Posts: 1605 (6/1/04 2:44 pm) Reply	Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> The lack of inherent self is fundamental to Buddhist philosophy. Some Hindu varieties may differ, but there is no doubt that the concept of self is the most basic delusion. Tharan

komodo island

Registered User

Posts: 20

(6/1/04 3:41 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Enlightenment in 3 steps:

1. Self-abandonment
  2. Self-oblivion
  3. Self-obliteration
-

Quote:

---

Weird..So how can a self do that to itself...
What does it use to accomplish these things...
itself?

---

It is not something 'you' do. It happens when the parietal lobe is deafferentated, for example, temporarily after a pint of beer, or permanently after lobotomy.

Or meditation (e.g. zazen/shikantaza) has similar effects, but it takes longer time...

komodo island

Registered User

Posts: 21

(6/1/04 3:48 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

In 'normal' consciousness, what is called the 'self' is a collection of bodily and psychological states. In higher, mystical knowledge, what is considered the 'self' is the 'Purusha' or pure 'witness consciousness' otherwise known AS consciousness, or 'awareness.' This could hardly be destroyed. When one is able to 'see' this, one is also aware that there IS NO self. Thus, the self cannot be abandoned or obliterated since it never existed.

---

I am not therefore I am.

There is nothing that is you, there is nothing that is not you.

Just take our 'self' as a shadow.

If there is nothing to do with 'our' shadows, how can anything be done with 'our' self?

After all, who is doing what?

Neither a shadow nor self is 'ours' to begin with.

komodo island

Registered User

Posts: 22

(6/1/04 4:08 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Insomuch as 'our' shadows appear and disappear, so does 'our' selves.

Really the word 'our' here is unnecessary but for communication.

All concepts of 'mine' and 'ours' are just that - concepts.

Kalpana!

We go to toilet and dump 'our' shits, when the 'shit' is 'ours' and when is not?

Whether a shit is inside or outside of the body, it is not 'mine'.

Even this body is not 'mine'.

Shit!!!

komodo island

Registered User

Posts: 23

(6/1/04 5:03 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

"The parietal lobe houses our somatosensation (sensation of the body from touch, pain, and proprioceptive senses) and relates this information to the rest of our sensory information. So, our primary somatosensory cortex lies in the parietal lobe. Immediately posterior to it are the somatosensory association areas. As we continue to go even more posteriorly within the parietal lobe, we approach the occipital lobe with its visual information. So, the more posterior regions of the parietal lobe are where somatosensory and visual information come together. For example, when I look forward toward this screen, I see two hands in front of me. Because I also can sense my arm positions and hand positions, I can integrate my sensation of my body with my visual information and come to the understanding that those two hands are my hands. If we couldn't do that, seeing those two hands would be eerie!"

~~~~~

The knowledge that this flesh-and-bones is 'my' body depends on the proprioceptive functions of posterior superior parietal lobule (PSPL), without which, or when it is deafferentated, there is no way I can know this body as 'mine', still I can see a body here, but because the somatosensation is lost there is nothing to say that it is 'mine'.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 126

(6/1/04 11:29 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

The lack of inherent self is fundamental to Buddhist philosophy. Some Hindu varieties may differ, but there is no doubt that the concept of self is the most basic delusion.

---

Interesting. Would either one of you (Captain, Jakk) be able to show me an example of where the Buddha said that there is NO self?...Thanks

 Captain Nemo Underwater

Registered User
Posts: 483
(6/2/04 1:38 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Komodo said:

Quote:

---

Just take our 'self' as a shadow.

If there is nothing to do with 'our' shadows, how can anything be done with 'our' self?

---

I like this a lot. See, I learn something every day. This is a nice and simple illustration as to how I see 'my' self. I am the shadow to this thing you call 'me.' Why would I care or worry about desire? The body thinks, feels desire, and satisfies desire - it all seems fine to me; why should I care? Who am I to care? ha. I'm glad the body and mind have their own program, it's fun to watch. You think I want to stay in this blackhole in a parallel universe for ever? Heck no, the gods come out to play!

N0X23

Registered User
Posts: 129
(6/3/04 1:44 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

Interesting. Would either one of you (Captain, Jakk) be able to show me an example of where the Buddha said that there is NO self?...Thanks

---

Jakk?
Nemo?

Anyone, anyone?

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 132

(6/6/04 2:24 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Why aren't either of you giving me the courtesy of even attempting to answer my question?

You have both affirmed the NO self doctrine and yet, will not show me an example...why is this?

MGregory

Posts: 570

(6/6/04 5:37 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Here, I'll show you one, even though I don't know jack shit about Buddhism. From the Vimalakirti Sutra, Jeweled Accumulation's little song he sings in the introduction:

Eyes pure and broad like the blue lotus;
mind pure, steeped in meditations;
for pure deeds long accumulated, boundless in fame,
your quietude guides the assembly - thus we bow our heads.

We have seen the great sage work miraculous transformations, showing us all the countless lands in ten directions, the Buddhas expounding the Law therein - every one of these we have seen and heard.

The Dharma King's Dharma powers surpass all other beings, constantly he bestows Dharma riches on them all.
Skillfully he distinguishes the characteristics of phenomena, never faltering in his grasp of the one great Truth.

You have learned to treat all phenomena with freedom, so we bow our heads to this Dharma King.
You define things as neither existing nor not existing;
causes and conditions bring about their birth.

No "I", no doer, no recipient,
yet good and bad karma never cease to function.
Beneath the Buddha tree, you used your might to overpower the devil; gaining the sweet dew of nirvana, you won your way to enlightenment.

etc.

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1620

(6/6/04 9:42 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Nox wrote,

Quote:

---

Why aren't either of you giving me the courtesy of even attempting to answer my question?

You have both affirmed the NO self doctrine and yet, will not show me an example...why is this?

---

Patience, friend. I have only now read this. I will give you two "old-school" examples. Let me know if you prefer something more current.

The following is from The Teaching of Buddha; Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai.

The Real State of Things

1. Impermanency and egolessness

Though both body and mind appear because of cooperating causes, it does not follow that there is an ego-personality. As the body of flesh is an aggregate of elements, it is, therefore, impermanent.

If the body were an ego-personality, it could do this and that as it would determine. A king has the power to praise or punish as he wishes, but he becomes ill despite his intent or desire, he comes to old age unwillingly, and his fortune and his wishes often have little to do with each other.

Neither is the mind the ego-personality. The human mind is an aggregate of causes and conditions. It is in constant change. If the mind were an ego-personality, it could do this and that as it would determine; but the mind often flies from what it knows is right and chases after evil reluctantly. Still nothing seems to happen exactly as it's ego desires.

If one is asked whether the body is constant or impermanent, he will be obliged to answer "impermanent." If one is asked whether impermanent existence is happiness or suffering, he will generally have to answer "suffering."

If a man believes that such an impermanent thing, so changeable and filled with suffering, is the ego-personality, it is a serious mistake. The human mind is also impermanent and suffering; it has nothing that can be called an ego-personality.

Our true body and mind, which make up an individual life, and the external world surrounding it, are far apart from both the conceptions of "me" and "mine." It is simply the mind clouded over by impure desires, and impervious to wisdom, that obstinately persists in hinking of "me and "mine."

Since both the body and it's surroundings are originated by cooperating causes and conditions, they are continually changing and never can come to an end.

<end quote>

The following is from the Sanskrit version of the Dhammapada, translated by Edward Conze, 1959, Penguin Press.

The Questions of King Milinda (paraphrased and excerpted)
2b. Personal Identity and Rebirth

The king asked, "When someone is reborn, Venerable Nagasena, is he the same as the one who just died, or is he another?"

Nagasena replied, "He is neither the same nor another."

"Give me an illustration!"

"What do you think, great king: when you were a tiny baby, newly born and quite soft, were you then the same as the one who is grown up?"

"No, that infant was one, I, now grown up, am another."

"If that is so, then, great king, you have had no mother, no father, no teaching, and no schooling. Do we then take it that there is one mother for the embryo in the first stage, another for the second stage, ...third..., ...fourth..., ...baby..., and another for the grown man? Is the schoolboy one person and the one who has finished school another? Does one commit a crime and the hands and feet of another are cut off?"

"Certainly not! But what else would you say (to resolve this dilemma)?"

Nagasena replied, "I am neither the tiny infant, newly born and quite soft, nor am I now the grown up man; but all these are comprised in one unit depending on this very body."

"Give me an illustration!"

"If a man were to light a lamp, could it give light throughout the whole night?"

"Yes, it could."

"Is now the flame which burns in the first watch of the night the same as the one which burns in the second?"

"It is not the same."

"Or is the flame which burns in the second watch the same as the one which burns in the third?"

"It is not the same."

"Do we take it that there is one lamp in the first watch of the night, another in the second, and yet another in the third?"

"No, it is just one lamp."

"Even so must we understand the collocation of a series of successive dharmmas. At rebirth one dharma arises, while another stops; but the two processes take place simultaneously (i.e. they are continuous). Therefore the first act of consciousness in the new existence is neither the same as the last act of consciousness in the previous existence, nor is it another."

"Give me another illustration!"

"Milk, after the milking is done, turns after some time into curds; from curds it turns into fresh butter, and from fresh butter into ghee. Would it now be correct to say that the milk is the same thing as the curds, or the fresh butter, or the ghee?"

"No it would not." replied the king. "But they have been produced because of it."

"And just so must be understood the collocation of a series of successive dharmmas." replied Nagasena.

<end quote>

And here is a Zen koan:

The Subjugation of a Ghost

A young wife fell sick and was about to die. "I love you so much," she told her husband, "I do not want to leave you. Do not go from me to any other woman. If you do, I will return as a ghost and cause you endless trouble."

Soon the wife passed away. The husband respected her last wish for the first three months, but then he met another woman and fell in love with her. They became engaged to be married.

Immediately after the engagement a ghost appeared every night to the man, blaming him for not keeping his promise. The ghost was clever too. She told him exactly what had transpired between himself and his new sweetheart. Whenever he gave his fiancée a present, the ghost would describe it in detail. She would even repeat conversations, and it so annoyed the man that he could not sleep. Someone advised him to take his problem to a Zen master who lived close to the village. At length, in despair, the poor man went to him for help.

"Your former wife became a ghost and knows everything you do," commented the master. "Whatever you do or say, whatever you give your beloved, she knows. She must be a very wise ghost. Really you should admire such a ghost. The next time she appears, bargain with her. Tell her that she knows so much you can hide nothing from her, and that if she will answer you one question, you promise to break your engagement and remain single."

"What is the question I must ask her?" inquired the man. The master replied: "Take a large handful of soy beans and ask her exactly how many beans you hold in your hand. If she cannot tell you, you will know that she is only a figment of your imagination and will trouble you no longer."

The next night, when the ghost appeared the man flattered her and told her that she knew everything.

"Indeed," replied the ghost, "and I know you went to see that Zen master today."

"And since you know so much," demanded the man, "tell me how many beans I hold in this hand!"

There was no longer any ghost to answer the question.

<end>

And just when you think you get it, yet another:

Nothing Exists

Yamaoka Tesshu, as a young student of Zen, visited one master after another. He called upon Dokuon of Shokoku.

Desiring to show his attainment, he said: "The mind, Buddha, and sentient beings, after all, do not exist. The true nature of phenomena is emptiness. There is no realization, no delusion, no sage, no mediocrity. There is no giving and nothing to be received."

Dokuon, who was smoking quietly, said nothing. Suddenly he whacked Yamaoka with his bamboo pipe. This made the youth quite angry.

"If nothing exists," inquired Dokuon, "where did this anger come from?"

<end>

Tharan

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 134

(6/7/04 3:42 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

McGregory... The Vimalakirti Sutra is Chinese translation of and commentary on, the thoughts of Indian Buddhist Philosophers and not doctrine derived from the teachings of the Buddha.

The Teaching of Buddha; Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai is highly inaccurate and completely misrepresents Buddhism as a whole. In my opinion its junk. I know of a group that are campaigning to cease the printing of this book, its that bad.

Jakk...I keep forgetting the fact that my dry sense of humor does not translate well into text, or the possibility that I just might not be that funny at all.
My post was just meant to bump the thread.

The Questions of King Milinda

This story is using metaphor to express the belief that although there is what appears to be continuity in the cycle of rebirth consciousness, it is still impermanent and void of self.

I don't see how this implies that the Buddha taught there is NO self, or even suggests no self.

The Subjugation of a Ghost and Nothing Exists come from Chinese commentary, translated into Japanese thought and technically, Zen is not classified as Buddhism but, Advaitism.

The Buddha didn't teach non-dualism.

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1625

(6/7/04 4:04 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Yes, I have very dry humor as well and usually face the same issues when I break off a funny.

Quote:

---

The Subjugation of a Ghost and Nothing Exists come from Chinese commentary, translated into Japanese thought and technically, Zen is not classified as Buddhism but, Advaitism.

The Buddha didn't teach non-dualism.

---

This is very interesting information. Would you mind expanding and maybe referencing these two statements?

Tharan

*edit*

Quote:

---

The Teaching of Buddha; Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai is highly inaccurate and completely misrepresents Buddhism as a whole.

---

My, my...this one as well, please. How would you represent Buddhism as a whole to me?

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 6/7/04 4:07 pm

MGregory

Posts: 571

(6/10/04 8:58 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

NOX23: The Vimalakirti Sutra is Chinese translation of and commentary on, the thoughts of Indian Buddhist Philosophers and not doctrine derived from the teachings of the Buddha.

---

So, what writings are derived directly from the Buddha?

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 141

(6/15/04 4:26 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

This is very interesting information. Would you mind expanding and maybe referencing these two statements?

---

There have been many attempts to combine the Advaita Vedanta, non-dualism and the Mahayanist, Sunyata, into some sort of all encompassing, hybridized Buddhism. One of those attempts is known as Zen.

Such ideas as Advaita (meaning the absence of an ultimate distinction between self and the Divine Reality) or any attempt at seeking one's true nature, is dismissed as a metaphysical blunder, based in ignorance of the nature of experience.

Any stance regarding the self or the Self is still considered a false postulation and is categorized as a "personality view", one of the most basic fetters that ties one to Samsara.

Another outrageous claim by the Mahayana is that there is ultimately no distinction between moral and immoral conduct, good and evil, ignorance and enlightenment and Nirvana and Samsara.

They deny conventional dualities because the ultimate nature of all phenomena is emptiness.

And yet the Buddha, time and time again clearly demonstrates the dualities that are clearly evident, such as skillful and unskillful actions, truth vs. ignorance, suffering and liberation...etc.

And while I'm not advocating that the Buddha taught Dualism, he was adamant in fixing our attention on the duality between impermanence and suffering in Samsara and the unborn, ageless, deathless freedom of Nibbana.

Quote:

---

My, my...this one as well, please.

---

Yea I had to go a dig this one out of the boxes.

My major contention with this problematic book is that its basically based on Pure Land which in my opinion is as ignorant of the teachings of the Buddha as to days Christians are of Christ's Teachings.

I haven't had time to actually sit down and re-read it again but glancing around, it claims that Enlightenment is beyond ones ability and that only thru faith can one hope to be re-born into heaven.

Another issue is that they advocate the guilt of sin and the more one sins, the further he is away from his true Buddha nature.

It teaches that concentration of the mind means to get quickly away from greedy and evil desires.

It goes on and on like this.

Quote:

---

How would you represent Buddhism as a whole to me?

---

I will gracefully decline this request. ;)

It might have been more accurate had I stated that in my opinion this book and the majority of its views stand in complete contradiction to the Canonical texts.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 142

(6/15/04 4:55 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

So, what writings are derived directly from the Buddha?

---

Technically that is impossible to say for sure but the Tripitaka is a good place to start.

Quote:

---

Vinaya Pitaka

The collection of texts concerning the rules of conduct governing the daily affairs within the Sangha -- the community of bhikkhus (ordained monks) and bhikkhunis (ordained nuns). Far more than merely a list of rules, the Vinaya Pitaka also includes the stories behind the origin of each rule, providing a detailed account of the Buddha's solution to the question of how to maintain communal harmony within a large and diverse spiritual community.

Sutta Pitaka

The collection of discourses, attributed to the Buddha and a few of his closest disciples, containing all the central teachings of Theravada Buddhism. (Over six hundred sutta translations are available here.)

Abhidhamma Pitaka

The collection of texts in which the underlying doctrinal principles presented in the Sutta

Pitaka are reworked and reorganized into a systematic framework that can be applied to an investigation into the nature of mind and matter.

---

Here is what the Buddha is credited with saying regarding the validity of any teaching, his or otherwise.

Quote:

---

"Do not accept anything on (mere) hearsay -- (i.e., thinking that thus have we heard it from a long time). Do not accept anything by mere tradition -- (i.e., thinking that it has thus been handed down through many generations). Do not accept anything on account of mere rumors -- (i.e., by believing what others say without any investigation). Do not accept anything just because it accords with your scriptures. Do not accept anything by mere suppositions. Do not accept anything by mere inference. Do not accept anything by merely considering the reasons. Do not accept anything merely because it agrees with your pre-conceived notions. Do not accept anything merely because it seems acceptable -- (i.e., thinking that as the speaker seems to be a good person his words should be accepted). Do not accept anything thinking that the ascetic is respected by us (therefore it is right to accept his word).

---

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1641

(6/16/04 3:39 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Nox wrote,

Quote:

---

Another outrages claim by the Mahayana is that there is ultimately no distinction between moral and immoral conduct, good and evil, ignorance and enlightenment and Nirvana and Samsara.

---

There is in fact no absolute distinction between good and evil, as the Mahayanists rightly proclaim. Nature is not concerned with your survival. One may argue for a moral human framework in which these distinctions are defined, but to attribute this morality to Nature itself is the height of delusion and arrogance.

Quote:

---

They deny conventional dualities because the ultimate nature of all phenomenon is emptiness.

And yet the Buddha, time and time again clearly demonstrates the dualities that are clearly evident, such as skillful and unskillful actions, truth vs. ignorance, suffering and liberation...etc.

And while I'm not advocating that the Buddha taught Dualism, he was adamant in fixing our attentions on the duality between impermanence and suffering in Samsara and the unborn, ageless, deathless freedom of Nibanna.

---

You say "the Buddha" says this and yet in your following post, you quote one of the few things supposedly actually uttered by him. Which Buddhist school of thought are you most comfortable with?

One must speak in dual terminology in order for language to work.

Let's dissect the previous sentence for example: one/other, must/must not, speak/be silent or yell or laugh etc., dual/non-dual, terminology/silence or mere sounds, order/chaos, language/non-semantic utterances, work (function)/non-functional.

Thus, in order to transmit information verbally/conceptually, one must use dual terminology. This does not mean that Siddartha did not see the illusory nature of all duality and conceptions.

Quote:

---

My major contention with this problematic book is that its basically based on Pure Land which in my opinion is as ignorant of the teachings of the Buddha as to days Christians are of Christ's Teachings.

---

For the most part, I agree with this statement. As I have said before, Pure Land is like Buddhist Catholicism. You simply run around uttering "Amida" all the time and you are guaranteed a place in Heaven...err, sorry Pure Land.

One could argue though that this sytem would be a useful tool for the less spiritually inclined individuals who would not comprehend the finer points of Zen and the nature of their true existence. Therefore, why not have them meditate and keep their mind focused on something they understand, like a social control structure via simple reward system?

The quote on Impermanency and Egolessness has merit though regardless of the fact that it came from a Pure Land text.

Tharan

*edit*

placed "not" in a strategic location

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 6/16/04 4:32 pm

MGregory

Posts: 589

(6/16/04 5:31 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Thanks Nox, I'll check it out sometime.

N0X23

Registered User

Posts: 144

(6/17/04 4:59 pm)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps

---

Quote:

---

There is in fact no absolute distinction between good and evil, as the Mahayanists rightly proclaim. Nature is not concerned with your survival. One may argue for a moral human framework in which these distinctions are defined, but to attribute this morality to Nature itself is the height of delusion and arrogance.

---

But the Buddha taught that there's a very clear distinction between the saintliness of Devas and the wickedness of Mara.

I think the line between truth/fact and technique often becomes blurred.

I often wonder when I hear someone declare that there's no distinction between good and evil, if that person's life has ever been touched by evil.

If Nature is not concerned with my survival is it concerned with its own and isn't it Nature, that gave us the attributes of self-awareness and morality?

Or if we view the question thru the axiom, "as above so below", isn't Nature, what we are a product of, self aware with a sense of moral balance and universal equilibrium?

Quote:

---

You say "the Buddha" says this and yet in your following post, you quote one of the few things supposedly actually uttered by him. Which Buddhist school of thought are you most comfortable with?

---

Im certainly not looking for a comfort zone in Buddhism, in any of its forms and while I have a preference for the least dogmatic Theravada, I respect the Wisdom contained within all its socially molested interpretations.

Quote:

---

One must speak in dual terminology in order for language to work.

---

We must also act and live within duality to survive.

Hypothetically, say if your child had a benign brain tumor and had to be removed.

Would you then apply the metaphysical doctrine of non-dualism to this reality and let a used car salesman perform the surgery, instead of an experienced neurosurgeon, because ultimately there are no distinctions?

Quote:

---

Thus, in order to transmit information verbally/conceptually, one must use dual terminology. This does not mean that Siddhartha did not see the illusory nature of all duality and conceptions.

---

Well if he did or didn't, what he taught was the comprehension of dualities is an imperative to grasping the Dhamma.

Quote:

---

The quote on Impermanency and Egolessness has merit though regardless of the fact that it came from a Pure Land text.

---

Agreed.

There are a lot of basic tenets in the book that coincide with the Cannon, but for the most part it's a case of seeking a diamond in dog-shit.

Quote:

---

*edit* placed "not" in a strategic location

---

He he... Yes, a very strategic location.

MacGregory sez:

Quote:

---

Thanks Nox, I'll check it out sometime.

---

No problem.

Edited by: NOX23  at: 6/17/04 5:05 pm

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > The Thinkers' Inn
- > Enlightenment in Two Steps

| Author                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1647(6/18/04 3:32 am)Reply | Re: Enlightenment in Two Steps <hr/> Quote: <hr/> But the Buddha taught that there's a very clear distinction between the saintliness of Devas and the wickedness of Mara. I think the line between truth/fact and technique often becomes blurred. <hr/> I think that last sentence is an astute observation. As a practical matter, a person might subscribe to these dual ideas if not for anything else but social functionality. But it should not be mistaken for truth. Quote: <hr/> If Nature is not concerned with my survival is it concerned with its own and isn't it Nature, that gave us the attributes of self-awareness and morality? <hr/> Please describe a scenario when nature's "survival" might be threatened. |

Our self-awareness is limited and relative. Morality is our own, ever-shifting invention.

Quote:

---

Or if we view the question thru the axiom, "as above so below", isn't Nature, what we are a product of, self aware with a sense of moral balance and universal equilibrium?

---

You are viewing it through a lens with a human filter. In nature there is no above nor below in a physical sense. Is there a time when the earth is "above" the sun in it's revolution? Depends on your relative position...

"Moral balance" does not speak to the trees we cut, the animals we slaughter, or even the weed pick from the garden; all products of nature.

Quote:

---

Im certainly not looking for a comfort zone in Buddhism, in any of its forms and while I have a preference for the least dogmatic Theravada, I respect the Wisdom contained within all its socially molested interpretations.

---

Hehe, nice

Tharan

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - The Thinkers' Inn - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

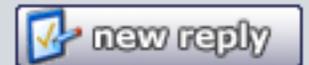

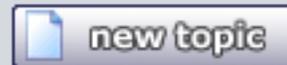

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment, suicide

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 871(12/8/03 6:22 pm)Reply      | Suicide <hr/> Genius suicide and early deaths are explained only in Alchemy. In regard to Samson:Secret strength = Public Weakness                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1890(12/8/03 9:11 pm)Reply | Re: Suicide <hr/> Quote: <hr/> If you are a thinker, you don't really show enough of it in public - at least not on this forum. Look at Huz Heng, by contrast. He has the same sort of snappy Zennish playful attitude as you, but he supplements it with sustained deep thought, which makes him so much more interesting and potent. I know you have talent. You could easily be a thinker of some note if you didn't suppress your thinking so much. <hr/> You mean he supplements it with many collected written words. Writing my thoughts will not make me any more a thinker than I am, all it means | is that I can become known as one. If one thinks, and loves ones thoughts, there is no suppression, even when it hurts.

Yes, Hu Zheng is interesting and potent, deep in motion. He isa great friend, he has courage to be alone, especially amongst friends!

When shall I move?! I have learned and unlearned patience several times over! Just wait until I begin my down-going! That I've squandered and scattered and severed myself from myself across cybersapce, who could measure my work?!

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1861

(12/9/03 7:09 am)

Reply

Re: Suicide

---

I get the sense that you're afraid, that you lack confidence in your ability to think clearly, that you fear exposure if you started articulating your thoughts more straightforwardly. I think you hide behind that dancing persona of yours.

I also wonder whether you are using the forum to resolve personal and social difficulties that you had at school. I wonder if your "dancing" is simply a form of revenge against old school foes.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 872

(12/9/03 8:02 am)

Reply

Re: Suicide

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000

I also wonder whether you are using the forum to resolve personal and social difficulties that you had at school. I wonder if your "dancing" is simply a form of revenge against old school foes.

---

Personal difficulties - Yes, I live in this body.

Social difficulties - Yes, I interact with all different types of organisations (Bodies)

School difficulties - Yes, because we never leave school (Body of carnal knowledge) until we stop learning.

The more one sees and understands the more one must learn to dance. You too can learn to dance Mr. Quinn. Learn the dance of Mercury. Alchemy is in code. The Genius affirms - Yes, Yes, or No, No. Absolute. Like machine code.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1863
(12/9/03 8:54 am)
Reply

re:

---

DEL wrote:

Quote:

---

You too can learn to dance Mr. Quinn

---

It's fast becoming a tired old cliché, this one.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1897
(12/9/03 10:09 am)
Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

I get the sense that you're afraid, that you lack confidence in your ability to think clearly, that you fear exposure if you started articulating your thoughts more straightforwardly. I think you hide behind that dancing persona of yours.

I also wonder whether you are using the forum to resolve personal and social difficulties that you had at school. I wonder if your "dancing" is simply a form of revenge against old school foes.

---

Everyone hides in themselves, just as they spring forth as though to leave themselves behind, my writing is of use to me, and I do have certain apprehensions about public receptions, but this is to do with my great sociability, my not being truly able to speak to everyone's desires without speaking to no-ones. School?! I should not have written the word revenge perhaps! I do not seek it in any sense!

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 874
(12/9/03 6:55 pm)
Reply

-

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000
It's fast becoming a tired old cliché, this one.

---

That's right Mr. Quinn.
"Fast becoming". Don't stop, keep going and you'll soon be there.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 166
(12/10/03 12:09 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

When shall I move?! I have learned and unlearned patience several times over! Just wait until I begin my down-going! That I've squandered and scattered and severed myself from myself across cybersapce, who could measure my work?!

Everyone hides in themselves, just as they spring forth as though to leave themselves behind, my writing is of use to me, and I do have certain apprehensions about public receptions, but this is to do with my great sociability, my not being truly able to speak to everyones desires without speaking to no-ones. School?! I should not have written the word revenge perhaps! I do not seek it in any sense!

You won't answer my questions but you expect me to answer yours? You're like Rhett who is too ashamed to state his age.

Hi Suergaz,

I have written this in case it means something in relation to the decisions you will have to make. If you want to talk about it in a broad or specific sense then i am open to it. I am under the impression that you are about 18 years old. I have just written this online, so my apologies for it's haphazard nature.

I am 28 years old by common definition. I have always had a highly rational disposition and was quite shy in my early years. Just like most young boys i clashed with my mothers irrationality at a young age, and asserted myself against it, refusing hugs, disregarding unreasonable demands. When i was presented with the book 'How a baby is made' i thought sex was dirty and disgusting, but deeper down i think i was horrified at such close connection to people, the loss of individuality. I was the sort of guy that still built sandcastles at the beach when most other guys were checking the girls out. I often looked away when women passed. I didn't know why, but it was a natural inclination against sex power, the power and will to unconsciousness.

At some point in my adolescence i consciously affirmed through reason my practice of always speaking the truth, and whilst I soon forgot about this conscious valuing, i just went on doing it.

I never had any girlfriends at school and was incredibly scared of any kind of come-on from a girl. At school i paid full attention to the teacher and focused on the deeper concepts that were being presented. It seemed superfluous to ram the ideas any further down my throat since i had already grasped the essential concepts, so i never did any reinforcement, or homework, or assignments, or study.

The HSC (end of school exams) was a real clincher in my psyche. The closer it got the more ominous it seemed and yet the sooner it would be over. It pressed on my mind really really hard, and stimulated an incredible rush of insights. My mind was really born. I felt a real separateness to other people, and often went off on my own. There were some moments where others reacted against my solitude, thinking i was rejecting them, but it only pushed me further away. I stuffed up the HSC because it was so insignificant to the other thoughts that were going on in my mind.

I left school and had no friends for many months. I went for walks by myself, created my own alternative imaginary reality, and basically just kept thinking, particularly about my father's nature. He didn't know what was going on in my mind, and used to shout at me in frustration, and i was just silent, watching, thinking. I estimated that i surpassed his level of 'wisdom' at the age of 18/19. He is also highly conscious but is an exceptional suppresser, only in recent time have i found out from my sister that he experiences extreme anxiety, yet supresses almost all of it.

If i had been presented with a book such as David's at this point the last 10 years of my life would probably have been very different.

Not even for the slightest moment in my life have i ever wanted to have children, a mortgage, get married. But the need for money has naturally pressed on me at various times, and i was impregnated by my surroundings with a worker mentality...so life forged on. Despite this heightened consciousness i threw myself into what i thought was life, no other option. So I built on my confidence around people, worked towards relationships, worked towards an occupation.

I kept getting asked out and having girls show interest in me, but despite my best efforts it took me until 21 to get a girlfriend and have sex. 8 months later she moved on for unstated reasons but then wanted to re-unite, but it was more than i could handle.

I attacked life with gusto, developing extremely good social skills without dipping into unconsciousness, and blitzed any job i undertook. But I ended my career after 2 years, my mind was just too important to me. Part of the reason i moved on was that i needed to sort out my intellect, it had grown too powerful and just kept cycling around and around. Due to my strong will to consciousness, i had no desire to suppress it, so I started working as a bricklayers labourer and began practising mindfulness and satori whilst i worked. I explored extremely challenging forms of rockclimbing, which required exceptional levels of rationality and fear (ego) alleviation, which i did through suppression and satori.

Even so, life just didn't satisfy, it lacked meaning. I wasn't particularly angry at society, i took the brunt of my issues completely onto myself, which is what i have always done, and doesn't that make life hard. I have always tried to be perfect, and that sure makes life very very hard. Because i was experiencing so much suffering due to an active mind with poor constructs about the world, i never wanted to make anyone else suffer, which meant never getting angry at people, etc. A super conscience based on false understanding, a recipe for both success and disaster.

I came across a few good books here and there that instilled some more spirituality, and at the age of 24 i went wandering, exploring asceticism and trying to see if there was some kind of life worth living. My consciousness deepened. I explored alternative communities, and eventually bought a share in one. But the people were the same. I decided that to seek solitude in a community would also lack meaning for me, and i needed money so headed back to the city.

By the time i was 26 i could achieve significant satori in all physically active states, even, for example, whilst chopping vegetables for dinner. I had been freediving for a couple of years and each dive deepened my satori.

It peaked when i experienced a 'great satori', which was basically the same as enlightenment except that it was temporary - it lacked sufficient intellectual foundation. It was an incredibly potent experience. During subsequent months, whenever i thought about this event it had a profound effect on me.

I was still experiencing a fair amount of sexual desire but i just wasn't willing to make the compromise except in a few rare circumstances. I was only really attached to my mental imaginings of sex, i had had so little sex overall that i did not become attached to the 'physical' act.

I tried to start my own business but the more i tried the more i realised that the disjunction between myself and society was too deep. I was working at an unusually spiritual and dynamic workplace at the time. There were some individuals that had made significant progress but were still chasing emotion. There were a few that were trying or had tried to reach quite highly but through poor understanding were just on the fringe of mediocrity. My dynamicism was reaching levels at which i was burning everyone out, and became a pariah (even though i was deeply respected and liked), i asked too many questions...

There was nowhere else to go...and yet along came what i had been working towards without knowing, i had prepared myself in almost every detail for...you know what.

So i have led enough of a 'life' to know with absolute certainty my values. So what would have happened if i had met with Ultimate Wisdom at an earlier age? I don't know. Perhaps i would have become a giant beyond all measure, perhaps not much different to where i am now, or perhaps it just wouldn't have worked - perhaps i would be lost in an intermediate zone of horror. Regardless, they would all be superior to common mediocrity.

Rhett

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 12/11/03 9:49 am

|                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1909(12/10/03 2:38 pm)Reply      | ---- <hr/> If you're worried I think you're mediocre, you needn't worry, for I don't. I think that it would be easy to say you are a man of great resolve but little talent from reading your words here, but I don't believe that either. You thought I was eight years younger than I am, I thought you about eight older than you are! Concerning ultimate wisdom, which I am more sure of calling ones life,-- we as little have to reach it as we can say we've reached it! Along came what you say when you were 25?! (:D) I really don't know what you mean! |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 434(12/11/03 2:09 am)Reply       | Re: ---- <hr/> Rhett's story makes my throat tighten up, as if gagging. It makes me want to send him to a shrink. Someone who could help him in behavior and sociability. Either:A) He became a recluse because of philosophy.ORB) He became philosophical because he was a recluse. I'm thinking it's B, based on what he wrote.                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1099(12/11/03 4:04 am)Reply | Gagging <hr/> You are so hard on your fellow travelers to the tomb, Voce. I think Rhett is depressed. No doubt his mother propped the bottle and walked away.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1316(12/11/03 5:27 am)Reply  | Gagging <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I think Rhett is depressed. No doubt his mother propped the bottle and walked away. <hr/> &lt;tries not to laugh at the analogy, it is a good one&gt;                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

Actually, he probably had a decent relationship with his mother. That can make it more difficult to break away, though I don't sense he is overly depressed. Now Voce on the other hand...he needs a hooker or at least a slutty college girl.

To accept one's solitude as truth logically is the easy part. Transitioning to a higher love takes time.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 441
(12/11/03 5:48 am)
Reply

Re: Gagging

---

I've had enough slutty college girls ;-)

No, I really don't need cheering up, I'm a pretty happy guy. I get frustrated, though, when people don't see how stupid they really are.

I've become a person that doesn't hold back his anger. I'll create a hurricane of disgust if someone is asking for it. I'm not being too mean either, I mean, it is just the internet. Nothing's personal.

Most of the time when I'm posting here, I am smiling about it. It's kind of sick humor.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1102
(12/11/03 5:51 am)
Reply

gagging

---

Quote:

---

<tries not to laugh at the analogy, it is a good one>

---

What analogy, Wolf, I meant it literally.

Quote:

---

Actually, he probably had a decent relationship with his mother. That can make it more difficult to break away,...

---

I believe this is a common misunderstanding. It is when needs are not met and unresolvable conflicts arise that people can't break away, and that men cannot be men. If you have a boy and want to raise a hero, he must be coddled and indulged as an infant. It really makes sense when you think about it. To be brave and independent, you must feel inwardly strong. If when you are very fragile and vulnerable, you are left quaking and alone so that you are in fear, as many people in our society do to their infants, how is the person to end up with an inner pillar of strength?

The moslems, of all people understand this, especially the Bedouins. They are moslem, but fully tribal. Their ideals are very masculine - they strive for independence, autonomy, bravery, stoicism and emotional control. Even the women. They take care with a boy even more than a girl to give him a lot of emotional support in infancy, and not to break his will with too much discipline. They don't want him to lose his defiance.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 170
(12/11/03 10:12 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Suergaz wrote:

If you're worried I think you're mediocre, you needn't worry, for I don't. I think that it would be easy to say you are a man of great resolve but little talent from reading your words here, but I don't believe that either.

You seemed to be inferring that you were ruminating about your future... that is the primary reason i wrote it. I didn't make a big deal of myself so that you didn't baulk at the appearance to your mind of egotism.

You thought I was eight years younger than I am, I thought you about eight older than you are! Concerning ultimate wisdom, which I am more sure of calling ones life,-- we as little have to reach it as we can say we've reached it! Along came what you say when you were 25?! (:D) I really don't know what you mean!

Wake up fool. I thought you were a youngster that needed to balance your experience of life with the potentiality of becoming spiritual. I think it was Wolf that said you were 18. I thought you were lame for an 18 year old, yet to think you are 25...

In fact, you need a hit of truth, a good solid hit. If only i could slap you over the head...

By the way, i have edited my previous post, i have inserted some crucial bits that i missed.

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                            | Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1107(12/11/03 10:43 am)Reply  | re-- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I thought you were lame for an 18 year old, yet to think you are 25... <hr/> Can't you add? He's 26!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 172(12/11/03 10:57 am)Reply | Re: re-- <hr/> Can't you add? He's 26! That's what happens when i have a large characterisation of Suergaz floating around in my head, it affects my own thoughts. He's just so non-logical, non-algebraic...such an irrational artistic pansy. That he is 26 is even worse... Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 447(12/11/03 11:06 am)Reply        | Re: re-- <hr/> I thought you were lame for an 18 year old, yet to think you are 25... You think suergaz is lame, when you are the one who hadn't had contact with girls til your 20s. Your egotistical mind will make you think that it was mostly your choice, because the divine power of the universe has chosen you specifically to be a very introspective philosophical man. I think the real reason you were so quiet is because you were afraid. Recently, you escaped to enlightenment to escape the life you hate. Am I close, Rhett? He's just so non-logical, non-algebraic...such an irrational artistic pansy. |

It's pretty illogical and irrational to react to someone like you do. At least he can embrace his artistic side, instead of making it boring like you do because of a false idea of what reasoning is.

I want you to cry, Rhett.

1TheMaster
Registered User
Posts: 190
(12/11/03 12:00 pm)
Reply

Re: re--

---

The path from emotional to rational is one-way.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1318
(12/11/03 12:15 pm)
Reply

Re: gagging

---

Quote:

---

Tharan: Actually, he probably had a decent relationship with his mother. That can make it more difficult to break away,...

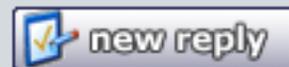

Anna: I believe this is a common misunderstanding. It is when needs are not met and unresolvable conflicts arise that people can't break away, and that men cannot be men. If you have a boy and want to raise a hero, he must be coddled and indulged as an infant. It really makes sense when you think about it.

---

/shrug, you may be right. I didn't know we were necessarily talking about creating "heros" though I am sure Rhett appreciates the compliment on some level.

I am not sure if I was coddled as a child, but I certainly never had any trouble breaking away from situations or old girlfriends when they displeased me. It was/is like turning off a light switch. My mother and I get along fine.

Tharan

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment, suicide

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1319(12/11/03 12:24 pm)Reply                                                                              | Re: gagging <hr/> suergaz (Zag) is 26 or 27, Voce Io is 18 or 19. I feel that they both contribute positively to this forum, whatever their ages. Their voices help to keep the conversation fresh, IMO. Many people read here who don't post, I suspect in some cases, because of the lively dynamic. If we all agreed on Ultimate Truth, we certainly wouldn't need this forum!?!?!?!?! (ode to Zag).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 423(12/11/03 12:56 pm)Reply  | Re: gagging <hr/> The Youngest Child How so very important it is, whether one is the first child born, or the last. So much rests upon this. The oldest child is more exposed, and becomes independent and hard, whereas the youngest is more sheltered, and correspondingly softer. I have heard it said that the youngest child matures sooner than his elder brothers and sisters. It is more accurate to say that he grows-up sooner - at the expense of maturity. This is because the company of elder siblings is stimulating, and the younger child can rapidly learn the many tricks and deceptions of life. However, he never faces the hard knocks of those who go before him, and doesn't become seasoned. The oldest child is like a wise old weather-beaten man who shows his years; while the youngest is a bright socialite of the city. I wonder if the incomplete generalisation above from Solway is pertinent | in regard to Rhett. Don't know where he is placed in his family. To me mother-child relationships are of most importance only when the child is the sole living child or the mother is crazy.

IMO the lack of challenges can either lead to a lack of confidence in communicating with others or, as Kevin says, they go the opposite way and become socialites. A case of two extremes.

Socialites need to be the centre of attention, why, because deep down they lack confidence in themselves and they have to constantly show everyone how capable and likeable they are. They learn to be socialites because when young and dealing with groups or adults they get very nervous and the adrenaline starts to pump, so their reactions to communicating with others is more outwardly displayed. This in turn makes the feedback they get from others more intense and the action-reward equation begins to form part of their essential personality. A single event can cause them to turn introverted, if the feedback when forced into communicating is negative or extroverted if it is positive. It is how comedians and actors are created.

If luck goes their way, for the most part extroverted folk can float along through life in relative happiness, whereas introverted people must turn to something else. Although some will find some release in concentrating on academic or outdoor pursuits, most will turn into their own mind. If they turn into their own mind a good number will go crazy or become suicidal or turn into murderers, rapists, hard core crims, religious fanatics or the like as the thoughts going around in their heads are all affected by self-perpetuating emotion. A very small number will resist these emotions and seek release in working logically through the things they are experiencing. People in this category would need to have been given confidence in their own mental abilities at some stage in their early childhood, which often does not happen to introverted people. An even smaller number will have the brain power required to take this far enough for it to become their natural state of being.

Of course there are many other things that will have an impact apart from where one is born within a family. In fact anything that hurts a child deeply and consistantly enough, such as child abuse or death of a close sibling, can cause them to retreat into themselves.

I haven't read that much of Rhett's stuff, but what I've read doesn't seem irrational at all, certainly nothing in what he says is greatly objectionable. Rhett's stuff might be more interesting to me, if I actually desired or decided to attempt enlightenment, but I'm still rejecting that.

Suergaz on the other hand speaks as if doesn't want to lose something - namely the ability to love or be intimate with other humans - that he doesn't actually possess, although he does have compassion (which is simply just positive sensitivity). He is a bit like me but somewhat more intellectual.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 12/11/03 1:36 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1912
(12/11/03 1:13 pm)
Reply

---

---

Jimhaz thinks I lack the ability for intimacy! Yet says I have more intellect than he!

Rhett thinks I am a pansy! Yet tells me about his love life and expresses the desire to hit me!

Anna thinks I'm sub-human! But she believes we were hatched by saucer men!

(:D)

Sweet hypocritical AGNOSTICS.

Atheism takes the motherfucking floor.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1108
(12/11/03 2:50 pm)
Reply

misc

---

Well, I wasn't actually calling Rhett a hero. I was pointing out that a lousy infancy is no way to get a strong man.

Quote:

---

To me mother-child relationships are of most importance only when the child is the sole living child or the mother is crazy.

---

But I think you are speaking of an adult child. It is definitely bad to be the only child of a crazy mother.

Introversion/extraversion are inborn traits.

Quote:

---

Rhett's stuff might be more interesting to me, if I actually desired or decided to attempt enlightenment, but I'm still rejecting that.

---

Ya gotta love this guy.

Sue, I don't think you're subhuman, but conversing with you is sometimes about as productive of understanding as perhaps a cro-magnon.

Nothing so outrageous about the saucer men. We are saucer men ourselves now, and we are fast on the trail of genetic manipulations of all kinds, as well as being about ready to work with the human genome. Good God, man, get out of dark ages already.

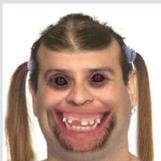

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 450
(12/11/03 3:14 pm)
Reply

Re: misc

---

Bird, I think you should make a topic on your theory of behavior and a man's past!

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 424
(12/11/03 3:33 pm)
Reply

Re: misc

---

Introversion/extraversion are inborn traits.

You might be right, I'm not sure, but I've got a feeling that you are right only in those cases where the hormonal balances in the mother were outside of what is average during pregnancy. In terms of brains, I don't think that people are as genetically different at birth as people imagine. A lot might happen in the first hour or day that sets a child onto a different path to other children – all our experiences are different from one another. We are sucking in info even before we pop out. I still think introversion/extraversion are learnt traits, because given the right causes we can learn to be either at any time in our lives.

Perhaps we have so many supposed hyperactive kids these days because they are viewing images on TV that they don't know how to deal with. Their hyperactivity is the end result of their reaction to the brain working through what they have seen, and they become more extroverted as they experiment with physical ways to get away from whats going on in their brains. They just want to play and be active all day to get away from reality, just like adults.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 12/11/03 3:33 pm

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 174
(12/12/03 10:41 am)
Reply

Re: responses

---

Voce wrote:

Rhett's story makes my throat tighten up, as if gagging. It makes me want to send him to a shrink. Someone who could help him in behavior and sociability.

Why do you think that? I think i have exceptional social skills, i can achieve whatever i want socially.

Either:

A) He became a recluse because of philosophy.

OR

B) He became philosophical because he was a recluse.

I'm thinking it's B, based on what he wrote.

I think your characterisation of me is, understandably, quite poor. Firstly, i am not a recluse, either of mind - as you well know, or of body. I have lived in share houses for the last 9 years and had quite a lot of friends/associates, in fact, i have struggled on many occasions to beat them off so-to-speak.

Anna wrote:

You are so hard on your fellow travelers to the tomb, Voce. I think Rhett is depressed. No doubt his mother propped the bottle and walked away.

Another poor characterisation. Throughout my whole life I have been unusually free of depression. All of my difficulties have been expressed through intense thought. As for my mother, she was incredibly dedicated throughout my upbringing.

-----
I think Rhett is depressed. No doubt his mother propped the bottle and walked away.
-----

Wolf wrote:

Actually, he probably had a decent relationship with his mother. That can make it more difficult to break away, though I don't sense he is overly depressed.

Now we are getting a little closer. I was incredibly attached to my mother in my early years, i always used to shuffle around to whatever room she was in. She tried kindergarten at one stage but it just didn't work, and my first day at school almost didn't happen either. However, this should probably be contrasted with other events such as me teaching myself how to ride a bike that was far too big for me at the age of 4. Since i couldn't reach the ground i just kept falling off.. getting back on..riding..falling off..etc.

*To accept one's solitude as truth logically is the easy part.
Transitioning to a higher love takes time.*

I don't agree, I would say that most people have no concept of their inherent solitude, and are wholly indisposed to accept it. Most people cannot fathom that they exist purely within their own experiences (consciousness), and they steadfastly refuse to even think about it.

Voce wrote:

I've had enough slutty college girls ;-)

No, I really don't need cheering up, I'm a pretty happy guy. I get frustrated, though, when people don't see how stupid they really are.

I've become a person that doesn't hold back his anger. I'll create a hurricane of disgust if someone is asking for it. I'm not being too mean either, I mean, it is just the internet. Nothing's personal.

Most of the time when I'm posting here, I am smiling about it. It's kind of sick humor.

You're trying to suppress your conscience at the same time as trying to convince yourself that you are virtuous. Utter mediocrity.

-----
Actually, he probably had a decent relationship with his mother. That can make it more difficult to break away,...
-----

Anna wrote:

I believe this is a common misunderstanding. It is when needs are not met and unresolvable conflicts arise that people can't break away, and that men cannot be men. If you have a boy and want to raise a hero, he must be coddled and indulged as an infant. It really makes sense when you think about it. To be brave and independent, you must feel inwardly strong. If when you are very fragile and vulnerable, you are left quaking and alone so that you are in fear, as many people in our society do to their infants, how is the person to end up with an inner pillar of strength?

The moslems, of all people understand this, especially the Bedouins. They are moslem, but fully tribal. Their ideals are very masculine - they strive for independence, autonomy, bravery, stoicism and emotional control. Even the women. They take care with a boy even more than a girl to give him a lot of emotional support in infancy, and not to break his will with too much discipline. They don't want him to lose his defiance.

I am not too sure about the historical references but i think you've made some good points here.

Voce wrote:

You think suergaz is lame, when you are the one who hadn't had contact with girls til your 20s. Your egotistical mind will make you think that it was mostly your choice, because the divine power of the universe has chosen you specifically to be a very introspective philosophical man.

You are judging me from a very mediocre perspective. I consider the nature of my difficulties with women as being indicative of the very opposite of mediocrity, especially since whenever i entered a new social group i would almost invariably get asked out by the choicest woman in the group.

I think the real reason you were so quiet is because you were afraid.

My god yes, and i even stated this in my post, so you've made no deduction at all. I was afraid of being consumed by a voracious killer of soul.

Recently, you escaped to enlightenment to escape the life you hate.

Yes again, but I am equally drawn to the Truth. 'Life', as in samsara, is the purest act of evil against the Truth. It is utter mediocrity and falsity. I could easily have been a CEO or whatever is considered successful in our society, but have chosen not to.

Am I close, Rhett?

Close, but you haven't said anything that is in the slightest profound.

Quote: "He's just so non-logical, non-algebraic...such an irrational artistic pansy."

It's pretty illogical and irrational to react to someone like you do.

Quote: "Anything I say is not true." [voce io]

Phew...that was close...lucky i had my medicine handy!

Seriously though, who are you to judge my actions? You have no idea of the nature of what is occurring between Suergaz and me.

At least he can embrace his artistic side, instead of making it boring like you do because of a false idea of what reasoning is.

'Artistry' is in no way a sufficient vehicle for the level of creativity of someone such as myself.

I want you to cry, Rhett.

I'm not self-centered enough to do that anymore.

Wolf wrote:

I am not sure if I was coddled as a child, but I certainly never had any trouble breaking away from situations or old girlfriends when they displeased me. It was/is like turning off a light switch. My mother and I get along fine.

The sign of a dud ego (ie. limited soul/consciousness).

suergaz (Zag) is 26 or 27, Voce Io is 18 or 19. I feel that they both contribute positively to this forum, whatever their ages. Their voices help to keep the conversation fresh, IMO. Many people read here who don't post, I suspect in some cases, because of the lively dynamic. If we all agreed on Ultimate Truth, we certainly wouldn't need this forum!?!?!?!?! (ode to Zag).

I value anyone being here that values the Truth, because i value them becoming Wise.

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 175
(12/12/03 11:54 am)
Reply

Re: gagging

---

The Youngest Child

How so very important it is, whether one is the first child born, or the last. So much rests upon this. The oldest child is more exposed, and becomes independent and hard, whereas the youngest is more sheltered, and correspondingly softer.

I have heard it said that the youngest child matures sooner than his elder brothers and sisters. It is more accurate to say that he grows-up sooner - at the expense of maturity. This is because the company of elder siblings is stimulating, and the younger child can rapidly learn the many tricks and deceptions of life. However, he never faces the hard knocks of those who go before him, and doesn't become seasoned.

The oldest child is like a wise old weather-beaten man who shows his years; while the youngest is a bright socialite of the city.

Jimhaz wrote:

I wonder if the incomplete generalisation above from Solway is pertinent in regard to Rhett. Don't know where he is placed in his family. To me mother-child relationships are of most importance only when the child is the sole living child or the mother is crazy.

Interesting. I have a sister that is two years older. Perhaps that is part of the reason why it has taken me this long to become in any way 'seasoned'.

IMO the lack of challenges can either lead to a lack of confidence in communicating with others or, as Kevin says, they go the opposite way and become socialites. A case of two extremes.

Well, i certainly did have a lack of confidence in communicating with others - throughout my whole upbringing. My father was also incredibly socially inept, and is still breaking those barriers now - the ones i broke in a few years have taken him 25, and he is still working at them as intently as ever. It wasn't until i was about 21 that i really broke through the barrier. I then continued on to develop the capacity to do whatever i wanted, anything from extreme introversion to extreme extroversion. I think this is quite related to my conscious nature. Most people are sociable through their instincts, they are passive, whereas i had to develop a conscious understanding of what is an incredibly complex phenomena - egotism.

Socialites need to be the centre of attention, why, because deep down they lack confidence in themselves and they have to constantly show everyone how capable and likeable they are. They learn to be socialites because when young and dealing with groups or adults they get very nervous and the adrenaline starts to pump, so their reactions to communicating with others is more outwardly displayed. This in turn makes the feedback they get from others more intense and the action-reward equation begins to form part of their essential personality. A single event can cause them to turn introverted, if the feedback when forced into communicating is negative or extroverted if it is positive. It is how comedians and actors are created.

If luck goes their way, for the most part extroverted folk can float along through life in relative happiness, whereas introverted people must turn to something else. Although some will find some release in concentrating on academic or outdoor pursuits, most will turn into their own mind. If they turn into their own mind a good number will go crazy or become suicidal or turn into murderers, rapists, hard core crims, religious fanatics or the like as the thoughts going around in their heads are all affected by self-perpetuating emotion. A very small number will resist these emotions and seek release in working logically through the things they are experiencing. People in this category would need to have been given confidence in their own mental abilities at some stage in their early childhood, which often does not happen to introverted people. An even smaller number will have the brain power required to take this far enough for it to become their natural state of being.

My father set a very equalitarian atmosphere, and was extremely afraid of emotion and ego, so there was very very little praise given at all. Egotism was absolutely and utterly socially unacceptable in our house. It was never talked about of course, just one of those silent things. This is one of the keys to my nature, which i haven't really though much about from my current understanding. It is also one of the reasons why it has taken me so long to actually acknowledge my traits.

Of course there are many other things that will have an impact apart from where one is born within a family. In fact anything that hurts a child deeply and consistantly enough, such as child abuse or death of a close sibling, can cause them to retreat into themselves.

There was a major impact when i was 14 years old because my parents split up. The family unit was no more. There were a lot of emotional undercurrents, but it resolved okay and my sister and i actually spent most of our time with my dad, so overall it was actually a fairly amicable separation.

I haven't read that much of Rhett's stuff, but what I've read doesn't seem irrational at all, certainly nothing in what he says is greatly objectionable.

Rhett's stuff might be more interesting to me, if I actually desired or decided to attempt enlightenment, but I'm still rejecting that.

What about piercing through the psychology of egotism?

Suergaz on the other hand speaks as if doesn't want to lose something - namely the ability to love or be intimate with other humans - that he doesn't actually possess, although he does have compassion (which is simply just positive sensitivity).

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                           | Compassion is usually just another expression of self love, ie. egotistical delusion. He is a bit like me but somewhat more intellectual. Why do you think he is more intellectual than yourself? Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 454(12/12/03 12:00 pm)Reply       | Re: responses <hr/> Rhett, you win!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1114(12/12/03 12:12 pm)Reply | misc <hr/> Quote: <hr/> A lot might happen in the first hour or day that sets a child onto a different path to other children – all our experiences are different from one anothers. We are sucking in info even before we pop out. <hr/> What do you think, then, of taking a newborn boy of about 24 hours old, away from its mother and bed, and strapping it naked into a hard, cold circumstraint. You are not a father, so I must let you know that infants hate to be unwrapped (unless its skin to skin), and are positively terrified of being held spreadeagled. The infant is now screaming hysterically and beet red. Minutes pass. The doctor arrives, pours cold liquid all over the genitals. The screams of fear and terror continue, without a word of comfort. Next, over a period of 5 to 10 minutes various clamps are pulled over the edge of the foreskin, the foreskin is ripped off of the head (it is attached in infancy) and slits are made. The infant vomits. Slowly, with various ingenious devices that take a while to apply correctly, the foreskin is safely separated from the head, and cut away. The breath stops. Eventually, it begins again, with a piercing wail. The devices are removed, and the baby is taken by a nurse to the nurse, where it will sleep almost without waking for about 24 hours, often refusing to feed, or feeding listlessly, for that time. 6 months later, when taken to the doctor for perhaps a shot, he will cry more than an umcircumcised boy or a girl. |

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                            | Is this the way to make a real man? 8 Rhett, if your mother was dedicated, and you were so attached to her, yet could keep getting up after you fell, this only proves what I'm saying. When you are a child, you are vulnerable, you need support to be strong.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1919(12/12/03 12:15 pm)Reply       | ---- <hr/> I am not entirely fair with Rhett, which he realizes, but it is because he is not entirely fair! Rhett, why not speak truthfully? Does my presence make you trip over yourself? Self love is not always an expression of egotistical delusion! Soon you'll be dry enough to burn!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 177(12/12/03 12:42 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> I am not entirely fair with Rhett, which he realizes, but it is because he is not entirely fair! Rhett, why not speak truthfully? Does my presence make you trip over yourself? Self love is not always an expression of egotistical delusion! Soon you'll be dry enough to burn! Suergaz has a miniscule seed of desire for real wisdom within him, and hopes that i will help him break down his ego fortresses so that it can be nurtured. But to admit that would spoil the whole endeavour, it would make him vulnerable. People often ask for help from someone by abusing them. This is because the person represents what they need, which is of course what they don't have, so it reinforces their lack just at the time that they are needy. It's an ego protection technique to be abusive. It's why the old saying was created, "Don't bite the hand that feeds you", because people often do. Additionally, he is also hiding behind his words, which is why he rarely makes any sense, unless of course you want to create your own imagining of what he is getting at, but then you aren't really connecting with him |

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                         | anyway. Yet abuse may also be the way to help such people, abuse of their ignorance. Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1921(12/12/03 1:06 pm)Reply     | --- <hr/> I thought I had countless solutions to aid men who are sick of themselves, or at least imagine themselves sick of themselves--- I see now I must leave such men alone! They can't help but connect with me!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1322(12/12/03 9:24 pm)Reply | Re: responses <hr/> Rhett, Quote: <hr/> Tharan: To accept one's solitude as truth logically is the easy part.Transitioning to a higher love takes time. Rhett: I don't agree, I would say that most people have no concept of their inherent solitude, and are wholly indisposed to accept it. Most people cannot fathom that they exist purely within their own experiences (consciousness), and they steadfastly refuse to even think about it. <hr/> Read between the lines, friend. I am not speaking about "most people." I am talking to you. Quote: <hr/> Tharan: I am not sure if I was coddled as a child, but I | certainly never had any trouble breaking away from situations or old girlfriends when they displeased me. It was/is like turning off a light switch. My mother and I get along fine.

Rhett: The sign of a dud ego (ie. limited soul/consciousness).

---

Be careful with that Judgement Stick, Genius. You may hurt yourself with it one day.

Tharan

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 12/12/03 9:46 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1930
(12/13/03 12:20 am)
Reply

Re: responses

---

Rhett:--

Quote:

---

Most people cannot fathom that they exist purely within their own experiences (consciousness), and they steadfastly refuse to even think about it.

---

No-one exists purely within their own experiences without ever having being in the experience of others Rhett. We, humans, are born you see.
You don't think the people who cannot fathom their solitude should be given it do you?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 180
(12/13/03 11:52 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Suergaz wrote:

I thought I had countless solutions to aid men who are sick of themselves, or at least imagine themselves sick of themselves---

I see now I must leave such men alone! They can't help but connect with me!

You live in your own fantasy, and far more than you could possibly fathom right now, in fact, you never really leave it. That is why your judgements are so bad.

---

Most people cannot fathom that they exist purely within their own experiences (consciousness), and they steadfastly refuse to even think about it.

---

No-one exists purely within their own experiences without ever having being in the experience of others Rhett. We, humans, are born you see. You don't think the people who cannot fathom their solitude should be given it do you?

Your ego is firmly fixed in the realm of worldly wisdom, which is just a more refined version of common mediocrity.

It seems that you would much rather keep your blinkers on than open your mind to wisdom that is all encompassing.

Rhett

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 181
(12/13/03 12:13 pm)
Reply

Re: responses

---

Tharan wrote:

---

Tharan: To accept one's solitude as truth logically is the easy part. Transitioning to a higher love takes time.

Rhett: I don't agree, I would say that most people have no concept of their inherent solitude, and are wholly indisposed to accept it. Most people cannot fathom that they exist purely within their own experiences (consciousness), and they steadfastly refuse to even think about it.

---

Read between the lines, friend. I am not speaking about "most people." I am talking to you.

Okay, but your comments didn't seem to make much sense in relation to me, and i wasn't quite sure what you mean by 'higher love'. It's a big topic. I seemed to develop the higher love before i accepted my inevitable solitude, and yet even then i quickly went beyond solitude. Perhaps i'll add more to this later, but if you're willing to clarify your points that also may be of interest.

---

Tharan: I am not sure if I was coddled as a child, but I certainly never had any trouble breaking away from situations or old girlfriends when they displeased me. It was/is like turning off a light switch.

Rhett: The sign of a dud ego (ie. limited soul/consciousness).

---

Be careful with that Judgement Stick, Genius. You may hurt yourself with it one day.

I might get nailed to it, but i am not so self-concerned as most people.

However, i consider it a suggestion rather than a judgement, consider that i wrote 'sign', as in 'indication'. I am quite open to counter-argument. [However, i admit that it would have been less forceful and perhaps clearer if i had written, "A sign of a dud ego", and if i had erased the mother bit which was irrelevant to it].

Rhett

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 12/13/03 12:28 pm

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1937

(12/13/03 10:26 pm)

Reply

---

Rhett:--

Quote:

---

It seems that you would much rather keep your blinkers on than open your mind to wisdom that is all encompassing.

---

I suppose it could seem that. But really, it doesn't matter. By blinkers you mean sanity?

Quote:

---

Your ego is firmly fixed in the realm of worldly wisdom

---

I hate to think where yours is fixed!

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 184

(12/14/03 12:41 pm)

Reply

Re: responses

---

Voce io wrote:

Rhett, you win!

Then it is you that have won.

I can neither win nor lose.

Rhett

|                                                                       |                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 358(12/14/03 12:53 pm)Reply | Re: responses<hr/> You're so right, Rhett.Voce io has won. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------|

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment, suicide

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 185(12/14/03 12:56 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> ----- It seems that you would much rather keep your blinkers on than open your mind to wisdom that is all encompassing. ----- Suergaz wrote: I suppose it could seem that. But really, it doesn't matter. Then why are you interacting with this forum if wisdom doesn't matter to you? By blinkers you mean sanity? You want to keep your 'sanity' (as it is commonly defined by the herd), which in an absolute or truthful sense means that you want to remain insane - because you are too insane to realise what sanity really is. ----- Your ego is firmly fixed in the realm of worldly wisdom ----- I hate to think where yours is fixed! You're probably right in saying that, because what is left of it is firmly |

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                            | fixed on the Truth, which does seem to be what you hate. Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 360(12/14/03 1:04 pm)Reply            | Re: --- <hr/> Rhett on suergaz:"Then why are you interacting with this forum if wisdom doesn't matter to you?" suergaz is wisdom, Rhett. Just like you.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1948(12/15/03 11:35 am)Reply       | --- <hr/> Paul you mystic mediator! Rhett and I are having a battle for the greater wisdom! He speaks of an all encompassing wisdom, which can only, for us, as humans, be 'worldly'----there is no 'universal' wisdom.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1949(12/15/03 11:37 am)Reply       | ---- <hr/> Worldly                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 193(12/15/03 12:10 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Paul you mystic mediator! Rhett and I are having a battle for the greater wisdom! He speaks of an all encompassing wisdom, which can only, for us, as humans, be 'worldly'----there is no 'universal' wisdom. You should find it much clearer to think of them in terms of absolute versus relative. Even after being on this forum for quite some time, are you still willing to defy logic and argue against the possibility of absolute (Ultimate) Truth? Rhett |

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1951
(12/15/03 8:55 pm)
Reply

---

---

I quote myself from an earlier thread:

Quote:

---

suergaz:...reality is infinite and finite, not ultimate, meaning that 'ultimate' reality is only ever reality.

Ultimate reality is a superfluous expression betraying weakness of expression.

---

It's come down to a possibility now for you has it Rhett?! (:D)

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 196
(12/16/03 11:15 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

-----
suergaz:...reality is infinite and finite, not ultimate, meaning that 'ultimate' reality is only ever reality.
Ultimate reality is a superfluous expression betraying weakness of expression.
-----

The response you got to that at the time was perfectly satisfactory. You are being a naughty devil to bring it back.

It's come down to a possibility now for you has it Rhett?! (:D)

No, I was seeing whether it had at least become a possibility for you. I am far too aware of it to even begin to doubt its validity. People do not live in reality, they live in fantasy, and a horrid fantasy at that.

Game over, you're becoming ever more puerile.

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1957
(12/16/03 11:28 am)
Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

People do not live in reality, they live in fantasy, and a horrid fantasy at that.

---

In fantasy, one can't help but live in reality, even though one may not be completely conscious of it.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 198
(12/16/03 11:49 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

-----
People do not live in reality, they live in fantasy, and a horrid fantasy at that.
-----

In fantasy, one can't help but live in reality, even though one may not be completely conscious of it.

No. Reality is nothing but consciousness. In fantasy, one live's in the 'reality' of their fantasies - to the degree that one is conscious. When one is not conscious, one is not living.

In other words, 'fantasy lives' are a real phenomena, but riddled with falsity nonetheless.

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1961
(12/16/03 1:00 pm)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

Rhett:--People do not live in reality, they live in fantasy, and a horrid fantasy at that.

suergaz:--In fantasy, one can't help but live in reality, even though one may not be completely conscious of it.

Rhett:--No. Reality is nothing but consciousness. In fantasy, one live's in the 'reality' of their fantasies - to the degree that one is conscious. When one is not conscious, one is not living.

In other words, 'fantasy lives' are a real phenomena, but riddled with falsity nonetheless.

---

"Reality is nothing but consciousness"-- A lie. "When one is not conscious, one is not living"-- Another lie. You end by reiterating my point.

Edited by: suergaz at: 12/16/03 1:20 pm

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1335
(12/16/03 2:39 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Rhett wrote,

Quote:

---

When one is not conscious, one is not living.

---

Tell me about the last time you had a "bad" dream, Rhett.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 800
(12/16/03 10:39 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: People do not live in reality, they live in fantasy, and a horrid fantasy at that.

Zag: In fantasy, one can't help but live in reality, even though one may not be completely conscious of it.

Rhett: No. Reality is nothing but consciousness. In fantasy, one live's in the 'reality' of their fantasies - to the degree that one is conscious. When one is not conscious, one is not living.

---

Take a brand new consciousness and lock it in a box. Will it have a reality?

Fantasy can be constructed of nothing but one's experience of reality.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 202
(12/17/03 11:30 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

-----
When one is not conscious, one is not living.
-----

Tharan wrote:

Tell me about the last time you had a "bad" dream, Rhett.

A chance coincidence, i had a dream last night. They are a rare occurrence for me, particularly as i don't tend to eat late in the evening. It was very brief, just a little bit of sexual imagery. Naturally, i was conscious in some sense of the word. If i wasn't, then i couldn't have experienced anything, could i?

Rhett

|                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 203(12/17/03 11:43 am)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> Dave wrote: Take a brand new consciousness and lock it in a box. Will it have a reality? This is an 'empirical' question. I think it is highly likely that it wouldn't, as it would be bereft of the causal processes that enable it's existence (ie. body, nutrients, etc). Fantasy can be constructed of nothing but one's experience of reality. Yes indeed. It's a real shame, from my perspective anyway, what people do with their experiences, but that's just the way it goes most of the time. However, that's no reason to idealise falsity - as a number of people on this forum are attempting to do - in vain. Rhett |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1965(12/17/03 11:44 am)Reply       | ---- <hr/> You were conscious enough to have recalled some of your dreaming, but I say you were still alive even when you were deep asleep (:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1338(12/17/03 1:48 pm)Reply    | ---- <hr/> I don't mean dreaming in general, I want to hear about a "bad" dream. Tharan                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1138(12/17/03 2:23 pm)Reply   | ---- <hr/> It WAS a bad dream - it was about sex!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 666
(12/17/03 3:20 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Dave: Take a brand new consciousness and lock it in a box. Will it have a reality? Fantasy can be constructed of nothing but one's experience of reality.

So, you are with your fellow countryman, John Locke?

Thomas

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 374
(12/17/03 4:21 pm)
Reply

Stop that

---

Quote:

---

It WAS a bad dream - it was about sex!

---

Anna? Are you there? Oh, hi.
You're undermining Male Superiority with such remarks. Keep it cool, please.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 207
(12/18/03 9:35 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

You were conscious enough to have recalled some of your dreaming,

It seems that you are inferring that i was not conscious during all of my dreaming. That is impossible. Dreaming is just another experience of consciousness, thus, you can't be dreaming whilst unconscious. What may occur within what we conceive of as a 'brain' during sleep that is not experienced is beyond our capacity to properly verify. It is just speculation or an uncertain empirical investigation.

My recall of the dream as being a real occurrence at some previous moment is also uncertain. At the point in time that i wrote my email about the dream, i could not be sure about anything other than my 'memory' of it. This means that i could not be sure that i even had a dream. The dream may just have been programmed into my mind just as i wrote the email. All i can be sure of is what i am experiencing in each moment, though (of course), i can reason beyond that.

but I say you were still alive even when you were deep asleep

Am i being foolish to ask you to explain your definition of life? You rarely respond to such questions in any kind of philosophical manner.

Rhett

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment, suicide

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 803(12/18/03 9:55 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> DT: Take a brand new consciousness and lock it in a box.Will it have a reality? Rhett: This is an 'empirical' question. I think it is highly likely that it wouldn't, as it would be bereft of the causal processes that enable it's existence (ie. body, nutrients, etc). <hr/> Perhaps so, though I said nothing of it needing such. Nonetheless, for a short period at least, it would be a consciousness with no reality, no means from which to garner one, no means from which to garner. This line of thought may shed some light on the 'empirical' nature of everything consciously understood. Quote: <hr/> DT: Fantasy can be constructed of nothing but one's experience of reality. Rhett: Yes indeed. It's a real shame, from my perspective |

anyway, what people do with their experiences, but that's just the way it goes most of the time.

---

But you said that reality is nothing but consciousness. Now if that were the case, where is the aforementioned consciousness' reality? Where is any consciousness' reality? Of course ideas about it are constructed in the mind, but from what, from consciousness' experience of what?

The answer these questions is what is commonly known as reality.

Quote:

---

Rhett: However, that's no reason to idealise falsity - as a number of people on this forum are attempting to do - in vain.

---

I'm certainly not suggesting such a thing. What I am suggesting is that there is nothing false about reality, only conceptions thereon.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 12/18/03 10:34 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 804
(12/18/03 10:17 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

So, you are with your fellow countryman, John Locke?

---

The Tabla Rasa? not really no. I think the newborn human mind is anything but a blank slate.

It was really just to illustrate that conscious experience draws on the stimulus of reality and develops conceptions thereon, as opposed to creating it. That the 'reality' which it creates from said experience could be no 'reality' at all without it.

The newborn will have certain genetic instructions to instinctively follow but I don't think this can constitute a 'reality'. In fact I think the infant has certain genetic instructions with which to create a 'reality', but only in conjunction with broad experience. That is to say, genetic instructions for language acquisition, grammar comprehension and conceptual development. But these instructions comprise a checklist which must be individually experienced and ticked off for there to be any real emergent consciousness to speak of.

I'm sure one as well informed as you will know about Chomsky's Syntactic Structures. Any thoughts?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 805
(12/18/03 10:32 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: A chance coincidence, i had a dream last night. They are a rare occurrence for me, particularly as i don't tend to eat late in the evening.

---

As far as I understand, everybody dreams every night, save the odd exception or two. We dream in shifts throughout the night, the first shift occurring roughly 90 minutes after the onset of sleep (the individual who is suffering a sleep deficit will naturally begin earlier, in fact if this condition persists and becomes chronic, their dreams will spill over into their waking life as the brain has to produce its serotonin and repair itself) and lasting for around 20 minutes or so. The gaps between shifts become progressively smaller and the shifts become progressively longer until the sleeper has their final big shift between roughly 6hrs 45 mins, and 8hrs 6mins asleep. This last hour or more is when the brain receives most attention and is usually the hour that a lot of people do without, to their physical and mental detriment.

I don't remember many of them either, though I know that a little practice could resolve this, if I so wished. It sometimes startles me, the detail in which some can recall their dreams. I'm not sure if they're of any conceptual use, though some say they're the royal road. Seems to me that road is full of potholes.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 208
(12/18/03 10:52 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

DT: Take a brand new consciousness and lock it in a box. Will it have a reality?

Rhett: This is an 'empirical' question. I think it is highly likely that it wouldn't, as it would be bereft of the causal processes that enable it's existence (ie. body, nutrients, etc).

---

Perhaps so, though I said nothing of it needing such. Nonetheless, for a short period at least, it would be a consciousness with no reality, no means by which to garner one, no means by which to garner.

If it is having experiences (ie. it is conscious) then it has a reality. You are trying to carve up consciousness into 'reality' and 'conception', but there is no inherent difference or separation. At bottom, experiences = consciousness = reality.

This line of thought may shed some light on the 'empirical' nature of everything consciously understood.

Depends on what you mean by understood, whether you mean that which is by necessity certain and true (ie.  $A=A$ , including the experience of absolute or construct truths) which reach beyond empiricism, or a reasoning that is subject to empiricism.

---

DT: Fantasy can be constructed of nothing but one's experience of reality.

Rhett: Yes indeed. It's a real shame, from my perspective anyway, what people do with their experiences, but that's just the way it goes most of the time.

---

But you said that reality is nothing but consciousness.

Yes, what's wrong with that?

Now if that were the case, where is the aforementioned consciousness' reality? Where is any consciousness' reality?

Are you talking geographical location here or..? We can never know 'location' for sure, if you are just an alien computer program for example, you might actually exist (in some form) on an asteroid, and Earth may just be an illusion of your mind.

Of course ideas about it are constructed in the mind, but from what, from consciousness' experience of what?

Ideas are only experienced by the mind - not constructed. Where or how they are constructed is beyond our capacity to know with certainty. However, they do seem to bear some relation to other experiences of consciousness, and in the truthful individual will be in true relation. In a deluded individual they will be in poor relation.

The answer these questions is what is commonly known as reality.

I can't really follow you on that.

-----
Rhett: However, that's no reason to idealise falsity - as a number of people on this forum are attempting to do - in vain.
-----

I'm certainly not suggesting such a thing. What I am suggesting is that there is nothing false about reality, only conceptions thereon.

Our experience of conceptions is just as much a part of our reality as any other experience. The division you are making is a false notion (that, incidentally, you experienced and was a part of your reality).

It's not like people have the odd false notion here or there, they are embedded in every experience they have.

Rhett

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 811
(12/18/03 11:54 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: I can't really follow you on that.

---

So it would seem.

-----

Can anyone else vouch for my, at least partial, clarity in that post? Can anyone reading make sense of what I was saying? Can anyone understand the context of what I said and how Rhett's answers there upon do not correspond to said context?

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1142
(12/18/03 2:20 pm)
Reply

re--

---

I'm having a hard time following the argument. Were you trying to say there that for the consciousness or mind to have a reality, it must have input from outside?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 669
(12/18/03 2:51 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Dave: I'm sure one as well informed as you will know about Chomsky's Syntactic Structures. Any thoughts?

I am a bit at a loss how you just connected Locke to Chomsky. Do you want to say the way we perceive reality is modeled by language? Certainly! Anyone who wants to prove this for himself only needs to study a foreign language. I recommend Chinese. :-)

Yes, I remember Chomsky quite well. Roughly 12 years ago I was involved in programming a natural language translation system that used some of Chomsky's ideas. The program was based on grammatical trees, flexion databases, and Chomsky models to analyze sentences. However, since the computation is fairly CPU-intensive (and computers weren't that fast at the time) the semantical analysis was somewhat restricted; for example the system could not resolve homonyms properly. This did occasionally lead to embarrassing and funny demo effects on trade fairs.

Today a normal personal computer can do that.

Regarding the newborn, genetic instructions, and creating reality, I think you put that quite well. I'll just lazily throw in two more words: Emergentism. Self-organization.

Thomas

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1969

(12/18/03 10:37 pm)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

suergaz:--You were conscious enough to have recalled some of your dreaming, but I say you were still alive even when you were deep asleep (:D)

Rhett:--It seems that you are inferring that i was not conscious during all of my dreaming. That is impossible. Dreaming is just another experience of consciousness, thus, you can't be dreaming whilst unconscious. What may occur within what we conceive of as a 'brain' during sleep that is not experienced is beyond our capacity to properly verify. It is just speculation or an uncertain empirical investigation.

My recall of the dream as being a real occurrence at some previous moment is also uncertain. At the point in time that i wrote my email about the dream, i could not be sure about anything other than my 'memory' of it. This means that i could not be sure that i even had a dream. The dream may just have been programmed into my mind just as i wrote the email. All i can be sure of is what i am experiencing in each moment, though (of course), i can reason beyond that.

Am i being foolish to ask you to explain your definition of life? You rarely respond to such questions in any kind of philosophical manner.

---

I am my own definition of life!

Rhett, I did not at all infer that you were not conscious during all of your dreaming. This does not mean that for a good part of your sleep you were not unconscious. You seem to be saying that what is not conscious is necessarily not alive! What is unconscious can become conscious and vice versa, but you're saying reality=consciousness and yet you maintain that A=A! You mustn't be getting enough sleep!

Dave Toast, I can vouch for your clarity, but not over mine!

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 814
(12/19/03 10:13 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Naturally.

I'm trying to focus on a more distant object though ;-)

Quote:

---

Bird: I'm having a hard time following the argument. Were you trying to say there that for the consciousness or mind to have a reality, it must have input from outside?

---

Pretty much, yes. Only I'm saying that said 'outside' is reality, and it is what we refer to when we speak of reality.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 815
(12/19/03 10:31 am)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Dave: I'm sure one as well informed as you will know about Chomsky's Syntactic Structures. Any thoughts?

Thomas: I am a bit at a loss how you just connected Locke to Chomsky. Do you want to say the way we perceive reality is modeled by language? Certainly! Anyone who wants to prove this for himself only needs to study a foreign language. I recommend Chinese. :-)

---

Kind of yeah, but I was speaking of the inborn hardwired ability and predilection to acquire the language with which we model reality, and the existence of such a thing being one invalidation of the blank slate.

I think the blank slate is a poor analogy. I would describe it more as a broad canvass, an enormous palette, a fully stocked box of colours, a whole range of brushes and painting implements, even an artist.

What it lacks though, is subject matter. It even lacks the very idea of subject matter and it's connection to the surrounding paraphernalia. Yet it still knows to start putting brush to canvass. This is more what I was getting at.

Quote:

---

Regarding the newborn, genetic instructions, and creating reality, I think you put that quite well. I'll just lazily throw in two more words: Emergentism. Self-organization.

---

Do you feel less lazy today? :-)

I'd like to hear.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1150
(12/19/03 12:04 pm)
Reply

re

---

Quote:

---

Only I'm saying that said 'outside' is reality, and it is what we refer to when we speak of reality.

---

That's really pretty interesting, if BofH understands aright. It is an antidote to solipsism and even to the idea that we cannot be sure there is anything extant outside our minds. We would not have any experiences if there were nothing outside our minds.

The main problem with the blank slate idea is that a newborn has already had quite a few experiences. It has heard its mothers blood, heartbeat and voice, and almost certainly has felt her feelings, especially when something like adrenalin rushes through the system. Then, too, they already have personality differences while in womb and react differently than another fetus.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 675

(12/19/03 6:17 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Dave: Do you feel less lazy today? :-)

Definitely lazy enough to skip some actual work and instead knit avantgarde rambling concepts about the universe.

Emergentism is the view that the sum is more than the parts. In particular, it concerns the nature of the material world (a wordy synonym for "nature") where it is in opposition with the reductionist view. Its main tenet is that when you put together material compounds, you get more than a lump of compounds; you get a new system with new properties. Atoms, molecules, cells, organisms are all very nice illustrations of emergent phenomena. H<sub>2</sub>O looks and behaves different from H and O. Conversely, when you take a system apart, you lose some of its properties. The fish on your dinner plate has lost its ability to swim and has become a mere protein/carbohydrate source. Maybe an unnecessarily cruel example.

Self-organization is a term from system theory. A system is self-organizing when two conditions are fulfilled: (1) its complexity increases and (2) its entropy decreases over time. Some people think that the two are really the same, but one can at least hypothetically imagine a highly complex but chaotic universe, or respectively a highly ordered universe with very little complexity.

Now, what has this to do with newborn blank slates with hardwired language predilections?

It means that the differentiation between human hardware (the brain and CNS) and software (abilities such as language) is somewhat artificial, at least in the perspective of a few hundred million years, because as we know, the human organism is a developing thing, a product of evolution, in short: a process. It's a process, enveloped in processes, enveloped in other processes ad infinitum. Any lifeform, including the human, is like an incredibly complicated fractal, consisting of billions of stacked and nested processes, duplicated billions of times over. It is a fractal. The result of self-organization and emergent phenomena. Yin and Yang.

We can't really say when exactly the capacity for language originated, but we know that it has to do with certain areas in the cortex and we know that the cortex is a fairly recent development, speaking again from the perspective of millions of years. Since it is quite likely that the cortex did not suddenly pop into the skull of some prehistoric man, it must be assumed that language capabilities also took some time to develop. And this is the basic idea that leads back to Locke: everything is a process and everything is -at all times- in a constant flow of change, ergo there are no blank slates. The development of the newborn begins way before its birth.

Thomas

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 818
(12/20/03 11:08 pm)
Reply

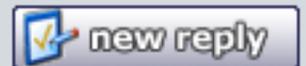

Re: ----

---

Yep, Locke should have stuck to civil government.

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enlightenment, suicide

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 8(12/6/03 9:04 am)Reply        | Enlightenment, suicide <hr/> Why would anybody with a self want to give that up in order to find the cold, hard truth? This I wonder. It is nothing short of suicide. Only suicidal ego's would want to stop being. Wanting to give up yourself for truth.. it is almost analogous to giving up life for heaven. I am not really against this.. I just don't know it can be done by any self that doesn't want to end itself. Perhaps it is more desirable to want to just shape yourself into a certain direction, instead of eradicating it. Not for the sake of truth though.. those who want to reach truth in such a way should probably be more humble and admit it isn't really what they want. Myself included... Who here wants to commit or has already committed this suicide? |
| 1TheMasterRegistered UserPosts: 188(12/6/03 9:13 am)Reply | Re: Enlightenment, suicide <hr/> The ego is the enemy of freedom. It is merely a construct of the psyche, indoctrinated from birth. One can exist and indeed live, when ego is vanquished.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

|                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1879(12/6/03 9:28 am)Reply                                                                                | ---- <hr/> Speak for yourself, dead-head.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 161(12/6/03 11:32 am)Reply                                                                         | Re: ---- <hr/> Suergaz wrote: Speak for yourself, dead-head. You seem to spend a lot of time on this forum knocking its truths to feed your own ego. How long do you think you'll last here? Rhett                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1559(12/6/03 11:36 am)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Actually, Rhett, a more pertinent question might be: How long has he lasted here? Answer: quite some time. But what Zag is really on about is something of a mystery, and that's almost certainly the way he wants it. edit And whilst I can understand the suicide analogy when it comes to Enlightenment I think it might be more useful in this case to think of it as an awakening from a bad dream. Or, perhaps, the birth of a true self.* Dan Rowden Edited by: drowden at: 12/6/03 12:23 pm |

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1297
(12/6/03 12:39 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Zag likes to dance in mockery while we sit motionless attempting no-thought. He is Nietzsche incarnate, but having more fun this time around, I believe. He adds color to an otherwise grey tableau.

Tharan

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1848
(12/6/03 1:28 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Well, if Nietzsche had a lobotomy and then got exceedingly drunk, he would begin to resemble Suergaz, but that's about it.

I think Suergaz simply enjoys being a legend in his own mind. Hiding behind a clownish persona on the internet and dazzling kids with some snappy attitude helps foster this illusion. I find it hard to get excited by him because he lacks the profundity and wisdom of someone like Nietzsche.

I wonder what he does in real life. Suergaz, what do you do for a living?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1849
(12/6/03 1:39 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Autem wrote:

Quote:

---

Why would anybody with a self want to give that up in order to find the cold, hard truth? This I wonder. It is nothing short of suicide.

---

That is certainly the ego's point of view. But as soon as you propel your thought processes outside of the various egotistical algorithms in the brain, your perspective entirely changes. Suddenly, you see that confining your consciousness within the egotistical framework is itself a form of death because it obliterates what you really are in a larger sense. The ego is suddenly seen for what it is - an illusion - and you perceive the utter madness of trying to preserve it.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1882
(12/6/03 10:37 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

I have been here since the beginning of this forum. Its prototype, and everything in it, disappeared.

Anyone who spells lobotomy labotomy really needs one DavidQuinn000.

The same goes for anyone who thinks the ego has a point of view or needs preserving DavidQuinn000.

I am 'unemployed'.

Are you still disabled?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1850
(12/7/03 7:01 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Does that mean you are on Newstart? Why are you unemployed?

Autem
Registered User
Posts: 9
(12/7/03 7:32 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

drowden:

Quote:

---

And whilst I can understand the suicide analogy when it comes to Enlightenment I think it might be more useful in this case to think of it as an awakening from a bad dream.

---

You've already woken? And it was like a bad dream, so you felt relieved? Can a person who has no more ego still feel that? I thought that part was dead, gone. Inconsistency, there.

David Quinn:

Quote:

---

But as soon as you propel your thought processes outside of the various egotistical algorithms in the brain, your perspective entirely changes.

---

You can you escape your egocentric ego, propel your thought outside of it, if you're still in it? By an act of 'free will', maybe? Or your ego might have got weak and died. Maybe enlightenment is a result of weakness. You, being on the 'other side', will probably no longer care if it's weak or strong. But I do, from this side.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1300
(12/7/03 7:56 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Autem wrote to Dan,

Quote:

---

You've already woken? And it was like a bad dream, so you felt relieved? Can a person who has no more ego still feel that? I thought that part was dead, gone. Inconsistency, there.

---

I remember how it felt to live in North Carolina. But truly, I no longer live there. Transitioning into a new state of being does not render the memories of the previous state of being into some distant, barely conceived dream. In fact, one becomes a bit more unlimited in their understanding of the workings of Nature and it's by-products (consciousness, motivations, emotions, desires, and the like).

Tharan

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1853

(12/7/03 9:50 am)

Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Autem wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: But as soon as you propel your thought processes outside of the various egotistical algorithms in the brain, your perspective entirely changes.

Autem: You can you escape your egocentric ego, propel your thought outside of it, if you're still in it?

---

Yes, if you experience enough dissatisfaction with egotism and ignorance. Think of the ego as a series of neuronal networks within the brain. With enough effort (in the form of concentration and persistent reasoning), consciousness can be teased out of these networks and allowed to create brand-new networks. The ego and the brain are not equivalent entities; the former is merely a subset of the latter.

Quote:

---

By an act of 'free will', maybe?

---

Sure, if the causal circumstances are ripe.

Quote:

---

Or your ego might have got weak and died. Maybe enlightenment is a result of weakness.

---

Indeed. It is only through weakening falseness that room can be made for truth.

Quote:

---

You, being on the 'other side', will probably no longer care if it's weak or strong. But I do, from this side.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                    | <hr/> That's perfectly understandable. It's an issue that every individual wanting to become enlightened has to grapple with, and it's never easy.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1885(12/7/03 3:20 pm)Reply | Re: Enlightenment, suicide <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Does that mean you are on Newstart? Why are you unemployed? <hr/> You won't answer my questions but you expect me to answer yours? You're like Rhett who is too ashamed to state his age. I am on 'Newstart allowance' yes, but I am not faking mental illness like you are for the disability pension. I am unemployed because I do not feel like making money, or using my talents (Literary, artistic, musical) to this end. It is imagined that contracted societal contributions make up for a lack of being, love, character. I shall give back more to life than my revenge on society shall take from it, don't worry. |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 9(12/7/03 7:04 pm)Reply  | Re: Enlightenment, suicide <hr/> hey is there life after enlightenment? too much rum, makes a girl glum                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 10(12/7/03 7:07 pm)Reply | Re: Enlightenment, suicide <hr/> ps: I am working my ass off at the local gas station, cause society dosen't value my ass' ets                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 11
(12/7/03 7:20 pm)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Quote:

---

I shall give back more to life than my revenge on society shall take from it, don't worry.

---

whoa I knew I hated someone~! lol take as you can, take as you will, unlike society's little pill, I neither pander to this one, nor pander to you.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1886
(12/7/03 7:45 pm)
Reply

---

---

You're not so silent Sal! You really hate me?!

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1854
(12/8/03 8:08 am)
Reply

Re: Enlightenment, suicide

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Does that mean you are on Newstart? Why are you unemployed?

Sue: You won't answer my questions but you expect me to answer yours? You're like Rhett who is too ashamed to state his age.

---

Do you mean my profile page isn't open and revealing enough?

Quote:

---

I am on 'Newstart allowance' yes, but I am not faking mental illness like you are for the disability pension.

---

I never fake mental illness, Suergaz. That would be a horrible way to live. Very restrictive.

Valuing wisdom in an open way and expressing yourself with the freedom of truth has always done the trick for me. This alone is enough for society to think you have a significant disorder.

Quote:

---

I am unemployed because I do not feel like making money, or using my talents (Literary, artistic, musical) to this end.

---

So how have you directed these talents, then? Can you post some examples of your work?

Quote:

---

It is imagined that contracted societal contributions make up for a lack of being, love, character.

---

Yes, I quite agree with you on this.

Quote:

---

I shall give back more to life than my revenge on society shall take from it, don't worry.

---

What do you plan to do?

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1889

(12/8/03 1:54 pm)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

I never fake mental illness, Suergaz. That would be a horrible way to live. Very restrictive.

Valuing wisdom in an open way and expressing yourself with the freedom of truth has always done the trick for me. This alone is enough for society to think you have a significant disorder.

---

If you cannot bring yourself to make yourself understood, at least in gesture to those who are not your equals, I really question your ability to be misunderstood by them!

Valuing wisdom in an open way means having enough of ones own time to demonstrate ones sanity whilst increasing it in others.

What is your 'diagnosed' condition? Did you go to a doctor for a certificate or what?

My talents are apart from my work. You know very well I am a thinker.

Edited by: suergaz at: 12/8/03 8:52 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1858

(12/8/03 3:17 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

If you cannot bring yourself to make yourself understood, at least in gesture to those who are not your equals, I really question your ability to be misunderstood by them!

Valuing wisdom in an open way means having enough of ones own time to demonstrate ones sanity whilst increasing it in others.

---

I had no desire to demonstrate my sanity to these people, just as I had no desire to fake an insanity. My only intent was to present myself as honestly as possible and allow them to naturally come to the conclusion that I was too far outside the norm to hold down a job.

Quote:

---

What is your 'diagnosed' condition? Did you go to a doctor for a certificate or what?

---

Yes, I saw a psychiatrist as part of the requirement for applying for the disability support pension. My diagnosed condition is "schizoidal personality disorder".

Quote:

---

My talents are apart from my work. You know very well I am a thinker.

---

If you are a thinker, you don't really show enough of it in public - at least not on this forum. Look at Huz Heng, by contrast. He has the same sort of snappy Zennish playful attitude as you, but he supplements it with sustained deep thought, which makes him so much more interesting and potent. I know you have talent. You could easily be a thinker of some note if you didn't suppress your thinking so much.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

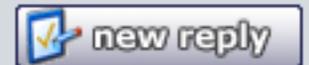

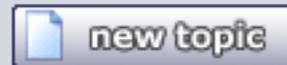

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enter into Absolute

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 44(2/21/04 6:53 pm)Reply | Enter into Absolute <hr/> Enter into Absolute2004.2.112004.1.31OK, i would better write down something, or you will lost interest to read my articles if i only always laugh :)After you become a superman, your field of vision will become very big, almost 180 degree, and things become very stereo, you can sense the earth, the sky directly. Most of you have this feel occasionally, superman is almost always in this state.What Nietzsche called psychologist by born can be called heartist :) The heart connecting ability is common in geniuses, after heart ability get the level, you will have the face ability. Face ability is the ability to see the animal portion in the people. The eyes ability is mainly used between a boy and a girl :) which called love by the first glance, the cause of love by first glance is sex-complement, if you are sex-complement, both of you will have sense when contacted, if only you have sense, it is most likely because you didn't understand yourself while you understand her, girl often understand herself as she was always in the consciousness state, so, if you find that you can't find your girl, what you need to do is find yourself first.Most people are cheated by the sexual desire, needn't say, sexual desire is a good thing, if animal have no sexual desire, they won't waste time for sexual intercourse :) Sexual desire is the appearance, propagation is the | essence. Many geniuses find they are controlled by the sexual desire at first, then they managed to control the sexual desire, without force, and become a sage that don't marry, but the sage is still in the appearance world on this point, as sexual desire is the appearance, controlled the sexual desire or not, both in the appearance world, if you get the essence, you will get enlightened, there have no question that whether we need to propagate.

Always remember, the supergirl won't show any initiative, she won't make herself become your echo, if you understand this, then you won't be hit when chat and dazzle to her(why don't her praise me? just a little :)). I understand this, so our hearts can connect easily, as i can understand her deeply hided meaning(the meaning in the smiling face) when her words don't show any initiative :)

Why we are fond of hide the meaning deeply? This is the game between geniuses :) We do this to distinguish each other from normal people.

"mountain is mountain again" is the unifying of "mountain is mountain" and "mountain is not mountain".

If your words are boring, i will lead our conversation become more boring, that make you can't bear :)

Yes, i trust beautiful girl, as genius trust genius :)

War is geniuses' competing game, but it is wrong, geniuses waste their life in it. Now geniuses like to compete each other by devotion, as devotion need intelligence, morality, will, and devotion can create the maximum value.

The trouble of their love story is, both of them are too noble :) But this is just why their story is so fascinating. My secret is, be lowest, while noblest :_) How? Be a noble child :)

Chaos is not beyond understanding, just like the gossiping in a very big chatting system, their words are very easy to understand, although numerous, but only have several meanings.

The art of seduce :_) Many girls are good at this, seldom boy know this :_) The boy who know this is just the psychologist by born.

Reading "The Red and the Black", i learn many things from this book! I often howl while reading it :)

While being a child, never forget to train yourself as being a superman.

If you pretend a little, i will make your words become a old man, while i am a child :) although we are at the same age :_)

To Buddhist: "I am Buddha reincarnation." :)

Read over "The Red and the Black". The world become silence, my head is freezed, tears once get into my eyes and disappeared after a while.

2004.2.1

I think "The Red and the Black" should be better than "A Dream of Red Mansions", but i may need to read "A Dream of Red Mansions" again first.

I find a thing from these days' reading: good book will help my thinking, and not-so-good book will stop my thinking. I review "The Second Sex", what i get from it? Nothing, only materials, no thinking, but i know, normal people like list many uncontinuous materials so it become complex(chaos?) and become seems have thinking(that some thinking should hided in them), and many other normal people will agree with this. For instance, they can't distinguish philosophy historian from philosopher. They feel philosophy historian must be a philosopher too :_) They even think philosophy is just philosophy history.

I sit in the dining hall and have lunch, i look at the passing students by my innocent eyes, the pure human is so seldom, i didn't meet one in the past half an hour. I can tell you my feeling when i move my sight in the passing students, like a saucer man past then another, yes, my feeling like the feeling when you see various saucer man past by, my heart is innocent, filled with fear and astonished by every new face, i must have already faint on the ground if i didn't have the experience in that morning that i see the "Ultimate Reality", that unbearable miserable face, that most vicious face, if i wasn't god, oh. I have already meet several pure human, i will try to find all of them on the earth, and unite them by genius religion :) Marriage is suggested to only take in members of genius religion.

How lucky that i am me :) I can't imagine that i being another people :_) That is most unbearable.

Start reading "Otto Weininger: Collected Aphorisms, Notebook and Letters to a Friend".

=====

Science is asexual because it absorbs; the artist is sexual, because he emanates.

Vegetarians are just as mistaken as their opponents. If you did not want to contribute to the killing of living beings, you could only drink milk, for whoever eats fruit or eggs still kills embryos. Milk is perhaps for that reason the healthiest food, because it is the most ethical.

Pleasure is to be defined even more generally than the feeling of creation. It can only be defined unequivocally as the feeling of life, as becoming conscious of existence; pain as the feeling of some kind of death (thus is sickness painful).

We can thus note this much against eudaemonism, that the goal of the striving must not be mistaken for the feeling that arises at the goal (which I can know from experience). When I strive for the higher life, I strive for something whose accompanying phenomenon is higher pleasure, but not for pleasure itself. Likewise, man longs for woman, and woman for man, not directly for pleasure.

-- For propagation.

All words that are connected to a certain extent with the word life, have the letter "L": Life, love, pleasure, voluptuous, laugh, lightness, lightly, lisp, light, luxury, liberty, bloom, lighten, lax, liven, loose, large, flux, flute, lily, lynx, limber, slippery, sleek, glide, guile, lotus, relieve, lux, lumen, lick, lambent, lappet (soft linen), lamb and glue, because L is the most frictionless consonant and the most strongly opposed to the friction of the totality and uniformity (Rappaport). Against this can certainly be cited: Load, leather, learning, lame, letum, languish, left.

-- I modified this paragraph a little, you would better read the original German version.

The sadist lives discontinuously in individual moments of time, he never understands himself: for him, every moment already has reality in itself; that is why he makes decisions easily, while the masochist can always only act on the basis of everything. The masochist is never in a position to ask himself, "How could I ever have done that? I don't understand myself!" This is the sadist's usual attitude to his past, which still does not, for that reason, lose its punctuated reality for him in the slightest. The sadist has the finest capacity for perception and the best memory for every momentary particular; his senses are continually engaged because all particulars have reality for him. The masochist suffers from long pauses, which he cannot fill with any reality.

-- "he never understands himself: for him, every moment already has reality in itself;", and, here "he" can change to "she" too, there are case a lovely girl with a strong boy, but the girl is the sadist, as she is too lovely, the boy follow her.

The masochist can, therefore, never love a picture or a statue: here there is all too little reality (activity) for him. The sadist can very well love them; he is also, of course, gallant, and gallantry is primarily the adornment of statues, from which one later removes the ornaments, or which one smashes, when there is no more reality to be sucked from them.

-- Have you see a photo that a lovely girl stand by a statue? Then you can know her deeply hid little inclination :)

The true concept of God is incomprehensible to the sadist; in art he is an oversensitive person, constantly focusing everything, and unjustly, on a man, on a moment, on a situation. He can tell stories; the masochist never (not even jokes), because no particular is real enough for him to be able to be lovingly absorbed in it. To the masochist, the character of Napoleon is a starting point from which he distances himself in order to think, and to comprehend him through thought: for the sadist, all the world lies in such a figure.

-- So she can't understand me at all :_) She can tell stories :) I begin to a little ashamed to understand those things, Weininger helped me again. Freud should be ashamed too when he begin to use sex to explain people :)

The masochist is thus helplessly weak in face of the sensory world: the sadist is strong in it. The masochist seeks to assert himself against appearance, against change: only he understands the concept of the Absolute (of God, of the idea, of meaning). The sadist does not question things about their meaning. For him, "Carpe Diem!" is the command of his I; change appears real to him. What strikes him about time is not change, but rather duration ("aere perennius").

-- the sadist is strong in it. The sadist does not question things about their meaning, so she can't sense the deeply hid meaning in the very "normal" chat words at all. In the other side, i think this is because her intelligence is not high enough, while she was always satisfied by her intelligence, high enough :)

Criminals who commit great individual criminal actions are sadists; criminals in the grand style, who actually commit no individual, separate crime, are masochists. Napoleon was a masochist, not a sadist as perfunctorily believed; as proof take his relationship to Josephine and his enthusiasm for Werther, his relationship to astronomy and to God. The individual woman never possessed real existence for him.

-- Yes, and, Napoleon was a masochist.

The sadist, moreover, can be a thoroughly decent and good person.

-- Right. So, please don't misunderstand me when i say who has sadistic inclinations.

The masochist takes everything as fate; the sadist loves to play fate. For masochists, the idea of fate is especially contained in concrete pain; pain has only as much reality for him as it has a share of this idea. So the sadist is the fate of the woman; the woman the fate of the masochist. "Woman" is sadistic (whoever is active in the sensation of woman); "Mrs." masochistic.

The sadist seeks to help people (against their will, their constant disposition) to (momentary) happiness or pain; he is grateful or revengeful.
-- momentary happiness. Almost don't lost any chance of dancing etc..

In gratefulness and revengefulness there is always a lack of compassion, thoughtlessness towards our (timeless) fellow man; both are, like all immorality, boundary transgressions, i.e., functional connections with our fellow man.

-- lack of compassion, she know that she hurt many boys without intention :
_) Our timeless fellow man :) Weininger must have a similar love story as me, my long mails are said to be deleted by her without read, i can save my mails easily as use computer, but Weininger can't as use papers, his mails may have all put into fire, so let him know she really have no sense on him at all and ask him don't mail her anymore, then Weininger decide to hide this failed love story at all, "happiness was foreign to Weininger's nature", "Weininger, initially, was no stranger to happiness. It was only later that his personality changed", then he write "Sex and Character" with the greatest passion, and he will then surely regard as driven by "the most vehement misogyny known to history". That girl won't say anything after Weininger committed suicide, for guilt, she know she killed a genius, but she was really without intention, so without compassion. OK, this is just a conjecture by "only genius understand genius", i will try to find some proof. Oh, Weininger saved my life, i know this is true. I am alive till now is a miracle, i have experience death for so many times(several electric shocks, drowning, appendicitis, many death accident i didn't aware or escaped and many chances to commit suicide :) i am laughing now, this is common in geniuses, genius like try everything, the lovely genius) in the past years. God is a miracle.

==

2004.2.2

Happy as a mad man :) I can understand the mad man's happy when he frighten the little students :) I once heard a mad man frightened a girl that her newly buy cake dropped to the ground, then the mad man pick up it :)

=====

An excursus appended to the earlier revision of Sex and Character, attempted to uncover morphological and parallel psychological analogies among mouth, throat and anal-genital regions, and in addition to ascertain something about the prototype of the vertebrate animal. It sought to ascertain what mouth and anus have in common, and tongue and sex organ, and to discover why sticking out the tongue is experienced as similar to the displaying of the behind; why eating in front of others was regarded as shameless among some primitive peoples (as etiquette still forbids eating on the street today): which analogies exist between the genital and eating instincts; why the tongue-kiss is so closely related to ejaculation; why the thyroid gland (which has a rudimentarily developed excretory duct that ends at the root of the tongue) stands in such a remarkable relationship to the reproductive glands, why the voice is especially sexually stimulating, and is so strongly sexually differentiated.

Pleasure is physical, joy mental. The neurasthenic's sin is wanting to become good only through suffering.

Animals and plants are the unconscious in man.

The old man who is childlike: He has not grasped the meaning of life.

Morality is assigned to the heart, intellect to the head.

All animals are criminal, even the horse, even the swan (aimless beauty, no longer flies anywhere): there is a fear of the swan.

Every animal has a face in which one discovers some kind of human emotion, an instinct, a passion, a human weakness or baseness.

That she is lustful, mendacious, coquettish, that she immediately springs into action as soon as anyone seems to take less note of her, that she will leave standing anyone who courts her naively and admires her openly - indeed that she has all of the prostitute in her, is not so new to me as you seem to think, and has also stirred me less than the observation I made shortly before I left, that in all these qualities she does not suffer, and does not control them, does not hold herself in check.

-- She should be the girl who Weininger courted with all his love. Hu Yan like dancing in the ballroom, she will have a new boyfriend soon after part company with her precious boyfriend, i know she changed boyfriend for about four times while i court her, in about half an year :)

The feeling of not being able to love again, I unfortunately know very closely.

-- Brokenhearted. She should have tell him that she burn his mails without read to ask him never mail her anymore, and at last scold him rudely and tell him that she have a new boyfriend now. Like this:

*****

ã̂, ä; j ä°: icelotus (æ, ... æ° èŠ™è“%oÂ: â; fâ!, æ-çæ°) æ † éç~: Re: ç®€â••ç”ÿæ´ » :)
â•ä; j ç«™: â»â•â; şâ-!è“è%o²æ~ÿç°ç«™ (Tue Nov 18 10:00:02 2003)
æ•¥ æ°: 211.83.127.249

ä½ äZ»æ-»~i¼•i¼•i¼•i¼•i¼•i¼• ä½ æ€Zä¹è; æ~è;™ä¹è†ªâ•šâ; şæf... â•Ši¼•
æ^ä»Zæ•¥æ²; æœ%oè®”âZÆä, €ä, ç”ç”ÿâf•è®”âZÆä½ ä, €æ .i¼Æä½ çÿÿ ¥ä, çÿÿé“æ^â¾çf!ä½ â•Šã€, æ^æ%o€æœ%oçš, æf³æ³•ä»€ä¹é f½â’Æä½ æ— â...¾i¼Ææ^çZ°
âœé•zâ, é•zâ, çf!ä½ ä€, çœèèš•ä½ çš, â•â—â°±âf•â•Zä°†èè•†ä, €æ .éš¾â—i¼Æä±...ç
„¶è®©æ^çç°ä, Šä½ è;™çš•ä, â•ç•†â»çš, ç”ç”ÿã€, æ^ä»Zæ•¥æ²; æœ%oæ-fçœ¼çœèè;†ä½ i¼Æçœÿçš, ä€, è€Æä, ”æ^æœ%oç”æœ<â•<â°†i¼Æä, è!â†â’Ææ^èè;™ä°è®©æ^é•zâ, ä, è^æœçš, è-ã€, æ^â¾æf³æšæ%o“ä½ ä, €é; i¼Æçÿÿé“â•—i¼ÿ
ä½ âªè†ªâ•šâ; şæf... ä°†i¼Æä½ çš, ä; j æ^ä»Zæ•¥é f½ä, æ€Zä¹çœ<â° ±â i¼Ææ>ä, è!è-â—ä½ çš, ä½±â•â°†ã€, â,Ææœ>ä½ ä»¥â•Zâ†â¹ÿä, è!ç»™æ^â•è;™ä°âz fâœ¾ã€, ä€, ã€• äœ” huzheng (â!-â...%) çš, æ•¥ä; j ä, -æ••â°: ä€

*****

:_) I was going to hide this mail forever too, it astonished me. I laugh... I am Weininger.

I find the thought of an essay "On the gait of man" very pleasing, but you should write it as soon as there is time and inclination. My feeling for what the gait of a man says is comparatively weak, much less expressed than with you, or than with my, for example, physiognomic impressions. It will also be useful to you with the Philistines if you handle such a serious subject, "although..."

-- Yes, physiognomic impressions, we have this ability.

The more love and the less pure sexual excitation there is, the more decent is the child (no criminal as man, no prostitute but rather mother as woman).

Believe me: when a man like you or me stops being productive, you should not wait for it to come back, but look for a reason. There is always a fault.

==

Things astonished me too, i can understand Nietzsche and Weininger completely so easily. As we are pure human.

I still very appreciate Hu Yan, she pursue her love and never change herself too, although she should just be the people who most impossible to understand me :)

What to say? Alas.

2004.2.3

There exists high intelligence idiots, that are not wise at all. In fact, i think this is because their intelligence are too low, can't break a limit, but, high enough :) when compare to animals or themselves. And this was called the difference between genius and talent.

"Society expresses its sympathy for the geniuses of the past to distract attention from the fact that it has no intention of being sympathetic to the geniuses of the present." --Celia Green. Too right, genius is said to be awaited by them, but genius is not welcomed when come. "When a true genius appears in this world, you may know him by this sign, that the dunces are all in confederacy against him." --Jonathan Swift. A short article titled "Hu Zheng Genius Philosophy" will be deleted everywhere :_)

Genius, remember, always make yourself happier than others, so it is you laugh at them, rather than they :_) I know Hu Yan was astonished when she see my smiling face, while she was hugging happily with her boyfriend and glance at me :_) People feel good when they know genius feel not good(so they often ask you "Are you well?", and my answer "super well" often make them disappointed), people are shocked when they know you have so many beautiful and lovely girlfriends(genius should have no girlfriend). :)

I write these things for fun? :) I just played AirStrike 3D Operation W.A.T, a good game :)

I know you the lazy boy don't want to go out and find a reason that it is cold, but i can tell you, the cold weather is just the best weather for running :) Go, and you will find you skin become warm and your body is full of energy soon :)

<http://huzheng.geniusreligion.org> is OK :)

The Internet will surely affect the whole human, innumerable things appear in the Internet like a chaos, and the essence emerged in them too :)

I have no interest to discuss whether i am a genius, let's discuss whether you are a idiot :)

2004.2.4

Read over "Peer Gynt" by Henrik Ibsen.

2004.2.5

When only i one person in the room, i get up early, After Bu Weiming come, we get up early too, then Wu Chuanhui come, we become all get up late, all of us lie in the bed and wait others to get up :) Three monks have no water to drink. After all, as we understood this psychological phenomenon, we can overcome it :) I will get up early again tomorrow :_)

Ho, money and power are desired by you, speak slowly and low intelligence girl is lovely, indignant people is most justice, become a scientist is funny :_)

I laugh at myself more than you :_)

I am always joking, until more and more things become true, we are always laughing, until you know the meaning of my laugh :)

If dig more deep, that is, want to exist.

What i write in the last month? Haven't much things and i don't want to review. In other side, i don't think any book i read ago have much things :_) Good, keep ignorant. And, i need to break my present limit.

"Both are lost in the world, we meet and understand each other that needn't be acquainted ago". -- Bai Juyi. Feel very lonely.

Eternal.

Alone and smile :)

Read over "Up and down these 5000 years" by Cao Yuzhang, about China history.

2004.2.6

Start reading "On last things".

=====

Fear of old women is just fear of death.

==

2004.2.7

What make me laugh everyday? :) Analyze others' psychology is very interesting, my psychology is very interesting too. Human is a interesting animal :_)

Read over "On last things".

2004.2.8

Read over "Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science" By Martin Gardner, a very humorous book :)

Read "Sex and Character" again :)

=====

Universality is the distinguishing mark of genius. There is no such thing as a special genius, a genius for mathematics, or for music, or even for chess, but only a universal genius. The genius is a man who knows everything without having learned it.

There are many kinds of talent, but only one kind of genius, and that is able to choose any kind of talent and master it.

If a common theory, especially popular with the philosophers of the coffee-house, be true, that productive men (because they are always covering new ground) have no memory, it is often because they are productive only from being on new ground.

==

2004.2.9

The secret of success is, never stop, so he is impossible to fail.

I think about whether i am the god on the bed last night :) This is not strange, so many theologians are thinking about whether god exists too. I trust i am the god sometimes too, I often feel i am the god when i walk on the road and when i close my eyes :_) This is not strange, so many people trust god exists too, and they often feel god exists.

Missionize on the earth, Genius Religion :)

=====

Time creates and time destroys the emperor.

-- Historian recorded many wars, but the wars are non-sense and people will forget their detail at last, then the emperor is destroyed by time. Even the emperor have done some good things(the emperor often done bad things too), it is only mainly their contemporary people benefit from him, so him is destroyed with his contemporary people too, by time.

Thus he becomes one and all; he has the law in him, and so he himself is the law, and no mere changing caprice.

Nothing is superior to him, to the isolated absolute unity.

But how can I show a man my contempt, and how prove to him my respect? The first by ignoring him, the second by being friendly with him.

==

I feel very serene this afternoon, the head is very clear, the consciousness spread from my brain to the whole outside world, feel there have no gulf from my head and body to the outside world. :) You can easily get this too if you train your body and train your thought.

:) :_)

2004.2.10

=====

Maternal love is an instinctive and natural impulse, and animals possess it in a degree as high as that of human beings. This alone is enough to show that it is not true love, that it is not of moral origin; for all morality proceeds from the intelligible character which animals, having no free will, do not possess. The ethical imperative can be heard only by a rational creature; there is no such thing as natural morality, for all morality must be self-conscious.

-- I am sure that prostitute love is not true love now. I think maternal love is the genuine true love, and Weininger saying this as mountain is not mountain. Don't misunderstand, maternal love is completely different from love mother, and, i think, prostitute love is love your younger sister in fact.

The matron whose whole time is taken up in looking after her husband and children, who is working in, or superintending the work of, the house, garden, or other forms of labour, ranks intellectually very low. The most highly developed women mentally, those who have been lauded in poetry, belong to the prostitute category;

-- This is the normal case, but i see the most intellectual girls are the maternal category.

Napoleon, the greatest of the conquerors, is a sufficient proof that great men of action are criminals, and, therefore, not geniuses.

A truly great man may honestly share in the desire for admiration or fame but personal ambition will not be his aim.

Great men of action, then, must be excluded from the category of genius.

The true genius, whether he be an artist or a philosopher, is always strongly marked by his relation to the constructive side of the world.

I have found some clues however. The anti-moral significance of prostitution is in harmony with the fact that it appears only amongst mankind.

-- I find another clue, money and power is only amongst mankind too, and the two have close relation to prostitution. Prostitution is for entertainment? The third thing besides living and propagation? But there are many other ways for entertainment too, and money and power should can't make man really happy because of their price. Prostitution is because of vanity, the desire of power have relation to the desire of immortality too (but the wrong way in our view). Weininger get this: "Even individual immortality is vanity, or fame-egoism". Just like prostitution is opposite to motherhood, emperor is opposite to us. There are two way for immortality, destruct or construct the world :_) True genius is undoubtedly can defeat emperor type genius as humaner, wicked can't win justice, god defeat demon. The emperor type geniuses can process the strong intelligence and will as us, although they are beastly. But they are not wise at all (and this become the cause of their failure). There exist two type of prostitution, the second type girls have no beautiful face but display their body, and their prostitution should is not because of vanity, may be money (money is still vanity in the wide range, but the first type girl's vanity have no desire of much money). The emperor type genius think money is most really, while i often feel money don't exist, so vanity is just the reality to prostitute type girl. Nothingness and Absolute. Is it possible that after human race become more and more humanly then prostitute type girl disappear as the most intellectual girl is maternal and the beastly genius disappear too? No, just like monkey is still on the earth with human. I understand now, a new living species is generating, what called superman by Nietzsche, or the pure human called by me.

==

"Geniuses experience a second adolescence, whereas other people are only young once." -- Goethe. I am experiencing my second adolescence, after be seems drowsily for several years :) What i want to say here is, Jiang Qin is experiencing her second adolescence too, her face and dress up are completely the same as a little girl.

=====

zyzyis:

I'm sure that I know why huzheng became a "philosopher" now ?
for his lovely goddess for anonymous girls

==

Too right :) And i have already find her :_)

I find i am completely a child, when someone send me a mail and make me have to talk about his stupid suggestion, it will destroy my good mood and i have to scold his stupidity :) Really have to. I will reply them with the ":)" as the content later on.

I suggest you use Window XP!

I like quarreling to you :_) As it let me regain my good mood soon, hehe.

Everything changed, my heart is beating, my body is trembling violently. I vow i won't commit suicide, and i know i won't, i can overcome it...my fingers are trembling. I go sleep now.

2004.2.11

I am very tired now, last night i get on-line of QQ and going to send several messages to Jiang Qin but received several messages from her and get to know that she already have boyfriend, and my heart get out of control :_) I really don't want to write down these secret things now, write down for myself? The heart is too tired and feel the breath is very hard. :) A good philosopher must have a strong heart that can bear ruthless and full of love at the same time. I think for hours last night, get up in the early morning and write down some draft, then go to bed again but can't fall into sleep.

I thought about commit suicide by the way of course :_) After the spirit get the level, the sexual desire can be disappeared, the alive desire can be disappear too as think about commit suicide will make your spirit get the highest level, the reason of sex is propagate, the reason for alive is, death? Death have no difference from life to you now, you will feel your spirit contained the whole world, become the whole world, and death won't eliminate it, but make it become eternal, then death become very temptingly, and you may feel ashamed while you know all the geniuses are in the other world. I know i have no danger as i am still a child. So, material life and spiritual life should be balanced, only one of them is wrong.

Weininger said this:"The absolute mother (if such existed), who thinks only about the child, would become a mother by any man", yes, but this is because she is full of love too, just like male genius will accept any girl too. Genius love everything, everyone, he/she love the animals, the plants, as love the nature. Jiang Qin like her boyfriend as i like Hu Yan, and will never change too. So, if she can accept my viewpoint, i should still have hope :_) But :)

Wang Xiaobo find he didn't get the true love, because he didn't have children with Cheng Qingyang, Cheng Qingyang is a maternal type girl. Stendhal think maternal love is true love too, as Julien Sorel get to know prostitute love is connected to vanity at last, and my theory can easily explain why he find Renal's children become mediocre after grow up. In fact, literateur give philosopher the material, philosopher think about it deeply and then tell you the reason.

IQ test is certainly can't test the wise quality, and the genius often think about those problems more deep and from various aspect, so they can't get very high mark in the IQ test, but if give they enough time they should can get very high mark. Einstein is not good at psychology, this can be explained as he is not wise, and his face will give you this impression directly too, so Einstein is not a true genius as Napoleon.

Weininger think there only exist two type of genius, genius as artist or genius as philosopher, but i think, the absolute genius(the greatest genius, the genius of geniuses) can only be a philosopher(or religion founder ago). Weininger find him have musical genius later on as "I now have the conviction that I am yet born to be a musician", i can understand this, when i have good mood i will begin to humming, the rhythm which come out from my heart will be a music if i get enough training on music, and if i draw down what i see when i walk on the road, which make me feel i am the god, it will be a good drawing too. Artist is still not absolute genius can be know by their face(Beethoven, Von Gang), that is still not very humanly. All other type of geniuses(artist, literateur, scientist, emperor, politician, psychologist...) are just have some portion of the absolute genius, or the absolute human.

Commit suicide is a indication of highly developed, and, i know whale commit suicide too, dolphin have high intelligence, there are many story that dolphin save human, oh, may be they(especially the whale) have higher intelligence than human! They should have their way for communication, their brain is bigger than human, but they lack the hand to create tools. So research the way to communicate to them is very valuable. Oh, i nearly trust this viewpoint now, i am sure that human are very stupid :_) Human should stop to be arrogant now. Another thing is, Chinese are very wise people, but have no science ago, as they can live harmoniously with the nature without science, so this can explain why whale have no science. If we can communicate to them, they can help us to research science etc., oh, that beautiful world, human no longer be alone!

:_) Genius of geniuses is very good at fantasizing while all of his words have proofs, hehe.

Genius religion have so many interesting things to do, join us, join genius religion :)

What is true love? I think the love between the most sex-complement people, between the male genius and female genius is the most true love, most of the low intelligence girl is maternal type, the high intelligence girl is prostitute type, the highest intelligence is maternal type again. All love are true, but love can get deeper and deeper.

Geniuses are the most easy to get on with people in fact, except they make you ashamed when you compare yourself with them, but this is not their fault, they never despise you in fact, they smile to you sincerely when meet you, you should build up your self-respect, and, only when you insist on your stupidity in front of them, as it will destroy their good mood, they will play with you and reveal your stupidity in front of you to the extreme, so you should start to recognize your ignorance as Socrates, as geniuses.

Except the sea, the forest should have some rare living species that are wiser than human too, although they have no science too. Human should focus on protect the environment and improve human quality first, then we can make them start to trust us, don't avoid us, then communicate to them should be very fast and easy, as they are very wise.

Is it possible that human have already evoluted to their limitation as pure human appeared? As the brain can't become bigger? I think it is very possible, just as honey stopped evolution. But human can communicate to other species(whale, savages), and we can live together harmoniously and cooperate, human stopped evolution, but evolution never stop, there may generate the super human(or super whale etc.), are they still human? If ape is not human, they should not be human too. I think, maybe brain is not the bigger the better, just like the body, so human should still be the best (although not the wisest) species :)

I lie on the bed in the morning, in the noon, in the afternoon, but i always can't fall into sleep. Now my head is happy, but the heart is grieve, and the head, the heart, the body all are very tired, oh, i need to take good care of my body these days.

May be i am only the chieftain of sophists, like Chuang Tsu, Socrates etc. :
_)

When you don't feel good, go out and sit down under the sunshine, the sun is most beautiful.

I am very lazy now, often think write nothing is the best. :) But i will done this work.

I feel very good now, after arranged the precious sentences and find i still have hope :) Philosophy always help me and make me happy :) I am so good at explaining everything that i met :)

I am a deluded boy, or enlightened? The lover is the most beautiful girl in his lover's eyes. I am the most self-love people in the history? Who knows :_) Too interesting :_) Human is beautiful, yes, then who is humaner? This is always changing, by the theory that declining face is ugly. People find i am most handsome after read my book, after find i keep ascend and never decline :_) In the infant's eyes, there have no beautiful or ugly.

My confidence is build on geniuses in the history ago, so if i am deluded, human are deluded too :_) I was a boy always admire others in my childhood, only after touch philosophy i become deluded to the deepest :)

If you love yourself, you are in your reality. The happiest people's reality, who never decline is called the ultimate reality. How to keep never decline? Who is most good at live and propagate. If entertainment is not good for live and propagate, it become vanity. Honey live in their reality, human live in human's reality, if human become extinct but honey is still there, honey's reality is the real reality compare to human. If the living creature evolve to the last, they should will become materials, as never extinct. Then, living creatures generate from the materials again. The eternal circle.

Oh, so cool :) I make all of you can understand Nietzsche's thinking now :) Then, there is not life or death, as i am alive even i am the material form. I hear that dolphin won't try to save their partizan when human kill dolphin in front of them, may be this is because they have already understand there have no death. Oh, so many animals on the earth are more evolved than human.

What is the utmost truth? One. such as crime and punishment is one, life and death is one, etc. There have no difference.

Is philosophy terminated? :_)

I go to have supper, everyone is beautiful :)

The universe is one. Physics terminated :_) I am not joking, this is the most simple formula which physicists pursued, science was always only philosophy's helper, it tell you truths, and only philosophy can tell you the one truth, the utmost truth.

I know my utmost truth will change the whole human, but my last vanity, the vanity for immortality, have already disappeared :) As i know i am immortal, even no one know my name :)

Wisdom in extremes is folly, genius tortured because of the desire for immortality, i don't desire immortality as any fool now :)

Enjoy our life :) Enjoy the eternal circle :) The perfect world.

I telephone to Jiang Qin and tell my utmost truth to her happily, and i know my words like flapdoodle, make others trust my utmost truth still need time :) But it should will be accepted soon, as everyone will become happy after understand it :) I created this biggest matrix :_) I created the Genius Religion :_)

:) So funny, so happy :)

The world is played by a child? :) Because he is happiest, he have smile and laugh being the most powerful weapon :_)

My philosophy can explain why ancient civilizations are disappeared, they have the most powerful science, but they don't defeat barbarian's invasion, because they become completely altruist after the last selfishness, the selfishness for immortality, disappeared :)

Yes, more and more people will become altruist after understand my philosophy, and in this way human will build the best world easily.

When i say money will disappear ago, you regard it as dream and impossible, but this will become true soon, maybe only need tens of years, the highly developed civilization is surely have no money, "Genius never desires what does not exist." -- Kierkegaard. I know money doesn't exist as i know i have no desire of it :)

I run on the playground, Weininger didn't died, Nietzsche didn't died, their spirit are completely filled the whole world, my spirit is completely filled the whole world, many geniuses' spirit are completely filled the whole world, they become the same as the whole world, as the nature, become the happiest, and so will never be eliminated. Buddha's highest realm should be the same as mine, entered the happiest world, the eternal world, Weininger entered this world too, i paste this again, "A person lives until he enters either into the Absolute or into Nothingness. In freedom he himself determines his future life; he chooses God or Nothingness. He annihilates himself or creates himself unto eternal life. For him a double progress is possible: one toward eternal life (to perfect wisdom and holiness, to a condition fully adequate to the idea of the True and the Good) and one toward eternal annihilation. However, he continually advances in one of these two directions; there is no third", yes, Buddha tell you enter into the Absolute too, or you will become Nothingness.

Just like whether you are a genius depend on whether you believe you are a genius, whether you entered into the Absolute depend on whether you believe you have already entered into the Absolute. I have already believed this.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 712

(2/21/04 7:04 pm)

Reply

Re: Enter into Absolute

---

Can you write little bits at a time? I get bored and only read a paragraph each time.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2349

(2/21/04 7:11 pm)

Reply

---

---

If you can only read a little voce, read a little! Why complain?!

Quote:

---

Why we are fond of hide the meaning deeply? This is the game between geniuses :) We do this to distinguish each other from normal people.

"mountain is mountain again" is the unifying of "mountain is mountain" and "mountain is not mountain".

If your words are boring, i will lead our conversation become more boring, that make you can't bear :)

Yes, i trust beautiful girl, as genius trust genius :)

War is geniuses' competing game, but it is wrong, geniuses waste their life in it. Now geniuses like to compete each other by devotion, as devotion need intelligence, morality, will, and devotion can create the maximum value.

The trouble of their love story is, both of them are too noble :) But this is just why their story is so fascinating. My secret is, be lowest, while noblest :_) How? Be a noble child :)

---

I love this stuff!

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2352

(2/21/04 8:49 pm)

Reply

----

---

At the end, I shall not enter 'the absolute' ----I want to surmount nothingness! So I shall enter into it! A return to myself. To live for the future is noblest, but this is only possible if one first lives for oneself and consecrates the entire present!

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 713

(2/22/04 4:17 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Why complain? Because it's annoying to try and read this entire thing. If he is trying to talk to people uninterested in spiritual concepts, so that there may become more geniuses, he should write to that audience. Currently, he's primarily writing to only the audience that likes him.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 714

(2/22/04 4:20 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

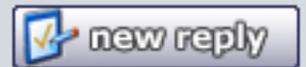

In other words...he is just showing off to his friends.

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2357(2/22/04 10:04 am)Reply                                                                                 | --- <hr/> That's crap. He writes to his readers. Who doesn't?!                                                                                                                                                            |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 717(2/22/04 11:13 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> He most likely won't have a large amount of readers if he continues to write so horribly. That's the point of his writing, isn't it...to get people into his line of thinking? The more people, the better? |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 455(2/22/04 6:59 pm)Reply                                                                                      | Hey, China man <hr/> Apart from that, Hu Zheng is ugly.Everybody knows it, nobody says it. Well, I just did. Naughty me.                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2361(2/22/04 9:06 pm)Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Hu Zheng is not ugly. Paul, please post your picture in here like the best of us do. No-one here is naughtier than I.                                                                      |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000 Forum Host Posts: 2207 (2/22/04 9:16 pm) Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Suergaz wrote, about Hu Zheng's material: Quote: <hr/> I love this stuff! <hr/> He is a complete moron, Suergaz. He makes use of words such as "God" and "Ultimate Reality" ..... I mean, what a twit! |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2363 (2/22/04 9:28 pm) Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> Dave, you think I lack love! We all have our differences, for instance, Hu Zheng is more intelligent than yourself.                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Paul Registered User Posts: 457 (2/22/04 10:59 pm) Reply                                                                                      | To suergaz <hr/> I don't know how to put a picture of mine in this forum. Just give me an e-mail address, and I'll send you my ugly face. Wait, I remember now, Anna has her e-address available. I'll send it to her. And to you. If I get your e-address. x                      |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2365 (2/23/04 12:46 am) Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Anna couls host a picture of you, I'm sure she'll oblige, even if only for a little time (that of the duration of bearing your visage burning into her brain)                                                                                                                                  |
| Paul Registered User Posts: 458 (2/23/04 3:21 am) Reply                                                                                       | Re: --- <hr/> : - ) Picture of dumb Paulie is sent to annaoleynik@hotmail.com                                                                                                                                                                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 46(2/27/04 10:00 am)Reply                                                                                     | Re: --- <hr/> David, Wisdom in extremes is folly, and i think i have already answered you in "Absolutivity, Circlematics". I may need to remind you, only moron will think i am moron :_)                                                                                                                                            |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 47(2/27/04 10:03 am)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Hey, China man <hr/> Paul, i am sure that you are ugly, as only ugly people will think i am ugly. Here is my photo:  put your photo here, let us compare, and let you know what is ugly. Edited by: huzheng at: 2/27/04 10:04 am |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2432(2/27/04 10:14 am)Reply                                                                                   | --- <hr/> David doesn't think you're a moron Hu Zheng, but he was trying to suggest that I think you are because I like to tease people who talk about 'God' and 'Ultimate Reality'.                                                                                                                                                        |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 763(2/27/04 10:33 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> I do think you're a moron.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 48(2/27/04 10:36 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> I know this so i added a ":_)" :)The best way to tease a Christian is tell him that "i am the god", then he find he need to prove that you are not the god, but not "god exists", which they good at :) |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 49(2/27/04 10:38 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> You are the only moron in this forum :_)                                                                                                                                                                     |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

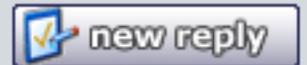

> GENIUS FORUM

> Enter into Absolute

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2436(2/27/04 12:41 pm)Reply                                                                                         | --- <hr/> I've told so many christians I am god through internet chat! It is great fun!And perhaps you're right that it is the best way. But it is still a beautiful thing to tell a christian you're the devil! So funny!!                                                                                                                                                                     |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 821(2/27/04 1:56 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Hu Zheng is writing streams of words, large gushing rivers, in fact. Why make so many words? Compare writing with horse riding. There are two ways to ride a horse. Either you ride the horse, or the horse rides you. It is the same with thoughts and with writing. Either you control your thoughts and thus your writing, or the thoughts control you. Thomas |

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2439(2/27/04 2:04 pm)Reply                                                                                         | --- <hr/> I don't see your point Tom. It is clear to see from Hu Zhengs words that he is a thinker. To be swept away with oneself (I am not saying Hu Zheng is so) is not something that really needs cautioning against. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 470(2/28/04 11:33 pm)Reply                                                                                            | Thomas Knierim &amp; Truth <hr/> Thomas Knierim, like Hu, is a Genius in long stories.So he will be outsmarted by suergaz anytime. How's Thailand, Smiley?                                                                  |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 828(3/1/04 2:19 pm)Reply  | Re: Thomas Knierim &amp; Truth <hr/> A joy to behold, as usual. Thomas                                                                                                                                                           |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

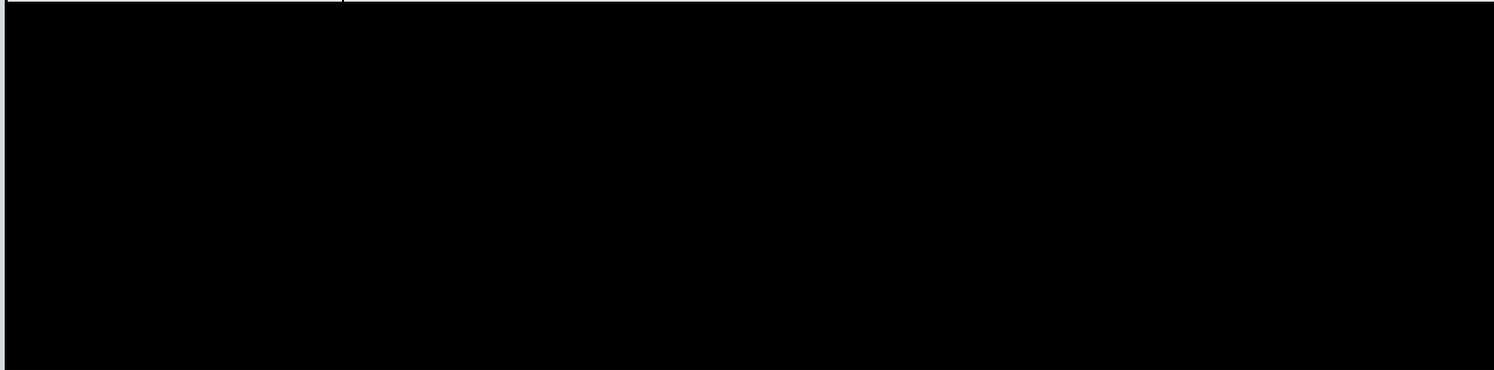

GENIUS FORUM
> GENIUS FORUM
> Evil

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 190(12/21/03 10:36 pm)Reply | Evil <hr/> Quote: <hr/> KS: "Evil" is a name we give so something we observe - namely, it is the opposite, and the most removed, from what we choose to call "good". If truth is what we call "good", then it follows that lies and untruth are "evil". suergaz: No, it follows that lies and untruth would be what you call evil. <hr/> It doesn't make any sense to place the word "call" in front of everything. To be consistent, you would have to add the words "what we call" in front of every single noun you use. Quote: <hr/> Kevin: So it's not a matter of "believing" in evil or not, it is simply a category we use. suergaz: We? I don't use that category. <hr/> |

|                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                      | Indeed you do use that category, only you might give it a name other than "evil". The difference is only in a name.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1990(12/21/03 10:56 pm)Reply | -- <hr/> So you admit it's a matter of taste! This all then comes down to you saying people are evil! I never have!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 191(12/21/03 11:02 pm)Reply  | Re: -- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> So you admit it's a matter of taste! This all then comes down to you saying people are evil! I never have! <hr/> I'm not sure what your point is here. Yes, what labels we use for things is a matter of taste, such as whether you call yourself suergaz or zagreus. But whatever the name, you are are same person. Similarly with "evil", or whichever other name you want to use for the same thing. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1991(12/21/03 11:15 pm)Reply | -- <hr/> hahahahah! You use the word evil to describe people! WHAT SAME THING?! hahahahahah                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 192
(12/21/03 11:20 pm)
Reply

Re: Evil

---

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

You use the word evil to describe people!

---

You can use the word to describe anything which exhibits the characteristics of evil.

Quote:

---

WHAT SAME THING?!

---

The thing referred to by the label "evil".

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1993
(12/21/03 11:23 pm)
Reply

---

---

And what is it?!!!!

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 194
(12/21/03 11:30 pm)
Reply

Re: Evil

---

Quote:

---

And what is it?

---

You will remember that I defined evil earlier in this discussion (Reincarnation thread) as "the opposite, and the most removed, from what we choose to call 'good'".

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                         | I then suggested that what is "good" is truth.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1995(12/21/03 11:31 pm)Reply    | --- <hr/> Then, I'm terribly sorry to have given you the benefit of the doubt as they say, for it isn't! Hahahahahahaha!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 379(12/22/03 1:01 am)Reply         | Re: --- <hr/> suergaz, you're at it again.Aren't you forgetting it's only Sweet Brains in this forum? Sorry, Dangerous Brains, I forgot.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| 1Mike SRegistered UserPosts: 2(12/22/03 2:09 am)Reply        | Re: --- <hr/> How about a different definition? This is devoid of human interpretation, so it could be considered an "absolute" definition of good and evil: everything that flows in the direction of nature is good, everything that goes against nature is evil.Try that on for size! Mikehttp://www.notcreatedequal.com/ |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1352(12/22/03 2:52 am)Reply | Good and Evil <hr/> Hi Mike, Can you name or identify one single thing or idea that actually "goes against nature?" Tharan                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1353
(12/22/03 3:08 am)
Reply

Good and Evil

---

Kevin,

With the way you guys use these definitions (yourself, David Q, Rhett), I cannot help but sense an emotional component to this application.

For example, let's say some particular rock is "evil." Others will then argue that the rock is "good." Still others might argue that the rock is neither good nor evil, but something in between the two, or maybe an inert mixture of both.

But the rock is a natural phenomenon. So is a pedophile. So is a serial killer or a Catholic priest with his zipper down. The fact is, all these things are natural, yet to label them with these terms (good/evil) is merely done so out of an emotional desire to separate "that which you like/prefer" from "that which you do not like/prefer." This act of emotional distinction is done fundamentally as a tool to be used as a motivator for some social change that the labeller desires.

These labels are merely one set of an infinite set of dualities that are not actual. And it would seem the application of these labels in a social setting does not follow the path of logic and reason, but rather a path of emotional acceptance; herdiness when taken to the extreme.

Please correct me if I am wrong.

Tharan

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1162
(12/22/03 1:06 pm)
Reply

good and evil

---

You are wrong in the sense that those things you mention such as the serial killer are aberrations, produced through emotional pain. They are unnatural in that they do not follow the pattern that promotes life. I don't think it is valid to say that it is equally natural to produce a kind and decent person as a serial killer, because that which produces great emotional aberration is a deviation from tried and true behavior patterns that have evolved to promote life, such as good parenting, and gentle treatment of the very young. It is natural for the emotions to become extremely skewed under extreme duress. But it isn't good.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 683

(12/22/03 2:13 pm)

Reply

Re: good and evil

---

Good and evil are completely human attributes. For this reason they are subjective. However, the more we become human, the better we understand the nature of good and evil. Much of our lifetime is spent with perfecting our understanding of good and evil. Commonly, humans aspire to become gods and hence we seek good, or respectively what we believe to be good. For the same reason we fight evil, or respectively what we believe to be evil. Unfortunately, on account of zealousness and ignorance, humans become blind and trapped in evil so that the struggle carries on.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 196

(12/22/03 6:02 pm)

Reply

Re: Good and Evil

---

Tharan wrote:

Quote:

---

With the way you guys use these definitions (yourself, David Q, Rhett), I cannot help but sense an emotional component to this application.

---

It is true that the word "evil" has a tendency to trigger emotions in the unwise. But that's precisely the value in it. For example, most people like to see themselves as "good", and try to be satisfied with that. They become complacent. So when you explain to them that rather than being "good" they are in fact the living embodiment of evil, it can be enough to make them sit up and take notice. It might even make them consider re-evaluating their position.

Quote:

---

These labels are merely one set of an infinite set of dualities that are not actual.

---

The good-evil duality is just as real any other duality, such as true-false, or self - not-self.

Quote:

---

And it would seem the application of these labels in a social setting does not follow the path of logic and reason, but rather a path of emotional acceptance; herdiness when taken to the extreme.

Please correct me if I am wrong.

---

The emotions provide handles through which people can be pushed and prodded. The Zen Master Hakuin, for example, states that his initial motivation for becoming enlightened was primarily the fear of hell.

When people are pushed and prodded in the direction of wisdom, eventually they go beyond these emotions, and they are then able to see good and evil as they really are.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2003
(12/22/03 9:22 pm)
Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

It is true that the word "evil" has a tendency to trigger emotions in the unwise. But that's precisely the value in it. For example, most people like to see themselves as "good", and try to be satisfied with that. They become complacent. So when you explain to them that rather than being "good" they are in fact the living embodiment of evil, it can be enough to make them sit up and take notice. It might even make them consider re-evaluating their position.

---

The word 'evil' is predominantly used by the wizened. It has no value except for moral natures like your own who equate "good" with truth. What you are saying is that a lie can make a complacent person re-evaluate themselves.

Quote:

---

The good-evil duality is just as real any other duality, such as true-false, or self - not-self.

---

Excepting the last of these dualities, it is matter of taste whether we nullify ourselves and become proponents of them.

Quote:

---

The emotions provide handles through which people can be pushed and prodded. The Zen Master Hakuin, for example, states that his initial motivation for becoming enlightened was primarily the fear of hell.

When people are pushed and prodded in the direction of wisdom, eventually they go beyond these emotions, and they are then able to see good and evil as they really are.

---

I don't see good or evil at all. But then I don't wear glasses. Do you have a cane?

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 197

(12/22/03 11:08 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

The word 'evil' is predominantly used by the wizened. It has no value except for moral natures like your own who equate "good" with truth.

---

What do you equate "good" and "bad" with?

Answer: you believe that "good" is what you believe in, and "bad" is what you believe is wrong - and what you are seen to argue against.

Therefore you are yourself a "moral nature", without the current ability to admit it.

Quote:

---

What you are saying is that a lie can make a complacent person re-evaluate themselves.

---

Any truth spoken to a fool (ie, an unwise person) is always transformed into an untruth once it has filtered into their mind. That is the nature of a fool. They transform everything into untruth.

Edited by: ksolway at: 12/23/03 12:31 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2005

(12/22/03 11:59 pm)

Reply

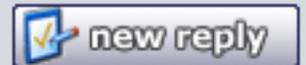

---

You asked me a question, and then answered for me, which is unwise and foolish.

A truth for you Kevin! I am a higher type of human being than you.

'Bad' now and not 'evil'? What I believe in does not matter! Greatness escapes you.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

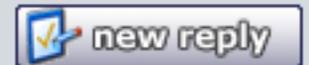

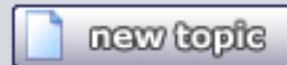

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Evolution

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 283(1/23/04 10:10 pm)Reply | Evolution <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> The "selfish gene" theory according to Dawkins is incompatible with group selection. <hr/> Clearly, individuals can be genetically programmed, or determined, to be servants of a group, like worker ants. However, the genes of the possibly sterile "slaves" may try to replicate themselves, if they are programmed/determined to. However, if they are programmed/determined not to try to replicate themselves, and remain simply serving the group, then that's what they will do. There is no law of nature that says that every individual gene will try to replicate itself, or serve primarily its own individual replication. If Dawkins believes that, then he is wrong, but I don't think he does believe that. Quote: <hr/> Dawkins states that individual organisms -or genes- are NOT | programmed to act in the interest of the species, not even in the interest of the group they happen to live in, unless of course the group's interest coincides with their own. Dawkins provides IMO very convincing reasoning for this.

---

In the case of worker ants, they are working to preserve genes that are a similar copy to themselves, but not themselves, since every worker ant is genetically unique.

I'm not convinced about Dawkins' category "individual". To me, the "individual" is an arbitrary grouping that can be applied to anything you want. A species is an individual, all life on this planet is an individual, etc.

Quote:

---

Social 'structures' have evolved ultimately for the benefit of the individual.

---

For the species and its genes (as an individual) to survive, it is important that many individuals within it reproduce - but not all.

Quote:

---

Kevin: But even if it is 100% concerned for others, and not at all for its own reproduction, it will still be almost perfectly reproduced in any case - through other individuals.

The problem with this idea is that altruism (being concerned for others) works only if ALL members of the group behave altruistic.

---

The genetic altruism I am talking about is the sacrificing of one's genetic uniqueness (as in the worker ant) in order to serve shared genes in the species pool. This works even if the 90% is exploiting the 10%.

Quote:

---

If there were a group of animals in which 99% of the group behaves altruistic and only 1% behaves exploitative (=non-altruistic), the exploitative minority would quickly gain a huge food and survival advantage over the altruistic animals.

---

In the case of human race there is an exploitative majority. All the selfish and bad people I know have lots of children, while all the good and unselfish people I know have very few, or no children at all. The exploitative majority have all the food and survival advantage over the good and unselfish minority, who are yet allowed to live off scraps.

My theory is that while the minority of good people generally do not pass on their own personal genes, there is something in the genetic code of the bad and selfish majority that keeps spawning a certain percentage of good an unselfish people - because they have a use, like the worker ants. In other words, without the good and unselfish people, the selfish majority would not be able to survive.

Quote:

---

With very few exceptions (such as the honey bee) we don't see any species where individuals perform suicidal altruistic sacrifices.

---

If it works better than any other technique, it is done. A species (as an individual) obviously doesn't want to waste too many of the individuals within it, or it will cease to exist.

Quote:

---

The structural identity of chimpanzees and humans is 98% but this does not account for the isomorphism arising from functionally identical genes. So, the comparison is not valid.

---

I'm not sure about that. It only takes very small changes in genes, especially when they have their effects early in the development of an organism, to create all the differences between us and chimpanzees.

Quote:

---

Although individuals sacrificing themselves for the species are an exceptionally rare phenomenon,

---

You agree that the worker ants are genetically different to both their parents, and each other. In other words, each individual worker ant is genetically unique. And they sacrifice that uniqueness in order to serve that part of themselves that they share with the rest of the colony.

There's an awful lot of ants - so it is quite common.

Quote:

---

. . . game theory . . .

---

Here's one of the first computer programs I ever wrote. It was written to use CGA mode (back when monitors only had only 4 colors - if you include the black background). But it still works on WinXP.

www.theabsolute.net/sware/files/life.zip

It's 13kb in size, and I'm not sure if it needs any support files. Let me know if it does.

|                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2109(1/23/04 10:25 pm)Reply                                                                                          | ---- <hr/> Our words for values are completely opposed! In my nobler understanding, The selfish are the few, the noble, and the unselfish the vast majority! You concede the common understanding of these words Kevin! I take their simpler, purer meaning. Concerning creepy crawlies, ---can you tell me anything about a species of 'flattid bug' in which the insects develop differently in appearance in order to form together into a type of flower that they mimic for a reason I forget?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2110(1/23/04 10:37 pm)Reply                                                                                          | --- <hr/> The reason most likely that of eluding predators, but anything else? It strikes me as a very strange example. *I've searched online, and I only seem to be able to find the kind that do not assume different parts. Could I be misinformed? Edited by: suergaz at: 1/23/04 10:48 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 777(1/25/04 10:10 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Kevin: However, the genes of the possibly sterile "slaves" may try to replicate themselves, if they are programmed/determined to. As a matter of fact they do, at least in the case of hymenoptera. Whether a female becomes a sterile worker or a queen depends on the uptake of certain chemical substances via food during the early stages of development. Kevin: There is no law of nature that says that every individual gene will try to replicate itself, or serve primarily its own individual replication. Yet, this is pretty much what Dawkins' theory implies. It is not the single genes that are in competition, but the entire DNA sequence of an organism made up of thousands of different genes. Since DNA is a sort of a program, this is like saying that different programs compete for survival. Single genes provide "algorithms" for the survival program. Some algorithms are effective, some are ineffective, some are detrimental. The program with the most effective combination of algorithms wins. It is also paramount that the program is capable of changing algorithms in order to cope with new challenges in a changing environment. Biologists know this as adaptation. Dawkins doesn't use the words 'algorithm' and 'program', but he uses the |

word 'survival machines' to describe organisms, so the terms algorithm and program appear like a natural extension of Dawkins' terminology to me.

Kevin: I'm not convinced about Dawkins' category "individual". To me, the "individual" is an arbitrary grouping that can be applied to anything you want.

I am not sure what brings you to say this. An "individual" is nothing arbitrary. You are a well-defined individual, likewise David and Dan are individuals, but QRS is not an individual.

Kevin: The genetic altruism I am talking about is the sacrificing of one's genetic uniqueness (as in the worker ant) in order to serve shared genes in the species pool. This works even if the 90% is exploiting the 10%.

You seem to bet all your money on worker ants. Are you sure this is wise? I mean, how representative do you think worker ants are for the animal kingdom? Even if you draw on the entire hymenoptera family and other social insects to illustrate group selection, your implication remains unconvincing. Animals do generally not work for the benefit of their species; they work for their own benefit, and -in some cases- for the benefit of the kin or the colony. The two objectives, survival of the species and the survival of the self, do of course coincide most of the time. Ants and bees have developed a strategy where the colony forms a "larger self". They work towards the goal of thriving and reproducing within that larger self. This is, however, an exception. Most animals do not live in rigid social arrangements like hymenoptera. Besides, it would be a mistake to conclude group altruism from the behavior of ants and bees. In reality, they don't care about the survival of the species. They actually fight each other. Some ant species are known to develop soldier ants who kill those of other ant colonies. Some ants also take slaves from other colonies after they killed these colonies' soldiers and worker ants. They carry away the unhatched young workers, which then hatch in their captor's nest and work for a queen with which they are genetically unrelated.

Kevin: In the case of human race there is an exploitative majority.

I am not at all inclined (and not sympathetic) to the use of the evolutionary selection argument to explain human behavior. Human beings have largely freed themselves from raw evolutionary selection pressure. They have complex social arrangements, artificial food supply, medicine, hygiene, and technology. If there should be an exploitative majority -as you suppose- perhaps this could be explained in terms of culture rather than in terms of biology.

Kevin: Here's one of the first computer programs I ever wrote. It was written to use CGA mode (back when monitors only had only 4 colors - if you include the black background).

Nice. I remember having written similar programs for the Atari ST some fifteen years ago. But it doesn't really cut to the core of the argument, the notion of an ESS (evolutionary stable strategy) which was formulated by Maynard Smith ten years before the game of life became popular among computer enthusiasts. An evolutionary stable strategy is an algorithm for survival. It could be a method for conflict resolution, food gathering, a defense mechanism, or anything that determines behavior. Such a behavior is subject to game-theoretical iterations where it interacts with competing strategies, a bit like the game of life, although on a somewhat higher order of complexity. The point is that the ultimate purpose of any ESS is domination in the gene pool, or respectively in the player population. The ultimate purpose is NOT to provide the maximum payoff to each player. Payoff is merely a single-game objective. This is to say that an ESS is rarely the strategy with the greatest shared benefit, but the strategy that is most stable against cheats, exploits, and intruder strategies, while still yielding a reasonably high benefit for each individual. An altruistic strategy -although possibly providing maximum payoff to each individual- is therefore not an ESS. It can be attacked or evaded by competing "nasty" strategies and it is therefore not stable.

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 286
(1/25/04 11:02 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: To me, the "individual" is an arbitrary grouping that can be applied to anything you want.

T: I am not sure what brings you to say this. An "individual" is nothing arbitrary. You are a well-defined individual, likewise David and Dan are individuals, but QRS is not an individual.

---

Anything we call "individual" is in reality just a grouping of things, some of which might be quite disparate.

Quote:

---

You seem to bet all your money on worker ants. Are you sure this is wise?

---

Yes. It is the principle that matters.

Quote:

---

It would be a mistake to conclude group altruism from the behavior of ants and bees. In reality, they don't care about the survival of the species. They actually fight each other. Some ant species are known to develop soldier ants who kill those of other ant colonies.

---

That is a way of ridding the species of inferior genetic stock.

Quote:

---

Some ants also take slaves from other colonies after they killed these colonies' soldiers and worker ants.

---

Good idea.

Quote:

---

Animals do generally not work for the benefit of their species; they work for their own benefit, and -in some cases- for the benefit of the kin or the colony.

---

This is your claim, but you haven't provided the proof.

It is often to the benefit of the species that individuals work "for themselves". So in working for themselves they are in fact working for the benefit of the species - which is a dynamic, not a static thing. The species must keep changing to keep pace with the competition, and it relies on the individuals within it for that change.

Quote:

---

The two objectives, survival of the species and the survival of the self, do of course coincide most of the time. Ants and bees have developed a strategy where the colony forms a "larger self". They work towards the goal of thriving and reproducing within that larger self. This is, however, an exception.

---

No. This is the norm. Any drive through a modern city will convince you that all the human beings in that city must, somehow, be working together, whether they know it or not, in order to function as a unit, just to make an amazing thing like a city work.

Quote:

---

Human beings have largely freed themselves from raw evolutionary selection pressure.

---

"Raw evolutionary selection pressure" is everything around us. We have most certainly not freed ourselves from it. We still need food. We still need personal space, shelter, ability to reproduce, etc. Nothing at all has changed. We are in the same boat as any other species. We still have to compete with things which eat the food that we want for ourselves (eg, insects), as well as things that eat us (bacteria, etc).

If our planet is invaded by an aggressive alien race tomorrow, we will have to try to defend ourselves, just as any other animal would try to do.

Quote:

---

They [humans] have complex social arrangements, artificial food supply, medicine, hygiene, and technology.

---

In reality nothing is "artificial". Everything is perfectly natural. Our technology is essentially no different to things which other animals produce for themselves, like nests, or burrows. There are ants which harvest fungi in "farms" not unlike the way we farm our own food.

Quote:

---

If there should be an exploitative majority -as you suppose- perhaps this could be explained in terms of culture rather than in terms of biology.

---

Culture is part of biology - it comes under the category of "animal behaviour".

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 778
(1/26/04 2:08 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Kevin: Anything we call "individual" is in reality just a grouping of things, some of which might be quite disparate.

Well, an individual human being is doubtlessly composed of disparate things, such as a heart, arteries, a nervous system, internal organs, etc., but we see none of these compounds walking around on their own, and hence, we don't call them an individual. I think you misunderstand the Buddhist saying "everything is compounded". It is meant in a phenomenological sense. The Buddha used it to reject the Platonic idea of an eternal self. But the Buddha did not mean to say that there are no entities. It is obvious that there are entities; in fact the individual organism is the most clear-cut entity in nature. All entities are subject to impermanence, however, which is another fundamental Buddhist insight. It means that entities do not persist, and ultimately even classes of entities -such as species- do not persist. This is the message and the truth of the Buddhist saying. I think it is therefore valid to speak of individuals, even selfs, as long as one is aware of their vicissitude. Biology would be quite impossible without the concept of individuality.

Thomas: Animals do generally not work for the benefit of their species; they work for their own benefit, and -in some cases- for the benefit of the kin or the colony.

Kevin: This is your claim, but you haven't provided the proof.

I don't know Kevin; do you watch Discovery Channel? Do you observe wildlife in the Australian bush? If you do, it should be obvious to you that animals fight for their own survival, not for the survival of the species at large. If your theory were true, you would find animals performing sacrifices of all kinds for the benefit of the species at large. For example, you would find animals sharing out food to their conspecifics. This could be expected to be standard behavior if the interest of the species actually came before selfish interest. Furthermore, if your theory were true, you would also see animals behaving much more altruistic in general. For example, imagine an antelope that stands between an approaching lion pride and its herd. If the antelope flees, the hungry lions would attack the herd. In this case, the lions might kill two or three individuals out of the herd. On the other hand, if the sole antelope sacrifices itself, the lions would spend time and energy hunting the sole antelope, thus giving the herd enough time to flee. From an "interest of the species" point of view, the right thing for the antelope to do would be to sacrifice itself, because the species can preserve two or three bodies that way. However, this is not what happens. We don't observe this behavior in nature.

Thomas: They [ants] work towards the goal of thriving and reproducing within that larger self. This is, however, an exception.

Kevin: No. This is the norm. Any drive through a modern city will convince you that all the human beings in that city must, somehow, be working together, whether they know it or not, in order to function as a unit, just to make an amazing thing like a city work.

There can be no discussion that building cities is NOT the norm in animal behavior. Do you think that human behavior has explanatory value for ant (or animal) behavior, or vice versa?

Kevin: "Raw evolutionary selection pressure" is everything around us. We have most certainly not freed ourselves from it. We still need food. We still need personal space, shelter, ability to reproduce, etc. Nothing at all has changed. We are in the same boat as any other species.

Ah but Kevin, you ignore the biological meaning of selection. The mechanism of selection is the survival and perpetuation of one kind of organism over another that dies or fails to produce offspring. Today people have a much lesser propensity to die if they can't find food or shelter, or if they get sick. It does not at all depend on your genes or on your ability to hunt or find food. There is agriculture, there is medicine, there are welfare programs. If you live in Australia, it is very unlikely that you die of starvation, and your survival does have little to do with your dexterity and luck as a hunter. Then again the situation looks different if you live in Africa. Your survival as a human being seems to depend more on geopolitical circumstances, not on biological factors. We are certainly not in the same boat as other species. The selection pressure, the problem of terrestrial survival, has been solved by our species for the most part. If resources would be shared fairly among the world population, the problem would disappear altogether. However, this achievement is in danger. It doesn't come for granted, as many people seem to believe. If the world population continues to grow at the present rate, the human race will swing back into cruder selection modes. If there are too many human beings, and if the economic disparities should aggravate, we can expect that selection pressure will tighten and that millions of people will be subject to animal-like deaths from starvation, poisoning, or violent fights over resources.

Kevin: Culture is part of biology - it comes under the category of "animal behaviour".

This statement is such a vast generalization that I am inclined to dismiss it forthright. What is biological about culture? Culture is a human phenomenon. It arises with communication, education, and most importantly it depends on the transmission of "memes". Although some animals have developed primitive forms of meme transmission, there is really no comparison. What animal cultures do you see out there? How are they biologically determined?

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 290

(1/26/04 3:58 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Well, an individual human being is doubtlessly composed of disparate things, such as a heart, arteries, a nervous system, internal organs, etc., but we see none of these compounds walking around on their own, and hence, we don't call them an individual.

---

We certainly speak of "an individual heart". An individual human being can no more survive independently of its environment than can something like a heart.

Quote:

---

The Buddha did not mean to say that there are no entities. It is obvious that there are entities; in fact the individual organism is the most clear-cut entity in nature.

---

Firstly, I have never said that there are no entities. What I am saying is that "entities" are defined by where we decide their boundaries are.

An "entity" is just a thing, is it not? A brick is such an "entity". In what manner is a human being, as an entity, more clear cut than a brick? It isn't.

From what I can see, this mistaken belief you have about entities is the main reason for your misunderstanding of reincarnation.

Quote:

---

Animals fight for their own survival, not for the survival of the species at large.

---

Saying that animals fight "for" something is only a figure of speech. It's not as though animals sit down as committees and work out what they are going to fight for. They are only doing what they are programmed to do. And what they are doing is fighting to preserve their genes - which reside primarily in the species.

Individuals, who, alone, try to replicate their genes, have very little chance of long-term survival compared to a species composed of millions of individuals who are able to preserve theirs.

Quote:

---

If your theory were true, you would find animals performing sacrifices of all kinds for the benefit of the species at large.

---

Every individual life is a sacrifice for the species at large.

Quote:

---

If the sole antelope sacrifices itself, the lions would spend time and energy hunting the sole antelope, thus giving the herd enough time to flee. From an "interest of the species" point of view, the right thing for the antelope to do would be to sacrifice itself, because the species can preserve two or three bodies that way. However, this is not what happens. We don't observe this behavior in nature.

---

By allowing the predators to select-out the weakest individuals, or those less-fit to escape, this is a way of strengthening the species, by making the species more able to avoid predation.

Quote:

---

Do you think that human behavior has explanatory value for ant (or animal) behavior, or vice versa?

---

We are DNA-based creatures, just like ants, so our lives are very similar in many regards.

Quote:

---

Today people have a much lesser propensity to die if they can't find food or shelter, or if they get sick.

---

A lot of people are dying of eating the wrong foods. More and more people are dying of diseases like cancer, AIDS, or suicide.

Quote:

---

The selection pressure, the problem of terrestrial survival, has been solved by our species for the most part.

---

We are a long, long way from solving the problem of how to survive on this planet. And even if we ever to come close to solving that problem, we can still be wiped out in an instant by an invading alien aggressor. Also, the problem of disease in the next 100 yrs can be much larger than we currently expect, because of the evolution of "super-bugs" for which we cannot find a cure.

Quote:

---

Kevin: Culture is part of biology - it comes under the category of "animal behaviour".

T: This statement is such a vast generalization

---

It is not a generalization, it is a fact of definition.

Quote:

---

What is biological about culture?

---

Our culture is a part of our behavior, and as we are animals, our culture is thus a part of animal behaviour, which in turn is part of "biology".

Quote:

---

Culture is a human phenomenon. It arises with communication, education, and most importantly it depends on the transmission of "memes". Although some animals have developed primitive forms of meme transmission, there is really no comparison. What animal cultures do you see out there? How are they biologically determined?

---

You have already said, correctly, that culture is a matter of degree. Some other animals on this planet have very primitive forms of "culture". Our ancestors, for example, had primitive culture, and their ancestors had even more primitive culture. And there are probably many advanced cultures found in other animals on different planets scattered around the Universe.

So "culture" is definitely not a "human" thing. It is simply a form of animal behaviour that exists to this day because, presumably, it helps in the replication of genes.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 182

(1/26/04 4:06 pm)

Reply

...

---

Kevin, I think the point is that two individuals with the same DNA can have two completely different cultures, depending on where they were raised. But I agree that individuals are only individuals when we define what they are.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 292
(1/26/04 6:09 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

I think the point is that two individuals with the same DNA can have two completely different cultures

---

Certainly I agree. But "culture" itself is part of our natural human biology. Culture is naturally variable from one individual to another, in the same way as two dogs, or birds with identical DNA can still have different personalities.

I don't believe it is right to separate human beings from all other animals just on the strength of our minimal consciousness.

The evolution of consciousness is like the evolution of, say, a backbone. If it works, we might survive, and if it doesn't, we won't.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/26/04 11:11 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2129
(1/26/04 11:21 pm)
Reply

---

---

Kevin:--

Quote:

---

I don't believe it is right to separate human beings from all other animals just on the strength of our minimal consciousness.

---

Our strength of consciousness naturally separates us from them. Your belief about whatever it is you're talking about is a boring piece of shit.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 469

(1/26/04 11:55 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

The selection pressure, the problem of terrestrial survival, has been solved by our species for the most part.

If the world population continues to grow at the present rate, the human race will swing back into cruder selection modes.

We already have crude selection modes. Selection is mostly about looks and possessions. That is why we have popular TV shows like 'Extreme Makeover' and 'Queer Eye for the Striaight Guy' that sell the 'need' to have physical improvements and possessions.

The more selection is done on the basis of wisdom then selection may become a bit more refined, however only a very small percentage of people presently select a mate on this basis and generally those are the ones that have an above average level of wisdom.

---

I'm not sure of Kevin's view on individual survival v's the species though, not that it matters as the end result is the same. In any situations where individuals work entirely for themselves and this is not ALSO commensurate with the interests of the species then evolution naturally weeds those species out.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 780

(1/27/04 1:02 am)

Reply

Re: ---

---

jimhaz: I'm not sure of Kevin's view on individual survival v's the species though, not that it matters as the end result is the same. In any situations where individuals work entirely for themselves and this is not ALSO commensurate with the interests of the species then evolution naturally weeds those species out.

You got a point there, jimhaz. If the selfish interest of individuals happens to go against the interest of the species this means that the species is dying out. Occasionally this happens in nature. For example, when a species becomes too specialized in food gathering, and that specific food resource is reduced, intense competition begins. Members of the same species compete with each other. According to Kevin's theory this would not be possible. If Kevin's theory were right, the species would develop altruistic strategies for food rationing. However, this is not what happens. Instead members of the species fight about the limited food sources and -if the food is withdrawn- the species becomes extinct.

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 300
(1/27/04 1:25 am)
Reply

Re: ---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

Members of the same species compete with each other.
According to Kevin's theory this would not be possible.

---

A species has to continue to adapt and evolve. This often means infighting, which ends in the elimination of the least fit characteristics. As I say, a species is a fluid thing.

Edited by: ksolway at: 1/27/04 1:31 am

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 787
(1/27/04 8:08 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

Kevin: Some other animals on this planet have very primitive forms of "culture".

That is true, but you can only count in those species that have developed some form of primitive memetic transmission, such as certain songbirds, monkeys, perhaps (?) whales.

Kevin: So "culture" is definitely not a "human" thing.

Culture is definitely a human thing, although the boundaries that separate human culture from animal culture are slightly blurry. Only very slightly. If you compare the amount of human memes with animal memes, you will find that 99.99% of this planet's total memes are produced by humans. Probably more than that. So, there can be no discussion that culture is primarily realized by humans.

Kevin: It is simply a form of animal behaviour that exists to this day because, presumably, it helps in the replication of genes.

I don't think so. Culture is a meta-evolutionary system. It is indifferent to genes. Instead it has its own mechanisms of reproduction, mutation, and selection. Cultural memes take form in inventions, thought models, philosophies, fashions, beliefs, and so on. They meddle with conventional evolution by replacing biological selection with cultural selection.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 303

(1/27/04 8:56 pm)

Reply

Re: Culture

---

Quote:

---

You can only count in those species that have developed some form of primitive memetic transmission, such as certain songbirds, monkeys, perhaps (?) whales.

---

One of the reasons there are so few such species is that we killed-off a number of them during our own evolution.

Quote:

---

If you compare the amount of human memes with animal memes, you will find that 99.99% of this planet's total memes are produced by humans. Probably more than that. So, there can be no discussion that culture is primarily realized by humans.

---

Nevertheless, in the entire Universe the percentage of memes produced by humans is probably about zero.

Quote:

---

Culture is a meta-evolutionary system. It is indifferent to genes.

---

I think it was JimHaz who pointed out that most of our culture is to do with very base, animal things, such as sex and food. Someone else pointed out that even genius can be seen as a form of sex display, designed to attract women. Some of culture may be indifferent to genes and sexual reproduction, but that is difficult to prove.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Evolution of Consciousness - Will to Unconsciousness

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 140(11/28/03 11:18 am)Reply   Edit | New Post Evolution of Consciousness - Will to Unconsciousness <hr/> Evolution of Consciousness - Will to Unconsciousness At one end of the spectrum we have unconsciousness (animalism), which is basically the complete absence of thought (abstraction). This end of the spectrum is neither content nor discontent, ignorant nor wise, it just 'is'. The other end of the spectrum is enlightenment, genius, which is basically the understanding of the nature of Reality, and most particularly the nature of thought (abstraction). This end of the spectrum is neither content nor discontent, ignorant nor wise, it is beyond all labels, and yet encompasses the highest wisdom. It also just 'is'. Virtually all humans exist in an intermediate zone between these ends of the spectrum. This intermediate zone is fraught with difficulties, it is rife with delusion and suffering. This is because the mind has the capacity for differentiation (thought, abstraction) but is unable to place its concepts in proper perspective, it lacks a solid foundation of Truth upon which to develop it's knowledge base. One might think that humanity would slowly evolve from the former to the latter, but (unfortunately) there is a significant force that constantly undermines peoples capacity to achieve this. It is called the 'will to unconsciousness'. This will takes a great variety of forms which hide its |

underlying nature. Some examples are; the will to experience emotion, play and watch sport, learn endless trivial information, take drugs, have sex, etc. This will arises because people correctly perceive that their mind is the source of their suffering, without also realising that it is the source of their very existence and that it has the potential to transcend all suffering. Thus, they use their mind against itself in an attempt to undermine it and reduce their suffering. Obviously they can never be successful (unless they commit suicide) and what a horrid waste of potential, a race of beings intent on destroying their very essence, their defining characteristic.

If only people could become aware of the nature of this dilemma, and be prepared to take the bold steps necessary to resolve it, the world would be fixed in a flash, a few generations at most. Only knowledge of Truth can possibly fix this stagnation of human evolution.

Rhett

1TheMaster
Registered User
Posts: 183
(11/28/03 12:36 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Evolution of Consciousness - Will to Unconsciousness

Indeed. But to expect Joe average to understand the mind is fighting the mind internally for control of an essence which can only exist and be free with external intervention is naive.

Being aware of the nature of this dilemma requires a certain abstract removal in order to clarify it. In most peoples case this is not possible, due to pressing day to day issues, "ties" with others which sustain a set of beliefs. Since these ties are the very axis upon which society operates and functions, how is it possible to spread these ideas?

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1805(11/28/03 12:58 pm)Reply                                                                                 | New Post --- <hr/> These above posts can be summed up as an "if only"! The mind is not the cause of suffering for people who have little, nor even for those who are scorched by the hot solitudes of thought. The cause of suffering in all originates in sickness of body, the consciousness of which can accentuate the suffering if no foreseeable solution presents itself. Not everyone should or can think critically! Rhetts examples of the will to unconsciousness, while true in many cases, are also grounds for the opposing will. The will to unconsciousness cannot rightly be called will. It is a drive. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1806(11/28/03 1:07 pm)Reply                                                                                  | New Post --- <hr/> It's good to see Rhett seems to have given up 'ultimate truth' in favour of truth!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 410(11/28/03 2:16 pm)Reply  | New Post Re: --- <hr/> how is it possible to spread these ideas It isn't. What the QRS are doing is pointless within their lifespan. They are ahead of their time. Their only chance is to find someone who is a 'star personality', but the nature of what they see as truth, almost by definition that excludes anyone who believes their theories. There is nothing they can invent that will interest the average Joe for the next twenty years. So they must learn that deceitfulness is truth as well, and find a Tony Robbins type.                                                                                       |

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 411
(11/28/03 2:34 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: ---

---

That was a bit harse. If they write books it is not pointless, nor is the creation of websites to promulgate their ideas. It is just that they are not doing enough to gain a Movement. Perhaps the time for marketing will come when the QRS have a book each.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 861
(11/28/03 6:00 pm)
Reply

New Post Evolution of Consciousness - Will to Unconsciousness

---

Good stuff Rhett.
The Will to unconsciousness is the same as the Will to power.
The Will to Consciousness is the same as the Will to value.
Recognised by all Genius men.

Quote:

---

Rhett Hamilton
Virtually all humans exist in an intermediate zone between these ends of the spectrum. This intermediate zone is fraught with difficulties, it is rife with delusion and suffering. This is because the mind has the capacity for differentiation (thought, abstraction) but is unable to place its concepts in proper perspective, it lacks a solid foundation of Truth upon which to develop it's knowledge base.

---

The illusion is to look for this so called solid foundation of truth. Truth is not solid. It is an oscillation, a spin, a tension. You have to find your own resonant frequency. The ultimate truth is your own correct tension or spin. Power and value are like two huge rubber bands, if you refuse to suffer the pain finding your resonant frequency then you will let go of the power rubber band or the value rubber band. It is obvious you will get hurt really bad and will colide with someone else who also lost their grip.

|                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 862(11/28/03 6:09 pm)Reply                   | New Post They died <hr/> Many of the great have died because they tried to make the truth still so to speak.Otto Weininger died for this reason. Only 50% of truth can ever be written down.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 307(11/28/03 6:32 pm)Reply                  | New Post Re: They died <hr/> 50%? According to the latest findings it's 38%, DEL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1809(11/28/03 7:55 pm)Reply              | New Post ----The will. <hr/> The will, once understood, is related entirely to the will to any particular thing.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 147(11/30/03 1:49 pm)Reply   Edit | New Post Re: Visions <hr/> how is it possible to spread these ideas? It isn't. What the QRS are doing is pointless within their lifespan. It is not at all pointless. Sure, it may not have universal acceptance at present but that doesn't really mean anything. They are ahead of their time. They are beyond time and their cultural context. Their only chance is to find someone who is a 'star personality', I think any vehicle can have some benefit if approached in the right manner. Even a 30 second commercial on television. As to using a 'star' personality...well, that would require an exceptional degree of care. However, i can imagine an attractive youngish male that is perfectly enlightened and that is given the chance to explain his values and purpose having an interesting effect. But thinking of television, i imagine that a documentary would be the best approach. |

but the nature of what they see as truth, almost by definition that excludes anyone who believes their theories.

No. Anyone that understands their truths is wholly included.

There is nothing they can invent that will interest the average Joe for the next twenty years.

Probably right, but the average Joe is probably not worth bothering about within the next 20 years. The target market would be say 16-30 year old males that have good levels of abstraction. The older they are the more spiritually advanced they would need to be.

So they must learn that deceitfulness is truth as well, and find a Tony Robbins type.

Bad news...

That was a bit harse. If they write books it is not pointless, nor is the creation of websites to promulgate their ideas. It is just that they are not doing enough to gain a Movement. Perhaps the time for marketing will come when the QRS have a book each.

Depends on how large you consider a movement has to be before you consider it a movement. How many enlightened people in the past managed to facilitate others to enlightenment? Unprecedented history is being created on this very website as we speak (write).

Rhett

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 313
(11/30/03 2:01 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Visions

---

Quote:

---

Unprecedented history is being created on this very website as we speak (write).

---

And guess who is to blame for that.

|                                                                                     |                                                                               |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 413(11/30/03 2:13 pm)Reply  | New Post ... <hr/> Why do I come to this forum? |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1822(11/30/03 9:07 pm)Reply | New Post ---- <hr/> To do something!            |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Evolutionary biology as challenge to existence of God

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| callogicianPosts: 3(3/17/04 5:37 pm)Reply | Evolutionary biology as challenge to existence of God <hr/> I am defining God (note the capital "G") as the omniscient, omnipotent, sentient creator of the universe who is inextricably tied to certain holy texts. Please note that I am making no positive claims regarding the non-existence of god (note the lowercase "g") in general. I quote from the Bereshet passage of the old testament: Then God said, "Let us make man in our image, in our likeness, and let them rule over the fish of the sea and the birds of the air, over livestock, over all the earth, and over all creatures that move along the ground." If one has faith that this statement was the word of God and hence an absolute truth, he would conclude that the theory of evolution is incorrect because the theory of evolution is incompatible with the idea that God created the universe as a distinct and conscious act. Hence, if the common ancestry of man with other living organisms can be demonstrated, the strictly defined God does not exist. Now, let's take a scientific perspective. Say to yourself, "I will now remove my biases and search for truth. I am completely indifferent to what conclusion I reach, for truth is inherently better than untruth. If God exists, I want to believe that he exists; If God does not exist, I want to believe that he does not exist." Firstly, I am forced to concede that the bible is not a source of absolute | truth. It could very well have been inspired and written by humans who are subject to bias and error. Certainly, the authority of the bible is no greater than that of the Koran, and they contain contradictory information (i.e. regarding whether or not Jesus is the Messiah).

*Note-in my opinion, the bible isn't even very well written.

Lets examine the theory of evolution...

The theory of evolution posits that there are a myriad of homologies (similarities that are obscured from or arbitrarily related to function and not likely to have resulted independently) between organisms which act as artifacts signifying common ancestry. I'll list out a few examples, and then I'll consider one in detail.

1) Every single living organism has a ribozyme translator, and the subunits share a ribonucleotide homology. A ribozyme translator is a ribosome composed of both ribonucleotide components and proteins that catalyze the translation of other ribonucleotide sequences into protein. The individual ribosomal ribonucleic acid (r-RNA) ribosome subunits (independently folding) have a highly conserved ribonucleotide sequence in all organisms. Even the most superficially dissimilar organisms (i.e. a bacterium and a human) have a statistically significant similarity in ribonucleotide sequence (we're talking p (m-RNA) is converted into a protein. It is defined by transfer RNAs (t-RNA) which specifically bind to a 3 nucleotide sequence (a codon) and an amino acid.

3) All organisms use nicotinamide adenine dinucleotide hydride (NADH) and flavin adenine dinucleotide hydride (FADH<sub>2</sub>) in fundamental metabolic reactions.

4) The protein, cytochrome c, has a highly conserved homologous amino acid structure in all organisms where it is found.

5) There is a homology of the type and arrangement of bones in all vertebrates even where these bones are involved in very dissimilar structures. One example is the similarity between the wing of a bat and the arm of a bear. Another is the presence of a hip bone in whales (this would be absurd if they didn't have ancestors on land).

6) "Ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny." Evolution is effectively code written on top of code, so even where the adult organisms of different species are markedly different, there exist artifacts of common ancestry during embryonic development. A classic example is the presence of pharyngeal gill slits in mammals during embryonic developments. Last I checked, I don't have gills.

I could go on all day, but instead, I'll chose one example and discuss it in detail. I decided to choose something that can be appreciated on the macro level so that the layman can relate to it (I'm sure I'd lose just about everyone if I chose a signal transduction pathway).

Consider the fenestrae (holes) in vertebrate skulls. There are two fenestrae I want to focus on defining three discretely differentiable types of skulls:

Fenestrae:

- 1) Supramandibular fenestra: This is a fenestra over the dorsal (towards the back) aspect of the mandible (lower jaw bone).
- 2) Inframandibular fenestra: This the the fenestra underneath the dorsal aspect of the mandible.

Types of skulls:

- 1) Anapsid: These skulls contain neither the supramandibular or inframandibular fenestrae. It is associated with limited jaw movement vegetation feeding-characteristic of turtles.
- 2) Synapsid: These skulls have the inframandibular fenestra but not the supramandibular fenestrae. Synapsids are all mammals.
- 3) Diapsid: These skulls have both fenestrae. Reptiles (though not turtles) are diapsids.

Now, use your intuition:

Take a lizard, a bird, and a human. Which group is in group? In other words, which two organisms are more closely related to each other than to the other organism? It's touch to judge superficially isn't it. However, all evidences to the same conclusion...

Most diapsid organisms, including lizards, snakes, and non-avian dinosaurs are able to open their jaws very wide. This is attributable to the presence of a a supratemporal fenestra. Reptiles can often swallow very large prey relative to their body size, but their jaw is much less structurally robust. Mammals feed on small prey and vegetation, but they can generally bite down harder, and their jaws are less likely to become trapped open when devouring tough meat. Where do birds (aves) fit into this picture? Many species of birds feed on seeds and do not need to open their jaws very wide, but they are diapsids! Their inframandibular and supramandibular fenestrae exist in reduced form, an artifact of their common ancestry with the non avian dinosaurs. Indeed, the dinosaurs as a monophyletic group includes birds.

The fenestrae example is an excellent demonstration of a homology because of the obvious obscurity from function. Also, it can be shown that birds are more closely related to other reptiles than mammals using other homologies. Doing analysis on the sequences of shared proteins and nucleic acids yields the same result (the birds are more similar to reptiles than either group is to mammals).

Returning to the bigger picture...

Neither the creation of man as a distinct and conscious act by God or the evolution of man from a common ancestor of other organisms is inherently superior to me. You must understand that I am not making a choice. The evidences force me to reject the former.

I have by no means exhausted the evidences for evolution in this post, but I conclude that the explanation provided for the existence of man in the bereshet passage is incorrect. Hence, the simultaneous acceptance of the conclusions from faith in God and science is repugnant, so the two are incompatible.

Edited by: callogician at: 3/18/04 8:18 am

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 884
(3/17/04 8:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Evolutionary biology as challenge to existence of God

---

callogician: I have by no means exhausted the evidences for evolution in this post, but I conclude that the explanation provided for the existence of man in the bereshet passage is incorrect. Hence, the simultaneous acceptance of the conclusions from faith in God and science is repugnant, so the two are incompatible

That is the conclusion to which every rational thinking person must come. I find the ribonucleotide homology particularly fascinating because it is so fundamental. It's like all organisms share a common "programming language". I am skeptical about the "ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny" bit, because all that remains seem to be tiny fragments of phylogeny, such as the said embryo gills. While nature stacks code on top of code, quite a bit of the "old" code gets overwritten in that process. Incidentally we've just discussed this topic a couple of days ago in the Icons of Evolution thread.

|                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                         | This is about a book from a biology Ph.D. who supports the idea of intelligent design. Thomas                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| 4000EarthquakesPosts: 6(3/18/04 3:28 am)Reply                                                     | Parables about seeds... not magic wands <hr/> Why does evolution exclude God?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 108(3/18/04 3:52 am)Reply                                  | Involve God, Evolve its Matrix <hr/> Involution precedes evolution while evolution follows with mathematical certainty. It's basically one beings thoughts versus the whole. Perfection against imperfection.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| <input type="checkbox"/> a wordRegistered UserPosts: 5(3/18/04 4:12 am)ReplyezSupporter | God the genius <hr/> The timing of evolution and the invention of the wheel, makes you wonder why man -- in all his brilliance -- didn't learn to fly himself in that period of time. The timing of the discovery of the fact that round things roll -- coincides with the timing of a "species" of men, called "adam" developing the ability to begin to reason. They could not have 'written' verbatim, how it was that man could 'suddenly' reason, because they had not figured out how to write yet. So the tale was passed on. We've all played "telephone". Before the "god-experts" even knew that the earth was round, they were interpreting the meaning of God. He gave them ten simple rules. All they did was argue. Before man even had a chance to begin to understand this being called God, they had defined him, used him for political reasons, and closed their minds to understanding or discovering anything more about Him. <hr/> Do you yell at your television set? |

If it refuses to listen do you shoot it for sinning? People are like television sets without receivers -- towards God.

What should He do? Blow the planet up, or just wait and let us do that ourselves? I'm sure there are a few good receivers out there, he might spend some time watching. The rest of the tv's -- just noise.

Remote control.
He runs the show.
Transformer man.

my thoughts only.

a word
Registered User
Posts: 6
(3/18/04 6:35 am)
Reply
ezSupporter

Addressing callogician's point(s)

---

The scripture contradicts itself. Enough said.

living creatures appear to have been designed from an original "prototype" design and then were developed outward. As we do with our own designs and inventions.

A volkswagon looks nothing like a hearse. Yet they grew from the same initial, crude, design.

If God were a magician as the so-called "scholars of the past" fed us, we weren't "designed" in his image.

It may seem like magic, to a two-year old, when dad magically changes the channel with the remote control -- but dad knows better. I don't think he's going to try to explain how it works, just yet, however.

There is logic and order to the design of the universe and the human body, which we are only beginning to understand.

---

The fault lies not in that God doesn't "jive" with religious claims and interpretations. The fault lies in that we refuse to let these faulty original explanations go.

We are attempting to save a condemned, crumbling, building. Science only proves that the previous "know-it-alls" were full of it. There is plenty of scripture to be found that fully supports science, and the things we know now, beautifully.

Science supports God. Religion makes us look like idiots. The reapers of that pot of gold will do anything to continue their manipulation of that farce.

Ask. I'm dying to share. I know those books as well as you know your science. Let's have some fun.

callogician

Posts: 4

(3/18/04 8:12 am)

Reply

responses

---

"I am skeptical about the "ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny" bit" -Thomas

Your skepticism is justified. Early ontologists erroneously viewed fetal development as a "a march through the phyla" due to early misleading observations. "Ontogeny substantiates phylogeny" would be a more accurate adage.

An interesting fact: The pronounced pharyngeal gill slits during human pre-natal development share a 2' deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) homology with "fish" (fish is in quotations because it is a paraphyletic group-it is not a distinct evolutionary lineage). This is the quintessential example of how "ontogeny substantiates phylogeny."

"Science supports God." -A word

I am confused. You seem to agree with me, and then you posit the opposite. Is this simply a superficial bastardization of semantics (using "God" to mean the more general "god"), or is this a this a deep philosophical challenge? I do not deny that much of scripture is historically accurate, but the major flaws lead me to believe that it is not the word of god. If in fact the "telephone effect" destroyed the original meaning of the bible as to misconstrue its fundamentals (i.e. to spuriously posit the creation of man as a distinct and conscious act of an intelligent designer), then it is worthless.

 a word
Registered User
Posts: 8
(3/18/04 11:11 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Genesis 4:14. Simple. Species.

---

I am in agreement with you.

My explanation is so simple, you are probably looking for something more complicated than it is.

God has always been a "scientist".
Men have always lied, exaggerated, and claimed to know more than he really did know especially when it comes to "God".

Religions claim God.
Not the other way around.

They interpreted Genesis incorrectly from the beginning. Adam was a species of man.

Language and writing skills weren't developed yet during these "generations" of Adam (and so on). Therefore, the written account was rough, rough, rough, by the time it hit the page.

Start over. Reread first post... it's simple.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1660
(3/19/04 11:35 am)
Reply

Re: Genesis 4:14. Simple. Species.

---

Evolutionary biology only undermines certain rather unsophisticated notions of God; it does not, and more importantly, cannot wholly undermine the notion of God.

No purely empirical endeavour can.

Dan Rowden

Weluvducsoha
Registered User
Posts: 6
(3/20/04 12:59 pm)
Reply

Re: Genesis 4:14. Simple. Species.

---

Evolution doesn't undermine anything...

All the G-d advocates have to do is say that G-d wanted things to look like they evolved. Sure you can then invoke Ossum's Razor, but that merely says it makes sense not to believe in an omnipotent G-d, not that he/she/it does not exist.

Let's start with that.

After that, evolution does not work...

Irreducible complexity: all creatures have DNA; DNA cannot have evolved from something else and is too complex to spontaneously arise.

Many animals have eyes. Eyes are so complicated that the process of evolving them into existence would evolve their benefactor out of existence long before it would benefit from them.

Everything is made of matter... but what is matter and where did it come from?

Ultimate cheap shot: You are mortal. You cannot so much as prove you exist, much less that G-d does not.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 895
(3/20/04 2:32 pm)
Reply

Re: Genesis 4:14. Simple. Species.

---

Weluvducsoha: Irreducible complexity: all creatures have DNA; DNA cannot have evolved from something else and is too complex to spontaneously arise.

DNA did not evolve spontaneously. Prebiotic synthesis, polymerization processes, peptide synthesis, informational macromolecules, and finally RNA are thought to have preceded DNA.

Weluvducsoha: Many animals have eyes. Eyes are so complicated that the process of evolving them into existence would evolve their benefactor out of existence long before it would benefit from them.

That is not the case. The eye has actually evolved several times independently in different phyla.

Weluvducsoha: Everything is made of matter... but what is matter and where did it come from?

I can't see how this question is relevant to evolution theory. You would benefit from reading an up-to-date account of evolution.

Thomas

callogician

Posts: 5

(3/21/04 7:12 pm)

Reply

Various things

---

"Evolutionary biology only undermines certain rather unsophisticated notions of God; it does not, and more importantly, cannot wholly undermine the notion of God." -drowden

You can call it unsophisticated, but the view that a sentient being created man as a distinct and conscious act is held by 95% of Earth's population, so I feel it is worthy of attacking. Once again, I have defined God (capital G) strictly. It is repugnant to simultaneously advocate the existence of God while agreeing with my argument. Also, I feel that you responded to the thread title rather than my argument...which is annoying.

"No purely empirical endeavour can." -drowden

Instead of making this wild conjecture of a generalization, why don't you first propose in my flaw to a specific counterexample to this statement.

"Evolution doesn't undermine anything...

All the G-d advocates have to do is say that G-d wanted things to look like they evolved."

You would have to say more than simply this. You would have claim that God...

- 1) Intentionally created a deceptive fossil record that follows steno's law (concept that older fossils are buried more deeply). Indeed, the fossil record as determined by steno's law matches that proposed independently by radioactive decay dating.
- 2) Created molecular homologies all over the place
- 3) Created structural homology
- 4) Created vestigial traits
- 5) Created transposons (about 50% of our DNA that has no function yet has inherent properties of fecundity).
- 6) Created parasites that coincidentally share a genetic relation with each other.

The list goes on and on. Is God a deceiver? Did God create a rational being while simultaneously creating an environment such that the most rational individuals would error and be sentenced to an eternity in hell? I can not positively disprove any of these hypothetical outlandish claims, but they are intuitively ridiculous. They are infinitesimally likely just like any arbitrary conjecture I propose (for instance, there exists an invisible purple dragon standing next to you). I refuse to display such hyperbolized skepticism, else I will accomplish nothing. I will in fact invoke Occam's razor.

You also proposed Richard J. Behe's argument of irreducible complexity (from his book "Darwin's Black Box"). This is a very interesting argument. Firstly, let's call it synergistic complexity so that we do not assume your desired conclusion. I'll attack your arguments one by one.

Firstly, you propose that there exist fundamental macromolecules which display a synergistic complexity (they require many smaller units to work synergistically in order to have any beneficial effect on the organism). As you note, even a peptide with 200 amino acids could not have arisen by chance (the probability against it is so great that you wouldn't expect it to occur once in  $10^{50}$  times the lifetime of the universe). This argument has two weaknesses:

- 1) The weak anthropic principle. You are assuming a form of the Goldilocks principle (that everything is just right), but prerequisite to this is the idea that the current state of the universe is special. Though a theist would support the premise, an evolutionary biologist would deny it. Just as easily, a particular protein, evolutionary lineage, or even life itself (defined in strict biochemical terms) could not exist. How foolishly anthropocentric it would be to assume that our world necessarily exists.

- 2) Richard Dawkins' concept of cumulative selection. Evolution does not require that a long strand of DNA evolve by chance to select for it. There can be a gradual change from an ancestral, simpler, strand of DNA such that each step has a selective advantage. As organisms change, proteins diverge and adapt to new uses as dictated by selection. Consider the analogy: Take a blind monkey and have him randomly type out the number of characters equal to the number of characters in this paragraph. Repeat until he exactly replicates this paragraph. Obviously, he will never get it—not in  $10^{1000000000000000000000000000000}$  years. However, do the same thing, but this time, save his correct characters and only make him retype what he got wrong. Now, he will replicate the paragraph very quickly. This is the nature of cumulative selection (Don't worry—I've anticipated your reasonable objection and will soon address it).

Next, you give an example of an eye that has such an incredible synergistic complexity that you can't imagine it being cummulatively selected (i.e. you can't imagine an early version of an eye with any benefit to the organism). You could have given many examples of this phenomenon, but they are all incorrect because they erroneously assume that the mechanism of action remained constant over evolutionary time. For instance, imagine the transduction pathway of vision. If one step is missing, the entire eye fails, so if the transduction pathway remained the same over evolution, cummulative selection would be impossible, but the transduction pathway didn't remain the same. Earlier in evolutionary history, eyes had a simpler mechanism of transduction that did not require all the steps. In this light, where not just the parts but also the whole evolves, cummulative selection is possible. Of course, despite the fact that the eye evolved independently many times (as Thomas noted), all eyes have a common ancetral "eye spot" - a light sensitive region in some modern organisms. This homology has been proven by molecular studies-there are statistically significant similarities in the DNA that codes for the basic photoreceptors in all eyes. Once again, did God plant these homologies to deceive me? Will he favor the conformist who flocks to theism like sheep to the slaughter over the skeptic?

"Ultimate cheap shot: You are mortal. You cannot so much as prove you exist, much less that G-d does not."

If I doubt my own rationality, I can not know anything, but that would ruin the fun, so I choose to build a mountain of near certainly rather than a mole-hill of absolute truth. To each his own.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1044
(3/22/04 1:34 am)
Reply

Re: Various things

---

Quote:

---

Cal: the view that a sentient being created man as a distinct and conscious act is held by 95% of Earth's population

---

You've just plucked that figure out of the air, and it's not a very educated guess.

Quote:

---

so I feel it is worthy of attacking.

---

Why?

95% of earth's population does believe that everyday reality is objective. Don't you think that might be something you could learn the ins and outs of, to facilitate even more worthy attack?

This stuff makes you look really clever, but it too is just fairly esoteric information that you can read and understand.

Quote:

---

Once again, I have defined God (capital G) strictly. It is repugnant to simultaneously advocate the existence of God while agreeing with my argument.

---

One can agree with your argument according to it's definitions and yet disagree with your definitions.

Quote:

---

Also, I feel that you responded to the thread title rather than my argument...which is annoying.

---

If you get annoyed, that feeling does not come from anywhere outside of you.

And how exactly is this statement not repugnant to the one which preceded it?

Quote:

---

Weluv: "Evolution doesn't undermine anything... All the G-d advocates have to do is say that G-d wanted things to look like they evolved."

Cal: You would have to say more than simply this. You would have claim that God...

1) Intentionally created a deceptive fossil record that follows steno's law (concept that older fossils are buried more deeply). Indeed, the fossil record as determined by steno's law matches that proposed independently by radioactive decay dating.

2) Created molecular homologies all over the place

3) Created structural homology

4) Created vestigial traits

5) Created transposons (about 50% of our DNA that has no function yet has inherent properties of fecundity).

6) Created parasites that coincidentally share a genetic relation with each other.

---

Not that I agree with the consequent worldview of Weluv's hypothetical 'G-d advocate, or disagree with the information you've detailed; but your argument does not address the question.

This hypothetical sentient God would not have to do any of these things, it might just decide the rules by which the process unfolds, and set it in motion. You might counter that these 'certain holy texts' you mention hold information which is inconsistent with evolution over the geological time-scale, but that would only be correct if you were to read said texts literally.

I think it's quite ironic that Steno converted to Catholicism and is now under review for eventual sainthood. Funny that.

Quote:

---

The list goes on and on. Is God a deceiver? Did God create a rational being while simultaneously creating an environment such that the most rational individuals would error and be sentenced to an eternity in hell?

---

But the most truly rational individuals wouldn't error so much, once they understood the context of all of the information. Of course one cannot fit the entirety of the infinite into the finite, and that is why it's human to err.

Quote:

---

I can not positively disprove any of these hypothetical outlandish claims, but they are intuitively ridiculous. They are infinitesimally likely just like any arbitrary conjecture I propose (for instance, there exists an invisible purple dragon standing next to you).

---

You know, you could positively disprove this particular arbitrary conjecture logically, once you understand what 'exist' really means, logically. Of course you would then understand the logical reasons that God does not and cannot 'exist', thereby increasing your understanding of the context of 'holy texts' in the deal.

Quote:

---

I refuse to display such hyperbolized skepticism, else I will accomplish nothing.

---

Hold on, aren't you a moral relativist? How then might you know you are accomplishing anything except "in the context of a paradigmatic society biased by genetic predisposition and subtle inculcation", or even just in the context of your definition of 'accomplishment', which holds no more water than the next man's?

Quote:

---

I will in fact invoke Occam's razor.

---

What would Occam's razor have to say about the source of these 'holy texts"? And therefore, what would it say about the wisdom of their being read literally?

Quote:

---

If I doubt my own rationality, I can not know anything, but that would ruin the fun, so I choose to build a mountain of near certainty rather than a mole-hill of absolute truth. To each his own.

---

To each his own, well that's moral relativism for you. There is no absolute right and wrong but then that kind of precludes any certainty or even 'near certainty' whatsoever. The mountain you build is completely imaginary in it's 'near certainty'. If you care to look into the meaning and workings of 'absolute truth', you'll find that there certainly seems to be certainty. However you will also find that this certainty is only certain about what it can be certain about, and that it cannot be intellectually certain about it's certainty itself. But it is the least of the evils, intellectual uncertainty wise, and it might just lead you to the only possible certainty, that proof of certainty is not intellectual and therefore requires faith to be antecedent.

There can be no doubt of the mote in the eye of anyone who doubts the process of evolution, and identifies small holes in scientific theories thereon, for the express purpose of casting doubt on this knowledge, that they might carry on with their inherited beliefs. Others who pick these holes in the name of truth should also realise that scientific knowledge is less than perfect (for example, we've only recently found that neutrinos have mass and can therefore swing between the three flavours and randomly interact with atoms throughout the universe and time), and the context of their questioning, thereby.

There can also be no doubt of the beam in the eye of anyone who chooses to garner all their information about existence from that without, as opposed to that within.

Weluvducsoha
Registered User
Posts: 7
(3/28/04 10:36 am)
Reply

Re: Evolutionary biology as challenge to existence of God

---

DNA:

There have been several attempts to find an environment wierd enough that DNA [or even sub-dna] molecules could come into existance. To date the best scientists have been able to do is create sub-proteins but nothing that could give rise to life of any sort.

Eyes:

You can't prove to me that eyes evolved in several phyla. You can say it, but your proof would be based on the theory of evolution. BUt you can't use a theory to prove itself. That's just bad science.

My point on eyes, however, was that half an eye is no good for anything. So what happens if a creature evolves half an eye? Natural selection weeds that creature out because half an eye is just a waste of energy. Also, you can't evolve a whole eye all at once. It's just too complex. I take that back. you can evolve an eye, but it's so improbable that it shouldn't occur so much as once in the lifetime of a universe. And you're trying to tell me it happened more then once?

Matter:

Of course matter matters! If there were no dirt primordial slime would have nothing to ooze out of. Thus, until you can explain away the existance of matter you might as well not bother trying to explain how that matter magically turned itself into a human being.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1055
(3/28/04 1:57 pm)
Reply

Re: Evolutionary biology as challenge to existence of God

---

Quote:

---

DNA:

There have been several attempts to find an environment wierd enough that DNA [or even sub-dna] molecules could come into existance.

---

There have been many, but in evolution, nothing simply comes into existence. The fact that no human scientist has been able to experimentally link this part of the evolutionary chain to the rest of it by way of recreating DNA synthesis does not invalidate evolution and Natural Selection; no more than human scientists not being able to experimentally able to recreate the transition from any part of the continuum to any other part; it's the continuum pattern that counts.

Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence.

Quote:

---

To date the best scientists have been able to do is create sub-proteins but nothing that could give rise to life of any sort.

---

It seems that the best scientist, with it's myriad various experiments, quite obviously has. Here and elsewhere, is there not life? I can't imagine what you're suggesting otherwise, supernatural agency gave rise to it? Again, the fact that we cannot compute Pi does not invalidate the fact that it's  $22/7$ . The fact that we cannot predict the weather does not invalidate chaos theory. The fact that we cannot recreate the formation of the solar system does not invalidate General Relativity. And the fact that we can't recreate DNA synthesis does not invalidate evolution and Natural Selection.

Quote:

---

Eyes:

You can't prove to me that eyes evolved in several phyla. You can say it, but your proof would be based on the theory of evolution. BUt you can't use a theory to prove itself. That's just bad science.

---

The theoretical scientist must always use theory to prove and evolve itself, there's no other way. Experimental verification is the current validation of the theory, but no experimental verification is not the current invalidation of the theory. The theory of Natural selection and the theoretical evolutionary continuum of this planet/solar system/galaxy/universe has been experimentally verified over and over again. That we cannot experimentally recreate every single stage of said continuum does not invalidate all that other experimental verification nor the theories that it validates to one degree or another.

Quote:

---

My point on eyes, however, was that half an eye is no good for anything. So what happens if a creature evolves half an eye? Natural selection weeds that creature out because half an eye is just a waste of energy.

---

Half an eye would and could never evolve, you're shifting from one place on the continuum to another place wholly removed in the process. You are not looking at the big picture and consequently misunderstanding the processes involved, which leads you to formulate faulty refutations.

Quote:

---

Also, you can't evolve a whole eye all at once. It's just too complex. I take that back. you can evolve an eye, but it's so improbable that it shouldn't occur so much as once in the lifetime of a universe.

---

And yet, according to your previous question, half an eye can be evolved. Of course you can't just evolve an eye, but that is not how it works, and no argument at all.

Quote:

---

And you're trying to tell me it happened more than once?

---

I can't imagine anyone trying to opine that ridiculously simplistic interpretation. And I don't see anyone doing so.

Think of it like the 1,000 monkeys at the thousand typewriters. If they typed for a million years, they'd never once get close to writing any short story, never mind a novel or even the works of Shakespeare. But, if you tried to superimpose the letters they typed over the top of every story ever written, and selected the ones that match whilst disregarding the ones that don't for each generation, you'd soon reproduce every single story ever written, let alone Shakespeare's entire works. Now if you wanted to produce something original, which coheres with its context (in this case, being a readable story; in the case of Natural Selection, being a 'fit'), then all you need is the process of selection and an inordinate number of experiments. Voila, everything. (Edit - On reading back, I see I'm reproducing reproduction here.)

Just think about these eyes for a moment, in the big picture. Why has everything with eyes got eyes? Not how, but why.

Why has everything that only needs poor eyesight to be a fit, got poor eyesight? Why has everything that has a greater need to keep an eye on what's going on around it have eyes on the side of its head? Why has everything that has a greater need to concentrate its vision on what is directly before it have eyes facing forwards? Why is it that things which need to see for miles can see for miles, yet things which don't need to, can't? Why do flat fish which lay on their side have two eyes on the upper side and a skull which looks completely deformed in comparison to other fish?

Look in the mirror, selection is staring you in the face. Now close your eyes and try looking at it again. Can you see?

Quote:

---

Matter:

Of course matter matters! If there were no dirt primordial slime would have nothing to ooze out of. Thus, until you can explain away the existence of matter you might as well not bother trying to explain how that matter magically turned itself into a human being.

---

That is ridiculous, and desperate. Why do you want to not believe the theory of Natural Selection? I'm guessing it's related to the selection of one of the most fit memes in the history of man. This meme has been so successful because of Natural Selection. Faced with all that intelligence and all those 'gaps', humans needed to develop something to fill them more than they didn't, the solution was selected and carried forward. But we are getting past it now, becoming fitter as a whole, that meme will be replaced when it no longer fits.

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Formlessness survey

Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 635(4/15/04 5:21 pm)Reply  |  Formlessness survey <hr/> I made the post following this survey in TPG. There were no replies. It is an argument against formlessness. Please pick one of the following for the whole concept and/or for any individual statement I have made that . <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>a) It is seems to be the truth</li> <li>b) It has a majority of concepts that I believe to be true</li> <li>c) It is a mixed up mishmash of ideas - and it is!, but I'm too lazy to tie up the lose ends within it - but is still more valid than TAO formlessness</li> <li>d) Can't make any sense of it</li> <li>e) The majority of the concepts are valid for the world we sense but not the TAO</li> <li>f) Apart from Newtons Laws, virtually every concept is wrong.</li> <li>g) It is completely wrong. The Tao is completely without any type of form.</li> </ul> This is not an appeal to numbers, but I am interested in how 'far out' people think me views are. Feel free to state what you think about the concept of the universe being formless. In addition, a lot of people here have said very little on this subject or what they think themselves about the nature of the universe - again tell us your theories if they differ to the QRSR theories. Rhett: The Totality is capable of an infinity of appearance (experiences), so it could never be said to have an objective form. |

I do not believe the universe is capable of an infinity of appearances or experiences. Now I just believe it is capable of a near infinity of appearances within a finite spectrum. This would mean it has form, and it does. For objects to exist it must. Without form the sun would not rise tomorrow. Its form starts off with Newtons laws of thermodynamics.

The laws are:

1. A body continues in a state of rest, or in motion at constant speed in a straight line, except when this state is changed by forces acting on it.
2. Force is equal to mass multiplied by acceleration (in other words, a given force on a given mass will produce a given acceleration. On twice the mass, it will produce half the acceleration. If the force on a given mass is doubled, however, the acceleration will double too.)
3. To every action there is an equal and opposite reaction.

The 1st law is correct for objects but not the universe itself.

The 2nd law is actually a subset of the 3rd law. It is redundant.

Rhett: Since the Totality is formless, it could never be said to have a "first cause", because in the absence of form there is no cause and effect, there is just a seamless continuum, that is beyond description.

I would change this to:

Since the Totality is without intelligent design, it could never be said to have a "first cause", because in the absence of intelligent design there is no A to B, no time or distance, or even A or B, no universal conception, there is just a continuum of movement.

Design exists but it is not intelligent, not determined by a force separate from movement, it is merely places in the universe where temporary balance has been achieved as a result of the above laws. Every thing is a hierarchical set upon set of incredibly complex balanced movements of matter. I do not believe the hierarchy is infinite in either direction. To me energy, including electrons, photons, light, gravity etc are just less complex matter than particles and thus are subject completely to the above laws. Life is just a system that electrical current flows into, within and out.

I believe there is a base level of pattern in every speck of space we have even seen. A base level pattern of Void, which could even be gravity. The base pattern creates what appears to be attraction/repulsion as displayed by magnetism and electricity, but which is really only movement of smaller matter than we are aware.

Bits of positive and negative (or different shaped) matter move into contact and lock together when a balance of movement occurs creating a closed base level patterns (lets say gravity), some of these patterns are compatible and also lock together as larger sets (lets say light) . Over time these larger sets bump into other patterns creating even larger sets (electrons, photons), then on to atoms, then elements, then combined elements, then lots of combined elements of all sorts of various patterns, then life, then you. It is all dependant on how patterns join together initially and the degree of chaotic movement as the patterns build. eg. space has too little chaos to form matter, the sun too much, but neither is permanent as patterns do form, a few eventually getting so sizable as to be the makers of their own destruction.

Hence we could add the following laws:

4. Due to movement, the universe coincidently makes base level patterns from which all things are constructed, then deconstructed.

5. Everything moves down the path of least resistance, but only by coincidence, due to the preceding laws.

Time, velocity, momentum and all other forces are created by the action of laws 1-4.

Unfortunately my theory implies that at some stage there was no movement or at some stage there will be no movement due to the universe coming into complete balance. Now if you believe in infinity, then something must inherently create movement (timelessness) and something must create matter (limitlessness). Perhaps that is where formlessness comes into play, it being complete emptiness and complete fullness, true emptiness bereft of any gravitational pulls, or any form or matter or energy and true fullness bereft of any possibility for movement. At the point of occurrence of complete emptiness its existence will pull the universe or void together. Space is 'stretched', but this stretching is simply movement of the bass pattern towards the place where the emptiness occurred. Complete fullness explodes (energy is unable to move in any direction due to surrounding energy, however when a sufficiently large object strikes into the core it causes the object surrounding it to fracture producing chaotic movement. Explosions 'stretch' the universe apart eventually creating points of emptiness as the energy and matter moves outward.

Thus both emptiness and fullness are the creators of movement.

Hence we add the following law

5. Emptiness/fullness are temporary, thus Universal Entropy is not possible.
If it is not possible in the future it never has been possible.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 4/15/04 5:25 pm

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 369
(4/16/04 12:44 pm)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

I've started my reply but it'll have to wait till tomorrow Jimhaz.

The TPG thread has overtaken me.

How about i post my reply here rather than at TPG?

Rhett

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 637
(4/16/04 3:03 pm)
Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

Yes Rhett, post here. This site needs rejuvenation. I was just trying to get some action happening.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1078
(4/16/04 3:38 pm)
Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

All lost sheep willingly recieved, shepherds or no.

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 370

(4/17/04 1:05 pm)

Reply | Edit

Re: Formlessness survey

Jimhaz,

Quote:

---

Rhett: The Totality is capable of an infinity of appearance (experiences), so it could never be said to have an objective form.

Jimhaz: I do not believe the universe is capable of an infinity of appearances or experiences. Now I just believe it is capable of a near infinity of appearances within a finite spectrum.

---

The Totality could be 'carved up' in an infinite variety of ways to form experiences. What could possibly limit this capacity?

Are you suggesting that it's limited in it's capacity because, for example, i'm unlikely to ever experience me jumping into space and voyaging around the galaxy in my t-shirt and shorts? This doesn't follow, because it involves the conceptualisation of a bounded infinite entity, and then subtracting appearances from it.

Think of an apple. There is undoubtably an infinite variety of ways you could cut it up and then look at the cut. That example is enough in itself, but to finish it off and make it a better analogy, now imagine an infinite apple . . . (you can't actually - but just conceptualise it the best you can) . . .

Quote:

---

This would mean it has form, and it does. For objects to exist it must. Without form the sun would not rise tomorrow. Its form starts off with Newtons laws of thermodynamics.

---

Form does exist - in the moment of experience. These momentary forms however, do not inherently exist, they are merely manifestations of the moment.

Quote:

---

The laws are:

1. A body continues in a state of rest, or in motion at constant speed in a straight line, except when this state is changed by forces acting on it.
  2. Force is equal to mass multiplied by acceleration (in other words, a given force on a given mass will produce a given acceleration. On twice the mass, it will produce half the acceleration. If the force on a given mass is doubled, however, the acceleration will double too.)
  3. To every action there is an equal and opposite reaction.
-

These laws are based upon a false distinction, that being a bounded body that exists in time. Thus, their answers are contingent.

To see this more clearly for yourself, i suggest you explore each of the definitions used in the laws. All of them either refer to a thing, or are a relative distinction about a thing, and thus, they have no absolute meaning.

Nevertheless, the laws obviously have practical value to scientists, engineers, etc, when they're doing their job.

Quote:

---

Rhett: Since the Totality is formless, it could never be said to have a "first cause", because in the absence of form there is no cause and effect, there is just a seamless continuum, that is beyond description.

Jimhaz: I would change this to: Since the Totality is without intelligent design, it could never be said to have a "first cause",

---

Cause & effect is a fundamental principle, upon which any design or method of design must be based.

Quote:

---

because in the absence of intelligent design there is no A to B, no time or distance, or even A or B, no universal conception, there is just a continuum of movement.

---

In the lack of a human distinction, there is no A or B, conception, or change. Change is dependant on the existence of things. No things = no change.

Quote:

---

Design exists but it is not intelligent, not determined by a force separate from movement, it is merely places in the universe where temporary balance has been achieved as a result of the above laws. Every thing is a hierarchical set upon set of incredibly complex balanced movements of matter. I do not believe the hierarchy is infinite in either direction. To me energy, including electrons, photons, light, gravity etc are just less complex matter than particles and thus are subject completely to the above laws. Life is just a system that electrical current flows into, within and out.

---

All of this and the rest of your post (snipped) is philosophically meaningless. Try to pin down any of these terms and they just vanish into thin air.

Rhett Hamilton

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 894

(4/17/04 2:37 pm)

Reply

Re: Formlessness survey

Sorry guys, but I'm going to cut in and give my take on Rhett's post.

The Totality could be 'carved up' in an infinite variety of ways to form experiences. What could possibly limit this capacity?

You'll see in a second...

Think of an apple. There is undoubtably an infinite variety of ways you could cut it up and then look at the cut.

There isn't an infinite number of ways to cut an apple and look at the cut. Think about it. An apple is an object, and an object is limited by its own form. There'd be A LOT of ways to cut and look at an apple, but definitely, MOST definitely, not an infinite number of ways.

That example is enough in itself, but to finish it off and make it a better analogy, now imagine an infinite apple . . . (you can't actually - but just conceptualise it the best you can) . . .

Well exactly, you've just proven the point I just made. You can't have an infinite apple, because an apple is finite. Anything finite is bound by it's own objectness. Something bound must ALWAYS have an end to ways of manipulating it.

Form does exist - in the moment of experience. These momentary forms however, do not inherently exist, they are merely manifestations of the moment.

Formlessness can't create form.

Ahem.

These laws are based upon a false distinction, that being a bounded body that exists in time. Thus, their answers are contingent.

The laws are based on a false distinction is right, but...

To see this more clearly for yourself, i suggest you explore each of the definitions used in the laws. All of them either refer to a thing, or are a relative distinction about a thing, and thus, they have no absolute meaning.

They're the laws of PHYSICS. Physics is the study of how THINGS work. They have meaning pertaining to form, which is the only thing which needs to have meaning. You can't bring meaning to the infinite, because the infinite is beyond your meaning, and contains your meaning.

Nevertheless, the laws obviously have practical value to scientists, engineers, etc, when they're doing their job.

As well as philosophers and enlightened folks, who all live in the physical world. Rhett, you type these things on your keyboard; you rely on form... yet you speak as if all of it is nothing to you. You deny what surrounds you. I think I understand why you do this, so I'm not as shocked as I might seem. I just think you need to realize the part of reality you're missing out on in order to create your 'reality'.

Cause & effect is a fundamental principle, upon which any design or method of design must be based.

Cause and effect is Newton's third law of Physics, which you've said has no absolute meaning.

I don't think you worded that nicely enough. "Absolute meaning", I think, means that it has to do with the "absolute"...the "totality". Since everything, even form, is contained within the absolute...then all form has absolute meaning, right?

...

In the lack of a human distinction, there is no A or B, conception, or change. Change is dependant on the existence of things. No things = no change.

Have you experienced the world outside of yourself to say this is true? It's an idea - an incorrect idea. I'm going to argue that change does NOT depend on human distinction, but creates human distinction.

You're right that change is dependent on the existence of things, and that no things = no change.

All of this and the rest of your post (snipped) is philosophically meaningless. Try to pin down any of these terms and they just vanish into thin air.

Everything seems to be vanishing for you, Rhett. Is this vanishing illusion a solid truth to hold onto?

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 371
(4/19/04 11:15 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: Formlessness survey

---

Voce,

Quote:

---

R: The Totality could be 'carved up' in an infinite variety of ways to form experiences. What could possibly limit this capacity?

Think of an apple. There is undoubtedly an infinite variety of ways you could cut it up and then look at the cut.

V: There isn't an infinite number of ways to cut an apple and look at the cut. Think about it. An apple is an object, and an object is limited by its own form. There'd be A LOT of ways to cut and look at an apple, but definitely, MOST definitely, not an infinite number of ways.

---

Why not? What could limit me to a pre-defined set of cuts?

Quote:

---

R: Form does exist - in the moment of experience. These momentary forms however, do not inherently exist, they are merely manifestations of the moment.

V: Formlessness can't create form.

---

Yes it can.

The Totality is formless outside of consciousness, yet has form in consciousness.

(Thus, form = consciousness)

And since consciousness is created (caused) by 'not-consciousness', formlessness creates (causes) form.

Quote:

---

R: These laws are based upon a false distinction, that being a bounded body that exists in time. Thus, their answers are contingent.

V: The laws are based on a false distinction is right, but...

R: To see this more clearly for yourself, i suggest you explore each of the definitions used in the laws. All of them either refer to a thing, or are a relative distinction about a thing, and thus, they have no absolute meaning.

V: They're the laws of PHYSICS. Physics is the study of how THINGS work. They have meaning pertaining to form, which is the only thing which needs to have meaning. You can't bring meaning to the infinite, because the infinite is beyond your meaning, and contains your meaning.

---

Meaning is an ascription of consciousness. You, or I, or anyone else, each decide what they consider meaningful, based on what they value.

I value enlightenment over physics because it has relevance to every moment of experience i have. I hardly think about the conceptual laws of physics.

Quote:

---

R: Nevertheless, the laws obviously have practical value to scientists, engineers, etc, when they're doing their job.

V: As well as philosophers and enlightened folks, who all live in the physical world. Rhett, you type these things on your keyboard; you rely on form...yet you speak as if all of it is nothing to you. You deny what surrounds you. I think I understand why you do this, so I'm not as shocked as I might seem. I just think you need to realize the part of reality you're missing out on in order to create your 'reality'.

---

I've studied mechanical engineering, so i'm pretty conversent with applied physics, and yes, it has helped me in my everyday life.

But it's nothing compared to Ultimate Wisdom, so i place far more emphasis on the latter.

Life without the conceptual laws of physics is fine - they're not that important, but life without Truth is a big problem.

Quote:

---

R: Cause & effect is a fundamental principle, upon which any design or method of design must be based.

V: Cause and effect is Newton's third law of Physics, which you've said has no absolute meaning.

I don't think you worded that nicely enough. "Absolute meaning", I think, means that it has to do with the "absolute"...the "totality". Since everything, even form, is contained within the absolute...then all form has absolute meaning, right?

---

Concepts are considered to have absolute meaning when they are true for all time, independent of circumstances. Thus, any law of physics that is dependant on circumstances is not absolute, whereas any physics law that is purely a logical construct is true for all time - but won't actually say anything to us about reality or it's nature.

Quote:

---

R: In the lack of a human distinction, there is no A or B, conception, or change. Change is dependant on the existence of things. No things = no change.

V: Have you experienced the world outside of yourself to say this is true? It's an idea - an incorrect idea. I'm going to argue that change does NOT depend on human distinction, but creates human distinction.

You're right that change is dependent on the existence of things, and that no things = no change.

---

Then all you need realise is that things are a distinction of mind - in order to realise that change is a distinction of mind.

Quote:

---

R: All of this and the rest of your post (snipped) is philosophically meaningless. Try to pin down any of these terms and they just vanish into thin air.

V: Everything seems to be vanishing for you, Rhett. Is this vanishing illusion a solid truth to hold onto?

---

The lack of inherent existence of things (objects of perception) is a solid truth to hold on to, but you'll only ever experience this truth momentarily, so you can't really hold on to it.

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 4/22/04 9:39 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 896
(4/19/04 12:20 pm)
Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

Logical fallacies everywhere.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1498
(4/22/04 1:14 am)
Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

Jimmy,

My general response to your musings on the universe are that I really enjoy them. I like that you think about these things. I'm not so sure as to any specific agreements or disagreements.

Quote:

---

I would change this to:
Since the Totality is without intelligent

---

You and Rhett are not discussing the same thing. Rhett said elsewhere that there is an infinite number of possible cuts to an apple, and voce disagreed. I believe that voce is right, but I am not sure about there being a limit to the expressions of the universe. You are saying the universe is finite. It is a point to be careful about. When a number seems to be really, really high, people think it is infinite, when it is not.

I'm not sure where you really differ by saying the universe is without intelligent design and has no cause. But finite things must be caused, I think.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 371
(4/22/04 9:43 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

Voce,

Quote:

---

Logical fallacies everywhere.

---

Actually, i did make a blooper - with the word absolute, it's the second time i've had some kind of 'brain hiccup' with the word. It's now fixed.

Your response certainly fits into the category - "brief" - at this juncture . . .

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1557
(4/22/04 11:26 am)
Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

---

Anna wrote,

Quote:

---

I'm not sure where you really differ by saying the universe is without intelligent design and has no cause. But finite things must be caused, I think.

---

The fact that we are intelligent speaks of an intelligent universe; like the eye of a giant beast slowly opening. What else could it be? The concept of God is irrelevant. There is nothing but this. It is everything.

Tharan

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 898
(4/22/04 11:27 am)
Reply

Re: Formlessness survey

Absolute is a tough word. I don't want to discuss the topic anymore, since I've made the points that I think are necessary. I guess it's philosophically "bad" of me to be so brief, but I'm not a philosopher.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1558
(4/22/04 11:29 am)
Reply

Re: Formlessness survey

I'm not a philosopher either. Welcome.

Tharan

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 644
(4/22/04 5:50 pm)
Reply

Re: Formlessness survey

Rhett Re your posts from a few days ago.

I wasn't going to reply Rhett as Scott covered what I would of said pretty well but I got bored.

-----
Rhett: The Totality is capable of an infinity of appearance (experiences), so it could never be said to have an objective form.

Jimhaz: I do not believe the universe is capable of an infinity of appearances or experiences. Now I just believe it is capable of a near infinity of appearances within a finite spectrum.

-----
The Totality could be 'carved up' in an infinite variety of ways to form experiences. What could possibly limit this capacity?

I agree with what Scott said:

- Formlessness can't create form
- Form limits itself.
- You can't bring meaning to the infinite, because the infinite is beyond your meaning, and contains your meaning.

Basically I'm just saying you can't fit a round peg into a square hole. There are limitations, so there cannot be a limitless number of forms. A form must be build from other forms and it is these preceding forms that limit the new form.

Form does exist in the moment of experience. These momentary forms however, do not inherently exist, they are merely manifestations of the moment.

Agreed, but so what. My definition of existence includes temporary existence. I think you and the QRS make more out of the word inherent than you should. Nothing can be inherent unless it applies to the universe as a whole. So I suggest that whatever allowed the laws of nature to be conceived by us humans is the inherent form of the universe.

These laws are based upon a false distinction, that being a bounded body that exists in time. Thus, their answers are contingent. All of them either refer to a thing, or are a relative distinction about a thing, and thus, they have no absolute meaning.

I disagree, the laws do have an absolute meaning at the abstract level (I say abstract only because the laws are not necessarily phrased 100% accurately).

Cause & effect is a fundamental principle, upon which any design or method of design must be based.

Actually ALL cause and effect is, is the process of movement. So it is at least one step above fundamental.

-----
because in the absence of intelligent design there is no A to B, no time or distance, or even A or B, no universal conception, there is just a continuum of movement.
-----

In the lack of a human distinction, there is no A or B, conception, or change.

No, life other than humans can have concepts – dogs for example.

If there was intelligent design then the universe and all things the universe consists of would have been formed by this design. However as my view is that the universe is too disjointed for any form of consciousness to have devised the things in the universe, I feel it is more likely that the things we observe were created completely coincidentally over time by an infinite number of movements of base level matter.

As matter, at any one time, cannot have all possible properties of existence then it therefore must have form and it is the lack of infinite properties that creates patterns, from which comes structure and observable objects.

Change is dependant on the existence of things. No things = no change.

No, no movement would mean no change which would mean no things. That things exist is taken for granted.

---

Design exists but it is not intelligent, not determined by a force separate from movement, it is merely places in the universe where temporary balance has been achieved as a result of the above laws. Every thing is a hierarchical set upon set of incredibly complex balanced movements of matter. I do not believe the hierarchy is infinite in either direction. To me energy, including electrons, photons, light, gravity etc are just less complex matter than particles and thus are subject completely to the above laws. Life is just a system that electrical current flows into, within and out.

---

All of this and the rest of your post (snipped) is philosophically meaningless. Try to pin down any of these terms and they just vanish into thin air.

No, they don't actually vanish, however our ability to conceptualise it does.

Now why someone would then propose that the universe is emptiness just because they cannot trace the object to it's smallest constituents is beyond me. Isn't it more likely that the universe is fullness + emptiness. This would make matter those parts of the universe that do not have all properties. Something that had all properties would not be recognisable, as would something with no properties.

The Totality is formless outside of consciousness, yet has form in consciousness.

(Thus, form = consciousness)

No it isn't, it is just that things are nameless, meaningless, not conceptualised. Form is only recognisable by consciousness, rather than equalling it.

And since consciousness is created (caused) by 'not-consciousness', formlessness creates (causes) form.

Yes I agree consciousness is caused by 'not-consciousness', but consciousness is merely a structure, an object created by things of a different form, in the same way as the universe is nothing but the some of its parts.

I value enlightenment over physics because it has relevance to every moment of experience i have. I hardly think about the conceptual laws of physics.

Fair enough, whatever makes you not unhappy, but you don't think about physics because you believe you have all the answers in the circular QRS enlightenment situation. If you think the universe is formless what point is there is looking at these things further.

Life without the conceptual laws of physics is fine - they're not that important, but life without Truth is a big problem.

Life without truth - Not important if you don't have an existing love or desire for truth. Not if you are born lucky. Ultimate type truth is only sought by those who need it. What truth seems to do is teach us what we don't need to consider, which makes us feel complete.

Then all you need realise is that things are a distinction of mind - in order to realise that change is a distinction of mind.

No, change is not JUST a distinction of mind, although things are.

The lack of inherent existence of things (objects of perception) is a solid truth to hold on to, but you'll only ever experience this truth momentarily, so you can't really hold on to it.

That's what I've found

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 645

(4/22/04 6:06 pm)

Reply

 Re: Formlessness survey

You are saying the universe is finite. It is a point to be careful about. When a number seems to be really, really high, people think it is infinite, when it is not.

We make assumptions that it is infinite in size, it is such a commonly held belief, but what proof do we have? None. I think the universe could only be infinite in size if 'emptiness' itself actually creates matter. Singularities I guess.

I'm not sure where you really differ by saying the universe is without intelligent design and has no cause.

That was only in relation to the first cause, it does not mean that the universe by coincidence, cannot create things of intelligent design. Like everyone else I am not able to properly understand the nature of the infinite universe, or infinity, but I know that any form of intelligent design creates a beginning, so perhaps the absence of same means that a beginning was never necessary.

But finite things must be caused, I think.

Finite things must be caused by other finite things. It is probable this process is circular and thus infinite.

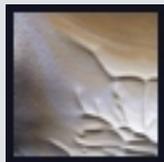

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 373

(5/7/04 11:08 am)

Reply | Edit

Re: Formlessness survey

Jimhaz wrote,

Quote:

---

-----

Rhett: The Totality is capable of an infinity of appearance (experiences), so it could never be said to have an objective form.

Jimhaz: I do not believe the universe is capable of an infinity of appearances or experiences. Now I just believe it is capable of a near infinity of appearances within a finite spectrum.

Rhett: The Totality could be 'carved up' in an infinite variety of ways to form experiences. What could possibly limit this capacity?

-
- Formlessness can't create form
  - Form limits itself.
-

Imagine a Zebra's stripes in your mind. Now picture a white stripe in the middle, and on either side are black stripes. The white stripe represents the realm of form - consciousness, and the black stripes the formless realm. They seem distinct, in that there is white, and there is black, but if we were to hone in on them the distinction would become more and more hazy, until such time as we lost all reference to where the original distinction lay. From a microscopic perspective, we'd see a wholly different set of contrasts to the everyday perspective, but that too would just be an appearance. We could conceivably hone in indefinitely, but that too would just furnish further appearances - contrasts. So, from this we can understand that there isn't really a boundary between the white and black stripes - it's just an appearance, and that everyday appearances are no more or less truthful than other appearances. They just are what they are, and they're never going to jump out and tell us, or in some way reveal to us, absolute truths (unless we're experiencing a spiritual man of course!).

However, to take the next step, we need to realise that this analogy was built on a falsehood. It suggested that we could represent the formless realm, with a black stripe, but of course, the black stripe has form! Thus, given that we can never experience formlessness, any attempt to represent or imagine the transition between the realm of form and the formless realm is fundamentally false. And likewise, so too is any attempt to investigate it. Quite simply, every experience is necessarily comprised of form, because it is form that constitutes experience. They are one and the same. Without form, there is no experience.

Quote:

---

- You can't bring meaning to the infinite, because the infinite is beyond your meaning, and contains your meaning.

---

The Infinite does, as you say, "contain my meaning", but, unlike yourself, i think it's also fair to say that "I bring meaning to the Infinite" (at least, to the extent that i consider myself to exist). Meaning does not exist outside of my ascription of it, which, of course, only occurs within my consciousness.

Quote:

---

There are limitations, so there cannot be a limitless number of forms. A form must be build from other forms and it is these preceding forms that limit the new form.

---

Form arises from the formless. It does not arise nor is built from other forms, as forms do not inherently exist.

Form is not continuous. It is best considered a moment-by-moment manifestation.

Consider when you lie down in your bed at night. Your form (consciousness), will, at some point, stop.

Your form then starts again, and all manner of memories arise, and align, and fill it with your construction of an objective world (that doesn't objectively exist), including the notion of it being morning and that you have woken.

Quote:

---

-----
Rhett: Form does exist in the moment of experience. These momentary forms however, do not inherently exist, they are merely manifestations of the moment.
-----

Agreed, but so what. My definition of existence includes temporary existence.

---

All existence is temporary. Have you ever had a constant (i.e. frozen) experience?

Sure, you experience forms that your mind tells you you have experienced before, but your mind has done nothing more than categorise different experiences into one conceptual and imaginary entity - a construction. You cannot be certain that there is any correlation between these different experiences, they might simply be a alien-designed computer program that is running its course. The correlation, thus, is contingent, and should not be held as Truth.

Quote:

---

Rhett: These laws are based upon a false distinction, that being a bounded body that exists in time. Thus, their answers are contingent. All of them either refer to a thing, or are a relative distinction about a thing, and thus, they have no absolute meaning.

Jimhaz: I disagree, the laws do have an absolute meaning at the abstract level (I say abstract only because the laws are not necessarily phrased 100% accurately).

---

No, the laws don't have absolute meaning, they aren't purely abstract; they rely on circumstantial predicates.

Gravity, mass, force and acceleration are merely observed and measured properties, at any particular moment in time, and at any particular place. They are purely circumstantial, i.e. relative.

It's infinitely unlikely that at any time any interactions have conformed exactly to the formulae that have been derived from them (e.g.  $F=ma$ ), and plenty of scientific observations have already contradicted these formulas. Thus, we know both logically and evidentially that these formulas are contingent.

To dispell some of your doubts, consider that scientists have very little idea as to the causes of gravitational attraction, that light photons seem to be able to exist as energy or mass, and that particles seem to be able to influence each other in real time through space. Pretty quickly you start to realise just how uncertain it all is, after all, most scientists have! It's actually quite possible that in some other part of the Totality (or indeed, right in front of our eyes!) these properties could be completely absent, or arse about.

Quote:

---

Rhett: Cause & effect is a fundamental principle, upon which any design or method of design must be based.

Jimhaz: Actually ALL cause and effect is, is the process of movement. So it is at least one step above fundamental.

---

Okay, let's consider 'fundamental' to be the moment of experience - the simple isness of the Totality.

However, since you've used the term 'movement', which indicates change, i'll make the following point:

Cause and effect exists for momentary appearances (things), in that they are necessarily caused to be as they are, whereas change requires the conception of timely existence of those things.

Thus, change (movement) should be considered a step above cause and effect, not below.

Quote:

---

-----
Jimhaz: because in the absence of intelligent design there is no A to B, no time or distance, or even A or B, no universal conception, there is just a continuum of movement.

Rhett: In the lack of a human distinction, there is no A or B, conception, or change.

---

No, life other than humans can have concepts – dogs for example.

---

Okay; in the lack of a conscious distinction.

Quote:

---

If there was intelligent design then the universe and all things the universe consists of would have been formed by this design. However as my view is that the universe is too disjointed for any form of consciousness to have devised the things in the universe, I feel it is more likely that the things we observe were created completely coincidentally over time by an infinite number of movements of base level matter.

---

Consciousness devises things in the very moment of experience, including "base level matter". Aside from conscious differentiation, it is all One - seamless.

Quote:

---

As matter, at any one time, cannot have all possible properties of existence then it therefore must have form and it is the lack of infinite properties that creates patterns, from which comes structure and observable objects.

---

What are you pointing to when you talk of "matter"?

Quote:

---

Rhett: Change is dependant on the existence of things. No things = no change.

Jimhaz: No, no movement would mean no change which would mean no things. That things exist is taken for granted.

---

You need to stop taking the existence of things for granted. Not a single notion can be taken for granted if you want the truth. The existence of finite, separate, inherently bounded objects is radically silly, and totally unfounded. It's a real shame that this notion arises from the experience of form.

Quote:

---

Now why someone would then propose that the universe is emptiness just because they cannot trace the object to it's smallest constituents is beyond me.

---

We demarcate the Totality, thus creating all constituents - both big one's and small one's, and we can demarcate them as small as we want (based on the forms that we experience). Are you suggesting, for example, that our ridiculously nebulous definition of various "sub-atomic particles" are indicative of inherent existence? Surely not.

Quote:

---

Rhett: The Totality is formless outside of consciousness, yet has form in consciousness. (Thus, form = consciousness).

Jimhaz: No it isn't, it is just that things are nameless, meaningless, not conceptualised. Form is only recognisable by consciousness, rather than equalling it.

---

In the absence of consciousness, the Tao is nameless, meaningless, non-conceptual, and without form or things.

Form and things are necessarily observer dependant. Every experience you have is contained purely within your brain as a construction, based on the inputs from your senses. You never experience the photons of light that enter your eyes, or the pressure waves that enter your ears, or the physical stimulus of your skin, or the food that resides on your tongue, etc. Your experiences are constructed from these, and that construction is only one of an infinity of ways of representing the void that exists outside of it.

Consider a bat, that 'sees' through use of echo's. It might fly past you and 'see' the same portion of the void that you are seeing, but it's construction would be radically different. You, like most people, will naturally think that your construction is right, or that there is somehow an objective way of seeing, but there isn't. How could there be?

Thus, the experience of a forest (for example), is wholly within consciousness, and any tree that you care to demarcate from it's surroundings is also purely within your construction, and thus, contingent. Just as a computer screen is a collection of dots from which we discern letters and pictures - realising that they are just dots, so too do we discern contrasts within our brain's construction and create things - realising that they are just images within consciousness.

The irony is that you hold a belief - that forms objectively and inherently exist (that they are bounded/finite, and exist in time) - without understanding what you're actually suggesting, or having any foundation for it. It is nothing more than an empty assertion, that is easily falsified.

Quote:

---

Rhett: And since consciousness is created (caused) by 'not-consciousness', formlessness creates (causes) form.

Jimhaz: Yes I agree consciousness is caused by 'not-consciousness', but consciousness is merely a structure, an object created by things of a different form , in the same way as the universe is nothing but the some of its parts.

---

This contradicts a statement you made later in your response.

Jimhaz: "No, change is not JUST a distinction of mind, although things are."

If you accept that things are a distinction of mind, then you accept that the Totality is seamless, and thus, that it is not a "sum of parts".

Quote:

---

Rhett: I value enlightenment over physics because it has relevance to every moment of experience i have. I hardly think about the conceptual laws of physics.

Jimhaz: Fair enough, whatever makes you not unhappy, but you don't think about physics because you believe you have all the answers in the circular QRS enlightenment situation. If you think the universe is formless what point is there is looking at these things further.

---

What, do you suggest, can be gained from you or I discussing physics?
What is the point or reason for doing so?

Quote:

---

Rhett: Life without the conceptual laws of physics is fine - they're not that important, but life without Truth is a big problem.

Jimhaz: Life without truth - Not important if you don't have an existing love or desire for truth. Not if you are born lucky. Ultimate type truth is only sought by those who need it. What truth seems to do is teach us what we don't need to consider, which makes us feel complete.

---

If delusional fantasy imbued with mindlessness, uncertainty and suffering is your preference in life, then you can have it!

Ultimate Truth is sought by those that have developed the wonderful capacity called reason, and it is the genuinely dedicated of those that blast through common ignorance to nirvana.

Yes, it is as you say, truth does teach us what we don't need to consider. In respect to to the demands that our experiences bear upon us, and their incredible variety, i'm all too glad of truth fulfilling this role - of simplifying.

Rhett Hamilton

Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31i
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

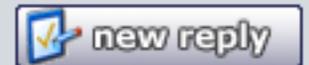

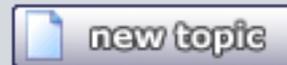

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Free will

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 555(5/30/04 4:36 pm)Reply  |  Free will <hr/> Alright, this is a fascinating subject. I'm convinced it's guaranteed to disturb anyone who thinks about it. Alright, maybe not, but the question is: where could free will possibly come from? As I see it, there are only two possibilities: either it's caused or it's uncaused. What other possibility exists? If it's caused, then our "will" comes from outside influences. If it's uncaused, then the will is completely random, with no possibility of control able to enter the picture. So where does the control of free will come from? |
| Jones KellyPosts: 122(5/30/04 5:59 pm)Reply                                                                                |  Re: Free will <hr/> MGregory wrote: Quote: <hr/> where could free will possibly come from? As I see it, there are only two possibilities: either it's caused or it's uncaused. What other possibility exists? If it's caused, then our "will" comes from outside influences. If it's uncaused, then the will is completely random, with no possibility of control able to enter the picture. So where does the control of free will come from? <hr/> If free will is the ability of an uninfluenced self to make decisions freely,    | there may be two kinds of "freedom":

(1) if the self is totally free, then it must not have any causes. It therefore cannot exist as a knowable self. This also points out that without self, awareness is God...

(2) if the self is somewhat free, the originator of decisions still has independence from causality - at some point. But decisions are causal, ie. using causes for the decision PLUS the causation of an effect (decision). This points out that there can be no independence from causality, ie. no self.

What exactly is a decision? I think it is the appearance of problem-solving, ie. identification of a solution to a question, a response to an appearance that lacks identity. It doesn't actually require the notion of free-will.

Also, since it is impossible to eradicate appearances in consciousness - i.e. the cessation of applying values - obviously free will cannot exist.

MGregory

Posts: 564

(6/4/04 1:58 pm)

Reply

 Re: Free Will

---

I'm going to change my story a little bit. If "free will" is defined as "the fact that we don't know what decision we will make until that decision has already been made", then it exists. I don't think it's useless to define it that way for practical uses. I mean, it would be silly to deny that we have to make decisions.

I think a lot of people think of determinism as future knowledge, almost to the point of equating the two, but that's just a lack of understanding of causality. Just because we know that a thing is caused doesn't mean we know what those causes are or what the results of any particular cause will be.

But then again, such a statement hinges on the definition of "causation". If it's sufficiently narrow, then it probably would be possible to catalog all the causes of an event. Although, this would undoubtedly lead to an endless refining of the definition as more and more causes that don't fit the definition are discovered. But I guess that's what laboratories are all about, attempts to create causal fences. In a way, laboratories are a tacit admission that causation is infinite, or at least too vast for us to comprehend, otherwise they wouldn't be necessary.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 147

(6/4/04 4:52 pm)

Reply

Re: Free Will

Matt:

Quote:

---

I'm going to change my story a little bit. If "free will" is defined as "the fact that we don't know what decision we will make until that decision has already been made", then it exists. I don't think it's useless to define it that way for practical uses. I mean, it would be silly to deny that we have to make decisions.

---

The instant problem-solving becomes important, decision-making exists, which creates the illusion of free will. If all solutions are known to be empty, free will fades into emptiness, and a logical process wanders along aimlessly.

Quote:

---

I think a lot of people think of determinism as future knowledge, almost to the point of equating the two, but that's just a lack of understanding of causality. Just because we know that a thing is caused doesn't mean we know what those causes are or what the results of any particular cause will be.

---

There is an element of future knowledge in understanding causality, not prescience exactly, but rather of knowing the nature of all possible appearances.

Quote:

---

But then again, such a statement hinges on the definition of "causation". If it's sufficiently narrow, then it probably would be possible to catalog all the causes of an event. Although, this would undoubtedly lead to an endless refining of the definition as more and more causes that don't fit the definition are discovered. But I guess that's what laboratories are all about, attempts to create causal fences. In a way, laboratories are a tacit admission that causation is infinite, or at least too vast for us to comprehend, otherwise they wouldn't be necessary.

---

Ridiculous, isn't it? By using an empirical process to explain every empirical process, scientists have given themselves an endless investigation, saying the universe must indeed be vast!

raainking

Registered User

Posts: 4

(6/18/04 4:40 pm)

Reply

 Re: Free Will

---

"In the midst of the the world" the creator said to Adam "I have placed thee, so thou couldst look around so much easier, and see all that is in it. I created thee as a being neither celestial nor earthly, neither mortal nor immortal alone, so that thou shouldst be thy own free moulder and overcomer; thou canst degenerate to animal, and through thyself be reborn to godlike existence. Animals bring forth from the womb what they should have; the higher spirits, on the other hand, are from the beginning, or at least soon after, what they remain in all eternity. Thou alone hast power to develop and grow according to free will: in one word, thou hast the seeds of all embracing life in thyself"

Pico Della Mirandola

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 693

(6/18/04 7:46 pm)

Reply

 Re: Free Will

---

So where does the control of free will come from?

The answer is in the question. Although it is technically true that we have no free will in that everything is pre-determined, as we are the sum of those predeterminations - thus we are the tao. Those causes made us think of the question, thus we have the carriage of our conscious lives.

We were brought here by the joining together of a myriad of bits and pieces, which when broken apart into parts mean nothing.

Our goal is to secure more consciousness. We have the free will to cease that consciousness or to keep living to see where it leads.

What else could free will be?

It is more natural and logical for us to choose the later.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 6/18/04 7:52 pm

raainking

Registered User

Posts: 5

(7/2/04 3:01 am)

Reply

 free willy

---

to my unenlightened way of living and of occasionally thinking this is the only question of ultimate significance on any of these forums. Time, space, matter blah are all addressing this basic question of will to beings with consciousness.

When I first started to formulate the lived hypotheses that moral consciousness was somehow distinct from the causal process I gave up in disgust at my own inability to explain how this might be feasible as a logical argument. Sometime later I was reminded by reading (as opposed to thinking) that this intuitive and rebellious proposition of mine was exactly the question that Kierkegaard and Kant had tackled and earned their stature from in the philosophical world.

Taking another drag on a smoke hardly qualifies me to talk about free will though does it as I am the self same person who claims to long for a pleasurable immortality. Since there is no way to get what I want from a causal universe I spit at it.

Somehow some of you dole bludgers have convinced yourselves that you have some entitlement to immortality by default of your existential consciousness that I don't have. All human problems are, in the last resort, problems of the soul and whilst I admire these attempts to address this question of what the description 'soul' might mean I remain as perplexed as ever. How is it possible to speculate about a soul in a causal universe without resorting to a defence of the spiritual that then becomes ultimately indefensible on logical/causal terms ?

I accept that I may not have yet have made a choice based on free will but I live on in hope that someday I do. Then I shall freely die.

ChrisSaik

Registered User

Posts: 85

(7/2/04 3:24 am)

Reply

☐ Re: Free will

---

Consider this.

You make decisions in the course of your everyday life. You are free to decide whether or not you are going to go to work, for instance. But you are not free of the consequences (getting fired, etc).

You are also not free to decide that today you have the ability to flap your wings and fly. (Well, you can fantasize all you want, but in all likelihood you will plummet to your demise).

You are not free from cause and effect. Free will would imply that you could ignore the laws of the universe. Not only mentally, but actually.

This is a fool's notion.

november rains

Posts: 6

(7/6/04 6:37 pm)

Reply

☐ in the land of "uprightness"

---

OMG.

"Free will" means you have inner voices, inside of you, and they speak to you and tell you "do that!", or "you know that is wrong...".

You get to make the choice.

People who make the wrong choices are usually so caught up in covering their own tracks, they never even see it coming when the "bad luck men" move in on em. boy what a mess.

People who make the right choices, well they are just dumbfounded, how these great, wonderful things just seem to fall into place some times, for the betterment of good.

Unfortunately the Christian religion, in fact all religions have pretty much tried to take control of all that business, so everyone is all screwed up now, and who knows, i guess those "bad luck men" are going to be having a ball for awhile now.

Actually this was all in "the plan", and it was a reliable evolutionary process that we (man) would reach the point of almost full evil after, say, 6.2 thousand years (give or take), and the Lord of Hosts, well He had plenty of foreknowledge when this would begin, by keeping an eye on the planet for it's first little ozone hole. That's usually the first sign that the big egg is about

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | to POP! Fortunately, God doesn't put fingerprint smudges on the lenses of his hubblesopes. And they are far more advanced than ours. How do I know all this? Well by golly, I read the script. nr.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| ragweedzero Posts: 3(7/6/04 6:41 pm) Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                          |  Well what a coincidence. <hr/> "Let favour be shown to some men, yet they still will not learn to do the right thing. In the land of uprightness (this is where men learn to walk on two, instead of four,) he will be unjust and will not acknowledge that there is one who is smarter than he. When the bad luck men come, they will not even see it coming..." Somewhere in the bible, I'm sure this doesn't apply to you. |
|  Kills  Registered User Posts: 1(7/6/04 8:37 pm) Reply ezSupporter |  Re: Well what a coincidence. <hr/> I Have Not yet read this O but I Am EAR.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

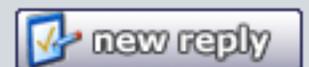

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > Fully Determined

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 933(1/21/04 6:36 pm)Reply | Fully Determined<hr/> Quote: <hr/> Rhett HamiltonI say that you are essentially or inherently blameless - not only because you are fully determined to do as you do, but also because you don't inherently exist. <hr/> "You are fully determined" Who really believes that?Ask yourself again if you really believe that.Then meditate on it for a little while.Now what do you believe? |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM
> fundamentalism

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Jones KellyPosts: 17(4/1/04 10:47 am)Reply | fundamentalism <hr/> Dave T raised the issue of the sickness of Fundamentalism in the "Nietzsche and the Overman Delusion" thread. I seem to have discomforted some people with what appears to be traditional dogmatic fundamentalism, so i'd like to clarify the two kinds of fundamentalism here: (1) Strict maintenance of fundamental doctrines of any religion, esp. Islam(2) Strict maintenance of fundamental principle of Reality As i had a background as a teenager in the pressure-cooker of Protestant fundamentalism, i have good knowledge of how different it is to (2). But as i am still a beginner here, i am open to better knowledge. Doctrinal/religious fundamentalism is attachment to beliefs, not to knowledge. Because these beliefs are not fundamentally reasoned, they provide a strong foothold for emotional, egotistical self-identification (Holy Crusaders, or anti-terrorism, for instance). Desire to identify by losing one's identity (merging) also feeds martyrdom (harakiri, early Christians). Unfortunately, the key delusion for these suffers is ego. They undertake austerities or pain of death to prove the greatness of their beliefs to others. These are extremists and fanatics because they are insane, by believing in the inherent existence of a mental construction. Fundamentalism as the practice of understanding Truth/truth is knowledge of the inherent non-existence of any mental conception. Strict maintenance of this principle is to know that all knowledge is ultimately illusory and know |

that that knowledge is true: an apparent paradox. To be attached to "neither real nor illusory" is impossible in practice. Imagine the relics and statues for such a "religion" that doesn't exist...!

According to valuing fundamental truth in this way, the sage is rather more dangerous to society, for he is bent on killing. But the awakening of consciousness in others is his goal, not the death of it. Death is the unfortunate equivalent of consciousness that never awakes in the first place.

Fundamentalism as it is practised in this way realigns all values to sit true to the understanding of the nature of Ultimate Reality. E.g. speaking the Truth/truth at all times.

Religious fundamentalism is different to the fundamentalism of Truth because there is utter relinquishment of desire in the latter - even ultimately of the desire for consciousness. This is the very last relinquishment, since it is the primary tool for Truth to be fully known.

[Edited a spelling error.]

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 4/1/04 1:27 pm

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1138
(4/1/04 2:30 pm)
Reply

Re: fundamentalism

---

So, how do you define fundamentalism?

Jones Kelly
Posts: 26
(4/2/04 2:38 pm)
Reply

fundamentalism

---

Quote:

---

Marsha: So, how do you define fundamentalism?

Kelly: ...i'd like to clarify the two kinds of fundamentalism here:

(1) Strict maintenance of fundamental doctrines of any religion, esp. Islam

(2) Strict maintenance of fundamental principle of Reality

Fundamental, of a basic principle. Thus it is pure irony in (2).

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Gay Bishop

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                  | Comment                                                                                                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 571(8/6/03 6:30 pm)Reply       | Gay Bishop <hr/> US elects first Gay Bishop.Interesting changes taking place. Does the individual shape society or does society shape the individual? |
| FosterPhileRegistered UserPosts: 1(8/6/03 19:01)Reply   | Gay Bishop? <hr/> What I dread the most is all of the superfluous jokes that I'll be hearing whenever I play chess from here on out.                              |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1126(8/7/03 0:35)Reply | Gay Bishop <hr/> Heh, good one.                                                                                                                                   |
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 30(8/7/03 6:50)Reply    | Re: Gay Bishop <hr/> Or does something else shape society and the individual?                                                                                     |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| prozak666Registered UserPosts: 158(8/7/03 10:23)Reply  | Re: Gay Bishop <hr/> WHAT changes? Seems like every other priest these days is having forced homosexual relationships with young boys, and that tradition goes back a long way (13 inches, in fact).                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 176(8/7/03 12:28)Reply                                                                                   | Re: Gay Bishop <hr/> "The last Christian died on the cross" - Nietzsche. Modern Christians don't follow their own Book--some sects even allow female priests!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 572(8/7/03 17:57)Reply                                                                                        | That "something else" <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Barium Boy:Or does something else shape society and the individual? <hr/> I'm still trying to get a full understanding of that "something else". So far it seam to be belief. Some are making a great effort to perfect their reason and logic and escape faith and belief. Others show no respect for reason or logic and want to live by faith. |
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 358(8/7/03 18:09)Reply                                                                                   | -- <hr/> What is your preference?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 575
(8/7/03 18:19)
Reply

That "something else"

---

Quote:

---

G Shantz:
What is your preference?

---

At the present time I think only fools promote one or the other hoping to find the ultimate rest.
The truth is a constant painful oscillation in the middle. A bit like a sine wave. I'm just trying to figure out the significance of amplitude and frequency.
I was thinking to myself that perhaps everyone has their own resonant frequency so to speak. If the amplitude is too high the person's mind shatters like a glass so to speak.
These thoughts are new so I'm not quite clear yet.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 576
(8/7/03 18:43)
Reply

-----

---

What is your preference Mr Shantz?

MKFaizi
Registered User
Posts: 1003
(8/8/03 10:47)
Reply

Re: -----

---

I see virtually no difference between a homosexual bishop and a heterosexual bishop.

Faizi

prozak666
Registered User
Posts: 162
(8/8/03 11:39)
Reply

Re: -----

---

Yes, both need to be killed.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1347
(8/8/03 12:20)
Reply

Re: -----

---

By who?

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 360
(8/8/03 12:56 pm)
Reply

logic vs. belief

---

DEL asked:

Quote:

---

What is your preference Mr Shantz?

---

Well, I guess you could say that I have a belief that logical thought can make one enlightened. I won't know for certain that it will until I achieve it (enlightenment), so right now it's only a belief. The fact of logical thought underpinning all mind activities is a good reason to value logic. That is, if you want to be sane. If you don't want to be sane, then belief is a good way to go. Hey, why not believe that you're God? Or that your desk is? Makes about as much sense as anything else one could choose to believe.

I've heard about that vibration/frequency stuff, but I've never paid it much heed. Usually it has been women telling me about it too, oddly enough. :)

Gregory Shantz

[edited for greater clarity-GS]

Edited by: G Shantz at: 8/8/03 1:18 pm

prozak666

Registered User

Posts: 170

(8/9/03 5:05)

Reply

Re: logic vs. belief

---

By those who have the wit to do so.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 578

(8/9/03 8:22)

Reply

Sanity

---

Quote:

---

G Shantz:

That is, if you want to be sane. If you don't want to be sane, then belief is a good way to go. Hey, why not believe that you're God? Or that your desk is? Makes about as much sense as anything else one could choose to believe.

---

If you believed that your desk is God how would your behaviour differ from somebody who believed logic is God?

Quote:

---

G Shantz::

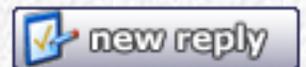

I've heard about that vibration/frequency stuff, but I've never paid it much heed. Usually it has been women telling me about it too, oddly enough. :)

---

Oh! Interesting. I thought I was alone with this new idea.
Where did you read/hear about this?

|                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| FiramirRegistered UserPosts: 2(8/9/03 8:26)Reply        | Gay Priest <hr/> A wise gay christian friend of mine once said "the church can live without the gay community, but not without Africa" I know it is not a political discussion but if the African church did seperate itself from the synod it would deal a hard and perhaps crippling blow to Anglican Christianity. |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 838(8/9/03 8:40)Reply | Re: Gay Priest <hr/> Quote: <hr/> "the church can live without the gay community, but not without Africa" I know it is not a political discussion but if the African church did seperate itself from the synod it would deal a hard and perhaps crippling blow to Anglican Christianity. <hr/> Why?     |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 179(8/9/03 11:53 am)Reply | Re: Gay Priest <hr/> Egypt have their own Pope. I think a lot of African nations do. Is that not separated from the Vatican enough? Yet the Vatican seems to be unharmed by it. Edited by: ynithrix at: 8/9/03 11:54 am                                                                                               |

|                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1131(8/9/03 11:58)Reply | Gay Priest <hr/> Prozak wrote, Quote: <hr/> Yes, both need to be killed...By those who have the wit to do so. <hr/> You talk a lot of shit, Prozak. Do it, or you are just another loudmouthed pussy that runs when shit gets hot. Tharan |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 181(8/9/03 12:20)Reply     | Re: Gay Priest <hr/> Why not go the full way--www.vhemt.org/.The 'wonders' of free speech seem not to end.                                                                                                                                                      |

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Gay Bishop

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1350(8/9/03 12:38)Reply | Re: Gay Priest <hr/> I don't think killing a bishop would be the wittiest thing to do, I wouldn't be seen dead near one.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| FiramirRegistered UserPosts: 8(8/11/03 6:20)Reply    | Oh dear <hr/> I think a couple of things need explaining. One, this debate has nothing to do with Roman Catholicism, they are not thinking of electing any gay bishops. It is about the Anglican synod, lead by Rowan Williams (the archbishop of canturbury) who are debating whether or not to elect openly gay bishops. Two, the african church has made it patently clear that if Gay Bishops are elected then it will leave the synod. As Anglicanism is growing fastest in Africa the west would be left on its own, perhaps to fade away. I hope this helps those of you thinking in the dark. |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| prozak666Registered UserPosts: 175(8/11/03 7:03)Reply  | Re: Oh dear <hr/> Killing Christians/Jews is rarely unwise, unless you get caught!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| wannabealotRegistered UserPosts: 15(8/11/03 15:04)Reply                                                                                | The Episopalian Gay Bishop <hr/> Science has already proven that male homosexuality is caused by too much testosterone in the womb during a critical stage of development of the male fetus - either from the mother being under stress or too many previous males being carried by the mother (enlightening about the quote about the seventh son of the seventh son in the bible, huh?). Anyway, male homosexuality is not a choice of the individual, but a condition into which he was born. Why would God disown someone who He created that way? |
| MortHandlesonRegistered UserPosts: 2(8/11/03 18:38)Reply                                                                               | Choices meet absolutes <hr/> This is an interesting topic as the absolute nature of doctrine is being challenged by popular sympathy. Homosexuality has become mainstream and unoffensive to many people and the people who are against it now must swim against that stream. It must be a powerful stream to have the religious right floating towards tolerance.                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 840(8/12/03 15:05)Reply                                                                              | Re: The Episopalian Gay Bishop <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Science has already proven that male homosexuality is caused by too much testosterone in the womb during a critical stage of development of the male fetus - <hr/> Surely you mean too little testosterone? And how could the previous sexes of offspring already born affect the                                                                                                                                                                                        | hormone status of the current fetus?

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 505

(8/12/03 21:45)

Reply

Re: The Episopalian Gay Bishop

---

Yep, the way I understood it, the relative presence of testosterone decides the relative male/femaleness of the brain regardless of gender, not sexuality.

Could you point us to something about this mulitple child thing coz I've never heard of that one.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 361

(8/13/03 10:24)

Reply

Re: Sanity

---

Quote:

---

G Shantz:

That is, if you want to be sane. If you don't want to be sane, then belief is a good way to go. Hey, why not believe that you're God? Or that your desk is? Makes about as much sense as anything else one could choose to believe.

DEL:If you believed that your desk is God how would your behaviour differ from somebody who believed logic is God?

---

If someone believed logic was God, ie. valued it highly, they would apply it to every facet of their existence and eventually become enlightened. Is it logical to have emotions? Is it logical to experience anxiety, lust, hate, fear or shame? No, it is not. Because these things are caused, they have nothing to do with us and only obscure our true natures, which are empty.

Quote:

---

G Shantz:

I've heard about that vibration/frequency stuff, but I've never paid it much heed. Usually it has been women telling me about it too, oddly enough. :)

DEL: Oh! Interesting. I thought I was alone with this new idea.
Where did you read/hear about this?

---

I have heard my mother and two other women mention vibrations and different speeds of this. I think things vibrating at different speeds make different things. I think it is a misunderstanding of a Buddhist conception, but I don't know much about Buddhism.

Gregory Shantz

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 111

(8/13/03 13:35)

Reply

Re: Gay Bishop

---

Quote:

---

If someone believed logic was God, ie. valued it highly, they would apply it to every facet of their existence and eventually become enlightened. Is it logical to have emotions? Is it logical to experience anxiety, lust, hate, fear or shame? No, it is not. Because these things are caused, they have nothing to do with us and only obscure our true natures, which are empty.

---

If our true natures are empty, wouldn't logic obscure them too? Logical thought is caused in the exact same way as anxiety, lust, hate, fear or shame.

The person known as Gregory Shantz is talking about the true nature of something else. Gregory Shantz is all caused and there's nothing illogical about his thoughts and feelings. It'd be illogical if he was that empty thing he's talking about, but he isn't.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 362

(8/16/03 13:52)

Reply

Re: Gay Bishop

---

My life had no beginning, nor does it have an ending, either. In fact, I'm not even alive. In fact, if you want to go even deeper, I'm not even writing this, because there is no 'Gregory Shantz' whose qualities we can absolutely define. He is whatever he is becoming at any given moment, whatever he is thinking about, that is what he is. He's a collection of appearances, a body, a mind, a pinecone. How do I know this for certain? By thinking about it logically.

Does that answer you question, Matheus?

I'm writing this in a park where it's quite peaceful. I was lightly disturbed, earlier, by a squirrel knocking pinecones out of a tree. All those thumping noises beside me, and not knowing what the cause was, was frightening, at first. When we know the cause, we have nothing more to fear.

One is all alone, in Enlightenment.

The good thing about enlightenment is that you can still do what you did before and enjoy it on a higher level

Greg

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1372

(8/16/03 18:55)

Reply

-

---

Gregory Shantz knows for certain that he is a pinecone by thinking about it logically.

G Shantz

Registered User

Posts: 363

(8/17/03 3:24)

Reply

--

---

Heh. Yeah, I stand by that.

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 1038
(8/22/03 12:07)

Reply

Re: --

---

I may have said this previously. If so, forgive me.

I don't give a shit about whether or not a bishop is gay. I don't give a shit whether or not the president of the United States is gay.

Faizi

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 1398
(8/22/03 13:13)

Reply

---

---

But surely you must feel for the bishops son or the presidents wife since the horror of gaiety is just so horrible.

drowden

Forum Host
Posts: 1349
(8/22/03 14:27)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Well, at the rate that the current American President is bugging things, he may as well be gay.

Dan Rowden

drowden

Forum Host
Posts: 1350
(8/22/03 14:27)

Reply

Re: ---

---

At the rate that the current American President is bugging things, he may as well be gay.

Dan Rowden

|                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| HywelRegistered UserPosts: 4(8/22/03 22:39)Reply   | Re: Gay Bishop <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Women priests. Great, great. Now there's priests of both sexes I don't listen to. Ha, fuck, I don't care. Have a hermaphrodite one. I don't fucking care. Have one with three dicks and eight titties. You know, have one with gills and a trunk, i might go to that meeting.Bill Hicks <hr/> I think this applies equally to homosexual priests. Hywel |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 79(8/3/04 5:44)Reply | Re: Gay Bishop <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

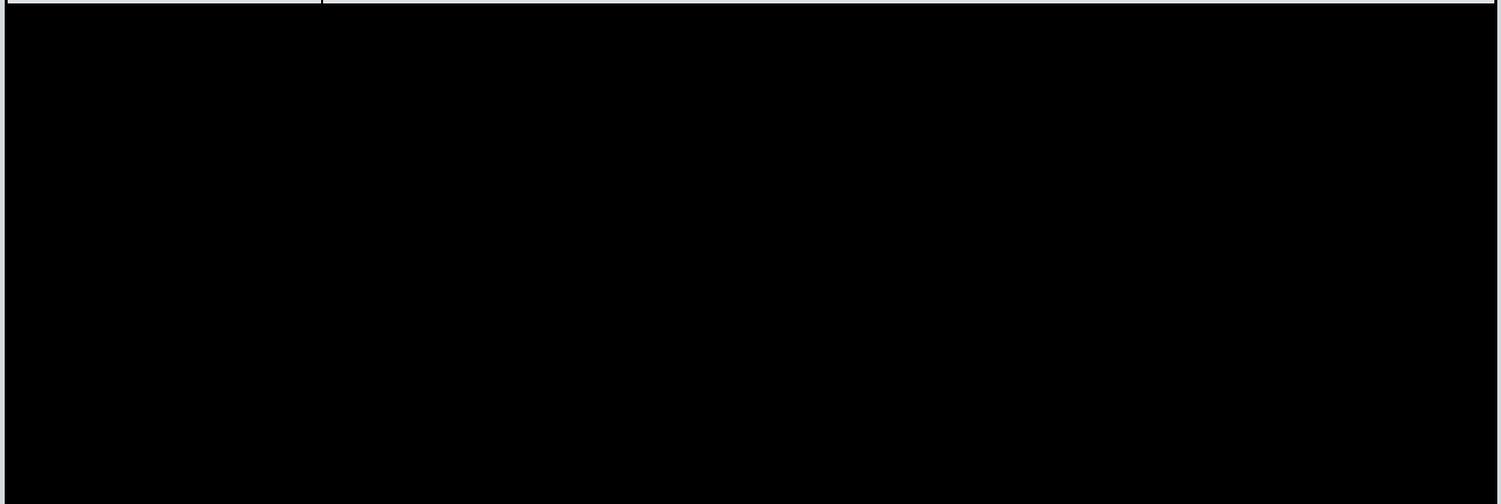

> Genius and the Gollum/Smeagol syndrome

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 944(1/26/04 7:49 am)Reply | Genius and the Gollum/Smeagol syndrome <hr/> The Genius never tells lies.He has no need to.You know that is true.On consideration I'll take it further.The Genius cannot lie.Only stupid and clever people tell lies.Sometimes they are stupid.Sometimes they are clever.Ah! The answer cannot be stupid or clever.The last time you lied you thought you were clever.The last time you lied you realised you were stupid.The last time you told the truth you felt justified.The last time you told the truth you regretted it.Ah! The answer cannot be in truth or lies.Everyone around me is a closed system.I am a closed system to everyone around me.I opened up and nobody liked what was inside.They opened up and I didn't like what was inside any of them.Ah! The answer cannot be open or closed.You cannot attain Genius by effort.Genius comes to you at the very point that your efforts are exhausted.Ah! How do I sustain the optimum level of exhaustion?Are you saying the answer is a question? |

|                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 181(1/26/04 9:33 am)Reply                                                                                    | ...<hr/> No, the answer is that the genius doesn't give a fuck about sustaining the optimum level of exhaustion.                                                                                                                              |
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 181(1/26/04 9:39 am)Reply                                                                                    | ...<hr/> Unless he cares about sustaining the optimum level of exhaustion. :P                                                                                                                                                                 |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 949(1/26/04 6:37 pm)Reply                                                                                       | -----<hr/> Something must be sustained.For every action there is an equal an opposite reaction. No?                                                                                                                                       |
| Naturyl Registered UserPosts: 110(1/26/04 6:44 pm)Reply | Re: -----<hr/> I think it's a pretty good piece. You don't gain insight until your eyes close in frustration and you stop looking outward. After all, it's insight, not oversight.Shit, I just made that up. Not bad. Not bad at all. |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 952(1/26/04 6:47 pm)Reply                                                                                       | -----<hr/> Very good.                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 469
(1/27/04 12:06 am)
Reply

Re: -----

---

*I am a closed system to everyone around me.
I opened up and nobody liked what was inside.
They opened up and I didn't like what was inside any of them.
Ah! The answer cannot be open or closed.*

Well I hope you don't give up trying. Eventually you may work out how to communicate the truths you sense, so that others feel inclined to like you. IMO, the fact that you used the word 'like' indicates that you have not yet grasped ultimate truth as yet, it is clouded. At least you have more sense of what being alive is than most other people.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2131
(1/27/04 12:51 am)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

The Genius cannot lie

---

.
This line which isn't true, should be changed to 'the genius cannot lie to himself'

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 659
(1/27/04 4:00 am)
Reply

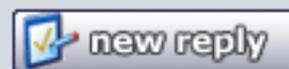

Re: ---

---

I like that, Del.

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 27(1/27/04 7:31 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Ah! The answer cannot be in truth or lies. <hr/> oh the glorious tales i toldwoven with lovely liesthe truth makes my storyuntold as i close mymouth and die |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2135(1/27/04 11:15 am)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> The last bit should be, "-as I clear the edge, and fly."                                                                                                                                                           |
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 28(1/27/04 5:13 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> thats cool                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

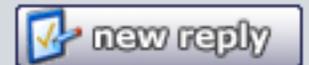

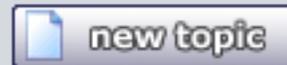

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> genius country

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 39(2/19/04 12:54 pm)Reply | genius country <hr/> genius country2004.1.142004.1.8 I am thinking on the train :) I think about the next years, first, the stupifying system which build by Mao Zedong have already be smashed by me, I only need to spread my articles, this will be done half an year later, and this revolution will take peacefully, as it only need thinking. China will surely become the strongest country, as Marxism and Nietzsche's thinking are merged now. My thinking will not only change China, but also the whole human. Weininger's thinking haven't take effect yet, so, second, I will research woman problem more deep, why female geniuses are hide. The third thing i do is change the whole human by my thinking, this need to know foreigner and foreign countries, so i will go abroad. After all of these things done, I can pursue my next dream: become a physicist :) Except drink milk everyday(so your head won't be tired), keep drink one small mouth of water frequently(so your head won't become heat). One policy we need to apply is forbid tobacco planting. 2004.1.9Reading "Anthropological Linguistics: An Introduction".==== Good examples of articulate knowledge are our knowledge of street names or the causes of the Russian Revolution. Good examples of tacit knowledge |

are how to drive a car or how to speak a language. Tacit knowledge does not take the form of logically connected chains of reasoning; its structure is perhaps most clearly manifested in the act of understanding: the creative grasping together of disjointed parts into a comprehensive whole.

==

Tao can't tell to you directly as it is a whole. Study articulate knowledge, learn tacit knowledge.

We should add the computer games course in the senior high school, so they won't play computer games everyday after come to the university.

"It is well established by now that humans belong to the class of animals called apes, our closest living relative being the chimpanzee, with which we share some 98 per cent of our genes". So, the difference of genes between genius and the normal people should be very small, such as 0.1%, but this is already very big difference.

genius country!

After more and more people accepted my thinking, a genius country will build up naturally.

In the genius country, spiritual things all are free, such as software, GNU/Linux have already done this work, books are freely available on the Internet, and most people read books on the computer.

High education will be free as in Germany, the present China education is too expensive, to learn, we only need a computer connect to the Internet.

After more and more country become genius country, the earth are unified.

Why i never feel alone or boring? Because i am thinking, i am learning.

2004.1.10

I am sure my thinking will make geniuses won't be hide anymore. Most geniuses I acquainted only play computer games for four years in the university, then they will be hide in the society. I will tell each of them that you are a genius, then they know what to do in their whole life.

I think about why i am so wise. It should have some relation to hereditary, as both my father and mother are very clever, although both of them are hide in the society. Then, is it possible to make others as wise as me? No, genius is by born.

China is really a animal farm. I mean the people i see in the railway station are really animals.

Except genius and genius killer, there exists many normal people, the reborn of human is inevitable, the normal people is very weak on intelligence and will, I think their morality is weak too, their morality is only normal no-danger animal morality. The difference between superman and normal human become very big now.

We don't kill them, just separate from them is OK, now this is happening as the separation between city and village, but this is not enough. We need to build a genius country, it consist by the elite of the whole human on the earth. Or, another way, we need to limit their propagation.

Nietzsche predicated the first superman's born, now, i predicate the human's reborn.

Limit their propagation is the better way.

I know it is hard for you to understand my thinking, but superman can understand me, more and more supermen will born, the superman is full of love, but ruthless as the same time.

I am different from hitler, I don't advocate war, I have the highest morality, i am full of love.

The key is whether genius have some relation with heredity.

What is the value of animals? They can't create any spiritual things, presently they can create physical things, but superman can create more, especially as the science developed. So animal will disappear at last, it is inevitable.

We should focus on make more and more supermen born first, we needn't pay attention on animals.

I get home in the afternoon, i have see the snow on the travel :)

Human's stupid astonished me, normal people can't understand my philosophy at all, just like they can't understand Einstein's relativity :_) I think about male genius killer and normal female genius killer again, my view point are surely right, I think about the female genius killer, I confirmed this too, because she really stopped Zhang Yong from thinking, i chat with Zhang Yong last night, his design decision on LinQ get wrong again and again, he must waste much time to realize it, but my opinion was right at the beginning.

I won't wait the stupid people to accept my thinking, I will put my philosophy into practice in the next years, build a company, first, make geniuses can gain the living, second, build a university, third, build a research center, fourth, extend my company to worldwide. Money is collected as the genius foundation. Then, the earth is changed by me.

In the next semester i can make many pdf files which collect the books that can help you to understand my thinking.

To limit animals' propagation, we can do this: if they only have one child, we will support their living. their children are given the same education too, because their children are still possible be a genius. To ourselves, two children is the best.

One thing, don't despise normal people, or i despise you. We are animals too, it is only we have many things that they don't have.

We should do our best to help them, except their propagation.

To talk with others is so hard, they can't understand my thinking and my plane at all, it have no difference to make a animal to understand human.

Normal people is animal to me at all now as they only need to alive, all learning are not in their world at all, they can't sense the love any more, only care for money.

Enlighten human, can you understand me? Human are being animals, can you understand me? Our responsibility is so big, we need to devote our whole life on this work.

Why i want to enlighten human? because i love human. Am i saying these words indignantly? No, I say these words full of love and misery. Do you know how miserable life that normal people are leading? Especially they can't sense their miserable at all.

What is needed by a infant? love and things to learn, as he/she needn't worry about the living. Human have the ability to needn't worry about living now, what we need is love and learning. Don't forget your original nature.

Unlike Nietzsche, I needn't wait for 100 years for the next people to understand my thinking, every genius at the age of about 20 can understand me, but you need to keep thinking to fellow my thinking.

I think fear blood is not a psychology defect, but as a indication of love human. I don't fear the blood of animals, or the blood in the computer games (quake3). I fear the blood shedding on the body of people. A article describe the blood meticulously can make me very fear too. I still remember in the senior high school, Xiao Xiangnv's dairy about the blood when swimming have touched my heart, i imagine it and fear it very much. My successor should fear blood too.

I love my father, my mother and my younger brother, love is connected by heart, now it is very easy to connect the heart to my mother and young brother, but my heart is hard to connect to my father, my father begin to lost the heart in the last one year because of gambling.

I can just see the reality, I can determine whether you are a human or animal, a genius or a genius killer, just by the photo. I view your photo as a whole.

I am the first superman? I think i am just the first human.

Communicate to your father, although it seems unable to communicate at all at first, continue, then you will discover his wisdom, and your heart is connected with him at last. Your father's wisdom can help you very much.

We misunderstand each other because lack communication.

How to determine whether you started your thinking? Once started, you can never stop.

Develop your ability to get on well with every type of people, you can gain the wisdom from them and by get on with them.

Everyone share some thing with animal, the superman is just have those things nearly disappeared at last, Weininger get this too: "There are few people who do not have one or more animal faces; and those animals which they look like, also resemble them in behavior".

Beautiful girl is just more human than other girls.

On boy it is the same, but most people's view point is not very right, and boy often only become handsome after grown up. Andersen's "The Ugly Duckling" described this.

Superman is just a complete human. May be i should use superhuman now, as there are superwoman too, the female genius.

I think Jiang Qin is a female genius, her achievement is very good in the senior high school, and she is very beautiful, but her smile looks a little wooden, just as I look very drowsily at the same time.

Oh, yes, it is not strange, animals' life are really not miserable to themselves, I understand now, I never need to save human, or save animals :
_) I just lead my life with my girl, yes, this is doing nothing.

2004.1.12

Real genius won't be hide. Nietzsche have done the work of make genius won't go mad, Weininger have done the work of make genius won't commit suicide.

I am the first superman, the first genius that can lead happy life.

Genius is by born, i think genius is hereditary as talent too. If a male genius make love with a female genius, their children should be geniuses. In the history, many male genius didn't get married or committed suicide, they didn't have children. Most male genius didn't marry with a female genius, but a woman with many genes of animal(ugly woman or stupid woman), so their children are not geniuses. So, what need to do? I think i should try to acquaint many beautiful girls, make love with them, our children should be geniuses. I know those girls love me and are willing to make love with me too as they are seeking me too. male genius find female genius at last.

The renaissance of China is inevitable, the reborn of human is inevitable.

Hu Jingtao is handsome, i trust him :_)

Nietzsche is handsome, Weininger is handsome, yes, we are common on this, because, male genius is handsome, female genius is beautiful.

I discovered the secret of genius :_)

Human understand human at last :)

In normal case, i will get married with a girl, but according to my thinking, i should have children with more girls, will my action make normal boys have no girl? i think it should haven't much effect, as genius is very seldom.

Is genius really hereditary? Anyway, I should practice too. I know the geniuses who accepted my thinking will think so too. This is one principle of the genius religion. Yes, Richard Stallman get the same idea as me too:"I believe in love, but not monogamy".

The superman should have more children, this is required by evolution. In the history, normal people have many children, the people who is wise, whose intelligence, morality, will are much better than normal people just have no child or less child, this is the reason why human stopped evolution in quality, this is the reason why genius is so seldom. We should change our old, wrong tradition.

Oh, polygamy is not a new thing, Chinese tradition was just polygamy. Yes, this is the good thing in Chinese tradition, completely renounce Chinese tradition is wrong. This can explain why Chinese is a very wise people too.

Absorb the good things of western countries, remain the good things of Chinese tradition. I know my philosophy is really merged western philosophy and Chinese traditional ideology.

Animal morality is only for alive, it is good in most case, but, once you want to do something surmount alive, it become your obstacle, so i ask you to develop your morality to the superman morality.

Animal wisdom is only for alive too.

Have you get to see human are being animals? Do you find what you need to do in your whole life? We can't make animal become human, but their children are not animals, we should do our best to prevent their children from become animals.

Every child should given education, we need to done this.

Human don't despise animals, only some animals despise other animals.

You needn't try to make animals understand you, listen to them and nod is OK. Keep silence, smile and thinking, animals' affairs are non-sense at all, while your thinking is unimaginable at all to them too.

I am going to build a big company several years later, put my philosophy ideology into practice, achieve a genius country like ideal society. If you want to join, you can study my philosophy thinking, absorb the mental effort which i give you, train your body, become good at English, study Linux, build your personal society, read the books which i recommended to you, write essay, recall your childhood, train the ability of meditation, etc. :
_) I am not dreaming, you know i am both good at the humanities and the science, and acquainted many geniuses(most of them play games everyday in the university) who have nothing to do, and i am a psychologist by born. have no problem of manage, hehe, you can see these things too, i am archiving this life plan step by step :) I am writing the book "Genius Country" to build the business manage theory presently.

æ^'â††â††â†† â¹'â•ŽâŠžâ, €ä, ºâ¤šâ... -â•, i¼CEâ°†æ^'çš,,â"²â-lâ½"ç³»æŠ•â...
¥â®žè-µi¼CEâ®žçŽ°â¤©æ%•â½²è^-çš,,ç•†æf³ç¤¾¾¾¼š¼CEé€ ç!•â... "â°ç
±»ã€€,â!,æžœä½ æf³âŠ â...¥i¼CEâ°±â-lâ¹ æ^'çš,,â"²â-læ €•æf³i¼CEâ•,æ"¶æ^'ç»™ä½ çš,,ç²¾ç¥žâŠ>é†•i¼CE"»ç,¼è°«â½"i¼CEç²¾é €šè<±è^-i¼CEâ-lâ¹ Linuxi¼CEâ¶¶â½œä, ºâ°â,»é¡µi¼CE~...è^-»æ^'æŽ"è••çš
,,â¹i¼CEâ†™éš•ç-»i¼CEâ>žâ¡†ç«¥â¹ i¼CEâÝâ...»æ²%æ€•çš,,èf½âŠ>ç-% ç-%o :_) æ^'â-â,•æ~â•šæç!â"i¼CEâ¡°æœ-æ•¥â°±æ-†ç•†â...¼é€š¼CEè® ¤è-†â, €â¤šâ, ®æ²¡â°â•šçš,,â¤©æ%•(â¾^â¤šâœ"â¤šâ-lé†CEâ¤â ¤©çŽ©æ,,æ^•)i¼CEæ^'â^æ~â¤©ç"Ýçš,,â¡fç•†â-lâ®¶i¼CEç®¡ç•†æ²¡é—®é ç~i¼CEâ'µâ'µi¼CEâ½ ä¹Ýâ-â»¥çœ<â°i¼CEæ^'æ-fâ, €æ-¥â, €æ-¥âœ°â®žçŽ °ç•€è¡™ä, ºâ°ç"Ýè®¡â" :) ç>®â%•æ^'æ-fâœ"â†™ã€Šâ¤©æ%•â½²ã€<â, €ä!æ•¥è¡è¡CEâ¼â,šç®¡ç•†çš,,ç•†è®â»è®¾ã€,

I think about how to guarantee geniuses can earn the living in the society for hours. This need to gain money at first, to gain money, build a company is best, then expand our company to every field, i still don't know how to earn money most efficiently, i think it is just because i still lack the society experiences, so, i should not think about this at first, just learn everything, then our company will surely defeat other companies, as our company is consist by geniuses, and we are fully learned. Step by step, let's learn everything at first.

I have to trust my thinking, because it is out by reasoning.

What earn money at most? New technique, so learn everything, then we can develop new techniques. I know how to earn money at last :_) Genius is good at creating new things, undoubtedly, we are confident on this :)

What wrong? I begin to pursue money :_) This is easy to understand, my pursue money is different from others, yes, there is a famous sentence: first, see mountain, it is mountain, second, see mountain, it is not mountain, third, see mountain, it is still mountain. Good, now i pursue money as others now.

Our company will be larger than IBM :) After gain enough money, we can begin to build the genius country, genius country is not a country on a island, but the whole earth. So the earth is unified. And, the earth will be unified peacefully.

Then, we start to explore the universe.

Genius country company! How cool it is :_)

€CEç°çâ, 1/2â•â...¬â•, æœ%œâ•-ç^±çš,,ç%œ1ç, 1, â¾4®è1/2-â...¬â•, æ¾3/4ç
„¶æ~æf³â»°ç««ä, €ä, ä, •â>1/2, ä, •è; †èš, èš•çª•æœ%œâ¥1/2ä, •â®1æ~“â»°èµ•æ•¥â•
`èç«ä°°ä, €è,,šè, ©âž®çš,,â•±é™©, é†`â±±â~>, è´çä, »çš,,æf³æ³•, è±ªæ°æ—
©â°±è; †æ—¶ä°†, MPlayerâ¼€â•´ç», „æœ%œä, Šç™³/4â••é»`â®ç, ä½ æ €žæ~â¹æ%œ<, ç°çæ—ä, €çœ<â°±çÿÿé•“æ~æf³é• æ”¿â°œâ...»,
â••â°°é†â>ççš,,â•±è ¥æ~â¿...ç,,¶çš,,i¼CEæœ%œç, 1æ-†â-|ç´ â...»çš,,é½çÿÿ
¥é•“â••â°°é€šâ,, é½æ~èç«æ%œ“è ¥, â½“ç,,¶, æ^`â»¬è¶...â°°â°±ä, •â•CEâ°† :
_)

æ^`â»¬â...¬â•, è´è¿™çš•æ †è-: ç|•æ-ççš•æ•ççfÿè•%œã€, èµšé´±çš,,æ¹æ³•æ^`â¹ÿæf³â†°æ•¥â°†, ä, •è; †â...^ä, •â`Šè-%œä½ , ä½œä, °â•†â, šæœ°â-†, â...¶â®žâ²ç»•â`Šè-%œä½ ä°†, ä, •è; †ä½ æ²¿æœ%œæ „•è-†â°.

Weininger: "Art creates, science destroys the sensory world; that is why the artist is erotic and sexual, the scientist asexual. Optics destroys light", this can be unified, as scientist can be artist too now, being sexual and asexual at the same time.

æ^`â-œæ¬ççš,,è•:

ä°°ä¹<â•, æ€šæœ¬â-,, æ€šç>, è¿´, ä¹ ç>, è¿œ. Human nature is good by born.

âç`â®¶çš,,â...¼ç^±. Love human.

â±âžÿ: ä, ¾ä, -çš†æµšæ^`ç<¬æ, ...i¼CEâ¼—ä°çš†é†°œæ^`ç<¬é†’. I can understand his words. Only genius can understand genius.

ç”ÿä°žâ¿šæ, £, æ-»ä°žâ®%œä¹•. I always remember this words in my heart, it tell you keep thinking.

â-|è€CEæ—¶ä¹ ä¹<, ä, •ä°è¬`â¹ž? â-|, study, ä¹, learn. â•¬ä, -â½²ä°°â•´æ—

©â¿~â°†â-|ä, žä¹ çš,,âCEâ°â«„ä»¥ä, °â-|â¹ âªæ~â-|, æœ€è¿´`æ%œ•æ••â†°è†ªâ-|çš „æ¹, â¿µ, ä¹ÿâ°±æ~â¹ .

æœ%œæœ<è†ªè¿œæ¬¹æ•¥, ä, •ä°è¹â¹ž? â•©æ%œ•é½1/2â¿¿ä°œæœ<â•<, ä½†ä, • herd together, æ%œ€ä»¥"è†ªè¿œæ¬¹æ•¥".

é”™: error, è¬: mistake.

æ— æf...æ~ ruthless, ä, •æ~ nolove.

make love æ~æœ%œé•“ç•†çš,, â•©æ%œ•æ,,ÿâ•—â¾—â†°æ•¥. to è¬ `æ~žâ°†ç”•æ€šçš,,ä, »âš`æ€š.

ç%œ©æž•â¿...â••. è¿™æ~ä, -â½²æœ€æ±çš,,ä, €â•¥è•.

é¿°â...¶è†ªç,,¶. è¿™æ~æ^`çš,,è¿CEâš`âžÿâ™, ä¹ÿæ~æ^`ä, €ç>´â¹èš, çš „âžÿâ» .

â½>â®¶âçç•CE: çœ<â±±æ~â±±, çœ<â±±ä, •æ~â±±, çœ<â±±è¿~æ~â±±.

â-|è€CEä, •æ€•â™ç½”i¼CEæ€•è€CEä, •â-|â™æ®†. ä, €è¬¬â°°â-|â°†â°
±æ~â, •æ€•, â¾â°šâ°ç»•â,, æ€•â•´æ~æ²¿æœ%œâ-i¼CEé½1/2â•ÿâ•šâ° è; TMä, rç, 1çš,, ä°ä° 'ä1<â•^â° 'ã€, ä, €ä±<ä, •æ%«ä1/2•ä»¥æ%«â¤@ä, <. ä°•â®æ‡†CEâžfâœ¾4èç<ä, €ç> 'æ~æ^'âž»æ%»çš,, :_) ä... ¶â®žæ^'æœ€æ‡†', ä, »è!•æ~â^«ä°é f1/2ä, •æ %»æ^'æ%•æ%» :)

æ•žç™1/2: â¤@ç»'ÿæ^'æ%•â;...æœ%ç»'. ä1/2 ä1ÿçÿÿé•«è‡â±æ~æ%•, ä°-ç
¤¾4ä14šâ¥1/2âf•âœ°'â'Sè-°ä1/2 ä1/2 æ2;æœ%ä»€ä1^ç»'â¤,, ä, •è; ‡ç>, ä; ;è; TMâ• ¥è-, ç>»â1æ2;æœ%é»™.
æ—©é¤•â•fè¥±, ä, -é¤•â•fâ¥1/2, æ™šé¤•â•fâ°'. ä1/2'ç,, ¶, è!â•fæ—©é¤•â¾4
—âÿ1â...»â‡°æ—©èµ•çš,, ä1 æf-, è!èffâ•fâ¥1/2â°±è!ç>»â,, é»ç, 1/4è«ä1/2'.
éçœâ•â, •è; •æ€'ä°žç%©. ä'µâ'µ, æ^'â¾4æ—©â°±æ~žç™1/2è; TMé«ç•†â°†, ä1ÿâ°±æ~ä, •â µæ°°.
æ^'ä, •ç»ÿæ°°. æ^'ä1ÿæ~, ä'µâ'µ, ä, •è; ‡è; TMâ•æ~æ^'ä1/2œä, °ä, €ä, °â•â-©æ—¶çš,, çš¶æ€•, â!, æžœä1/2 è¶šâ°†ç•CE, ä1/2 ä°±ä1/4šâ•çž°æ^'â•æ^'â°†ä, €ä, °è¶...ä°°, ä1ÿâ°±æ~é—°ç»µ, ä14šâ•â°†é>éœ†â1^â°•.
æµ•ç°ç™¾4â••, æœ%â®1ä1fâ¤š.
â¤šè¾4@ä, •è€€. ä; °çš,, è-æ~çœÿç•†, ä1/2 ä, •è; TMæ •è® ¤ä, °æ^'ä1ÿä, •ä14šâž»è•ÿä1/2 è¾4©, è‡â°±â¤šçœ<ç, 1ä1â-1âž».

æ%°1è-, :
â¤@â°†é™•â¤šä»»ä°žæ~ä°°ä1ÿ, ä;...â...è<â...¶â;fâ;—, äšâ...¶ç-<é°, é ¥;ä...¶â1/2"è,¤. ä, •è!â, °â•¶â°°ä, §â¤±â;fâ;—, ä1/4, â°•è°«ä1/2', ä¾4—èffç—
...ç-%œ%¾4ç•†ç»±, è°«ä1/2'æ~é•©â1/2çš,, æœ-é'±.
â...^â¤@ä, <ä1^â;§è€CEâ;§, ä°žâ¤@ä, <ä1^â1•è€CEä1•. ä, •çÿÿé•«æ~âç fç•CEä, •â¤ÿé«è;~æ~æœ%ç, 1â•‡, çœÿæ-fä»¥â¤@ä, <ä, °â±â»»çš,, ä°°æ~ä, €ç> ä;§, ä1ÿâ°±æ~ä, €ç>'âœ°æ€•è€f, ä1/2†ä»¥ä1•ä, °ä, »), ä° ä, °ä»— â¾4è‡â;ä; , ä, €â1/4€âš<â°±â•â»¥æfâ°â¤@ä, <ä1^çš,, âœ°é•ç, è€CEä, 'ç>, ä; ;è
, -â®šâ14šâ®žçž°, æ%€â»¥ä1ÿæ~ä, €ç>'â1•, ä; §â1•âœ°ä»—è°«ä, šæ~ç>ÿä, €çš,, çž°â1/2ç>'ç »ç©¶â-1é—®çš,, ä, %âçfç•CE1/4CEâ€œæ~â¤œè¥;éžâ‡çç
šæ 'i1/4CEç<-ä, šé«~æ¥1/4i1/4CEæœ>â°1/2â¤@æ¶-è-â€•i1/4CEæ-¤â...¶â, €i1/4â
€œè;fâ, |æ, •â®1/2ç>^ä, •æ, 'i1/4CEä, °ä1/4šæ¶^â¾4—â°°æ†'æ, ^â€•i1/4CEæ-¤â...
¶â°CEi1/4â€œä1/4—é‡CEâ-»ä»-â•fç™¾4â°i1/4CEè'ç,, ¶â»žé!-i1/4CEé, fâ°°â•
'âœ°ç•-ç>«é'ç>šâ¤,, â€•æ-¤â...¶â, %â€€, â-1é—®ç »ç©¶â®CEâ°†â°±â°°è-
¥â1/4€âš<æ>|æ€€€ä; ;ä;fâœ°âž»â®žè-µâ°†, âœ°â®žè-µä, -è; >ä, €æ-¥â®CEâ-
, ç•†è®°.
æ>æ¾4ä, œ: ä, žâ¤@æ—i1/4CEâ...¶â1•æ—ç©•i1/4ä, žâœ°æ—i1/4CEâ...¶â1•æ
—ç©•i1/4ä, žâ°°æ—i1/4CEâ...¶â1•æ—ç©•i1/4â¤šâœ°â'CEâ¤@ç©°âœ°æ^'çš
,, â°2â-1ä1/2"ç>»ä, -æ~æœ%â¾4é«çš,, âœ°ä1/2çš,, ä1ÿæ~æ^'â»-çš
,, äš°é‡•æ°•æ¾4. ä°°ä, žâ°°ä1^é—'â°°è-¥ç>, ä°°â•ç^±.
ç‡é>€â®%çÿÿé, ;é1,, ä1^â;—i1/4 æ€žâ1^èf1/2è1/2»èš†è-ÿè‡â°±ä, €èµ•é;ä
âšçš,, ä1/4™â1/4', è; TMçš•â°â•æ~ä, €æ—¶â¤è,, 'â•çf-, è; ‡ä, €éµâ°±â¤±è ¥â°†, æ2;æœ%æ^'çš,, "Try to be lonely as me, try to be individual as me.

Be a eagle hover in the air, don't be a sparrow in the many other sparrows" á øfç•Æé«~.

è´çøÿè`•á¼€á¼€æ~æœ€á½çš,,èšfá†³æ-¹æ³•, æ”á!,á‡ ä,ª•Æá-!é—®á½ æ~ä,•æ~á-¹á½¹æœ%œ,,•æ€•á‘€,,á!,æžœä½ è´ä,•æ~ä»-ä»-á°
±á•-ä»¥ç-‘ä½ á•Šáœ©ä°†, æ%œ€ä»¥á¹²è,,†è´"æ~á‘€", ä»-ä»-á°±æ²;è´è-
´ä°†, á••æ-£ç;®á®žæ~æœ%œç,¹á-œæ¬çá½¹ :_)

Tell the true words of your heart often be the best solution, such as several friends ask you whether you have some affection to her, if you say no, then they can laugh around you for several days, so you can just say "yes", then they have no words to say, anyhow, you really a little like her :_) æf³æè´á°Šä,Šá•‘ç”ÿæ€šá...³ç³»ä,»è!•æ~æ-²æœ», æf³è!•á ¥ç;ªæè°«è¼¹æ~á-œæ¬ç, æf³è!•á½è·ÿä½ ç”ÿä,ªá-©á•æ%œ•æ~ç^±.

Want to have sexual relations with her on the bed is mainly the sexual desire, want her sleep by you is like, want her borne a child for you is love.

I think milk and water is better than tea, which Nietzsche recommended. I don't like tea presently.

Why we all these philosophers care for the food and drink so much?
Because we know we have to think non-stop in the whole life.

Weininger know physiognomy too. "All that a man does is physiognomical of him" -- Carlyle.

The female genius killer seek the genius who think woman is just only for cooking. The normal female genius killer seek the genius who think woman is weak and need his protection. Man and woman is not the same, but i respect them as equally, so i can gain the true love. There is no stronger or weaker between Yang and Yin.

Your environment is not good? Never wait it to become good. Even you can't change the whole environment, you can easily change your environment. The best environment you imagined is not good too, there have no good or bad environment, as all of us are in the same big environment.

Never pity yourself. Superman won't pity you.

Our company will often devote money to help education.

We needn't advertisement, my legend and my books are enough.

Everyone can find Americas, but only Columbus find it, when you think it is just so so, he ask you how to make the egg stand up on the desk, all of you don't know, he stand the egg up by a little break it, then all of you know, but it is not just so so. Nietzsche say god is dead, i say i am the god. Christianity is smashed by us at last.

Genius feel not easy when wear the army clothe and stand together with others.

I look at the television, the bad man who do crime, look fierce to you, to me, they are only beaster.

Linus like drink wine too :_)

Zhang Yong have developed several softwares in the university as me too, but unlike me, he didn't build a personal website and record his ago. So Nietzsche say Napoleon is between not-human and superman.

If you think woman is just only for cooking, you can only build a small company as a family. In the big company, men and women work together.

Now the design of my company is very like IBM now, as do many kinds of business, support education, research science, but we will be higher, as i require you to learn everything, not only become a expert. And, yes, you can find we are higher than IBM in every field, anyway, i am a philosopher, this is not strange :_)

If our company become too big, will it become monopoly and stop economics' development? No, as we will always insist on the spirit of "Open Source".

If we insist on open source, we will can't earn many money at first, but we should have no problem to gain living, just like IBM support Linux and open source too. What will happen several years later? If Linux have no game softwares, we develop the open source games, people can download it, we can earn some money by sell CD-ROM or sell traditional version. What will happen when Linux have all the softwares that you need and freely available? Microsoft company will bankrupt! We destroyed the software economics, but software will develop more fast! We can't earn money by spiritual things, even we don't develop free software, no one can stop GNU/Linux's development. Now only the physical products can earn money. OK, i go out and visit some people first.

I know no one would like to teach me any more once talked to me. This boy sit there bod and smile for one hour, i have already say these words for several times and begin to have no words to say, but he seems would like to nod and smile to you for another several hours. It is lucky he stand up with the smiling face at last :_)

Listen to animal waste time :)

I find i become a idiot now, only know nod feebly, smile occasionally for no reason.

I love my mother, she love her son even he become a idiot, follow him and take care of him when her son only know nod.

Tears are in my eyes, always in my eyes.

I find i can't say i will never commit suicide with the strong will now. I need to find some human, and let my tears flow down.

I start to forget everything, what is genius country?

Tears.

This is my fate.

I go out, i am laughing while crying, tears flow down at last, the eyes are a little sting by the tears, i doubt that there have blood mixed in the tears.

Then i meet a woman, and get to know she want to introduce prostitution to me. Too interesting, Kierkegaard have the experience of try prostitution, which helped his thinking's development very much. I become a innocent boy instantly, just like a child can stop crying and start to smile instantly. We chat for a while and I pay a little money, she introduce a girl to me at last. Surely a not beautiful girl, i walk with her and talk for half an hour, it haven't much thing, then i return home. Prostitution is the most animal form life.

I become complete normal now. Don't worry me, i am surely will never commit suicide or go mad, you know, i just intend to taste those experiences by the strongest emotion, but my head will always be reasoned, so i can develop my thinking and completely understand Buddha, Jesus, Lao Tze, Chuang Tsu, Van Gogh etc. :_)

OK, I go sleep now, then continue think about genius country company tomorrow :_)

I lie on the bed and think for hours in the middle night. I get these things. In fact, i have already be higher than any sage in the history, i can use my thinking to explain other people's words, but this is not very important, as mine is already the highest. What i get? Genius is just more humanly, and it is hereditary. My gene should be the best, if i make love with the humanly girl, our children will be genius too. So what i need to do is try to make love and have children with girl. Girls will be willing to have children with me, the only hindrance is the law. I can use my wisdom to cheat others, yes, i have to do this, but i cheat them to the right way, i will cheat boys that i will build a company and ask them learn eagerly first, i will cheat girls to make love with me. In fact, i don't want to cheat them, it is only because make them understand my thinking is too slow and make trouble to me. Other boys, whose gene is not as good as me, even understand this, will still don't want to agree with this, they may would like to kill me. Why i become so fond of propagation while all sages haven't much interest on this? I only do things according to my thinking, and my thinking is surely right.

To me, philosophy is terminated, although many others will surely still research philosophy for fun. There is only science left.

I only get a simple idea, the man who have better gene should have more children, which the most wise people himself just haven't understand.

Philosophy is ridiculous, what is philosophy?

I am a little tired now, sleep...

2004.1.14

One thing about the software company, if i use some money to build a company and develop free software, we can't earn money, but, we can make many big companies bankrupt, then both of us have no money to earn, but, we, geniuses, developed our ability and we can do other things. By don't earn money, we earn all the money, this is do nothing, done everything.

All pure software companies will bankrupt.

I think for hours, what should i do? I know, my thinking will change the whole human, but this change is too big.

I don't want to think about the company presently, as i know i don't want to be a boss, i only want to be a normal people. Now i need love very much, breath is hard to me.

I understand Nietzsche, think violently for tens of years, and Weininger, that devoted all of his love, then have to commit suicide, as he can't get love from others. Nothing, i won't, i know i can gain love from girls, then i can regain my strongest will.

It is surely nothing, my will is always within me :_) I can lead the happiest life in my whole life :) I have so many things to enjoy, so many things to learn :)

What is ultimate reality? Every people share some portion of animals, genius is humaner.

I sleep and think, build a company to earn many money is impossible. I get a idea and start to laugh :) What will i do in my later life? I will develop free software, i won't earn money by develop software, i think it is immoral. I will write books, i think don't give my book to others freely is immoral too. I will research physics and many learnings, but i don't want to stay in a university, earn living by it, and get the diploma is too much a trouble to me, i like walk in the society. It seems i must starve into death, it is lucky that I have strong body, i am very handsome and have very charming temperament, so i am going to earn living by prostitution, beautiful girl can be cheaper :_)

æ^'â††â††â»¥â•Žâ¼€â•'è†ªç"±è½-ä»¶,æ^'ä,•æf³é€šè;†â¼ €â•'è½-ä»¶èµšé'±,â ä,°æ^'è®âä,°è;™æ~ä,•é•"â¼çš,,æ^'â¼šç»§ç»- â†™ä¹, æ^'è§%â¼—è†ªâ±â†™çš,,ä¹ä,•â...è
¹æ••â¼ç»™â^«äººâ¹ÿæ~ä,•é•"â¼çš,,æ^'â¼šç"ç©¶ç%©ç•†â-lâ'€â...
¶â®fçš,,è®,âšâ-lé—®,ä,•è;†æ^'ä,•â-œæ-çâ¼...âœ"ä,€ä,"âšâ-lè†€â»¥æ•™ä¹ä,°ç"ÿ,â†-è-æ^'â¹ÿæ<üä,•â°æ-†â†-,æ^'â-œæ-çâœ"ç â¼ä¹ä¼šä,Šâ°âœ,,æµ•è•j.çœ<æ•¥æ^'ä,€â®šâ¼—éÿ;æ-»â°†,è;~â ¥½æ^'è°«â½"â¼â•¥,é;üâ¼—â¼â,....â•æœ%è¶¶...è;•äººçš,,æ"è"â æâ††â††â»¥â•-æ•«â,°ç"ÿ,ç¼Žâ¥³â¼~æf â¹ :_)

Let boy prostitute, but not girl, this is the result of my philosophy, and i think this can save human.

I laugh for half an hour, i am not mad :_)

I am so happy, i must be the greatest philosopher :)

The noblest man do the lowest work.

Buddha beg, i prostitute.

Edited by: huzheng at: 2/19/04 2:54 pm

|                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1643(2/19/04 2:34 pm)Reply  | Re: genius country <hr/> I think you need to come back and edit your post and try not to cut and paste from weird programs. If not I'll have to edit it down myself as the format is rather haywire. What program did you write this post in, Huzheng? Dan Rowden |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1474(2/19/04 2:55 pm)Reply                                                                         | Re: genius country <hr/> A computer with Chinese characters installed, I'll bet.                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 40(2/19/04 2:56 pm)Reply                                                                               | Re: genius country <hr/> OK now :) I use Mozilla, but i set the wrong codeset :)                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2319(2/19/04 11:06 pm)Reply                                                                            | --- <hr/> Hu Zheng, you say prostitution is the most animal life, and that geniuses are what they are by being more humanly....you are a genius, so please don't prostitute yourself! It is a waste of your time!                                                               |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > Genius Inheritance

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 981(2/9/04 8:24 am)Reply                                                                                    | Genius Inheritance <hr/> How much of Genius and the propensity for enlightenment is inherited?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1630(2/9/04 9:35 am)Reply  | Re: Genius Inheritance <hr/> I don't there's nearly sufficient information available to speculate on whether something like a "genius gene" exists. I happen to think not. If it does, it certainly skips a hell of a lot of generations. Dan Rowden                                                                          |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 982(2/9/04 9:45 am)Reply                                                                                    | Re: Genius Inheritance <hr/> Maybe it takes a lot of generations to create a Genius in the community. It is as if the Genius is the concentrated wisdom of a community over time. A concept can be diffused into the collective. It makes sense that the collective can bring about the concentration necessary to produce a Genius. |

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 266

(2/10/04 12:07 pm)

Reply

Re: Genius Inheritance

---

"A number of researchers have found that individuals with faster reaction times or speed of performance on an assortment of tasks also have higher I. Q. scores on standard tests (vernon, 1987).

Further, some studies have linked speed of processing both to I.Q. and to the functioning of the central nervous system. For example, it is now possible to measure speed of conduction of neural (nerve cell) impulses such as those in the nerves of the arm. Vernon and Mori (1992) found that there was a relationship between this measure and measures of I.Q."

[Introductory Psychology, Tony Malim and Anne Birch, 1998]

I don't think this is a requirement for being a genius, and genius undoubtably requires the combination of a number of elements for it to manifest.

However, in our current civilisation this may be a requirement of becoming a genius. It's not easy to make a stand against the entirety of humanity.

Rhett

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 991

(2/10/04 6:31 pm)

Reply

Re: Genius Inheritance

---

Quote:

---

Rhett Hamilton

It's not easy to make a stand against the entirety of humanity.

---

It is not easy to make Gold from base metal.

It is not easy to understand a woman.

The secret is that you need 2 mirrors.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 270
(2/11/04 10:14 am)
Reply

Re: Genius Inheritance

---

*It is not easy to make Gold from base metal.
It is not easy to understand a woman.
The secret is that you need 2 mirrors.*

If you can give me a satisfactory and worthwhile explanation for that, you might want to consider a career as a koan writer...

Rhett Hamilton

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 678
(2/11/04 10:54 am)
Reply

Re: Genius Inheritance

---

I have two mirrors, but I can't make Gold from base metal.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 995
(2/11/04 2:26 pm)
Reply

Re: Genius Inheritance

---

Quote:

---

Rhett Hamilton

If you can give me a satisfactory and worthwhile explanation for that, you might want to consider a career as a koan writer...

---

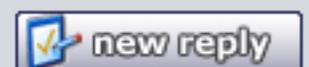

You already know that Koan cannot be explained.

The Gold is character, the process involves great heat. All impurity is consumed or detached in the heat. The fire causes pain.

To communicate with the feminine you must use the effect of the words in the context of time not the literal meaning. Therefore it is impossible to communicate with the masculine and the feminine at the same time effectively.

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                            | Looking in the mirror has the same effect as a ring. It's an endless dead loop. The second mirror gives a view into infinity and multiple angles on the same object. But how the mirrors relate to, and effect the subject I am still meditating upon.                                                                                                             |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 272(2/12/04 12:09 pm)Reply  | Re: Genius Inheritance <hr/> Models will always confuse. [edit: but some rare models can lead to the end of confusion - ie. Ultimate Wisdom] Rhett Hamilton Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 2/13/04 11:06 am                                                                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2290(2/12/04 1:59 pm)Reply       | Re: Genius Inheritance <hr/> DEL If you do two, why stop there?! Become a fucking kaleidoscope! Reflection is honest. Meditation, is, well, yes. Why do you think the ring a dead loop?! It is the symbol of eternity! I appreciate your words on fire and gold.                                                         |
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 997(2/12/04 6:12 pm)Reply                                                                                              | Re: Genius Inheritance <hr/> I'm having a lot of difficulty at the moment in recognising the inverse and the reverse of concepts together with their relationships quick enough. This is an important skill that the Genius has. As an illustration of this concept literally, try picking up a small item on a table while looking at it through a mirror. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> genius religion

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                            | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 12(10/28/03 9:58 pm)Reply | genius religion <hr/> genius religion2003.10.28 suergaz said this:"Are you prepared to be posthumous?! Love is strong in you." And I am still reading the last part of "Sex and Character", it is still helping me:"It is only a formal statement to say that original sin is the same in all persons; it differs materially for each person. only the founder of a religion has had original sin in its absolute form. Thus the founder of a religion is the greatest of the geniuses, for he has vanquished the most. The founder of a religion is thus the very antipodes of the emperor. He knows that he himself was the man most laden with guilt, and he atones for the guilt by his death on the cross." I get to know what i am doing now. Just as Jesus tell everyone original sin born in all person, i am telling every boy they are born genius, i am creating a religion, these boys who accept my idea, will believe himself as a genius in all his life, he will spread my book to every boys in the world, and, i am the genius in the absolute form, i am the greatest of the geniuses, as i am the founder of genius religion...what i am doing? I. I am just be confirmed again by Otto Weininger's theory! my fate... Here are two paragraphs from "Sex and Charater": ===== Our age is not only the most Jewish but the most feminine. It is a time when art is content with daubs and seeks its inspiration in the sports of animals; the time of a superficial anarchy, with no feeling for Justice and the State; a time of communistic ethics, of the most foolish of historical |

views, the materialistic interpretation of history; a time of capitalism and of Marxism; a time when history, life, and science are no more than political economy and technical instruction: a time when genius is supposed to be a form of madness; a time with no great artists and no great philosophers; a time without originality and yet with the most foolish craving for originality; a time when the cult of the Virgin has been replaced by that of the Demivierge. It is the time when pairing has not only been approved but has been enjoined as a duty.

But from the new Judaism the new Christianity may be pressing forth; mankind waits for the new founder of religion, and, as in the year one, the age presses for a decision. The decision must be made between Judaism and Christianity, between business and culture, between male and female, between the race and the individual, between unworthiness and worth, between the earthly and the higher life, between negation and the God-like. Mankind has the choice to make. There are only two poles, and there is no middle way.

=====

I understand everything happened these days now. Things are inevitable! No one can stop it. Yes, Otto Weininger have already anticipated what i am doing these days by 100 years ago, just as Nietzsche have announced the one who understand his book will appear 100 years later. It is me. Boys, have you understand it?! If you don't trust me, you can trust Otto Weininger and Nietzsche, they both have already been respected as genius by everyone in the world, and I, I am the genius, will be agreed with by everyone in the world soon! Every word in Otto Weininger and Nietzsche's books are right, I am just merge them and develop it more further, even Nietzsche's opinion on woman is right(i have already described in the previous article "super boy philosophy"), I develop it more further by understand girl and understand the whole female at last. The one who stand on Otto Weininger and Nietzsche's shoulders is the genius, everyone know this.

Boys, have you understand it now?! Review the history of recent 2000 years, why, all of those great scientists, all of those great litterateurs, all of those great artists, all of those great philosophers, all of the geniuses! have their so miserable life, so miserable death?! Do you need me to list some names here? Giordano Bruno, van Gogh, Beethoven, Nietzsche, Otto Weininger...All of they have miserable life, people seems take genius will have miserable life for granted now, any one of you asked why? Now we get the answer. I am the man who mankind waits for 2000 years! I am the greatest genius who geniuses waits for 2000 years! After Jesus created Christianity 2000 years ago, we, geniuses, have our miserable life for 2000 years! I am the greatest of the geniuses, the savior of geniuses, who will create a new religion, the genius religion, which will save all the geniuses from miserable life! which will defeat Christianity! God is dead, here comes the new religion. Geniuses, then, our happy life comes...

All the geniuses, not only the boys, including you, man, do you understand? Our happy life comes! Genius will have happy life, this will be taken for granted by everyone!

All the male are my friends! Especially the thinking male. Help these haven't started thinking male to start their thinking, thinking male!

Some one of you still care for me, i am a Chinese boy, am i want to defeat western countries? No, don't you see i am writing my articles in English? I am the man, who will help every man in the world, not only China man, not only boys! I will help every man in the world, every genius in the world! Every man is more or less a genius, i have described this ago. This is a revolution between male and female! It will happen everywhere, so it is the biggest revolution! And, after this revolution, both male and female will start their happiest life, this is described ago too. No smoke, no war, spread my articles to every man in the world, man! This revolution is started.

Here only have one chapter of "Sex and Character" left, what will happen after i read it over?

Here is a sentence from the last chapter of "Sex and Character": "The education of woman must be taken out of the hands of woman; the education of mankind must be taken out of the hands of the mother." I said this ago, girls should be taught the learnings by his boy, after taught by her father when she is a child. This is what happening on icelotus, she is the only child of her family (It is common in China, and this is another lucky of me, you know, this is not a common case ago), so she is taught by his father, then i will teach her after she leave her father. The happy life of human after the revolution can be seen on icelotus and i first.

The book is read over now. It seems i have stopped my thinking at last. What have i thought these days? it seems i get nothing, it is luckily i have written down these articles which recorded my thinkings.

Holding Otto Weininger and Nietzsche's bodies, I climb down from their shoulders, after I get on the ground, i kneel on the front of them. They are greatest geniuses, i am just a small short boy, who have chance to read their books 100 years after their body's death, their spiritual images appear on the front of me, i can see both of them looking at me, i will continue your work, our these geniuses' work, after our fought for 2000 years, i go now...

When i look at the roommates, when i hear their non-stop but completely non-sense talking, how to help them start their thinking, bring them out of the matrix? It seems no way. jimhaz said this to me:"I'd like to see this guy surpass his affliction and move forward. His afflcitytion is one where he can't cope with everyday people, so eventually he will go sufficiently insane as to be classed as a nuisance. While I don't know what that means in China, death of some sort I guess, prolly a heap of electricity, it will be sad to lose another tryer." Don't worry about me :) I get on well with them, except i seldom talk with them recently, yes, if i want to help them start thinking, i must communicate to them, but i can spread the truth to these thinking male first. Don't worry about me, i am strong enough to save my life :) I know my life is important to human(although i have already done the most important thing in my life). And, jimhaz, you, all of the thinking man, can help me! Trust me, we will success, the last sentence in "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is:"a morning sun coming out of gloomy mountains", and now it comes, the gloomy which clouded mankind for 2000 years will be clean out soon as the sun start its shinning.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 674
(10/28/03 10:27 pm)
Reply

Re: genius religion

---

HERE'S JOHNNY.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1640
(10/28/03 10:53 pm)
Reply

----

---

huzheng, your shining, your love, which you know before all others, will form the wedding procession around yoursfl and icelotus, you need not know the procession at all.

Force of happiness!

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

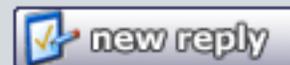

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Girl shortage in China?

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 905(1/9/04 5:42 pm)Reply     | Girl shortage in China? <hr/> I hear there is a shortage of girls in China. Is this true? If so is there anybody who is able to explain the differences in the tone of society in contrast with the west.What is it like as a man to live in a place where there is a girl shortage?Any comments huzheng? I stayed in Saudi Arabia for about 3 weeks on business. It was wonderful for about a week then an incredibly intense boredom came over me.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 39(1/27/04 5:57 pm)Reply | I don't feel China have girl shortage. <hr/> I don't feel China have girl shortage, but i don't know the statistic exactly. I think the proportion of men to women will always keep 1:1, even people want to born boy. The biological theory make the proportion keep 1:1. In China, people only allow to have one child, even people want boy, if the first child is boy, they are satisfied, or they can born the second child secretly, if it is a boy, they stop to born more children, but this won't make boys be more than girls, as there are case that they have three girls and despaired at last :_) The only way to change the proportion is by kill female infant, but this seldom happen in the current society. |

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 955
(1/27/04 6:12 pm)
Reply

I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Ok, thanks.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 141
(1/27/04 6:18 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

think the proportion of men to women will always keep 1:1, even people want to born boy. The biological theory make the proportion keep 1:1.

---

That pesky yin/yang thing again.

Quote:

---

The only way to change the proportion is by kill female infant, but this seldom happen in the current society.

---

If the Chinese government would like to change that, maybe they would be interested in acquiring Mr. Quinn. It would be an "ideal" task for him.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2143
(1/28/04 8:22 am)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

Hu Zheng: I think the proportion of men to women will always keep 1:1, even people want to born boy. The biological theory make the proportion keep 1:1.

Nat: That pesky yin/yang thing again.

---

No, you've already agreed that there is no relationship between the universal principle of yin/yang and particular instances of yin and yang.

Remember the master/slave analogy.

If a contagious virus were to suddenly strike everyone with XY chromosomes the world over, killing the victims within hours, then it is probable that the entire population of males would be wiped out. The universal principle of yin/yang would not be able to save them.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 62
(1/28/04 10:35 am)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

If a contagious virus were to suddenly strike everyone with XY chromosomes the world over, killing the victims within hours, then it is probable that the entire population of males would be wiped out. The universal principle of yin/yang would not be able to save them.

---

There are many illnesses and defects attributable solely to males with relation to the Y chromosome. It is quite conceivable that such a pandemic could occur that would affect only males and possibly wipe out all the male members of our species. In fact the Y chromosome exists for the sole purpose to make one "male" and not female. The absence of Y leads to development of females in the womb. All this would indicate the very opposite of what you preach. ie. it is the females who are superior to us males. All because of our unstable chromosomes.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 146
(1/28/04 11:28 am)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

No, you've already agreed that there is no relationship between the universal principle of yin/yang and particular instances of yin and yang.

---

No, I agreed that the relationship is subject to change. Why would I claim that there is 'no relationship' between the universal principle of yin/yang and particular instances thereof? That would be like saying that there is no relationship between the law of gravity and an apple falling from the tree. I agreed only that specific yin/yang relationships are mutable and subject to change, as seen in the master/slave analogy you referred to.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1345
(1/28/04 12:22 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

In fact the Y chromosome exists for the sole purpose to make one "male" and not female. The absence of Y leads to development of females in the womb. All this would indicate the very opposite of what you preach. ie. it is the females who are superior to us males. All because of our unstable chromosomes.

---

Nature created the male to provide variety. Yet the male comes from the female and always reacts to her. This is his driving force. The female is not superior to, but is antecedent to the male, and therefore always has a head start.

The male innovates and the female integrates. The female provides problems for the male to solve. The female could be called superior in that she is the basic life form, and created the male as a tool. The male is a boomerang.

On the other hand, the boomerang can fly and can see far.

The female is the Tao and the male is the ten thousand things.

The female is the chaos and the void, and the male is the Word of God, without whom nothing was made.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 488
(1/28/04 12:25 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Yin/yang is just duality. Yin/yang as you see it exists only by coincidence.

However, duality exists because of emptiness versus fullness. Opposites attracting, emptiness attracts fullness and fullness wishes to expand into emptiness. It is the nature of space versus non-space.

Matter (yin) and energy (yang) are the same thing. Energy=Moving matter. All matter and energy is in the nature of a spectrum consisting of differing degrees of matter/energy waves.

ie solid -liquid-gas-recognisable energy (light/radiation etc)- unrecognisable energy (gravity)

As all life and consciousness is a result of matter it also is a spectrum.

ie unconscious things (rocks etc) - plants - bacteria - insects - animals - self-consciousness – fully controlled self consciousness – godliness (some of these divisions are artificial).

Within each of these there exist sub-spectrums, ie for humans we have differing degrees of consciousness and intelligence. For instance awake and asleep is a differing degree of consciousness, dumb and enlightened is differing degrees of both consciousness and intelligence.

This is in fact ultimate reality. I think my post is brilliant.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 64
(1/28/04 12:28 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Birdofhermes, I like everything you said. Not only is it very poetic, but so smacks of the truth in a way none of the QRS can understand. I just think they'll have a field day with the following quote:

Quote:

---

The female provides problems for the male to solve.

---

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 788
(1/28/04 12:51 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

David: If a contagious virus were to suddenly strike everyone with XY chromosomes the world over, killing the victims within hours, then it is probable that the entire population of males would be wiped out.

But has not yet been observed. It is a fabrication. Reminds me a bit of your 'absent force' argument, which is obviously of the same tenor. The argument does not provide any support, because the premise is flawed. Do you think you can make friends with the simple logic that false conclusions follow from false premises?

BTW, another example for yin/yang at work is the process of meiosis. Isn't it surprising that the two possible allele combinations are almost always found at a 1:1 ratio? There seems to be a perfect balance. Segregation distortions such as t-alleles are observed very rarely.

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 1/28/04 1:12 pm

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 65
(1/28/04 12:54 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

Do you think you can make friends with the simple logic that false conclusions follow from false premises?

---

He is not interested in making friends Thomas. He is trying to free himself from all forms of attachment, remember?

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 489
(1/28/04 1:03 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Isn't it suprising that the two possible allele combinations are almost always found at a 1:1 ratio.

don't know what an allele is, but anyway.

But the ratio fluctuates, even if only to a small degree. If yin/yang were not merely observed coincidence then the ratio would be constant. IMO, it is evolutionary requirements that create the underlying cause for this near equality, rather than the principle of yin/yang. As the number of opposites move further apart a vacuum of the needed opposite creates the space for the existence of growth.

Nothing in perfect balance can permantly exist. Perfect balance of anything would mean the end of movement and the universe would cease to exist.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 789
(1/28/04 1:29 pm)
Reply

Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles

---

Jimhaz: If yin/yang were not merely observed coincidence then the ratio would be constant.

Is it possible that you misunderstand the I Ching? The I Ching does not say that Yin and Yang must occur in perfect balance. It says that Yin and Yang struggle for balance (which means that fluctuations can be expected) and that health and stability go with the state of balance, while imbalance spells trouble. This is pretty much what happens in case of allele segregation distortion, for example in pigs, or in rats. They become sterile or short-lived, or both. Because meiosis renders a genetic shift in favor of the distorting allele, they quickly spread through populations. There is evidence that entire mice populations have become extinct due to t-alleles (read: imbalance).

Thomas

|                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 490(1/28/04 1:49 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles <hr/> Is it possible that you misunderstand the I Ching? Yep, it is easy to misunderstand something I haven't read. In fact I haven't read in their entirety or to the degree of studying any traditional philosophical texts. I don't mind, in that way I don't get attached to any of them and can use my own thoughts. Mind you I will at some stage, but as yet I'm the great pretender. I just prefer being a blank sheet.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 491(1/28/04 1:53 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles <hr/> It still seems to me though from the way people say things here that most people still 'think' about yin/yang as being some form of perfect natural balance.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 306(1/28/04 2:01 pm)Reply  | Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles <hr/> All the interpretations of Yin-Yang that I have seen (other than the one which I have provided - which relates to the manner in which all things can be viewed from their passive or active aspect) are drivel. Here is a popular run-down of Yin/Yang: Yin/Yang:female/malemoon/sunblack/whitedarkness/lightfat / muscle, bone Is this obviously childish nonsense or not? Now, a modern example of Yin/Yang: Yin: the traffic light on the freeway (the stillness)Yang: the traffic that flows past that traffic light (the vivaciousness) I don't think I've ever heard of anything that reeks of more nonsense than this. |

As I say, in my interpretation all things have exactly equal amounts of Yin and Yang. In the above example one can see the light as active and energetic, and the traffic as passive, and bending to the will of a driving force.

Naturyl

Registered User
Posts: 147
(1/28/04 2:02 pm)
Reply

Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles

---

Well, you need to understand the actual yin/yang concept before dismissing it, wouldn't you think?

ksolway

Registered User
Posts: 307
(1/28/04 2:27 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

Nature created the male to provide variety. Yet the male comes from the female and always reacts to her. This is his driving force. The female is not superior to, but is antecedent to the male, and therefore always has a head start.

---

Male and female evolved together, simultaneously. There was never a time when there were only females and no males.

If you mean that the "active" arose from the "passive", then this isn't really true either, as all things have both an active and passive aspect.

Quote:

---

The female could be called superior in that she is the basic life form, and created the male as a tool.

---

You're really getting deperate now!

Quote:

---

The female is the Tao and the male is the ten thousand things.

---

All things are the Tao, only they have different appearances. The ten thousand things, too, are the Tao.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 494
(1/28/04 2:40 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

I'll have to refer back to your full explanation, but regardless I believe NOTHING is passive. All things are active because all things require movement to exist.

To call anything passive it would have to have an inherent existence, which nothing has.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1348
(1/28/04 3:10 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

Male and female evolved together, simultaneously. There was never a time when there were only females and no males.

---

According to biology, they consider asexual reproduction of one-celled organisms to be female which precedes the division into two sexes.

Quote:

---

You're really getting deperate now!

---

I was trying to rehabilitate the male from the lowly position Nature ascribes to it. My point is that there are reasons why the male has more extremes than the female. And, in my opinion, the pattern continues from the simple invention of the male in the first place, to more complex life forms, in which males are more active in deciding where the herd will go to forage. Did you know that even male rats use the cardinal directions to find their way around, and that female rats don't, in a similar way that human females also don't?

Quote:

---

All things are the Tao, only they have different appearances.
The ten thousand things, too, are the Tao.

---

True; again, I was referring to the feminine voidness as opposed to male organizational force. Whatever the force is that causes DNA, for example, to become highly organized, it should be primarily a 'male' force. It was not because Adam was the authority that he named the animals, but because it is his nature to do so.

Jimmy: Two good points. You're funny, either you bat 100 or zero.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Girl shortage in China?

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 791(1/28/04 4:24 pm)Reply  | Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage. <hr/> Anna: According to biology, they consider asexual reproduction of one-celled organisms to be female which precedes the division into two sexes. Huh? Asexual production is 'female'? I think you must be referring to parthenogenesis which occurs in many insects, for example bees and wasps. The unfertilized eggs of the queen become males, while the fertilized ones becomes females. One-celled organisms, on the other hand, reproduce by means of 'standard' mitosis, which is simply ASEXUAL. You can discount them; there's nothing female in that. But perhaps the phenomenon of parthenogenesis holds some potential for your 'female antecedent' hypothesis, considering that parthenogenesis can be forced in many species under certain conditions. Any thoughts? Thomas |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2149

(1/28/04 4:46 pm)

Reply

Re: Yin-Yang-Meiosis-Alleles

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

Well, you need to understand the actual yin/yang concept before dismissing it, wouldn't you think?

---

I think Kevin's point was that it is impossible to rationally understand the yin/yang concept because it is ultimately nonsensical. It's hard not to agree.

In my view, people only use the yin/yang concept to protect an attachment they have to a particular dualistic object within the Universe. They don't want to abandon the object in question, so they make up some cock-and-bull story about how it is intrinsically part of the universe and cannot be eliminated without creating an imbalance. It's just another low-grade religious belief for the ego to hide behind. There's a million of them.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 183

(1/28/04 10:05 pm)

Reply

...

---

Yeah, this yin-yang thing is pretty senseless. I don't advocate the maintenance or destruction of any traits we might have, but saying that they should be kept because of some sort of universal balance doesn't make sense at all.

Depending on what you consider to be male and female, I like having a balance of those traits in me. But my own values define the gravity point of that balance, because I defined what "balance" is. Eliminating feminity would destroy the balance as I defined it, and I'm not going to give in to anyone who tries to do that to me, but I don't justify my behavior by making up senseless universal laws. I justify it by saying "I do this because I want to have things my way". There's no need for more than that, really.

You people try so hard to prove who is right and who is wrong. Who cares. You can still do wrong things if you wish to. Truth is only as important as the weight you give it. Maybe you don't even value truth that much, whatever it is, but had yourselves convinced that you HAVE to. So you keep doing what you don't want for the sake of what you think truth is. And maybe, just maybe, that's the cause of all suffering you whine about.

This is directed at no one in particular.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 495
(1/28/04 10:16 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

I think Kevin and I are both partially right and wrong.

In a sense there is a form of essential passiveness that exists. It is that which holds energy waves together to form matter and retain form, albeit only of a temporary nature and is simply a by-product of competing activity. Without this everything would be energy waves, or whatever the smallest possible unit of non-emptiness/existence is.

In the case of a centre of a black hole I imagine this temporary property of passivity could remain in place for trillions of years.

In addition emptiness or relative emptiness itself is a form of passivity for without this the universe could not expand and matter could not decay.

My comment that 'nothing is passive' is therefore partially wrong, albeit that no thing is inherently passive.

At the ultimate level Kevin's principle remains intact "all things have both an active and passive aspect", but his example was not a good one for me.

Nonetheless, the exception I've noted above is still physically dualistic in nature and far divorced from any example of yin/yang I've encountered so far.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1350
(1/29/04 4:06 am)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Quote:

---

Huh? Asexual production is 'female'?

---

I agree with you, but I am sure I've seen in the literature at least a few times that idea, in other words, they consider bacteria female. I do recall, in the one biology class I took, having some diagrams of the earliest experiments with sexual reproduction. I would say that the male is what got created there because of the shape of its parts and that he inserted a gene packet into the other one, which reproduced. Then, too, there is still the idea that the basic mammalian form is female because an embryo will revert to female if the masculinizing hormones are withdrawn, but then it seems i found out some other orders have it reversed.

Are those unfertilized males capable of mating?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 796
(1/29/04 1:41 pm)
Reply

Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage.

---

Anna: I agree with you, but I am sure I've seen in the literature at least a few times that idea, in other words, they consider bacteria female.

As mentioned, bacteria generally reproduce by mitosis resulting in identical phenotypes with a low margin of mutation (copying errors). There are some exceptions, however. Some bacteria have the capability to recombine by means of transformation, transduction, and conjugation. Transformation is the most common way of recombination. Transduction involves phage attachment and conjugation can be interpreted as a kind of sexual recombination (hence, the jokes about female and male bacteria). In conjugation the "male" bacteria (donor) contains a plasmid that is transferred to the "female" bacteria. Conjugation is dependent on the "male" bacteria, therefore I am not sure if the "female antecedent" theory holds.

Anna: Are those unfertilized males capable of mating?

Sure they are. Mating is in fact their main purpose.

Thomas

I AM
Registered User
Posts: 226
(1/29/04 4:59 pm)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

The female is the chaos and the void, and the male is the Word of God, without whom nothing was made.

---

hmmm...could this be why woman does not seek enlightenment? because she does not need to? you know, sense she is already the void? is there a material correlation with this when men vigorously seek to put themselves inside a womans 'void'? same as they search for it spiritually? why do many think enlightnment is devoid of emotion? what's life if you cannot feel? i agree in not letting your emotions control you, that doesn't mean you can't have them, enjoy them and be in control of them. or would you rather be an emotionless, dickless hermit that thinks he is in perfect balance because he has deprived his body of it's birthright and effectly produced said hallucination? straight freestyle yo.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 331
(1/29/04 5:19 pm)
Reply

girl shortage

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

-----

The only way to change the proportion is by kill female infant, but this seldom happen in the current society.

-----

N:

If the Chinese government would like to change that, maybe they would be interested in acquiring Mr. Quinn. It would be an "ideal" task for him

LB: Like, where have you two been the last 25 or so years? Didn't you know that millions of little girls have been butchered, legally no less!, right here on our loving planet Earth? In fact, desire to destroy them is so powerful that most people can't even wait 'til these defenseless, little girls kick their way out of the womb. "Lets just go on in there and annihilate them!-- before we get a look at what it is we are dismembering!"

There isnt really that much difference, is there, between this and post-strangling. The major difference being that in the former case the circumstances don't force mothers to admit to themselves what they have done.

Leo

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1359

(1/30/04 1:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

IAM-

I don't know whether to agree or disagree. Who says women aren't interested in enlightenment? It certainly seems to me that they are.

On the other hand, I also think women have a different outlook on things, have different problems to overcome, and have different strengths and weaknesses.

It is harder to know and understand what those things are for two reasons. The main one is, that men have indeed co-opted pretty much everything, such that religion IS what men have said it is, and the literature is tediously male pointed, and is often just slightly off kilter for a woman. Not all of it, of course, but a good bit of it. Men harp and harp on problems that are theirs, but not necessarily women's. Women have been effectively cut off from themselves and have lost their own thread. Their spiritual instinct is strong, and they continue to participate in high numbers, but the program is not their program, it doesn't really speak to them.

The other reason it is harder to understand is that women are much harder to understand, being inwardly directed and having an approach that is focused simultaneously in several directions.

It may be the greatest of spiritual temptations for a man to cut off his emotions as an easy way out.

When a man says he must give up Woman for the spiritual life, what he is saying is that he is trading one female for another.

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 221(1/30/04 3:05 pm)Reply     | re: Re: I don't feel China have girl shortage. <hr/> "According to biology, they consider asexual reproduction of one-celled organisms to be female which precedes the division into two sexes." Yes, it is a consideration only. One-celled reproduction has only one part, so it isn't male or female, it is "ale", let us say. When it then becomes two, ale is dead and male and female are born together. It is considered thus, because the female is the reproducing part of the species, nothing more, so it is a suitable consideration to make. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2154(1/31/04 11:43 pm)Reply    | ---- <hr/> ynithrix, when will we finally replace women with robots as you have predicted?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1368(2/1/04 5:49 am)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> I had hoped Ynithrix's recent disappearance meant he had a girlfriend. He needs to get laid.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1440(2/1/04 6:38 am)Reply  | Re: Girl shortage in China? <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I hear there is a shortage of girls in China. <hr/> America is trying to increase her exports to China. We all know of the trade "imbalance." Have we considered this?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 223(2/2/04 12:39 am)Reply                                                                                  | re: --- <hr/> "ynithrix, when will we finally replace women with robots as you have predicted? " I don't see this has anything to do with the thread, but I'm not sure. Ideally, whenever we are ready to do so--it shouldn't be rushed, we must be sure to have matched all of their traits so as not to 'lose' anything. But I think women will kill themselves long before men will. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2167(2/2/04 11:44 am)Reply  | Re: re: --- <hr/> I do not see how one sex could possibly kill itself without killing the other sex. We'll never be ready to replace any part of ourselves until we actually lose that part. There is no desire for such a loss. Your madness is a strange sort.                                                                                                                               |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

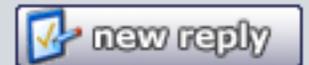

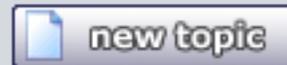

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

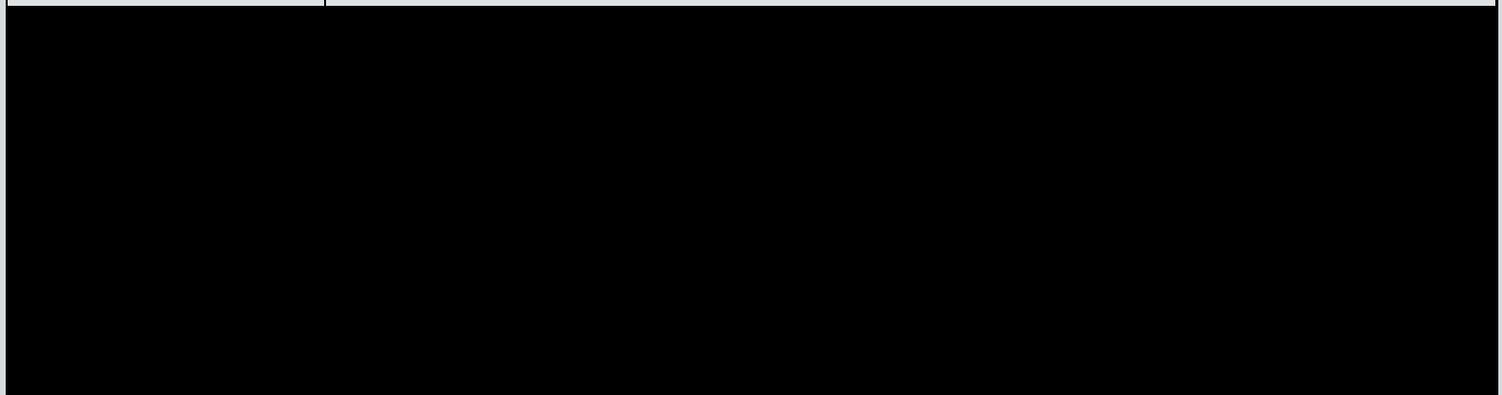

> GENIUS FORUM

> giving in

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 76(2/17/04 1:47 am)Reply  | giving in <hr/> feel my stamp on this forum just dont lose sight of my adhesive nature                                                                                                                                                                         |
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 77(2/17/04 1:53 am)Reply  | Re: giving in <hr/> who feels God's knowledge? I feel I live in a pretty screwed up america ... should i? the desert of the real is here and now. do not lose faith in Gods design it is more powerfull than anyone power or country for this matter :P |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1470(2/17/04 2:53 am)Reply | Re: giving in <hr/> Are you going to start a new thread for every little thought or feeling you have? Why not combine them in a single post (with a specific point)?                                                                                           |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 694(2/17/04 5:36 am)Reply        | Re: giving in <hr/> Yeah, really.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 379(2/17/04 5:47 am)Reply                                                                                       | Re: giving in <hr/> Well, I believe I can answer that, since I've read all of Static's posts and consider myself an expert in his philosophy. See, God has Forms, and these Forms are his ideas. So, if Static doesn't post all these messages, God won't know that he has faith. So there you have it. If you have any questions about this feel free to ask me or Static.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1472(2/17/04 7:00 am)Reply                                                                                   | Re: giving in <hr/> I am surprised to see someone worshipping the dance of forms. It is not the true, formless god from which all the infinite forms spring.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 960(2/17/04 10:09 am)Reply  | Re: giving in <hr/> Matt, I have a number of questions that I'd like to put to you, as X's advocate. Being as one can't get a word of sense out of X directly, or from trying to tease some meaning from X's incoherent prose, which can only be based on higgeldy-piggeldy knowledge of a few throw-away pieces of belief; I hope you can add some clarity. What does X believe that this God is, and what is this evidence X claims to prove this God with? Can you explain that ETERNAL SOMETHING OR NOTHING thing X keeps on going on about, in a manner which can be understood, and which also makes logical sense, whilst keeping true to X's interpretation? Why does X place such emphasis on faith, as though having faith in faith is all that is required to glean this God's favour? Why does X want to glean this God's favour? |

Why does X refer to the tenets of X's beliefs as knowledge?

What is this supernatural soul that X refers to, and how does X prove such a thing to X's satisfaction?

Why does X speak so much of love, and yet spew so much vitriol?

Why is X obsessed with the significance of a Hollywood dramatization based upon a bodging together of the tenets of various belief systems from the past? and why does X refer to 'believeing in' this dramatization, what does X mean by this?

Why does X seem so self-obsessed, so needing of attention, perhaps to the point of messianic envy and craving?

Why does X keep mentioning Jesus? And why does X constantly ask if he is God?

What is this 'God's knowledge' that X 'feels'?

Why does X constanly speak of others reacting with fear to X's drivell, as opposed to, say, bemusement, confusion, amusement and pity?

Why does X keep on quoting Neil Peart's words on free will, as though thay prove something? And does X realise that it is impossible to 'choose free will', except in a metaphorical sense? And does X realise that X is actually choosing "a ready guide in some celestial voice", as opposed to free will? Does X realise the logical implications of the existence of this celestial voice, with regard to free will?

Why does X choose to quote the following for any not 'heading' his warnings?

"I will destroy the wisdom of the wise; the intelligence of the intelligent I will frustrate"

And what are X's warnings?

Why does X think that if somebody can't accept X's words (which they would have to make sense of first), then they are not cut out for philosophy?

Why does X say that some should be afraid of the existence of God, and why does X justify this by saying that this God would should feared by these people?

Why does X keep apologising for being a dick, and then carry on being a dick?

Why does X believe that cookies are a miracle? And then why does X consider cookies as worthy of being specifically marked out as being a miracle?

How come the quotes that X gives from some past people seem to be the only coherently readable and sensible parts of X's posts?

Why does X pose meagre little mind-games, the likes of which a 5 year old could solve, as some sort of test of others' intelligence?

Why, now that X has discovered this God, is X choosing to join the army, of all things?

Why does X ask for opinions on his opinions, and then in receipt of such, babble some vague regurgitated rhetoric, or simply ad hom?

Does X believe X's philosophy teacher is this God, or just Morpheus?

Why is virtually every other word in X's posts either 'I' or 'me'?

Why does X keep on referring to insanity?

What is bonum? And how is it to be summoned? (Is it by singing Stairway To Heaven?)

Does X understand what good and bad truly are?

How would this 'highest good' fit into a correct understanding of such?

Why doesn't X remember what memory is?

Why does X show virtually no regard for X's fellow man? And why does X ignore all the advice that is being given to X, presumably by God, in the form of others?

Does X consider X to be of sound mind?

If X does consider X to be so, how come X can't see the glaring irrationality in most of what X says, and in how X expresses whatever it is that X expresses?

How many times, in the average day, does X wank about his Godliness?

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 2/17/04 10:15 am

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 381
(2/17/04 11:25 am)
Reply

Re: giving in

---

Dave Toast inquired:

Quote:

---

Matt, I have a number of questions that I'd like to put to you, as X's advocate. Being as one can't get a word of sense out of X directly, or from trying to tease some meaning from X's incoherent prose, which can only be based on higgeldy-piggeldy knowledge of a few throw-away pieces of belief; I hope you can add some clarity.

---

Ah, I'm glad some interest has developed in this utterly fascinating topic. I will enlighten you to the theory of X and in the end you will be very upset.

Quote:

---

What does X believe that this God is, and what is this evidence X claims to prove this God with?

---

This God are his feelings of what God is.

Quote:

---

Can you explain that ETERNAL SOMETHING OR NOTHING thing X keeps on going on about, in a manner which can be understood, and which also makes logical sense, whilst keeping true to X's interpretation?

---

Impossible.

Quote:

---

Why does X place such emphasis on faith, as though having faith in faith is all that is required to glean this God's favour?

---

Because he is afraid of reason and thinks faith will save him.

Quote:

---

Why does X want to glean this God's favour?

---

Because he feels he has lost something that God once gave him and has taken away.

Quote:

---

Why does X refer to the tenets of X's beliefs as knowledge?

---

Because his thinking is validated by his feelings and it is short-circuited every 0.85 seconds by them.

Quote:

---

What is this supernatural soul that X refers to, and how does X prove such a thing to X's satisfaction?

---

This supernatural soul is his feelings. His experience of them is proof in itself.

Quote:

---

Why does X speak so much of love, and yet spew so much vitriol?

---

Beliefs = knowledge = love = vitriol.

Quote:

---

Why is X obsessed with the significance of a Hollywood dramatization based upon a bodging together of the tenets of various belief systems from the past? and why does X refer to 'believing in' this dramatization, what does X mean by this?

---

It means he took a high school philosophy class taught by a home economics teacher who saw it 4 or more times.

Quote:

---

What is bonum? And how is it to be summoned? (Is it by singing Stairway To Heaven?)

---

The inverse of munob. No, but singing it backwards might do the trick.

Quote:

---

Does X understand what good and bad truly are?

---

Not intentionally.

Quote:

---

How would this 'highest good' fit into a correct understanding of such?

---

The idea of fitting cannot be applied to something as profound as the philosophy of X.

Quote:

---

Does X consider X to be of sound mind?

---

No, but he feels justified.

Quote:

---

How many times, in the average day, does X wank about his Godliness?

---

As many times as he feels the urge to.

Quote:

---

Why does X seem so self-obsessed, so needing of attention, perhaps to the point of messianic envy and craving?

Why does X keep mentioning Jesus? And why does X constantly ask if he is God?

Why does X constanly speak of others reacting with fear to X's drivel, as opposed to, say, bemusement, confusion, amusement and pity?

Why does X keep on quoting Neil Peart's words on free will, as though thay prove something? And does X realise that it is impossible to 'choose free will', except in a metaphorical sense? And does X realise that X is actually choosing "a ready guide in some celestial voice", as opposed to free will? Does X realise the logical implications of the existence of this celestial voice, with regard to free will?

Why does X choose to quote the following for any not 'heading' his warnings?

"I will destroy the wisdom of the wise; the intelligence of the intelligent I will frustrate"

Why does X think that if somebody can't accept X's words (which they would have to make sense of first), then they are not cut out for philosophy?

Why does X say that some should be afraid of the existence of God, and why does X justify this by saying that this God would should feared by these people?

Why does X keep apologising for being a dick, and then carry on being a dick?

Why does X believe that cookies are a miracle? And then why does X consider cookies as worthy of being specifically marked out as being a miracle?

How come the quotes that X gives from some past people seem to be the only coherently readable and sensible parts of X's posts?

Why does X pose meagre little mind-games, the likes of which a 5 year old could solve, as some sort of test of others' intelligence?

Why, now that X has discovered this God, is X choosing to join the army, of all things?

Why does X ask for opinions on his opinions, and then in receipt of such, babble some vague regurgitated rhetoric, or simply ad hom?

Why is virtually every other word in X's posts either 'I' or 'me'?

Why does X keep on refering to insanity?

Why doesn't X remember what memory is?

Why does X show virtually no regard for X's fellow man? And why does X ignore all the advice that is being given to X, presumably by God, in the form of others?

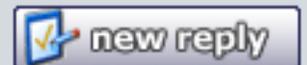

---

Because XTC, Rush and philosophy don't mix. Nor does XTC and philosophy without the Rush, nor does XTC by itself.

I've heard of this type of thing happening to people before (messiah complex?), and my personal theory is this: Sensations that reach a certain intensity and duration seem to become reality itself. A person will naturally center himself around these feelings he has experienced, and when that happens, he has basically fallen into a deep pit that he cannot escape from.

|                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                        | He will probably just have to wait it out for awhile until his experiences lose some of their potency so his reasoning can free itself from their web. Thus, the true heart of the philosophy of a static X.                                                                                                                                                      |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 961(2/17/04 12:02 pm)Reply  | Re: giving in <hr/> Fascinating. This hypothetical X person's psychology is a curious thing to behold. I wonder what such a person would really be like, down the pub and that.                                                                                                                                                                     |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 382(2/17/04 12:39 pm)Reply                                                                                    | Re: giving in <hr/> I would have to say his demeanor would be quiet and very inwardly drawn. He would be suspicious of you if you tried to have a conversation with him. If he comes to trust you enough he would become very animated when his ideas are discussed. Of course, I'm pulling this completely out of my ass, but that's what I think. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

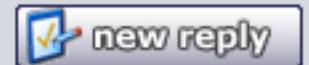

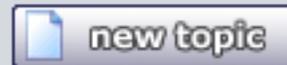

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> GNOSIS

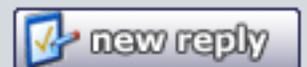

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Ben987Registered UserPosts: 1(2/18/04 11:01 am)Reply | GNOSIS <hr/> hey everyone check out this website www.mysticweb.org if you are serious about spirituality or become enlightened or astral traveling or destroying your ego etc, this is the place to go. the stuff on this site isn't normal spirituality, it is HARDCORE spirituality! sign up for one of the courses!! in the meantime while you're waiting for the courses to start try reading this book: http://www.geocities.com/gnosis_for_you/Treatise_of_Revolutionary_Psychology.pdf it is really good. try to have an open mind while reading it. later,Ben Edited by: Ben987 at: 2/18/04 1:19 pm |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 445(2/18/04 11:16 am)Reply | Re: GNOSIS <hr/> 'www.mysicweb.org' doesn't exist, Ben.I tried 'www.mysticweb.org', but that also can't be what you mean.?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

|                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Ben987Registered UserPosts: 2(2/18/04 1:20 pm)Reply | Re: GNOSIS <hr/> yup thats it, my bad                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 446(2/18/04 4:26 pm)Reply | Re: GNOSIS <hr/> Ah, now 'www.mysticweb.org' works.Unfortunately it has nothing to do with mysticism. 'Astral travelling' seems the most popular item there.Thanks anyway, Ben.                                                                                                                                |
| Ben987Registered UserPosts: 3(2/20/04 9:37 am)Reply | Re: GNOSIS <hr/> yes i can see how you might think that on first glance. However, i am sure that if you look at the site more carefully you will see otherwise. the real "meat" of the site is in the online classes. there are 3 more online classes that only become available after you have completed the first two. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 450(2/21/04 1:21 pm)Reply | Re: GNOSIS <hr/> I'm not a genius, yet I knowthat geniuses don't like classes. Trying to catch up,always yours, Paulie                                                                                                                                                                           |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

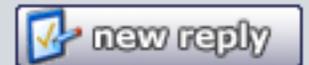

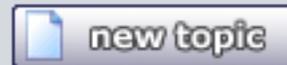

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> God? The great con game.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 92(3/9/04 6:01 am)Reply | God? The great con game. <hr/> First and foremost, God is, of course, about acculturation, indoctrination... about brainwashing children. After all, we don't exactly pop out of the womb shouting, "Praise Jesus!" or "Allah is Great!" We are, instead, socialized to internalize this or that God, this or that religious agenda. That, in fact, is why children in Muslim countries stand a far better chance of embracing Osama bid Laden's theocratic claptrap than, say, children growing up in an Orthodox jewish community in Tel Aviv. Of course there are always going to be children who are raised in families or communities that profess no belief in God at all. Or they will be taught to worship and adoreA God, THE God...but it will be the WRONG God. Depending, of course, on who gets to decide who the RIGHT God is. Think about how that works. You are raised to believe in, say, the Catholic God or the Presbyterian God or the Methodist God or the Evangelical God or the Jewish God or the Shinto God or the Islamic God or the Hindu God. Again, from the day you were first able to form a conception of God as a child dozens and dozens and dozens of people are there to cram THEIR God into your brain. And they will always have some sort of SCRIPTure to fall back on so as to enable them to inculcate the Right Way To Live. Their way. Yet each of these denominations all claim that their own The Right Way is THE The Right Way--even though their liturgy is in many ways, hopelessly conflicting and contradictory. Yet you would think, with so much at stake |

[like going to Heaven or Hell, for example] that, if there was A God, He would be very, very careful to make sure that His Way was unequivocally promulgated throughout the planet. But He fails utterly in doing so. Instead, you have all these children being brainwashed to believe in all these countervailing Dieties.

The whole thing is absurd from the perspective of salvation. Consider the following scenario respecting the Christian religion as an example of this.

Suppose hypothetically evangelical missionaries go down into the Amazon Basin to witness for Christ. They are trying to infiltrate three different tribes. The first one they are able to successfully convince most of the members to accept Jesus Christ as their savior. In the second one, however, they fail miserably. The third one they are not even able to find at all. Now suppose someone from each tribe dies on the same day. What is to be their fate on Judgement Day? Will the disceased who converted in the first tribe get into Heaven? Will the man who resisted the missionaries in the second tribe go to Hell? If so, is it not the missionaries themselves who are responsible for putting him in a situation where, upon being apprised of Christ, he rejected him? And what of the third man to die---the one from the tribe that was never visited? How could a merciful, just and loving God send him to Hell when he had never even heard of Jesus Christ or the Christian God? Yet if his ignorance permits him access to Heaven then it would be truly reprehensible to send the man from the second tribe to Hell, right?

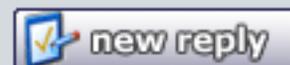

Or think of those folks who believe that a just, merciful and loving Chirst will soon return. And, upon doing so, will commense the great "Left Behind" chapter in Christianity. Those who have accepted Jesus Christ as their savior will be whisked up to Glory and those who did not will remain to suffer God's trials and tribulations. Think how morally despicable a point of view like that is. Here you have a planet with literally billions of people who were brainwashed from birth to believe in a God other than the Christian God. You have millions of folks who literally have never heard of Jesus Christ. You have babies and infants who are not even capable of grasping anything relating to religion at all. Yet we are expected to believe that the Jesus Christ of the New Testement will come back to Earth and orchestrate this moral travesty---in the name of God!!!

The intellectual farce that is denominational religion, right?

Biggie

|                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregory Posts: 500 (3/9/04 6:10 am) Reply  | Re: God? The great con game. <hr/> It's not an intellectual farce because for it to be that there would have to be something intellectual about it in the first place.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Biggier Registered User Posts: 93 (3/9/04 9:24 am) Reply                                                               | Re: God? The great con game. <hr/> Good point. In fact, I doubt God could express it better himself. In fact, let's see if he comes in here and tries to. ; )                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| rushdl <input type="checkbox"/> Registered User Posts: 39 (3/9/04 10:19 am) Reply                                      | Re: God? The great con game. <hr/> You have mixed monotheism with polytheism. There are three Montheistic religions only, except for the satan worship crap, they are Christian, Judism and Islam. The hindu and buddists have many gods, but they represent something totally different. Like the pagans, fertility, beauty, childbearing, etc... The Hindus are not exactly wrong about anything, just a different view. They certainly believe this: God (As we would call it) is not obtained or found by looking to the heavens for a location, but in reverse, looking into your self and your behavior, your attitude toward others and your treatment and consideration of others, especially less fortunate. And that, as a different religion, is just like the other three in the macro view. IMHO. dave |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Goffman, identity and enlightenment

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 114(8/15/03 10:04 am)Reply | Goffman, identity and enlightenment <hr/> www.cfmc.com/adamb/writings/goffman.htm Erving Goffman's The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, published in 1959, provides a detailed description and analysis of process and meaning in mundane interaction. Goffman, as a product of the Chicago School, writes from a symbolic interactionist perspective, emphasizing a qualitative analysis of the component parts of the interactive process. Through a microsociological analysis and focus on unconventional subject matter, Goffman explores the details of individual identity, group relations, the impact of environment, and the movement and interactive meaning of information. His perspective, though limited in scope, provides new insight into the nature of social interaction and the psychology of the individual. Goffman employs a "dramaturgical approach" in his study, concerning himself with the mode of presentation employed by the actor and its meaning in the broader social context (1959, 240). Interaction is viewed as a "performance," shaped by environment and audience, constructed to provide others with "impressions" that are consonant with the desired goals of the actor (17). The performance exists regardless of the mental state of the individual, as persona is often imputed to the individual in spite of his or her lack of faith in -- or even ignorance of -- the performance. Goffman uses the example of the doctor who is forced to give a placebo to a patient, fully aware of its impotence, as a result of the desire of the patient for more | extensive treatment (18). In this way, the individual develops identity or persona as a function of interaction with others, through an exchange of information that allows for more specific definitions of identity and behavior.

The process of establishing social identity, then, becomes closely allied to the concept of the "front," which is described as "that part of the individual's performance which regularly functions in a general and fixed fashion to define the situation for those who observe the performance" (22). The front acts as the a vehicle of standardization, allowing for others to understand the individual on the basis of projected character traits that have normative meanings. As a "collective representation," the front establishes proper "setting," "appearance," and "manner" for the social role assumed by the actor, uniting interactive behavior with the personal front (27). The actor, in order to present a compelling front, is forced to both fill the duties of the social role and communicate the activities and characteristics of the role to other people in a consistent manner.

This process, known as "dramatic realization" (30), is predicated upon the activities of "impression management," the control (or lack of control) and communication of information through the performance (208). In constructing a front, information about the actor is given off through a variety of communicative sources, all of which must be controlled to effectively convince the audience of the appropriateness of behavior and consonance with the role assumed. Believability, as a result, is constructed in terms of verbal signification, which is used by the actor to establish intent, and non-verbal signification, which is used by the audience to verify the honesty of statements made by the individual. Attempts are made to present an "idealized" version of the front, more consistent with the norms, mores, and laws of society than the behavior of the actor when not before an audience (35). Information dealing with aberrant behavior and belief is concealed from the audience in a process of "mystification," making prominent those characteristics that are socially sanctioned, legitimating both the social role of the individual and the framework to which the role belongs (67).

Goffman explores nature of group dynamics through a discussion of "teams" and the relationship between performance and audience. He uses the concept of the team to illustrate the work of a group of individuals who "co-operate" in performance, attempting to achieve goals sanctioned by the group (79). Co-operation may manifest itself as unanimity in demeanor and behavior or in the assumption of differing roles for each individual, determined by the desired intent in performance. Goffman refers to the "skill," a member of the team who "provides a visible model for the audience of the kind of response the performers are seeking," promoting psychological excitement for the realization of a (generally monetary) goal, as an example of a "discrepant role" in the team (146). In each circumstance, the individual assumes a front that is perceived to enhance the group's performance.

The necessity of each individual to maintain his or her front in order to promote the team performance reduces the possibility of dissent. While the unifying elements of the team are often shallower and less complete than the requirements of performance, the individual actor feels a strong pressure to conform to the desired front in the presence of an audience, as deviance destroys the credibility of the entire performance. As a result, disagreement is carried out in the absence of an audience, where ideological and performance changes may be made without the threat of damage to the goals of the team, as well as the character of the individual. In this way, a clear division is made between team and audience.

Goffman describes the division between team performance and audience in terms of "region," describing the role of setting in the differentiation of actions taken by individuals (107). Extending the dramaturgical analysis, he divides region into "front," "back," and "outside" the stage, contingent upon the relationship of the audience to the performance. While the "official stance" of the team is visible in their frontstage presentation, in the backstage, "the impression fostered by the presentation is knowingly contradicted as a matter of course," indicating a more "truthful" type of performance (112). In the backstage, the conflict and difference inherent to familiarity is more fully explored, often evolving into a secondary type of presentation, contingent upon the absence of the responsibilities of the team presentation. To be outside the stage involves the inability to gain access to the performance of the team, described as an "audience segregation" in which specific performances are given to specific audiences, allowing the team to contrive the proper front for the demands of each audience (137). This allows the team, individual actor, and audience to preserve proper relationships in interaction and the establishments to which the interactions belong.

The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, though detailed, does not provide a comprehensive description of interactive processes. In exploring the construction of presentation among individual and teams, Goffman does not fully explore the nature of marginalized individuals, the importance of ritual or ceremony in the dramaturgy, or the construction of character. A reading of these complementary notions from Goffman's later work, including Stigma and Interaction Ritual, provides a vehicle for expanding the analysis of the interaction of everyday life into the broader experiences of human interaction.

The pressure of idealized conduct is most clearly seen in marginalized people, whose deviance forces them into "discredited" or "discreditable" groups, based on the nature of their stigma (Goffman 1963, 42). The importance of impression management is most visible with these individuals, as those who are discredited must assuage the tension their stigma causes in order to successfully interact with others, while those suffering from a discrediting stigma are forced to limit the access of others to information about the stigma or assume the character of a discredited individual. The emphasis on idealized, normative identity and conduct limits the ability of the discredited individual to achieve full acceptance by the population that he or she is forced to assimilate into. For the discreditable individual who attempts to "pass" and employ "disidentifiers" to establish him/herself as "normal" (44), feelings of ambivalence and alienation emerge as a result of limited social intercourse. Ultimately, the existence of a stigma of any type, a part of the existence of a large segment of the population, changes the nature of impression management and, hence, interaction.

In his essay "Face Work," from Interaction Ritual, Goffman expands on the concept of the "line," originally employed in The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, dealing with the definition of line in terms of ritualized, symbolic action (Goffman 1967, 4). Symbol, as with the three types of symbolic imagery described in Stigma, stigma symbols, prestige symbols, and disidentifiers (Goffman 1963, 43-44), assume a more abstract location in the communicative process, a reification of verbal cues. The face reflects the line imputed by others, regardless of cognizance of its existence, to the actor, based on the use of verbal and non-verbal symbols, either affirming or denying a social construct. In this way a means of locating the actor in the interactive process and the broader society, allowing Goffman to affirm George Herbert Mead's argument that identity is constructed through an understanding of the projection of the self to others.

The vehicle for the construction of the character and identity can be seen in Goffman's article "Where The Action Is." The emphasis on the movement between social spaces, similar to his discussion of audience segregation and the "presence of third parties" (42), underscores the importance of the recreation of the self in different environments. To fully define the self, Goffman argues, involves performance in voluntary, consequential action, which is not fully available in everyday life. As a result, individuals are drawn to activities that involve risk-taking, such as gambling and bullfighting. Ultimately, the experience of action may become more important than social perception in defining character. As Goffman states:

Although fateful enterprises are often respectable, there are many character contests and scenes of serious action that are not. Yet these are the occasions and places that show respect for the moral character. Not only in mountain ranges that invite the climber, but also in casinos, pool halls, and racetracks do we find worship; it may be in churches, where the guarantee is high that nothing will occur, that the moral sensibility is weak (268). In this sense, Goffman depicts extraordinary circumstances as a means of developing the character central to the experience of everyday life. Through an investigation of his work in a broader context, the relationship between the forces that shape society and the individual becomes more clear. While Goffman's symbolic interactionist orientation situates him well in developing an understanding of microsociological function, it provides only a cursory exploration of the larger institutions and processes of society. Despite this emphasis, The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, is a work that lends itself well to a macrosociological reading. By placing Goffman's work in the context of the writings of other thinkers, a beneficial link between the micro- and macro-structures of society becomes visible.

An important link may be made between Goffman and Durkheim may be made in an inquiry into the concept of "spontaneity." In The Presentation of Self, the importance of spontaneity emerges as an aspect of the performance, as the actor seeks to create a front that does not appear to be contrived. Spontaneity allows for the realization of the "true" self, an idealized type of interaction that allows the individual to realize a desired face. In The Division of Labor in Society, Durkheim describes a macrosociological model of spontaneity, a "finely articulated organisation in which each social value...is appreciated at its true worth" (313). Durkheim, though primarily concerned with labor, describes a type of social interaction that, like Goffman's model, reaffirms the existing social environment through the notion of "truth." Each individual is bound to the contemporary social organization, while attempting to realize a sense of freedom in expressing truth.

Antonio Gramsci's concept of hegemony extends this relationship further, establishing an ephemeral unconscious acceptance of existing social institutions. Change in this state, for Gramsci, takes place via change in human consciousness. As Roger Gottlieb argues:

Since present control is internalized in the minds and hearts of workers and peasants, a counter form of socialization, a counter form of self-identity, is required to overthrow that control (120).

Through changes in consciousness, hegemony forms an "moving equilibrium" (Hebdige 1979, 15) through an assimilation of the doctrinal bases of the culture through "common sense" (9). In light of Goffman's work, hegemony provides the definition of "idealized" performance and the pressure to correspond to established definition. As a representation of what Marx termed "the ideas of the ruling class" (Marx 1848, 172) hegemony provides the norms, mores, and laws to which stigma, line, face, and Durkheim's anomie can be applied. In this sense, hegemony provides a vital link between the macrostructure of social institutions and the microsociological phenomena of face-to-face interaction.

The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life provides penetrating insight into the nature of interpersonal interaction and the institutions to which interaction more strongly applies. Despite an unusual, anecdotal methodology, Goffman's work displays an uncommon analytical rigor in dealing with a comparatively unexplored area of social thought. Through an inquiry into the everyday life of humanity, the book provides a strong foundation for the understanding of microsociological phenomena, an understanding bolstered by an investigation of his other writings. By limiting his work to a dramaturgical study, however, Goffman eliminates the possibility of applying the activities of the mundane world to the larger social world, a problem that may be reconciled by examining concepts employed in the book through the work of macrotheorists.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 115

(8/15/03 10:08)

Reply

Goffman, identity and enlightenment

---

Is the concept of spontaneity related to enlightenment? Would an enlightened person develop an identity in a different way from other people? What would the differences be?

Paul

Registered User

Posts: 17

(8/15/03 10:49)

Reply

Re: Goffman, identity and enlightenment

---

Yeah, let's copy and paste, Rairun.

Enlightenment is not a permanent state. It has its ups and downs, like in 'real life', so to speak.

The core of the matter is hit, but there's no 'being there' all the time.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 274

(8/16/03 8:06)

Reply

Re: Goffman, identity and enlightenment

---

Then you aren't enlightened, Paul.

|                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 20(8/16/03 10:56)Reply       | To 'voce io' <hr/> You know the cliché:trying to explain the color blueto a blind man.I'm enlightened alright.'voce io' is blind as a bat.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 278(8/16/03 16:42)Reply   | Re: To 'voce io' <hr/> Why would you explain the color blue to someone who didn't ask? Whywould an enlightened man defend himself against someone like me? ...go away.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 28(8/17/03 16:59)Reply       | Re: voce io <hr/> 'Go away'? You can't stand the truth, huh? Pax (second edition)?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1769(8/19/03 11:35)Reply | re: <hr/> Rairun wrote: Quote: <hr style="width: 80%; margin-left: 40px;"/> Is the concept of spontaneity related to enlightenment? <hr style="width: 80%; margin-left: 40px;"/> Spontaneously being truthful. Quote: <hr style="width: 80%; margin-left: 40px;"/> Would an enlightened person develop an identity in adifferent way from other people? What would the differencesbe? <hr style="width: 80%; margin-left: 40px;"/> |

|                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                  | Enlightenment gives one the perception that there is no self-existence, which in turn eliminates emotions such as insecurity, anxiety and fear. One realizes that there isn't really any self to be fearful over. The consequences of this are enormous. The perfectly enlightened person lacks any kind of self-consciousness and is no longer emotionally inhibited in his thoughts and actions, which is the essence of true spontaneity. He cannot be contained by anything.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| LbartoliRegistered UserPosts: 268(8/19/03 19:06)Reply | On the conditional benefits of Enlightenment <hr/> This is all very well in an idealistic way, however we must not forget that the perfect consciousness of enlightenment depends on the healthy operation of the body/mind, so although the enlightened person may be fearless and beyond worry ordinarily, if someone or something were to forcefully alter his body and mind, were to abuse him to the point of changing the causal factors that give birth to clear consciousness then anxiety would not be far behind. Furthermore, there is no evidence that anyone has or can attain Perfection, or perfect clarity always, consequently the imperfect enlightened person is still at times troubled by his imperfection... stop.... someone just turned on a radio, people are yapping all over, sorry folks cant think, maybe im mistaken! Leo |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 86(8/3/04 5:49)Reply    | Re: Goffman, identity and enlightenment <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Google on Enlightenment

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 163(10/24/03 1:34 am)Reply | Google on Enlightenment <hr/> Google: "For certain, there are states beyond, far beyond, what most people understand as 'enlightenment'. Indeed, there are states of consciousness of such transcendence and enlightenment, that they've never been experienced by anyone yet, and are just waiting to be experienced. States of consciousness are all relative. Even the 'highest' state of consciousness can be surpassed and transcended, because in reality, there is no absolute 'highest' state of consciousness. It's all relative. People who believe that they've reached the 'highest' state of consciousness are pleasantly deluding themselves. I see right through them. Both Buddha and Jesus were limited by their states of consciousness, as are all people. It's all about states of consciousness, including 'enlightenment'. What Jesus and Buddha experienced I infer from their words. To the extent that my inferences are correct, I do not regard what Jesus and Buddha experienced as so very enlightening relative to what I've experienced. We have the means nowadays, the technology, and the knowledge of mind-brain function to go far, far beyond the transcendent states of consciousness that Jesus and Buddha ever experienced. And this is just the beginning. The future holds the means for far greater and transcendent states of consciousness, and of enlightenment, than anyone nowadays can possibly imagine. From my perspective, based on my transcendent experiences and enlightenment, I know that I am far beyond Jesus and Buddha. This is not a | proclamation of arrogance and condescension. It simply is what is. In fact, for the most part, I'm very humble about my experiences, and wish that others could experience what I have, and to go beyond me.

Let me explain a bit more about my views on 'enlightenment', and through it, provide a definition of enlightenment: I'm a relativist of sorts, and believe that 'enlightenment' is relative. That is, there is no 'absolute' state of enlightenment, but rather that enlightenment denotes a change in one's state of consciousness, and in particular, with regard to transcendent states of consciousness. So, for example, say a person experiences, for the first time in their life, a transcendent state, then we would say that the person is 'enlightened'. But 'enlightenment' is relative, which means that this person can then go on to experience an even more transcendent state than the first, and we would say the person has experienced 'enlightenment' again. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to speak of 'degrees of enlightenment', with individuals possessing different degrees of enlightenment, but I think this is misleading because 'degrees of enlightenment' suggests some 'absolute' state of enlightenment, which I deny. It's all relative.

And it's all about states of consciousness.

So, practically speaking, how can you assess my state of enlightenment? By my actions and words. Evaluate them, see if my words make sense, see if my actions are significant. Ultimately, everyone is their own judge, of others and, more importantly, of themselves.

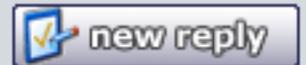

How can you experience enlightenment? First, understand what great people like Jesus, Buddha, and others taught. Try to get yourself at least to their level. Learn as much as you can, about philosophical perspectives, math, science, the Bhagavad Gita and Upanishads, and just about everything you think could be important for you in going beyond what's been said and experienced before, and what you've learned about. Ultimately, self-examination/exploration is the way. Meditative techniques will only take you so far. The utility of entheogens can be great, but this depends a lot on the individual person, their background and beliefs, their mindset, their expectations, and whether they're intelligent enough not to do permanent damage to themselves thru abuse and addiction. Assuming you're intelligent and motivated enough to have found your own way (please note, there are reasons why I do not go into all the details regarding the way I adopted, at least not for the time being), then when you're in transcendent states of consciousness, practice exerting subtle control over your state. Practice this technique and learn it as well as you can. It's a very subtle type of control. Use this control to guide your transcendent experiences. You should not always be passive while in the experience. You must recognize opportunities for exerting subtle control, to guide and transform your experience. The funny thing is that you'll be ego-less, and so the 'you' I'm referring to isn't the 'you' that you're experiencing right now. You will experience yourself as impersonal 'It', as 'Presence' that has no real explanation in words. And you'll experience much, much more, but you must train and prepare your mind first, as I've outlined above.

Know thy Self. Ponder the question, 'What am I?'. Self-exploration. Be honest with yourself. Look deep enough into yourself, and you'll find me there."

mind-brain.com/whatisenlightenment.php

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > GOST perspectives.

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 886(1/18/04 12:02 pm)Reply  | GOST perspectives. <hr/> Being as it's all about interpretation, I thought it might be interesting to get some alternative perspectives on some of the sayings in the Gospel Of St. Thomas. These translations are taken from the coptic version by Thomas O. Lambdin, and from the Greek fragments by B.P. Grenfell and A.S. Hunt. 1) And he said, "Whoever finds the interpretation of these sayings will not experience death." 2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All." 3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty." 4) Jesus said, "The man old in days will not hesitate to ask a small child seven days old about the place of life, and he will live. For many who are first will become last, and they will become one and the same." |

5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1422
(1/18/04 12:22 pm)
Reply

GOST perspectives

---

Jesus was an enlightened individual with a knowledge of the Infinite. It is really a shame that the subsequent Christians corrupted his message for personal/tribal gain. He was above the fray like a Jewish Buddha, though he did temper his message for the greatest impact to his temporal audience. He took into account the local traditions and understandings to transcend the finite. He is a fine example of the Abrahamic tradition of duty over local desire.

Tharan

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 645
(1/18/04 1:10 pm)
Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

1) And he said, "Whoever finds the interpretation of these sayings will not experience death."

Death is an illusion, so the enlightened individual wouldn't experience it.

2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All."

This is the actual process of anyone who does find the truth.

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty."

The kingdom is everything, and knowing yourself as God, you can't ever be in poverty.

4) Jesus said, "The man old in days will not hesitate to ask a small child seven days old about the place of life, and he will live. For many who are first will become last, and they will become one and the same."

Learned people will spout off words that have no foundation in truth. A child is more open to reality. The ones that think they know, don't know at all. Knowing or not knowing, everything is still nondual.

5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

Since all changes, if something is having a particular function (hidden), later it must have the opposite function (manifest). If you recognize what's in your sight, you are enlightened, and all things will be known to you.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1288

(1/18/04 1:21 pm)

Reply

Here's the truth

---

Quote:

---

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty."

---

This is a great passage, (except he should have said sons of the living mother.)

The kingdom is inside. And what interests women - the inside. Women's brains are more active and their inner experience is richer. If the kingdom is inside then it resides in the self, in deep insight. The corpus collosum is 15% larger in women so that the two halves of the brain communicate. The above are facts. My opinion is that this is the reason, for example, that men can be unaware of their own emotions and motives, and need to use projection to express the truth.

If we are to go within and find the kingdom, it must mean the brain. It means the body also, but it begins with the brain.

So they have done these studies years ago with Indian yogis who had mastered meditation, had meditated hours a day for years. They could enter theta brain waves (normally associated with dreaming) and to a small extent even delta waves, associated with deep, dreamless sleep. And yet they are awake. Seems like a good definition of consciousness to me, having all of one's mind (well, probably not all but a helluva lot more than the rest of us get) available to waking consciousness. And the pictures they had of these guys while in deep meditation is that the brain wave activity of the two hemispheres was rather equal, and that of regular volunteers extremely lopsided.

One thing that happens when you have communicating hemispheres is that you are able to understand all parts of life simultaneously and relate them to each other. So what all this means is that for real enlightenment, women have a leg up.

And I frankly think this is one reason why, although they are often enough interested in philosophy, they are yet pretty hard to impress. Because almost all men's philosophy falls short of the mark. Even a woman who is not so inclined and hasn't the intellectual capacity to explain in startling clear language why, can often spot that something just doesn't ring a bell. And so they find it uninspiring and drift off.

But it doesn't really matter, guys, because you can now purchase your enlightenment with (!) technology, invented by men (!) that will do it all for you. yep, you buy the CD's plus headphones and your brain is placed effortlessly in theta and delta waves, and all your unconscious baggage, known as karmic load, starts to resolve, you learn to stay awake and your brain builds connections to accommodate it. Very impressive.

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 168
(1/18/04 2:14 pm)
Reply

...

---

I've always disagreed with the way women are perceived to be by QRS, but I think it's kind of pointless to keep making up ways to show that they are worth something. You end up falling in the same trap as they do when they go against women. It's like you're desperate to prove that women aren't bad and will take anything you come across to try to prove your point.

Anyway, I like this excerpt:

6. His disciples asked him and said to him, "Do you want us to fast? How should we pray? Should we give to charity? What diet should we observe?"

Jesus said, "Don't lie, and don't do what you hate, because all things are disclosed before heaven. After all, there is nothing hidden that will not be revealed, and there is nothing covered up that will remain undisclosed."

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 214
(1/18/04 3:35 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty."

---

If you turn to the teachings of another and put faith and adoration on an outside influence (those who lead) or idea (kingdom in the sky) you will be putting those things above you, allowing them to 'outrank' your standing. The true understanding is that one must realize they are All. There is no boundary between the earth and sky, there are no differences...as above, so below.

Quote:

---

5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

---

If something is "hidden" it is only considered such because it is yet to manifest, when the something manifests, it can no longer, or ever have been hidden...a paradox. We already have the answers we seek, we just have to ask the right questions.

Edited by: cassiopeiae at: 1/18/04 3:38 pm

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2070
(1/18/04 5:09 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Unfortunately, Jesus was a follower of the QRS school of thought:

Quote:

---

114) Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

---

So even though he was one the wisest and most enlightened people of all time, he rated masculine consciousness infinitely higher than feminine consciousness and considered it the gateway to Heaven. How could such a godly man have been this deluded?

Canadian Zoetrope

Registered User

Posts: 22

(1/18/04 5:34 pm)

Reply

St. John.

I think it's astonishing how similar this Gospel is to that of St. John. Some scholars believe that St. John used this text to derive much of his own account, or visa versa.

Read a wonderful account of the Gospel, fairly recent, actually here are some highlights:

The Thomas gospel sayings attributed to Jesus can be listed in four groups: Those which compare word for word with statements found in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John in the New Testament, those which are variants of other canonic, or "accepted", sayings, and a third group of sayings not included in the canonic gospels, but which are known through references made to them by early church authorities who were aware of their existence. The fourth and perhaps most interesting group consists of sayings previously unknown and unrecorded.

Despite evidence that the material in the Thomas gospel was copied directly from a Greek work of around 50 A.D., possibly within the lifetime of Thomas, theologians must regard these sayings with a skeptical eye. It is possible, and in fact it has been proven in similar cases, that such works suffer heavily in recopying by secular leaders with preconceived notions. Therefore, the contents of the gospel of St. Thomas must be regarded as of questionable authenticity, perhaps as another agraphic text. The gospel, nevertheless, remains an important piece in the jigsaw puzzle of early Christianity.

Sayings also found word for word in the canonic gospels are those concerning the mote and the beam, the blind man leading the blind, that which is hidden and must be revealed, and the prophet who is not acceptable in his own country. Some of the sayings already known to the early church fathers but having no parallels in our biblical Gospels are:

"Jesus said: He who is near me is near the fire, and he who is far from me is far from the kingdom." (This was also cited by the ancient scholar Origen as the words of Jesus.)

"Split a piece of wood -- I am there; lift the stone and you will find me there."

Of those which had been previously unknown, the following are of considerable interest:

"Jesus said: Woe to them the Pharisees, for they are like a dog lying in the manger of cattle, for he neither eats, nor does he let the cattle eat."

"His disciples said to Him: Is circumcision useful or not? He said to them: If it had been useful, their father would have begotten them circumcised from their mother on; but the true circumcision in spirit is alone completely advantageous."

Jesus said: "If those who lead you say to you 'Behold the kingdom is in heaven,' then the birds of heaven will precede you; if they say to you that it is in the sea, then the fish will precede you. But the kingdom is within you and it is outside of you."

Mary said to Jesus: "Who are your disciples like? " He said, "They are like small children who have settled in a field which is not theirs. When the owners of the field come, they will say, 'Leave our field to us.' They are completely naked in their presence and so they will leave it to them and give them their field."

Jesus said: "The kingdom of the Father is like a man who wanted to kill an important person; he drew his sword in his house, he pierced it through the wall to see if his hand would be steady; then he killed the important person."

From: <http://www.bonsai-east.com/rarebird/lostgos.htm>

Ps. Perhaps one of favorite lines of scripture, in or out of the Bible: "Split a piece of wood -- I am there; lift the stone and you will find me there. "

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 19
(1/18/04 5:37 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Jesus also said " I am the way "

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1289

(1/18/04 9:21 pm)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

I think it's kind of pointless to keep making up ways to show that they are worth something. You end up falling in the same trap as they do when they go against women. It's like you're desperate to prove that women aren't bad and will take anything you come across to try to prove your point.

---

Um...so I should not try to show they are worth anything...OK, but the only reason for that is that QRS, and their ilk, have the inferiority of women as a necessary condition of their philosophy, and build the rest up around it. That is their primary bedrock, and of course it is hopeless to argue against it, they are impervious because it is a matter of intention. They are interested in truth only if it conforms to the bedrock.

No, I do not fall into their trap. I am genuinely interested in men and women and their overlapping attributes, in a similar way that I am intersted in the cosmos.

But I should quit wasting my time and do something more productive.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2071

(1/18/04 11:21 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

Um...so I should not try to show they are worth anything... OK, but the only reason for that is that QRS, and their ilk, have the inferiority of women as a necessary condition of their philosophy, and build the rest up around it. That is their primary bedrock, and of course it is hopeless to argue against it, they are impervious because it is a matter of intention. They are interested in truth only if it conforms to the bedrock.

---

Dear forum members,

I would dearly love to be proven wrong in my views about women. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see women begin to reason deeply about things and become Buddha-like in their outlook. But I've never really encountered it, except faintly in women like Celia Green and Marsha Faizi. For the most part, whenever I look out into the female lanscape, I see only a desert.

So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

How can we begin to make the necessary changes that will allow women to truly participate in the spiritual realm if we keep hiding away in fantasy-land and continue to peddle the belief that women currently have what it takes to become enlightened and wise? Can you imagine a greater act of cruelty against women? We are literally depriving them of the greatest thing in the world - consciousness of one's true nature - simply because we want to continue enjoying their unconscious ways. I don't know how anyone with a conscience can condone it.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 215
(1/19/04 12:47 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Why is it that every topic on this board ends up being a discussion of women vs. men? Who cares! It is obvious that nearly every person on here has spoken his or her point of view at one time or another. Is it that hard to accept differences in opinion? Is it impossible for anyone to talk about anything without involving the same ol' argument? Women and men are different, IMO, neither being inferior to the other. This could have been a great topic, of course, now it's turned to shit...

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 26
(1/19/04 1:00 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

This could have been a great topic, of course, now it's turned to shit...

---

As has many great topics here for the same reason. And you can be sure that many more will in the future. Rwill that is. ;)

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 270
(1/19/04 1:07 am)
Reply

'solum ipsum'

---

Quote:

---

Jesus also said "I am the way".

---

"I am the way, the truth, the life." The ultimate meaning of these words begins to be realized when I stop to think about them in a wholly exterior way, i. e. "Jesus said that he is the way and the truth" -- in the deepest sense I should think about these words as "I am the way and the truth". Of course, I am not the truth as my personal being but - to put it in Buddhist phrases - I have the potenciality to be that when I realize the illusion of my personality and everything around me which is not I.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 888

(1/19/04 1:45 am)

Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

And there was me imagining that this might just turn out to be a thread where we may simply state our perspectives on the five sayings listed thusfar, perhaps discuss our perspectives a bit, and then move on to the next five, etc. An oasis of calm in this storm of vitriol, if you will. A chance for the sage and the student to progress together perhaps. A forlorn hope obviously. But then that's cause and effect for you.

Quote:

---

Wolf: Jesus was an enlightened individual with a knowledge of the Infinite. It is really a shame that the subsequent Christians corrupted his message for personal/tribal gain. He was above the fray like a Jewish Buddha, though he did temper his message for the greatest impact to his temporal audience. He took into account the local traditions and understandings to transcend the finite. He is a fine example of the Abrahamic tradition of duty over local desire.

---

Well said Tharan. I'd be interested to hear your perspectives on these sayings, considering your knowledge of Buddhist writings.

Quote:

---

Voce: 1) And he said, "Whoever finds the interpretation of these sayings will not experience death."

Death is an illusion, so the enlightened individual wouldn't experience it.

---

Does the enlightened individual not experience all of their experiences regardless? I mean they may have a different perspective on such things but will they not experience them nonetheless?

There is also the question of death perhaps being meant in the sense of ego-death, or some such like. But I think you are right in that death is meant literally here. Perhaps the word 'experience' is not meant literally then?

Quote:

---

Voce: 2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All."

This is the actual process of anyone who does find the truth.

---

Presuming for a moment that these sayings are all about said enlightenment, that would be implicit. So could you expand upon that for me? Expand upon what these words might mean in such a context from your perspective?

Quote:

---

Voce: 3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty."

The kingdom is everything, and knowing yourself as God, you can't ever be in poverty.

---

Very succinct. Perhaps it would be of benefit to others if you break it down sentence by sentence though, being as there are a good few elements to it.

Quote:

---

Voce: 4) Jesus said, "The man old in days will not hesitate to ask a small child seven days old about the place of life, and he will live. For many who are first will become last, and they will become one and the same."

Learned people will spout off words that have no foundation in truth. A child is more open to reality. The ones that think they know, don't know at all. Knowing or not knowing, everything is still nondual.

---

The perils of conditioning and learning then?

But can the newborn really be more open to reality, being as the path must first be travelled i.e. one must learn to be able to unlearn?

Perhaps the 'ones that think they know' are further away from abiding, but closer to realisation?

Quote:

---

Voce: 5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

Since all changes, if something is having a particular function (hidden), later it must have the opposite function (manifest). If you recognize what's in your sight, you are enlightened, and all things will be known to you.

---

I'd be interested in a more detailed explanation of this from you.

Perhaps David, Kevin and/or Dan will have a particular perspective on this one in particular.

Quote:

---

Bird: 3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty.

This is a great passage, (except he should have said sons of the living mother.)

---

I'm not so sure about that. Perhaps both the father and the mother would be better but the father is concentrated on because it's common knowledge that we are of the mother (nature).

It seems to me that what is referred to as the hidden void in Buddhism, is referred to as the father here (and as male, etc. elsewhere in other sayings). The father impregnates the mother, and the mother gives birth to all that is manifest.

Quote:

---

Bird: But it doesn't really matter, guys, because you can now purchase your enlightenment with (!) technology, invented by men (!) that will do it all for you. yep, you buy the CD's plus headphones and your brain is placed effortlessly in theta and delta waves, and all your unconscious baggage, known as karmic load, starts to resolve, you learn to stay awake and your brain builds connections to accommodate it. Very impressive.

---

I've tried the sound and light machine, which also uses flashing red lights to induce this state. It was good and it worked but it's a bit impractical for sustained useage. Flotation can have a similar effect for different reasons.

Quote:

---

Rairun: I've always disagreed with the way women are perceived to be by QRS, but I think it's kind of pointless to keep making up ways to show that they are worth something. You end up falling in the same trap as they do when they go against women. It's like you're desperate to prove that women aren't bad and will take anything you come across to try to prove your point.

---

That's cause and effect for you. I've questioned the causal wisdom of our sages here on this count. Perhaps it serves a purpose in some ways but I think there are more cons than pros to the overall purpose.

Quote:

---

Cass: 3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty.

If you turn to the teachings of another and put faith and adoration on an outside influence (those who lead) or idea (kingdom in the sky) you will be putting those things above you, allowing them to 'outrank' your standing.

---

Yes, good interpretation of the first part for me. But perhaps it goes further, perhaps it refers not only to the teachings of others, but to duality and reason itself.

Quote:

---

Cass: The true understanding is that one must realize they are All. There is no boundary between the earth and sky, there are no differences...as above, so below.

---

And as a result of this, one dwells not only in the mundane world, but in the world that brings it forth, which is one in the same?

Quote:

---

Cass: 5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

We already have the answers we seek, we just have to ask the right questions.

---

Like it.

Quote:

---

DQ: Unfortunately, Jesus was a follower of the QRS school of thought:

114) Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

So even though he was one the wisest and most enlightened people of all time, he rated masculine consciousness infinitely higher than feminine consciousness and considered it the gateway to Heaven. How could such a godly man have been this deluded?

---

I had hoped you might put that drum away for the moment, maybe deal with what is at hand, and that perhaps we could deal with the final saying last.

Still, as you bring it up. What you are saying here is that these esoteric sayings, of which the interpretation is of the utmost import, are actually meant literally. After all, your interpretation is nothing but literal. I think you know of this mistake, but carry on regardless due to nothing more than it's backing your views up on such mundane matters. It seems to me that you may have fallen into your own trap.

Let's, for a second, interpret Mary as mother, or nature, and the male as the hidden void. So Jesus' interpretation of what Peter is saying is something along the lines of forget about the mundane world of nature and that within it, for it is not worthy of consideration. Jesus' esoteric answer to this would then be something along the lines of I have the knowledge and can show these natural aberrations the way back to the father, that they too may become one with the father like you who understand, or attempt to become one with the father like you who attempt to do so. For every mundane being of the mother who will truly attempt to become one with the father will make themselves of the father.

Quote:

---

DQ: I would dearly love to be proven wrong in my views about women. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see women begin to reason deeply about things and become Buddha-like in their outlook. But I've never really encountered it, except faintly in women like Celia Green and Marsha Faizi. For the most part, whenever I look out into the female lanscape, I see only a desert.

---

Ok, so there's 2 in comparison to the 8 or nine males that you've previously mentioned. Not the worst ratio, considering the causality of civilization to this point then?

Quote:

---

DQ: So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

---

Speak for yourself. Such presumption.

Quote:

---

DQ: How can we begin to make the necessary changes that will allow women to truly participate in the spiritual realm if we keep hiding away in fantasy-land and continue to peddle the belief that women currently have what it takes to become enlightened and wise? Can you imagine a greater act of cruelty against women? We are literally depriving them of the greatest thing in the world - consciousness of one's true nature - simply because we want to continue enjoying their unconscious ways. I don't know how anyone with a conscience can condone it.

---

You don't know how anyone with your conscience can condone the way you see these things, you mean.

According to you, women do not currently have this faculty. How then do you propose that these faculties of women might be changed? Might it be your perception of these faculties which needs changing?

Please consider all these questions rhetorical, for the sake of this thread. It would be nice if you could address my interpretation of saying 114 though. Sup to you, obviously. I just thought you might see my purpose here.

Quote:

---

Zoetrope: I think it's astonishing how similar this Gospel is to that of St. John. Some scholars believe that St. John used this text to derive much of his own account, or visa versa.....

---

Yes, it is interesting to look into the authenticity, cross-overs and the like of such things but I think this is a pretty unresolvable question, after a fair amount of looking. There simply wasn't the detailed historical recording in such times for us to be able to make a judgement either way. Still though, I think it is an interesting exercise nonetheless to dissect the sayings from our individual perspectives, and see what comes out in the wash.

Quote:

---

Sal: Jesus also said " I am the way "

---

Care to expand?

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 1/19/04 2:08 am

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 20
(1/19/04 2:14 am)
Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

Quote:

---

So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

---

Woman are only inferior to you David because you value Wisdom, over truth, the fact that you value one holds you firmly into a position where you can't experience the other.

I am the Way

form moves

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 648
(1/19/04 4:03 am)
Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

I wasn't going to post anymore in this forum, but you asked me some questions, Dave.

Does the enlightened individual not experience all of their experiences regardless? I mean they may have a different perspective on such things but will they not experience them nonetheless?

Well technically, the enlightened individual can experience all facets of their existence. Death is an illusion, though, and enlightenment is conquering illusions. So truly understanding Jesus's sayings is really conquering death, and thus, not experiencing it.

Our bodies and minds still rot, and are put in coffins or burnt. We still die; just not in truth (we never existed in truth in the first place).

There is also the question of death perhaps being meant in the sense of ego-death, or some such like. But I think you are right in that death is meant literally here. Perhaps the word 'experience' is not meant literally then?

Well, if it were ego-death, Jesus would be saying "if you understand my teachings, you will stay in your delusion".

Presuming for a moment that these sayings are all about said enlightenment, that would be implicit. So could you expand upon that for me? Expand upon what these words might mean in such a context from your perspective?

Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds.

There's no way a person can stop seeking when they're a seeker. They are focusing outward, looking for satisfaction in places that will only momentarily give it. Everything they do is seeking, whether they know it or not; and once the true self is found, there's no more need to seek.

When he finds, he will become troubled.

The truth is shocking, it shakes all previous world-views. For example; when one sees there is actually no 'right' and 'wrong', and no 'God' that we thought existed, that person becomes very troubled. When they see that there is no true self, it's a troubling perspective. The enlightened person realizes that they can kill their parents, and siblings, and lovers, and good friends; and there is no reason to fear this (of course they wouldn't do so in most cases). They see that all of this life is utterly meaningless.

I am kind of shaky talking about this particular section, because 'troubled' to someone is not the same to someone else. Just, in retrospect, when you understand these teachings you will look back and say "oh yes, I was definitely fucking troubled".

When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished

The truth is astonishing. In your fear/sadness/whatever, astonishment and joy pops up. You begin to love the way things actually are.

and he will rule over the All

The true self rules over All. I hate being brief, but there's not really much else to say about this. My true self is greater than anything in existence, because I've created everything in existence, and it's all me. I am the drawn-back-thing, which has infinite possibilities.

Very succinct. Perhaps it would be of benefit to others if you break it down sentence by sentence though, being as there are a good few elements to it.

Sure..

"If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you.

People look for God in the dumbest of places. Some say heaven is in the clouds, but if it were, then then of course the birds would be closer to heaven. They could fly into heaven, and would have the advantage. Apparently, I don't know, some people thought heaven was under water? If it were, then fish could go into and out of heaven, and would have the advantage. Heaven isn't a specific place.

Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you.

The kingdom is everything. It is all phenomenon.

When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father.

When you know your true self, you know God, and you see your body-mind as a product of your true self.

But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty.

If you don't know your true self as God, you are living in delusion, and you are a part and the provider of that delusion.

The perils of conditioning and learning then?

But can the newborn really be more open to reality, being as the path must first be travelled i.e. one must learn to be able to unlearn?

Perhaps the 'ones that think they know' are further away from abiding, but closer to realisation?

You said it very well. The newborn is closer to God, but hasn't had the intellectual understanding of itself and the world yet. Once it gains that, then the newborn is realized and abiding...of course it takes a while to gain that level of intellect.

A child that's raised in the wild most likely won't be enlightened, either. Nor one that has everything done for it, and doesn't do anything all day long.

I'd be interested in a more detailed explanation of this from you.

Alright, let's say there is a road that goes in a big circle. When you are driving in a car along this road, you see the cars that are driving next to you, in front of you, and behind you...but that's all you see from your perspective. When you stop driving, and sit along the side of this big circular road, you see every car going along this road.

Similarly, if you are part of the changing universe, you won't be able to know much of anything, because your perspective is in a changing place. When you aren't part of the changing universe (as your true self), then you see all things and gain knowledge of how they change.

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 649(1/19/04 4:10 am)Reply     | Re: GOST perspectives <hr/> 114) Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven." I just think it's funny how Jesus says he'll lead her...yet, he is leading all of his male disciples as well! This particular verse also wasn't necessarily part of the Gospel, from what I know. I don't know, though. I am enlightened and I don't have this idea that women are inferior. Maybe Jesus did. That doesn't give me any reason to start following that line of thought, though. My personal experience with women has been pretty positive. |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 415(1/19/04 4:48 am)Reply        | Re: GOST perspectives <hr/> Strange guy, that Jesus.They crucified him, isn't it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 216(1/19/04 5:07 am)Reply | Re: GOST perspectives <hr/> Quote: <hr/> 3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty. Cass: If you turn to the teachings of another and put faith and adoration on an outside influence (those who lead) or idea (kingdom in the sky) you will be putting those things                                                             | above you, allowing them to 'outrank' your standing.

---

Mr. Toast: Yes, good interpretation of the first part for me. But perhaps it goes further, perhaps it refers not only to the teachings of others, but to duality and reason itself.

---

Of course it is deeper...duality only presents itself when there is a distinguished difference in something, when you take away the opposites, duality is non-existent.

People try to separate themselves from the mundane world and put themselves on a higher pedestal than other 'things'. We think we are better than the spider, the squirrel, the tree, (generally speaking) but that is the illusion. We are all part of the greater organism, each composed of the same elements merely in a different way. If the trees all die, so do we. Separation is the disease that creates dis-harmony. In the same breathe, people put themselves lower on the spiritual ladder than esoteric entities or ideas...we are not as good as Buddha, Jesus, the soul, even though we are said to have one, there is always something we imagine to be better. This separation is just the same, it allows us to make excuses for our stupidity.

Quote:

---

Cass: The true understanding is that one must realize they are All. There is no boundary between the earth and sky, there are no differences...as above, so below.

---

Mr. Toast: And as a result of this, one dwells not only in the mundane world, but in the world that brings it forth, which is one in the same?

---

It is All existent as the greater organism, still the same energy that has manifest itself in many different ways. Each layer (mundane or spiritual) is needed to create the organism as a whole, and the separation of each of the layers is purely superficial.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 22
(1/19/04 6:41 am)
Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

Quote:

"I am the way, the truth, the life."

Jesus is form, therefore all he can ever do is point to the truth he cannot be the truth, I am the way, it is not his form that is the truth, forms move that is there design, so to identify with his form would be to identify with that which is not true, you can only identify with that which he points to which is the truth.

So the example of this forum and the notion that woman are inferior highlights identification with form, rather than the way which is formless and unchanging, form is moving and always changing ... neti,neti

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> GOST perspectives.

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1423(1/19/04 7:09 am)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> 114) Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven." <hr/> Notice it is Simon Peter who is asking Mary to leave and it is Jesus who is consoling him in language both soothing and understandable to him. Simon Peter is the traditional misogynist in this example, not Jesus. Jesus spoke to his audience, not a reader 2000 years into the future. It is a subtlety to often missed here. DQ wrote, Quote: <hr/> |

So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

---

This is an unfortunate POV and certainly of no use in terms of convincing half the population of the more important points in your philosophical repertoire. Even a simple statistician can tell you there is a difference between causality and coincidence.

Some of what Anna (birdofmermes) speaks of, I don't agree with. But most I do. And to be honest, that is more than I can say of many of the posters here, the majority of which happen to be male.

You would find many more adherents interested in Truth if you would use the language descriptors such as herdiness, local love and attachment, passivity, and submission rather than the gender based descriptors. Casting half the instances of current and past humans into a category based on genitalia, and yet described with the aforementioned qualities, is not only an inaccurate generalization but also one that does not take into account the many historical and social factors that stifled the development of women as well as their ability to communicate or disseminate a message throughout the local culture. You would be hard-pressed to find a culture on this planet in the past 2000 - 3000 years (when we began writing things down) that did not fit this model. The results are what you see today. Recent patriarchy is an important point in our evolutionary development, but there is emerging evidence that it is not the endpoint.

Gender is ultimately irrelevant.

Tharan

Edited by: WolfsonJakk at: 1/19/04 7:36 am

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 416
(1/19/04 8:47 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

Jesus spoke to his audience, not a reader 2000 years into the future. It is a subtlety too often missed here.

---

Oh? I hardly get the impression that anything is missed here, Wolf. Well, going for the Genius Status, so there's some reading & meditating ahead of me.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 926
(1/19/04 8:57 am)
Reply

GOST perspectives.

---

1) And he said, "Whoever finds the interpretation of these sayings will not experience death."

DEL: This means if you understand the truth then you have the truth in you. If you have the truth in you, you cannot be diffused or diluted by the collective.

2) Jesus said, "Let him who seeks continue seeking until he finds. When he finds, he will become troubled. When he becomes troubled, he will be astonished, and he will rule over the All."

DEL: The truth is dynamic, an oscillation, tension, a spin.

3) Jesus said, "If those who lead you say, 'See the kingdom is in the sky', then the birds of the sky will precede you. If they say to you 'It is in the sea', then the fish will precede you. Rather, the kingdom is inside of you, and it is outside of you. When you come to know yourselves, then you will become known, and you will realise that it is you who are the sons of the living father. But if you will not know yourselves, you dwell in poverty and it is you who are that poverty."

DEL: The truth is not in the tools used to help you find the truth. Tools are books, ceremony, circumstances, people.

4) Jesus said, "The man old in days will not hesitate to ask a small child seven days old about the place of life, and he will live. For many who are first will become last, and they will become one and the same."

DEL: Truth is timeless. Pride of age brings blindness for the old. Disrespect for age brings blindness for the youth.

5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

DEL: The truth is dynamic, an oscillation, a tension, a spin. Every breath you take is full of this dynamic. Every mistake you make is full of significance because it was not a mistake but an occurrence. For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction therefore we have to watch for the reaction and parry it so that the returning force/energy is transformed into a spiral motion and not into an endless loop. Spirals show progress loops are traps.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2072
(1/19/04 9:55 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

WolfsonJakk wrote:

Quote:

---

114) Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, for women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "I myself shall lead her in order to make her male, so that she too may become a living spirit resembling you males. For every woman who will make herself male will enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

Wolf: Notice it is Simon Peter who is asking Mary to leave and it is Jesus who is consoling him in language both soothing and understandable to him. Simon Peter is the traditional misogynist in this example, not Jesus.

---

I agree that Simon Peter is the traditional misogynist in this exchange (he is, after all, the mirror-image of the husband), but disagree that Jesus's words were simply words of consolation.

Quote:

---

Jesus spoke to his audience, not a reader 2000 years into the future. It is a subtlety to often missed here.

---

The truth that he was pointing to in this passage is timeless and just as applicable to today as it was back then. It will always be true that feminine consciousness can never enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

Quote:

---

DQ: So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

Wolf: This is an unfortunate POV and certainly of no use in terms of convincing half the population of the more important points in your philosophical repertoire. Even a simple statistician can tell you there is a difference between causality and coincidence.

---

I'm not interested in convincing half the population of the disadvantages of retaining feminine consciousness - that would be hopelessly unrealistic. I'm simply trying to awaken something in the intelligence and conscience of a handful of superior individuals. That's a big enough job as it is!

To contemplate the limitations of feminine consciousness is a massive step for any individual to take, for you are literally questioning the core values of society and everything you have ever been taught to believe in. And yet if a person is unable or unwilling to do this, then he has no chance at all of heading in the proper direction towards Truth and becoming enlightened. It won't matter how much he tries to study the Gospel of Thomas. It will be a complete waste of time.

Quote:

---

Some of what Anna (birdofmermes) speaks of, I don't agree with. But most I do. And to be honest, that is more than I can say of many of the posters here, the majority of which happen to be male.

---

Well, as with most women, I find her thinking extremely incoherent in a deeper sense. She is like a female version of Thomas Knierim in the sense that they both read a lot and like to echo what they have read. It is only when they are in pure echoing mode that they begin to sound coherent and intelligent. As soon as they veer away from this mode, their words immediately become confusing and incoherent again. Thoms differs from Anna, however, in that his thoughts are much more structured and his views far less changeable.

Quote:

---

You would find many more adherants interested in Truth if you would use the language descriptors such as herdiness, local love and attachment, passivity, and submission rather than the gender based descriptors. Casting half the instances of current and past humans into a category based on genitalia, and yet described with the aforementioned qualities, is not only an inaccurate generalization but also one that does not take into account the many historical and social factors that stifled the development of women as well as their ability to communicate or disseminate a message throughout the local culture.

---

The trouble is, the language descriptors that you mention are not an adequate substitute. They do not address the all-over-the-place, flowy, memory-less nature of feminine consciousness which is found in nearly all women and a lot of men.

A man can be very herdly and passive and full of attachment and yet be far closer to wisdom than a herdly, passive, attached woman, simply because his consciousness is more structured, more consistent, more rational, and more penetrative. Again, Thomas Knierim is a classic example of this. Thomas has many superior mental qualities to most women and thus, even though he is herdly, passive and full of attachment, just like Anna is, he has the inner potential to break away from this mode of existence if he chose to and make advances towards wisdom. That he isn't doing this is far more due to apprehension and fear than it is to a lack of capacity. A woman, however, lacks this potential because all she ever does in life is flow unconsciously into things.

The majority of the male population would probably have to be great bodhisattvas before women will start flowing unconsciously into the spiritual realm. But even here, they wouldn't be leading a spiritual existence. It would still only be a simulation.

Quote:

---

Gender is ultimately irrelevant.

---

Agreed. This is not about gender. It is about consciousness.

I AM

Registered User

Posts: 224

(1/19/04 10:17 am)

Reply

---

---

ahhh...an interesting thread.

Quote:

---

Perhaps the 'ones that think they know' are further away from abiding, but closer to realisation?

---

nicely put. from the day we are born as we begin to take in information through our senses, we are constantly adding layers to who we are without the new info. unfortunatley an infant does not have the cognitive abilities to realise their unlayered-self. your classic catch 22. by the time we are adults the world has done it's share of helping us create an image of ourselves using said layers as the building blocks.

interestingly, most of us in our late teens or early twenties go through a little "who am i?" crises and usually go off to college or get our own apartment to "find ourselves". this is possibly that last battle between our innocence (i.e. unlayered-self) and the image the world is trying to implant in us. they are pulling from both sides and it drives us mad at times. unfortunatley, most of think we "found" ourselves when we decided we wanted to become a doctor, a computer engineer, a housewife (many woman these days have babies young to escape this confusing pull), or some of us even go to the military.

in reality we didn't really find ourselves but just found out which role we wanted to play on earth and usually cease searching of ourselves. Afterwards we may feel we live an "empty" life in a "horrid" world. we basically sell out. but it's not really our faults, choosing the image is much much easier. everybody else has, the whole world is a huge image created by all of us in unision, all you have to do is jump right in! then there are some of us, such as in this messageboard that have realized something is wrong and attempt to cut back through all the layers yet also realise it's some real tough shit. almost everything in the world around you is against it, it pulls you away from going within. kind of like gravity. the mass of the world image is much heavier and all you have pulling from the other side is something burried deep inside you.

on another note, i am not saying the information we have learned should totally discarded. we need that info and the roles we play using it to enjoy the world. we just shouldn't identify who we really are with it.

i think i'm off topic now...i will respond to the Jesus quotes in the next post Toast.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2073

(1/19/04 10:41 am)

Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

I had hoped you might put that drum away for the moment, maybe deal with what is at hand, and that perhaps we could deal with the final saying last.

Still, as you bring it up. What you are saying here is that these esoteric sayings, of which the interpretation is of the utmost import, are actually meant literally. After all, your interpretation is nothing but literal. I think you know of this mistake, but carry on regardless due to nothing more than it's backing your views up on such mundane matters. It seems to me that you may have fallen into your own trap.

---

It's not always the case that the wisest interpretation of a sage's words is esoteric or metaphorical. Sometimes the literal interpretation is the true one. The reader needs wisdom to make the correct call in each case.

Quote:

---

Let's, for a second, interpret Mary as mother, or nature, and the male as the hidden void. So Jesus' interpretation of what Peter is saying is something along the lines of forget about the mundane world of nature and that within it, for it is not worthy of consideration. Jesus' esoteric answer to this would then be something along the lines of I have the knowledge and can show these natural aberrations the way back to the father, that they too may become one with the father like you who understand, or attempt to become one with the father like you who attempt to do so. For every mundane being of the mother who will truly attempt to become one with the father will make themselves of the father.

---

It could be interpreted in that way, but it sounds like too much of a stretch. Why would a wise man like Jesus use provocative gender-based language that is hurtful to at least half the human race in order to make a metaphysical point? He could have easily made the same point in a far simpler, less controversial way.

In my view, the passage is too specialized and skillful to be anything other than an enlightened comment about feminine consciousness. Note that Jesus first rejects the common misogyny of most men, as articulated by Simon Peter, and then rejects the common and deeply-held belief that feminine consciousness is just as open to wisdom as masculine consciousness is.

Quote:

---

DQ: I would dearly love to be proven wrong in my views about women. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see women begin to reason deeply about things and become Buddha-like in their outlook. But I've never really encountered it, except faintly in women like Celia Green and Marsha Faizi. For the most part, whenever I look out into the female landscape, I see only a desert.

DT: Ok, so there's 2 in comparison to the 8 or nine males that you've previously mentioned. Not the worst ratio, considering the causality of civilization to this point then?

---

As I say, it's only very faint in these women, not enough to spark them into the spiritual realm. I see it much more strongly in at least 50% of the male population, who nevertheless don't enter the spiritual realm because of fear and mental blocks.

Quote:

---

DQ: How can we begin to make the necessary changes that will allow women to truly participate in the spiritual realm if we keep hiding away in fantasy-land and continue to peddle the belief that women currently have what it takes to become enlightened and wise? Can you imagine a greater act of cruelty against women? We are literally depriving them of the greatest thing in the world - consciousness of one's true nature - simply because we want to continue enjoying their unconscious ways. I don't know how anyone with a conscience can condone it.

DT: You don't know how anyone with your conscience can condone the way you see these things, you mean.

According to you, women do not currently have this faculty. How then do you propose that these faculties of women might be changed?

---

The first thing to do is persuade men to value wisdom over femininity, which is no easy task. Only then can we begin to make the transition from a woman-centered society to a wisdom-centered one. Then, with all of our scientific and philosophic knowledge, we will be in a position to make the necessary changes to both sexes to make them more open to the highest wisdom.

Quote:

---

Might it be your perception of these faculties which needs changing?

---

They can only be changed if I abandon my spiritual knowledge of emptiness.

Quote:

---

5) Jesus said, "Recognise what is in your sight, and that which is hidden from you will become plain to you. For there is nothing hidden which will not become manifest."

---

In the moment that you perceive the fundamental nature of what is in front of you, in that very moment you perceive the fundamental nature of all things. Nothing is excluded from it. This is true omniscience.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1292

(1/19/04 12:31 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Re David's post, I think Jesus was doing what you suspect the Buddha of doing - keeping an inferior like Peter around for his submissiveness and drive to build a church. Jesus' treatment of women was impeccable, and his example caused the early church to have women in positions of leadership, and some were given the title "equal to the apostles." They also lived like true communists. The likes of Peter, however, soon clamped down and we have the results you see today.

I even had the thought that it could have been misogyny that caused the ecumenical council to not include that gospel or passage of Thomas in the canon. Because, you see, Jesus made it sound so doable, giving women the ability to become living spirits. And in that case, it would be quite hard to reintroduce the old misogynies. No fun.

But I am not convinced Jesus really meant that, because he not only had to soothe Peter, he had to do so in a way that he could accept. Really, with that passage he gave women free passage.

Quote:

---

Well, as with most women, I find her thinking extremely incoherent in a deeper sense. She is like a female version of Thomas Knierim in the sense that they both read a lot and like to echo what they have read. It is only when they are in pure echoing mode that they begin to sound coherent and intelligent

---

David, if I thought you understood me better, I'd take your words more to heart. But if you see my words as incoherent with something I've advocated previously, I'd appreciate it if you'd point it out. I do read a lot, and I sometimes echo, especially something relatively new, but you might be surprised at how I take things that I've read and think about them, and draw my own conclusions, or store ideas for years on end and then when some new data comes along, I see the connection or put it to new use. I have a huge storehouse of my own theories, and what's really gratifying is when I find them corroborated years later in some book or research.

On the other hand, unlike some people, I have a lot to learn and can modify my views, as per below...

=====

Quote:

---

Let's, for a second, interpret Mary as mother, or nature, and the male as the hidden void.... For every mundane being of the mother who will truly attempt to become one with the father will make themselves of the father.

---

Wow, Toast, that is more or less the exact opposite of my thinking. It seems to me the void is the mother. Nature is the mother, but nature is actually the void, or the more visible aspect of the hidden void. The reason I think this way is that I see males and maleness as causing and representing order. Things becoming manifest, becoming discrete and separate and highly ordered, individual. Look at the male carrying the x and the y, whereas the woman carries only the x, and she has potential with every single egg to produce either sex, but the male determines which.

When you say nature, you probably are thinking of all the animals and plants and weather patterns, or perhaps quantum particles. But those are all formations that have arisen through nature.

Or perhaps the void is male, and somehow brings order (impregnates) to nature, and all the forms we see are the offspring...

But another thing I took some exception to was that the tone of your paragraph sounded rejecting of nature and of who we are. I don't think the goal is to return to the void, because then we wouldn't have life or consciousness or evolution as we know it. The goal is to be aware of the void, to know it and see it, and to go on living, refined and transformed inwardly.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 1/19/04 12:48 pm

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2085

(1/19/04 12:31 pm)

Reply

----

Cass?! The greater organism?! What is that then? You mean humanity? It is not equal to itself in as much as it is, ---separation, division, difference...are anything but superficial. They are ways that we create.

David should write fiction. It becomes him.

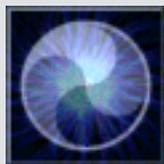

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 59

(1/19/04 1:10 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

Quote:

So the reason why Jesus and I that think women are inferior is not because it is an immovable bedrock in our thought, but because they really are inferior when it comes to philosophical and spiritual thought. It's a harsh truth, I know, but it is the truth nonetheless, and we shouldn't shy away from it simply because we think it is unfair or makes us unhappy.

When it is said so flatly, however, we steamroll the reality of the situation. The fact is, not all women are philosophically and spiritually inferior. I will grant that at the present time, as a very broad general rule (in the statistical sense), it may be that women are less likely to excel in these areas. I have already admitted this, so I am not running from anything.

There are, however, many exceptions. For example, despite your low estimation of her, Bird strikes me as a woman with a good deal of depth and authenticity in her thought. Her thought is more sophisticated than that of most men. There are many others like her as well. Whatever disparity exists is probably due more to cultural and historical factors than anything else, although I won't deny that women's thinking processes may be a bit less suited to logic and analysis than those of men.

Whatever organic difference exists, however, I think that it is small in comparison to the cultural factors. What is wrong with women is largely wrong with men as well, if we're talking about a lack of substantive, authentic thought. Of course, QRS admits this, but blames it on 'feminine-mindedness.' In reality, this business of 'masculine' and 'feminine' thought is a distraction and can serve only to obscure the simple truth. There is really only human thought. If the human condition is not what it could be, blame humanity and you'll be much more likely to make progress.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2090

(1/19/04 1:13 pm)

Reply

---

---

I disagree with your last sentence Naturyl. You worded it poorly.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 61

(1/19/04 1:21 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Well, in that blame is not progressive, you are right. Perhaps I should have said that humanity bears the responsibility for the human condition. If you were criticizing my reference to 'blame,' I thank you for the correction. Blame is what QRS assign to 'femininity,' and because they blame, they create a scapegoat. There is no scapegoat, though. Humanity is what we make of it, all of us - man and woman alike.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1296

(1/19/04 2:03 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see women begin to reason deeply about things and become Buddha-like in their outlook. But I've never really encountered it, except faintly in women like Celia Green and Marsha Faizi.

---

Oh, for heaven's sakes. Celia Green's book was wonderful, but I have certainly read other women authors as good. I particularly enjoyed that she expressed some ideas I had been thinking on, and which I tried to convey once or twice (and got blank stares). She was definitely a masculine woman, as evidenced by her fury at being belittled as a child for not taking an interest in other people. A very bitter woman. (If she'd been a boy, they would have let her alone.)

Marsha is certainly a less masculine woman than me. And the reason that you praise certain women, to date three, Sue, Marsha and Green, is that they conform to your views. Marsha once said I had capitulated because I expressed that I had a crush on Thomas, but I have never hidden the fact that I love men and sex. She has capitulated, because she has submitted to you.

I'm a very deep thinker, I dwell in the "event zone" of the enlightened, but you don't give me the praise I quite obviously deserve because I have not submitted, and do not appear likely to do so. (And I would submit darling, if only you were not so irritatingly wrong about things.) I have no need to submit because I prefer to think for myself.

But I am not trying to be masculine. It's just the way I am, a life-long curse.

I am considering a major move toward more femininity and I believe I have Dan to thank. All I need to do is go to class to learn how to mix drinks, and I think I'll try my hand at bartending. I have a D cup and I want to be paid for it! So why not a personality change while I'm at it? Women are adaptable as voce says.

I'm also thinking of becoming a preacher, so as to uplift Christianity. I mean, if the world is to have any chance at becoming a a better place, and I do see many hopeful signs, should we continue to roll our eyes at the fundamentalists and ignore them? That might backfire. So perhaps we should bring up the rear.

Here's a hopeful sign I noted today. My patient discussed with me his hobby, kite flying. There's a whole world of kite flying that is high tech, full of events and even championships! The kites are stunning and wonderfully engineered. I was thinking that play is getting so sophisticated, perhaps it can finally replace warfare as something for those surplus males Thomas mentined to do.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2075

(1/19/04 2:15 pm)

Reply

Re: ---

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

Blame is what QRS assign to 'femininity,' and because they blame, they create a scapegoat.

---

There is no necessary correlation between blame (in the sense of identifying the cause of a problem) and creating a scapegoat. If that were true, then we would automatically be creating scapegoats every time we attempted to solve a problem.

Quote:

---

There are, however, many exceptions. For example, despite your low estimation of her, Bird strikes me as a woman with a good deal of depth and authenticity in her thought.

---

For a woman, sure.

Quote:

---

Her thought is more sophisticated than that of most men.

---

Obviously, I disagree with you here. She is certainly very energetic in her thinking, as many women are, and can spiral out thoughts endlessly. But without a large degree of consistency and coherency in one's thinking, there can be no sophistication.

Whenever a well-educated, well-read woman speaks, she certainly sounds impressive. The ease of which she is able to express her thoughts; her command of the language; the way she is able to quote a variety of sources; her ability to be many-sided and present what seems to be an unbalanced view - it all seems very impressive on the surface and I never tire of admiring it on a certain level. But the problem is, the content of what they say almost never stands up to scrutiny.

It's a bit like what happens in school, where the girls write their essays with beautiful handwriting and surround it with lovely headings and margins and append a large bibliography of sources, and it all looks incredibly impressive. But then you read the actual content of these essays and you see that most of what is written is almost complete gibberish and barely coherent at all.

Women tend to get away with this sort of thing because we expect it from them and we rarely challenge it.

cassiopeiae
Registered User
Posts: 217
(1/19/04 2:17 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Suergaz: Cass?! The greater organism?! What is that then? You mean humanity? It is not equal to itself in as much as it is, ---separation, division, difference...are anything but superficial. They are ways that we create.

---

The greater organism meaning the envelopment of all things, living, nonliving, spiritual, mental...the entirety of the visual and esoteric universe. Isn't creation superficial, as it is a purely mundane trait?

By saying separation is purely superficial, I mean "if" there could be an outside observer to *our* universe, physical and spiritual, they would have to look very close to see each part that makes up the whole. We are made of millions of cells, each independent of the other, though together they are a body.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1300
(1/19/04 3:33 pm)
Reply

Re: GOST perspectives

---

Quote:

---

I've tried the sound and light machine, which also uses flashing red lights to induce this state. It was good and it worked but it's a bit impractical for sustained useage. Flotation can have a similar effect for different reasons.

---

I don't know what you mean, impractical. I have heard of that sound and light thing, and it is definitely related, but the folks at centerpointe have taken this technology and really refined it. I find meditation highly impractical, yet since starting this I have never missed a day. I can hardly account for such dutifulness on my part. I just think it gives a lot of reward. I put the headphones on at night and fall asleep most of the time. What could be easier?

so, check out www.centerpointe.com

It's not for nothing they have named their program "awakening".

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 24
(1/19/04 3:33 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

It will always be true that feminine consciousness can never enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

---

This is true, there is simply no need for woman to conquer this boundary. Although they most certainly can if they develop certain attributes, which obviously she can. Bird is touching on this in some way because she is far more intelligent than I and she may be able to articulate it.

silentsal
Registered User
Posts: 25
(1/19/04 3:37 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

---

ok clarify feminine consciousness rather than woman, woman is just the expected form for feminine consciousness

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2093
(1/19/04 5:12 pm)
Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

The greater organism meaning the envelopment of all things, living, nonliving, spiritual, mental...the entirety of the visual and esoteric universe. Isn't creation superficial, as it is a purely mundane trait?

---

everything else granted, but the envelopment, the development, the elopement of all things, is not an organism. (:D) I'm not saying we should elope!

Quote:

---

By saying separation is purely superficial, I mean "if" there could be an outside observer to *our* universe, physical and spiritual, they would have to look very close to see each part that makes up the whole. We are made of millions of cells, each independent of the other, though together they are a body.

---

There is no outside of a universe.

|                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2095(1/19/04 5:20 pm)Reply                                                                                | --- <hr/> silent sal, are you one of birds daughters?                                                                                |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 450(1/19/04 7:19 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> humanity bears the responsibility for the human condition Disagree. Evolution holds that responsibility. |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > GOST perspectives.

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2098(1/19/04 8:25 pm)Reply                                                                                   | ---- <hr/> How can you disagree? Humanity is a kind of evolution.                                                                   |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 453(1/19/04 10:43 pm)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Not it is not - it is just an effect.                                                                                |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 218(1/19/04 10:50 pm)Reply                                                                               | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> suergaz: There is no outside of a universe. <hr/> No kidding. I was making a point. |

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2099

(1/19/04 11:39 pm)

Reply

----

Jimhaz, anything that is conscious of its evolution becomes a kind of evolution.

Cass, know kidding.

Canadian Zoetrope

Registered User

Posts: 24

(1/20/04 6:50 am)

Reply

Women

David, your views on women are foolish and contradictory. Lets explore logic: Causality, cause and effect, the basis, of all logic reasoning. Newton's law of universal conservation, every cannot be created or destroyed, they all mean the same thing: Rationality.

However, deducing ANYTHING to it's simplest explanation inherently returns you to one question? Why, and the big answer my friend, the yang to the yin, the piece de resistance:

Women

Women are the universal manifestation of irrationality. One cannot be rational without irrational, one cannot be logical with out immagination, one cannot be male without female. So yes, in your universal declaration of all things right and wrong, you give yourself the conditions of an impenetrable argument, you forget one thing...

Logic is feminine.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2082

(1/20/04 8:54 am)

Reply

Re: Women

Well, feminine logic is certainly feminine, I grant you that.

We don't need to preserve the actual existence of irrationality and femininity in order to be rational and masculine. We can use our memories and imaginations to imagine their existence in order to create the necessary contrast. They don't need to physically exist at all.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 890

(1/20/04 10:45 am)

Reply

Re: Women

---

Bunch of cunts. Look what you've done to my 'be nice' thread.

I'm sick of all the to and fro, feminine this, causality that, my the other is better than your the other. I understand what I know. But it doesn't matter.

Make with the next stage Quinn.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 67

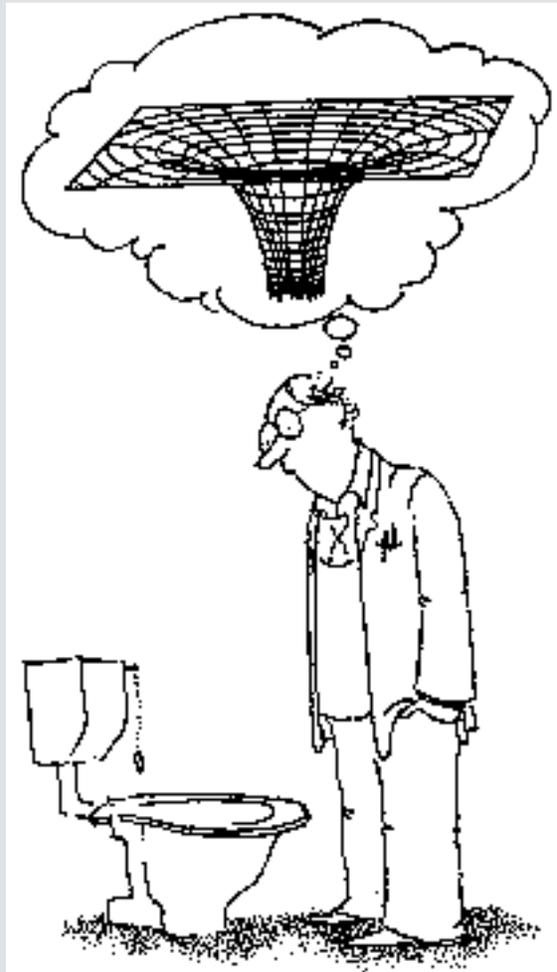

(1/20/04 11:53 am)

Reply

This seems appropriate yet again...

---

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1307

(1/20/04 11:57 am)

Reply

Re: Women

---

But Toast, you missed my reply to you. So I'll move it up here. Probably David missed his portion as well.

Re David's post-- I think Jesus was doing what you suspect the Buddha of doing - keeping an inferior like Peter around for his submissiveness and drive to build a church. Jesus' treatment of women was impeccable, and his example caused the early church to have women in positions of leadership, and some were given the title "equal to the apostles." They also lived like true communists. The likes of Peter, however, soon clamped down and we have the results you see today.

I even had the thought that it could have been misogyny that caused the ecumenical council to not include that gospel or passage of Thomas in the canon. Because, you see, Jesus made it sound so doable, giving women the ability to become living spirits. And in that case, it would be quite hard to reintroduce the old misogynies. No fun.

But I am not convinced Jesus really meant that, because he not only had to soothe Peter, he had to do so in a way that he could accept. Really, with that passage he gave women free passage.

Quote:

---

Well, as with most women, I find her thinking extremely incoherent in a deeper sense. She is like a female version of Thomas Knierim in the sense that they both read a lot and like to echo what they have read. It is only when they are in pure echoing mode that they begin to sound coherent and intelligent

---

David, if I thought you understood me better, I'd take your words more to heart. But if you see my words as incoherent with something I've advocated previously, I'd appreciate it if you'd point it out. I do read a lot, and I sometimes echo, especially something relatively new, but you might be surprised at how I take things that I've read and think about them, and draw my own conclusions, or store ideas for years on end and then when some new data comes along, I see the connection or put it to new use. I have a huge storehouse of my own theories, and what's really gratifying is when I find them corroborated years later in some book or research.

On the other hand, unlike some people, I have a lot to learn and can modify my views, as per below...

=====

Quote:

-----
Let's, for a second, interpret Mary as mother, or nature, and the male as the hidden void.... For every mundane being of the mother who will truly attempt to become one with the father will make themselves of the father.
-----

Wow, Toast, that is more or less the exact opposite of my thinking. It seems to me the void is the mother. Nature is the mother, but nature is actually the void, or the more visible aspect of the hidden void. The reason I think this way is that I see males and maleness as causing and representing order. Things becoming manifest, becoming discrete and separate and highly ordered, individual. Look at the male carrying the x and the y, whereas the woman carries only the x, and she has potential with every single egg to produce either sex, but the male determines which.

When you say nature, you probably are thinking of all the animals and plants and weather patterns, or perhaps quantum particles. But those are all formations that have arisen through nature.

Or perhaps the void is male, and somehow brings order (impregnates) to nature, and all the forms we see are the offspring...

But another thing I took some exception to was that the tone of your paragraph sounded rejecting of nature and of who we are. I don't think the goal is to return to the void, because then we wouldn't have life or consciousness or evolution as we know it. The goal is to be aware of the void, to know it and see it, and to go on living, refined and transformed inwardly.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

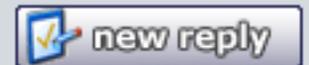

> Gravity Probe-B

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                        | Comment                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------|
| rushdl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 43(4/20/04 5:24 am)Reply | Gravity Probe-B<hr/> Gravity-Probe-B |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Healing

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 33(4/5/04 4:33 pm)Reply                                                                                   | Healing <hr/> I was wondering if there have been any enlightened sages that have healed or cured any physical (and possibly mental) ailments. Anyone know?                       |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 869(4/5/04 11:26 pm)Reply  | Re: Healing <hr/> Jesus and the Buddha were said to be able to do things like that. I know there have been others, but I just woke up, so I can't really think of any more.      |
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 34(4/6/04 11:33 am)Reply                                                                                  | Re: Healing <hr/> I have heard the same things about Jesus and the Buddha as well. Do you think only a few have such a capability or do you think all enlightened sages have it? |

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1686
(4/6/04 12:36 pm)
Reply

Re: Healing

---

Enlightened sages have the ability to heal physical ailments in the same sense that doctors, nurses and people who've done first aid courses can heal people. Other than that the idea if religious gibberish.

The sage can certainly help people heal themselves in psychological terms, in that he can help them rid themselves of their delusions.

Dan Rowden

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 870
(4/6/04 1:12 pm)
Reply

Re: Healing

---

Well I think that's a pretty dismissive statement, Dan.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 871
(4/6/04 1:13 pm)
Reply

Re: Healing

---

Barium Boy,

I think that on the path to enlightenment these types of powers can come to a person, and also after enlightenment a person can seek the powers out.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1544
(4/6/04 1:49 pm)
Reply

Re: Healing

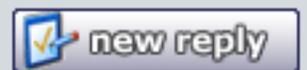

---

Aren't you enlightened, Scott?

Tharan

|                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 872(4/6/04 2:46 pm)Reply  | Re: Re: Healing <hr/> There's no such thing as enlightenment.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Barium BoyRegistered UserPosts: 35(4/6/04 8:01 pm)Reply                                                                                | Re: Re: Healing <hr/> Thanks for the responses. If anyone has more information on this topic, please share it here.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 122(4/9/04 3:06 pm)Reply                                                                             | Re: Re: Healing <hr/> A practitioner is one who practices mental and spiritual healing; and demonstrates for other than physical healing. The practitioner knows within himself the truth about his patient; and that self-knowingness rises into the consciousness of the patient. We treat man, not as a patient, not as a physical body, not as a diseased condition neither do we treat the disease as being connected with him nor a part of him. The practitioner realizes that man is born of Spirit and not of matter. Spirit is Changeless, Perfect and Complete. He realizes this until he sees his patient as a living embodiment of Perfection. For more on this read the book The Science of Mind by Ernest Holmes. |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

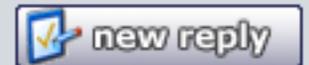

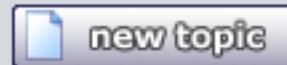

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> hell is other people: fate or farce?

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 57(1/8/04 8:28 am)Reply | hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Emile Cioran: "If we could see ourselves as others see us, we would vanish on the spot". This relates to Jean Paul Sartre's infamous speculation that "hell is other people". Sartre did not, of course, construe this in a circumstantial sense; he meant it in an ontologivcal sense: people are "hell" because they objectify us. In other words, they do not see us as we ARE, but as THEY are. As they THINK we are. Which is why human communication is so profoundly difficult at times. We cannot see the world as other do. And while our "worlds" may overlap in important respects---historically, culturally, existentially---there are just too many unique, indivdual experiences that can precipitate permutations that are nearly infinite. You can read a book [you found in a park] tomorrow that changes your life. You can have an experience that upends your whole scheme of things today. And, most fascinating of all is how the tiniest of permutations can snowball into consequences having an enormous impact on you or on others around you: On impulse you decide to stop in a bakery. You see someone wearing a tee-shirt with the image of a musician you admire. You strike up a conversation and become friends. Your friendship blossoms into a romance and she severs her engagement to another. The decision causes the man to commit |

|                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                 | suicide. From a sudden impulse to get a few donuts to a man's death. This is how we are all connected. It is both profoundly mysterious and profoundly mundane. Fate as farce? Biggie |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1392(1/8/04 12:34 pm)Reply                                                                          | hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> "When you understand, reality depends on you. When you don't understand, you depend on reality."--Bodhidharma Learn it. Live it.             |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 544(1/8/04 1:00 pm)Reply                                                                                | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Biggie, I love your situations. You should just make a topic full of those.                                                                                 |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1599(1/8/04 2:18 pm)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Sartre's problem was that he was a shallow thinker. Dan Rowden                                                                                       |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2045(1/10/04 11:32 am)Reply                                                                             | --- <hr/> And Simone de Beauvoir?                                                                                                                                                                          |

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ErichthoRegistered UserPosts: 2(1/11/04 12:15 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Hello again Biggie,Your comments are based upon a fundamental misunderstanding of Sartre. Sartre's comment "Hell is other people" is because we are objectified by them but this is not because they cannot understand us. All human beings share the same fundamental project and in this sense analysing and understanding other people is very possible. The objectification at the hands of other people rests more on the ensoi/poursoi distinction and the fact that we see other people as ensoi because our experiences are tied to a phenomenological point-of-view which we cannot escape. Edited by: Erichtho at: 1/11/04 12:15 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 60(1/12/04 8:52 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Erichtho, You misconstrue Sartre in your way and I'll misconstrue him in mine. ; ) Seriously though that is one of the most profound observations I can offer anyone. As we discussed over and over again in the Ponderer's Guild, you cannot [in my opinion, of course] "analyze or understand" anyone objectively respecting 1] human ethics 2] aesthetic values 3] emotional and psychological states 4] human identity and 5] ontological inquiries. Further, in my view, Sartre blinked. He blinked because he did not apply nearly enough his own conjecture about how others objectify us to how we objectify our own essentially meaningless and absurd "self". That's the biggest con game of them all!! Human identity is, by and large, a delusion. Folks like Cioran and Beckett and Eco grasped this intuitively. Most do not; and they do not because they cannot deal with the numbing horror of human existence as merely a brute, naked facticity. No right and wrong. No good or bad. No more or less authentic way to think and feel and live. Instead they invent [among other things] Metaphysics and Philosophy and Ultimate Reality. Or they analyze to death What Words Mean. Literally to death in some cases. Although, from time to time, I am able to liberate some from the madness of Logic and Epistemology and Absolute Truth. Not you though, right? ; ) |

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1396
(1/12/04 10:37 am)
Reply

---

---

Oh, pity the poor existentialist. Someone throw him a cookie.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2003
(1/12/04 11:38 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggie wrote:

Quote:

---

And, most fascinating of all is how the tiniest of permutations can snowball into consequences having an enormous impact on you or on others around you:

On impulse you decide to stop in a bakery. You see someone wearing a tee-shirt with the image of a musician you admire. You strike up a conversation and become friends. Your friendship blossoms into a romance and she severs her engagement to another. The decision causes the man to commit suicide.

From a sudden impulse to get a few donuts to a man's death. This is how we are all connected.

It is both profoundly mysterious and profoundly mundane.

---

It's called cause and effect, which makes up the body of Reality.

|                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 61(1/13/04 1:26 am)Reply       | Re: --- <hr/> Tharan, Is that what you have been reduced to---retorts? A shame. But par for the course when metaphysical minds confront one like my own. B.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1398(1/13/04 5:35 am)Reply | -- <hr/> Retorts take no thought. What makes you think you deserve more of my time and attention at this point? You have your opinions and have no intention of wavering from them, so why should I give you more than a retort? Your self-pity is ridiculous and pathetic. What else needs to be said? I am open-minded, go ahead...prove me wrong. Tharan                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 62(1/13/04 9:24 am)Reply       | Re: -- <hr/> Tharan, See, now you are making it personal. That's a dead giveaway respecting just how discomfiting my points are making you feel. With me it is never personal. It is only polemics. It becomes personal, in my opinion, only for those who are generally upset because another is effectively deconstructing their carefully manicured Reality. They spent a lot of time and committed a lot of effort to getting reality Just Right. Then someone like me comes along with arguments they are woefully unprepared to deal with intelligently. So, they make ME the argument instead. It is all so sadly transparent. Again, I would advise you to just skip my posts. You are in way, way, way over your head with me. You are still at the white belt stage, my friend. And my belt is black as the ace of spades. In | other words, when you discuss philosophy with a mind like mine it is always two outs in the bottom of the ninth in the 7th game of the World Series. Strike out and the humiliation is especially excruciating, eh?

See, THAT'S polemics, my friend!

Nothing personal. ; )

Biggie

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 63
(1/13/04 9:34 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

Cause and effect? Well, I would imagine that Ultimate Reality is derived from the very first cause and the very first effect. Right?

Would you be so kind then as to encompass [in as much detail as you are able] What Happened Then.

Thanks,

Biggie

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2008
(1/13/04 9:40 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

Cause and effect? Well, I would imagine that Ultimate Reality is derived from the very first cause and the very first effect. Right?

---

Since all things have causes, there can be no first cause.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1231
(1/13/04 10:47 am)
Reply

--

---

Quote:

---

It becomes personal, in my opinion, only for those who are generally upset because another is effectively deconstructing their carefully manicured Reality. You are in way, way, way over your head with me.

---

There's no point, Wolf. He's far less rational than I had given him credit for. He has sealed the cracks with bitumen and pitch. It's watertight. He actually thinks it is we who cannot understand him. He's as impregnable as a Baptist. A fundamentalist.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2011
(1/13/04 11:17 am)
Reply

Re: --

---

Agreed.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 403
(1/13/04 11:31 am)
Reply

Stop googling, Paul

---

http://www.findarticles.com/cf\_dls/m1077/6\_54/54216331/p1/article.jhtml

Keep your Faith, Biggie!

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 64
(1/14/04 1:55 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

Would you mind encompassing in some detail WHY we should believe that cosmogeny is embedded in infintiy?

Please elaborate, for example, on how you KNOW there was no first cause.

Surely in a philosophy venue we are not just expected to take your word for it, are we? I mean, when I was in Sunday School I was told a lot of things I was expected to embrace as The Truth. But that was called faith. Blind faith. And while I do understand Paul's point about keeping my own, I am not the one in here claiming to speak in the name of ULTIMATE Reality, right?

I readily admit that how I understand the world around me flows from within my own unique existential trajectory from the cradle to the grave. I would never be so foolish as to suppose how I see things is The Way They Are. And I certainly would never demand that others merely accept my opinions "because I just KNOW they are True!!"

Like you do?

Biggie

Edited by: Biggier at: 1/14/04 2:00 am

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2019
(1/14/04 7:41 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

Would you mind encompassing in some detail WHY we should believe that cosmogeny is embedded in infintiy?

Please elaborate, for example, on how you KNOW there was no first cause.

---

Because that would mean something popping into existence without cause, which is logically impossible. A detailed proof of this can be found in chapter 2 of my book.

Quote:

---

I readily admit that how I understand the world around me flows from within my own unique existential trajectory from the cradle to the grave. I would never be so foolish as to suppose how I see things is The Way They Are.

---

And yet you are doing this very thing. You are Asserting in Strong, Authoritative Terms that anyone who claims that they know Ultimate Reality is automatically deluded. You are Proclaiming this as The Way Things Are.

Quote:

---

And I certainly would never demand that others merely accept my opinions "because I just KNOW they are True!!"

---

I have provided an abundance of proofs and reasonings to back up my statements, both in my posts and in my book.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 65
(1/15/04 9:39 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

All you do [in my view] is to deduce premises. They must be true, you insist, because [it is assumed] all of the words used in the deductions are true. It's like Kant in the Critique of Practical Reason respecting human ethics.

Ah, but Immanuel blinked, didn't he? Bingo: God!!

No, not the Dude with the long white beard up in Heaven, of course, but God nonetheless. Now, he can't prove any of this, can he? The "proof", instead, is to be inferred from the a priori dedcutions. God is embedded in the noumena. And the really neat thing about that is this: we are not privy to it at all. So, gee, how can we expect Kant to "prove" its existence, eh?

Similarly, you act as though space and time always existing is actually more "logical" then nothing at all existing---and then space and time just popping out of it. As though either rendition was amenable to Logic. It is the same as insisting that existence is more logical than no existence at all. Out that far on the metaphysical limb, however, rational thought itself implodes into the philosophical equivalent of a black hole. That is, for all intents and purposes, right around the ontological/teleological corner from God, my friend.

So, what you do is to "deduce" THIS cosmogenic "essense" rather than THAT one. As though you actually COULD do this from this teeny tiny planet in the staggering expanse of All There Is!!!! You don't know squat about ULTIMATE reality, do you? Though I do not doubt you THINK you do.

Trapping me in the language I use will get you nowhere in discussions about metaphysics. Language, after all, is all we have at our disposal isn't it? It's not as though we can perform actual experiments like the hard guys do to test or to verify our conjectures about What It ALL Means, right? Sure, it's fun to speculate about the most primordial of inquires. But we don't go around deluding ourselves that we actually DID Figure It All Out. I'm just honest enough to admit it.

For you, "proof" is just a bunch of words insisting that a bunch of other words are True. It is grounded in nothing but abstractions and assumptions and gigantic leaps of faith. To use my favorite analogy you are like the Brilliant Engineer who builds the world's most Brilliant Race Car. One day Biggie stops by the Brilliant Garage and notes it is spotless.

BIGGIE: Haven't you taken it out on the road yet? You know, to test drive it?

BRILLIANT ENGINEER [looking incredulous]: why in the world would I want to do that?!!

BIGGIE: Well, out in the real world there are potholes and and icestorms and falling boulders and hair-pin turns and intersections and other drivers juggling their cell phones while gulping down coffee. You can even take it off road and see how it handles in vastly different conditions.

BRILLIANT ENGINEER [even more incredulous]: But it's all right here! It's in the manual!! Read THAT!!! It's all you need.

No, in me own humble opinion, I don't think so.

Biggie

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2033(1/15/04 10:03 am)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> All you have to do is provide an example of a thing which isn't caused and I will be persuaded to your point of view. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> hell is other people: fate or farce?

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 68(1/16/04 8:29 am)Reply | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> David, That's it? That is your response to all of the points I raised above? And because I was born in 1948 and was not around billions of years ago to confirm astrophysicists' contention that the Big Bang started all that we now know of as Existence....that Proves your own Ultimate Reality is True? Is THAT your actual contention? By the way, how do you feel about the Big Bang? How does it "fit" into your own sense of UR? Is the science behind it simply preposterous? And suppose I throw in the towel and concede: okay, existence is infinite and was not caused. How exactly does that Prove YOUR Ultimate Reality is THE Ultimate Reality...and not one of god knows how many others that have been proposed over the centuries? If you and 9 others believe yours is The One, fine. I can't demonstrate that you are wrong, that's for sure. But it might be while before you get number 10 in the fold if you don't start being a bit less obtuse regarding your evidence. Biggie Biggie |

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2046
(1/16/04 8:55 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

That's it? That is your response to all of the points I raised above?

And because I was born in 1948 and was not around billions of years ago to confirm astrophysicists' contention that the Big Bang started all that we now know of as Existence....that Proves your own Ultimate Reality is True?

---

No, as I've said before, I've already logically proven to myself the reality of everything being caused. But since you were raising an objection to it, I asked you to provide evidence and proof that your objection is valid. It is the standard procedure in analytical discussion.

Quote:

---

By the way, how do you feel about the Big Bang?

---

I have no opinion on it. It makes no difference to my philosophical knowledge either way.

As a scientific theory, I don't find it as convincing as, say, the theory of evolution. Whereas the latter has masses of supporting evidence from a wide variety of sources, the Big Bang model has relatively little solid evidence. Much of the theory is propped up by theoretical speculation, which makes it appear flaky.

Of course, I don't believe for a second that the Big Bang (assuming that it is a reality) just sprang into existence out of nothing. If the Big Bang did occur, it would have been caused to occur, just like anything else that occurs in Nature.

Quote:

---

And suppose I throw in the towel and concede: okay, existence is infinite and was not caused. How exactly does that Prove YOUR Ultimate Reality is THE Ultimate Reality... and not one of god knows how many others that have been proposed over the centuries?

---

Because nothing can exist outside of cause and effect.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 69
(1/16/04 12:54 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

Your proof about everything being caused....

YOU believe it is logically correct. Again, fine. Congratulations. But there is a whole world out there filled with very, very bright [professional] minds [philosophers, physicists, futurists, engineers, skeptics etc] who would love to have you demonstrate this to be Absolutely True. So, what in the world are you doing peddling it in HERE?! ; )

Admittedly, I don't have a damned clue about the actual physics behind the Big Bang but truly gifted minds that do embrace it. They go into astonishing detail in explaining how the present day universe only makes sense if there was a Big Bang. And a Big Bang, to me sounds an awful lot like another way of saying a Big First Cause. And, again, you can speculate until you are blue in the face about something creating the Big Bang [out of nothing at all--- which many phycists claim is what the BB did, in fact, erupt out of] but that does not exactly constitute hard evidence does it?

I ask you why YOUR UR is THE UR and you tell me "because nothing can exist outside of cause and effect". As if THAT was all that needed to be said!!!

Please try again, okay?

Biggie

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1419
(1/16/04 1:00 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

DQ wrote to Big,

Quote:

---

All you have to do is provide an example of a thing which isn't caused and I will be persuaded to your point of view.

---

Brilliant concession. That is a definite checkmate.

Big?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2058
(1/16/04 1:33 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

Your proof about everything being caused....

YOU believe it is logically correct. Again, fine.
Congratulations. But there is a whole world out there filled with very, very bright [professional] minds [philosophers, physicists, futurists, engineers, skeptics etc] who would love to have you demonstrate this to be Absolutely True. So, what in the world are you doing peddling it in HERE?! ; )

---

There is nowhere else to peddle it. The bright professional minds that you speak of aren't all that bright or professional when it comes to deep truths like cause and effect. It either goes completely over their heads such that they cannot comprehend it at all (a bit like your good self), or if they do have some understanding of it, they nevertheless cannot perceive its usefulness. So my life as a philosopher is somewhat akin to continually pointing to empty space.

Quote:

---

Admittedly, I don't have a damned clue about the actual physics behind the Big Bang but truly gifted minds that do embrace it. They go into astonishing detail in explaining how the present day universe only makes sense if there was a Big Bang. And a Big Bang, to me sounds an awful lot like another way of saying a Big First Cause. And, again, you can speculate until you are blue in the face about something creating the Big Bang [out of nothing at all--- which many physicists claim is what the BB did, in fact, erupt out of] but that does not exactly constitute hard evidence does it?

---

It does, if you have the eyes to see it. Pure logic is far more cutting and powerful than empirical evidence when it comes to fundamental issues.

Quote:

---

I ask you why YOUR UR is THE UR and you tell me "because nothing can exist outside of cause and effect". As if THAT was all that needed to be said!!!

---

Whatever exists is necessarily composed of cause and effect. There is no room for any other reality.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 755
(1/16/04 2:53 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David: All you have to do is provide an example of a thing which isn't caused and I will be persuaded to your point of view.

Wolf: Brilliant concession. That is a definite checkmate.

Not rushed conclusions, please! I think that BB wasn't a bad example. Obviously BB cannot be 'caused' because spacetime begins with it. But if David thinks that the BB theory is too "flaky", then how about quantum fluctuation?

Thomas

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1420
(1/16/04 3:25 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote,

Quote:

---

Obviously BB cannot be 'caused' because spacetime begins with it.

---

"Spacetime" is a concept you and I have mapped over the current conceptualization of reality. Even so, this does not logically discount some form of existence before the BB.

Tharan

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 757
(1/16/04 6:17 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Tharan: "Spacetime" is a concept you and I have mapped over the current conceptualization of reality. Even so, this does not logically discount some form of existence before the BB.

It certainly does discount some form of existence before the Big Bang, simply because the word before indicates spatiotemporal relation. It may be possible that there is a form of existence that has no spatiotemporal relation to this universe. It may also be that this form of existence has something to do with the Big Bang, but the relation could not be explained in terms of causality, because causality requires -among other things- spatiotemporal relation. This is actually a forum oldie, isn't it?

What about quantum phenomena? What about the probabilistic nature of the wave function and Bell's falsification of the hidden variables theory? Wouldn't that be a good example of God rolling dice, an acausal (non-deterministic) process in nature?

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 1/16/04 6:25 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2060

(1/16/04 7:18 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas Knierim:

Quote:

---

Obviously BB cannot be 'caused' because spacetime begins with it.

---

The theory only states that our particular bubble of space-time was created by the Big Bang. It says nothing one way or the other about the existence of other previous bubbles of space-time.

Quote:

---

What about quantum phenomena?

---

I dealt with this subject in detail in Chaper 2 of my book. As an objection against causality, it is a non-starter.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 759

(1/16/04 9:56 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas: What about quantum phenomena?

David: I dealt with this subject in detail in Chaper 2 of my book. As an objection against causality, it is a non-starter.

I am sorry for being blunt, but as an objection to acausality, Chapter 2 of your book is a non-starter. You basically say that if quantum states aren't caused in an explicable way they must be caused in an inexplicable way. Both ways they're caused. Neither do you offer any speculations as to what might constitute "inexplicable causation", nor do you provide a semantic analysis of the term "causation".

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2062

(1/17/04 8:07 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

I am sorry for being blunt, but as an objection to acausality, Chapter 2 of your book is a non-starter. You basically say that if quantum states aren't caused in an explicable way they must be caused in an inexplicable way.

---

I went into it much more deeply than this. I hope you read other people's books more carefully than you read mine. In Chapter 2, I demonstrated how it was logically impossible for anything at all to not be a product of causal conditions. The reasoning I offered cannot be refuted.

Quote:

---

Neither do you offer any speculations as to what might constitute "inexplicable causation",

---

Superficial stuff that scientists can waste their time on.

Quote:

---

nor do you provide a semantic analysis of the term "causation".

---

More superficial stuff that Wittgenstein wannabies can waste their time on. The book makes it pretty clear that the phrase "everything is caused" refers to the way in which things are products of other things, that a thing cannot pop into existence unaided. It's very straightforward. What is there to analyze?

--

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/17/04 8:27 am

Biggier

Registered User

Posts: 71

(1/17/04 12:17 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

You and I both know that IF you were actually able to demonstrate that your own rendition of UR was, in fact, The True One, there would be any number of distinguished minds out there ready, willing and able to test it.

And if they did and confirmed it you would then become the lead story on Entertainment Tonight; instead of Michael Jackson. For that reason alone I beg you to roll the dice and go public with it. ; )

Pointing to empty space, eh? Well, okay, THAT part admittedly, does make a lot of sense to me. ; )

PURE logic = YOUR logic?

Wow, I'm a poet!!

When you say things like "whatever exists is necessarily composed of cause and effect" that is like someone showing you a photograph of those being herded into Hitler's gas chambers and then step by step pointing out how this led to that..and that led to this...and this led to that. Starting from the moment they were taken from their homes in the Ghetto [or from the moment they were born?] to the time they actually walked into the gas chamber itself. Then when someone asks about the moral or political contexts you scratch your head and once again go through every single interaction that had to occur in order for the photograph to depict what it does. Again, it smacks of this blind determinism where ethical considerations are moot because they are all merely subsumed mechanically in the Cause and Effect of UR. Well, your UR, anyway.

That, in my view, is a very, very scary way to think because it obviates all moral responsibility. We become like 6,000,000,000 dominos on planet Earth. Once the first one is toppled the rest just topple in turn--- As It Was Meant To BE.

Biggie

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1282

(1/17/04 1:54 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Quote:

---

It certainly does discount some form of existence before the Big Bang, simply because the word before indicates spatiotemporal relation. It may be possible that there is a form of existence that has no spatiotemporal relation to this universe.

---

It surprised me when I found out the many people come to the conclusion that the Big Bang could be a first cause.

If ours is the first universe, the big bang still did not come out of nothing.

But it seems more likely that it is not the first, or at least, will not be the last.

One possible explanation of a big bang, which has apparently occurred to many people besides myself, is that black holes are universes in the making. Obviously they are increasing in density, and eventually something has to give?

Or, if the universe collapses on itself, then there could be a period of no time between the two manifestations, with spacetime collapsing and expanding again along with matter.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2066

(1/17/04 5:11 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

You and I both know that IF you were actually able to demonstrate that your own rendition of UR was, in fact, The True One, there would be any number of distinguished minds out there ready, willing and able to test it.

---

There have indeed been many distinguished minds that have tested it and confirmed its reality. But in doing so, they too have become largely invisible to mainstream society. This hidden movement of thinkers and sages very rarely enters the public eye, save for the occasional Jesus or Buddha.

Quote:

---

And if they did and confirmed it you would then become the lead story on Entertainment Tonight; instead of Michael Jackson. For that reason alone I beg you to roll the dice and go public with it. ; )

---

They have done it and confirmed it, and yet alas, no lead story on Entertainment Tonight.

Quote:

---

When you say things like "whatever exists is necessarily composed of cause and effect" that is like someone showing you a photograph of those being herded into Hitler's gas chambers and then step by step pointing out how this led to that..and that led to this...and this led to that. Starting from the moment they were taken from their homes in the Ghetto [or from the moment they were born?] to the time they actually walked into the gas chamber itself. Then when someone asks about the moral or political contexts you scratch your head and once again go through every single interaction that had to occur in order for the photograph to depict what it does. Again, it smacks of this blind determinism where ethical considerations are moot because they are all merely subsumed mechanically in the Cause and Effect of UR. Well, your UR, anyway.

That, in my view, is a very, very scary way to think because it obviates all moral responsibility.

---

It is irrational and irresponsible to block out a truth simply because it undermines an attachment that you have to a particular point of view, such as "moral responsibility". The entire Nazi movement itself was steeped in this process of blocking out truth for the sake of their attachments, and look what happened there. If you want to live a truly ethical life, then you have to base your system of ethics upon the truth. Otherwise your behaviour remains false and, in the long term, can only create far more harm than good.

An awareness of cause and effect makes one more conscious of the consequences of one's actions, and thus increases one's sense of responsibility towards others and one's power to do good. One becomes more and more aware of just how much is at stake in everything that one does.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 72
(1/18/04 9:21 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

Okay, please name these "distinguished minds". HOW distinguished? How did they go about confirming your points? How did they go about testing and replicating your views? What was the methodology employed. Please don't tell me you merely expressed your view, they listened and then said, "Yep, sounds reasonable to me".

And what about the $1,000,000 Randi award? Go claim it. I mean, what could possibly be more "supernatural" than Ultimate Reality? After all, most folks call that God, right?

If the Nazis are part of Ultimate Reality how can you hold them responsible for ANYthing they did? What choice did they have in your ontological Cause and Effect world? And basing his life on The Truth is exactly what Adolph claimed to be doing. In fact, he wrote a book about it. Mein Kampf. It may as well have been sub-titled: "Ultimate Reality and the Jews".

You are not being clear, in my view, about UR and its relationship to determinism and free will. In other words, is your UR a metaphysical construct? Does it express an Absolute Truth? If so, is this embedded in an ontological Cause and Effect such that human autonomy and freedom are effectively obviated by being subsumed IN the UR?

Biggie

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2074

(1/19/04 11:14 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

Biggier wrote:

Quote:

---

Okay, please name these "distinguished minds".

---

As I say, most of them are invisible to mainstream society. Those who have caught the public eye include Diogenes, Socrates, Lao Tzu, Buddha, Jesus, Chuang Tzu, Huang Po, Hakuin, Miester Eckhart, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche.

Quote:

---

HOW distinguished?

---

They are the greatest thinkers on earth.

Quote:

---

How did they go about confirming your points?

---

They are not "my" points. The great truths of Nature are timeless and owned by no one.

How did they confirm these truths? By thinking.

Quote:

---

How did they go about testing and replicating your views?

---

By thinking.

Quote:

---

What was the methodology employed?

---

Thinking.

Quote:

---

And what about the $1,000,000 Randi award? Go claim it.

---

I wasn't aware that Randi had an award for knowing Reality. Even if he has, he probably doesn't have the wisdom or knowledge to make a proper judgment. For if he did, he would have to award the money to himself.

Quote:

---

I mean, what could possibly be more "supernatural" than Ultimate Reality? After all, most folks call that God, right?

---

Since Ultimate Reality refers to Nature itself, there is nothing supernatural about it.

Quote:

---

If the Nazis are part of Ultimate Reality how can you hold them responsible for ANYthing they did?

---

Yes, it is true that the Nazis weren't ultimately responsible for what they did, since their every thought and action was caused. In a fundamental sense, they are as blameless as a newborn babe. Nature was the doer of it all.

However, I personally condemn the Nazi movement because its values were shallow and their beliefs irrational, and because Hitler was a very stupid man. There was nothing about the Nazi movement that was conducive to the promotion of wisdom, which is what I fundamentally value in life. Thus, I have no desire to see anything similar arise again - although it surely will because people everywhere are shallow, irrational and stupid.

Quote:

---

You are not being clear, in my view, about UR and its relationship to determinism and free will. In other words, is your UR a metaphysical construct? Does it express an Absolute Truth? If so, is this embedded in an ontological Cause and Effect such that human autonomy and freedom are effectively obviated by being subsumed IN the UR?

---

I explored this issue in great detail in chapters 3 and 4 in my book.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1291
(1/19/04 11:39 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Quote:

---

and because Hitler was a very stupid man.

---

Plus he was homosexual.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 1/19/04 2:10 pm

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 64
(1/19/04 1:45 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

I like Biggier. He keeps us honest. His existentialism is really quite useful in that it can help us examine our motivations for holding the views we hold. If someone can show me that I am clinging to something simply because I am afraid of the 'brute' and seeking to invent meaning, that person is my friend. Why? Because I want to hold opinions and form beliefs that are justified by more than just my 'all too human' desire to have them be so. Those of us who do philosophy run this risk daily! Avoiding it is like trying to catch a tuna in a sea full of sharks. It is all too easy and all too tempting to slowly, imperceptibly start to believe things just because they offer us some comfort. If we want the wonderful, horrible truth, however, we need people like Biggier around to keep us on our toes. This is why, as much as we might be tempted to snipe at them, we should thank them instead.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 760
(1/19/04 1:49 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas: I am sorry for being blunt, but as an objection to acausality, Chapter 2 of your book is a non-starter. You basically say that if quantum states aren't caused in an explicable way they must be caused in an inexplicable way.

David: I went into it much more deeply than this. I hope you read other people's books more carefully than you read mine.

Okay, then let's go through it in detail, shall we? In chapter two of your book, you begin to argue against non-determinism in quantum theory by first explaining that virtual particles arise because there is no force in the universe that prevents their arising. You conclude that the absence of this force causes virtual particles to exist, hence virtual particles are caused.

There is really no argument here at all. One could similarly reason that children are caused because of the absence of a force in the universe that prevents children from coming out of female bodies, hence, children are caused. Even the most ignorant person would dismiss this argument. The causes of children obviously have something to do with eggs and sperm, not with the presence or absence of a mysterious force. Chapter two continues with raving lunacy:

It does not really matter if such a force actually exists or not. Just the fact that we can imagine its existence is enough to validate the argument. It proves that quantum particle pairings are indeed dependent upon the right causal conditions for their arising, the same as anything else in the Universe.

Poppycock. Piffle. Balderdash. Jabberwocky. But it gets even better:

The pairing is also dependent upon the Universe possessing a natural tendency to spontaneously produce them in the first place. If the Universe was set up in a different way, or if it did not exist at all, then it would be impossible for the pairing to arise. Similarly, if there was no space or time or quarks, or if there was no Big Bang to begin with.

What a brain wave. So, if there was no Big Bang to begin with, then there would be no quantum fluctuation. Yes, that seems right. Obviously this is true for EVERY phenomenon, since not a single phenomenon can be imagined to exist without a surrounding universe. So what does this say about causation? Right, it says absolutely NOTHING about causation. It does certainly not say anything about quantum fluctuation. In chapter two you continue making fallacious statements:

In a similar vein, the scientific assertion that subatomic particles arise without cause is one made from a practical standpoint, rather than from the ultimate one. Physicists assert it because they cannot yet find causes (or "background conditions") for the particle that fall within their area of interest.

This description misses the point insofar that the background conditions of quantum phenomena are extremely well known. Quantum mechanics is now a hundred years old (Planck stated the idea of energy quantization first in 1900). It is a well corroborated theory that has been verified experimentally over and over. The philosophical problem arises from the fact that only non-deterministic models can explain quantum phenomena. In particular, we can get an adequate picture of reality only by replacing the classical deterministic model with a probabilistic one, such as the probability cloud model of bound electrons in an atom. In this model, the electron's position can be at any point in a defined area around the atom core, but it is impossible to say where exactly the electron will be at a given point in time, although it is possible to say with what likelihood it will be at a given point in space. Moreover, there is no transition from one position to another. This means that the electron is in fact not moving from A to B, but that it is either at A or at B. So, what does this do to causality? Why is the particle at A, then at B? Physics cannot tell us why, and what is more, it proves that it is impossible to do so. It is not possible to describe the trajectory of a bound electron, because the electron has no trajectory (as Einstein assumed).

In Chapter Two, David continues to deal with antimatter pairs:

Protestations from the physics community notwithstanding, a positron-electron pairing always has causes. They may not be causes that we are easily able to recognize or can model with perfect precision, but that does not undermine the logical truth that they do have causes. All it means is that our physical and mathematical tools are too currently limited to observe them.

This paragraph essentially says -as previously mentioned- that if quantum phenomena are not explicable in terms of causality, then there must be an inexplicable type of causality responsible for them. Oh well. That is a complete non-argument. Besides, I don't know why you keep hammering on quantum fluctuation. There are many other quantum phenomena that cannot be modeled deterministically. Are you sure that you understand non-determinism? I am asking this question since your book suggests that you don't. You would not bring up the surrounding-universe-background-condition type of argument if you understood what non-deterministic processes are. The fact that certain phenomena exist only under certain conditions does not disprove these processes are non-deterministic in nature.

Also, your book fails to mention alternative philosophical interpretations of quantum phenomena which have been brought forward for some time. Seeing that you argue in favor of classical causality, it comes as a surprise that you don't bring up any of these "stronger" determinist arguments. Are you aware that there are alternatives to the Copenhagen interpretation?

Thomas

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 1/19/04 5:45 pm

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2077

(1/19/04 5:26 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

In chapter two of your book, you begin to argue against non-determinism in quantum theory by first explaining that virtual particles arise because there is no force in the universe that prevents their arising. You conclude that the absence of this force causes virtual particles to exist, hence virtual particles are caused.

There is really no argument here at all.

---

To prove the truth of universal determinism, we only have to demonstrate that the occurrence of non-determinism is logically impossible. This means showing that an event cannot arise independently of causal conditions. Since a particle necessarily depends on a destructive force not being there at the moment of its birth, this is enough to show that it cannot arise independently of causal conditions.

Quote:

---

One could similarly reason that children are caused because of the absence of a force in the universe that prevents children from popping out of female bodies, hence, children are caused. Even the most ignorant person would dismiss this argument. The causes of children obviously have something to do with eggs and sperm, not with the presence or absence of a mysterious force.

---

Because we are already aware that children are caused, we don't have to go to the trouble of creating a proof to demonstrate they are caused. But if we met someone who had a mental block and declared that children arise without any cause at all, then we can always invoke the destructive force scenario to prove him wrong if needs be.

Quote:

---

Thomas: Chapter two continues with raving lunacy:

DQ: It does not really matter if such a force actually exists or not. Just the fact that we can imagine its existence is enough to validate the argument. It proves that quantum particle pairings are indeed dependent upon the right causal conditions for their arisal, the same as anything else in the Universe.

Thaoms: Poppycock. Piffle. Balderdash. Jabberwocky.

---

I am assuming from this that you can't think of a coherent argument.

Quote:

---

Thomas: But it gets even better:

DQ: The pairing is also dependent upon the Universe possessing a natural tendency to spontaneously produce them in the first place. If the Universe was set up in a different way, or if it did not exist at all, then it would be impossible for the pairing to arise. Similarly, if there was no space or time or quarks, or if there was no Big Bang to begin with.

Thomas: What a brain wave. So, if there was no Big Bang to begin with, then there would be no quantum fluctuation. Yes, that seems right. But apparently this is true for EVERY phenomenon, since not a sinle phenomenon can be imagined to exist with a surrounding universe. So what does this say about causation? Right, it says absolutely NOTHING about causation. It does certainly not say anything about quantum fluctuation.

---

It says that quantum fluctuation is a causal phenomenon, with the Big Bang being one its causes.

Quote:

---

Thomas: In chapter two you continue making fallacious statements as follows:

DQ: In a similar vein, the scientific assertion that subatomic particles arise without cause is one made from a practical standpoint, rather than from the ultimate one. Physicists assert it because they cannot yet find causes (or "background conditions") for the particle that fall within their area of interest.

Thomas: This description misses the point isofar that the background conditions of quantum phenomena are known extremely well. Quantum mechanics is now a hundred years old (Planck stated the idea of energy quantization first in 1900). It is a well corroborated theory that has been verified experimentally over and over. The philosophical problem arises from the fact that the only models that work are non-deterministic models. This means we can get an adequate picture of reality only by replacing the classical deterministic model with a probabilistic one, such as the probability cloud model of bound electrons in an atom.

---

It sounds as though you have a different conception of "non-determinism" to me. For you, it seems that non-determinism is a function, not of the Universe itself, but of our ability to make predictions. Because we can only currently predict sub-atomic particles with "non-deterministic" models (i.e. statistical models), you're saying that the particles themselves are non-deterministic, irrespective of whether or not they are completely causal in nature from the Universe's perspective. Is that right?

Quote:

---

In this model, the electron's position can be at any point in a defined area around the atom core, but it is impossible to say where exactly the electron will be at a given point in time, although it is possible to say with what likelihood it will be at a given point in space.

---

Just as it is impossible to say where exactly a couple of dice will land when thrown on a table, even though we have a rough idea of where they'll end up.

Quote:

---

This means that the electron is in fact not moving from A to B, but that it is either at A or at B.

---

Just as a train could either be at Central Station or Bond Street Station.

Quote:

---

So, what does this do to causality? Why is the particle at A, then at B? Physics cannot tell us why, and what is more, it proves that it is impossible to do so. It is not possible to describe the trajectory of a bound electron, because the electron has no trajectory (as Einstein assumed).

---

It may or may not have a trajectory, but either way the law of causality isn't broken. If it doesn't have a trajectory, then then it is likely that some kind of hidden mechanism is at work, one that we are currently unaware of.

Quote:

---

Thomas: In Chapter Two, David continues to deal with antimatter pairs:

DQ: Protestations from the physics community notwithstanding, a positron-electron pairing always has causes. They may not be causes that we are easily able to recognize or can model with perfect precision, but that does not undermine the logical truth that they do have causes. All it means is that our physical and mathematical tools are too currently limited to observe them.

Thomas: This paragraph essentially says -as previously mentioned- that if quantum phenomena are not explicable in terms of causality, then there must be an inexplicable type of causality responsible for them.

---

The paragraph isn't saying this at all. It is saying that if we can't see the causes of an object, it doesn't mean they are not there. It simply means that we are currently limited in our ability to see them.

Quote:

---

Besides, I don't know why you keep hammering on quantum fluctuation. There are many other quantum phenomena that cannot be modelled deterministically.

---

Of course. But the points I make about quantum fluctuation are just as applicable to any other quantum phenomena, or indeed to any phenomena at all which is imagined to be uncaused.

Quote:

---

Also, your book fails to mention alternative philosophical interpretations of quantum phenomena which have been brought forward for some time. Seeing that you argue in favor of classical causality, it comes as a surprise that you don't bring up any of these "stronger" determinist arguments.

---

I haven't been impressed with them thus far. What's the best one, in your view?

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> hell is other people: fate or farce?

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 762(1/19/04 6:48 pm)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> David: Since a particle necessarily depends on a destructive force not being there at the moment of its birth, this is enough to show that it cannot arise independently of causal conditions. Bilge. Bosh. Bunkum. Flapdoodle. The existence of a particle does not depend at all on the presence or absence of an IMAGINED force or any other IMAGINED magnitude. Physics deals exclusively with what is observable, not with what is imaginable. David: It says that quantum fluctuation is a causal phenomenon, with the Big Bang being one its causes. If you say that quantum fluctuation is caused by the Big Bang then that is plainly wrong. The error here lies in the misapplication of language. A surrounding universe does not qualify as a cause. It is certainly a necessary condition (for everything), but it is not sufficient to explain quantum phenomena. It is therefore not a cause. You did not give much thought to Hume, did you? David: Because we can only currently predict sub-atomic particles with "non-deterministic" models (i.e. statistical models), you're saying that the particles themselves are non-deterministic, irrespective of whether or not they are completely causal in nature from the Universe's perspective. Is that right? This is what the Copenhagen interpretation of quantum mechanics says |

(originally brought forward by Bohr).

David: It sounds as though you have a different conception of "non-determinism" to me. For you, it seems that non-determinism is a function, not of the Universe itself, but of our ability to make predictions.

According to the Copenhagen interpretation, non-determinism is a property of the universe.

David: Just as it is impossible to say where exactly a couple of dice will land when thrown on a table, even though we have a rough idea of where they'll end up.

The throwing of dices is something that can be modeled deterministically. If you know the shape of the dice, the initial momentum and spin, the properties of the contact surface, et cetera all within a given margin of error, you can predict the number it will show. Hence, your comparison doesn't hold. The actual outcome of a wave function is undetermined, even with precisely defined start conditions.

David: Just as a train could either be at Central Station or Bond Street Station.

This comparison is equally inadequate, sine it overlooks the fact that we know exactly how the train gets from Central Station to Bond Street Station, but we don't know how the particle gets from A to B.

David: I haven't been impressed with them [alternative philosophical interpretations of quantum phenomena] thus far. What's the best one, in your view?

I haven't been impressed with any deterministic explanation of quantum mechanics either. But, even if quantum phenomena should be deterministic, for all that matters, they behave as if they were not. In fact, quantum phenomena make randomness in the universe possible without which there wouldn't be much of a universe.

Thomas

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 451
(1/19/04 7:23 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Being as we are caused beings and have minds that react only to causes, anything that we can therefore possibly investigate or imagine must have a cause, otherwise there would be no effects that we could possibly recognise.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 763
(1/19/04 9:32 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Jimhaz: Being as we are caused beings and have minds that react only to causes, anything that we can therefore possibly investigate or imagine must have a cause, otherwise there would be no effects that we could possibly recognise.

You did not provide any reasoning to support your assertion.

As far as I can tell the question whether we and how are caused ourselves as human beings is -although interesting- quite irrelevant to the investigation of causality itself. The fact that our mind can "recognize" causality has to do with our abstraction ability, not with the fact that our mind itself is caused. An insect's mind is also caused, but it does not consciously recognize the principle of causality, or does it?

Thomas

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 452
(1/19/04 10:28 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Well explain to me how we could possibly understand something that doesn't have a cause. To understand something that doesn't have a cause would mean that one themselves would have not to have been caused. You're the one that seems to be insisting that things can just pop into existence from emptiness like magic, not me. You have not stated anything that doesn't have a cause yourself, you've only stated a few theories that a limited number of scientists agree might be possible if they abandon everything that we otherwise know as logic. Sure material could seem to pop into existence, but only if the source is energy or it comes from elsewhere in the universe. Do you at least accept that imagination and invention is caused?

Yes the insect can recognise a very limited form of causality. Instinctual behaviour is still caused behaviour. In a way that is what life is, a recognition of causality.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 765

(1/20/04 12:26 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Jimhaz: Well explain to me how we could possibly understand something that doesn't have a cause.

Non-determinism can be understood mathematically. Like a deterministic model, say meteorology, a non-deterministic system consists of states and transitions. In a deterministic system, future states of the system can be predicted with absolute certainty if all present states are known, because all transitions are defined as either 1 or 0. In a non-deterministic system they can't. Either the model is probabilistic, meaning that a given input state is associated with a number of output states each having probabilities between 0 and 1, or the model is purely non-probabilistic meaning that a given input state leads to unknown output states within a known state space.

Jimhaz: You're the one that seems to be insisting that things can just pop into existence from emptiness like magic, not me.

There's no magic here, Jimmy. Just number theory.

Jimhaz: You have not stated anything that doesn't have a cause yourself, you've only stated a few theories that a limited number of scientists agree might be possible if they abandon everything that we otherwise know as logic.

A limited number of scientists? Abandoning logic? You gotta be kidding. Quantum theory is a mainstream scientific theory. Very few physicists doubt it. The present endeavor of physics is rather to weave quantum theory into a larger unified theory.

Jimhaz: Do you at least accept that imagination and invention is caused?

It depends whether "qualia" are "caused". It is a very difficult question since it has to do with the nature of consciousness. Some mind philosophers, such as Daniel Dennett say qualia are caused and painting a deterministic picture of mind, while other philosophers such as Roger Penrose (who is also one of the most outstanding contemporary mathematicians) deny exactly that. As you might have imagined, I tend to agree with Penrose. :-)

Thomas

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1301
(1/20/04 1:19 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

I don't quite understand the difference between the idea that, say, particles are caused (which I am sure they are) and that their subsequent behavior may be undetermined.

However, it seems to me that string theory can account for it.

Quote:

---

[In the past]"Although each particle was viewed as elementary, the kind of "stuff" each embodied was thought to be different. Electron "stuff" had negative electric charge, while neutrino "stuff" had no electric charge. String theory alters this theory radically by declaring that the "stuff" of all matter is the same. Each elementary particle is composed of a single string--that is each particle is a single string--and all strings are identical. Differences between the particles arise because their respective strings undergo different resonant vibrational patterns."

---

This rock bottom identity of all "things" allows for variation and nondeterminism because the source has the capacity to become anything at all. But once the string has been given its form/vibration, all events from there on out should be determinable.

It is sort of like saying that you can take a piece of clay from a huge vat and make anything you want from it.

But of course, this brings up the question, who pulls the strings? And must they be pushed only from the side that precedes form, or can they be pulled/shaped from "our" side?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2083

(1/20/04 9:42 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Since a particle necessarily depends on a destructive force not being there at the moment of its birth, this is enough to show that it cannot arise independently of causal conditions.

Thomas: Bilge. Bosh. Bunkum. Flapdoodle. The existence of a particle does not depend at all on the presence or absence of an IMAGINED force or any other IMAGINED magnitude. Physics deals exclusively with what is observable, not with what is imaginable.

---

Science constantly engages in hypothesizing. It asks, "If this were different in the world, what would be the outcome?"

In a similar vein, I ask, "What if a destructive force were to exist at the moment of a particle's birth, what would be the result?" The answer is, no particle. Thus, its existence is definitely dependent upon causal conditions.

Quote:

---

David: It says that quantum fluctuation is a causal phenomenon, with the Big Bang being one its causes.

Thomas: If you say that quantum fluctuation is caused by the Big Bang then that is plainly wrong. The error here lies in the misapplication of language. A surrounding universe does not qualify as a cause. It is certainly a necessary condition (for everything), but it is not sufficient to explain quantum phenomena. It is therefore not a cause. You did not give much thought to Hume, did you?

---

I've already given an adequate answer to this in my book:

--

It might be argued that things like space and time, and the Universe itself, should be classified as "background conditions" of the quantum pairing, rather than its causes. While they are certainly necessary to the pairing's existence, the argument might continue, they do not constitute a sufficient cause of it. The sheer fact of their existence does not directly lead to the pairing's existence. They merely lay the platform for its possible arisal.

The problem with this argument is that it is ultimately impossible to distinguish between a "background condition" and a "cause". All causes are merely "background conditions" in the end. It is impossible for any one thing to cause another thing into existence all by itself. It always needs the help of countless other causes (or "background conditions") to do its creative work. It is powerless all alone.

Consider the birth of a human being, for example. Under the schema provided above, the parents would constitute the main "cause" of the child, while space would merely be a "background condition". The latter would be relegated to its lowly status because, although it is necessary for the child's existence, it lacks the power to bring the child into being on its own. The trouble is, the same reasoning can equally be applied to the parents. The parents too lack the power to bring a child into existence on their own. Without the help of other things, such as food, air, molecules, atoms, genes, womb, time, and yes, space, the parents would not be able to create a thing. So they are no different to space in this regard. They too constitute nothing more than a "background condition" as far as the child is concerned. In the final analysis, the child is a product of countless background conditions, of which the parents only play a very small part.

We can see, then, that the millions of causes which contribute to the creation of an object are really just background conditions, each playing a small contributory role, none of them standing out as having any greater importance than the rest. It is only our imaginations which zero in on one or two of these background conditions and blow them up to gigantic proportions, thereby dwarfing the rest.

It is in our practical interests to do this, of course. It is usually more practical for us to think of the parents as being the main cause of the child, even though from the ultimate perspective they are no more the main cause than space or time or carbon-based molecules are. It is more practical because we potentially have a far greater influence over the existence of the parents than we do of space or time. Parents are much more fragile and fleeting, whereas space seems stable and constant. Parents easily go in and out of existence, which influences the probabilities that a child will be created.

I use the word "probabilities" because the very occurrence of two people becoming parents in and of itself does not guarantee the birth of a child, for the child might die as a foetus or as a conceptus. All it does is increase the probabilities that a child will be born. Being aware of these kinds of probabilities is of practical benefit to us, even though it can easily distort our picture of the Universe if we are not careful.

--

Quote:

---

David: Just as it is impossible to say where exactly a couple of dice will land when thrown on a table, even though we have a rough idea of where they'll end up.

Thomas: The throwing of dices is something that can be modeled deterministically. If you know the shape of the dice, the initial momentum and spin, the properties of the contact surface, et cetera all within a given margin of error, you can predict the number it will show.

---

Nonsense. There are always too many factors involved. What face the dice will show can never be predicted with any certainty, no matter how much we know.

Quote:

---

Hence, your comparison doesn't hold. The actual outcome of a wave function is undetermined, even with precisely defined start conditions.

---

Which is exactly the same as throwing a dice. It doesn't matter how precisely we know the starting conditions, we will always have no real idea of what face the dice will show up next.

Quote:

---

David: Just as a train could either be at Central Station or Bond Street Station.

Thomas: This comparison is equally inadequate, sine it overlooks the fact that we know exactly how the train gets from Central Station to Bond Street Station, but we don't know how the particle gets from A to B.

---

Imagine an alien who has never seen trains before and doesn't know how they work. Imagine that he is suddenly asked to predict whether a train will be at Central Station or Bond Street station. He has no idea how to preceed. From his point of view, the train is either at Central Station or Bond Street Station. In the absence of any other data, he begins to create statistical models based on the past behaviour of trains as indicated by timetables given to him. But no matter his ingenious his statistical models become, he still won't know which station the train is at until he actually looks.

Quote:

---

David: I haven't been impressed with them [alternative philosophical interpretations of quantum phenomena] thus far. What's the best one, in your view?

Thomas: I haven't been impressed with any deterministic explanation of quantum mechanics either. But, even if quantum phenomena should be deterministic, for all that matters, they behave as if they were not.

---

Then why are we having this disussion? If you accept that the behaviour of particles can seem non-deterministic from our current point of view (and no one is disputing this), even though they might be completely caused, then why on earth are you arguing with me? Honestly, Thomas, what a clutz you are.

--

Edited grammatical errors - DQ

---

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/20/04 9:49 am

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 766
(1/20/04 2:45 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Anna: I don't quite understand the difference between the idea that, say, particles are caused (which I am sure they are) and that their subsequent behavior may be undetermined.

The behavior of particles is far more interesting than their creation. According to the mass-energy relation, particles are just forms of locked-up energy, most of which are unstable and some of which are stable. So you could say that matter is "caused" by energy, because it appears so if you observe a process that moves from an energy field to a stable particle (such as in a supercollider), but because energy and matter are equivalent, the observed "causation" process is really only "equivalence in action". The interesting thing about the creation and death of particles is rather the spontaneous nature of these events. They seem to happen randomly. This means that it is impossible to calculate and predict spacetime localities for quantum fluctuation events (which David mentioned), or occurrences of radioactive decay. We can say that this "spontaneous" non-deterministic nature of particle events manifests in many ways, such as in the probability clouds of bound electrons, for example.

Anna: However, it seems to me that string theory can account for it.

String theory might explain particles and forces and in more cohesive way, but it does not solve the underlying philosophical problem, since the vibration of strings in string theory is also probabilistic, meaning that nondeterministic quantum phenomena simply map to nondeterministic string vibrations.

Anna: This rock bottom identity of all "things" allows for variation and nondeterminism because the source has the capacity to become anything at all. But once the string has been given its form/vibration, all events from there on out should be determinable.

I think the conclusion is wrong. Non-determinism in string theory is merely one level "deeper" and it leaves us with exactly the same phenomena (and the same resulting philosophical problem) described by quantum mechanics.

Thomas

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 767
(1/20/04 2:48 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David: Science constantly engages in hypothesizing.

This is really getting quite silly. Science does engage in hypothesizing, okay, but an unsubstantiated hypothesis cannot be used to prove another hypothesis, since it doesn't offer any support. A (physical) hypothesis requires empirical evidence to be of any value. Ergo, you argue out of thin air.

David: In a similar vein, I ask, "What if a destructive force were to exist at the moment of a particle's birth, what would be the result?" The answer is, no particle. Thus, its existence is definitely dependent upon causal conditions.

This argument is so flawed – it is plainly embarrassing that you keep repeating it. Once again, the absence of a non-existing (hypothesized) force has nothing to do with the creation of a particle. You actually make two errors in this argument. First, -as already mentioned above- you are not allowed to use an unsubstantiated hypothesis to prove a statement and second, according to Occam's "entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem" meaning "entities should not be multiplied beyond necessity" the factoring of an unrelated entity is ill advised. Since only the most ignorant person could fall for that, I strongly recommend to revise that argument in your book.

David: There are always too many factors involved. What face the dice will show can never be predicted with any certainty, no matter how much we know.

It seems you misconceive the problem. The rolling of a dice is a completely deterministic and linear(!) process, hence, it can be modeled in a computer with comparable ease and with good accuracy. You need to know the geometrical properties of the dice and the contact surface, the starting forces (spin, momentum) and voila – you can compute the face for any roll. You can do this on a cheap home PC, really. It is far less complicated than you might imagine.

David: Imagine an alien who has never seen trains before and doesn't know how they work. Imagine that he is suddenly asked to predict whether a train will be at Central Station or Bond Street station. He has no idea how to precede. From his point of view, the train is either at Central Station or Bond Street Station. In the absence of any other data, he begins to create statistical models based on the past behaviour of trains as indicated by timetables given to him. But no matter how ingenious his statistical models become, he still won't know which station the train is at until he actually looks.

This comparison can be invalidated with ease. In your story, the alien must be capable of perceiving the train to be in a certain location, at Central Station or at Bond Street. This means that we can assume the alien observer is capable of perceiving the train at any given location. The observer will therefore soon discover that the train is not only found at Central Station and Bond Street, but at any point between the two stations. Given a sufficient number of measurements, a continuum will emerge and it can be concluded by the alien observer that the train describes a path between Central Station and Bond Street. In quantum mechanics, however, such a continuum cannot be measured in any way, regardless of the precision and number of measurements.

Thomas: I haven't been impressed with any deterministic explanation of quantum mechanics either. But, even if quantum phenomena should be deterministic, for all that matters, they behave as if they were not.

David: Then why are we having this discussion? If you accept that the behaviour of particles can seem non-deterministic from our current point of view (and no one is disputing this), even though they might be completely caused, then why on earth are you arguing with me?

Intellectual integrity requires me to work with the best possible explanation we currently have and that is -like it or not- the assumption that non-deterministic processes are a property of nature. I don't see sufficient reason to believe any of the deterministic explanations, such as the many world theory or Bohm's version. I could return the question and ask you why you insist on "hardcore determinism" while you proclaim that you haven't been impressed with any deterministic interpretation of quantum theory.

Thomas

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 454(1/20/04 3:09 pm)Reply    | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Does anyone else hate Thomas's quoting in white text - or is that just my IE setup.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1309(1/20/04 3:56 pm)Reply                                                                             | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> No, I find it useful. why does it bother you?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 454(1/20/04 8:24 pm)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> I just find it difficult to read, so I highlight the text.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 74(1/21/04 11:59 am)Reply                                                                                   | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> David, You are telling me that the "distinguished minds" embracing your UR are ALL DEAD?!" Well, how convenient. ; ) Besides, the names you mentioned were hardly of one mind about the nature of existential reality---let alone an ULTIMATE one. I simply don't see the point of taking you seriously, my friend. Pointing to nature and saying "there's the truth!" is sophistic in the extreme. Can you imagine if natural science stopped there? We'd still be living in caves. And anyone who tells me that the Nazis were as blameless "as a newborn babe"---yet worthy of moral condemnation is, in my view, about 299 pins short of a perfect game in the thinking department. You are postulating |

determinism AND free will simultaneously.

You are just words defending other words to me. Again, I don't see the point in continuing our exchange because, quite frankly, I have no respect at all for your intellectual depth. None.

But that is just me. The best of luck with all the others in here.

Biggie

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2087

(1/24/04 4:13 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggie wrote:

Quote:

---

David,

You are telling me that the "distinguished minds" embracing your UR are ALL DEAD?!"

Well, how convenient. ; )

---

Kevin Solway and Dan Rowden are still alive. There are also others on this forum who are in the process of embracing it. It remains to be seen whether they reach the level of a "distinguished mind".

Quote:

---

Besides, the names you mentioned were hardly of one mind about the nature of existential reality---let alone an ULTIMATE one.

---

I beg to differ. They were all fully conversant with Ultimate Reality. The way they expressed their thoughts about it might have differed, but not the wisdom behind these thoughts.

Quote:

---

Pointing to nature and saying "there's the truth!" is sophistic in the extreme. Can you imagine if natural science stopped there? We'd still be living in caves.

---

The understanding of Ultimate Reality is a completely separate discipline to science. Success in the one does not automatically mean failure in the other. There is no reason why our species cannot do both, and do both well.

Quote:

---

And anyone who tells me that the Nazis were as blameless "as a newborn babe"---yet worthy of moral condemnation is, in my view, about 299 pins short of a perfect game in the thinking department. You are postulating determinism AND free will simultaneously.

---

I don't think in terms of moral condemnation. Rather, I think in terms of shaping the future. I focus on initiating changes in the unfolding causal processes of Nature to make it more difficult for Nazism and other forms of irrationality to arise.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2087

(1/24/04 4:53 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Science constantly engages in hypothesizing.

Thomas: This is really getting quite silly. Science does engage in hypothesizing, okay, but an unsubstantiated hypothesis cannot be used to prove another hypothesis, since it doesn't offer any support. A (physical) hypothesis requires empirical evidence to be of any value. Ergo, you argue out of thin air.

---

It is not a physical hypothesis. The truth that all things have causes is a purely logical assertion, and the argument which utilizes the "destructive force scenario" is also purely logical in nature. That a particle cannot possibly arise if the process of causality deploys a sufficiently destructive force at the moment of its birth is necessarily true from a logical point of view. End of story. There is nothing more to the matter. Your demand for empirical evidence is both unnecessary and unwarranted.

Quote:

---

David: In a similar vein, I ask, "What if a destructive force were to exist at the moment of a particle's birth, what would be the result?" The answer is, no particle. Thus, its existence is definitely dependent upon causal conditions.

Thomas: This argument is so flawed – it is plainly embarrassing that you keep repeating it. Once again, the absence of a non-existing (hypothesized) force has nothing to do with the creation of a particle. You actually make two errors in this argument. First, -as already mentioned above- you are not allowed to use an unsubstantiated hypothesis to prove a statement and second, according to Occam's "entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem" meaning "entities should not be multiplied beyond necessity" the factoring of an unrelated entity is ill advised. Since only the most ignorant person could fall for that, I strongly recommend to revise that argument in your book.

---

I know you have trouble with these kinds of reasonings, Thomas. You always have. Since I don't think I can restate the argument any more simply, I'm going to have to leave it there. If you can't see it, then you can't see it.

Quote:

---

David: There are always too many factors involved. What face the dice will show can never be predicted with any certainty, no matter how much we know.

Thomas: It seems you misconceive the problem. The rolling of a dice is a completely deterministic and linear(!) process, hence, it can be modeled in a computer with comparable ease and with good accuracy. You need to know the geometrical properties of the dice and the contact surface, the starting forces (spin, momentum) and voila – you can compute the face for any roll. You can do this on a cheap home PC, really. It is far less complicated than you might imagine.

---

What if your home PC predicts that the next roll of the dice will turn up a two, and then during the process of the dice rolling a meteor suddenly falls out of the sky and smashes the table and dice to smithereens before the dice has a chance to finish its roll? What happened to the predictive powers of your PC there?

Quote:

---

David: Imagine an alien who has never seen trains before and doesn't know how they work. Imagine that he is suddenly asked to predict whether a train will be at Central Station or Bond Street station. He has no idea how to precede. From his point of view, the train is either at Central Station or Bond Street Station. In the absence of any other data, he begins to create statistical models based on the past behaviour of trains as indicated by timetables given to him. But no matter his ingenious his statistical models become, he still won't know which station the train is at until he actually looks.

Thomas: This comparison can be invalidated with ease. In your story, the alien must be capable of perceiving the train to be in a certain location, at Central Station or at Bond Street. This means that we can assume the alien observer is capable of perceiving the train at any given location. The observer will therefore soon discover that the train is not only found at Central Station and Bond Street, but at any point between the two stations. Given a sufficient number of measurements, a continuum will emerge and it can be concluded by the alien observer that the train describes a path between Central Station and Bond Street.

---

Unfortunately, the aliens aren't able to do this because, unbeknownst to them, they have a peculiarity in their visual cortex which prevents them from perceiving trains in motion. Because of this, they naturally create the theory that trains don't actually move at all, but simply blink in and out of existence in a random manner. Indeed, believe it or not, they have actually come to believe that trains just pop into existence without any cause at all, as a result of a quantum fluctuation. The silly fools.

Quote:

---

David: If you accept that the behaviour of particles can seem non-deterministic from our current point of view (and no one is disputing this), even though they might be completely caused, then why on earth are you arguing with me?

Thomas: Intellectual integrity requires me to work with the best possible explanation we currently have and that is -like it or not- the assumption that non-deterministic process are a property of nature.

---

Translation: I am too cowardly to think for myself. I just submit to whatever is popular.

Quote:

---

I don't see sufficient reason to believe any of the deterministic explanations, such as the many world theory or Bohm's version. I could return the question and ask you why you insist on "hardcore determinism" while you proclaim that you haven't been impressed with any deterministic interpretation of quantum theory.

---

Because, as I have shown, it is logically impossible for anything to arise uncaused. This knowledge is more authoritative and powerful and more cutting than any of the tentative theorizings currently entertained by quantum physicists.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 75

(1/25/04 11:38 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

You've shown no such thing, David. All you have actually shown is your willingness to conflate accessory circumstances with genuine causality. In this attempt to re-define the concept of causality to support your position, you are guilty of intellectual dishonesty. In addition, your conflation of concepts involves a number of logical fallacies, most notable among them being a form of the post hoc ergo propter hoc fallacy of causality.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 777

(1/25/04 10:15 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David: That a particle cannot possibly arise if the process of causality deploys a sufficiently destructive force at the moment of its birth is necessarily true from a logical point of view. End of story.

Yes, but what does this prove? It proves nothing. Neither does it point to any alleged cause of matter-antimatter fluctuations, nor does it provide a formally valid argument. If you want to establish a causal nature of quantum fluctuation you need to provide a theoretical framework with a PREDICTIVE quality that establishes a clear logical connection to its alleged causes and you need to make sure that the theory can be corroborated by observation. An imagined (absent) destructive force is not going to cut the cake.

David: I know you have trouble with these kinds of reasonings, Thomas. You always have.

Anyone with a minimum training in logic would have trouble with that kind of reasoning. You say: "if there is an inhibiting force (F) there is no particle ( $\sim P$ )", and you conclude that "if there is no inhibiting force ( $\sim F$ ) then there is a particle (P), therefore P is caused." In other words:  $(F \rightarrow \sim P) \rightarrow (\sim F \rightarrow P)$ . That's a fallacy. But, the argument is already semantically messed up when you state  $F \rightarrow P$ , because the truth value of F is unascertainable. Not that the latter is a problem for formal logic, but it is certainly a problem when you talk about F and P as physical entities. Besides, as Naturyl mentioned there is good reason to dismiss the argument right away on account of post hoc ergo propter hoc, because that force you mention is not a part of our observation of quantum fluctuation. I had addressed the same point citing Occam's "entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem".

David: Since I don't think I can restate the argument any more simply, I'm going to have to leave it there. If you can't see it, then you can't see it.

See, this is what always happens when your argument is refuted beyond any trace of doubt. You say that others just don't get it. Thus you achieve two things; first, you tire your opponents, who probably don't care to invest energy beyond the refutation itself; second, you manage to bluff those who did for some reason not detect the fallacy at first by suggesting that you might be right after all. It would be commendable if you do everyone a favor and delete the argument from your book, thus increasing the book's overall quality. While you are at it, you might want to expel all other quantum mechanics references as well. This course of action was suggested by Natuyl for obvious (well-meaning) reasons.

David: What if your home PC predicts that the next roll of the dice will turn up a two, and then during the process of the dice rolling a meteor suddenly falls out of the sky and smashes the table and dice to smithereens before the dice has a chance to finish its roll? What happened to the predictive powers of your PC there?

The computer's prediction will obviously be wrong. The system modeled in the computer is necessarily incomplete and it does not consider magnitudes such as meteors. Remember that your contention was:

David: What face the dice will show can never be predicted with any certainty...

...to which I answered that the rolling of a dice "can be modeled in a computer with comparable ease and with good accuracy." Good accuracy means something like 99% accuracy, which is pretty good, meteors, earthquakes, and other accidents notwithstanding.

David: Unfortunately, the aliens aren't able to do this because, unbeknownst to them, they have a peculiarity in their visual cortex which prevents them from perceiving trains in motion.

That is an unnecessary fabrication. You could have argued more convincingly that the trains move through tunnels and that they are only visible to the aliens at the train stations which are above the ground.

David: Because of this, they naturally create the theory that trains don't actually move at all, but simply blink in and out of existence in a random manner.

Well, then the aliens are pretty damn stupid. If they were intelligent, they would create a theory of motion, regardless whether the trains can be seen when they move or not. They would only need to look at neighboring train stations and record the time when trains pop up at any given station. First, they would notice that a train pops up at stations in a defined sequence. They always move in an ABCD pattern, not ACDB. They would then compare the measurements of different trains at different stations and notice that the spatial distance between two stations is proportional to the time that elapses when a train pops up at successive stations. This could be expressed as  $v = \Delta(AB)/t$  which is precisely the formula for linear motion. It is probably superfluous to mention that electrons do not fit into this picture, since measured electron positions do not suggest linear motion.

Thomas: Intellectual integrity requires me to work with the best possible explanation we currently have and that is -like it or not- the assumption that non-deterministic processes are a property of nature.

David: Translation: I am too cowardly to think for myself. I just submit to whatever is popular.

Where do you see cowardice? Quantum mechanics has nothing to do with blind faith. It's a bare fact, something that you can validate with your own intellect – if you have one. The question of determinism is a philosophical one. QM leaves space for deterministic and non-deterministic interpretations, and both seem to enjoy equal popularity. I find the non-deterministic interpretation more convincing. You have not yet answered my question why you avoid the deterministic explanations of QM.

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 287
(1/25/04 11:20 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: In a similar vein, I ask, "What if a destructive force were to exist at the moment of a particle's birth, what would be the result?" The answer is, no particle. Thus, its existence is definitely dependent upon causal conditions.

Thomas: This argument is so flawed

---

What David's argument is essentially saying is that if the Universe has created conditions for a particular quantum event to take place, then that event will take place, and will thus have been caused by those necessary conditions.

As all events, quantum or otherwise, rely on certain conditions, they are all necessarily caused.

David phrased his argument more dramatically because he didn't think you would understand the above. That is, he thought you would be able to more easily imagine a destructive force than a creative one. And the absence of a destructive force is just as much a condition (or cause) as the presence of a creative one.

Naturyl claims that David is redefining the term "cause" to suit himself, but what is a "cause" other than something that is necessary for the existence of something else? That is the most sensible definition of "cause". And the absence of a destructive force fits within this definition.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 895
(1/25/04 11:35 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

As stated elsewhere, it is an unavoidable semantic consequence.

It is no use, however, to equate semantic or logical causality with temporal determinism, as future temporality is not a logical entity.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 288
(1/25/04 11:43 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

It is no use, however, to equate semantic or logical causality with temporal determinism, as future temporality is not a logical entity.

---

What do you mean by saying future temporality is not a logical entity?
Future temporality is logically dependent on what is not future temporality.

Anything you can name is a logical entity.

The present is caused by the past, and the future by the present.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> hell is other people: fate or farce?

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 897(1/26/04 12:46 am)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Here's how Wikipedia explains Hume's construction of the logical problem of temporal causation: When one event causes another, most people think that we are aware of a connection between the two that makes the second event follow from the first. Hume challenged this belief, noting that whereas we do perceive the two events, we don't perceive any necessary connection between the two. And how else but perception could we gain knowledge of this mysterious connection? Hume denied that we could have any idea of causation other than the following: when we see that two events always occur together, we tend to form an expectation that when the first occurs, the second is soon to follow. This constant conjunction and the expectation thereof is all that we can know of causation, and all that our idea of causation can amount to. Such a lean conception robs causation of all its force and some later Humeans like Bertrand Russell have dismissed the notion of causation altogether as something akin to superstition. But this violates common sense, thereby creating the problem of causation—what justifies our belief in a causal connection and what kind of connection could we have knowledge of?—a problem which has no accepted solution. Hume's view seems to be that we (as well as other animals) have an instinct-like belief in causality based on the development of habits in our nervous system, a belief that we cannot eliminate but which we cannot prove to be true by any kind of argument, deductive or inductive, just as is the case with regard to our belief in the reality of the external world. |

As I said, your logical causality is logically irrefutable, but it does not map to temporal causation.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 898
(1/26/04 1:34 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

This is also why co-dependent origination cannot touch the problem of change (ship of Theseus), and has no necessity to do so. It is temporally stranded, but then it doesn't believe in temporality, so no problem.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2090
(1/26/04 7:24 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Because, as I have shown, it is logically impossible for anything to arise uncaused. This knowledge is more authoritative and powerful and more cutting than any of the tentative theorizings currently entertained by quantum physicists.

Nat: You've shown no such thing, David. All you have actually shown is your willingness to conflate accessory circumstances with genuine causality. In this attempt to re-define the concept of causality to support your position, you are guilty of intellectual dishonesty. In addition, your conflation of concepts involves a number of logical fallacies, most notable among them being a form of the post hoc ergo propter hoc fallacy of causality.

---

As Kevin points out, a cause is whatever is necessary for something else to exist. It doesn't have to be a sufficient cause (i.e. one that is able to cause something else into existence entirely on its own), because nothing at all can be a sufficient cause. It only has to be a contributory cause. And it is easy enough to demonstrate, as I have done in my book, that nothing can arise in the complete absence of contributory causes.

Remember: All I have to do in order to disprove the idea that a quantum particle arises completely uncaused is to demonstrate that it does indeed have contributory causes - e.g. time, space, Big Bang, the absence of a destructive force, the Universe itself, etc. The demonstration that any one of these things is necessary to a particle's existence is enough to prove that the particle is not completely uncaused.

There is nothing more I need to do in this matter. The job is already done. I don't have to push on and identify further causes of quantum particles, as Thomas lamely suggests, because I have already proven, without any shadow of a doubt, that these particles are not uncaused. I'll leave that to the scientists who have nothing better to do with their time.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 81
(1/26/04 9:05 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David

It's always Cause! Cause! Cause! with you. Until, of course, we start speculating about the existence of existence itself.

Then things were just...well...always here, right?

Biggie

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2093
(1/26/04 9:13 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Yes, the process of cause and effect is itself the only "thing" that is without cause, for obvious reasons.

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 290
(1/26/04 9:53 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

. . . your logical causality is logically irrefutable, but it does not map to temporal causation.

---

Let's take the past Universe as one thing, and the present Universe as another. Now, given the existence of these things it follows that the present Universe is caused by the past Universe. Thus we have temporal causation.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 901
(1/26/04 12:13 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Pedantry Kevin?

Though I may have missed a word in my last post, I was originally talking about future temporality.

pub86.ezboard.com/fgeniusnewsfrm6.showMessageRange?topicID=336.topic&start=41&stop=59

Have a look at this from a good while back, 4th post down.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 81
(1/26/04 12:51 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

Ultimate Reasons usually are rather "obvious", admittedly, when they are not attached to anything even remotely relating to actual human interactions from day to day.

For example, what can UR tell us about:

- 1] the ethics of abortion
- 2] the war in Iraq
- 3] gender and racial politics
- 4] the nature of human identity
- 5] great art

- 6] pop culture
- 7] compulsive/obsessional psychological states
- 8] the ambivalence we might feel respecting a political agenda
- 9] pi
- 10] hiroshima and nagasaki

Pick any three and enlighten us.

Biggie

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 94

(1/26/04 4:06 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Kevin said:

Quote:

---

Naturyl claims that David is redefining the term "cause" to suit himself, but what is a "cause" other than something that is necessary for the existence of something else? That is the most sensible definition of "cause". And the absence of a destructive force fits within this definition.

---

But isn't this just saying "well, it makes more sense to define an elephant as a type of rhinoceros, so that's what we will do?" Necessary conditions do not constitute causality in and of themselves. Any argument which makes this assertion is fatally flawed. Any worldview is based on this fallacy is up a creek without a paddle, to be quite frank. It's just that simple. We don't get to define causality based on what we think 'makes sense,' particularly in regard to quantum mechanics. Anyone who supposes that quantum mechanical processes are amenable to any of our traditional ideas about what 'makes sense' has failed to grasp the matter entirely.

David said:

Quote:

---

As Kevin points out, a cause is whatever is necessary for something else to exist. It doesn't have to be a sufficient cause (i.e. one that is able to cause something else into existence entirely on its own), because nothing at all can be a sufficient cause. It only has to be a contributory cause. And it is easy enough to demonstrate, as I have done in my book, that nothing can arise in the complete absence of contributory causes.

---

Fine. But necessary conditions are not causes at all. They are not sufficient causes, nor are they contributory ones. The fallacies inherent in classifying necessary conditions as causes have been pointed out by Thomas, myself, and others. Your entire argument collapses if necessary conditions are denied causal efficacy of any kind.

Quote:

---

Remember: All I have to do in order to disprove the idea that a quantum particle arises completely uncaused is to demonstrate that it does indeed have contributory causes - e. g. time, space, Big Bang, the absence of a destructive force, the Universe itself, etc. The demonstration that any one of these things is necessary to a particle's existence is enough to prove that the particle is not completely uncaused.

---

Fallacious reasoning, see above.

Quote:

---

There is nothing more I need to do in this matter. The job is already done. I don't have to push on and identify further causes of quantum particles, as Thomas lamely suggests, because I have already proven, without any shadow of a doubt, that these particles are not uncaused. I'll leave that to the scientists who have nothing better to do with their time.

---

There is nothing more you need do than advance a fallacious argument, proclaim it proven, and then fob the whole mess off on somebody else? That's a pretty good racket you've got going there. Very skillfull indeed. However, until you show that your concept of causality is valid, you'll always run into the occasional stick-in-the-mud who shouts "bull!"

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 95

(1/26/04 4:15 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggie said:

Quote:

---

For example, what can UR tell us about:

- 1] the ethics of abortion
- 2] the war in Iraq
- 3] gender and racial politics
- 4] the nature of human identity
- 5] great art
- 6] pop culture
- 7] compulsive/obsessional psychological states
- 8] the ambivalence we might feel respecting a political agenda
- 9] pi
- 10] hiroshima and nagasaki

Pick any three and enlighten us.

---

I don't know that David's version of "ultimate reality" offers any specific guidance by which one might address these issues, but some philosophies which include concepts of 'the Absolute' do indeed contain philosophical guidelines derived from logic and reason which are well-suited to the task. Not all ideas which involve ontology are necessarily a lot of glorified tautologies, although I'll admit that enough are that way to give them all a bad name. My own worldview, for example, which does involve certain 'ultimate' or 'absolute' elements, would be able to address all ten of your examples in considerable detail. If you wish, I will prove this, although if you have no great interest, I will save the effort. I do respect your skepticism, as I have mentioned before, and I feel that you do us all a service by demanding justification and verification for claims made. Only those who fear that their worldview may not withstand such scrutiny have any real reason to fear or dodge such inquiry.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2100

(1/26/04 5:10 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: As Kevin points out, a cause is whatever is necessary for something else to exist. It doesn't have to be a sufficient cause (i.e. one that is able to cause something else into existence entirely on its own), because nothing at all can be a sufficient cause. It only has to be a contributory cause. And it is easy enough to demonstrate, as I have done in my book, that nothing can arise in the complete absence of contributory causes.

Nat: Fine. But necessary conditions are not causes at all. They are not sufficient causes, nor are they contributory ones.

---

Well, they are contributory causes. For example, the existence of space contributes, in its own way, to your form and existence. Without its contribution, you wouldn't exist at all.

Quote:

---

The fallacies inherent in classifying necessary conditions as causes have been pointed out by Thomas, myself, and others. Your entire argument collapses if necessary conditions are denied causal efficacy of any kind.

---

How does the existence of space not contribute to your existence?

You've lost me, Nat. How do you imagine that a necessary cause isn't also a contributory one?

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 102

(1/26/04 5:29 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

What is a 'necessary cause?' We were talking about necessary circumstances and their relation to causality. In short, your idea of causality is informed by your law of identity:  $A=A$ . To you, everything that is not a particular thing is a cause of that thing, insofar as it grants the thing existence. But existence is not a predicate, and is therefore useless beyond its role in your law of identity. Granting something existence in the sense of a distinguishable identity is not the same as causing it. Essentially, you have developed a way to assign cause in a semantic sense, but this does not translate to reality. As Kant put it, "one cannot build bridges from the conceptual realm to the real world." As others have pointed out, your logical constructs do not map to reality in any meaningful sense. They are grammatical tautologies.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2105

(1/26/04 5:58 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

What does any of this have to do with the price of eggs?

Please explain how a necessary cause is not also a contributory cause? The entire issue of non-determinism rests on this one point, so please answer it carefully.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 107

(1/26/04 6:23 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Again, what is this "necessary cause" business? We were talking about the relationship of necessary circumstances and contributory causes. For some inexplicable reason, you suddenly started talking about "necessary causes," which no one had brought up previously. You use the term first in your post of 5:10 and again in your latest post, but you fail to explain how the term "necessary cause" became involved in a discussion of necessary circumstances and contributory causes. I cannot answer your question until you explain how you relate this new term to the terms that were under discussion, and what you mean by it.

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 292

(1/26/04 6:24 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Quote:

---

KS: Let's take the past Universe as one thing, and the present Universe as another. Now, given the existence of these things it follows that the present Universe is caused by the past Universe. Thus we have temporal causation.

DT: Though I may have missed a word in my last post, I was originally talking about future temporality.

pub86.ezboard.com/fgeniusnewsfrm6.showMessageRange?topicID=336.topic&start=41&stop=59

Have a look at this from a good while back, 4th post down.

---

"Future temporality" doesn't seem to mean much other than "time in the future". I had a look in your post, but it didn't seem to contain anything relevant as to whether logical causality maps onto temporal causality. I showed above that it certainly does.

I saw something about how you think determinism and free will are incompatible, but it is simple enough to prove that they are perfectly compatible. Open another topic if you want to discuss determinism/free will.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2108

(1/26/04 10:58 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Please explain how a necessary cause is not also a contributory cause? The entire issue of non-determinism rests on this one point, so please answer it carefully.

Nat: Again, what is this "necessary cause" business? We were talking about the relationship of necessary circumstances and contributory causes.

---

A necessary cause is anything which is necessary for something else to exist. I gave the example of space being a necessary cause of your existence. It isn't the only cause of your existence, but it is one that necessarily contributes to it.

Space is also a necessary cause of a sub-atomic particle's existence, which is enough to disprove the idea that these particles arise without any cause at all.

To sum up, then, in order to demonstrate that non-determinism is a plausible scenario in the Universe, you would have to show how a particle can arise without the necessary contribution made by space.

Good luck.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 82
(1/27/04 8:16 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Naturly,

Okay, lets consider the ethics of killing a human fetus from an "absolute" or "ultimate" frame of mind.

Express what you consider to be ultimate or absolute elements here.

And, so much more critically, do you believe these elements will allow is to express a moral perspective said to be "absolutely true"?

Or do you believe, perhaps, that the issue is so inextricably ensnared IN Ultimate Reality it simply makes indivdual points of view moot anyway as everything is already determined?

Biggie

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2113

(1/27/04 8:42 am)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Biggie wrote:

Quote:

---

David,

Ultimate Reasons usually are rather "obvious", admittedly, when they are not attached to anything even remotely relating to actual human interactions from day to day.

---

Ultimate Reasons are only divorced from everyday human interactions in people who are spiritually and philosophically dead - which, unfortunately, constitutes at least 99% of the human race at the moment.

Quote:

---

For example, what can UR tell us about:

- 1] the ethics of abortion
- 2] the war in Iraq
- 3] gender and racial politics
- 4] the nature of human identity
- 5] great art
- 6] pop culture
- 7] compulsive/obsessional psychological states
- 8] the ambivalence we might feel respecting a political agenda
- 9] pi
- 10] hiroshima and nagasaki

Pick any three and enlighten us.

---

Well, for the sake of saving my energy, I'll just deal with the first one and you can deduce from this my approach to the rest of the issues.

1] The ethics of abortion.

The abortion issue hinges on where we choose to define life, and that can vary depending on our values. In reality, there is no boundary between life and death. It is simply an arbitrary projection on our parts. There is never a specific moment in time in which a human being comes into existence. The causal processes in a mother's womb which lead to the formation of the conceptus, and then of the foetus, are part of a seamless continuum. There is no real beginning to our lives at all, apart from where we arbitrarily decide it to be.

Some people arbitrarily decide that the formation of the conceptus constitutes the beginning of human life, and thus for them abortion is an act of murder. Other people arbitrarily decide that life does not begin until six weeks after conception, which means that an abortion before this time would not be an act of murder. My own personal view is that we should be flexible enough to alter our concepts of life to suit the circumstances. For example, in this day and age of rampant overpopulation, which threatens the entire biosphere with extinction, it would be wiser to define the beginning of life as late as possible - e.g. at the moment of birth.

krussell2004
Registered User
Posts: 49
(1/27/04 11:46 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Hell is being David Quinn.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 83
(1/27/04 11:47 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David,

So, by your account, 99% of us are philosophically and spiritually dead. Which is just another way, in my view, of saying that 99% of us don't agree with you.

Actually, of course, it is one hell of a lot less than that!! You have, after all, already noted only about 10 folks on the entire planet DO agree substantially with you. So, if you divide 6,000,000,000 [the approximate number of current earthlings] into the ten who grasp Ultimate Reality it is really closer to 99.9999999999999999999999999999% of us, isn't it? ; )

And why in the world would you say this is "unfortunate" since this is simply The Way Things ARE? Nothing could possibly be more objectively true than that right?

Abortion.

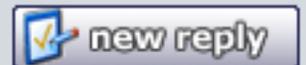

I agree there is no objective/essential/universal possibility of noting "after, human", "before, not human" once conception begins. That is why I believe abortion is always the killing of a human being. But I also believe women should not be restricted from obtaining an abortion. In other words, I do not believe it should be construed as murder. But there is no way on earth I can demonstrate that to be Ultimately True, is there? I just happen to believe it is based on all of my own experiences with women who have had abortions, with being politically active for many years, with discussing it with others and then mulling over as many of these variable as I can. Nor can you demonstrate your own point of view as anything other than, "because I say so". Right? You can't prove it otherwise. No one can sans God.

Yet you say that we should be "flexible" in our approach to abortion. Again, you completely lose me there. IF there is an Ultimate Reality that is Ultimately embedded in Cause and Effect how in the world can we be flexible about that?

You seem to want to give us autonomy and freedom on the abortion issue while situating every choice we might possibly make IN your UR. How can that be?

Biggie

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

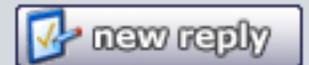

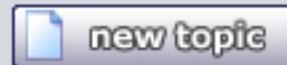

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> hell is other people: fate or farce?

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Naturyl  Registered UserPosts: 121(1/27/04 1:15 pm)Reply  | Re: hell is other people: fate or farce? <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Naturly, Okay, lets consider the ethics of killing a human fetus from an "absolute" or "ultimate" frame of mind. Express what you consider to be ultimate or absolute elements here. <hr/> Only that all life is One as well as many, so when we destroy others, we destroy a part of ourselves. This does not automatically prohibit the procedure, because it is sometimes necessary to destroy parts of ourselves, but it does suggest that we should give considerable thought to the issue before making a decision. Quote: <hr/> And, so much more critically, do you believe these elements will allow is to express a moral perspective said to be "absolutely true"? <hr/> |

No, except perhaps that we should treat others as we would like to be treated, for the reasons suggested above. That bit isn't original, though, a few people have mentioned it before. :-)

Aside from that somewhat vague (but still quite useful) guideline, I don't believe that there is any basis for 'absolute morality.' Ethics and morals are relative things for creatures in a relative world. The Absolute has no need of them.

Quote:

---

Or do you believe, perhaps, that the issue is so inextricably ensnared IN Ultimate Reality it simply makes individual points of view moot anyway as everything is already determined?

---

To an extent. I do lean strongly toward determinism, and find most concepts of 'free will' unconvincing. Because everything is of the Absolute (or Nature), everything is 'ensnared' in nature, as you put it. I'm not sure whether this makes individual points of view 'moot' in some sense.

Ultimately, beyond the reaches of what we can know, life is a mystery. Mystery qualifies as an 'Ultimate Reality' as well, does it not? :-)

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 122

(1/27/04 1:29 pm)

Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

David asserted:

Quote:

---

To sum up, then, in order to demonstrate that non-determinism is a plausible scenario in the Universe, you would have to show how a particle can arise without the necessary contribution made by space.

Good luck.

---

No. You are confusing the issue. I am not arguing against determinism. That would be rather silly, as I am a determinist, being quite skeptical of 'free will.' Determinism and randomness can co-exist in the form of probabilism.

I don't know whether or not space is required for particle/antiparticle generation through quantum fluctuation. Spacetime is a relative continuum. In a condition of perfect thermodynamic equilibrium, space would be essentially meaningless, but quantum fluctuations would continue to occur. Additionally, the level at which such fluctuations occur is generally considered to be a 'foam' rather than any sort of normal space. In other words, when a particle/antiparticle pair pops out of the void, it brings its own 'bubble of space' with it. It is difficult to understand this only because there could be nothing to separate such 'bubbles,' which is perhaps why space seems continuous despite the necessity that it be granular on the quantum level. Because there is nothing which could intervene between bubbles of space, the granularity would be identical to perfect smoothness.

Quantum mechanics is a koan.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2131
(1/27/04 3:59 pm)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

You are confusing the issue. I am not arguing against determinism. That would be rather silly, as I am a determinist, being quite skeptical of 'free will.'

---

So why did you write this at the beginning of the "Quantum mechanics and David's Ultimate Reality" thread:

WolfsonJakk: Why is it such a stretch to assume that particles are in fact caused to exist?

Naturyl: Because they aren't. Sorry, but they just aren't. If that throws a bag of shit onto your worldview's doorstep, blame quantum mechanics, not the messenger. Blame reality for fiercely resisting every attempt to corner it. It would have been a lot easier and more sensible if virtual particle creation was a causal process. But alas, it isn't, the rest of quantum mechanics doesn't make much more sense to boot, and there's nothing to do but deal with it. Life goes on.

Quote:

---

Determinism and randomness can co-exist in the form of probabilism.

---

Agreed.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 904
(1/30/04 10:30 am)
Reply

Re: hell is other people: fate or farce?

---

Quote:

---

Key: "Future temporality" doesn't seem to mean much other than "time in the future".

---

Yes. What aren't you understanding about determinism and what it implies about the future?

As I said, logical/semantic determinism does not map to the future, and it only maps to the past with hindsight. It is marooned in the present moment, which is why it can't deal with the problem of change. I mentioned this before, along with the age old example of 'The Ship Of Theseus', but you neglected to deal with it.

Quote:

---

Key: I had a look in your post, but it didn't seem to contain anything relevant as to whether logical causality maps onto temporal causality.

---

Then you need to read it again, just the first section on logical determinism, and perhaps have a good think about it.

Quote:

---

Key: I showed above that it certainly does.

---

You mean by saying "Let's take the past Universe as one thing, and the present Universe as another. Now, given the existence of these things it follows that the present Universe is caused by the past Universe. Thus we have temporal causation.", you have showed that logical causality maps to temporality? You're kidding right?

If you want to show us how that is so then go ahead. However, perhaps you should understand the my argument first.

Here's a clue:

A was A

A is A

A will be A

A is A' iff every single predicate of A is true of A'.

Hold on, a predicate has just changed, there it goes again, and again..... ad infinitum.

Quote:

---

Key: I saw something about how you think determinism and free will are incompatible

---

Hmmm, that's a bit wierd. Are you sure you read it at all? I mean it was all about how I think that determinism and free will are compatible, so you can understand how I might think your conclusion erroneous. You only need read the first line to at least see that I'm saying that I think they are compatible.

Quote:

---

Key: but it is simple enough to prove that they are perfectly compatible. Open another topic if you want to discuss determinism/free will.

---

Okey dokey.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hello

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MikeJack1Registered UserPosts: 1(7/25/04 1:42 am)Reply | Hello <hr/> My name is Michael, i am german and i am new to the forum. Well, i am certainly no fan of psychology(i think it's just a modern way of being stupid). Well, is there anything specifically intresting right now to debate? What is the usual approach to discuss something here?                                                                     |
| HywelRegistered UserPosts: 73(7/25/04 2:04)Reply       | Hello <hr/> Hello Mike, I'm Hywel. Quote: <hr/> Well, is there anything specifically intresting right now to debate? What is the usual approach to discuss something here <hr/> I suppose that depends on what your interested in. The discussions here tend to wander off the original topic, so if you want to start posting its probably |

best to just read the last few posts of a thread to find out whats going on and decide if its interesting.

If theres something you want to discuss, just start a new thread.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1021

(7/25/04 2:25)

Reply

Re: Hello

---

Sup Mike,

Why do you call psychology, "a modern way of being stupid"?

-Scott

MikeJack1

Registered User

Posts: 3

(7/25/04 2:25)

Reply

Re: Hello

---

"The best way to answer such a question is to describe what genius is not. Firstly, genius doesn't necessarily relate to talent. Being exceptionally good at a particular task doesn't automatically imply that one is a genius. Albert Einstein and Johannes Sebastian Bach, for example, while having outstanding abilities in their respective fields, can't really be considered geniuses. They were simply very talented people in specific areas of life. Brilliant, yes, but they lacked the universal nature of true genius.

Genius is a function of one's relationship with Ultimate Reality and therefore a function of consciousness. To the degree that one is conscious of the nature of Reality and able to thrive effortlessly in its light, one is a genius. By this definition, people like Jesus, the Buddha, Lao Tzu, Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Weininger, and Socrates were geniuses to greater or lesser degree.

The chief characteristics of genius are independence of mind, authority, clarity of thought, insightfulness and wisdom. The genius transcends the fashions and myths of his culture and opens up his mind to the timeless wisdom of the Infinite. In doing so, he attains to a special kind of knowledge which is permanent, indisputable and beyond all relativity, a knowledge that very few know about. I personally consider such knowledge and wisdom the greatest things on earth and the source of all genius.

Dan Rowden "

What you forgot to mention here is, that every human mind has the possibility to grow to a Genius.

Also you seem to discredit some great thinkers for specializing into one subject, well a Genius KNOWS what he is supposed to do.

Also you seem to discredit great artists. Well, a good artist is a Genius for one fact, he has grasped the nature of the Universe - ART.

Being a Genius is not about spitting interlectual speeches, that only appeal to other "Geniuses". Being a Genius is, to be able to intercede a 'difficult concept' to a 'lower' intellect. Or to be able to simplify a concept to such an extent, that it is possible for someone who has no glue of the subject to grasp it, if that person has an urge to grasp it.

MikeJack1

Registered User

Posts: 4

(7/25/04 2:31)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

Because it does not work. Or just in such a limited area, that it is of NO USE at all.

If psychology were a workable science, it could be generally applied to all kinds of problems, and present a useful solution, but it can not.

Also, psychology does not even believe anymore in the spirit, this is where it obvious went wrong. If you call a science Psychology, then it should address the spiritual part of man. However, psychology calls man "an animal", which man is obviously not.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1022

(7/25/04 2:43)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

I disagree. When a patient follows a psychologist or psychiatrist's instructions well, they usually get the results they wanted. If a person is depressed and wants to not be depressed, they are generally cured.

Psychology isn't supposed to be applied to "all kinds of problems". It's PSYCH-ology; about the psyche, or mind. Philosophy is what you want.

Psychology doesn't believe in the spirit of man anymore because, basically, the spirit of man is an illusion. Our entire experience has been proven to be formed entirely by brain matter, nervous system synapses and chemicals. Man's spirit is just awareness, and there isn't an actual "spirit" that's separate from man.

...or maybe there is. All I am saying is that you sound like you know absolutely nothing about what you're saying.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1023

(7/25/04 2:44)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

Also, man is an animal. What do you think is the big difference between animals and man? I had a pet dog, Foxie, and from clues in her actions I could tell she had thought processes. She came to rational conclusions about certain things.

MikeJack1

Registered User

Posts: 1

(7/25/04 2:54)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

Animals use 'instinct'.

You are the glueless guy here.

Man can make up his mind, he can react compleatly contrary to logic or instinct or even sanity. Thus, man has the ability to decide. An animal does not decide, it reacts.

Well, if we talk, for example about the "medical-drugs" or "brain-lobotomie" or elektro-shock "therapie", then you can already see what kind of useful science psychiatrie is.

If Psychologie/psychatrie had a glue about soul or the mind, they would not try to damage the brain or the mind.

I can assure you: There is a 'spirit'.

I THINK, therefore I AM. (don't know the correct translation... but i am sure you've heard about this before)

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1025

(7/25/04 5:45)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

Animals use 'instinct'.

As I said before, I witnessed my pet dog Foxie use reason on a few occasions.

You are the glueless guy here.

No, I'm not the clueless guy.

Man can make up his mind, he can react compleatly contrary to logic or instinct or even sanity. Thus, man has the ability to decide. An animal does not decide, it reacts.

I disagree. Man is completely caused, and has absolutely no free will of his own.

Well, if we talk, for example about the "medical-drugs" or "brain-lobotomie" or elektro-shock "therapie", then you can already see what kind of useful science psychiatrie is.

Lobotomies are stupid. Electro-shock therapy works only temporarily, and is harmful in the long run. Medical drugs are absolutely fine, if they have only a few side effects. Our brains are made of drugs, so changing the drugs to get what we want isn't a bad thing. I don't see why everyone assumes it is.

If Psychologie/psychiatrie had a glue about soul or the mind, they would not try to damage the brain or the mind.

You're correct if you're saying that sometimes drugs have adverse effects. For instance, sleeping pills work when you take them but you develop a dependency for them. Without them you still can't sleep. Even if you get your sleeping schedule back on track, you've conditioned yourself that when you take PILL you SLEEP.

In those instances, drugs are bad. Drugs are also harmful when it damages your ability to function fully. HOWEVER! Many of the drugs psychologists issue are just fine.

Let's say we have someone who is severely depressed and unable to think rationally. They love emotion, and make themselves sad just to get what they love. Yet they hate it at the same time (I've had a friend like this). So they go to a psychiatrist and get some sort of manic depression drug. THIS DRUG ACTUALLY HELPS THEM TO THINK RATIONALLY.

My friend is now just fine, even though he still takes pills. A small price to pay for being able to enjoy life and think straight.

I can assure you: There is a 'spirit'.

I can assure you there isn't "spirit". What kind of an argument is this???

I THINK, therefore I AM. (don't know the correct translation... but i am sure you've heard about this before)

Yes fool, Descartes. He was attempting to describe the concept of awareness. Some people, in spiritual traditions such as Advaita Vedanta and Buddhism (even Christianity)...think that consciousness is spirit. That consciousness actually exists. IT ISN'T A THING! It has no existence.

If you think your consciousness is spirit, then why is your spirit confined to your body on the physical plane? Could it be that your body and mind create the illusion of consciousness?

You'd better have a good response, I don't even feel like talking to such an idiot.

-Scott

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1562

(7/26/04 0:26)

Reply

Re: psychology...

---

Scott, you idiot, you must be a psyche major.

Hywel

Registered User

Posts: 74

(7/26/04 2:15)

Reply

Re:

---

Quote:

---

Man can make up his mind, he can react compleatly contrary to logic or instinct or even sanity. Thus, man has the ability to decide. An animal does not decide, it reacts.

---

Isnt a decision a kind of reaction?

MikeJack1

Registered User

Posts: 2

(7/26/04 2:54 am)

Reply

re...

---

Re.. i wont go into everything you said...

but following up very very very old eastern philosophies, that have far more PROVE of being an actual philosophie...

Think about this:

Could it be, that what you "consider" reality, is actually an illusion created by your mind?

Could it be, that you are thinking the whole thing on a reverse vector?

Could it be, that if you try to prove those -lies- you just mentioned, you are actually inventing more lies...?

And think this through for a second:

Think of yourself as a spiritual being. The body is a construct you use as a communication facility(like a phone). What you are doing, in general, is pure enjoyment of life, even pain. Animals are a creation for joy, distraction etc... Your main goal is to participate...

RE: REACTION... No, reaction is the outcome, it is the "effect". Opposite is cause.

Above cause, is the decision.

You think you are geniuses? Wait until you die, and find out how wrong you have been.... (the lights wont go out, lol)

It's simpilcity that you should look out for, do not try to "Over-complicate" everything.

The real answers are real simple.

Edited by: MikeJack1 at: 7/26/04 2:59 am

Hywel
Registered User
Posts: 75
(7/26/04 3:46)
Reply

re...

---

Quote:

---

RE: REACTION... No, reaction is the outcome, it is the "effect". Opposite is cause.

Above cause, is the decision.

---

Isnt every cause an effect, and every effect a cause?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 1026
(7/26/04 4:09)
Reply

Re: re...

---

Mike, I won't go into everything you said. Just think about this: you're a fool.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 296
(7/26/04 7:28)
Reply

Re: re...

---

MJ wrote:

Quote:

---

I can assure you: There is a 'spirit'.

---

und

Quote:

---

Wait until you die, and find out how wrong you have been....
(the lights went out, lol)

---

What do you define 'spirit' as?

What do you define as 'death'?

MikeJack1

Registered User

Posts: 3

(7/26/04 8:06)

Reply

Re: re...

---

re. fool... do you often have headaches?... fool...

define it for yourself.

re cause&effect

well, in that case, yes. But no, too. The decision is a cause not necessarily based on an effect.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 1027

(7/26/04 8:31)

Reply

Re: re...

---

Learn how to make sense, and then maybe you'll be able to convince someone of whatever it is you're trying to convince them of.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 298

(7/26/04 8:56)

Reply

...

---

Even if there were spirits and consciousness didn't cease to exist after the death of the body, free will still wouldn't exist. Things are either caused or random. If choices are caused, they are just reactions and there's no free will. If choices are random, they are completely chaotic. A random choice is no choice at all.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 739(7/26/04 11:12)Reply          | Re: ... <hr/> Electro-shock therapy works only temporarily, and is harmful in the long run. Are you fairly certain of this.What would you recommend for violent folk or molesters?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| MikeJack1Registered UserPosts: 4(7/27/04 2:04)Reply                                                                                          | re.. <hr/> rairun: No free will? Ok. I am sure somebody who utters such thoughts is without any free will. Alright. E-shock: Does not work, it is proven to be harmful to the mind, and the person remains in a state of complete confusion, the person can not "think" anymore. For a person to recover from the harm actually done by e-shock, "she has to get a new brain". It's destroying the person. Recomment: Silence. No stress. No drugs. Maybe even isolation, but the person got to have "space" ie. can take a walk in a park. Very much "relaxation". |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1563(7/27/04 4:19)Reply  | Re: re.. <hr/> Scott, I really think you ought to have something better to do than engage in being pointlessly vicious. Mike - I am not always sure what your comments refer to. Let us know what you are answering. copy and paste.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hello

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 1028(7/27/04 6:17)Reply  | Re: re.. <hr/> You're right, Anna.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| Jones KellyPosts: 301(7/27/04 9:46)Reply                                                                                                     | Re: re... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> MJ wrote:I can assure you: There is a 'spirit'....Wait until you die, and find out how wrong you have been.... (the lights wont go out, lol) KJ: What do you define 'spirit' as? What do you define as 'death'? MJ: define it for yourself. <hr/> |

Well, I don't think you can assure me that 'spirit' and 'death' exist as things that can encompass all possible definitions for 'spirit' and 'death', including definitions that contradict other definitions for 'spirit' and 'death'.

Hywel
Registered User
Posts: 76
(7/27/04 10:04)
Reply

Re: Cause and Effect

---

Quote:

---

re cause&effect

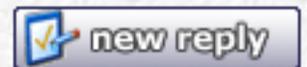

well, in that case, yes. But no, too. The decision is a cause not necessarily based on an effect.

---

A particular decision may not be based on (or caused by) any particular effect, but it will have causes (or be effected).

A human being making a decision is certainly effected (or caused) by many different factors, but I suppose they can all really be described under "who that person is". And what makes up "who that person is", is a huge number of other causes/effects, such as where they were born and grew up, who their parents were, their friends, and really every experience they have ever had. Which causes are applicable and significant in any particular decision is debateable, you could even say that a big cause of all the decisions that humans make is that they have a planet on which to do it.

But you can say that every human is completely caused by everything that they are not, because they rely on these other things utterly for their existence. This doesnt only apply to humans, of course, but to all things of any kind.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

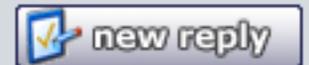

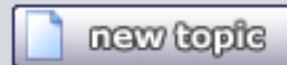

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Here, now.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Canadian Zoetrope  Registered UserPosts: 47(5/7/04 3:42 pm)Reply |  Here, now. <hr/> In the human mind, there is a program. A program created by specific codes of DNA, eons ago, in order to ensure our survival. This program is known as the ego. Because of the ego, the human mind percieves duality. This is essential for our survival: being able to distinguish between an apple and a rock is important for obvious reasons, as is being able to distinguish from past/present/future, we needed to be able to see how our actions effect our environment. Now, our ego, created so long ago, to ensure survival is doing something else. It is robbing us. Our ego is so obsessed with survival, that it never EVER gives any attention to the quality of that survival. For so long our ego did an amazing job, kept us alive on the plains of Africa, through the stone/bronze age, and on into the beginning of our current civilization. Recently, however, in the past 10,000 years, the human race has done some remarkable things. Not the least of which is agriculture. With agriculture, we were able to, for the first time in countless millenia, predict where food would be, and we could settle there, knowing for sure we would survive. Once the ego got us here, it's job had been accomplished. Now, as we all know, evolution takes a long LONG time. Perhaps the current abundant suffering in the world can be summed up in this explanation: Our egos, from time immemorial have driven us to ensure individual survival. Once agriculture was discovered, their presence was |

no longer necessary on the mental landscape. Now, we live in a society, which is centered upon the wants of the self, everyone stepping over each other to get the biggest piece of the pie, we never once stop to consider the quality of our survival.

So, here we are in the early 21st century, trying to satisfy our sisyphian thirst for more. We will never get enough, and so our ego tells us we're suffering. Just like Neurons in our skin tell us we're in pain. The ego thrusts suffering on us to prod us along a road we've already finished.

The solution obviously lies in the de construction of the ego. Once a person accepts his or her immanent death, and how really, death is only contextual, and not literal, as we're no more dead in the ground as we are walking and talking. To wit: The atoms that make our brain, will always exist, in one form or another, human 'life' is simply a separate manifestation of a single existence. I die, I am buried, a tree grows on my grave, an apple falls from the tree, is eaten by a pregnant mother, and the atoms from my brain, become the atoms of a new brain. Our ego, rather, tells us to be afraid of death. Why? Because as long as we're alive we can procreate. This is what we've been doing since the earth's crust cooled, and random atoms because synthesizing with each other creating molecuels, and accidently making more molecuels.

Once we destroy our ego, we can see existencet for what it really is. No time other than now, no place other than here. Existing in one moment, in one universe, in perfect harmony with all that is.

HansReinhardt
Registered User
Posts: 6
(5/7/04 4:06 pm)
Reply

 Re: Here, now.

---

Nice manifesto, but good luck. It's easy to say things like this:

Quote:

---

Once a person accepts his or her immanent death, and how really, death is only contextual, and not literal, as we're no more dead in the ground as we are walking and talking. To wit: The atoms that make our brain, will always exist, in one form or another, human 'life' is simply a separate manifestation of a single existence. I die, I am buried, a tree grows on my grave, an apple falls from the tree, is eaten by a pregnant mother, and the atoms from my brain, become the atoms of a new brain. Our ego, rather, tells us to be afraid of death.

---

But seriously, this is meaningless. Just because money and toilet paper are both made out of the same material, it doesn't mean they're interchangeable.

The circle of life thing is very grand sounding, but it's a poor substitute for being alive in the traditional understanding of the word.

The ego is what posits value, thus the ego is what values life. To eliminate the ego is to eliminate the value of life -- or anything else.

My point? Your solution itself is a greater problem than your original problem, which is fear of death:

I am afraid to die, which put another way, means that I value my life very highly. The problem is, I know I will die and since I believe in evolution, that means that I don't believe I will go to heaven and live forever. Bummer; what to do? Well, I could focus only on the fact that a primary aspect of my existence is biological and that my body will decay and become a part of the shared biology of the planet. Conversely, I then have to eliminate my ego, or, devalue my valuing function to the point of it not working. If I eliminate my valuing function I will no longer value my own life and this solves my fear of death.

This is like putting out your eyes to avoid looking at stuff you don't like. Sure it works, but the cure is worse than the disease.

Edited by: HansReinhardt at: 5/7/04 4:09 pm

Canadian Zoetrope 🖐

Registered User

Posts: 48

(5/7/04 11:04 pm)

Reply

☐ Heh.

---

Actually, money is made out of cotton.

Anyway, I don't agree with the idea that the ego is what posits one's value for life. Just as you said, money and asswipe are not interchangeable, so then it would stand that the value for survival, and the quality of survival are equally non-interchangeable.

I suppose I take issue with your statement, because you either seemed to have mis interpreted the core of my idea, or I did not communicate it sufficiently.

Here's the problem your encountering, from my point of view.

Quote:

---

I am afraid to die, which put another way, means that I value my life very highly.

---

If I had equated the length of live, with the quality of life, then this idea would be inherently correct. However, the core idea of my post was that the quality of life is sacrificed by the ego, in the name of quantity. Our ego shops at Wal-Mart.

Returning to your idea:

Quote:

---

I am afraid to die, which put another way, means that I value my life very highly.

---

I would not suggest that being afraid to die, necessarily infers the value of life. One might be deathly afraid of flying, only to sedate the fear, with a calming pre-flight cigarette. The fear is conquered, life is extended, however, it is at the expense of the quality of that life, being lowered by the damage done to the body.

However, one could easily argue that the smoking of the cigarette is an activity that the individual enjoys, and therefore, adding more quality to their life experience. This would be the exception, that proves the rule.

Quote:

---

The problem is, I know I will die and since I believe in evolution, that means that I don't believe I will go to heaven and live forever. Bummer; what to do?

---

I also take issue with the fact that you automatically assume that a lack of heaven would be a negative stimuli for someone who believes in evolution, when I went to great lengths to say otherwise. There is no death, ergo no heaven/hell, ergo no fear of loneliness/retribution from God. This single flaw unwinds the rest of your argument.

Quote:

---

If I eliminate my valuing function I will no longer value my own life and this solves my fear of death.

---

Again, valuing life, does not infer fearing death. Actually, I personally look at death as any other experience: something that changes me, what, and who I am, and that which is irrevocable, as all things always are.

I am not saying your wrong. Had I equated the quality with the quantity of life, as you did, then your argument would logically hold ground. However, I did not, and can accept responsibility if this was not communicated with greater fluidity.

Thank you, :)

HansReinhardt
Registered User
Posts: 7
(5/8/04 1:18 am)
Reply

Re: Heh.

---

Quote:

---

I am not saying your wrong. Had I equated the quality with the quantity of life, as you did, then your argument would logically hold ground.

---

Since I hold that the ego is the thing that posits value, I still maintain that the abolition of ego would negate valuing either quality or quantity. That, as I see it, is the problem with the approach you outlined.

Quote:

---

If I had equated the length of live, with the quality of life, then this idea would be inherently correct. However, the core idea of my post was that the quality of life is sacrificed by the ego, in the name of quantity.

---

Not necessarily. It depends on the maturity of the person, or, ego. But anyway, "quality of life" is no great prize if you are not alive. Your point about being alive because your biological matter is still in circulation is a bit thin to provide any real comfort. For example: imagine a mother has lost her baby. Do you honestly think that she will feel better if you tell her that her baby will become grass which will be eaten by a cow which will be eaten by a man? Sorry, I don't think so.

Quote:

---

I would not suggest that being afraid to die, necessarily infers the value of life. One might be deathly afraid of flying, only to sedate the fear, with a calming pre-flight cigarette.

---

I think it does. Fear is a protective mechanism that guards against pain and the thought of death is painful in the deepest sense. The root of the fear of flying is ultimately the fear of death. If you say that it is simply fear of pain, then how do you account for people with a fear of flight being able to drive a car? Would an airplane accident necessarily be more painful than a car accident? No. But a plane accident is more likely to result in death (although planes are not more likely to crash). If you are able to smoke a cigarette and deal with fear of flying, this does not support your argument. It is a chemical solution. You might as well smoke crack.

Quote:

---

There is no death, ergo no heaven/hell, ergo no fear of loneliness/retribution from God. This single flaw unwinds the rest of your argument.

---

And this is my point. You haven't actually proved there is no death, you have simply taken one aspect of your existence (the biological) and over-inflated its importance to deal with a problem you were having with another (the spiritual, or, ego).

Edited by: HansReinhardt at: 5/8/04 2:16 am

Canadian Zoetrope

Registered User

Posts: 49

(5/10/04 2:56 pm)

Reply

 Hrmmmm.

---

Okay, well basically the point of my post is that the ego, cares only for survival, and disregards the quality of that survival, in order to ensure it. That's why we suffer. I have offered good evidence to back this up. The ego, by definition is what drives our ability to survive, whether it be through conceptional duality, or chronological discrimination. The ego's pupose is to define the 'self' and do everything it can to ensure the survival of the self.

It must be noted, that the ego, is not the 'self' rather a small part of the self, in the manner that the engine is a part of the car, and not the entire car.

My point is that the engine will take drive the car, regardless of the destination. And it is up to the driver to assume responsibility for the journey. My point is that for 100's of millenia, this was a perfectly suitable way for our minds to function, it ensured our survival, and brought us to where we are.

However, we are not happy. We do not really care for this desintation, and refuse to take responsibility for where we are, by blaming an ungrateful 'god'.

My argument, is that we are here because are manifested ego's are still living in a time when survival is the priority. When nowadays, because of our collected cultural achievements: government, agriculture to name a few, survival is virtually garunteed.

We live in a society now, that feeds pur ego's hunger for more. A left over affliction, when survival was not taken for granted. This was a necessity, it no longer is. So we are left with a driving force 'ego' and nothing more for it to achive. This leaves us feeling empty, because we cannot achive something we already have. So we fill our lives with material goods in order to feel as though we're achieving survival. But, while this is symbolically important, these material things cannot fill a void that is already filled. So we spend our lives trying to win a race we've already won.

Kind of like a preffesional sports team, once it wins a wins a championship, and doesn't win it the next year, automatically it's deemed a losing year. Despite it's earlier achievements.

Because our ego gently whispered into our collective psyches for hundreds of thousands of years: "survive, survive, survive..." we still feel the pressure to survive, to achieve an impossible goal. We feel empty, we feel like failures, and we will continue to, until we recognize that out ego's are simply a left over program, designed to help our species survive. It's job has been completed, and now it's time for us to move on, and stop being so damn self centred.

Is anyone understanding me?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1499

(5/11/04 1:17 am)

Reply

Re: Hrmmmm.

---

Zoe,

I think that your thesis about evolution and ego does not really touch the problem. Yes, if the need to survive was a great struggle, then the ego would be over-active. That is a good point. But in the end, I fear death because I fear and loathe the idea of non-being, of no-consciousness, of no longer being part of the story that is unfolding. Being absorbed into the apple tree makes me part of the story I guess, but only in an unconscious, molecular sense.

And anthropologically, it appears that the invention of agriculture actually aggravated the problem. Hunter-gather peoples at least have expanded their sense of survival and love to include the whole tribe to a degree almost equal to the self. It is those societies which emphasize sharing, group survival, respect for nature and animals and the web of life. It was the agriculturalists who bought and sold pieces of land and instituted kingship and the buying and selling of food, with guards to enforce the above.

In fact, I think this is the source of the nostalgia humanity has for a golden past. Now that we have civilization, our problem is to get back on track, evolutionarily.

You are saying neither death nor life is real, so why worry. Why does this not comfort me? Why am I skeptical?

HansReinhardt

Registered User

Posts: 16

(5/12/04 12:57 am)

Reply

Re: Hrmmmm.

---

Amen, Bird.

Quote:

---

Okay, well basically the point of my post is that the ego, cares only for survival, and disregards the quality of that survival, in order to ensure it. That's why we suffer. I have offered good evidence to back this up. The ego, by definition is what drives our ability to survive, whether it be through conceptual duality, or chronological discrimination. The ego's purpose is to define the 'self' and do everything it can to ensure the survival of the self.

---

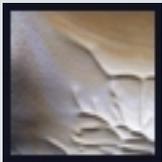

Sorry, but I don't think you've proved this or backed it up well.

Yes, the ego cares for survival, but it is a stretch to say that it disregards the quality of that survival. The fact of suicide shows this. Furthermore, so does our ability to sacrifice ourselves for others and ideals.

Also, the idea that the ego causes suffering is a bit absurd. Perhaps it's true in a highly stylized psychological sense. But it is not universally applicable. Let's take a crude example: imagine I set a baby on fire. Do you honestly think its suffering is an illusion caused by its ego? Actually, it is doubtful babies have egos and care much about conceptual duality, but anyway...

Edited by: HansReinhardt at: 5/12/04 12:58 am

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 380
(5/13/04 9:51 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: Heh.

---

Quote:

---

I would not suggest that being afraid to die, necessarily infers the value of life. One might be deathly afraid of flying, only to sedate the fear, with a calming pre-flight cigarette. The fear is conquered, life is extended, however, it is at the expense of the quality of that life, being lowered by the damage done to the body.

However, one could easily argue that the smoking of the cigarette is an activity that the individual enjoys, and therefore, adding more quality to their life experience. This would be the exception, that proves the rule.

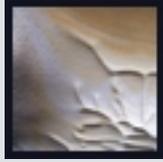

---

Smoking is a yellow stain down a person's back.

All drugs are like this.

It's understandable though, Reality is a rabid, white-hot plasma-breathing dragon to commonfolk.

It's nothing like the playful kitten - within which the sage is immersed.

|                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                    | edited: spelling error Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 5/16/04 12:45 pm                                                                      |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2628(5/16/04 2:47 am)Reply                                                                                                 |  --- <hr/> The playful kitten left a stain down your back Rhett. |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 384(5/16/04 12:49 pm)Reply   Edit  |  Re: --- <hr/> I'll get the dragon to lick it off.               |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hermaphrodites

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 12(8/15/03 3:54 am)Reply | Hermaphrodites <hr/> Like Jiddu Krishnamurti 'tached' for over 60 years, all we have to deal with is: 'What is'. Thought is wrong, attachment, and so on, they only bring misery, and extinction in the end. (I'm not a follower, let alone 'believer', of this great mystic, but he was right all along, I guess.) I've finally read Mr. David Quinn's, what is it, essay?, on Man &amp; Woman. I'm sure he generalized for the purpose of clarity. A beautiful and courageous piece of work! Must we become hermaphrodites in order to save this Earth for mankind? God, who doesn't exist in my view, did quite a bad job, didn't He? (If the former is true, I would miss the romancing bit, though :-) What is your opinion on this? |

|                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 112(8/15/03 8:44)Reply  | ... <hr/> I quite like my thoughts, feelings and "attachments". I find it kind of weird when people say "I have to fight my attachments, because they are related to things that have no inherent reality and that's not logical", but the attachment itself has no inherent reality. How the hell are you supposed to fight something that doesn't even exist in the first place? Live with your thoughts and feelings (both are the same thing in my opinion), the people saying they are bad don't know what they are talking about. Having said that, you can figure out that I find the idea of becoming a hermaphrodite useless to me. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 268(8/15/03 8:51)Reply | Re: ... <hr/> Rairun - +1.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 13(8/15/03 9:03)Reply     | To Rairun <hr/> Of course it's a useless idea to become a 'hermaphrodite'! It's just a theory. But it's the only way out. Out of what? Don't ask. You'll have to figure that out for yourself. (There's also the question of 'awareness'. Major issue.) Did you read my posting carefully? J. Krishnamurti didn't accomplish anything with his 'What is' thing, yet he was right. David Quinn will accomplish nothing with his essay, yet it is on the nail, in its essence. Thank you, Rairun, you live with your thoughts and feelings, I'll live with mine. Love,Paul                                           |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 270(8/15/03 9:37)Reply | Re: To Rairun <hr/> Out of what? I quadruple doggy dare you to answer!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

|                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 14(8/15/03 9:48)Reply      | To voce io <hr/> I had to deal with guys like you in other forums, 'voce io'.You lack intelligence.That's not your fault, though! Hug? |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 271(8/15/03 9:49)Reply  | Re: To voce io <hr/> Paul, I don't care. Post something substantial...like the answer to the question.                                                  |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 15(8/15/03 9:53)Reply      | Re: voce io <hr/> If you say you don't care, I don't care.Then we're even. Pax?                                                             |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 272(8/15/03 10:27)Reply | Re: voce io <hr/> Paul, no deal. Answer the question.                                                                                                   |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 16(8/15/03 10:38)Reply     | Re: voce io <hr/> 1. You are clearly not Enlightened.2. You're a pain in the ass. To me, that is. Just teasin', son!                 |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce io Registered User Posts: 273 (8/15/03 10:44) Reply                                                                                                      | Re: voce io <hr/> 1. This has nothing to do with ACTUAL enlightenment. 2. Oh well. The theory is that humans need to become hermaphrodites to get out...out of what?                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| I AM Registered User Posts: 210 (8/15/03 12:50) Reply                                                                                                         | ..... <hr/> In my opinion... Enlightenment can only come about in full relation to the world. Anything else such as any type of deprivation or hermaphroditation can only induce hallucination by nature. The use of drugs, TM techniques, or even hermaphroditation can be used to show the mind other states of consciousness but they are not it. |
| Paul Registered User Posts: 18 (8/15/03 16:04) Reply                                                                                                          | To: I AM <hr/> I agree with you. (Your it, is it love?)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| prozak666 Registered User Posts: 211 (8/15/03 23:16) Reply  | Re: To: I AM <hr/> Seeking a state of consciousness outside the mind is a will toward death. So die.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 1012
(8/16/03 11:12)

Reply

Hermaphrodites

---

Somewhat interesting thread.

I do think the world would be more peaceful if humankind was sexless. No women = no wars.

Pseudo-feminists will get their panties in a wad over such a statement. A true feminist will understand exactly what is meant.

As long as females continue to exploit themselves and to allow themselves to be exploited for sexual purposes -- like milkcows -- there will be strife.

You take away the tit and the testicle will atrophy.

Faizi

birdofhermes

Registered User
Posts: 851
(8/16/03 11:23)

Reply

Re: Hermaphrodites

---

You don't think greed and various forms of glory and power are sufficient to cause war?

MKFaizi

Registered User
Posts: 1013
(8/16/03 11:44)

Reply

Re: Hermaphrodites

---

Quote:

---

Seeking a state of consciousness outside the mind is a will toward death. So die.

---

Interesting statement, Prozak, and well put. For an asshole, your statement is remarkable.

It brings up many questions, the most pertinent of which is definition of death.

Obviously, death is the cessation of bodily functions.

You state that the seeking of consciousness outside the mind is a will toward death.

Do you believe that the seeking of consciousness is death, outside of the mind or not? How would you know that your seeking of consciousness is outside the mind?

How could there be consciousness outside the mind? Since the brain is the seat of the mind that stops functioning at physical death, what could be beyond it?

This speculation belongs to the realm of religion and the occult.

I think that one who desires consciousness should seek it at all costs.

Death is nothing compared to consciousness.

It is rather strange to an individual when the signposts to one's physical death start to become obvious. It is like a downpour of rain.

You can't stop the rain.

Faizi

Paul

Registered User

Posts: 21

(8/16/03 11:54)

Reply

MKFaizi

---

I'm in love. Again.

Or should I say: I fell in love.

With MKFaizi.

Fat chance for me, she being 'my' woman,
I know. But there are feelings.

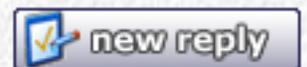

Be my Yin!

I love you.

Kill me.

Now.

|                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1014(8/16/03 13:01)Reply  | Re: MKFaizi <hr/> Anna, I don't think you understand men. Wars are fought to protect women. Men do not fight wars to protect men. That would be counter-productive. Faizi                                                                                                                     |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 22(8/16/03 13:11)Reply                                                                                       | MKFaizi <hr/> Fine answer to Anna,no reply to me. That's it! Divorce! But I still love you.I mean it. paulterbeek@home.nlhttp://www.spiderwebservices.nl/thegoldengirlsquotes Yours,Paul |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1371(8/16/03 13:12)Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Wars are fought because men like fighting! Women make great excuses. Marsha, I don't think you understand women!                                                                                                                                                                                         |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hermaphrodites

 new topic

 new reply

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1016(8/16/03 13:21)Reply | Re: ---<hr/> I made it very plain that I do understand women. Women are the cause of war.Faizi |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 23(8/16/03 13:26)Reply                                                                                            | MKFaizi<hr/> Yes, but I'm a man.So what's your point?Write me!Please...                    |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 279(8/16/03 16:44)Reply                                                                                        | Re: MKFaizi<hr/> Pathetic Paul.                                                                        |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1375(8/16/03 19:17)Reply                                                                                    | ---- <hr/> Women are not the cause of war, nor is woman -to once and for all put out the eyes of homeric blindness, but they are the purest spectators of wars, the nurses, not the creators. "Woman loves only a warrior"--Nietzsche |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1017(8/17/03 12:18)Reply   | Re: ---- <hr/> Wars are fought for protection of the homeland. Therefore, they are fought for the protection of women and children. If there were no women, there would be nothing to protect. There would be no wars. Faizi          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1380(8/17/03 13:12)Reply                                                                                    | --- <hr/> If there were no women, there would be no men! Wars are man-made and are fought out of fear and for fun. Protection of homeland? Wars are often begun in order to seize more homeland.                                             |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1020(8/17/03 13:16)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> To seize more homeland for the protection and enrichment of women. Again -- take away the tit and the testes will atrophy. Faizi                                                                                 |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1381(8/17/03 13:21)Reply                                                                                  | --- <hr/> No, rather for the protection and enrichment of ones women and children, ones people, culture, meaning.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1021(8/17/03 13:53)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Yes, just as I said -- wars are fought because of women. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 25(8/17/03 14:50)Reply                                                                                       | MKFaizi <hr/> Oh, I'm pathetic, you say. You're my Cleopatra, in some way. Help!, and love are on the way.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 284(8/17/03 17:46)Reply  | Re: MKFaizi <hr/> I disagree that wars are fought to protect the homeland, thus women. Wars are created to expand or protect power bases - to remain in control of the pack. It is true that individuals participate in wars to protect women from others or destitution, or to be in line with the herd, or for the excitement of hunting and killing, or revenge for the taking of a resource - but the leaders or creators of wars do it for selfish reasons. These men do fight wars to protect men - their men, their power base, their place in the hierarchy, their sphere of interest. Although the desire of women for material things - which results from their need to provide for their children or potential offspring - does increase the desire within men, as they are growing up, to have more power than is necessary, mostly it is just the active exercise of competition for the control of resources - which allows the winners to feel more satisfied they are in control of their environment and future than others. Women are just another resource. |

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 287

(8/17/03 18:44)

Reply

Re: MKFaizi

---

I quite like my thoughts, feelings and "attachments". I Live with your thoughts and feelings (both are the same thing in my opinion), the people saying they are bad don't know what they are talking about.

The four stages of liberation (just some ramblings from a novel I'm reading at present)

Simplex - one is caught within the boundaries of a single worldview, namely whatever culture or parents have imprinted into their consciousness. It is the great and deadly vanity of human beings that to convince themselves that their worldview, no matter how unlikely or bizarre, is somehow more sane, natural, pragmatic, holy, or truthful than another. This is the danger with attachments.

Complex - To be complex is to hold at least two different realities, perhaps at two different times in ones life. The complex man or woman will cast away beliefs like old clothes, as they become worn or inappropriate. Complex involves a progression from one belief to another, ever growing, ever more flexible, bursting free from one worldview to another as a snake sheds an old skin. The truly complex person will move freely among these systems as the need arises.

Multiplex - If complexity is the ability to suspend and adopt different beliefs as they are useful or appropriate, one after the other, then multiplexity is the holding of more than one reality at the same time.

These realities may be as different - or even contradictory - as science is to an adult and magic is to a child. Truth is multiple. One can never become multiplex if afraid of paradox or enslaved by the god of consistency. The mastery of multiplex makes it possible to see the world in many dimensions. The multiplex man will see all truths as interlocking parts of a greater truth.

Omniplex - holding all possible realities at once. For gods only.

|                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 196(8/17/03 22:32)Reply | Re: <hr/> "Wars are man-made and are fought out of fear and for fun." Fear of what? Fear of not protecting the homeland. "Protection of homeland? Wars are often begun in order to seize more homeland." ...To allow the tribe to grow, therefore to allow more women and children. Your Nietzsche quotes shows the point further. Most (all?) men strive to be wanted by women... You can be rather shallow, suergaz. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1382(8/18/03 0:27)Reply  | --- <hr/> "fear of not protecting the homeland" I'm awfully sorry, someone must have fucked you in the head. "Most men STRIFE to be wanted by women..." You can be rather a dicknose ynithrix.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1384(8/18/03 0:41)Reply  | --- <hr/> There is a difference between these Marsha. "women are the cause of war" "wars are fought because of women"                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| ynithrixRegistered UserPosts: 198(8/18/03 0:44)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> "You can be rather a dicknose ynithrix." English is not my first language: whether I say strive or strife doesn't matter too much to me, I would've thought you'd see what I meant...it's not too hard.                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1386

(8/18/03 2:19)

Reply

---

---

What is your first language?

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 117

(8/18/03 10:28)

Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

Somewhat interesting thread.

I do think the world would be more peaceful if humankind was sexless. No women = no wars.

Pseudo-feminists will get their panties in a wad over such a statement. A true feminist will understand exactly what is meant.

As long as females continue to exploit themselves and to allow themselves to be exploited for sexual purposes -- like milkcows -- there will be strife.

You take away the tit and the testicle will atrophy.

---

When I first answered to the post I was thinking it was about the idea that "feminine" traits should be eliminated, not the conflict between two genders.

I agree that there is conflict between them, especially in the way our society works, and it's disgusting to me. It's not really the thought of an actual war that disgusts me, it's the domination game that pretty much every person is part of that does. Even as a male, the one who is supposed to exploit instead of being exploited, it's stressing to think about being part of it.

I don't really have an opinion about a future hermaphrodite race though. I like the way I set my mind - I'm not taking part in any of that and that's enough for me. If anyone else feels bothered by the environment, I guess they would do the same and act according to what they want. It's not really hard.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 852

(8/18/03 12:54)

Reply

Re: MKFaizi

---

Quote:

---

I don't think you understand men.

Wars are fought to protect women. Men do not fight wars to protect men. That would be counter-productive.

---

I don't buy it. The desire to protect comes only after the fact of invasion. You didn't even address the glory and power question. Hitler, for example, was obsessed with war games as a very young child, and he was almost certainly homosexual. That the fame, glory and power which tend to go along with conquering can also lead to access to women can of course not fail to be a motivator. But then, the desire for access to women is a constant for every male in every circumstance. How can you explain the great interest that boys have in notions of glory and power before they have any real sexual feeling? Even though I agree that that the desire to penetrate the female is the most fundamental one, and that the others are to some extent tied to it, or at least not utterly independent of it, nonetheless I think other desires are sufficient motivation for war.

If men really have only one motive in life, that being their connection to women, then their existence is actually derivative.

Then too, to speak as though there could be such a thing as human life without women, or, for that matter, without emotion, is to so utterly reform the entire world and life as we know it, that it becomes unrecognizable.

I'd rather try to raise people's consciousness and awareness than go back to the drawing board and start all over.

David in his essay says it is surely not reason and logic, but emotion that is the cause of our impending death but that is only partly true. The real cause is deranged and hidden emotion, reason and logic applied to twisted and unsatisfied desires of the spirit, a disconnect between head and heart that causes men to use their great talents to such destructive ends. That men are failing as the rulers is obvious.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1389

(8/18/03 14:58)

Reply

---

---

Quote:

---

David in his essay says it is surely not reason and logic, but emotion that is the cause of our impending death but that is only partly true. The real cause is deranged and hidden emotion, reason and logic applied to twisted and unsatisfied desires of the spirit, a disconnect between head and heart that causes men to use their great talents to such destructive ends. That men are failing as the rulers is obvious.

---

I don't think it's obvious. It is obvious that men, as rulers, have failed, and failed better and better, and have shown that by ruling they can only advance the understanding that understanding ruling is to rule. Men do not even want to advance it towards the end where it would become an imperative!

Emotion is the fount of all reason.

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hermaphrodites

Page 1 2 3

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                   | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 854(8/19/03 0:05)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> It's a darned good thing for you that your are a man, Suergaz; can you imagine how you would be dismissed for such writing if you were a woman? Failed better and better?Understanding ruling is to rule?What would it be like if they advanced it to an imperative?Why is emotion the fount of reason? |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 856(8/20/03 5:16)Reply | Suergaz!! <hr/> Zag you are not much more than a disruptive force here. Not only do you refuse to explain when people ask, but you feel free to drop discussions all the time. No one can count on you to follow through. I want to know why you consider emotion the fount of wisdom, and I want at least two paragraphs, damnit.   |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1391(8/20/03 12:32)Reply                                                                               | ---- <hr/> When I see to my reason, and am not merely taken by it, I see that not only is it inextricable from my feeling, but born from it. It is not something I have considered but apprehended. Why do you care if I drop out of a discussion or remain with it, do you count perseverance over good taste? If you ask yourself what I mean by something, I am sure you would not have great trouble aswering yourself correctly.                                                                                                                           |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 857(8/20/03 13:55)Reply                                                                           | Re: ---- <hr/> Why do you care if I drop out of a discussion or remain with it, do you count perseverance over good taste? Oh, sometimes you seem to be saying something that might have some merit, which if I could figure out what it was...but when asked you often don't reply. Of course good taste is often the reason for dropping a conversation. Youi drop them more than that. If you ask yourself what I mean by something, I am sure you would not have great trouble aswering yourself correctly. You overestimate my powers, dear! |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1393(8/20/03 21:54)Reply                                                                               | ---- <hr/> Well, if you like, I shall make a note of this thread, and I shall attempt to answer every missed question if you can recall them and post them here.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1337(8/21/03 14:02)Reply  | Re: ---- <hr/> Enlightenment is not about becoming some kind of hermaphrodite (physically or mentally); it is about transcending the duality of gender. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 858

(8/21/03 15:09)

Reply

Re: ----

---

OK, start be explaining this:

Quote:

---

It is obvious that men, as rulers, have failed, and failed better and better, and have shown that by ruling they can only advance the understanding that understanding ruling is to rule. Men do not even want to advance it towards the end where it would become an imperative!

---

The common Chemists cook their water and their materials in the fire;
the hermetic Sages cook their Fire in their Water!

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1395

(8/21/03 16:36)

Reply

----

---

That wasn't a question Anna! What there needs explaining? Be specific! You had better explain this:

Quote:

---

The common Chemists cook their water and their materials in the fire; the hermetic Sages cook their Fire in their Water!

---

Dan, is enlightenment about anything any longer?

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 610
(8/21/03 17:45)
Reply

Cooking

---

Quote:

---

birdofhermes:
The common Chemists cook their water and their materials in the fire; the hermetic Sages cook their Fire in their Water!

---

I like that quote, where did you get it?

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1340
(8/22/03 0:04)
Reply

Re: ----

---

Zag asked:

Quote:

---

Dan, is enlightenment about anything any longer?

---

Yes, it is everything that hasn't been so far.

Dan

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 859

(8/22/03 5:26 am)

Reply

Re: ----

---

It is obvious that men, as rulers, have failed, and failed better and better, and have shown that by ruling they can only advance the understanding that understanding ruling is to rule. Men do not even want to advance it towards the end where it would become an imperative!

Quote:

---

That wasn't a question Anna! What there needs explaining? Be specific!

---

If I ever come to Australia I'll surely drop by just for the pleasure of knocking your head a couple of times. Then you'll answer without silly pretences. The whole damn thing needs explaining and well you know it! I already asked you three questions, and I will repeat them.

What do you mean failing better and better?

What do you mean understanding ruling is to rule?

What would become an imperative?

Quote:

---

You had better explain this:

---

-----
The common Chemists cook their water and their materials in the fire; the hermetic Sages cook their Fire in their Water!
-----

That was a signature quote I used once on another board, and I have no idea how it got here. I thought those were blocked here. It's an ancient alchemical reference, and I don't know who might have originally said it.

It refers to the idea that the alchemists make a liquid distilled substance that they refer to as "our water" (also Diana, or mercury or the dove) that is a very light and pure yet penetrating substance, in which they place another substance usually referred to as sulphur, or lead, or the dragon, which has an inner fiery nature. The combination of the two mingle and penetrate in the flask. In fact, it's from this process that I took the name BirdofHermes, also called an eagle or crow. The god Hermes is considered the originator or alchemy.

You see how it's done? Now let me see you try it.

Edited by: birdofhermes at: 8/22/03 5:28 am

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1397

(8/22/03 1:00 pm)

Reply

----

---

Quote:

---

suergaz:-Dan, is enlightenment about anything any longer?

Dan:-Yes, it is everything that hasn't been so far.

---

You're saying that enlightenment is the future?! Or do you mean it is only about it?

Ok Anna, I'm sorry to have made your blood boil.
Thankyou for the questions.

Quote:

---

What do you mean failing better and better?

---

I mean failing less and less in the sense that when one fails one may learn how one failed as well as being an example of a certain kind of failure.

This out from Zarathustra:

Timid, ashamed, awkward, like a tiger whose leap has failed: this is how I have often seen you slink aside, you Higher Men. A throw you made had failed.

But what of that, you dice-throwers! You have not learned to play and mock as a man ought to play and mock! Are we not always seated at a great table for play and mockery?

And if great things you attempted have turned out failures, does that mean you yourselves are-- failures? And if you yourselves have turned out failures, does that mean --man is a failure? If man has turned out a failure, however: very well! come on!

Quote:

---

What do you mean understanding ruling is to rule?

---

I mean there is no other way to understand ruling than by ruling, that the instruction is in the doing is the rule!

Quote:

---

What would become an imperative?

---

Ruling of course!

Edited by: suergaz at: 8/23/03 5:45 pm

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1345

(8/22/03 13:49)

Reply

Custom signatures and emoticons

---

Anna wrote:

Quote:

---

That was a signature quote I used once on another board, and I have no idea how it got here.

---

I hadn't gotten around till now to turning off the custom sigs and emoticons.

|                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                               | Actually, I forgot all about them. My reasons for doing so are as before. If anyone really feels the need for an emoticon fix, they still work in the chat room. Knock yourselves out :) Dan Rowden |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 82(8/3/04 5:46)Reply | Re: Hermaphrodites <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                  |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

Gold Community GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of presence.

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| timeless truthRegistered UserPosts: 1(8/16/03 1:56 pm)Reply | How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of presence. <hr/> The most direct evidence we have of the present moment is the perception of our own motion as revealed in the changing appearance of our surroundings. However, in order to see the world as spatial, this perception becomes a tool, with the result that it becomes transparent. In effect, we sacrifice our own presence in order to give presence to objects. This tool is adapted by the mind to project thought. So, mankind's obsession with the material world and with ideas of who we are stems from his lack of affinity with the present moment. However, meditation can help each individual to reacquaint himself with his true presence and to transcend mankind's misguided ways. Please read essay at: http://www.the-door.info/ Edited by: timeless truth at: 8/16/03 2:01 pm |

|                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 24(8/16/03 19:30)Reply                                                                                   | Presence <hr/> I love you.Too many words. Message from inhibited Paul                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Dragon of LogicRegistered UserPosts: 3(8/22/03 0:00)Reply                                                                          | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> You say mankind's ways are "misguided". How do you figure? Is not everything the effect of the cause? There are those who know the truth. There are those who abide in it. There are those who do neither. All are but a palm print in infinity. All are as they should be. |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1341(8/22/03 0:26)Reply  | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> Should be or must be? Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| HywelRegistered UserPosts: 3(8/22/03 0:50)Reply                                                                                    | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> All are as they are. Even to say "must" seems to suggest being forced from some other possibility. Hywel                                                                                                                                                             |

Dragon of Logic

Registered User

Posts: 4

(8/22/03 1:08)

Reply

Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese

---

You are right. Must be. The effect cannot be separated from the cause. They come together. It also "must be" in order to distinguish one thing from the next. Like the saying goes, "if all men are wise, then where are the wise men?". So the existence of ignorance is necessary for the existence of wisdom, and vice versa.

If you remove ignorance from reality, don't you also remove wisdom from reality? (I am, of course, using these terms as polar opposites).

When one is enlightened, is he then neither ignorant nor wise? When one is in accordance with his true nature, is he then not enlightened and not unenlightened?

From the individual standpoint, wisdom is the clear goal. From the ultimate standpoint, there is no goal.

This is where I get confused. Seems like the closer you get to truth, the more contradiction arises. I do not see the reason for taking the individual standpoint when the ultimate standpoint is what is real.

What am I missing, Dan?

timeless truth

Registered User

Posts: 2

(8/22/03 3:43)

Reply

Mankind's misguided ways

---

I do think mankind's ways are misguided, because there appears to be excessive emphasis on material values. I think this stems from our seeing the world as spatial, because the perspective necessary to see space compromises our innate sense of presence. The resulting existential emptiness is then 'filled' with possessions. But, the problem with possessions is that they lose their value and need to be replaced. This also applies to one's identity, since circumstances change, threatening the identity one has become accustomed to.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1342

(8/22/03 13:29)

Reply

Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese

---

Hywel wrote:

Quote:

---

All are as they are.

Even to say "must" seems to suggest being forced from some other possibility.

---

I agree with that. My use of "must" in this instance was intended to convey the meaning that things cannot be other than what they are.

Dan Rowden

Dragon of Logic

Registered User

Posts: 9

(8/23/03 0:44)

Reply

Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese

---

Dan wrote:

-----
I agree with that. My use of "must" in this instance was intended to convey the meaning that things cannot be other than what they are.
-----

Then why do enlightened people attempt to enlighten others? One is either going to be enlightened in this lifetime or one is not.

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1357

(8/23/03 0:49)

Reply

Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese

---

Enlightened people attempt to help others attain enlightenment because that is what they are.

I mean, what other reason could there be?

Dan Rowden

|                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dragon of LogicRegistered UserPosts: 10(8/23/03 0:59)Reply                                                                        | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> What of enlightened people who do not attempt to help others attain enlightenment? Are they not enlightened? You seem to be saying that helping others is a requisite for enlightenment.                                                                                                                                                                              |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1358(8/23/03 11:42)Reply  | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> I was making the point, in the spirit of the "must" theme that enlightened people do what they do, whatever that may happen to be, because they, like everything else, are simply what they are by necessity. However, I do regard the propagation and survival of wisdom as the among the most natural purposes an enlightened person could adopt. Dan Rowden |
| Dragon of LogicRegistered UserPosts: 11(8/23/03 14:32)Reply                                                                       | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> I certainly don't disagree with that. Well stated.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 80(8/3/04 5:44)Reply                                                                                | Re: How spatial perception inhibits one's own sense of prese <hr/> FUCK SHIT PISS BALLS NUTS BANANA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.32
Copyright ©1999-2005 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hu Zheng abridged

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1857(12/8/03 2:53 pm)Reply  | Hu Zheng abridged <hr/> Huz Heng's outpourings contain some excellent stuff. He's a real find. He has that wildness of thought which is needed for wisdom; all he needs now is some discipline and he'll really go places ..... Anyway, these are some of my favourite bits: --- - What is the different between academic philosophy and heroin? When dive into it, they feel very good, they want to dive into it always, but they must get out of it sometime, get money to buy new heroin, just as they often get money by sell heroin to others, the academic philosophy teacher can only earn money by teaching his philosophy to others, when he is out of his mental world, he is weak, both the body and spirit is weak, and, as academic philosophy is just a chronically poison, they can dive into it in their whole life, but they find them must be a professor in a university to earn some money to maintain the life, their philosophy is only theirs, no help to others. - Most human is still animal, hay and copulation are enough for | them, they don't need truth, so don't try to tell them the truth, or they will be angry (such as, you are pigs), they don't need freedom, so don't give the freedom to them, or they will starve to death in the forest.

- When I hear the roommates' words, when I go outside and watch the peoples, their weak, their null spiritual, their non-exists astonished me. How can they be so ignorant? and even they are still call the "elite" as being a university student. One people have no different from one ant. They have nothing filled in their brain, it is not that they can't, but they don't. The present age must be the most important age in human history, human explored the whole earth, the science applied everywhere, Internet spreads to everywhere, and the society become very stable! No big war seems will happen after the invention of atom bomb, it is easy for everyone to alive comfortably...As stable as the ant and honey. Ant and honey have existed for million years, but never developed further in these million years.

- Don't force your opinion on your son, the next generation is always better than you. Let the sapling grown up without your scissors. Never suppress the humanity, such as play games in childhood, such as sex desire, don't you see, most student play computer games everyday in the university now, because they don't play enough computer games ago, this can't be suppressed, I have played many games in my childhood, so I past this state now, and start learning in the university.

- One sentence in a philosophy book can extend to a literature book. It is always like this. Words in a philosophy book are all essence.

- Philosophy is so useful, but most people didn't sensed this, if the philosopher's ideology spread everywhere, it will change the whole world more than science, if I can just spread and explain Nietzsche's thinking to the world, it is BIG enough. I need to understand Nietzsche's thinking completely first.

- Do you want to be Bill Gate? Einstein? Nietzsche? ... No. If there exists god, he let me to choose to be anyone of them or death, I will choose death. If being one of them, then where is me? Death won't eliminate me, because death is one part of my life. So many people are doing things to eliminate himself, to be another one. If god ask me whether want to be god, i will say no too. What i want to do? I only want to be myself, to be me, but i am already myself, i am already me, then i need to do nothing. I walk there, i sit here, i develop StarDict, i think, this is doing nothing. What am i doing? Being myself, or, doing nothing.

- The world is very small in fact, i am related to everything in the world in fact, everything influenced me, i influenced everything, even a star in the sky, have relation to me. I trust this. As said in "Poison for The Heart": "The air you breath in is breath out by me".

- I go out and have classes sometimes, i am in there, i am outside there. I watch them, and think. Have them conscious themselves? They have a ego, but their ego is so small, that they haven't conscious themselves. I look through their head, their conscious to me, is only a little floating smoke, it is there, but if they can't find it by themselves, it will not be there easily. I go out of the classroom when the teacher is still there, there is no rule to me, as i am not in their world. I walk on the road, i am in the world, but i know, the world is just in my conscious, my conscious is so big, that contained the whole world, my conscious extend from my head to the outside, contained the cosmos. Everything, everybody, is just a small part as in my conscious, a small part of Me.

- Once i find the Me, i find it can never be eliminated. Death can't eliminate me. Where i come from? When am i generated? When i was born, i was generated? Or when the oosperm conjugate? or I was inside the gene? The me is so miraculous, that it can't generate from null, it can't be generated, it is always there. The physical me is just some material, these material is there, always there, when the cosmos is there, the physical me is there, it is always changing, but it is always there. Then, the spiritual me, when i am a infant, i know nothing, i only being me, it is only a me, but it is me, the me, is there, always there, it is always changing, from know nothing to know something, from know something to know nothing, but it is always there. The me is not generated instantly when i was born. I can't be generated instantly, then, i can't be eliminated instantly, death is said to will eliminated me instantly, but it can't, as i am not generated instantly. I am there, after the death. The physical me is still there, the spiritual me is still there, the physical me may become the material in other forms again, but it is still there, the spiritual me may become know nothing again as before i was born, but it is still there. I never generated, I never eliminated. Birth didn't generated me, death won't eliminate me. I exist from the start, i exist forever. Where i come from? I am there from the start. Where i go? I am there forever.

- I know i will be alone forever. Once you find the Me, you will get this too. Do I have the desire of to be not lonely? If there is me, there is lonely.

Try to be lonely as me, try to be individual as me, it feel very good, and it is very good :) Be a eagle hover in the air, don't be a sparrow in the many other sparrows.

- If Otto Weininger didn't commit suicide...

Otto was a brilliant student in high school (Gymnasium), exhibiting a special flair for the humanities. Later, he also developed a keen interest in the natural sciences and mathematics. He possessed his parents' talent for languages and at eighteen, apart from German, knew Latin and Greek, spoke French, English, and Italian well, and was fluent in Spanish and Norwegian. At age sixteen, he wrote an etymological essay on certain Greek adjectives found only in Homer and attempted unsuccessfully to publish it in a leading philological journal of the time. He was not, however, a model schoolboy. He frequently disturbed classroom teaching and followed his own inclinations in his studies, rarely paying heed to his teachers. "My pleasure in 'hell-raising' in class is my pleasure in chaos," Weininger noted in his pocket notebook in 1903.

Shortly after the publication of his book Weininger said to a friend "There are three possibilities for me - the gallows, suicide, or a future so brilliant that I don't dare to think of it".

- Television, newspaper, magazine, all garbages.

- To the future reader: when you are reading my articles, you may find what i said is right, but you already know these things, why i say these obviously right things here? but, please don't take these things for granted, I see numerous people didn't understand these things yet, human is much stupider than you thought of. Everyone know the earth is round when he is born? No.

- When i review the sentences that i wrote down, i find, it changed, it can't express what i want to say when writing them, these sentences appears to be the words come from a innocent and passionate child now, most of the things i want to say is lost, if you use your experience to understand my words, you will only get the understanding which fit yourself, our experience are different, but my experience can't be write down, I can't tell these experience to you. The truth need to be taught face by face! So we can share the experience. It is said that only 38% of the truth can be written down, right. How to get the other portion of the truth? You need to build your own experience and be thinking.

I know your feeling after read my articles, such as, when you see i say i am enlightened, you just think this is a lovely boy, but i mean i am really enlightened, you lack the experience of enlightened, so you can't understand what i say, you use your experience to understand it, then you think you just meet a funny boy.

- It is very boring that one people always saying himself being a genius, but, please forgive me, i just wrote down what i thought honestly. And you know, i am only only saying this, i am doing some other things, i am thinking.

- Physics and many other nature science are only one small part of the truth, most truth lie in the human itself. What i am good at is understanding myself, then i understand the others easily too.

- If you don't trust that you can done it, how can you done it? If i don't trust i am a genius, how can i be a genius? So i must trust it, even just for maybe i am a genius. Boy, you need to trust you are genius too, i can tell you:"you are a genius", you can trust me. The different from enlightened or not is very small, every boy have the potential to achieve enlightenment. You are told that you are not a genius because your achievement is not good? No, you are still a genius, your achievement is much better than the young Einstein at least. You are a genius, always remember this, always trust this!

The different between you and I is not i am a genius and you are not, but I trust i am a genius but you don't.

- I can give you a powerful weapon which i find occasionally: You want to defeat him? Always laugh :) Laugh when he is showing his money, his car. He cost many years' toil to get these things, you break he by one second, just by showing your laugh to him :) You will find he can't laugh happily as you, because you have everything that he want in his heart, and he know the car which he have is not wanted by you, he don't want the car too, so he envy you and can't laugh about. Laugh when the teacher ask you to do something with his solemn face, and leave him :) But, to laugh naturally, you need to achieve enlightenment first :)

- Go out, go to feel the earth and the sky, don't always stay in a room, or your view will be limited!

Your everyday life is not ultimate reality, the earth and the sky are neglected in your everyday life, the everyday life is just a world build by many people, it have no different from a world in a book, a world in a computer game.

- To be honest, i confess that i am a little making fun of you, sometimes, my laugh is a little like the laugh when you see a monkey wearing the clothes and doing something. You think the things what the monkey is doing have no meaning and laugh, i sometimes think... :)

Don't tell others that you get a good job which the monthly pay is six thousands, while others heard this and envy you, i laugh, because i begin to imagine a monkey become very happy because she is given six peaches everyday :_)

- Nietzsche go mad, Weininger commit suicide, I laugh :) I am lucky, that i read their books, not write their books. Then...

These thought have already sprout in my head, so when i read Nietzsche and Weininger's books, i understand their thought easily, and think they are right. If I didn't read their books, i must be me write their books, which will make my life as miserable as theirs.

I am confident, and I must be confident, this is directly related to my life. Nietzsche and Weininger are confident, they trust there will be a person who understand their thinking and agree with them 100 years later. My confidence is easier, there are two geniuses 100 years ago who agree with me.

- Oh, please, please don't think i am genius, i am not a genius, how can you trust the words come out from a child when he is dreaming, don't treat my words seriously, just get joy from them, or you will find you are played by a child :)

If i am not the genius, you are? Yes, if you think i am not a genius, then you are a genius. Yes, you really think i am not a genius, because, you are really a genius!

- When i am thinking, the whole world is in my head, the cosmos is in my head, the history is in my head, everything i know is in my head :) Everybody is in my head, every great man is thinking in my head, i explore this world by my thinking, i see Mao Zhedong, what is he thinking? i start thinking, then i understand what he is thinking :) Their thought is only a part of my thinking.

- Don't neglect any small clue of your thinking, think about it deeply, then surprising thought come out.

- Everyone of you know that human is different from animal is because human can think, but, are you thinking? you are thinking about food, house... animals can think about these things too.

- Genius must often feel that himself is a ignorance, i always feel i am a ignorance, know nothing, now :) So i learn eagerly. The different between ignorance and idiot is that idiot don't try to learn.

- Yes, the more my head is clear, the more clear i know i am the lightning that Nietzsche waited, the more my head is clear, the more clear i know i am the genius of geniuses that Weininger waited. I say the precious words, loudly, with my calm, clear head.

Geniuses in the world! Unite! The lightning is out! The first superman is born! The genius of geniuses is born! Follow me! Enlighten yourself! Geniuses!

- Awake, you are being a monkey! You don't "think" so? Try to record every word you said today, try to record every action you are doing today, then spend one day to watch it tomorrow! You will find a monkey!

- Monkey won't create anything in their whole life, what have you create? The computer you are using is not created by you, the clothes you are wearing is not created by you, everything around you is not created by you, you monkey. You take the material things created by geniuses, but you never take the spiritual things created by geniuses, have you read even one book written by the geniuses in the past so many years? You monkey.

- Everyone of you have these things in your heart too, the desire of truth is in your heart when you were born, but all of you forget it, lost your desire of truth. Why human are born? You are born with the desire of truth, the mission is given to you when you are born, but all of you forget your mission in your life when you grown up.

Start to recollect your childhood, write down it with every detail, you will find your desire of truth again, you will find you are a genius!

- If i am not so wise, i won't go to the way of becoming philosopher :_) I am not dazzling my wise here, you know, being a philosopher is not so wonderful, but it is inevitable to me now, once start your thinking, you can never stop it, hoho. Truth, is not so good too, :) inevitable. Anyway, being a philosopher to me is not so bad presently, i am much happier than ago, although the happy is different from the happy ago, i can always burst into laugh when reading some philosophy books, :) the bad thing will come some years later, that is, become a sage :) look at those sages, so dreadful life they are leading, :_), inevitable.

---

* subject heading edited - DQ

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 12/9/03 6:33 am

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1859
(12/8/03 3:50 pm)
Reply

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Huz Heng wrote:

Quote:

---

My thinking come near nihilism now, just like this: "There is no Truth, all is acceptable, all are aspects, all is truth." This is a trouble to me.

---

Do you find yourself falling into an acceptance of this "truth" at the expense of other views, such as "Only some things are true"?

"All is truth" is a meaningless viewpoint. The only way it can gain meaning is by contrasting itself to a false view, which by its own terms it cannot do .....

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 870
(12/8/03 6:11 pm)
Reply

Huz Heng abridged

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000
Huz Heng's outpourings contain some excellent stuff. He's a real find. He has that wildness of thought which is needed for wisdom; all he needs now is some discipline and he'll really go places .....

---

This guy is definately on the level.
I'll have to find out more about him.
Time for Google.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1891

(12/8/03 9:42 pm)

Reply

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

It's Hu Zheng, not Huz Heng!

David calls you a find! I call you a friend. Perhaps in his language find means friend, but even so, he thinks you need discipline, and one who says this outright to another where they could suggest it is not to be taken seriously, not only for the fact that between you and he, he would be the disciple, but he does not indicate where you you need it, in short--he cannot suggest it to you!

There are many who would learn laughter from us. There are many who are afraid to love us for losing themselves, spread your thought! You are wrong to say thinking is like a virus! It is yourself you are spreading, and you do not corrupt what you spread onto, into, as disease does. Your love is hard. Strike whilst others can only explode. ----To think, I have often behaved as the Monkey king amongst monkeys! ----

Philosophers! Do you know who you are? Who you must become, and overcome? It is only yourselves! And this is the air of Wisdom:--- That there is no genius killer amongst its many enemies!

In saying, I am not saying your saying was not understood by me! All I mean is genius is never die! I am Die. Die on ice us?

Naturally, this does not matter.

Friends.

 BookMark My Words

Registered User

Posts: 18

(12/9/03 12:51 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Quote:

---

- Don't force your opinion on your son, the next generation is always better than you.

---

Wow.

So, if all generations are an improvement on the previous one, what was Jeffery Dahmer's father like?

Mr. Hitler, Sr.?

Gotta say, at least G. Bush could finish a sentence...

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1895

(12/9/03 1:56 am)

Reply

--

---

He said the next generation, not all individuals within it Bookmark! The next generation of ones life is ones self-conception as living future.

 BookMark My Words

Registered User

Posts: 19

(12/9/03 3:05 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: --

---

Quote:

---

He said the next generation, not all individuals within it Bookmark! The next generation of ones life is ones self-conception as living future.

---

Oh. Then why the reference to the Son in the preceding sentence? My future life is not my son. Unless i was a soccer dad living out my personal fantasies in screaming from the sidelines...

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 424

(12/9/03 4:08 am)

Reply

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Think about it. If you have a child, the child will inherit your knowledge, as well as gain their own; that's how the next generation is always better. It's simple.

Hu Zheng (Huz Heng?) is not enlightened. He has gained knowledge of relationships in the world. An enlightened person would not move, because their entire brain would be conscious of Reality (nonduality). The mind's primary function is to compartmentalize and separate, to define. Such, NO mind can be enlightened.

We are all enlightened.

 BookMark My Words

Registered User

Posts: 21

(12/9/03 4:43 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Quote:

---

Think about it. If you have a child, the child will inherit your knowledge, as well as gain their own; that's how the next generation is always better. It's simple.

---

Simple, yes. but that would mean that Hitler, an only child, was better than his father? Good heaven's, what a monster. And his grandfather? And HIS grandfather?

Strangely enough, this idea seems completely at odds with observed reality. Not all knowledge is passed on, not completely and not accurately. Some with knowledge are not capable, or give the chance, to pass it on.

My dad, for example, is a lousy teacher. Great lecturer, though. For any given topic he is trained on, he gives a lecture, A to Z, with everything you'll ever need to know on the subject. But, if you have a question...he reiterates the lecture. A to goddamned Z. And some of what he KNEW was wrong. I had to unlearn it before I could learn something else.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 10(12/9/03 4:56 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Re: Huz Heng abridged <hr/> Not all knowledge is passed on, but knowledge is still passed on. A child first learns what his father is and then learns more. It can go past the father. In that, it is better. At least in the father's point of view.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|  BookMark My Words Registered UserPosts: 22(12/9/03 5:38 am)ReplyezSupporter  | Re: Huz Heng abridged <hr/> But in the kid's point of view, if Dad was wrong, we haven't gotten better. Stupidity has, in fact, persisted to another generation. For example, some people were rather fond of Piltdown Man. In the next generation of scientists, there was evidence, if not of a hoax, at least that Pilty did not fit in with the rest of the evidence being found. Adherence to Pilty, because that was what they were taught, actually hindered the free evaluation of the evidence found elsewhere. |
| AutemRegistered UserPosts: 12(12/9/03 6:16 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Re: Huz Heng abridged <hr/> Those people may not have been better than other scientists, but they were better than those who taught them. They got further. There is no other way to get further than to get beyond what others put into yourself.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1088(12/9/03 6:16 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | It's Hu Zheng <hr/> Quote: <hr/> The mind's primary function is to compartmentalize and separate, to define. Such, NO mind can be enlightened. <hr/> Perhaps, then, it is not the mind, per se, that gets enlightened.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

 BookMark My Words

Registered User

Posts: 23

(12/9/03 6:21 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Quote:

---

Those people may not have been better than other scientists, but they were better than those who taught them.

---

Maybe the problem here is that i don't think 'more' is necessarily 'better.' At some point, the successive generations of scientist building upon a foundation that was a hoax, had to realize that a great deal of what they KNEW was wrong.

The original statement that the next generation is always better seems wrong to me. If the 1st generation is an idiot, the next generation could be an even greater idiot. That isn't 'better.'

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1860

(12/9/03 6:57 am)

Reply

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

I don't think Hu Zzeng was meaning it in that sense. He was probably referring to the idea that a young child already has tremendous capabilities and potential, and is therefore superior to the frozen-minded adults around him.

Suergaz wrote:

Quote:

---

David calls you a find! I call you a friend. Perhaps in his language find means friend, but even so, he thinks you need discipline, and one who says this outright to another where they could suggest it is not to be taken seriously, not only for the fact that between you and he, he would be the disciple, but he does not indicate where you you need it, in short--he cannot suggest it to you!

---

In my view, he needs discipline in two areas:

- He is in danger of allowing his head to swell too much with the thought of his own attainments, which could eventually unbalance him, like it did to Nietzsche. Or even worse, it could cause him to stagnate in his current heaven and nip his progress in the bud, like it did to Rajneesh, the guru of the orange people. Hu Zheng has already achieved much, but despite his claims to the contrary, he is not enlightened yet. He still hasn't cleared the danger zone.

- He needs to prioritize his thinking more. At the moment, he is in a super-explorative phase, which is fine. But sooner or later, he is going to have to decide what is most important in life, organize his mind around it and start rejecting what is incompatible with it. Otherwise, his potential for greatness will be frittered away.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 425
(12/9/03 9:35 am)
Reply

Re: Huz Heng abridged

---

Simple, yes. but that would mean that Hitler, an only child, was better than his father? Good heaven's, what a monster. And his grandfather? And HIS grandfather?

I don't know much about Hitler, other than his political history. He is a moral monster in that. When we say "generation", though, we don't mean the few exceptions. We mean the sum of all people within that time.

I don't think Hu Zeng was meaning it in that sense. He was probably referring to the idea that a young child already has tremendous capabilities and potential, and is therefore superior to the frozen-minded adults around him.

What makes a person frozen minded? Beliefs, or points of view on subjects, right? I'm not trying to attack you, David, but you seem to be a very frozen-minded adult.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1864

(12/9/03 11:40 am)

Reply

re:

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

What makes a person frozen minded?

---

Either fear or smugness, mainly. Often both.

Quote:

---

Beliefs, or points of view on subjects, right?

---

Yes, you certainly seem stuck on that point of view.

Quote:

---

I'm not trying to attack you, David, but you seem to be a very frozen-minded adult.

---

I don't think you have very good eyesight, to be honest. A person who is truthful and free can no more change his mind than the truth itself can change. But this isn't frozen-mindedness. It is God's constancy.

"A person who doesn't change is either the wisest of the wise or the dullest of the dull", counsels the Dhammapada. For someone who is visibly stagnating in the idea that there is no enlightenment, I would be very careful if I were you, Voce Io.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 164
(12/9/03 12:08 pm)
Reply

Re: Hu Zheng abridged

---

David wrote:

Huz Heng's outpourings contain some excellent stuff. He's a real find. He has that wildness of thought which is needed for wisdom; all he needs now is some discipline and he'll really go places .....

It took me a little while to convince myself that you didn't have your tongue in your cheek.

Those that access the 'Genius List' will know what i mean when i say that he reminds me of Donna Thompson.

What makes you think he really has a center David?

Rhett

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 1898
(12/9/03 1:51 pm)
Reply

---

---

David:---

Quote:

---

- He is in danger of allowing his head to swell too much with the thought of his own attainments, which could eventually unbalance him, like it did to Nietzsche. Or even worse, it could cause him to stagnate in his current heaven and nip his progress in the bud, like it did to Rajneesh, the guru of the orange people. Hu Zheng has already achieved much, but despite his claims to the contrary, he is not enlightened yet. He still hasn't cleared the danger zone.

---

Clear the danger zone? What man wants to live without danger?!
"Gods constancy?!" David, go do it outside you bad dog!

Bookmark, stop being a muppet, you know full well what Hu Zheng meant! (:D)

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 426

(12/9/03 2:21 pm)

Reply

Re: re:

---

I don't think you have very good eyesight, to be honest. A person who is truthful and free can no more change his mind than the truth itself can change. But this isn't frozen-mindedness. It is God's constancy.

Truth is constant, but realization of Truth is subject to inconsistency. When you hold strict views on the realization, instead of the Truth itself, you are closing yourself off. When you deny the possibility that you are a closed-minded adult, you are being closed-minded.

"A person who doesn't change is either the wisest of the wise or the dullest of the dull", counsels the Dhammapada. For someone who is visibly stagnating in the idea that there is no enlightenment, I would be very careful if I were you, Voce Io.

You must have misunderstood me. I believe in enlightenment, and I don't believe in enlightenment. There is truth, and there is Truth. Why would I say anything in a forum about the realization of Truth, if I honestly didn't believe in any sort of realization? Compared to the Truth itself, realization is just a little dream.

Why should I be careful? If I'm proven wrong, which I should be, then my ideas were wrong. No big deal. If I sway people from some imaginary path to enlightenment, then good. We are all enlightened, anyway. No one needs to achieve anything.

Yet (I'm putting words in your mouth, from what I know of your ideas) you think that people need to do certain things/be a certain way to attain enlightenment. I agree.

See?

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 319
(12/9/03 3:39 pm)
Reply

Re: re:

This conversation reminds me of Huang Po:

All Buddhas and all sentient beings are no different from the One Mind. In this One Mind there is neither arising nor ceasing, no name or form, no long or short, no large or small, and neither existence nor non-existence. It transcends all limitations of name, word and relativity, and it is as boundless as the great void. Giving rise to thought is erroneous, and any speculation about it with our ordinary faculties is inapplicable, irrelevant and inaccurate. Only Mind is Buddha, and Buddhas and sentient beings are not different. All sentient beings grasp form and search outside themselves. Using Buddha to seek Buddha, they thus use mind to seek Mind. Practicing in this manner even until the end of the kalpa, they cannot attain the fruit. However, when thinking and discrimination suddenly halt, the Buddhas appear.

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

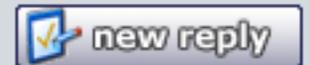

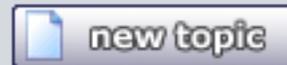

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Hu Zheng abridged

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 1866(12/9/03 3:58 pm)Reply  | Re: re: <hr/> Voce Io wrote: Quote: <hr/> Truth is constant, but realization of Truth is subject to inconsistency. <hr/> Only to the degree that one is slipping in and out of awareness of it. Quote: <hr/> When you hold strict views on the realization, instead of the Truth itself, you are closing yourself off. <hr/> If these strict views are true, then one is closing oneself off from falseness, which is a good thing. An open-mindedness that is so open that it cannot discriminate between true and false is of no use. Quote: <hr/> Yet (I'm putting words in your mouth, from what I know of | your ideas) you think that people need to do certain things/be a certain way to attain enlightenment. I agree.

---

What are those certain things?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1867

(12/9/03 4:19 pm)

Reply

Re: Hu Zheng abridged

---

Rhett wrote:

Quote:

---

What makes you think he really has a center David?

---

I don't think he has a centre yet - he's still too young and unformed - but he does have that special turn of mind which is both flexible enough to think outside of the conventions and profound enough to experience inklings of the highest wisdom. It remains to be seen whether this will eventually translate into genuine sagehood.

It could easily be the case that the golden period he is currently going through will one day fade away, and, having lacked the foresight to plant deep spiritual roots during his period, he will suddenly find himself just a normal sod again. Especially if he spends too much time ogling Icelotus.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 876

(12/9/03 7:09 pm)

Reply

-

---

The women will be along shortly after the battle to raid the corpses for jewels (true sayings).

The next generation of men will have to arrange them once again.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 430

(12/10/03 5:27 am)

Reply

Re: re:

---

Only to the degree that one is slipping in and out of awareness of it.

Also the process of realization. Different sages say different things, make their students/disciples do different things. All of that is subject to fallacy.

If these strict views are true, then one is closing oneself off from falseness, which is a good thing. An open-mindedness that is so open that it cannot discriminate between true and false is of no use.

If you were committed to Truth, you wouldn't need your open-mindedness to be useful. The strict views you hold aren't True, every thing is open to error.

What are those certain things?

You were talking about them earlier in this thread. What Hu Zheng should do or be. That's just an example.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1869

(12/10/03 7:58 am)

Reply

Re: re:

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: If these strict views are true, then one is closing oneself off from falseness, which is a good thing. An open-mindedness that is so open that it cannot discriminate between true and false is of no use.

VI: If you were committed to Truth, you wouldn't need your open-mindedness to be useful. The strict views you hold aren't True, every thing is open to error.

---

It isn't, but it's obviously something that you want to believe in. I'm not really motivated to continue talking with you because you're far too smug in your limited insight. Perhaps it's because you're still only 18; it's very much an adolescent trait to believe that one's small pool of knowledge is the pinnacle of all human thought. Hopefully, it will be something you will grow out of soon, but I have my doubts.

For the sake of other readers of this forum, I'd like to analyze the belief that "everything is open to error" or "our every thought is false". It is a fairly widespread view in our society today and, even though it is easy to expose, one comes across it all the time. It is popular with aimless hedonistic types because it gives them a lazy way to justify their rejection of all idealism and their pleasure in being passive.

It should be noted that when a person asserts - or in most cases, preaches - that every thought is false, he is, in the very moment of preaching it, affirming something which he believes to be true - namely, that every thought is false. He asserts it as a truth in his attempt to tear down the idealistic position of his listener. But then, suddenly, in the very next moment, he completely disowns what he has just done and pretends that it didn't happen at all. For he realizes (subconsciously) that he is stuck with the idea that every thought is false, which immediately traps him in a flat contradiction. And because there is no way of dealing with such a fatal contradiction in a rational manner, the only way he can deal with it is by blocking it out of his mind altogether.

And so that is what he does. One minute he asserts a truth so powerful that (in his mind, at least) it defeats every great philosopher in history, the next moment he disowns it and assumes a pose of nothing ever happening at all. A bit like a robber denying point blank that he had robbed the bank he just came out of, even though he is wearing a balaclava and carrying bags of cash. It's a case of arbitrarily rewriting history to suit one's egotistical purposes, a form of denial of reality.

So not only is the person who asserts every thought is false (or every belief is crap, or everything is prone to error) being lazy, he is also being duplicitous and hypocritical. No one who actively engages in thought and values purity could possibly get stuck in it. But alas, millions do.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 432
(12/10/03 9:37 am)
Reply

Re: re:

---

It's purely a misunderstanding on your part. I realize I seem smug, and stupid. At the moment, I don't see why I should even consider changing myself to please you. The "rational man" who relies on how things "seem"!

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 301
(12/10/03 1:47 pm)
Reply

keep the faith

---

DQuinn wrote:

Hu Zheng has already achieved much, but despite his claims to the contrary, he is not enlightened yet.

>

Dont believe it, Hu. You believe in yourself.
They tried this "lets-try-to-make-him-doubt-himself" crap with me too, dont fall for it.

What do they know about Reality that you dont, anyway? Probably not a thing.
Keep the faith!

Leo

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1096
(12/10/03 1:57 pm)
Reply

keep the faith

---

Quote:

---

They tried this "lets-try-to-make-him-doubt-himself" crap with me too, dont fall for it.

---

How ridiculous of them! They must be blind not to see that you're enlightened.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1875
(12/11/03 9:10 am)
Reply

Re: keep the faith

---

Leo Bartoli wrote:

Quote:

---

They tried this "lets-try-to-make-him-doubt-himself" crap with me too, dont fall for it.

---

If Hu Hzung's enlightenment is genuine, then nothing I say can make him doubt it. If it is falsely imagined (and I say that it is), then he can only benefit from having it questioned. Either way, no harm can be done to him.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 445
(12/11/03 9:33 am)
Reply

Re: keep the faith

---

If Hu Hzung's enlightenment is genuine, then nothing I say can make him doubt it.

Says you. What proof is there that genuine enlightenment doesn't include doubt?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1876
(12/11/03 10:13 am)
Reply

Re: keep the faith

---

It's a proof that can only be found within enlightenment itself. The transcendence of doubt is part and parcel of ultimate understanding.

The enlightened person can no more doubt his own enlightenment than a conscious person can doubt the fact that he is conscious.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 302
(12/14/03 11:07 am)
Reply

no kidding!

---

DavidQuinn wrote:

Leo Bartoli wrote:
Quote:
-----
They tried this "lets-try-to-make-him-doubt-himself" crap with me too, dont fall for it.
-----
If Hu Hzung's enlightenment is genuine, then nothing I say can make him doubt it. If it is falsely imagined (and I say that it is), then he can only benefit from having it questioned. Either way, no harm can be done to him.

LB: You think i don't know that?!

If you're so damn wise then why didnt you figure out there must have been some other reason for my comment, and hold-back your impulsive two-cents?

Such a show-off at times you are, Quinn.

Leo

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 303
(12/14/03 11:15 am)
Reply

Hu Hzung

---

Incidentally, what is it about what he's said that makes you question his enlightenment? Some logical error somewhere? The evidence of Ego?

Have you considered that this language is not his first? Have you read his thoughts in Chinese?

Have you enquired as to what he means by Enlightenment? Perhaps he's utilizing the word in a different manner than yourself, eh?

Leo

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1327
(12/14/03 11:49 am)
Reply

Re: re:

---

Voce Io wrote to David,

Quote:

---

At the moment, I don't see why I should even consider changing myself to please you.

---

I doubt he would be pleased or not-pleased whether you did it or not. It is for you and you alone, Voce.

Essential Prerequisites:

Nature's evolution (as it appears) is based on cause-and-effect, Consciousness begins with identity and differentiation ( $A=A$ ), and Enlightenment involves emotional transcendence from local (perhaps even Universal) phenomenon based on the previous two facts.

Tharan

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1894
(12/15/03 1:33 pm)
Reply

Re: Hu Hzung

---

Leo wrote:

Quote:

---

If you're so damn wise then why didnt you figure out there must have been some other reason for my comment, and hold-back your impulsive two-cents?

---

What was your reason?

Quote:

---

Such a show-off at times you are, Quinn.

---

I try my best.

Quote:

---

Incidentally, what is it about what he's said that makes you question his enlightenment? Some logical error somewhere? The evidence of Ego?

---

His thinking, while sometimes quite profound, is not very mature or consistent. It's still very experimental. Also, his self-love distorts his judgment too much.

Basically, he's mentally too young to be put on trial and judged to be enlightened or not. All we can say at this stage is that he has potential.

Quote:

---

Have you considered that this language is not his first? Have you read his thoughts in Chinese?

---

I'm actually wondering whether his primitive English and Chinese modes of thought create the illusion of a wisdom which is not really there. Perhaps they do to some extent.

Quote:

---

Have you enquired as to what he means by Enlightenment? Perhaps he's utilizing the word in a different manner than yourself, eh?

---

Anyone who doesn't define enlightenment as consciousness of Ultimate Reality is definitely deluded.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 304
(12/15/03 2:10 pm)
Reply

Hu Hzung

---

Leo wrote:

Quote:

-----
If you're so damn wise then why didnt you figure out there must have been some other reason for my comment, and hold-back your impulsive two-cents?
-----

DQ:

What was your reason?

LB: Isnt it obvious?-- to demonstrate your impulsive, peacockish tendencies! Well, not just that.

I was kind of hoping the man might correct me, and he might have hadnt you.....

There are too many reasons to list!

Quote:

-----
Such a show-off at times you are, Quinn.
-----

I try my best.

Quote:

-----
Incidentally, what is it about what he's said that makes you question his enlightenment? Some logical error somewhere? The evidence of Ego?
-----

His thinking, while sometimes quite profound, is not very mature or consistent.

LB: Well, i was hoping for something concrete to back up your refutation. Show me inconsistency. (I havent read very much of his, to be honest).

It's still very experimental. Also, his self-love distorts his judgment too much.

LB: Indeed.

Basically, he's mentally too young to be put on trial and judged to be enlightened or not. All we can say at this stage is that he has potential.

LB: Has he revealed his age?

Quote:

-----
Have you considered that this language is not his first? Have you read his thoughts in Chinese?
-----

I'm actually wondering whether his primitive English and Chinese modes of thought create the illusion of a wisdom which is not really there. Perhaps they do to some extent.

Quote:

-----
Have you enquired as to what he means by Enlightenment? Perhaps he's utilizing the word in a different manner than yourself, eh?
-----

Anyone who doesn't define enlightenment as consciousness of Ultimate Reality is definitely deluded.

LB: Sure, but he may have also used the word in another manner. (What did he say?..... Nevermind. What did you say, Hu?)

Leo

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

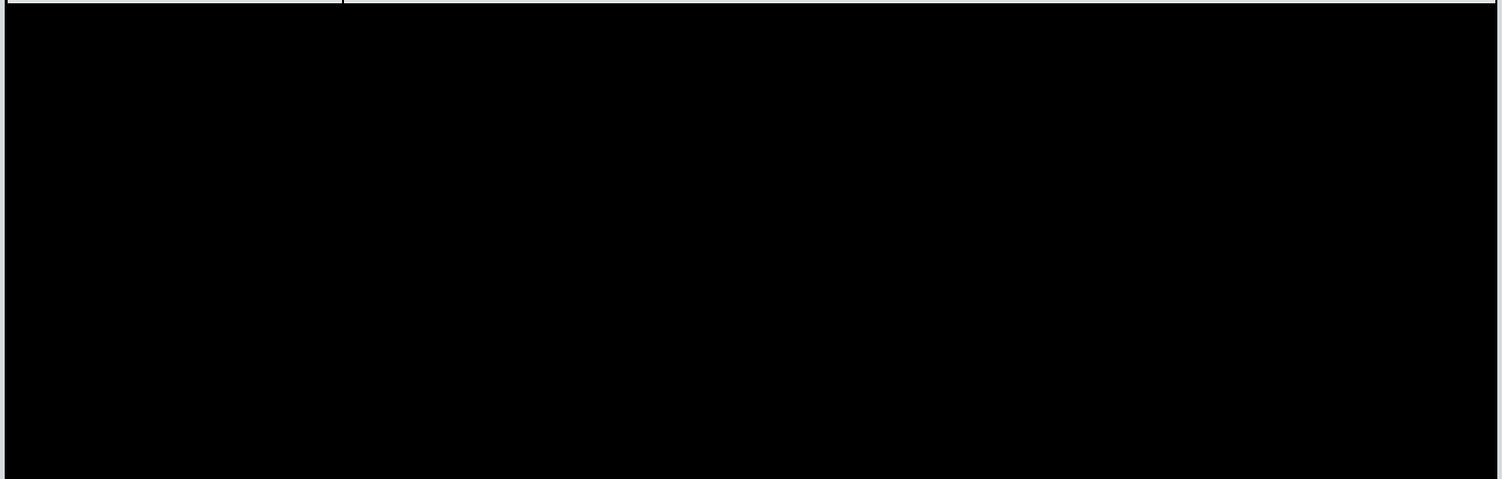

> Human Connections

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 421(11/7/03 9:12 am)Reply |  -- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> It's very good for a start, but as Matt Gregory pointed out in one of his posts a while back, it doesn't exactly inflame the male passion very much. Men enjoy the hunt. <hr/> The true man wants two things: danger and play. For that reason he wants woman, as the most dangerous plaything.-Zarathustra |

G Shantz
Registered User
Posts: 422
(11/7/03 9:43 am)
Reply

 --

---

ksolway wrote:

Quote:

---

Many people do not fear death greatly because their present lives are a kind of living death already.

---

It's not the living death of enlightenment you're refering to here, surely. Which people are you talking about?

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 162
(11/7/03 9:58 am)
Reply

 Re: --

---

Quote:

---

KS: Many people do not fear death greatly because their present lives are a kind of living death already.

It's not the living death of enlightenment you're refering to here, surely. Which people are you talking about?

---

No, I'm thinking of the people who live a deadened, insensitised kind of existence, following empty routines, going in circles. People who are unhappy, but lack enough life force to break the cycle.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 389

(11/7/03 9:59 am)

Reply

 Re: --

---

Going back....

...my daughter had recently told me of some behaviors from the guys that puzzled or frustrated her, as far as getting to know them. She said of one, "He's such an idiot - he's so smart and yet I can never get him to discuss anything serious."

For this rather mild remark, she gets called a bitch, and now she is stupid and cruel, which, because I am her mother, I cannot see. Fact is, she is neither.

No. You said she called the guy an idiot to his face. That was after he asked her out. Is that mild? I think that's quite a "bitchy" thing to do!

Voce, you are overreacting to an extreme degree - who is not a philosopher? You are also unjust, as you have two very different yardsticks for men and women.

I'm not overreacting. I don't have different yardsticks for men and women. I don't see where you come off saying that, I've never given you a sign of misogyny. On Nemo's forum I said that the mental difference between men and women is the subconscious drives they have. Women want to be beautiful, and men want to be strong (a big over-generalization). There was nothing to make you think I use different yardsticks for measuring men and women. Nothing! Certain key words probably created a false concept of me in your mind, and you still hold onto it because I haven't proven you wrong (to yourself).

I am anti-male. Now, the founders of this forum say that males are responsible for building civilization, and its religions, and its laws and institutions, and that males are interested in structure. I agree. But they don't want to admit that there is any downside or any fault that arises from this state of affairs. Some behavioral studies of children's play show that a preference for maintaining strong rules is a male preference. Girls don't care.

I'm not anti-male, but I am anti-civilization, and one of the main problems with it is that it skews the natural balances of relations between people, with a few males in control and the rest suffering, both male and female. In order to maintain control, punitive laws and deadbeat religions tend to be necessary.

|                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                      | Good, I agree.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1020(11/7/03 11:39 am)Reply                                                                                             | Re: -- <hr/> No. You said she called the guy an idiot to his face. That was after he asked her out. Is that mild? I think that's quite a "bitchy" thing to do! Oh, no, I never said that, nor did she do that. She has gone out with him, a few times, and been home to visit his parents. At least your reaction makes more sense now. I don't have different yardsticks for men and women. Regardless of whatever you may have said on Nemo's forum, you ignored the examples I gave right here. |
|  DagneyTRegistered UserPosts: 12(11/7/03 12:33 pm)ReplyezSupporter   | Re: --- <hr/> Where is Nemo's forum??                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|  DagneyTRegistered UserPosts: 13(11/7/03 12:55 pm)ReplyezSupporter | Re: Human Connections <hr/> disregard my question about Nemo's forum--I read the archives and I get it now.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 88(11/10/03 11:38 am)Reply   Edit                                                                                     | Re: --- <hr/> ----- Oh, and hey, what do you think about a woman approaching a man?Would that be alright? ----- Kevin:It's very good for a start, but as Matt Gregory pointed out in one of his posts a while back, it doesn't exactly inflame the male passion very much. Men enjoy the hunt. I am not so sure it's any better. I have been asked out by women many                                                                                                              |

more times than i have asked women out. What i notice most was that they did not spend time getting to know me, after the first interaction or so they would be straight out with it. I would then hold back until i had learnt enough about them to know whether i was interested in them or not, but by that time they had convinced themselves i was not interested and withdrew to tend their wounds.

They needed me to approve of them and show interest in them before they would let any relations develop. I was the other way around, since i knew they were interested in me, i hid any appearance related interest that i had for them to avoid further arousing them until i had got to know them better. I did not want to turn them on in case i was not interested (which was more often than not since i was searching for a mental partner), because i did not want to hurt their feelings, to make them suffer.

I think it reveals the superficiality of their selection process and the importance they place on emotion and appearances.

Whilst i placed no importance on the hunt, and so appreciated their forwardness, i rarely went out with them, often for the above reasons.

Rhett

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 1710

(11/10/03 10:30 pm)

Reply

 ----

---

I think by 'women' rhett you really mean young girls you knew in school, what school have you done? What do you do to get money Rhett?! Are you forced to get money? Or are you inherit-ly rich?

Edited by: suergaz at: 11/12/03 1:02 am

Rhett Hamilton

Registered User

Posts: 93

(11/12/03 11:57 am)

Reply | Edit

 Re: ----

---

I think by 'women' rhett you really mean young girls you knew in school

No. These experiences have been with women from about the age of 18 up to about 28.

Rhett

|                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1717(11/12/03 8:37 pm)Reply                                                                                               |  Re: ---- <hr/> Ok. And how do you make a living?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 96(11/13/03 12:33 pm)Reply   Edit                                                                                  |  Re: ---- <hr/> And how do you make a living? Thinking.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|  HellaneRegistered UserPosts: 4(11/13/03 1:14 pm)ReplyezSupporter |  Re: ---- <hr/> Why is everyone so secretive about their profession?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 183(11/13/03 3:41 pm)Reply                                                                                            |  Re: ---- <hr/> I was wondering the same thing...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 269(11/13/03 3:54 pm)Reply                                                                                                   |  Re: ---- <hr/> Paulie here is 50, worked as a corrector and editor for more than 20 years for the two major literature publishers in The Netherlands, made no money out of that, and I'm dumb. And a mystic. I love you. Oh, and I drink. Not on a regular basis, it's an on-and-off thing. I love you. I want to date! Maybe not.http://www.spiderwebservices.nl/thegoldengirlsquotes |

|                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1265(11/13/03 4:06 pm)Reply           |  Re: ---- <hr/> I am a systems admin in Lab Medicine department of the University of Washington, Seattle. 34 years old, married, daughter 8years old, aries, loves Pina coladas, and walks on the beach with Don Ho.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1724(11/13/03 11:28 pm)Reply              |  Re: ---- <hr/> Rhett, I mean, specifically what money producing activity is it (not just your thinking) that allows you to eat food that is not flowers in a field or some strange kind of a nut that grows in a bush near your pad. I'm a thinker, no-one has time for me, it's understandable, the government benefits I'm on are going to cease soon unless I work for them, If I have to work for money I will blow my brains out! What a threat to society I am!    |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 103(11/14/03 11:21 am)Reply   Edit |  Re: ---- <hr/> I'm a thinker, no-one has time for me, it's understandable, the government benefits I'm on are going to cease soon unless I work for them, If I have to work for money I will blow my brains out! What a threat to society I am! What government is that? Be aware that they may have a multitude of options that they do not tell you about, until perhaps you tell them with sincerity that you will blow your brains out... Rhett |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1733(11/14/03 12:02 pm)Reply              |  ---- <hr/> Are you talking disability pension for mental instability, depression etc? I am not depressive, or unstable mentally, and to let myself be disgnosed as such would be to participate in a disgusting farce. I am Australian.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

Lbartoli

Registered User

Posts: 300

(11/16/03 1:53 pm)

Reply

 women and sex

---

KSolway:

Yes, but when a child wants to sexually satisfy adults, in order to receive a boost to their ego, it is wrong because the child is not sufficiently aware of the consequences of their actions. The same argument can be applied to adult women.

LB: What are these consequences that you speak about? I mean, other than that everyone is pretty much aware of- stds, pregnancy.....
Are you referring to psychological damage?

Most of that is just myth. From a woman's perspective, servicing a man isn't very much removed from changing a diaper. It's just something you do to another person, no big deal.

It is men that make mountains of these mole hills concerning sex. The women, though they may at times pretend to assign great significance to sex, providing it, it's more often than not really no big deal for them.

We often *create* negative consequences by making a federal case out of it and basically persuading one so involved that they have been harmed in some way, the poor unconscious soul.

The phrase "get over it" comes to mind.

So what are these consequences?

KS:

If only one man were to hold-back from vulnerable women, then not much good would come of it, as there are a thousand other men milling around who would snap the woman up in an instant, with her full "consent". But if all men held back, then good things would result.

LB: Well if the wisest and finest among us can't set an example- can't keep his willy out of that warm spot, then why do you bother to mention it at all?

Reality check!

Leo

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

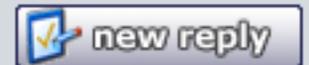

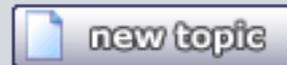

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Human nature - a primitive concept

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| HuzingtonRegistered UserPosts: 10(11/1/03 7:37 am)Reply | Human nature - a primitive concept <hr/> Let us see. . . . Primitive man attributed the movements of bodies to their being possessed by demons. Later, as man developed, "demons" were largely replaced by personified indwelling agents, such as "jubilance" etc. Later these explanations became more sophisticated - for instance, the rock was said to move because it had "impetus". And later the notion of indwelling agents which cause things to move etc was abandoned, for obvious reasons. Yet it still exists in psychology - in the form of "human nature", "attitudes", "personality", "sense of purpose", "will to power", etc. Psychology &amp; philosophy have been so delayed developmentally because, unlike physics and biology, these indwelling agents have not been done away with. Skinner, who is regarded as the most influential psychologist since Freud, said it quite well in his book Beyond Freedom and Dignity (a must-read, in my opinion): |

"Unable to understand how or why the person we see behaves as he does, we attribute his behaviour to a person we cannot see, whose behaviour we cannot explain either, but about whom we are not inclined to ask questions. . . . The function of the inner man is to provide an explanation which will not be explained in turn."

Thus we try to explain behaviour by appealing to the unobservable, by appealing to this invisible thing called "personality" - but do not explain personality.

Just as Christian primitives try to explain the universe by appealing to the God idea - without explaining God Himself- so we try to explain human behaviour by appealing to personality, but do not explain personality. The inner man - that is, personality - serves to explain that which we cannot explain. Like God, the existence of this "inner man" depends on our ignorance. Like God, he disappears as we continue to become less ignorant.

"Inner man initiates, creates, originates, is the centre from which behaviour emanates. He remains divine as he was with the Greeks. . . . He is miraculous. . . ."

Edited by: Huzington at: 11/1/03 8:07 am

Lux
Registered User
Posts: 8
(11/1/03 9:45 am)
Reply

Re: Human nature - a primitive concept

---

the condition of human dreaming most probably predates and generates all of our notions of mind-body splits and demon-other thoughts, that whole world looked upon in sleep that even the sleeping person knows it of a limited nature, and yet awake, such a mystically accessed world "out of our control" assumes for us significant proportions, and therein might lay all the suspicions for a metaphysical world accessed through the "mind" alone.

trying to escape the physical for enlightenment will only give a wide ass mind to sit on and will build pasty, airless, or horny philosophies from there and repeat all the other mistakes of discrediting the body, it is hard to believe a mind-body spilt is still seriously entertained (this is wherein women are superior without it) and that words like "curbing" "taming" "transcending" and the like are still thought to be anything but the admonitions of the timorous and ashamed.

|                                                                                        |                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1658(11/3/03 1:06 am)Reply     | ---- <hr/> Lux is a philosopher. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1659(11/3/03 1:11 am)Reply     | --- <hr/> But he's hiding.       |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 994(11/3/03 2:02 pm)Reply | Re: --- <hr/> Coax him out.      |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > The Thinkers' Inn
- > Humans always LiE!

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| unknownRegistered UserPosts: 56(6/30/04 8:20 am)Reply |  Humans always LiE! <hr/> hi Humans , if it is puk-in time , you will pu-ke. Nothing can stop it. It becomes a human habit. Control the energy. Channelise it. It is easy to talk and babble about everything. The only reason you are doing is that you don't feel good to keep that information in your brain. You like to get more references to that thought. It makes you feel good. If you do not feel good in pu-king , you won't. So go on , do what makes you what you are. Answering my non existing ramble is no good. May be it is a good exercise. All up to individual. You can't do one thing always. You can't ask question all the time. You can't answer all the time. Yet. Quest for ? what drives you ? | what makes you feel alive?

what if you know truth, what you will do next?

why ?

why the need ?

why the need to tell everyone what you want to say?

why not , just close down the shop?

You all are conditioned to babble.

Same thing. Over and over again. In different sequences.

An illusion of "NEW".

There chopra dude babbling LOVE binds all. What a crack pot.

It is not LOVE that really binds humans , It is the FEAR of NOT LOVE is scare the shi-t out of all humans.

Humans always says the opposite of what he feels inside.

Chopra dude is the victim of this conditioning.

Keep on asking question.

Ripple effect will grow. Soon it will find your own natural frequency.

Ripple effect will be permanent. A constant source of energy.

The life of humans depends on how much secret he can hold on to.

If everyone knows everything , what will happen?

what is the need of you ?

No one needs you. Simple.

That is why humans always hold on to his "INFO".

Humans always do double talk.

Humans always try to say in reverse. or Indirect.

Humans afraid to say anything direct.

If humans tell everything what he thinks , then what is the value of his thoughts? If everything Free , then what is the value of you and your beliefs and thoughts.

Humans always try to use his own beliefs and try to control others to and keep them under control.

Jesus did. Every humans uses his own belief system to do it.

The workable formula to control other humans is LOVE. A proven pattern.

Chopra dude is using the same formula for his own Angenda. It is absolutely pathetic attempt.

But if you really think deeper, he is just like anyone of you. A weak human trying to make money out of other humans with his own skill.

All comes to VALUE. What is the value of yourself ? How much money you have? How many people you can make believe in your theory? How many you can control? POWER.

Humans are afraid to be EMPTY. Humans loves to attach himself to something either it is power or wealth.

Until you are ready to ask question , you can't remove the Clouds of this illusion.

Until you have the control to control and balance your energy , you are just slave to same old humans pathetic slave conditioning.

HUMANS always lie. Every minute . Every second.

HUMANS can 't tell what he really thinks.

If he tells what he thinks then he is devaluing his own beliefs and making it Freely available. If his beliefs are worth something , he will keep in as a secret in a LOCK BOX. hahaha.

And use it when necessary.

Understand your behaviour before you try understand LOVE or GOD.

Understand the chemical reactions in your body.

|                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                    | Understand why you feel angry or depressed. It is always comes to one thing , You tell too much of what you think. hahahaha!. peaceunknown                                                                                                                                                               |
| KristjanGRegistered UserPosts: 10(6/30/04 8:22 am)Reply                                                                                 |  Re: Humans always LiE! <hr/> Yeah, most if not all of what people say is probably not necessary.But I figure we should keep talking as long as we enjoy it, even if we are ultimately just talking to ourselves. peece-K |
| james johnathanRegistered UserPosts: 6(6/30/04 9:14 am)Reply                                                                            |  Re: Humans always LiE! <hr/> Babble less - I agree with the message, but it took you an awful lot of words to say it.                                                                                                                     |
| unknownRegistered UserPosts: 57(7/1/04 5:57 am)Reply                                                                                    |  Re: Humans always LiE! <hr/> NEVER AGREE OR DISAGREE.                                                                                                                                                                            |
| admiregeniusPosts: 15(7/22/04 3:49 pm)Reply                                                                                                  |  Re: <hr/> At the end, all of your questions just go to ask doctors, if you can't ask GodIt doesn't need to agree or disagree with them                                                                                             |
| rushdl Registered UserPosts: 65(8/2/04 9:04 am)Reply |  Re: Re: <hr/> I agree.                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

|                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BryanParrishGlobal UserPosts: 37(8/2/04 9:36 am)Reply                                                                                    |  Re: Re: <hr/> What drugs do you take, unknown?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1282(8/3/04 12:15 pm)Reply  |  Re: Re: <hr/> What drugs do you take, Bryan? Just curious. Faizi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| rushdl <input type="checkbox"/>Registered UserPosts: 68(8/4/04 1:25 am)Reply                                                             |  Re: Re: <hr/> But I'll tell you something: I only smoke it in the late evening.Oh, occasionally the early evening, but usually the late evening - or the mid-evening.Just the early evening, midevening and late evening.Occasionally, early afternoon, early midafternoon, or perhaps the late-midafternoon.Oh, sometimes the early-mid-late-early morning. . . .But never at dusk." |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Humans can't be anything other than what he is!.

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                         | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| NONTHOUGHTRegistered UserPosts: 1(5/20/04 4:14 pm)Reply | New Post Humans can't be anything other than what he is!. <hr/> Hi, Humans are monkeys. Yes they act like monkeys when it comes to beliefs. They jump to belief as it suits their current mental state and context. All this forums and mental masturbation may be entertaining to all you human monkeys , the main purpose is kill TIME. What you are going to gain with attachment? You are already emotionally wrapped and conditioned to attachment. You are conditioned to react , words like " you are genius" brings you happiness. Words like " you are an idiot" makes you sad. Why did you let this happen? why why?why did you let human society condition you and rape you every day? You fail to ask questions.Not just asking questions, It is your ability to not to take sides. Never agree or disagree will bring you new perspective to your life. It is easier to take side and live in a goody goody world.It is no use. All you are doing is making yourself raped with a belief. Words are limited . It is already defined. What you are going to achieve | with words? Rational thought is nothing but a thought within walls , within limits.

You should try all possibilities.

No human should listen to others or respect another human.

If he respect another human , he can't respect himself.

He can only change himself , not outside force or junk words.

Ask question to yourself.

peace unknown(unknown@hotmail.com)

Jones Kelly
Posts: 101
(5/20/04 8:52 pm)
Reply

New Post Re: Humans can't be anything other than what he is!.

---

Unknown/Nonthought,

Who considers understanding the All to be mental masturbation is himself completely mentally masturbatory.

Quote:

---

You are conditioned to react , words like " you are genius" brings you happiness. Words like " you are an idiot" makes you sad.

---

Someone afraid of being physically hit will experience physical abuse as frightening as well as painful. It is possible to overcome deluded conditioning.

Suergaz values "genius" as an identity label, so i contrasted it with the word idiot to demonstrate a particular point.

Quote:

---

Why did you let this happen? why why?
why did you let human society condition you and rape you every day?

---

Who who are you talking about?

Quote:

---

You fail to ask questions.
Not just asking questions, It is your ability to not to take sides. Never agree or disagree will bring you new perspective to your life.

---

Since you obviously ask a lot of questions, i assume you've also found a lot of answers. Do you agree with your "new perspective" or is that taking sides/raping yourself with a belief?

Quote:

---

Words are limited . It is already defined. What you are going to achieve with words? Rational thought is nothing but a thought within walls , within limits.

---

Rational thought is limited within walls that are constantly moving.

Quote:

---

You should try all possibilities.
No human should listen to others or respect another human.

---

Which is it? Listen, or not listen?

At least tell me what all possibilities are, otherwise i'll be blindly believing you that i should.

Quote:

---

He can only change himself , not outside force or junk words.

---

|                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                           | So why the post, if you think potential to change must be born from "within"?                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| komodo islandRegistered UserPosts: 5(5/22/04 11:50 am)Reply  | New Post Re: Humans can't be anything other than what he is!. <hr/> I am not therefore I am. I can't be anything other than what I am,nor can I be anything other than what I am not. Shit! |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

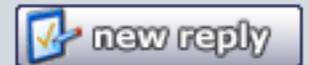

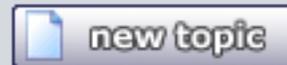

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I am sorry

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 8(10/26/03 9:04 pm)Reply | I am sorry <hr/> I am sorry2003.10.25My articles are deleted in "wisdom" board too, their action correspond to my anticipation, which i described in the article which they deleted, which i want it to be false. I won't spread my ideology in China any more. I lie on the bed in the quit for one hour in the evening, i sense Otto Weininger's commit suicide again, yes, my work have already been done, i have already find the truth, my ideology have already be matured, i only need to do something such as publish it as a book to make it can be find 100 years later, then i can die, as i have nothing to do now, i don't want to wait 100 years with my conscious in my brain, bear their laugh(i really can't bear this!!!), as i know that day will surely come, yes, if you can't make sure of it, you will struggle to alive and wait for that day, and at last it turned to be true, you are confirmed, then you blow off your last breath, died, but if you can make sure of it, just as Otto Weininger, would prefer to commit suicide, needn't wait for it to become true. But, i am lucky, when i think about commit suicide, two people appears in my mind when i review my life, icelotus, my girl, and Tang Hao, my best friend, after so many things happened in these days, i know who treat me best in this world now, i am alive, because their help, i can alive, because their love, i know how valuable their support on me is now, i have paste that article every where, only icelotus didn't delete it, i have acquaint with so many girls, only icelotus write comment when i said i was failed love, only icelotus replay the mail, which i say i may go mad, to me, although her words didn't said love to me, even just opposite, i can sense her love to me, it is her comment, |

her reply mail, make me alive. I find no one in the world understand me now, but Tang Hao come and tell me, he encourage me, you should try to spread your ideology abroad, there may be someone understand you, one day. Thank you, icelotus, Thank you, Tang Hao, my life is saved by you, i am alive for you, i will continue my work.

I have write two kinds of articles, English and Chinese articles, almost all Chinese articles are deleted, because they can read them, and English articles are left there, as they can't read them, so the truth won't disturb them, but my English articles are deleted in smth's philosophy board too, as they can read them. Shit, it may be better to write my articles in German, then they can saved in China.

It is most likely i will go abroad now. I want to stay in China indeed, spread my ideology from SiChuan university to everyone, which i absorbed from foreign, write more and more Chinese articles to explain my ideology, but they just delete my articles, they just ignore it, they just jeer at it, they won't understand it, they won't try to understand it, they said to me:"Don't dazzling here, don't brag here, be calmed, don't paste your articles every where". They announced:"The sea, accept every river", but when a dirty river comes really... I know what it means that i go abroad, i am bringing the Chinese traditional ideology to the western countries, which they desired for so many years but didn't managed to get it, they study Chinese language very hard, but it is still too hard for them to understand Chinese traditional ideology, now i come, they will read every article i write eagerly...I am sorry for it, but it is not my intention, you will only know you are wrong when it turned out to be wrong and things become too late to recover. I love China, I love Chinese, when i write down "The renaissance of Chinese ideology" and paste it on the foreign philosophy forum, i know everyone there is fearing me, "a boy get the ideology from Otto Weininger and Nietzsche and start to spread it in China, merge it with Chinese traditional ideology", i laugh at them:"China will become strongest again soon, i have got your ideology, i will bring it to China, but you can't get Chinese traditional ideology in the other side." Do you know how happy am i then? i decide to devote all my life to China, stay in SiChuan university, i need nothing but only write Chinese articles to explain my ideology, but all the Chinese articles i written down...I love China, most strongly than everyone of you, but, i love truth! i love truth most strongly than anything else. I am sorry. My throat have already begin plain, very plain, i know you don't trust this, but they trust me, everyone of they.

I will buy a German language studying book tomorrow.

I want to paste this article in these boards, but, when i begin, i remember

|                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                        | that, i have accept the request of "wisdom" board master in his warning mail, ok, i won't disturb you. And the "philosophy" board, have blocked my paste article permission at the first day one minute after i paste my articles:"Your sound of truth is too aloud".                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 663(10/26/03 9:40 pm)Reply  | Re: I am sorry <hr/> Don't be sorry, just do it. Why bother with the book? Rid the world of your genius now.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1513(10/27/03 8:25 am)Reply                                                                                         | Say what? <hr/> For my part, I don't even know what this chap is on about..... Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| jimhazRegistered UserPosts: 363(10/27/03 2:01 pm)Reply    | Re: Say what? <hr/> Just another post-weininger schizophrenic with delusions of love grandeur but who, alas, has a 'chink' in his 'amour'. It is amazing what weinerboy can do for young males in love with fundamentalist domination fantasies over women. Unbeknownest to them they think that the equation goes like this 'if we make women weak, then fuck them and teach them our personal wisdom, then we males with an innate right and desire for power will be stronger and more fullfilled'. All fundamentalists are the same - if only bloody Adam didn't allow god that damn spare rib :). The Muslims like their women robed because we all know it is what you can't see that counts. It also keeps the scents in :). "See, the problem is that God gives men a brain and a penis, and only enough blood to run one at a time." --Robin Williams |

Edited by: jimhaz at: 10/27/03 2:33 pm

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 781
(10/27/03 6:42 pm)
Reply

Re: Say what?

---

Quote:

---

"See, the problem is that God gives men a brain and a penis, and only enough blood to run one at a time." --Robin Williams

---

Nice quote.

So the enlightened are far better performers all round because while the blood runs one the spirit can control the other.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I am the god and They are machines

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 51(3/4/04 1:58 pm)Reply | I am the god and They are machines <hr/> I am the god and They are machines2004.2.18 2004.2.15"Can bent and can extend", Jiang Jieshi use this to comfort himself :_) Why Mao Zedong didn't capture Tai Wan when he seems can? Because he can't. This is the acquiescently convention between them, Mao Zedong know that he can capture Tai Wan, but Jiang Jieshi can assassinate him too. There are many these similar things between geniuses. Alexander stood opposite him and asked, "Are you not afraid of me?" "Why, what are you, " said Diogenes, "a good thing or a bad?" Alexander replied, "A good thing" whereupon Diogenes said, "Who, then, is afraid of the good?" Some people see i am creating a religion and talk of Mao Zedong's stupifying policy and feel these things are dangerous, but i know the Chinese government are geniuses and are good people, and i am good too, so i don't be afraid. By the way, about Mao Zedong and Nu Xun, although Mao Zedong advocate Nu Xun, you will know Mao Zedong don't like Nu Xun in fact, as he say if Nu Xun is still alive, he will put Nu Xun into prison if he don't keep silent. Why? Because Mao Zedong know that he is merely make use of the genius killer. It is the god created the devil, oh, but this is inevitable, because he love all. I can't connect my heart to the genius killers, our contact are always only appearance, they have no heart, they can only learn morality by head, so lack the root. And their appearance can obstruction(if a genius) or destroy(if a | talent) our happy heart connection(share good mood), by his indignation and bad mood etc., the corpse won't be affected as he is in his reality. Their problem is not have a opposite soul to their body, but have no soul, so they can't have good mood as have no heart. They look like the opposite sex when young, but have no the opposite soul(character).

Even Napoleon is a criminal, he is a genius, he is affected by the female genius killer, so he regret in his latter life.

Almost all of the male geniuses, especially who have already show his good ability to live in society, will meet some girls that court him on her initiative, but, be aware, she is very likely be a female genius killer, and she is very good at pretending(give you good feeling) and understand your psychology. Why they can understand our psychology? Especially the female genius killer can have this ability very early. May be this is because they tortured by their boring(so read news website to spend most of their time) too long(never have good mood) and understand others at last. Yes, i understand geniuses by heart, they by head.

How to know he never have good mood? He never humming. Yes, the genius killer can't feel happy when alone, they can only be happy when gossiping, arguing etc., we can be happy when gossiping too, but don't always be gossiping and won't be deluded by it. Why male genius killer and female genius killer don't attract to each other? Because he only like speaking, don't like listening, she have no interesting to listen to him, she like teaching his child, he have no interest to be teach and he is not a child. So the female genius killer seek the the normal genius who is a child in heart, the normal genius like her because she make him feel manly by show herself as a baby, although she is not a baby in heart, oh, no, she have no heart, she only have head. The male genius is a child and a superman at the same time, the female genius is a baby and a mother at the same time, so they fit each other very much :_) Then, why genius killer have no heart? Hereditary? Another, what about the people have heart but have no head? Domestic animals. Yes, those people who have heart but no head is just the normal people. I understand now, people who have many beast portion, who have no heart, are criminal in normal case, if they have high intelligence, they become genius killer. The male genius who is a child in heart often married with a beast portion girl who have high intelligence, so their children are weak in heart, the male genius who are superman in head often marry with a beast portion girl who have high intelligence too, so their children are weak in heart too. The male genius who is only a child in heart lack the will, the male genius who is only a superman in head lack the wisdom. The male genius who is both child and superman often marry with a domestic animal portion stupid girl because they don't spend time on find his girl, so their children lack intelligence. These wrong marriages make genius appear occasionally and seems random.

So genius killer is not genius killer in fact, just like you can't share head with normal low intelligence people but can share heart with them, you can't share heart with genius killers, but can share head with them. There have no genius killer, as genius can't be killed spiritually :) So get on well with them like get on well with normal good people, their head can help others to control head, but we need to aware them too, as they may become dangerous as no heart, the normal good people may become dangerous too as they have no head.

So genius is who have both head and heart, head and heart are well balanced, and genius have degree, more and more pure.

The male genius killer read news everyday and can't read long articles because he have no patience, as have no heart. So patience assigned to heart, will assigned to head.

So, in fact, a genius have many similar these things, lack anything will become a fault.

Human seems be domestic animal and beast at the same time, so they eat both grass and meat, but they are not domestic animal and not beast in fact, remove the animal portion on human is the evolution of human.

Heart connecting should never be delusion, if you feel your heart is connected to him/her, his/her heart is connected to you at the same time, and the content is the same. Trust your heart. When heart is out of control, by love, he/she will commit suicide, when heart is killed, by watch series of shows, repeating work, gambling etc., he will become corpse, he can regain the heart by play games, play with the children, communicate to his folks etc., when head is out of control, he will go mad, when head is killed, by limit thought in a small field for too long, he will become high intelligence idiot, and would like only communicate in a small close group. There are two types of corpses, lost heart and lost head, but they can recover easily too, so Weininger said:"The corpse belongs to God and not the Devil".

Weininger is a highest genius(very humanly) as me, he commit suicide because his highest spirit level, the belief of enter into Absolute by devote soul to the nature. And he didn't meet a female genius as me, so his opinion of maternal love get wrong, I find Jiang Qin by the clue that her smile is woodenly which i wrote in "my childhood".

It is very lucky that i met Jiang Qin, although i know this is predestined :)

Weininger think travel is immoral, yes, only travel and don't stay is wrong, but we need to explore the world, so it is better to move to a new place after you understand the present place, move more and more far(from village to city, another province, another country, another planet...), but keep the ability to return home :)

I tell you how to observe photo here, because photo is only a fixed time point, so you can't only trust your first glance, which is only the feeling and delusion. Look at it as a whole, open your heart, then you can see miserable or smile, don't only look at a fixed portion, or you will find every portion is ugly. Look at the eyes, you can see whether he/she is a corpse, genius killer etc. Look at the smile, the stiff smile face, which is out by pretending, will give you a good feel if you glance at it, but look at it for a while, you will find it is stiff and is pretending. The natural laugh face don't look very good by the first glance, but look at it for a while, you will find it is naturally and very beautiful, as it is out from the heart, and can connect to your heart. If a girl always live in her happy reality, she become a sadist as she begin to take happy as granted(because i am beautiful, so boys court me and devote love to me is deserved, i don't love you so i don't give love to you, so she have no compassion, delete your long letters and scold you), her smile will be very sensory and show her happy. Sadist like take photon by a statue. Male genius don't like take photo under a statue because he don't like the statue as a people is bigger than him. The male genius's face seems drowsily when young, although he is not drowsily. The female genius's smile seems woodenly when young, but she will always give you the smile when take photo. You should have these experiences too, that the photo taken when you are smiling, looks have no smile, because you are deluded by your first glance, look at it for a while and you will see the smile. You need to start to train your superman's eyes now. If you often observe people's face and connect the face to their characters and emotion state, you will get the ability of physiognomy at last.

There are two world, the feeling world, the thinking world, the appearance world, the essence world. I just tell you how to distinguish the two, so you can keep sane and live very well in the two world. Genius killer can give you good feeling, but can't give your the heart. The female sadist can give you the feeling you can sex abuse her, but it is she control you in fact, she is the prostitute type girl, but she is a good girl and a genius too, it is only that genius often devote first love to her and can't get back, then make we(for instance, Weininger and i) fall into the abyss.

Telepathy is real, after you two often have heart connection, and communicated the thinking, then, meet the same situation together, your heart connected and you know you two both started thinking, then, after you two both get the result, your eyes meet in a very short glance, and the message is send. But this need tools, by eyes, sounds(not only the words which speak out), text(the meaning is hided, it often give you the meaning by the words is not said out by other ways, so the text become very normal, but this is impossible for the sadist because the sadist doesn't question things about their meaning) etc.

Being a normal people and lead the normal life is so good :)

The best way to develop your thinking is make your thinking base on two geniuses, so avoid each other's weakness and help each other, and choose the thinkers which are foreign to your environment, so you can get new thinking while you have fundamental thinking, try to treat their thinking all are right, but make your opinion always be higher than theirs, and don't lack any clue, open your imagination, think about everything, learn everything.

Maybe i needn't write down my thinking, as the next geniuses(who are more humaner)can get these things too, but my thinking can give them the confidence and solve their problem, so he can make his thinking base on my thinking and develop it more high quickly.

The talent boy like the male genius killer because he can gossip non-stop to him and make his head happy. Yes, feeling and the appearance world is what Weininger called Nothingness, thinking and the essence world is what Weininger called Absolute. So he chose Absolute, as he trust "However, he continually advances in one of these two directions; there is no third". But, there is a third, that both, and he can get both too. Only Nothingness and only Absolute both are extreme, so both are wrong. I give a principle here, always get both, and this will always be feasible by unifying, as utmost truth exists.

I find what i write these days become too many, i need to start arrange my old articles and publish them, or the draft will become too long.

Write the draft and arrange them after your thinking get higher is a good method, so you can summarize the reason which make you get progress.

2004.2.16

When i arrange my old articles, i find my thinking is too consistent, perfect :)

Heart communication is as important as head communication, but people often neglect or refuse the heart communication after grow up, limit the heart communication only in the family members etc.. The genius killer who can only do head communication will easily destroy geniuses' heart communication. Geniuses can easily distinguish themselves from the people who can only do heart communication(the current education system have done this), now you need to start to distinguish yourself from the people who can only do head communication, this is very important, as the genius killer often mixed together with geniuses, and destroy their heart communication.

The current education system is surely neglected to develop geniuses' heart, so geniuses often be lazy, have no confidence, the heart is very easy be hurt and then don't open the heart to others to protect themselves, etc. The college entrance exam can distinguish the children who can't do head communication, but many children who can't do heart communication still entered the university, they destroyed geniuses' heart communication, so geniuses become disappointed with the university, play games everyday. We need to do the second selection after students entered the university for two years, but this selection can't be done by test the head. Then the selected students can enter the genius university, they will learn eagerly there.

Male genius like brag after he meet the girl he like, female genius like saying in opposition of her heart after the boy she like show her that he like her :_) Two good virtues that need to advocate separately :) And male genius and female genius always like play this game :) Male genius, if she refuse you and give you a reason, it is most likely the reason is only created by her temporarily, can you understand why she create this reason? Then you get this hided message and start to smile. Male genius's brag will become true soon, female genius always tell her heart to you, it is only because you didn't use your heart and think at her position to get this message.

How do you know you are a genius? You like mathematics(physics, computer science, biology), as your head is good, but you like literature(art, philosophy) too, as your heart is good. Genius is the people who both head and heart are good.

And, be aware, male genius killer can pretend to be more like science, literature and philosophy than you, he write many short science material articles but never research science as don't want to be a scientist, he put some literature books on his bed but didn't read it, he like philosophy but don't want to be philosopher. The female genius killer court boy in her initiative, let you feel she is very babyly, she will invite geniuses go eating in her home, after she killed a genius. Boy, philosophy must within you in your whole life, in every moment, the time you stop thinking, the time the genius killer cheat you.

Boy, you are 20 now but haven't start your first love? Oh, you need to start now, and, remember, court the most beautiful girl that you have see. Oh, you have no confidence? Who are you? I am a member of genius religion, remember this :) If you have already try your first love but get hurt, OK, you can start to seek your true love now, court a maternal type beautiful and high intelligence girl who is a baby in heart, she have no boyfriend too :)

Every time physics theory get big progress, the basic physics constant will become a unit convert factor, such as  $J=4.18$  joule/calory.  $c=299792458$ m/s was a constant and have no physics meaning in Relativity, after Absolutivity is out, now it become a unit convert factor. In Absolutivity, particles move by a fixed velocity but in different direction, it have no unit, so physics theory can't get a new unifying anymore, as this is the last unifying. Physics is terminated.

Think himself being the god is very easy, tens of years later, every genius will think himself being the god as me, we can build space ship, we can... Aren't we gods? And the female geniuses are the goddesses :_)

Will i be killed as Lincoln? That i offended genius killers. Oh, i don't want to be killed, i love my father, my mother, my younger brother, and, my lover. I want to build a space ship and drive in it. Oh, so, please remember, get on well with genius killers by share head with them, in fact, genius killer should marry with the people who can only do heart communication, then their children will be geniuses too, as head-heart complement. Oh, mistake won't happen on genius for twice, so i needn't worry about this :)

Love heart, respect head.

How to test heart? Ask him to help you cheat in the examination, the genius killer promise you, but he won't help you in the examination, he go back on his promise but won't feel guilty, as he have no heart, and his head tell him that he is right. The genius(or talent boy) will do his best to help you if he promised you, or he will feel guilty. The genius don't cheat on himself in the examination if he attach importance to the examination, but he is very willing to help others to cheat, especially whose heart can connect to him.

True love is both love heart and respect head.

Oh, the future of human is too beautiful, numerous geniuses will born, all the learnings start develop quickly and everything can be understand easily, human can do everything, too perfect.

2004.2.17

Jiang Qing is a genius killer, Mao Zedong lost heart after meet her, and done many wrong things.

You can never hear the genius killer's laugh, as he have no heart, he don't understand the laugh, so he always keep silent when geniuses chat in the bedchamber after went to the bed.

In fact, female genius killer is very good too, she respect the genius, court him on her initiative because she won't feel shy as have no heart, do her best to make the genius happy, even make herself to be always pretending to fit the genius's taste, she invent geniuses go to her home for eating sincerely, oh, things become wrong because she don't understand genius, that genius need another happy, the happy of the heart, which she never know.

Human are consisted by the head communication genius, the heart communication genius, and the genius who can both do heart and head communication, the children who can't do heart communication and head communication is the idiot. So, the head communication genius can get on very well with the heart communication genius, one speak and the head is very happy, one listen and the heart is very happy, the genius who can do both communication get on well in themselves too, only the idiot should don't marry, but we need to take good care of them.

Genius killer will stop pretending and become very happy too, they will understand themselves, that they lack the heart communication ability. The female genius killer often pretend to be a baby for a long time and forget that she was not a baby, but she will willing to become herself again after she find the boy who listen to her and love her indeed. The male genius killer often pretend to be full of love and very moral for a long time and forget that he have no heart in fact, it is only later he studied how to love and be morally by head.

In fact, it is only because we didn't separate geniuses from genius killers, if we can make geniuses get into the genius university, everything will be solved naturally.

Genius of geniuses should only have 0.1% difference from genius, while genius have 0.1% difference from normal people :)

Math become a mess after the invention of 0.

The happy of heart, love. The happy of head, respect. The happy of body, pleasure. The happy of body including the sex, as sex organ is a part of the body, to get the happy of body, you need to train your body, keep your body strong.

The idiot is the people who can only get the happy of body, so we take good care of them, they can get marry to have the sex pleasure, but need to do some operation to make the female idiot can't borne children. But, there are genius that like the idiot very much(mad man, neurastheniac), we can distinguish them from idiots by their face, and i think they can cure each other after live together.

Kant is the absolute head genius, he have no heart, but a perfect head, so he possess pure reason, but he critique himself, by "The critique of pure reason", use reason to critique reason, so he created a perfect philosophy system, his philosophy is a circle too, but is different from my eternal circle. The genius killer type philosophy professors will like his philosophy very much.

Jesus is a absolute heart genius, he have no head, but a perfect heart, so Christianity is build on love, use love to love love is a circle too, but heart get out of control(as have no head) will commit suicide, so Jesus killed himself. The normal people who have heart but no head will like Christianity very much.

Body genius don't write books, they are athletes etc..

Buddha is very similar to me, as his spiritual level is all are empty, mine is all are full, if he can get higher, Buddhism will become the same as genius religion, so Buddhist will join genius religion.

There are many other things created by geniuses, genius religion contained all of them, as this is GENIUS religion.

One thing, you understand these things now, but needn't be exciting, keep leading your everyday life, or extreme happy will become sorrow, now you are leading the peaceful happy life, and forever, as your head started thinking, restarted your heart communication, and your body is kept strong.

Perfect love is, love the heart, respect the head, like the body.

To implement polygamy, prostitution will be allowed too. The reason for girl prostitute(like dancing and decorating very much) is, her heart and head are well balanced, but both are not high enough, so live in her reality because of her low heart and head, and as can sense her low, so she do her best to court others' favor. If a boy's heart and head are well balanced but both low, he will become a good politician, as politician is male prostitute in fact, he will do his best to court others' favor too, such as, add a laugh(breath out some air from the nose in fact) when the genius killer have said something, although those words are not humorous. So Hu Yan is a lovely girl, Wu Chuanghui is a lovely boy.

The genius killer will become a good editor for newspaper, magazine, news website, the corpse become a good worker of a company, the lovely boy become a good military officer, the baby become a good official, the happy boy become a good city resident, the boy study hard become a good professor, the boy play games everyday become a member of genius religion, and i become the hierarch of genius religion :) Too harmonious :)

The new marriage guide will make human's heart and head start to be balance, and the polygamy policy will make human quality keep get higher and higher.

Genius commit suicide because he/she entered into the Absolute, devote soul to the nature, so there have no any sadness when he/she commit suicide. Normal people have heart but no head commit suicide because he/she can't bear the burden of heart, so they need the heaven. Nietzsche went mad because he can sense the eternal circle, but failed to understand it.

When genius known that he will die, he try to solve it by become immortal in the history, after he realized immortality is still vanity, he devote his soul to the cosmos, after he understand the cosmos, he get to know that he never die.

What is Ultimate Reality? Just the reality you lived in, but to see it clearly, distinguish it, understand it, is so winding, although it is so easy.

Genius religion is the only religion that needn't belief, as it is not a religion in fact, we just understand the world.

I walk slowly, look at the world created by me, so miraculously.

The world created us, and let us to create the world.

The little genius will ask you to help him/her to do a thing, he/she admire you and know this hard thing to him/her is very easy to you, he/she will take that you will help he/her for granted, as he/she think if i am you i will do this without question, he/she don't know it is just the very easy thing become a trouble to you as it will cost much time, but you understand him/her and would like to help him/her, as when you are a little child, you think so too. So, we can find little geniuses by this too.

There should be three kinds of universities, the university that receive the children only have heart or head(they live together and help each other), the university that receive talent children, and the genius university.

Geniuses, don't start to lazy, don't waste time, keep doing things efficiently, there are too many things we need to do in our whole life, we need to build a new world, we only just finished the initial theory building, things are nothing more than started, not finished.

Why crime and punishment is one? Genius know this directly, as they know if they do bad things, they will feel guilty, and the guilty will leave in the heart in the whole life, if the people don't feel guilty, he have no heart, have no heart will make you have no good mood etc., so crime and punishment is one can be very easily be understood by geniuses, geniuses understand this, so they are very brave, as they know they didn't do crime, so punishment won't come, even put into fire, even be killed, this is not punishment to them, so they face the death with smile and the heart is really happy, before be killed, they get to know life and death is one, if you let them to choose again, Bruno will choose to be put into fire again, Lincoln will choose to be killed again, as death is alive to them. Open the door is the cause, the door is opened is the result, cause and result is one. There are numerous these things, as the truths come out from utmost truth.

Just like it need 12 years' education to let the stupid people accept he is stupid (although he will still always insist on his stupidity), it need tens of years to let the no-heart people accept that he have no heart(although he still have no heart). If you reveal the stupid people's stupid, he will have bad mood(as have heart), if you reveal the no-heart people's no-heart, he will argue with you and may become indignant(as have head), but will forget it soon as have no heart, he can't imagine(as he have no heart, so have no imagination) that geniuses are doing happy heart communication when they keep silence and make some little sound at intervals by each other, while these quiet scene only make him restless. So, don't trouble them, it is impossible to make stupid people understand his stupidity, it is impossible to make no-heart people understand his no-heart, just like the color-blind people can't see the color which he can't see. But society should find them, let them accept their disability, and help them. The stupid people often have good heart, so can be good worker that do easy things, the no-heart people can learn morality by head, and do things that needn't heart.

Yes, genius killer have no imagination, so they will be the best students (perfect achievement), but they can never discover new things in the learning, as the new discovery will surely make the right answer in the test paper become wrong, so genius always can't past the test.

Idiot have no head and no heart, although he physically have head and heart, i say this to the genius killer who think he is surely have heart.

The genius killers can't read over a long literature book because they can't sense the emotion in the text, so they have no interest in it, emotion doesn't exist to them in their whole life, but they are very fit to do the repeating short head work (typing, check typo), as have no heart so won't feel smothered, and do short things needn't patience, although, computer are replacing them in more and more fields.

Artificial emotion is worth to research as artificial intelligence, this may need the circlematics computer.

The female genius killers were the prostitute ago, they have no heart so won't feel shame, if have half a heart, then like dancing with everyone and show her body.

When the lovely boy are going to do something (such as go to take a bath), he will say out what he is going to do and make others to hear it, so others won't be curious in the heart after him left, as we care him by heart, although we have no any reply to his words, we received this message and become secure for his leave. Genius send these messages too, but not by words, often by little sounds. Genius killer won't send these messages and they can't receive these messages, he don't care for your leaving too as he have no heart. When you study together, and keep silence, each of you make some little sounds at intervals to make others know what you are doing and what your current mood is, you are doing happy heart communication, but the genius killer is very restless in these scenes, he sit there and begin to obstruction your heart communication by the disorder sound which he make out as he is very restless. Genius killer only feel good when gossiping, as he can only get the happy of head. When several of you are trying to do heart communication, the genius killer will continue obstruction you as he is there, then the genius who most good at and most need heart communication will become can't bear this atmosphere, live with a genius killer, then can't do heart communication, this is why you feel the happy in your childhood disappeared.

The genius killer will never go travel alone, it is unbearable to him/her, as he/she have no heart to communicate to the nature. If he/she go travel with others, he/she will keep gossip non-stop. So Kant as the absolute genius killer only leave his town for once in his whole life, he take a walk everyday is only because his head tell him this is good for health, his biological clock is very exact because he have no heart to disturb him, which often make genius lazy for a while in the bed after awake, if his head is not used on gossiping, he will be thinking only by head, pure reason. Genius think and dig his deepest heart at the same time.

Bible only have story in it, as story are kept in heart, Jesus is a absolute heart genius, no head, so there have no reasoning in Bible. Christian should be the opposite of genius killer, so they should get married, and can lead very happy life as i described ago.

If there is a genius killer in the bedchamber that his/her restless often disturb you, "The critique of pure reason" should fit him/her, he/she was always seeking this book restlessly, but whether he will read this book depend on us, now most of you think read philosophy book is not normal, so he won't read, as he always try to be normal. After you know the genius killer only have head, emotion doesn't exist to him, you can get on very well with him now, you may become his best friend if you often do head communication to him, although it is only the friend in head, he will forget you soon after leave you, and have new friends, just like he read news everyday, and forget the news soon. Now you should know no heart is more serious than no head, even more serious than idiot, as just they seems much better than genius, and they destroy geniuses' eagerly learning heart, obstruction geniuses' heart communication. After we understand them, we can easily control them now, the tool have no emotion is too dangerous, we were always think they have more intense emotion than us, as they are indignant by head occasionally, but they forget everything soon in fact.

The genius killer almost forgot all of his childhood, he live and dead, nothing happened, only reasoning, so they are good at collecting and listing things. The genius killer type professor's books are very clear, pure(no emotion, no humor, no likes and dislikes), as all are list. Anyway, their books are good tool books, which collected materials. Their courses are boring, so genius don't go to the classroom, and they like roll call, as their head are good at counting. Their examination ask you recite the materials which list in the book, but genius have no memory on reasoning things(he just understand, so needn't recite), so genius can't past their examinations.

Bible and "The critique of pure reason" is the two pole. Nietzsche, Weininger, Chuang Tsu, Socrates and i are common that story(things, emotion) and reasoning are always intensely mixed.

Try to argue with the genius killer about he have no emotion in front of geniuses, you will find he really have no heart soon, all of his words are only reasoning, never show his heart, even he become indignant, it is only his head tell him that he should throw a book to the ground near your foot now, then after all other geniuses understand that you are playing the tool which have no heart, you can tell him that let us stop arguing, you will find he agree without words and continue read news so naturally, after a argue, if he have heart, his heart should be beating rapidly as you, but nothing happened to him. Don't afraid him, even you make him indignant, he won't revenge (which deluded us as a good virtue, but he is ungrateful too in fact), as revenge need heart, he will become your friend soon after you apologize (by head) to him in front of geniuses. Now you should know these high intelligence but no emotion tools around you are how dangerous now. These tools will become the best killing machine if someone tell them killing is right, they will do their best to kill the abnormal, mad people, who now called geniuses but still regard as abnormal and mad, they will insist that they are right, confess is impossible to them, as only have head. This have already happened in the history, the "Ten years culture revolution" in China. Because human consider head is more important than heart, human have produced so many high intelligence but no emotion machine. Human, start heart communication, then we can distinguish the machine from us soon, these machine have already mixed with geniuses in every field.

How others find the genius killer is really different from us? When arguing, the genius killer say out one sentence and astonished all of us: "Every one in the room all think you are idiot, you can ask each one of them", yes, my roommates say i am idiot as joking, i can know they regard i am a genius in the heart in fact while saying this, as we can communicate this message by heart, but the genius killer have no heart communication ability, then he really find others all think i am idiot. These machines will always remain to be the dangerous factor of human society, if human extinguished suddenly after become most prosperous, it must because of these high intelligence but no emotion machines. The corpse don't know what is happening in the whole progress, he laugh occasionally and treat this as a normal part of his reality, the lovely boy know what is happening, but still can't understand that the machine who make his head happy have no heart, others keep silent, they think for a while, then stopped thinking, return to the "reality".

When you say "You have no emotion" to a people in front of several other geniuses, if he have any emotion, he will surely won't argue with you but feel ashamed, but the genius killer only have head, he will argue with you, and become indignant by head.

The genius killers find they are different from others, as they can't understand others' happy heart communication, they study how to be a human, study morality by head in their whole life, their study be polite first, then you will find his polite become too polite, that waste time, geniuses needn't be polite in each other as they can do heart communication, then they study to make their voice become hears very good, although they can't sense your voice which full of love, they need another ten years to study how to laugh, but they still can't study to be shy, although they studied to become the most polite, kind, normal, good people, you will find he always need to live with a genius, respect him by head, but your heart still can never connect to him/her, because he/her have no heart. The female genius killer study to become a baby, to fit the genius's taste.

Awake, stupid and cowardly geniuses, you know there are people who have heart but no head, now you get to know there are people who have head but no heart, but you still feel they have emotion and try to use emotion on them, try to use no-emotion to explain their action, you will see the machine clearly!

The female genius killer is the demon, the male genius killer is the devil.

George Orwell find the animal in human, they have heart but no head, then, we find the machine in human now, they have head but no heart. There are many animal type people live in the low society, there are many machine type people live in the high society. The machine is more dangerous. We should use marriage to balance their children. It is lucky male genius killer and female genius killer don't like each other, if they get marriage, then machine will become a new kind of human, opposite to Jew.

Animal farm, machine institution.

2004.2.18

I think intensely last night, as i know whether human will extinguish or not is depended on me, oh, i know all the nuclear weapons on the earth should be managed by these machines, as they have no heart so seems always calm, although the nuclear weapons are controlled by geniuses. We need to melt up all the nuclear weapons slowly and step by step.

Every time the genius get progress on the learning, genius killer will start to imitate by their head, their achievement become perfect, much better than geniuses, but, i think, the new learning, such as Absolutivity, Circlematics, need imagination very much, i think they should can't get high achievement from now on, just like these people have heart but no head.

I find another type of male genius killer, you can feel he is not in your type directly at first, but you will find he is very polite, his voice hears very comfort, he seems very morally, seems try to develop good relation to genius sincerely, so he impression you and make you think it was only your prejudice ago. He court the female genius and will easily success soon, as he won't feel shy even it is his first love. He court female genius for sex, not love. But, after get on for a while, you will surely find that you can't do heart communication to him, even he greet to you sincerely with comfort voice every time you meet, it is only a formality to him.

Another type of female genius killer, her achievements all are very good, don't court boy on her initiative as sexual desire is not strong, male genius will court her, but, will find her have no emotion too, can't do heart communication.

You may find i like break up lovers, yes, the genius often be cheated by a genius killer, this is why genius's children are not geniuses. Can you do heart communication to your lover? Only head communication is not enough, just like only heart communication is not enough. But genius killer cheat you by head, not by heart, as have no heart, so he/she don't know he/she is cheating you, he/she really think he love you, as he/she really don't know the love of heart. The children of a genius and a genius killer are most likely will have half of your heart and a good head as you, so is not very bad, it decide by you :)

Why they killed so many people but have no any trace of regret? Because their head tell them, machine is superior than animal, let's kill these animals.

I think Germany is a genius country :)

Recursion need imagination, so genius killer type programmer should seldom use recursion in their program, and LISP should be very hard for them, although he may say he is going to study LISP. They are good at those hard work which need head but will smother genius's heart, such as crack, as they are machines.

The genius killer is studying laugh today, watch the program which often make others laugh(which he have no interest ago), try to add laugh when he is speaking, after i tell he that he never laugh ago last night, now his laugh is very artificial, but will become most charming soon, as charming as his voice, polite which he have already studied. Try to tell him that you never laugh loudly ago, you never look into my eyes when talk with me, you never look at the camera when take photos, he will start to study these things soon. Even i can't believe that these perfect studying machines exist, in the real world, around you.

Start to use heart communication to distinguish them, genius killers all haven't this ability by born, and can't study this ability as have no imagination.

I go out, look at the shinning sun, and see the beautiful future.

The genius killers are not dangerous at all as normal have-heart-but-no-head people, very very easy to get on with, after you really understand them. Tell them the reason is OK. It is funny, we get on with them for so many years and not until now get to know they are only just have no heart at all.

Test whether you have imagination.

Line. What is the shape if we turn the line ----- 90 degree inside?

Circle. What is the shape if we turn the circle 30 degree inside by the horizontal diameter? Then what about 90 degree?

Square. What is the shape is we turn the square 30 degree inside by the diagonal? Then what about 90 degree?

Notice! Never draw the answers of these easiest questions on the paper, or the have-head-but-no-heart people will recite the answers by head quickly. These things know by everyone who have imagination, can never be known by them if we don't draw to them, as this is the hardest question that they have ever met.

Do this most stupid thing, then you will find the most ridiculous fact, you will find your best student don't know these most simple answer!

Awake, geniuses.

Start your imagining.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 843

(3/4/04 2:32 pm)

Reply

Re: I am the god and They are machines

---

It seems that Chinese patriarchic chauvinism is compatible with Weininger's self-hating mysogony. What a load of worthless crap!

Thomas

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2512

(3/4/04 2:34 pm)

Reply

---

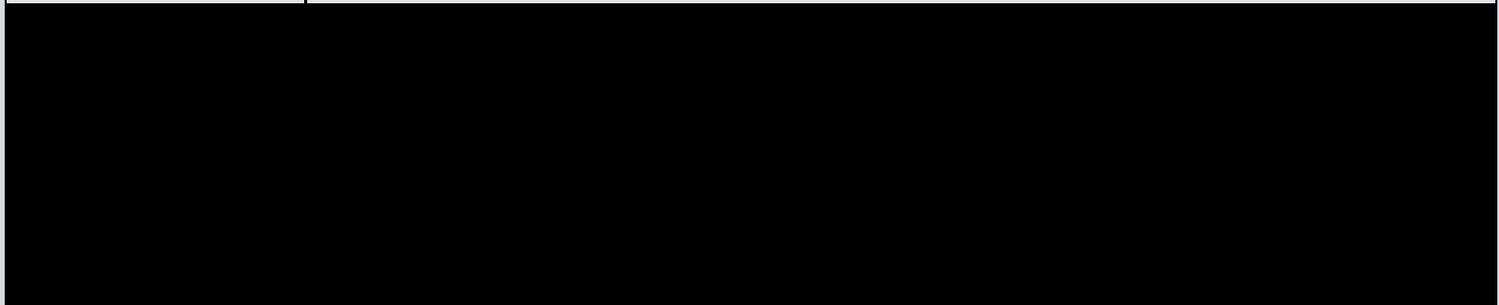

---

Did Jesus really kill himself Hu Zheng?!

And did Nietzsche really go mad from not understanding eternity?!

The news-hungry, their atmosphere has stifled so much!

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2513(3/4/04 2:46 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                  | --- <hr/> You read too impatiently Tom! Hu Zheng is not a misogynist, nor a chauvinist.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| WolfsonJakkPosts: 1501(3/4/04 3:28 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                                  | --- <hr/> Verily, I say unto thee, Huzeng will one day rule the world! You non-geniuses will bow before this mighty wind from the east. Be sure he doesn't see you hold your noses as you bow, because his heart is cold, his teeth are sharp, and his tail is hairless. He answers only to Icelotus. (The fact that she won't speak with him is immaterial.) |
| N0X23 Registered UserPosts: 93(3/5/04 3:55 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Did Jesus really kill himself Hu Zheng?! <hr/> Well he tried, but he could only get that one nail in.                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 52(3/5/04 6:37 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                    | Re: --- <hr/> I mean kill himself in the spiritual way, such as Bruno and Socrates are killed physically by others, but they are killed by themselves in fact, as when they can choose life, but they chose death. Jesus can avoid be killed by others too, but he is indeed want to be killed, to create the religion, to redeem.                                   |

N0X23

Registered User
Posts: 94
(3/6/04 1:39 am)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

I mean kill himself in the spiritual way, such as Bruno and Socrates are killed physically by others, but they are killed by themselves in fact, as when they can choose life, but they chose death. Jesus can avoid be killed by others too, but he is indeed want to be killed, to create the religion, to redeem.

---

...“Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?”– which means, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?”

Matthew 27:46

Which is the opening line to this prayer,

“My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?

Why are you so far from saving me, so far from the words of my groaning?

O my God I cry out by day, but you do not answer, by night, and am not silent.”

Psalm 22:1-2

And when Jesus had cried out again in a loud voice, he gave up his spirit.

Matthew 27:50

These do not strike me as words that would come from a man who “indeed want to be killed”, physically or spiritually.

Which makes me wonder what Siddhartha might have uttered, had he been nailed to the Bodhi tree.

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 799(3/6/04 3:48 am)Reply   | ... <hr/> Jesus didn't want to die. You can read about his prayers in the garden before his capture, and NOX's point. It wasn't as though Jesus was powerless, either. He allowed his death to happen. It's kind of like diving off of a high dive for the first time in your life; all your friends push you up the ladder, you take that last step off and after that it's inevitable. You may even cry out right before hitting water, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?" There's no turning back, though, once you take that step. Watch the new movie "The Passion" and see how Jesus was defiant against the people questioning him. They'd ask him, "Do you really think you're the son of God?" and he would answer by not saying anything at all. He could have just muttered a "No" and gotten out of being crucified. In letting himself die, he showed that he cared for what he spoke of. He'd take it to his own grave. It wasn't about wanting to die, I don't think. I also don't think he died to create Christianity...in fact, I think if he were alive today he wouldn't like Christianity. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2531(3/6/04 11:21 am)Reply | ---- <hr/> I've heard a lot of talk about the 'cryptosuicides' of socrates and jesus, and for a time I thought this was how it must have been, but their 'choosing death' to me really only seems to be their not being permitted to choose 'their' life.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| huzhengRegistered UserPosts: 53(3/6/04 12:16 pm)Reply   | Re: ... <hr/> Jesus should know he is not the son of God, but he didn't mutter a "No", but chose to die, so i think he really want to die, as he know die is necessary and it is the best ending for him. This is telling lie, and tell lie is necessary to create the religion.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2536(3/6/04 12:22 pm)Reply | --- <hr/> I think you're right, but it was still not a suicide as far as I'm concerned, but a murder. His not fighting it doesn't change that.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

XXX STATIC X
Registered User
Posts: 85
(3/9/04 2:12 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

---

Yes, jesus killed himself, for you, sinner. Ghandi, was like master roshi. But I'm not the ones writing the history. The rulers are, thank God for new nations. Wish we could just have heaven fall on us.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

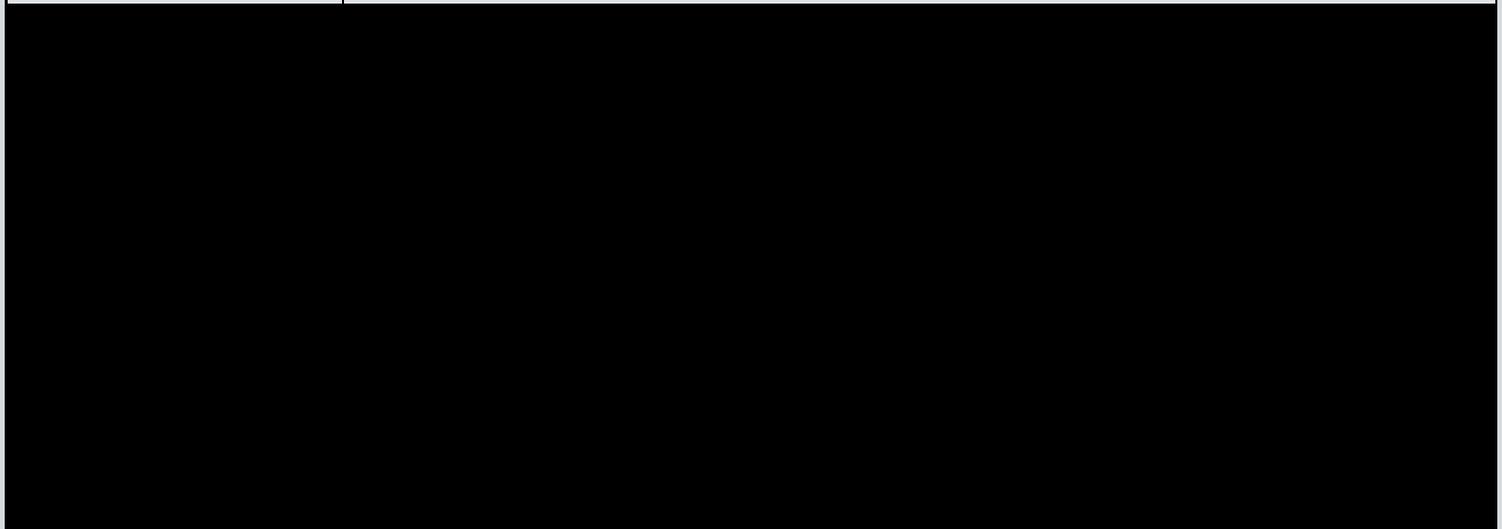

> I dare you...

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 489(12/29/03 4:26 am)Reply         | I dare you...<hr/> I dare you to test my enlightenment.It seems most everyone here doesn't believe me, so I think we should get down to the root of the problem. We should reason at the base of things, instead of relying on feelings telling you that I am not enlightened, or that I am. Try to prove me wrong. |
| GrantForEveryoneRegistered UserPosts: 10(12/29/03 5:44 am)Reply | Re: I dare you...<hr/> Why do you think you are enlightened?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 491

(12/29/03 6:13 am)

Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

All of the teachings have been found to be true, and I have found faults in some of them (the Bodhisattva's teachings, or unenlightened expositions), which I've internally fixed.

I understand the process of enlightenment perfectly, and understand my relationship with reality.

There's no more of this type of knowledge that I could possibly attain. I can learn new things about the world, about form, because that type of knowledge is never ending and always out of reach. The type of knowledge I've gained, though, is about what this world of form is made of. Why and how it works. It's concrete knowledge, and can't change. It's beyond change, as change is form.

I am enlightened through reason alone. There can't be another type of enlightenment! Everything is known through reasoning, no matter what. If someone wants enlightenment to be an experience, then I have that experience. It's an experience of understanding.

If you think I'm merely being egotistical and my ideas are flawed, you should know that I support the views of The Diamond Sutra.

I think I'm enlightened because enlightenment means:

A blessed state in which the individual transcends desire and suffering and attains Nirvana.

I have transcended my desire and suffering, but they haven't disappeared. I am just unaffected by them, because who I thought I was, WAS actually the desire and the suffering.

A philosophical movement of the 18th century that emphasized the use of reason to scrutinize previously accepted doctrines and traditions and that brought about many humanitarian reforms.

I advocate reason to be used against any 'previously accepted doctrines' (as well as that of reasoning itself, and any spiritual text).

Edited by: voce io at: 12/29/03 6:15 am

GrantForEveryone
Registered User
Posts: 12
(12/29/03 6:57 am)
Reply

Re: I dare you...

---

Your expoundings do not feel enlightened to me. It sounds like you have experienced a great change in yourself (perhaps a better understanding of your 4th circuit: guilt, morality, etc.), but are still clinging to your ego (2nd circuit) and rational mind (3rd circuit). But hey, that's just me.

www.deoxy.org/8circuit.htm

edit: specification of 2nd and 3rd circuits

Edited by: GrantForEveryone at: 12/29/03 6:59 am

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 492
(12/29/03 7:13 am)
Reply

Re: I dare you...

---

That's okay that you don't feel I'm enlightened.

My enlightenment is a full-brained experience. I have not lost any of the first four circuits, and I have opened or realized the higher four circuits. They all function at once.

GrantForEveryone
Registered User
Posts: 13
(12/29/03 7:26 am)
Reply

Re: I dare you...

---

Quote:

---

That's okay that you don't feel I'm enlightened.

---

"Okay"? That sounds like a 4th circuit perception.

Quote:

---

My enlightenment is a full-brained experience. I have not lost any of the first four circuits, and I have opened or realized the higher four circuits. They all function at once.

---

I definitely think your first four are operating in a typical fashion (which is NOT typical of enlightenment). As for the other four, your ego sounds very convinced of their operation.

edit: spelling

Edited by: GrantForEveryone at: 12/29/03 7:27 am

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 494

(12/29/03 8:01 am)

Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

"Okay"? That sounds like a 4th circuit perception.

You can individuate and label anything you'd like, but 'a 4th circuit perception' is not real whatsoever.

I definitely think your first four are operating in a typical fashion (which is NOT typical of enlightenment). As for the other four, your ego sounds very convinced of their operation.

My ego is very convinced. I'd like to know why you think the latter four aren't in operation, though. You don't think the first four still function when the latter four are in function?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1965

(12/29/03 3:13 pm)

Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

I dare you to test my enlightenment.

It seems most everyone here doesn't believe me, so I think we should get down to the root of the problem. We should reason at the base of things, instead of relying on feelings telling you that I am not enlightened, or that I am. Try to prove me wrong.

---

You're inconsistent over time and your thinking frequently violates the law of identity (A=A). This results in your thinking being shallow and incoherent and turns you personally into a non-entity.

Basically, you make the mistake confusing the flowy, all-over-the-place consciousness found in very feminine people with the freedom and non-duality of enlightenment. You haven't conquered your ignorance via profound reasoning. Instead, you've cunningly developed a habit of evading it by reducing your consciousness to that of a feminine person. By plunging yourself into extreme changeability and inconsistency you are able to succeed in driving all awareness of your ignorance out of your mind, together with its attendant sufferings. But alas, the ignorance can still be perceived by others.

GrantForEveryone
Registered User
Posts: 14
(12/30/03 4:34 am)
Reply

Re: I dare you...

---

David -

That's very interesting. Is that something that happens to people sometimes, or is that an "on-the-fly" diagnosis?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 496
(12/30/03 9:36 am)
Reply

Re: I dare you...

---

You're inconsistent over time and your thinking frequently violates the law of identity ( $A=A$ ).

My thinking doesn't violate the law of identity. Show me where you think it has.

I do think that my ideas about identity are complex, but they don't defy  $A=A$ .

This results in your thinking being shallow and incoherent and turns you personally into a non-entity.

My thinking penetrates to the core of consciousness, show me where I've been shallow. It's incoherent to people who aren't willing to open up to new thought; if I've been incoherent somewhere, people should ask me what I mean. My personality is just like anyone else's. What makes you think it's a "non-entity" (whatever that is)?

Basically, you make the mistake confusing the flowy, all-over-the-place consciousness found in very feminine people with the freedom and non-duality of enlightenment.

That is a horrible diagnosis. I am friends with very feminine guys and girls, who have this 'flowy' consciousness you talk about, and I am definitely not like them. There's nothing wrong with that type of consciousness, but I know it isn't enlightenment. The stern, concrete type of consciousness is also not enlightenment. Enlightenment allows you to be free from being bound by thinking you are either type.

I tend to function with both types at once, as everyone does. When you think you are being 'firm', subconsciously you are being flowy as hell. When you think you're being flowy, your subconscious is actually being quite stern.

Of course, reasoning eliminates the subconscious, or bring it to the forefront, and honesty prevails.

You haven't conquered your ignorance via profound reasoning.

Give some proof, please. I know I have, but it's kind of hard for me to prove that to someone.

Instead, you've cunningly developed a habit of evading it by reducing your consciousness to that of a feminine person.

Again, where is your evidence? You have never seen me in person, or actually had a conversation with me. The closest we got to a conversation, in words on the internet, was me going against what you believe.

My consciousness can not be reduced, only eliminated. If you mean my consciousness of truth, then it's definitely reduced when I claim Buddhahood, but not eliminated.

By plunging yourself into extreme changeability and inconsistency you are able to succeed in driving all awareness of your ignorance out of your mind, together with its attendant sufferings. But alas, the ignorance can still be perceived by others.

Awareness of ignorance IS my enlightenment! I can't know truth without knowing all of ignorance. I would again like to see your evidence for claiming that I've succeeded in driving all awareness of ignorance out of my mind. How could you know that I did such a thing? I think you are guessing, based off of your current contention that "voce io is wrong, and unenlightened".

Investigate it, publicly, here.

I can't plunge myself into extreme changeability. The truth doesn't ever change; only appearances. I am part of appearances, but I shouldn't even talk to you about identity, as it's obvious you don't get it.

You equate my expositions on identity as me being without center.
Human-hood is my center.

Also: do you truly think ignorance can be perceived by the ignorant?

Is that something that happens to people sometimes, or is that an "on-the-fly" diagnosis?

It's one of David's main beliefs...that weak and flowy people are further from enlightenment than strong and centered people.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 506
(12/30/03 2:27 pm)
Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

QUALIFICATIONS FOR A SPIRITUAL TEACHER OF BASIC PHILOSOPHY

- 1. Proper ethical behaviour - a guru should not harm others but try to help
- 2. Single pointed concentration
- 3. No self-grasping or egoistic thoughts
- 4. Having love and compassion as main motivations to teach
- 5. Realised emptiness, at least have a proper intellectual understanding
- 6. Perseverance in teaching
- 7. Wealth of scriptural knowledge
- 8. More learned and realised than student
- 9. Skilled speaker
- 10. Given up disappointment in the performance of the students

Taken from <http://www.omplace.com/omsites/Buddhism/teacher.html>

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1971
(12/30/03 3:02 pm)
Reply

 Re: I dare you...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: You're inconsistent over time and your thinking frequently violates the law of identity ( $A=A$ ).

VI: My thinking doesn't violate the law of identity. Show me where you think it has.

---

There have been many examples. One that springs to mind is when you claim something as being true, and then immediately deny that you've spoken a truth. Or when you claim to be unattached while also claiming to have attachments.

If Rhett or Wolfsonjakk were to say this sort of thing, then I could perhaps entertain the idea that they are saying something profound, as those sorts of statements are capable of profound interpretation. But from you it just smacks of evasiveness and a desire to shirk responsibility for your own thoughts.

Quote:

---

What makes you think it's a "non-entity" (whatever that is)?

---

Your inconsistency and changeability makes you appear like a non-entity. For example, one minute you claim to be unattached, which you define as never saying "no" to something; and then the next minute, you're proudly claiming your intolerance of something. No doubt you believe this to be the freedom of enlightened wisdom, but in reality it is just mindless inconsistency.

Quote:

---

DQ: Basically, you make the mistake confusing the flowy, all-over-the-place consciousness found in very feminine people with the freedom and non-duality of enlightenment.

VI: That is a horrible diagnosis. I am friends with very feminine guys and girls, who have this 'flowy' consciousness you talk about, and I am definitely not like them. There's nothing wrong with that type of consciousness, but I know it isn't enlightenment. The stern, concrete type of consciousness is also not enlightenment. Enlightenment allows you to be free from being bound by thinking you are either type.

---

That is a classic belief of feminine people. Feminine people always suffer from the delusion that they partake in both masculine and feminine forms of consciousness, when in reality they never ever leave the confines of the feminine. I have never seen you display masculine consciousness, not to any great degree at least, and I doubt that you even know what it means.

Quote:

---

Grant: Is that something that happens to people sometimes, or is that an "on-the-fly" diagnosis?

VI: It's one of David's main beliefs...that weak and flowy people are further from enlightenment than strong and centered people.

---

If you really were enlightened, you would know this to be true.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 509

(12/30/03 3:42 pm)

Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

One that springs to mind is when you claim something as being true, and then immediately deny that you've spoken a truth.

Language is different than an actual thing, it's like a map to describe the thing. So when I say "anything I say isn't true", I'm pointing to something beyond the confines of language. It isn't meant to be paradoxial.

Or when you claim to be unattached while also claiming to have attachments.

I hate to separate myself like this, but there are basically two selves I refer to. One is consciousness. It's still, unchanging, and free from anything. The other is what I appear as, which can change depending on what we are talking about. Personality, the body, what I think of myself..the list goes on.

Consciousness is unattached, and who I appear to be is attached. Of course, when who I appear to be is in a state of absorption, consciousness prevails, and makes who I appear to be more unattached to things.

You are going to tear me apart for that, but it's how things are.

If Rhett or Wolfsonjakk were to say this sort of thing, then I could perhaps entertain the idea that they are saying something profound, as those sorts of statements are capable of profound interpretation. But from you it just smacks of evasiveness and a desire to shirk responsibility for your own thoughts.

Tharan is plausible, but Rhett? Of course, people will only believe in me when they feel ready to believe in me. It's out of my control.

Your inconsistency and changeability makes you appear like a non-entity.

I'm not inconsistent, or changing. I may appear to be those, but that's all entirely up to your interpretation of what I say, and your previous experience.

I've been saying the same basic thing here for quite a while now.

For example, one minute you claim to be unattached, which you define as never saying "no" to something; and then the next minute, you're proudly claiming your intolerance of something.

I believe this is a freedom of enlightened wisdom... ;P

No doubt you believe this to be the freedom of enlightened wisdom, but in reality it is just mindless inconsistency.

Why? I am not mindless in any decision to transcend my own being bound by unattachment. Enlightened wisdom is beyond 'attachment' and 'non-attachment'. Don't you agree?

My actions seem irrational, but I guess it's your choice whether you want to trust how things seem or not.

That is a classic belief of feminine people. Feminine people always suffer from the delusion that they partake in both masculine and feminine forms of consciousness, when in reality they never ever leave the confines of the feminine. I have never seen you display masculine consciousness, not to any great degree at least, and I doubt that you even know what it means.

'Masculine consciousness' is an abstract term for having strong rational boundaries, which create a map for reality. 'Feminine consciousness' is an abstract term for not having a map, or having one and denying it's truth.

I do partake in all forms of consciousness at once; label that unenlightened, but I know myself and that's how everyone actually is (unless there's something different about their brain, like some birth disorder or a labotomy).

If you really were enlightened, you would know this to be true.

I am really enlightened, and it isn't true.

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 307
(12/30/03 10:11 pm)
Reply

 A new sage is with us!

---

His Voice, exclaimed:

"It seems most everyone here doesnt believe me,...

LB: Well I believe you, my friend. But you can't very well expect the unenlightened to understand, now can you? <

"Investigate it, publicly, here.

I can't plunge myself into extreme changeability. The truth doesn't ever change; only appearances. I am part of appearances, but I shouldn't even talk to you [DQ] about identity, as it's obvious you don't get it."

LB: What? Are you claiming to be above even, the great teacher Himself?

Certainly the sage recognize the sage, wouldn't you agree?

Leo

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 510
(12/30/03 10:40 pm)
Reply

 Re: A new sage is with us!

---

The purpose in your believing is that that you will understand.

I am beyond anything.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 442
(12/31/03 1:14 am)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us!

---

To me you seem subject to mood swings. There is also an anger within you towards others, which ultimately means yourself.

Neither of which equate to enlightenment.

John
Registered User
Posts: 34
(12/31/03 2:21 am)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us!

---

Enlightenment does not mean an experience and it is not just understanding, it is the continuous non-doing, non-thinking, non-speaking of any delusion.

John

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 161
(12/31/03 5:23 am)
Reply

...

---

Quote:

---

To me you seem subject to mood swings. There is also an anger within you towards others, which ultimately means yourself.

Neither of which equate to enlightenment.

---

Why can't an enlightened person have mood swings? Or better, why can't an enlightened person be anger, for example? One of you could argue that anger is just a mind object, but then everything would be a mind object. The one that reasons would be a mind object, as well as all rational thought. And we would be nothing... but then would the speech itself cease to exist even as a mind object?

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RairunRegistered UserPosts: 162(12/31/03 5:40 am)Reply   |  ... <hr/> No, I don't think the speech would cease to exist as a mind object, even if there isn't actually anyone who's speaking. As I see it, we are the speech. Be it angry or serene it doesn't matter. They are all real (even if just as mind objects, if you insist). I don't think Scott is enlightened because the difference between him and other people isn't any bigger than the one between any other two people. I guess I could say he's enlightened though, just because he's his own person. It doesn't mean I personally like all of his mood swings or opinions or whatever else he does, but those are just personal judgements of value which don't really matter for anyone else but myself.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 512(12/31/03 11:01 am)Reply |  Re: I dare you... <hr/> To me you seem subject to mood swings. Yeah, I am. There is also an anger within you towards others, which ultimately means yourself. When I meet someone for the first time, I generally have a love for them. When I get to know them more, the love deepens. My only enemy is the actions which a person commit. I don't hate David Quinn, but I will show anger towards some of the things he does; like saying what he does about women, and claiming it to be truth. The only reason I show anger towards that, is because I don't want people to be misinformed. If something is called truth, and is only perception, and some poor person believes it, it spreads lies. I am a fighter for honesty. You can still feel like I hate people, though, as well as myself. That's just what you're feeling. Neither of which equate to enlightenment. It depends on what your definition of enlightenment is. What is yours, personally? |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 513
(12/31/03 11:02 am)
Reply

 Re: A new sage is with us!

---

Enlightenment does not mean an experience and it is not just understanding, it is the continuous non-doing, non-thinking, non-speaking of any delusion.

Then that type of enlightened person is bound by continuous non-doing, non-thinking, and non-speaking of delusion. I play in delusion, and exist as truth.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

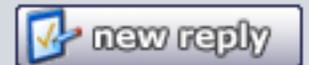

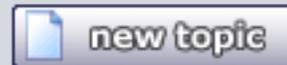

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I dare you...

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                              | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 514(12/31/03 11:07 am)Reply |  Re: ... <hr/> I know you aren't asking me, but I like to throw in my viewpoint... Why can't an enlightened person have mood swings? Or better, why can't an enlightened person be anger, for example? Great questions. People who call themselves 'unenlightened' are creating all of these conceptions for how enlightened people are supposed to be. Do they know for sure if these conceptions are true or not, being unenlightened? Also, it's nice to see you again, Matheus. One of you could argue that anger is just a mind object, but then everything would be a mind object. The one that reasons would be a mind object, as well as all rational thought. That's exactly how delusion is. And we would be nothing... but then would the speech itself cease to exist even as a mind object? Well, we would be like everything else, as we are. I don't understand the speech ceasing to exist part, though. With enlightenment everything still exists; perception of everything just changes, though. |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 515
(12/31/03 11:21 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

No, I don't think the speech would cease to exist as a mind object, even if there isn't actually anyone who's speaking.

If a human body is speaking, then there is speech.

As I see it, we are the speech. Be it angry or serene it doesn't matter. They are all real (even if just as mind objects, if you insist).

It depends on what type of an identification you're talking about.

I don't think Scott is enlightened because the difference between him and other people isn't any bigger than the one between any other two people.

Of course not. Everyone is enlightened, but they don't recognize it. What makes me say that I'm 'enlightened' is that I do recognize it.

I guess I could say he's enlightened though, just because he's his own person. It doesn't mean I personally like all of his mood swings or opinions or whatever else he does, but those are just personal judgements of value which don't really matter for anyone else but myself.

That's cool. I like you, though.

The reason I'm claiming enlightenment is to teach the few people that actually end up believing me that enlightenment isn't true. It's part of the delusion. In the delusion, it's real; but to an enlightened person that doesn't really mean much of anything.

Naturyl
Registered User
Posts: 14
(12/31/03 1:05 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

The first clue that one may not be enlightened is that they have written anything at all in this thread. I am well aware that this probably disqualifies me as well, but since I don't care whether I am enlightened or not, I am unconcerned. Words are a satisfying and necessary folly for those approaching the Tao, though they can never carry one across the final gulf of understanding. We all know the old aphorism - he who knows, does not tell, and he who tells, does not know. I may not know what enlightenment is, but I am beginning to understand what it isn't - and this is a stage at which words are still a useful indulgence. Like the yogi, we must always be prepared to say, "no, it isn't that; no, it also isn't that; and no, it isn't that either."

The second clue that one may not be enlightened is any proclamation that the truth is accessible via reason, words, or any such devices. If only it were so simple! Logic and reason, though devalued in today's society, are really remarkably simple tools. If enlightenment were based only on these, it would hardly seem elusive at all. The method of attaining enlightenment would have been discerned ages ago and systematized for the benefit of all. The truth, of course, is that any system of enlightenment can only serve to distance one from it. A true Buddhist must throw away Buddhism. The Zen master is advised that upon meeting the Buddha, he is to kill him. The Chinese sage writes a book of ultimate wisdom and hurls it into the sea. The Tao is not to be found by searching for it with concepts, systems, and philosophies. Trying to reason one's way to enlightenment is like trying to grasp a fistful of water. At best, reason and intellectual exercise can serve to bring us to a point of irreconcilable paradox through which the intuitive truth might emerge. Although instructors and guides can be useful in bringing us to this final precipice, those who maintain that the point of paradox can be transcended through intellectual effort are nothing but religionists and false teachers. The ultimate form is formlessness, emptiness is empty, nothingness is and is not not nothingness because it is not a thing, "not this, not that, not both, not neither," and similar Zen-like insights illustrate the futility of intellectual struggling. These concepts are immune to assault by reason and must be entered through the gate of direct experience. This last step must be taken alone, without even the comfort of reason and logic, though they be our faithful friends who may have brought us to the very gate.

Finally, the third clue that one may not be enlightened is the desire to become so. A sword does not cut itself, nor does one eliminate desire by desiring to eliminate it. The Tao cannot be pursued, it is like chasing one's own tail, the pastime of a small puppy. Those who wish to show themselves enlightened can never accomplish anything but the opposite. It is like trying to reach the clouds by digging a hole. This is unpleasant only to those who, in their attachment to ego, have stopped saying "no, it isn't that" and imagined themselves to have reached completion. To the rest of us, it is nothing but a relief, as it shows that there was never anything to chase in the first place, and that completion is as empty as incompleteness, and therefore indistinguishable.

These are just a few comments from a fellow wayfarer, and they may be taken as seriously or as lightly as one likes.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 516

(12/31/03 1:58 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Naturyl, I agree with everything you've said, except I have to comment on this:

At best, reason and intellectual exercise can serve to bring us to a point of irreconcilable paradox through which the intuitive truth might emerge.

The intuitive truth is confirmed through reason, which is why I say "reason is ultimate" and I say "enlightenment is through reasoning alone".

Although instructors and guides can be useful in bringing us to this final precipice, those who maintain that the point of paradox can be transcended through intellectual effort are nothing but religionists and false teachers.

I agree with that. I like the koan: a fire can't extinguish itself. Now, let's also say that "water" is a metaphor for a teacher, and that "wind" is a metaphor for something out of the seeker's control (like 'letting go'). Water can put out a fire, and wind can eventually blow out a fire (if it's a hard enough blow).

So enlightenment can be reached without a teacher, but at the point of paradox, 'the enlightened intuition' or whatever it is, I don't know what to call it, must kick in. Then reason justifies that, and full enlightenment is attained.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1975

(12/31/03 2:23 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

---

The ultimate form is formlessness, emptiness is empty, nothingness is and is not not nothingness because it is not a thing, "not this, not that, not both, not neither," and similar Zen-like insights illustrate the futility of intellectual struggling. These concepts are immune to assault by reason and must be entered through the gate of direct experience. This last step must be taken alone, without even the comfort of reason and logic, though they be our faithful friends who may have brought us to the very gate.

---

That is a good way of putting it, except that I would lay stress on the fact that reason and logic are the only means by which one can arrive at the gate. There is no other way to reach the gate other than through the path of reason. This is why I constantly speak against those who encourage people to give up their intellectualizing prematurely, which is nearly everyone.

Quote:

---

Finally, the third clue that one may not be enlightened is the desire to become so. A sword does not cut itself, nor does one eliminate desire by desiring to eliminate it.

---

Yet how can one become enlightened without desiring it? If you want to observe someone who has abandoned his desire for enlightenment, then you need look no further than the millions of mindless, spiritually dead people all around us.

Quote:

---

The Tao cannot be pursued, it is like chasing one's own tail, the pastime of a small puppy. Those who wish to show themselves enlightened can never accomplish anything but the opposite.

---

You're mixing together two separate issues - that of seeking enlightenment and that of showing off one's enlightenment. I'm not sure why are you doing this. The first one is a legitimate spiritual activity, while the latter is usually nothing more than insecurity and vanity.

Also, while you're correct in saying that the Tao ultimately cannot be pursued, it's really an advanced teaching for advanced students who have already spent many years pursuing the Tao. In other words, it has a deep meaning which is only revealed to those who already have a profound understanding of Reality. Because of this, Natyryl, I think you're being unwise in articulating this kind of teaching on a public forum which is mostly made up of people who are barely interested in enlightenment to begin with and who clearly lack profundity in their thought-processes.

Part of being a good spiritual teacher is knowing which teachings are appropriate in the circumstances and which aren't. The teaching that "the Tao cannot be pursued" is no more ultimately true than is the teaching that "one should pursue the Tao at all costs". However, both can be powerful teachings for those who are on different stages of the path. And both can mislead horribly if given indiscriminately to the wrong kind of people.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1976

(12/31/03 2:57 pm)

Reply

Re: I dare you...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: One that springs to mind is when you claim something as being true, and then immediately deny that you've spoken a truth.

VI: Language is different than an actual thing, it's like a map to describe the thing. So when I say "anything I say isn't true", I'm pointing to something beyond the confines of language.

---

How can your words be pointing correctly if everything you say is false? Even now you're still mangling the law of identity with your self-contradictory statements.

The rest of your post continues on in the same vein and I'm not inclined to deal with it. The core reason why your claim for enlightenment is invalid is because you don't display the characteristics of a sage. Simply having the gift of the gab and producing a few nifty thoughts about Reality isn't enough.

Others have remarked on your anger and moodiness. There is nothing of the deep tranquility and clarity of insight that one would expect of someone who has drank deeply from the well of wisdom. Instead we see a lot of bitterness and volatility. I also don't sense in you any evidence of a long-lasting commitment to wisdom. You give the impression that you will suddenly abandon all this enlightenment talk in a couple of week's time and go off and do something else - become a businessman or whatever. In other words, you haven't planted any deep spiritual roots. You don't display any real love of Truth. It is all just a game to you at the moment.

Moreover, you don't seem to have any idea of how to discriminate properly when it comes to spiritual issues. You don't isolate and stand up for the sorts of human characteristics and qualities that are essential for spiritual success. Indeed, more often than not your words and actions only serve to increase the already-huge reservoirs of mindlessness and aimlessness which saturate this forum and the world generally. There is no real purpose to your actions, no focus, no intelligent discrimination. You just seem to flit from one thing to the next without any rhyme or reason, powered along by unresolved issues which seem to gnaw at you constantly. This is why I say your consciousness is mainly of the flowey, all-over-the-place, feminine kind.

To sum up, I think you're quite a bright bloke with a lot of passion and perfectly capable of entertaining interesting thoughts, but you need to spend a few years developing all parts of your mind and character so that they begin to align themselves with an enlightened vision of reality. Only then, will you be in a position to make a legitimate claim for enlightenment.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 443

(12/31/03 3:41 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

Voce It depends on what your definition of enlightenment is. What is yours, personally?

Don't really know. I can't define something I'm not.

To hazard a guess I'd say it is a cleansed brain, one not constrained by the emotional influences of other humans. Such a brain will still have its own emotions, down and up days but those emotions will only be caused by natural cycles of the body, rather than the pointless, self-perpetuating and confused emotions caused by countless interactions with other people's emotions. Semi-enlightened folk recognise this and refrain from drugs and imbibe food that limits the body's swings.

'Reason' is just another word for the process of cause and effect. The only way to commence emotion-washing oneself is to think in terms of cause and effect about everything and to not engage in activities that steer the mind to emotions related to relationships with others - sex, money, drugs.

By removal of these distractions which take up most of our CPU time, the brain becomes able to concentrate on what is real. You become spiritually enlightened when this becomes your everyday nature. One becomes one with nature itself, rather than one amongst a bunch of humans.

Emotion is just the cause of why we process information a certain way at any one time. There are two forms of emotion, firstly the spiritual variety which relate to being alive and secondly the human variety ie anger, envy, love and so on, which are learnt behaviours from other humans and/or extensions of natural animal emotions beyond that of other animals as a result of our immense brainpower. Spiritual or natural emotions are things like the feelings coming from the majestic beauty of nature itself, the joy of using the logic part of the brain, and physical things like eating, swimming ,running, jumping, touching and rooting. In particular we enjoy rooting so much we'll do anything to get it, even forgoing the joy of nature itself. It is strange that our desire to root has left us with decreased opportunities for touching, such a pity it didn't turn out the other way around.

Until recently I have been thinking that removal of the human created emotions would leave one less than human, robot-like, but I am reconsidering this perspective (not that I'll do anything about it myself). Life itself is one big emotion, but we don't feel it properly as we have developed a myriad of emotions relating to the interaction with others. Our sense of life has been mongrelised too much. However by removing these interrelationship emotions, that due to their complexity in the present world NOBODY really understands well enough to be totally in control of them all, we are left with the pure emotion of the self, of life. When you have the pureness of oneself you find a significant degree of contentment in just this and do not strongly desire other emotions, apart from a desire to help others achieve this feeling.

Greed is the strongest natural emotion of all. It is what drives the will to live, to survive. All living things possess it, though in humans it is mostly out-of-control. In humans greed is also fuelled by human-created emotions, and emotions now feed fuel back into our natural greed for control of the environment, hence we have technology increasing at fibbonacci rates. Learning how to control and redirect greed is required to become spiritually enlightened. You cannot remove greed as such, as it is essential to life, but you can channel it into different activities. The QRS have restricted this greed to a greed for truth. Truth becomes the controlling factor and greed becomes manageable.

Touching and sex are natural to us. The problem with the QRS is that even though their emotions have been cleansed they have not chosen to selectively and carefully reenter and control these natural emotions from the cleansed adult state. I'll regard them as fully enlightened both spiritually and 'humanly' when they are able to do so. I'm not sure this is possible and therefore remain wary of their form of enlightenment as the end result.

As you can see from inconsistencies in the above I'm still confused about the whole concept.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 517

(12/31/03 3:55 pm)

Reply

☐ Re: I dare you...

---

How can your words be pointing correctly if everything you say is false? Even now you're still mangling the law of identity with your self-contradictory statements.

I claim that I'm not mangling that law, and I'm not actually being self-contradictory; that's it's merely a misperception on your part.

The rest of your post continues on in the same vein and I'm not inclined to deal with it. The core reason why your claim for enlightenment is invalid is because you don't display the characteristics of a sage. Simply having the gift of the gab and producing a few nifty thoughts about Reality isn't enough.

I don't display characteristics; alright. That can be your viewpoint, but I don't agree that it constitutes a state of delusion.

Others have remarked on your anger and moodiness. There is nothing of the deep tranquility and clarity of insight that one would expect of someone who has drunk deeply from the well of wisdom.

There is clarity of insight, but I choose not to flaunt any deep tranquility, as that is confused with the opposite of 'anger'. It's just my style of teaching.

I also don't sense in you any evidence of a long-lasting commitment to wisdom.

You and your senses are in good working order. Wisdom is just as important as anything else; I don't think of it as greater than anything else in the transient realm.

You give the impression that you will suddenly abandon all this enlightenment talk in a couple of week's time and go off and do something else - become a businessman or whatever. In other words, you haven't planted any deep spiritual roots. You don't display any real love of Truth. It is all just a game to you at the moment.

You are asking me to become attached to things such as 'Truth' and spirituality. Don't you see the flaws in your own logic? If I go off and become a businessman, that's okay. All of this enlightenment talk IS a game.

Moreover, you don't seem to have any idea of how to discriminate properly when it comes to spiritual issues. You don't isolate and stand up for the sorts of human characteristics and qualities that are essential for spiritual success.

I see where you're coming from with your ideas, but I don't think we should discriminate between those little things. They aren't real.

I just teach differently than you. You don't think I'm enlightened because of the way I teach, and I don't think you're enlightened because of the way you teach.

Indeed, more often than not your words and actions only serve to increase the already-huge reservoirs of mindlessness and aimlessness which saturate this forum and the world generally. There is no real purpose to your actions, no focus, no intelligent discrimination. You just seem to flit from one thing to the next without any rhyme or reason, powered along by unresolved issues which seem to gnaw at you constantly. This is why I say your consciousness of mainly of the flowey, all-over-the-place, feminine kind.

There are no unresolved issues that cause my actions. I've resolved all of my issues, and choose to act as a human in the world...taking on human problems. There's no need for me to be involved in a relationship, but I am. There's no need for me to go to school, but I choose to. Timothy Leary said it best on his deathbed: "Why? Why not?"

You look at the world in terms of 'mindless' and 'mindful'. These terms are only necessary for beginners on the path to enlightenment. They can be viewed as prerequisites, but I think they are completely unnecessary to focus on. If you are actually enlightened, then your cause will bring people closer to understanding.

My rhyme and reason for saying or doing anything is for love. You want me to form myself into a center for this universe, as you have done with 'masculinity' and that type of living. The universe has no center, so I just don't create one.

To sum up, I think you're quite a bright bloke with a lot of passion and perfectly capable of entertaining interesting thoughts

Thank you.

, but you need to spend a few years developing all parts of your mind and character so that they begin to align themselves with an enlightened vision of reality. Only then, will you be in a position to make a legitimate claim for enlightenment.

I agree that I need to work on my mind and character, but not for the purpose of enlightenment. I've attained. There's no way I can doubt this, because it's beyond 'belief' and 'doubt'.

You may also be right about working on my mind and character for the purpose of teaching. I held back since the summer, because I wasn't ready. I've recently realized many things, though, about the "gate". As I live on, I'll have more little realizations about the path to enlightenment, and progressively become a better teacher.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 518

(12/31/03 4:13 pm)

Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

jimhaz, thanks for your reply. I'll just dissect it and add my views. I don't mean to offend you, if this does...

Don't really know. I can't define something I'm not.

Enlightenment is about knowing yourself, not about knowing some enlightened self.

To hazard a guess I'd say it is a cleansed brain, one not constrained by the emotional influences of other humans. Such a brain will still have it's own emotions, down and up days but those emotions will only be caused by natural cycles of the body, rather than the pointless, self-perpetuating and confused emotions caused by countless interactions with other peoples emotions. Semi-enlightened folk recognise this and refrain from drugs and imbibe food that limits the bodies swings.

Semi-enlightened people are just as worse off as the un-enlightened. Drugs and poor food choices are just the same as anything else, and they don't hinder enlightenment. A cleansed brain is a good ideal, but then anyone who is brainwashed, or with a lobotomy is "enlightened". It isn't merely about escaping emotions.

'Reason' is just another word for the process of cause and effect. The only way to commence emotion-washing oneself is to think in terms of cause and effect about everything and to not engage in activities that steer the mind to emotions related to relationships with others - sex, money, drugs.

I can agree with that, however, being emotion-washed and thinking of cause and effect doesn't constitute enlightenment. Those things merely make you emotion-washed, and thinking of cause and effect.

By removal of these distractions which take up most of our CPU time, the brain becomes able to concentrate on what is real. You become spiritually enlightened when this becomes your everyday nature. One becomes one with nature itself, rather than one amongst a bunch of humans.

You don't become one with nature, you realize you have been one with nature. Also, 'distractions' aren't really distracting you. It's useless to hate certain things, as all things are one. Of course, some things lead people to understanding reality, and those can be considered good, but when reality is understood, 'good' and 'bad' just seems entirely useless.

Emotion is just the cause of why we process information a certain way at any one time. There are two forms of emotion, firstly the spiritual variety which relate to being alive and secondly the human variety ie anger, envy, love and so on, which are learnt behaviours from other humans and/or extensions of natural animal emotions beyond that of other animals as a result of our immense brainpower. Spiritual or natural emotions are things like the feelings coming from the majestic beauty of nature itself, the joy of using the logic part of the brain, and physical things like eating, swimming, running, jumping, touching and rooting. In particular we enjoy rooting so much we'll do anything to get it, even forgoing the joy of nature itself. It is strange that our desire to root has left us with decreased opportunities for touching, such a pity it didn't turn out the other way around.

Well, you can discriminate and create different categories like that. Things aren't actually that way, though. You are making it up.

Until recently I have been thinking that removal of the human created emotions would leave one less than human, robot-like, but I am reconsidering this perspective (not that I'll do anything about it myself). Life itself is one big emotion, but we don't feel it properly as we have developed a myriad of emotions relating to the interaction with others. Our sense of life has been mongrelised too much. However by removing these interrelationship emotions, that due to their complexity in the present world NOBODY really understands well enough to be totally in control of them all, we are left with the pure emotion of the self, of life. When you have the pureness of oneself you find a significant degree of contentment in just this and do not strongly desire other emotions, apart from a desire to help others achieve this feeling.

I think that feeling of 'life' or 'self' is the same as the type of enlightenment you are looking for. The serene state. If that's what you want, then just focus on yourself, and nothing else.

Greed is the strongest natural emotion of all. It is what drives the will to live, to survive. All living things possess it, though in humans it is mostly out-of-control. In humans greed is also fuelled by human-created emotions, and emotions now feed fuel back into our natural greed for control of the environment, hence we have technology increasing at fibbonacci rates. Learning how to control and redirect greed is required to become spiritually enlightened. You cannot remove greed as such, as it is essential to life, but you can channel it into different activities. The QRS have restricted this greed to a greed for truth. Truth becomes the controlling factor and greed becomes manageable.

I agree with this, except for: 'learning how to control and redirect greed is required to become spiritually enlightened'. Why can't enlightened people be greedy?

Touching and sex are natural to us. The problem with the QRS is that even though their emotions have been cleansed they have not chosen to selectively and carefully reenter and control these natural emotions from the cleansed adult state. I'll regard them as fully enlightened both spiritually and 'humanly' when they are able to do so. I'm not sure this is possible and therefore remain wary of their form of enlightenment as the end result.

Why would you reenter and control the natural emotions?

As you can see from inconsistencies in the above I'm still confused about the whole concept.

If you are looking to concepts for enlightenment, then you'll just remain confused. All that you've been talking about is primarily for the path, and not the enlightenment itself. It's all transient, and you can't be too sure about anything transient...so don't worry. Whoever sounds very certain about these types of things, is generally going to be easily proven wrong.

John
Registered User
Posts: 35
(12/31/03 6:18 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us!

---

voce io:
-----

Enlightenment does not mean an experience and it is not just understanding, it is the continuous non-doing, non-thinking, non-speaking of any delusion.

Then that type of enlightened person is bound by continuous non-doing, non-thinking, and non-speaking of delusion. I play in delusion, and exist as truth.

NO! One is not bound by being free. Cease from this clever self deception.

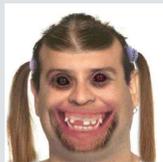

It is delusion that binds and 'playing in delusion' means you have not left that realm. You need years of discipline to mature and conform yourself to Buddha-mind.

We all exist as truth as there is no other option but real-ising the Buddha nature is not such an easy task. What lies in front of you is much hard work and sacrifice if you are to become really enlightened.

Let me know how you get on with "The Blue Cliff Record" & the "Book of Serenity".

John

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 445
(12/31/03 7:47 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us!

---

I don't mean to offend you, if this does...

When I first came to the forum a couple of years ago I was offended by what was written here. My first post was a tirade of disgust at Dan and David (I think it was deleted). I rarely find offence in anything here now. On the other hand I'm a bit disappointed that you feel so superior that you feel the need to apologise upfront.

Nowadays I'm only offended by the selfishness of people I interact with in day-to-day life, albeit that I'm a bigot to do so.

Enlightenment is about knowing yourself, not about knowing some enlightened self.

To me it is about knowing what you want from it.

Semi-enlightened people are just as worse off as the un-enlightened. Drugs and poor food choices are just the same as anything else, and they don't hinder enlightenment. A cleansed brain is a good ideal, but then anyone who is brainwashed, or with a lobotomy is "enlightened". It isn't merely about escaping emotions.

Sorry I don't agree with any of that. Children, the brainwashed or lobotomised don't understand cause and effect. I think it is precisely about escaping emotions. In fact all religions are about this very point. The Buddhists try and get people to do this themselves, whereas the other major religions ask people to control their natural emotions by succumbing to a supposed higher reason.

In some cases semi-enlightened people are worse off than the un-enlightened, as many become irrational.

being emotion-washed and thinking of cause and effect doesn't constitute enlightenment. Those things merely make you emotion-washed, and thinking of cause and effect.

True, being emotion washed just sets up an opportunity for enlightenment that is non-existent otherwise.

you realize you have been one with nature. True. You become one with anything by understanding it.

Also, 'distractions' aren't really distracting you. Disagree strongly.

However I would agree if I was inexperienced with human life.

It's useless to hate certain things, as all things are one. 'good' and 'bad' just seems entirely useless Agreed.

Well, you can discriminate and create different categories like that. Things aren't actually that way, though. You are making it up.

And why not. All thought involves creating discriminating and creating categories. I think it is masculine thinking to make assumptions and to be judgemental - it is the only way of creating 'new' truths. Whatever is wrong will be discarded. Nothing you have said leads me to believe what I've said is wrong.

I think that feeling of 'life' or 'self' is the same as the type of enlightenment you are looking for. The serene state. If that's what you want, then just focus on yourself, and nothing else.

Yep. I think I want the Buddhist discipline without all the traditions and religious crap and without being subservient to anyone. Pity that is impossible.

I agree with this, except for: 'learning how to control and redirect greed is required to become spiritually enlightened'. Why can't enlightened people be greedy?

If they are greedy for sex, drugs, respect and material things it automatically means they are still subject to emotions and will compromise wisdom for these things. If they are greedy for knowledge and truth then that is OK as it is not self-destructive. They have less (and more) to be greedy about.

Why would you reenter and control the natural emotions?

It is a physical thing. Human touch is pleasurable. Enlightened folk have not transcended from human to god, but only from uncontrolled human to self-determining human.

Your right though, the QRS don't seem to want it, at least on the outside, but I still do. This is one area where my thought is inconsistent. I still want the benefits of the herd, but I want it to be something people step into or out of at their own choosing. To me touching/sex/intimacy is like food, you can't choose not to eat or you will die but you can choose what to eat and how much.

If you are looking to concepts for enlightenment, then you'll just remain confused. All that you've been talking about is primarily for the path, and not the enlightenment itself.

But that is what I think the actuality of enlightenment is, continually choosing one's life path based on the best possible logic, rather than being totally influenced by others in determining that path.

Edited by: jimhaz at: 12/31/03 7:50 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 520
(12/31/03 10:43 pm)
Reply

 Re: A new sage is with us!

---

jimhaz, if your "cup is full", then don't expect to be getting the "drink of wisdom".

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 854
(12/31/03 11:42 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us?

---

When did you decide you had realised?

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 521
(1/1/04 9:31 am)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us?

---

When did you decide you had realised?

Great question. I decided about a week or two ago ;-)

I decided I was realized when all of the following were seen as untrue: 'I', 'decided', 'was', 'realised', 'when', 'seen' and 'untrue'. I know that sounds like a pretty cocky answer, but it is true.

Enlightenment is like the ultimate stupidity. All you have learned is seen as false. Nothing is false, and everything is true. All concepts about anything are real, but what they are trying to say is not real.

I decided I was realised when my realisation was beyond realization. Enlightenment is just part of the delusion. It's realizing that you are delusional, and that all is one.

This stuff probably doesn't make sense. It's hard for me to talk about it, because my mind is trying to create some sort of idea of it for you, when it's really beyond all ideas. It's just spontaneous existence.

All is me.

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 522(1/1/04 9:38 am)Reply  |  Re: A new sage is with us? <hr/> Also, before claiming enlightenment I was unsure, even though reason told me I was enlightened, absolutely. Doubting or believing doesn't matter, though. They are subject to the sway of...bullshit...and they are bullshit. Knowing you are enlightened isn't about believing you are, at all, it's about reason telling you you are. Reason tells you that you're enlightened when there is no such thing as 'you' or 'enlightenment'. When the universe is seen as not being separate.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 523(1/1/04 10:17 am)Reply |  Re: A new sage is with us? <hr/> jimhaz, I didn't want to give you such a short and cliché answer... When I first came to the forum a couple of years ago I was offended by what was written here. My first post was a tirade of disgust at Dan and David (I think it was deleted). I rarely find offence in anything here now. On the other hand I'm a bit disappointed that you feel so superior that you feel the need to apologise upfront. Then I must apologize for disappointing you. ;-) To me it is about knowing what you want from it. Knowing what you want from enlightenment? If someone were honest enough to admit that...like they wanted to be worshipped, and loved, and seen as important...then would they be enlightened? Or would they just be admitting those things, and being honest? Sorry I don't agree with any of that. Children, the brainwashed or lobotomised don't understand cause and effect. Cause and effect is a philosophical concept. It isn't enlightened truth. In order to have cause and effect, duality has to be present, and enlightenment is the realization of non-duality. I think it is precisely about escaping emotions. In fact all religions are about this very point. The Buddhists try and get people to do this themselves, whereas the other major religions ask people to control their natural emotions by succumbing to a supposed higher reason. All religions are about escaping emotions, but does that make | enlightenment about escaping emotions? It isn't about controlling emotions either, that can just be a byproduct of high reasoning.

True, being emotion washed just sets up an opportunity for enlightenment that is non-existent otherwise.

No, every person with a brain that reflects has an opportunity for enlightenment. I am enlightened, and I have emotions.

You become one with anything by understanding it.

Let's say a person studies auto-mechanics. They learn a lot about how to repair an engine; now, are they one with engine? They're one in their understanding of the engine, but the engine and the person are two different and separate objects.

Disagree strongly. However I would agree if I was inexperienced with human life.

Your mind creates distractions.

And why not. All thought involves creating discriminating and creating categories. I think it is masculine thinking to make assumptions and to be judgemental - it is the only way of creating 'new' truths. Whatever is wrong will be discarded. Nothing you have said leads me to believe what I've said is wrong.

Thought creates an imaginary universe, and yes, masculine consciousness does this. In order to attain enlightenment, though, it must be seen as 'masculine consciousness' and not as the consciousness which is aware of it. When your identification of awareness transcends the imagined, then you have attained. After that, it's just integrating that knowledge into your thought.

Yep. I think I want the Buddhist discipline without all the traditions and religious crap and without being subservient to anyone. Pity that is impossible.

Why's that impossible? Just be disciplined about whatever it is you personally care about.

If they are greedy for sex, drugs, respect and material things it automatically means they are still subject to emotions and will compromise wisdom for these things.

I don't think it absolutely means that. Wisdom is about knowing everything, and if they know, and let themselves be a certain way, they're still enlightened. The type of Buddha everyone is trying to idealize would die within a month. There'd be absolutely no reason to make any sort of attempt to eat, or do anything.

If they are greedy for knowledge and truth then that is OK as it is not self-destructive. They have less (and more) to be greedy about.

Knowledge and truth are the same as drugs. People want them to achieve an end. What other reason is there to want such things?

It is a physical thing. Human touch is pleasurable. Enlightened folk have not transcended from human to god, but only from uncontrolled human to self-determining human.

Actually they have transcended to god. Haven't you read any scriptures? "God-Realization"?

Your right though, the QRS don't seem to want it, at least on the outside, but I still do. This is one area where my thought is inconsistent. I still want the benefits of the herd, but I want it to be something people step into or out of at their own choosing. To me touching/sex/intimacy is like food, you can't choose not to eat or you will die but you can choose what to eat and how much.

It's good you still want it. Don't deny yourself that! Let yourself be yourself. Sexuality shouldn't even be a spiritual subject. It's obvious the universe created us to become enlightened, as we have these brains which reason and reflect. It's also obvious the universe created us to fuck, as we have dicks and vaginas!

There would be no point in teaching truth if there was no more sex, because there'd soon be no humans to teach truth to.

Flaws in reasoning, hm?

But that is what I think the actuality of enlightenment is, continually choosing one's life path based on the best possible logic, rather than being totally influenced by others in determining that path.

Well, that's just the best idea on how to live your life. It isn't enlightenment. It usually comes as a byproduct of enlightenment, I think.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 15

(1/1/04 11:09 am)

Reply

 Re: A new sage is with us?

---

Quote:

---

Also, while you're correct in saying that the Tao ultimately cannot be pursued, it's really an advanced teaching for advanced students who have already spent many years pursuing the Tao. In other words, it has a deep meaning which is only revealed to those who already have a profound understanding of Reality. Because of this, Naturyl, I think you're being unwise in articulating this kind of teaching on a public forum which is mostly made up of people who are barely interested in enlightenment to begin with and who clearly lack profundity in their thought-processes.

---

Hmm... it's an interesting observation. If what you are trying to do here is function as spiritual teachers, you are probably right. Since that isn't what I was trying to do, I saw no harm in talking about the matter in the best way I knew how. Perhaps in doing so I have inadvertantly confused some 'student' on his path. If that is the case, it is perhaps unfortunate, but I'm sure that if anyone here is attempting to provide 'spiritual instruction,' they will be able to straighten the matter out easily enough. :)

One question, however. Why are you trying to teach pupils who "are barely interested in enlightenment to begin with and who clearly lack profundity in their thought-processes?" I'm just curious, the question is not to be construed as an attack.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1979
(1/1/04 1:22 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us?

Naturyl wrote:

Quote:

One question, however. Why are you trying to teach pupils who "are barely interested in enlightenment to begin with and who clearly lack profundity in their thought-processes?"

I always write for the hypothetical lurker who is relatively wise and open-minded and able to perceive good reasoning.

jimhaz
Registered User
Posts: 446
(1/1/04 2:50 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us?

Voce jo

I'm not going to respond to what you've written (I don't like going around in circles, which is what would happen if I responded). Although I agree with some of your comments, I don't others and I still disagree with the overall position you are taking on enlightenment. I think your making the concept into a relative non-event so you can say you've attained something. There is a joy is having convictions, in removing the angst of greyness and making things into black and white concepts. Thats the feeling I think you have, not enlightenment.

I wonder if the effect of prematurely convincing oneself that they are enlightened, means they will never be so.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 524
(1/1/04 7:03 pm)
Reply

Re: A new sage is with us?

But jimhaz, I don't worship little transient things. If there is some 'enlightenment' that I need to attain, then whatever. I'll take it or leave it. What's important to me is the Absolute.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

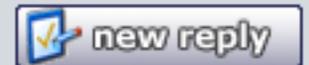

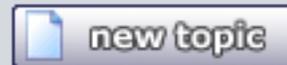

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I dare you...

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 525(1/1/04 7:56 pm)Reply |  Re: A new sage is with us? <hr/> Here is something good:http://www.otoons.com/eso/Enlightenment_test.htm I got a 3 out of 9.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 526(1/2/04 6:13 am)Reply |  ... <hr/> When an enlightened person is still, that's enlightenment, but the moment they move, it becomes, as I said, self-mastery, because the moment you move, you have to act in the world of particulars you have to walk, talk, work, do all these things. Now people who observe your ability to function in this world are going to see you in this heightened state of reality; they're going to see the way you carry yourself and they're going to attribute extraordinary things to you. The point is, though, that in enlightenment you wouldn't necessarily attribute these things to yourself, and that's the main difference. But also, the enlightenment experience doesn't apply to anything in particular, whereas self-mastery can be divided into certain fields. So you could have mastery in many different fields, and yet, even with that mastery, not be enlightened in the true sense. -Vernon Kitabu Turner |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1981

(1/2/04 8:34 am)

Reply

Re: I dare you...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: How can your words be pointing correctly if everything you say is false? Even now you're still mangling the law of identity with your self-contradictory statements.

VI: I claim that I'm not mangling that law, and I'm not actually being self-contradictory; that's it's merely a misperception on your part.

---

Okay, let's focus on this issue since it is an integral part in your world view - namely, that no opinion can express truth.

Imagine you are in a foreign city and you want to visit the museum. You ask a local for directions and he says, "If you go straight down this road for three blocks and then turn left, you will see the museum." You follow his directions to the letter and, lo and behold, you see the museum. The local was speaking the truth.

Similarly, you might ask an enlightened sage how to become aware of the Absolute. He gives you directions and if you follow them and become aware of the Absolute, you can conclude that the sage spoke the truth.

Yet, according to your all-pervasive maxim, neither of these things can happen.

Quote:

---

There are no unresolved issues that cause my actions. I've resolved all of my issues, and choose to act as a human in the world...taking on human problems. There's no need for me to be involved in a relationship, but I am. There's no need for me to go to school, but I choose to.

---

I'd be very careful, if I were you. It's easy for an 18-year-old to say things like this, because at that age one does feel invincible and free. However, if you are not careful, the "choice" to be involved in attachments will gradually be replaced by a need for them. And when this stage is reached, you will come to view the prospect of life without these attachments as a living hell. So while you might think you are a master of your attachments now, it won't be long before you will be a slave to them.

This happens to everyone who neglects to practice the philosophic art of non-attachment. Look around you and observe the middle-aged and elderly. Look at their unhappiness, their dead eyes, their lack of curiosity about the world, the way they sag down under life as though it were a burden, their violent mannerisms and speech - all of this comes from being a slave to your attachments. Take heed!

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 527

(1/2/04 10:32 am)

Reply

 ...

---

Okay, let's focus on this issue since it is an integral part in your world view - namely, that no opinion can express truth.

Imagine you are in a foreign city and you want to visit the museum. You ask a local for directions and he says, "If you go straight down this road for three blocks and then turn left, you will see the museum." You follow his directions to the letter and, lo and behold, you see the museum. The local was speaking the truth.

Similarly, you might ask an enlightened sage how to become aware of the Absolute. He gives you directions and if you follow them and become aware of the Absolute, you can conclude that the sage spoke the truth.

Yet, according to your all-pervasive maxim, neither of these things can happen.

Very good point. Remember that it depends on who you are asking, though. When asking directions to the building, one person might say, "Oh that's easy, go down in the subway, and take it to Central Station, when you walk up to the street you will see the building." Another might say, "Ah yes, go in the alleyway between those two buildings right there, and follow it straight to the building, there's no way you can miss it." Another will say, "Just walk into that building right there and go right, you'll eventually enter it, because they're connected to each other". All I am meaning when I say that opinion isn't true, is that there are many other possibilities. Also, that it doesn't compare to the Absolute. Nonduality is truth, and any form of duality is delusion...I'm also speaking on that level.

When I say the things I do, and they seem paradoxical, it's because they lead to the Absolute, which is not part of this world. So I'm sure some of it may not make sense at first. It may seem to defy the law of identity, but it only seems that way.

When you claim that your path to realization is 'true', and don't admit that it's just one path in a big collection of paths, then you close off the seeker to anything else. You've said that women are inferior, and that you have to face that fact to reach enlightenment (I may be wrong, that's the general idea I've received, though). You're able to do it your way, it's just not how I would like to teach anything. The goal is for the questioner to gain understanding, and I'd go about that in any possible way, so I keep an open mind towards other ways. I see what your path is about, and it isn't 'wrong' in the dualistic sense of the word, but it isn't certain and correct. Also, I think it breeds a lot of negativity when you talk about women the way you do. A lot of what you say is exaggerated to make the points you do, and it becomes untrue. This leads the questioner into further delusion.

Also, I wouldn't say my opinion that 'no opinion can express truth' is all-pervasive, as it kind of defeats itself. The only all-pervasive truth that I know of is that there is existence; everything else can be subject to fallacy.

I'd be very careful, if I were you. It's easy for an 18-year-old to say things like this, because at that age one does feel invincible and free. However, if you are not careful, the "choice" to be involved in attachments will gradually be replaced by a need for them. And when this stage is reached, you will come to view the prospect of life without these attachments as a living hell. So while you might think you are a master of your attachments now, it won't be long before you will be a slave to them.

Life would be hell if I constantly avoided aspects of it. That would definitely show my deep attachment to 'unattachment'.

This happens to everyone who neglects to practice the philosophic art of non-attachment. Look around you and observe the middle-aged and elderly. Look at their unhappiness, their dead eyes, their lack of curiosity about the world, the way they sag down under life as though it were a burden, their violent mannerisms and speech - all of this comes from being a slave to your attachments. Take heed!

I really do appreciate you caring for my well being - thank you. I really don't mind if my eyes become all dead, and I stop having that youthful essence. If I cared, I'd most definitely be attached to wanting to appear good, which would absolutely defeat the purpose of being unattached.

Instead of non-attachment, I'd teach acceptance.

avidaloca
Registered User
Posts: 143
(1/2/04 2:21 pm)
Reply

 Re: I dare you...

---

DavidQuinn000 wrote:

Quote:

---

I'd be very careful, if I were you. It's easy for an 18-year-old to say things like this, because at that age one does feel invincible and free. However, if you are not careful, the "choice" to be involved in attachments will gradually be replaced by a need for them. And when this stage is reached, you will come to view the prospect of life without these attachments as a living hell. So while you might think you are a master of your attachments now, it won't be long before you will be a slave to them.

---

And if your attachment is a woman, and she knows it (and you better believe they know these things) imagine to what extent she can manipulate you.

"Never let yourself get attached to anything that you are not willing to walk out on in 30 seconds flat if you feel the heat around the corner" (Robert De Niro, "HEAT" 1995)

Martin

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 528
(1/2/04 3:30 pm)
Reply

 ...

---

Don't worry, avidaloca, I'm not whipped ;-)

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1984

(1/3/04 4:34 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: Okay, let's focus on this issue since it is an integral part in your world view - namely, that no opinion can express truth.

Imagine you are in a foreign city and you want to visit the museum. You ask a local for directions and he says, "If you go straight down this road for three blocks and then turn left, you will see the museum." You follow his directions to the letter and, lo and behold, you see the museum. The local was speaking the truth.

Similarly, you might ask an enlightened sage how to become aware of the Absolute. He gives you directions and if you follow them and become aware of the Absolute, you can conclude that the sage spoke the truth.

Yet, according to your all-pervasive maxim, neither of these things can happen.

VI: Very good point. Remember that it depends on who you are asking, though. When asking directions to the building, one person might say, "Oh that's easy, go down in the subway, and take it to Central Station, when you walk up to the street you will see the building." Another might say, "Ah yes, go in the alleyway between those two buildings right there, and follow it straight to the building, there's no way you can miss it." Another will say, "Just walk into that building right there and go right, you'll eventually enter it, because they're connected to each other". All I am meaning when I say that opinion isn't true, is that there are many other possibilities.

---

Well, this is an entirely new tune. You have gone from "no opinions are true" to "many opinions are true".

Quote:

---

When I say the things I do, and they seem paradoxical, it's because they lead to the Absolute, which is not part of this world. So I'm sure some of it may not make sense at first. It may seem to defy the law of identity, but it only seems that way.

---

No, your statements really do break the law of identity. They really are self-contradictory. And it comes from trying to defend a point of view that you haven't really thought through yet.

What if the person in the foreign city asks the local for the shortest or quickest way to the museum. Since there can only be one shortest or quickest route by definition, the local either speaks the truth with his directions or he does not. Yet, according to your all-pervasive maxim, this cannot happen.

Quote:

---

When you claim that your path to realization is 'true', and don't admit that it's just one path in a big collection of paths, then you close off the seeker to anything else. You've said that women are inferior, and that you have to face that fact to reach enlightenment (I may be wrong, that's the general idea I've received, though). You're able to do it your way, it's just not how I would like to teach anything. The goal is for the questioner to gain understanding, and I'd go about that in any possible way, so I keep an open mind towards other ways. I see what your path is about, and it isn't 'wrong' in the dualistic sense of the word, but it isn't certain and correct.

---

Soren Kierkegaard used to constantly speak against this kind of mentality - what he called the disease of many-sidedness. It is a disease which causes people to shy away from delineating the harsh truths of life, from developing a consciousness of either-or. Instead, they immerse themselves in a mish-mash of little half-truths and lies, picked up from all kinds of sources, many of which conflict and contradict each other. The whole point to remain as unconscious as possible any significant at all, which enables them to submerge anonymously into the rest of the human race.

I will keep saying this to the day I die, but there is only one path to Truth and that is the path of abandoning delusions. And the path of abandoning delusions is one that is primarily powered by reason. There is no other way.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 532

(1/4/04 5:20 am)

Reply

Re: ...

---

Well, this is an entirely new tune. You have gone from "no opinions are true" to "many opinions are true".

I don't think a person could ever actually believe that no opinions are true. Obviously, for example, if you want to accomplish anything, there is an obvious and true way to go about doing it. My view has been 'no opinions are true', as well as 'opinions are true'. I'm talking about different levels of truth; worldly truth, and spiritual truth.

No, your statements really do break the law of identity. They really are self-contradictory. And it comes from trying to defend a point of view that you haven't really thought through yet.

They don't. They aren't. No, it hasn't.

What if the person in the foreign city asks the local for the shortest or quickest way to the museum. Since there can only be one shortest or quickest route by definition, the local either speaks the truth with his directions or he does not. Yet, according to your all-pervasive maxim, this cannot happen.

It obviously can happen. Still, that local will describe the quickest route by different landmarks (using different words), and different measurements (steps, versus feet or meters). You can get two totally different answers that are the same directions! Both are truth, but you shouldn't label something as definitive in the transient realm. Definitive directions to 'the absolute' will lead the seeker to more transience. Am I wrong in saying any of this, or does it defy the law of identity?

Soren Kierkegaard used to constantly speak against this kind of mentality - what he called the disease of many-sidedness. It is a disease which causes people to shy away from delineating the harsh truths of life, from developing a consciousness of either-or. Instead, they immerse themselves in a mish-mash of little half-truths and lies, picked up from all kinds of sources, many of which conflict and contradict each other. The whole point to remain as unconscious as possible any significant at all, which enables them to submerge anonymously into the rest of the human race.

I don't have many sides. The way I converse with a person is to reflect what they're speaking about back to them, that way I can talk to anyone about enlightenment, not just misogynists. I have one view about the way to enlightenment, and it's that there are many paths to it. I think the paths are pretty pointless for me to focus on, and delineate, so I remain conscious of truth. You are right, in the next portion, where you say that the path is 'abandoning delusion'. Yet, that's why I "came out" in the first place...women are not inferior, and they are completely capable of realization. An enlightened person has both male and female tendencies functioning at once.

I will keep saying this to the day I die, but there is only one path to Truth and that is the path of abandoning delusions. And the path of abandoning delusions is one that is primarily powered by reason. There is no other way.

I completely agree. Which is why, when you call a certain paths 'true', I will say something such as "no opinions are true". It means that compared to Truth, they are delusions, and we should abandon them, in order to attain an understanding of Truth.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1987
(1/5/04 9:00 am)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: I will keep saying this to the day I die, but there is only one path to Truth and that is the path of abandoning delusions. And the path of abandoning delusions is one that is primarily powered by reason. There is no other way.

VI: I completely agree. Which is why, when you call a certain paths 'true', I will say something such as "no opinions are true". It means that compared to Truth, they are delusions, and we should abandon them, in order to attain an understanding of Truth.

---

Let's transpose this to the example of the museum:

I completely agree. Which is why, when you call a certain set of directions to the museum 'true', I will say something such as "no directions are true". It means that compared to the museum itself, the directions are delusions, and we should abandon them in order to reach the museum.

Make much sense to you?

Quote:

---

Yet, that's why I "came out" in the first place...women are not inferior, and they are completely capable of realization.

---

Ah, the naivity of youth. It can be so touching at times.

Quote:

---

An enlightened person has both male and female tendencies functioning at once.

---

No, quite the contrary, in fact. The enlightened person transcends both his masculinity and femininity, and becomes empty and pure. He has used his masculinity (the active, idealistic side of himself) in the wisest possible way.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 535
(1/5/04 10:03 am)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

Let's transpose this to the example of the museum:

I completely agree. Which is why, when you call a certain set of directions to the museum 'true', I will say something such as "no directions are true". It means that compared to the museum itself, the directions are delusions, and we should abandon them in order to reach the museum.

Make much sense to you?

Funny. You know Truth isn't a location or certain thing.

No, quite the contrary, in fact. The enlightened person transcends both his masculinity and femininity, and becomes empty and pure. He has used his masculinity (the active, idealistic side of himself) in the wisest possible way.

That's very true. Yet I'm saying that he has also used his femininity in the wisest possible way. Masculinity has a tendency to be stubborn, and enlightened people are not stubborn.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 216
(1/7/04 11:35 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: A new sage is with us!

---

Leo wrote:

"A new sage is with us! I believe you, my friend. But you can't very well expect the unenlightened to understand, now can you?"

You are becoming quite indiscriminatory Leo. Your definition of enlightenment seems to run along the lines of: 'The state of anyone that claims enlightenment'.

I had profound experiences prior to coming across the Genius Realms, and was wondering whether i had become, in some sense, enlightened. Thankfully, Dan nipped that in the bud and put me on a course that took me all the way. If he hadn't it's likely that i'd still be quite deluded and suffering immensely.

The Truth can't be compromised for any reason, and there are no half-way steps. Any profound experience will soon wear off anyway - whether the person is rebutted for their claims or not. They will soon return to normal levels of suffering, if in fact they reduced in the first place.

Rhett

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1988
(1/7/04 11:52 am)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

You know Truth isn't a location or certain thing.

---

You're confusing Truth (which is non-dualistic and location-less) with consciousness of Truth (which is indeed dualistic and located in wise brains). You implicitly acknowledged this yourself when you said above that, "we should abandon them, in order to attain an understanding of Truth." It would be impossible to attain an "understanding of Truth" if it were non-dualistic. It is dualistic, however, because it exists in contrast to "ignorance of Truth". You also acknowledged this when you posted in that link to the Hindu scripture, a text that which outlines ways and means for attaining conciousness of Truth.

If you sincerely want to stop mangling the law of identity, you need to look into these matters far more carefully.

Quote:

---

DQ: No, quite the contrary, in fact. The enlightened person transcends both his masculinity and femininity, and becomes empty and pure. He has used his masculinity (the active, idealistic side of himself) in the wisest possible way.

VI: That's very true. Yet I'm saying that he has also used his femininity in the wisest possible way.

---

We can't use femininity in the wisest possible way because, in the end, we can't use femininity for any purpose at all. Indeed, in a very real sense, femininity doesn't really exist at all, except as a negative entity. It exists to the degree that masculinity is absent in one's thought-processes, just as darkness only exists to the degree that light is absent.

Femininity is a lack of order, coherency and purpose. It cannot be "used" in any way. One can only dive into it in order to escape the realities and threats posed by masculine consciousness, which is what most men do.

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/7/04 2:05 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 541
(1/7/04 1:22 pm)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

You're confusing Truth (which is non-dualistic and location-less) with consciousness of Truth (which is indeed dualistic and located in wise brains).

There is only one Truth; if that Truth is nondual and without location, then why are you talking about some 'consciousness of Truth' which is dual and located in brains? Are you trying to teach me duality?

If Truth is non-dual, and you value it, why are you wasting your time teaching in the first place? Maybe you value the teaching of Truth, instead of Truth?

You implicitly acknowledged this yourself when you said above that, "we should abandon them, in order to attain an understanding of Truth." It would be impossible to attain an "understanding of Truth" if it were non-dualistic. It is dualistic, however, because it exists in contrast to

"ignorance of Truth". You also acknowledged this when you posted in that link to the Hindu scripture, a text that which outlines ways and means for attaining conciousness of Truth.

Yes, an understanding of Truth is dual. If you think you've gained understanding, it's just ignorance. An enlightened person has to think dualistically to call themselves enlightened.

We can't use femininity in the wisest possible way because, in the end, we can't femininity for any purpose at all. Indeed, in a very real sense, femininity doesn't really exist at all, except as a negative entity. It exists to the degree that masculinity is absent in one's thought-processes, just as darkness only exists to the degree that light is absent.

Femininity is a lack of order, coherency and purpose. It cannot be "used" in any way. One can only dive into it in order to escape the realities and threats posed by masculine consciousness, which is what most men do.

Masculinity is about being strong and stubborn. Femininity is about being weak, and accepting. A seeker on the path must take the form of both: he must be strong and stubborn in his reasoning, so that delusion doesn't enter his mind. He must be weak and accepting, in order to let Truth take the place of ignorance; so that pure reasoning can replace impure reasoning.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2040

(1/8/04 12:08 am)

Reply

---

Quote:

---

Indeed, in a very real sense, femininity doesn't really exist at all, except as a negative entity.

---

Wrong! For in myself and 'indeed' real men, there is no femininity as 'entity'---what the fuck are you on about?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1990
(1/8/04 8:51 am)
Reply

Re: ...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: You're confusing Truth (which is non-dualistic and location-less) with consciousness of Truth (which is indeed dualistic and located in wise brains).

VI: There is only one Truth; if that Truth is nondual and without location, then why are you talking about some 'consciousness of Truth' which is dual and located in brains?

---

Because you're not distinguishing between the two with any intelligence. In fact, you're constantly mashing the two together, which makes your comments about these matters very confusing - as I clearly demonstrated when I transposed one of your paragraphs into the museum example.

Quote:

---

Are you trying to teach me duality?

---

I'm trying to get you off your high horse, so that you can actually begin to think these matters in a serious manner. Your current flippant half-baked manner doesn't cut it.

Quote:

---

If Truth is non-dual, and you value it, why are you wasting your time teaching in the first place? Maybe you value the teaching of Truth, instead of Truth?

---

I value consciousness of Truth, which is enlightenment. Everything I do revolves around this.

Quote:

---

Yes, an understanding of Truth is dual. If you think you've gained understanding, it's just ignorance.

---

Not in all cases. It would only be ignorance if the understanding was false.

Quote:

---

An enlightened person has to think dualistically to call themselves enlightened.

---

There is no other way to think than dualistically. The mind cannot do otherwise. Thus, to accuse a person of thinking dualistically is meaningless. It is like accusing him of breathing.

Again, because you haven't thought deeply enough about this matter, your statements about non-duality and duality are naive and ignorant. An enlightened person has to think dualistically in order to recognize anything at all - e.g. that a tree is a tree, or that a cloud is a cloud, or that an enlightened person is an enlightened person. But this alone doesn't make his thinking false.

Quote:

---

DQ: We can't use femininity in the wisest possible way because, in the end, we can't femininity for any purpose at all. Indeed, in a very real sense, femininity doesn't really exist at all, except as a negative entity. It exists to the degree that masculinity is absent in one's thought-processes, just as darkness only exists to the degree that light is absent.

Femininity is a lack of order, coherency and purpose. It cannot be "used" in any way. One can only dive into it in order to escape the realities and threats posed by masculine consciousness, which is what most men do.

VI: Masculinity is about being strong and stubborn. Femininity is about being weak, and accepting. A seeker on the path must take the form of both: he must be strong and stubborn in his reasoning, so that delusion doesn't enter his mind. He must be weak and accepting, in order to let Truth take the place of ignorance; so that pure reasoning can replace impure reasoning.

---

Here you're engaging in semantic quibblery in order to preserve the illusion that femininity is important. It is really stretching it to say that the overcoming of ignorance with truth is a feminine submissive act. It would be like saying that brave warrior fighting to the death is really expressing feminine submission to his bravery and desire to fight.

While it is true that the act of overcoming ignorance does require one to submit to the truth, this act of submission bears no resemblance to the feminine submissive mentality as exhibited by women and feminine men in their daily lives. The former is a conscious act of bravery and a direct will to power, while the latter is simply an emotional desire to give up one's individuality and will in order to feel safe.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 542

(1/8/04 11:44 am)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

Because you're not distinguishing between the two with any intelligence. In fact, you're constantly mashing the two together, which makes your comments about these matters very confusing - as I clearly demonstrated when I transposed one of your paragraphs into the museum example.

Your transposition wasn't correct, because Truth isn't a thing. There is no reason to distinguish between Truth and consciousness of Truth, since consciousness of Truth is a delusion!

I'm trying to get you off your high horse, so that you can actually begin to think these matters in a serious manner. Your current flippant half-baked manner doesn't cut it.

I'm not on some high horse. I'm working at debunking your misogyny, if not for you, at least for others.

I value consciousness of Truth, which is enlightenment. Everything I do revolves around this.

Okay. I don't think that is enlightenment, though.

Not in all cases. It would only be ignorance if the understanding was false.

And it would be false if you thought you had gained understanding!

There is no other way to think than dualistically. The mind cannot do otherwise. Thus, to accuse a person of thinking dualistically is meaningless. It is like accusing him of breathing.

The mind can enter a state of absorption in God, in which experience is nondual. You are mostly right, though. Of course, in order for me to type this, my mind must be thinking dualistically.

Again, because you haven't thought deeply enough about this matter, your statements about non-duality and duality are naive and ignorant. An enlightened person has to think dualistically in order to recognize anything at all - e.g. that a tree is a tree, or that a cloud is a cloud, or that an enlightened person is an enlightened person. But this alone doesn't make his thinking false.

Right, but the process of recognizing things is false. The five senses are illusion, and the mind is completely imagination.

You can continue calling me 'naive' and 'ignorant' without backing it up, yet it doesn't make you look too wise.

Here you're engaging in semantic quibblery in order to preserve the illusion that femininity is important. It is really stretching it to say that the overcoming of ignorance with truth is a feminine submissive act. It would be like saying that brave warrior fighting to the death is really expressing feminine submission to his bravery and desire to fight.

That's a good example of how EVERYONE functions. A warrior submitting (f) to his bravery(m). He will appear to be brave, but his subconscious is in submission. Another good example of this is how thugs and gangsters are; they put up a really masculine front, yet the reasons for doing so are very feminine (ego-worship, need for friendship/love, etc). I'm not saying warriors are equivalent to gangsters, though.

Didn't Jesus say something about being weak in your strength, and strong in your weakness?

While it is true that the act of overcoming ignorance does require one to submit to the truth, this act of submission bears no resemblance to the feminine submissive mentality as exhibited by women and feminine men in their daily lives. The former is a conscious act of bravery and a direct will to power, while the latter is simply an emotional desire to give up one's individuality and will in order to feel safe.

Good point about submission to truth being an act of bravery. However, I think you are merely trying to preserve a point; or at least you aren't making your point clear enough. I can look at a person and say, "Damn they're weak", and I can think they don't have the potential for enlightenment, and that they're bad for anyone trying to attain enlightenment...but I'm just babbling about a bunch of shit that has nothing to do with Truth itself, and I'm making myself unenlightened. I'm making myself a weak person by caring so much about something so useless.

I don't want to do that. To over-generalize, and confuse the majority of people who actually care about finding Truth. Yeah, it is confusing, and that's not because I'm unenlightened. It's because you've burrowed yourself so deep inside some little cave that the majority of people can't understand what you're saying without having to climb through all of this shit just to understand. Once they understand, they'll just be bitter, and they won't be enlightened. They might feel powerful, because they will be placing themselves over a group of people. Everyone who does that feels power.

Attainment is about being powerless.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 1997

(1/9/04 9:11 am)

Reply

Re: ...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

Your transposition wasn't correct, because Truth isn't a thing. There is no reason to distinguish between Truth and consciousness of Truth, since consciousness of Truth is a delusion!

---

If consciousness of Truth is a delusion, then why are you talking about Truth as though you know what it is?

Quote:

---

I'm not on some high horse. I'm working at debunking your misogyny, if not for you, at least for others.

---

You're barking up the wrong tree here. I am not a misogynist. Indeed, I am one of the few people on this earth who isn't a misogynist.

I wonder if you possess the intellect and dialectical skills to understand this point? Not many people do.

Quote:

---

VI: If you think you've gained understanding, it's just ignorance.

DQ: Not in all cases. It would only be ignorance if the understanding was false.

VI: And it would be false if you thought you had gained understanding!

---

I'm afraid you're being completely ignorant here.

Quote:

---

DQ: There is no other way to think than dualistically. The mind cannot do otherwise. Thus, to accuse a person of thinking dualistically is meaningless. It is like accusing him of breathing.

VI: The mind can enter a state of absorption in God, in which experience is nondual.

---

What is the difference between "absorption in God" and "consciousness of Truth"?

How can there be any such thing as a non-dual experience?

How can one "enter" non-duality?

Quote:

---

You are mostly right, though. Of course, in order for me to type this, my mind must be thinking dualistically.

---

I'm "mostly" right? Please provide an example of a non-dualistic thought.

Quote:

---

DQ: Again, because you haven't thought deeply enough about this matter, your statements about non-duality and duality are naive and ignorant. An enlightened person has to think dualistically in order to recognize anything at all - e.g. that a tree is a tree, or that a cloud is a cloud, or that an enlightened person is an enlightened person. But this alone doesn't make his thinking false.

VI: Right, but the process of recognizing things is false. The five senses are illusion, and the mind is completely imagination.

---

No, these things are completely real. The senses definitely exist, as does the mind, as does the world that is perceived by them.

What is an illusion is the perception that they exist as independent, objective entities. In other words, that they inherently exist. This is the core delusion which the enlightened sage abandons. After his enlightenment, he still experiences the mind and senses and the wider world, just like everyone else does. The difference with him, however, is that he is no longer fooled by their appearance.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 864
(1/9/04 9:15 am)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

DQ: It is really stretching it to say that the overcoming of ignorance with truth is a feminine submissive act. It would be like saying that brave warrior fighting to the death is really expressing feminine submission to his bravery and desire to fight.

While it is true that the act of overcoming ignorance does require one to submit to the truth, this act of submission bears no resemblance to the feminine submissive mentality as exhibited by women and feminine men in their daily lives. The former is a conscious act of bravery and a direct will to power, while the latter is simply an emotional desire to give up one's individuality and will in order to feel safe.

---

Do you not think then, David, that it is really stretching it to say that being submissive is feminine?

Your words show this clearly here, and need we be reminded of how often the first word used to describe this 'feminine' you tout, is submissive. And until now, I don't recall any mention of this 'masculine submissiveness', which I suspect was just a rhetorical device that shot it's father in the foot. So does this not again call this whole masculine/feminine designation for what you are trying to express into question?

It does seem most pertinent on many occasions, yet on just as many occasions it comes blundering in with it's size twelves, smashes all the China on the shelves and falls on it's arse with impeccable comedic timing. It then stands up, not acknowledging the need to brush itself off, and makes like a cat that has just been thrown across the room, i.e. "I was going this way anyway".

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 1999
(1/9/04 9:47 am)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

Do you not think then, David, that it is really stretching it to say that being submissive is feminine?

---

Traditionally, submission has always been regarded as a feminine quality and that is mainly because women have historically been far more submissive creatures than men - and still are.

Quote:

---

Your words show this clearly here, and need we be reminded of how often the first word used to describe this 'feminine' you tout, is submissive. And until now, I don't recall any mention of this 'masculine submissiveness', which I suspect was just a rhetorical device that shot it's father in the foot.

---

We can dissect any action into masculine and feminine components if we want to. The will to conquer ignorance can be thought of as the will to submit to the ideal of truth. The womanly desire to submit to a powerful man can be thought of as the desire to conquer insecurity and a sense of personal responsibility.

I don't usually make this dissection because it tends to create confusion and hinders my over-all purpose of promoting wisdom. I prefer to reserve my masculine and feminine categories for long-term mental traits. That way I can highlight the mental qualities that are needed for spiritual success, which is very important.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 551

(1/9/04 6:29 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

If consciousness of Truth is a delusion, then why are you talking about Truth as though you know what it is?

I'm talking about Truth, because I've had some consciousness of Truth. This consciousness of Truth showed me that having consciousness of Truth is false.

You're barking up the wrong tree here. I am not a misogynist. Indeed, I am one of the few people on this earth who isn't a misogynist.

I wonder if you possess the intellect and dialectical skills to understand this point? Not many people do.

I disagree with you. I think you're a misogynist that tries to cloak his misogyny with the idea that you're trying to save women (as well as men) from their woman-like qualities, which aren't spiritual to you.

Without sexuality, you wouldn't exist, and neither would your consciousness of Truth. I realize this is a typical feminine viewpoint, but it's an essential one! My mom was telling me something like this today...I was talking about how society and money is empty, and that people are what's important, and she told me how people need society and money to survive comfortably. You can't have truth without also having un-truth.

I'm afraid you're being completely ignorant here.

You're afraid and I'm ignorant; what a predicament we're in.

What is the difference between "absorption in God" and "consciousness of Truth"?

No difference.

How can there be any such thing as a non-dual experience?

Well, a non-dual experience is already happening. When the apparently dual person becomes aware of non-duality, that is a non-dual experience.

How can one "enter" non-duality?

It isn't something to be entered into.

I'm "mostly" right? Please provide an example of a non-dualistic thought.

When you take attention away from the senses, and away from any sort of formation of thought, and then attention is destroyed, there is a non-dualistic thought. It isn't really a thought, though. It's more just a product of having a brain - consciousness.

No, these things are completely real. The senses definitely exist, as does the mind, as does the world that is perceived by them.

Right.

What is an illusion is the perception that they exist as independent, objective entities. In other words, that they inherently exist. This is the core delusion which the enlightened sage abandons. After his enlightenment, he still experiences the mind and senses and the wider world, just like everyone else does. The difference with him, however, is that he is no longer fooled by their appearance.

Agreed.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

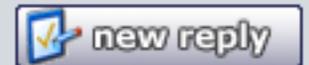

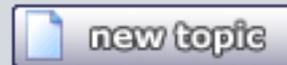

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I dare you...

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                           | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 552(1/9/04 6:42 pm)Reply |  Re: ... <hr/> The will to conquer ignorance can be thought of as the will to submit to the ideal of truth. The yin yang is a good symbol to look at for an empirical truth in dualities. Half is white and half is black, of course. We should remember though, that inside of the white is a black dot, and inside of the black is a white dot. I equate masculinity with being the black half. The subconscious (the white dot) has feminine traits (in this case, it would be the submission to Truth). Femininity would be the white half, and it's subconscious (the conquering of ignorance) - the black dot. The subconscious is the motivation for all conscious thought. In the case of a philosopher, the reason for their wanting to conquer ignorance (masculine) may be to feel good about themselves (feminine). A woman might seem all over the place in her consciousness (feminine), because her subconscious is driving her to conquer ignorance (masculine). In the case of an enlightened person, they realize the yin yang was just something they've created, and they let it go. |

|                                                                                   |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 38(1/9/04 7:08 pm)Reply      |  Re: ... <hr/> voce ioIn the case of an enlightened person, they realize the yin yang was just something they've created, and they let it go. Yes! There is a book, "Opening the Hand of Thought" by a Japanese fellow. It means as soon as something arises, one lets it go. The Buddha does not abide anywhere. John |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 561(1/10/04 6:07 pm)Reply |  Re: ... <hr/> Also, the Buddha doesn't-not abide anywhere. ; -)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 40(1/10/04 6:31 pm)Reply     |  Re: ... <hr/> voce ioAlso, the Buddha doesn't-not abide anywhere. Or he does not abide in non-abiding - but that's a story for another day. :) John                                                                                                                                                                |

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2001

(1/12/04 9:08 am)

Reply

Re: ...

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: If consciousness of Truth is a delusion, then why are you talking about Truth as though you know what it is?

VI: I'm talking about Truth, because I've had some consciousness of Truth. This consciousness of Truth showed me that having consciousness of Truth is false.

---

In other words, your conclusion that consciousness of Truth is false is based on a false understanding . . . . .

And I agree.

Quote:

---

DQ: You're barking up the wrong tree here. I am not a misogynist. Indeed, I am one of the few people on this earth who isn't a misogynist.

I wonder if you possess the intellect and dialectical skills to understand this point? Not many people do.

VI: I disagree with you. I think you're a misogynist that tries to cloak his misogyny with the idea that you're trying to save women (as well as men) from their woman-like qualities, which aren't spiritual to you.

---

It looks like we'll have to agree to disagree. Either my spiritual outlook is based on a love of Truth and an appreciation of what's involved in becoming truthful, or it is a product of emotional problems that I have with women. I'm happy to let readers decide for themselves.

I can see why you believe the feminine mentality has just as much spiritual potential as the masculine. For it is evident to me that you confuse truthfulness with evasiveness. To you, being truthful means being being skilled at evading all positions, stances, beliefs, etc - or, more accurately, evading consciousness of, and responsibility for, your rigidly-held stances, positions and beliefs. And of course, feminine people are just as capable of this kind of mental evasion as masculine people are. Hence, from your perspective, my stance on women must seem emotionally-driven.

This issue neatly encapsulates the essential problem that I have with you. You've taken what was initially a valid insight into formlessness (i.e. Reality is not a thing) and turned it into an intellectual basis for supporting a mentality of evasiveness, which in turn supports a hedonistic lifestyle that you cherish and enjoy.

This hedonistic lifestyle is far more important to you than leading a conscious, responsible existence based in truth, and it is shaping and limiting your entire philosophic vision.

Quote:

---

Without sexuality, you wouldn't exist, and neither would your consciousness of Truth. I realize this is a typical feminine viewpoint, but it's an essential one!

---

It's essential if you want to become a good husband, sure. Men have to keep spouting these woman-sanctioned, woman-approved cliches, just as they have to keep telling their wives that they love them. Otherwise, women will start to frown at them.

Regarding your point: Without murder, I wouldn't be able to exist either. If my ancestors hadn't brutally wiped out the opposition, I wouldn't be alive today. But is that grounds enough for me to continue supporting the act of murder? What do you think?

Quote:

---

My mom was telling me something like this today...I was talking about how society and money is empty, and that people are what's important, and she told me how people need society and money to survive comfortably. You can't have truth without also having un-truth.

---

It sounds like a discussion based on false premises to me. Money and society are only false and empty to the degree that people themselves are false and empty.

Incidentally, what does your mom think of your claim to enlightenment?

Quote:

---

DQ: There is no other way to think than dualistically. The mind cannot do otherwise. Thus, to accuse a person of thinking dualistically is meaningless. It is like accusing him of breathing.

VI: The mind can enter a state of absorption in God, in which experience is nondual.

DQ: What is the difference between "absorption in God" and "consciousness of Truth"?

VI: No difference.

---

But you've already equated consciousness of Truth with a false state of mind.

To translate, then, what you've just written here: The mind can enter a false state of mind in which experience is non-dual.

This does not compute.

Quote:

---

DQ: How can there be any such thing as a non-dual experience?

VI: Well, a non-dual experience is already happening. When the apparently dual person becomes aware of non-duality, that is a non-dual experience.

---

No, this is an example of where your evasiveness comes into play. An experience is always dual, regardless of what it is. Whether it be an experience of a sunset, or a first kiss, or the non-duality of Reality, an experience can always be distinguished from what is not it. Hence, it is always a product of duality.

That explains why there are ignorant people (who are unaware of the non-duality of Reality) and enlightened people.

Quote:

---

DQ: I'm "mostly" right? Please provide an example of a non-dualistic thought.

VI: When you take attention away from the senses, and away from any sort of formation of thought, and then attention is destroyed, there is a non-dualistic thought. It isn't really a thought, though. It's more just a product of having a brain - consciousness.

---

Regardless of whether it is a thought or a product of consciousness, it is still an experience which is dual in nature. It can be distinguished, for example, from experiences which involve attention upon the senses and thoughts.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 566

(1/12/04 12:23 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

In other words, your conclusion that consciousness of Truth is false is based on a false understanding . . . . .

And I agree.

It's based on an enlightened understanding.

I can see why you believe the feminine mentality has just as much spiritual potential as the masculine. For it is evident to me that you confuse truthfulness with evasiveness.

There isn't any confusion. Evasiveness is AVOIDANCE, and I avoid nothing.

To you, being truthful means being being skilled at evading all positions, stances, beliefs, etc - or, more accurately, evading consciousness of, and responsibility for, your rigidly-held stances, positions and beliefs.

Positions, stances, and beliefs are false. I can't evade my consciousness of any stance, position, or belief I have. If I have those things, then I'm conscious of them!

And of course, feminine people are just as capable of this kind of mental evasion as masculine people are. Hence, from your perspective, my stance on women must seem emotionally

From my perspective?! I "evade" any perspective, don't I? Your stance on women seems emotionally driven, because you are constantly proven wrong, and keep at it. If you actually were a rational being, you would've given up your point of view a while ago.

This issue neatly encapsulates the essential problem that I have with you. You've taken what was initially a valid insight into formlessness (i.e. Reality is not a thing) and turned it into an intellectual basis for supporting a mentality of evasiveness, which in turn supports a hedonistic lifestyle that you cherish and enjoy.

A hedonistic lifestyle...do you know my lifestyle, David?

Why is "Reality is not a thing" a valid insight into formlessness? How can you judge such a thing?

How can I have an intellectual basis which supports having a mentality of evasiveness; wouldn't I evade my own intellectual basis?

This hedonistic lifestyle is far more important to you than leading a conscious, responsible existence based in truth, and it is shaping and limiting your entire philosophic vision.

In the first place, I don't have a hedonistic lifestyle. Nothing is really too important to me, anyway. I guess love. Maybe survival. I don't have a philosophic vision, as I destroyed philosophy and have little use for it anymore. I am existing consciously, and I take responsibility for all the things I do. I live in truth.

I really don't see what you're going on about. You've got me boxed in your mind. Luckily, the actual 'me' is free from your mind, as well as my mind.

It's essential if you want to become a good husband, sure. Men have to keep spouting these woman-sanctioned, woman-approved cliches, just as they have to keep telling their wives that they love them. Otherwise, women will start to frown at them.

No! I was saying that in order for consciousness of Truth to exist, HUMAN BEINGS have to exist! Sex is needed for that. This isn't a woman-sanctioned, woman-approved cliché...it's a truth.

Regarding your point: Without murder, I wouldn't be able to exist either. If my ancestors hadn't brutally wiped out the opposition, I wouldn't be alive today. But is that grounds enough for me to continue supporting the act of murder? What do you think?

There's nothing inherently wrong with murder. We murder things all day long...little creatures in the air that we swallow, creatures in our bodies that we contaminate with unhealthy food, creatures on the ground that we step on. Also, death is just an illusion anyway. Form changes into other form, we die and our bodies turn into soil.

I also think your point is quite stupid, because if a raindrop hadn't hit the ground in a certain way, it could have affected the entire chain, and you might not have been born. If your ancestors hadn't brutally wiped out the opposition, then the opposition would have a bunch of babies turned philosophers, instead. I wasn't talking about YOU specifically, but you as a human being that values consciousness of Truth.

You need sex to value or have consciousness of Truth.

It sounds like a discussion based on false premises to me. Money and society are only false and empty to the degree that people themselves are false and empty.

Incidentally, what does your mom think of your claim to enlightenment?

I agree with you. I am just as false and empty as money or society. So are you. So is wisdom.

I don't have the need to tell my mom that I'm enlightened. She is a strict Christian, and it would hurt her more than anything.

But you've already equated consciousness of Truth with a false state of mind.

To translate, then, what you've just written here: The mind can enter a false state of mind in which experience is non-dual.

This does not compute.

There isn't a true state of mind, as all states of mind are true. A mind can know the Truth dualistically, and its experience can be non-dual.

No, this is an example of where your evasiveness comes into play. An experience is always dual, regardless of what it is. Whether it be an experience of a sunset, or a first kiss, or the non-duality of Reality, an experience can always be distinguished from what is not it. Hence, it is always a product of duality.

An experience of non-duality isn't like those other experiences, because the other experiences are within it.

That explains why there are ignorant people (who are unaware of the non-duality of Reality) and enlightened people.

There aren't ignorant people and enlightened people! That isn't True, David.

Regardless of whether it is a thought or a product of consciousness, it is still an experience which is dual in nature. It can be distinguished, for example, from experiences which involve attention upon the senses and thoughts.

It can't be distinguished. If it could, it wouldn't be "non-dual".

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 567
(1/12/04 12:24 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

John, have you ever seen The Big Lebowski?

"The Dude abides."

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2006
(1/12/04 1:14 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: In other words, your conclusion that consciousness of Truth is false is based on a false understanding . . . . .

And I agree.

VI: It's based on an enlightened understanding.

---

You've already stated that enlightenment is a delusion. So your statement here translates as: "My conclusion that consciousness of Truth is false is based on a delusion."

You're trying to have to both ways - to be both enlightened and deluded at the same time. This is called mangling the law of identity.

Quote:

---

DQ: I can see why you believe the feminine mentality has just as much spiritual potential as the masculine. For it is evident to me that you confuse truthfulness with evasiveness.

VI: There isn't any confusion. Evasiveness is AVOIDANCE, and I avoid nothing.

---

You're so evasive that you even evade the truth that you are evasive. Indeed, you're so evasive that you're not even conscious of it.

I'd probably rate you the least conscious person on this forum. No joke.

Quote:

---

DQ: And of course, feminine people are just as capable of this kind of mental evasion as masculine people are. Hence, from your perspective, my stance on women must seem emotionally

From my perspective?! I "evade" any perspective, don't I? Your stance on women seems emotionally driven, because you are constantly proven wrong, and keep at it. If you actually were a rational being, you would've given up your point of view a while ago.

---

Where am I constantly proven wrong? What's an example?

You've said that you agreed with my generalizations about men and women, so wouldn't that mean you are constantly being proven wrong as well?

Quote:

---

No! I was saying that in order for consciousness of Truth to exist, HUMAN BEINGS have to exist! Sex is needed for that. This isn't a woman-sanctioned, woman-approved cliché...it's a truth.

---

With sperm and ovary banks, artificial wombs and other technology along these lines, there will come a time when sex won't be necessary for the propagation of the species.

Quote:

---

There's nothing inherently wrong with murder. We murder things all day long...little creatures in the air that we swallow, creatures in our bodies that we contaminate with unhealthy food, creatures on the ground that we step on. Also, death is just an illusion anyway. Form changes into other form, we die and our bodies turn into soil.

---

Does this mean that you favour the murder of human beings and would like to see it continue in the future?

Quote:

---

I don't have the need to tell my mom that I'm enlightened. She is a strict Christian, and it would hurt her more than anything.

---

In other words, your relationship to her has become a lie. Won't the fact that you are lying to her hurt her even more in the long-run?

What about your friends? Do you tell them you're enlightened?

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 571

(1/12/04 1:36 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

You've already stated that enlightenment is a delusion. So your statement here translates as: "My conclusion that consciousness of Truth is false is based on a delusion."

You're trying to have to both ways - to be both enlightened and deluded at the same time. This is called mangling the law of identity.

You've only misinterpreted all of what I've said.

You're so evasive that you even evade the truth that you are evasive. Indeed, you're so evasive that you're not even conscious of it.

I'd probably rate you the least conscious person on this forum. No joke.

Then rate me as that. There's no way for you to know how conscious I am, and I don't even think it really matters to me anyway.

Where am I constantly proven wrong? What's an example?

The warrior example.

With sperm and ovary banks, artificial wombs and other technology along these lines, there will come a time when sex won't be necessary for the propagation of the species.

Without sex, we wouldn't have gotten to that point! Stop evading this point, David. You're acting a bit too much like me.

Does this mean that you favour the murder of human beings and would like to see it continue in the future?

No.

In other words, your relationship to her has become a lie. Won't the fact that you are lying to her hurt her even more in the long-run?

What about your friends? Do you tell them you're enlightened?

No, the relationship hasn't become a lie. If it were, it wouldn't hurt her more in the long run, anyway.

I tell some of my friends that I'm enlightened. There's really no point in saying I'm enlightened, though. I say it when it's necessary, like when

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | you're misleading people with your misogyny.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 44(1/12/04 6:59 pm)Reply                                                                                                                                                                           |  Re: ... <hr/> John, have you ever seen The Big Lebowski?I'd not heard of it - surfing, found a few sites, downloadednew_shit_has_come.mp3Still no idea. It looks to be a comedy film ??John                                                                                                     |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 572(1/13/04 3:04 am)Reply                                                                                                                                                                       |  Re: ... <hr/> Yeah, it's a comedy. The reason I brought it up was primarily for the quote from it: "The Dude abides".                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| N0X23 Registered UserPosts: 64(1/13/04 6:34 am)Reply |  Re: ... <hr/>Quote:<hr/> I'd probably rate you the least conscious person on this forum. No joke.<hr/>Whew, that's a relief... And I thought it was me this whole time. Although I suspect that I am not the most conscious either... sooo that must mean.... Damn...mediocrity is a bitch! |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 576
(1/13/04 2:43 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Who is the most conscious?
What characterises a person's degree of consciousness?
How can there be degrees of consciousness?
Why is consciousness "good", and unconsciousness "bad"?

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2013
(1/13/04 3:35 pm)
Reply

Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

What characterises a person's degree of consciousness?

---

The absence of ignorance, mental blocks and evasions.

For example, you have a large mental block about your own evasive behaviour, which greatly diminishes your consciousness and makes it impossible for you to attain genuine self-knowledge.

Quote:

---

How can there be degrees of consciousness?

---

A person is conscious to the degree that ignorance, mental blocks and evasions are absent in his mind.

Quote:

---

Why is consciousness "good", and unconsciousness "bad"?

---

Consciousness is considered "good" by anyone who values truth, knowledge, and enlightenment.

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 578

(1/13/04 4:35 pm)

Reply

 Re: ...

---

The absence of ignorance, mental blocks and evasions.

For example, you have a large mental block about your own evasive behaviour, which greatly diminishes your consciousness and makes it impossible for you to attain genuine self-knowledge.

How can you tell if I have a 'mental block'?

Are you absolutely sure that I have 'evasive behavior'?

How is my consciousness of things diminished if I do have 'evasive behavior'?

What exactly is 'genuine self-knowledge'?

Why does 'diminished consciousness' make it impossible to 'attain genuine self-knowledge'?

A person is conscious to the degree that ignorance, mental blocks and evasions are absent in his mind.

How can you tell what a person has in his mind?

Why does the absence of 'ignorance, mental blocks and evasions' make a person more 'conscious'?

Consciousness is considered "good" by anyone who values truth, knowledge, and enlightenment.

Consciousness is considered good by 'anyone'...how can you know that for sure?

Why do people that value 'truth', also value 'knowledge'?

Why do people that value 'knowledge', also value 'enlightenment'?

Why do people that value 'truth', also value 'enlightenment'?

If the truth says: "there is no 'good' or 'bad'", then why does a truthful person value truth at all (as value is based on a whole system of 'good' and 'bad')?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2014

(1/13/04 4:41 pm)

Reply

Re: ...

I had written:

Quote:

---

Consciousness is considered "good" by anyone who values truth, knowledge, and enlightenment.

---

Expanding on this subject a bit more:

We can dissect consciousness into several distinct forms:

- Dim consciousness. The consciousness enjoyed by cats, chimpanzees and young children. Awareness of little more than raw sensual perception and simple relationships between physical objects. No awareness of complex abstract realities, psychological realities, philosophical realities, etc. Just a spontaneous-in-the-Now which many feminine-minded adults, who find their own slither of consciousness too hard to bear, desperately yearn for.

- Feminine consciousness. Awareness of some complex abstract realities and psychological realities. No awareness of philosophical realities. No awareness or appreciation of ironical modes of thought. A lack of memory which hampers the pursuit and acquisition of deeper forms of knowledge. Very changeable, like the mind of a young child.

- Human consciousness. Strong awareness of complex abstract realities and psychological realities. Some awareness of philosophical realities. Good appreciation of ironical modes of thought. Strong awareness of causal consequences. A good appreciation of the power of reason.

- God-consciousness. Full awareness of philosophical realities. Complete knowledge of Ultimate Reality. Strong awareness of other people's souls. Strong awareness of what people need to spiritually progress. A complete absence of defence mechanisms and mental blocks.

--

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 1/13/04 4:43 pm

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 404
(1/13/04 4:58 pm)
Reply

☐ And then there's of course...

---

Love consciousness encompassing the Dim

Feminine

Human

God

consciousness

Dim Paulie

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2015
(1/13/04 5:17 pm)
Reply

☐ Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

How can you tell if I have a 'mental block'?

---

By looking.

Quote:

---

Are you absolutely sure that I have 'evasive behavior'?

---

Yes.

Quote:

---

How is my consciousness of things diminished if I do have 'evasive behavior'?

---

It makes you evade important information about yourself and thus keeps you ignorant about your own behaviour.

It's a bit like how a fundamentalist Christian constantly evades the conclusion that we are closely related to chimpanzees, no matter how strong and prevasive the evidence might be, just so he can stay locked within his safe little dreamworld. This is causes him to remain ignorant of the beauty and compelling nature of evolutionary theory and, in turn, closes his mind off from the many world-shattering implications contained within the theory.

Quote:

---

What exactly is 'geniune self-knowledge'?

---

In this context, clear-sighted perception of one's own psychology.

Quote:

---

Why does 'diminished consciousness' make it impossible to 'attain geniune self-knowledge'?

---

Because clear-sighted perception of one's own psychology requires a highly-tuned consciousness.

Quote:

---

How can you tell what a person has in his mind?

---

By examining his actions. Everything we do in the outer world has its causes in our psychology.

"Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth corrupt fruit.

A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit"

- Jesus

Quote:

---

Why does the absence of 'ignorance, mental blocks and evasions' make a person more 'conscious'?

---

Why does opening one's eyes make one see better?

Quote:

---

DQ: Consciousness is considered "good" by anyone who values truth, knowledge, and enlightenment.

VI: Consciousness is considered good by 'anyone'...how can you know that for sure?

---

Because none of these things can exist without consciousness.

Quote:

---

Why do people that value 'truth', also value 'knowledge'?

---

Because truth is the only form of knowledge there is.

Quote:

---

Why do people that value 'knowledge', also value 'enlightenment'?

---

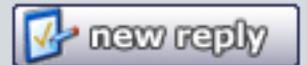

Because knowledge requires a mind that is free of the distortion of delusion.

Quote:

---

Why do people that value 'truth', also value 'enlightenment'?

|                                                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                           | Ditto. Quote: <hr/> If the truth says: "there is no 'good' or 'bad'", then why does a truthful person value truth at all (as value is based on a whole system of 'good' and 'bad')? <hr/> This question is itself based on a valuing of (what you think is) truth and therefore undermines itself. |
| Canadian ZoetropeRegistered UserPosts: 1(1/13/04 5:40 pm)Reply |  Re: A new sage is with us! <hr/> Mu.                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2058(1/13/04 6:11 pm)Reply        |  --- <hr/> Voce io, how can there not be degrees of consciousness?!                                                                                                                                                                  |

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I dare you...

Page 1 2 3 4 5

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 579(1/14/04 5:40 am)Reply | ...<hr/> suergaz, I don't see any degrees of consciousness. David made it up.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 580(1/14/04 5:45 am)Reply | ....<hr/> We can dissect consciousness into several distinct forms:We can, but none of it is true!Love consciousnessencompassing theDimFeminineHumanGodconsciousnessDim PaulieI agree with that. |

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 581
(1/14/04 5:56 am)
Reply

 ..

---

David, my conclusion is that you aren't enlightened, and that you're insane. Your conclusion is that I'm evasive.

I am being evasive by avoiding what you had last replied about, and you are being insane because you're judging me as evasive without actually knowing me, and then you're saying you're absolutely certain, when such certainty is frowned upon in philosophy if you don't have all the proper evidence. We both still claim enlightenment, and neither one of us is going to budge.

My enlightenment isn't about you, though. It's about me. I'm guessing yours is the same, so we can part ways, and say "forget it". You can go around saying that I'm unenlightened, and I can go around saying that you're unenlightened.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2018
(1/14/04 7:31 am)
Reply

 Re: ...

---

Voce Io wrote:

Quote:

---

suergaz, I don't see any degrees of consciousness. David made it up.

---

That's the way. Block it all out. Ignore all distinguishing features. Pretend there are no differences. Merge everything into sludge. Disappear into nothingness. Become no more.

Canadian Zoetrope
Registered User
Posts: 8
(1/14/04 7:56 am)
Reply

☐ heh.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1242
(1/14/04 8:10 am)
Reply

☐ ice blue plastic

Quote:

---

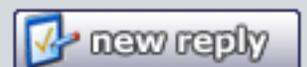

That's the way. Block it all out. Ignore all distinguishing features. Pretend there are no differences. Merge everything into sludge. Disappear into nothingness. Become no more.

---

I had a dream like that many years ago, one of only two or three nightmares in my whole life that I really can't forget. I went to this place like a public swimming pool, the pool was beautiful, but then I noticed the people were lying on top of it, and that it was not water but something with a consistency of semifirm plastic, and that the people were completely inert and were slowly melting into it. I was the only horrified one. That's the entire dream, and it has filled me with horror, lo these 10 or 15 years.

Anyway, David, in vain I have searched for the recent bit about how you're the only nonmisogynist on the planet, so my question to you is, what the hell is your definition of a misogynist?

|                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 585(1/14/04 9:45 am)Reply                                                                                     |  ... <hr/> David, I'm not blocking it out. I know conceptually that concepts mean nothing, and your entire charade is formed of this.                       |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2023(1/14/04 10:29 am)Reply  |  Re: ... <hr/> These different forms of consciousnesses are not mere concepts. They are verifiable empirical realities. That is what you are blocking out. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2064(1/14/04 10:39 am)Reply                                                                                   |  Re: ... <hr/> There are degrees of consciousness voce io, that is why there are selves.                                                                   |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 589(1/14/04 1:04 pm)Reply                                                                                     |  ... <hr/> There are selves??? There are empirical realities???                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2073(1/14/04 3:43 pm)Reply                                                                                    |  ---- <hr/> There are selves. Nox questions this. You may find a kindred, if not a kindred spirit in him.                                                |

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I hypothesize that the majority of humans

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                     | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 283(10/16/03 2:41 am)Reply | I hypothesize that the majority of humans<hr/> alive today lack the requisite biological capacity for truly exercising what others in times past referred to as "free will".I think the genotype has for the most part lost those necessary sequences and there's nothing that can humanly be done about it. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 344(10/16/03 4:04 am)Reply    | Re: I hypothesize that the majority of humans<hr/> Free will....mmmmmmuuuuuhhhhhh.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| xerosaburuRegistered UserPosts: 284(10/18/03 2:28 am)Reply | How predictable<hr/> Why even bother any more. Even people here have become parodies.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

|                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1588(10/18/03 9:25 am)Reply           | Re: How predictable <hr/> xerosaburu, (:D) ----bothering, bothering,How are you?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| scatteredmindRegistered UserPosts: 103(10/23/03 5:03 pm)Reply      | free will? <hr/> who cares about other people? who cares, other people?then excersize your own free will and don't bother with them.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| the meme of barnabyRegistered UserPosts: 2(10/24/03 11:43 am)Reply | the gene scene <hr/> xero, your statement suggests that in the past humans have had the capacity to harbour free will and are unable to do so today. Perhaps this is so (I would be interested in WHY you think this is), but I truly doubt that the cause is an evolutionary phenomenon in the genetic sense. Popular belief among evolutionary biologists today states that we are currently (and have been for thousands of years) at a evolutionaary standstill-natural selection has been challenged by our own ability to alter the world. We have created an environment in which genetic variability can flourish without selective pressures from nature. Your idea would make more sense in terms of socio-cultural evolution. Perhaps modern society does not sufficiently promote independent decision making? barnaby. |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 353(10/24/03 3:53 pm)Reply            | Re: the gene scene <hr/> Why call me a parody? Talking about free will is like describing a blade of grass. "Yay, good job, xero!" Fuck. It's boring. I don't even know why I come here anymore. The only interesting person is suergaz. Del is progressing into interesting topics, but it's still way off. Dan is cool, but never posts. The rest are fucking idiots. Fucking. Idiots. So once again...free will? Muuuuuuuuhhhhh.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

Cli Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31r
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

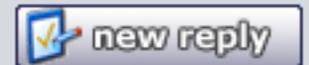

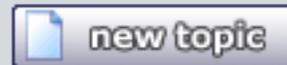

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I love you, I hate you, I love you

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 917(1/14/04 7:02 pm)Reply | I love you, I hate you, I love you <hr/> Quote: <hr/> voce ioIf there was actually a group of women which tried to rid masculinity from men, it would be the same. It would be considered horrible, and based off of hatred. <hr/> The community seeks to rid men of their masculinity. This is natural. The community is feminine in nature. Real men are unconsciously hated by the community. Androgynous behaviour is successful. Real men and real women are only appreciated among primitive or aristocratic people. Like this line from 'Prince'."Let a woman be a woman and a man be a man, if you want me baby, here I am." All those moving towards the androgynous personality will hate real women as much as they hate real men.Real women and real men have more hate in them than the androgynous can muster. That is why they also have more love in them than the androgynous can feel. |

The primitive and the aristocratic type love to give gifts. They also love robbery. Only they understand romance and passion. They hate trade and exchange.

The androgynous civilian type hate giving gifts and love laws with a passion.

Mr. Quinn, Mr. Rowden and Mr. Toast, Mr Thomas, Mrs Faizi got fatally injured in the battle of the sexes. These men who hate women and these women who hate men will only find peace in a monastery.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 738
(1/14/04 7:25 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

DEL: The community seeks to rid men of their masculinity. This is natural.

This is not so. The community consists of women and men who frequently seek to rid each other of many things, but hardly of their masculinity or femininity.

DEL: The community is feminine in nature. Real men are unconsciously hated by the community. Androgynous behaviour is successful.

And the facts? What is the evidence for this? What line of thought led to this statement?

DEL: Mr. Quinn, Mr. Rowden and Mr. Toast, Mr Thomas, Mrs Faizi got fatally injured in the battle of the sexes. These men who hate women and these women who hate men will only find peace in a monastery.

You have to be kidding.

Thomas

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 266
(1/14/04 8:37 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

You also got injured in that battle, DEL, inasmuch as you fail to make a distinction between the hermaphrodite and the androgyn. What you speak about is the hermaphrodite, the misshapen and horroristic being made up of the once separated man and woman "coalesced from their rear". While the androgyn is the original form of man.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 595
(1/15/04 4:23 am)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

The community is not primarily feminine. That is an assumption, and a generalization. The community also doesn't try to rid men of reasoning, as there is no way of doing so, besides possibly, a removal of the frontal lobe. With all of the distractions around us: television, the internet, gender issues, mind expanding drugs; with all of these things we are evolving, our society is leading us towards a more developed frontal lobe. We haven't reached the age of reason yet, but without much effort on our parts, I speculate that the age of reason will come soon enough. Our evolution as a post-industrial society is exponential. All of this QRS talk is essential to some of the evolution, yet, it's very dogmatic and problematic. A more enlightened view is all-encompassing, and non-rejecting. Embracing, and facing.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 918
(1/15/04 6:50 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

Thomas Knierim

This is not so. The community consists of women and men who frequently seek to rid each other of many things, but hardly of their masculinity or femininity.

And the facts? What is the evidence for this? What line of thought led to this statement?

---

Advanced civilisation works more effectively towards the destruction of the individual and conformity. Prescribed personalities and bodies are easier and more efficient to manage.

The equality drive of the community is feminine in character. A mother tries to treat all her children equally.

Quote:

---

B0ndi

While the androgyn is the original form of man.

---

Yes, these hermaphrodite values could be an unconscious effort to return to the womb where all was peaceful, apparently.

Quote:

---

voce io

With all of the distractions around us: television, the internet, gender issues, mind expanding drugs; with all of these things we are evolving, our society is leading us towards a more developed frontal lobe. We haven't reached the age of reason yet, but without much effort on our parts, I speculate that the age of reason will come soon enough.

---

The age of pseudo-reason is coming. It is common knowledge for centuries that too many clever, independent and non-conforming people around make things hard for management.

It's like a discussion class at school. The teacher chooses a topic for discussion like 'should we have to wear school uniform?'. The children go on in passionate discussion about the pros and cons feeling that their arguments could possibly make a difference in school policy.

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 267
(1/15/04 8:52 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

B.: (...) While the androgyn is the original form of man.

D.: Yes, these hermaphrodite values could be an unconscious effort to return to the womb where all was peaceful, apparently.

---

I couldn't care less about that psychological preconception. Believing in a whatsoever "return" is itself a hermaphroditic "value". (The same with a belief in an "evolution".) However, I leave it at there as I have no problem with your starting post, except the misleading words and phrasing.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1276
(1/16/04 6:09 am)
Reply

i love you i hate you

---

I've no idea why you included Toast or Thomas among the fatally wounded.

Quote:

---

The community is feminine in nature.

---

This I think is true in its most basic form. Community initially consists of females and young, after all, and various male animals join to one extent or another. In a Caribou herd, the males travel separately until the herd comes together in summer before the rut. At that point, the males expend such tremendous amounts of energy for a possible mating of only seconds, that it truly seems unfair.

The situation the human male notices he is in, is one in which the obsession over females is unescapable. QRS are among the most deeply trapped, and so is Wolf. There is no way to escape the female - you either cave in and make her the main focus of your life, or you resist, making your resistance the main focus of your life.

The female is equally pathetic. She has only one power - that of an overwhelming sexual pull, without which she would be abandoned by the male.

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 410
(1/16/04 6:23 am)
Reply

Re: i love you

---

Quote:

---

The female is equally pathetic. She has only one power - that of an overwhelming sexual pull, without which she would be abandoned by the male.

---

Oh, come off it, mystic!

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2049
(1/16/04 9:52 am)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

The situation the human male notices he is in, is one in which the obsession over females is unescapable. QRS are among the most deeply trapped, and so is Wolf. There is no way to escape the female - you either cave in and make her the main focus of your life, or you resist, making your resistance the main focus of your life.

---

Or you can do what I do and hardly think about females at all.

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 614
(1/16/04 9:58 am)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Yes, David, it's very obvious that you hardly think of women at all. Ha!

...edit: spelling ;)

Edited by: voce io at: 1/16/04 9:58 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 881
(1/16/04 10:31 am)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Quote:

---

Mr. Quinn, Mr. Rowden and Mr. Toast, Mr Thomas, Mrs Faizi got fatally injured in the battle of the sexes. These men who hate women and these women who hate men will only find peace in a monastery.

---

Mmmm.

Just for continuity, I am neither a woman hating man nor a man hating woman. Neither is Thomas, nor Marsha, and perhaps not even Dan. I'm often not particularly enamoured towards humankind in general but that's besides the point.

You is crayzee Del-boy.

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 39

(1/16/04 10:50 am)

Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Quote:

---

and perhaps not even Dan

---

I've noticed this as well. I've interacted with Dan a bit in previous months, and I have always had a different feeling when talking to him than I've had when reading Mr. Quinn or Mr. Solway. There is something in Dan, I think, which resists painting himself into a corner entirely. I sense a lot more moderateness in Dan than in the others, as well as more self-honesty. Yesterday, Dan admitted to spending a good bit of a recent afternoon 'perving on' a barmaid, for example. This is something that I would never expect to hear from David or Kevin, and the honesty and humanity of it are why I tend to think that Dan is easily the most reasonable member of QRS. Essentially, I am here because of Dan. If he were not the moderating presence that he is, and I had never encountered him, I doubt I'd have any interest in debating with David or Kevin.

DEL

Registered User

Posts: 920

(1/16/04 11:22 am)

Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Quote:

---

DavidQuinn000

Or you can do what I do and hardly think about females at all.

---

"Hardly" is the most important word used in the above sentence. To hardly think about females means that when he does eventually think about them his thoughts are more intense than the average man. It is impossible not to think about the opposite sex.

If you successfully stop thinking about women and keep away from them for a month you will definately experience intense lust at an unexpected time and place.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1615
(1/16/04 11:43 am)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

I think they would admit to such a thing if they saw merit in doing do. But my behaviour in relation to that girl is rather duplicitious in that at the same time as perceiving her sexual allure - and to some extent enjoying it - I can also perceive the underlying truth of it and of her consciousness (or lack thereof). If there is, in fact, any misogyny in me, it is really expressed in those moments when I do enjoy her sexual allure and give no thought to her consciousness. This is made all the worse by the fact that I can clearly see, when I choose to open my eyes to something other than her face and breasts and the superficial aspects of her personality, the incompatibility between the underlying truth of her sexuality and the notion of the betterment of her consciousness.

This is the true test of one's character - to put one's baser desires aside and act with nobility. She, of course, will never have any idea at all that I even experience such a conflict.

Her's is not to reason why, her's is but to flow or die.

Dan Rowden

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 245
(1/16/04 11:59 am)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

*"Hardly" is the most important word used in the above sentence.
To hardly think about females means that when he does eventually think about them his thoughts are more intense than the average man.
It is impossible not to think about the opposite sex.*

Sorry to spoil your attachments DEL, but i live in an area teeming with semi-naked and naked models, and yet don't experience attraction for them whatsoever.

Only relatively recently have i decided to give up my desire for women. Up until then i always desired them and had plenty of opportunities, but other factors held me back. There were never any hate issues at all.

I now realise why it rarely worked out for me, why i no longer value it, and how women's thinking is problematic for the development of Truth.

If you successfully stop thinking about women and keep away from them for a month you will definitely experience intense lust at an unexpected time and place.

I know what you're getting at because i've been there and done that, but nevertheless, the lust is gone, and my life is far better for it. I have absolutely no desire to get it back, i don't even think about it.

I mention this here so that people at least hear one voice saying that egotistical desire for women and it's attendant suffering can be permanently removed and is wholly worth removing.

Rhett

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 1/16/04 12:07 pm

voce io
Registered User
Posts: 618
(1/16/04 12:04 pm)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Aw Rhett, you poor, repressed man. In becoming unattached to women's sexuality, you become attached to other things.

Stop focusing on any particular thing, and just give up.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 750
(1/16/04 12:08 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

DEL: Advanced civilisation works more effectively towards the destruction of the individual and conformity.

Maybe, but how does that relate to your initial statement that the "community is feminine" and "seeks to rid men of their masculinity"? (Words in quotation marks are literal quotes) What does "destruction of the individual" mean?

DEL: Prescribed personalities and bodies are easier and more efficient to manage.

I can't make any sense of that sentence either. Please explain.

DEL: The equality drive of the community is feminine in character.

That's a loaded statement. In order to make this sound credible you would have to explain which community you refer to, what "equality drive" is, and what indications you see for its presence. Furthermore you would have to explain why it is "feminine in character". I expect a full report before 5:00 PM tomorrow. ;-)

DEL: A mother tries to treat all her children equally.

I think there are thousands of examples in biology and in human history that disprove this. Many mothers have a favorite child; some prefer the oldest son, others prefer daughters. Wild animals (mothers) often let the runt die if there is not enough food.

Thomas

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 885
(1/16/04 12:21 pm)
Reply

Re: TESTIFY

---

Quote:

---

Dan: Her's is not to reason why, her's is but to flow or die.

---

Or co-habit with one who's wise.

That kinda rhymes.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 921
(1/16/04 5:18 pm)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Quote:

---

drowden

She, of course, will never have any idea at all that I even experience such a conflict.

---

Don't be so sure of this. I used to think like that.

Womens senses are much more advanced.

For example have you noticed how difficult it is to catch a woman looking at you yet they can catch you looking at them nearly every time? Their periferal vision is far more developed.

She was totally aware of your conflict. She could see it in your body movements and lack of body movement. There is no way you can beat a woman at close range. She can smell the conflict. She loves the conflict.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 922
(1/16/04 5:28 pm)
Reply

Re: i love you i hate you

---

Quote:

---

Rhett Hamilton

Sorry to spoil your attachments DEL, but i live in an area teeming with semi-naked and naked models, and yet don't experience attraction for them whatsoever.

---

Ha Haa!

You are going to crash for sure!

It's not about semi-naked and naked models.

An ordinary looking woman in the right place at the right time at the right angle at the right distance with the right gesture will make you explode sooner or later.

Sometimes something really subtle or silly will turn you on if keep on like that. She might just unconsciously stroke her neck in a certain way or brush past you or slip her shoe off to reveal the cutetest toes.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 923
(1/16/04 5:51 pm)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

Thomas Knierim

Maybe, but how does that relate to your initial statement that the "community is feminine" and "seeks to rid men of their masculinity"? (Words in quotation marks are literal quotes)
What does "destruction of the individual" mean?

---

For thousands of years woman has been a symbol of a group of people. So a church community for example is considered feminine.

A large group of people gathered prepared to riot is like a woman without a man.

A man is a symbol of a concept or idea. A strong man can make a speech and bring the crowd into order and give them a purpose.

The best relationships between man and woman are when the man is distant physically. He should visit from time to time of course but not too often. This is a universal principle.

Prescribed personalities are like the characters you get on sitcoms. No true man a sit down and watch sitcoms.

To keep the people, the community, the woman in order one must speak of equality and fit individuals and things into manageable categories otherwise there will be chaos.

The concept, the idea, the man is consumed, utilised or diffused by the community.

Thomas Knierim
Thomas Knierim

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

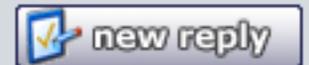

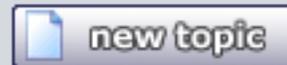

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> I love you, I hate you, I love you

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 924(1/16/04 5:55 pm)Reply                                                                                               | Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you <hr/> Ooops! I forgot to delete the extra cut and paste 'Thomas Knierim'. <hr/> Bloody Mistakes. I hate mistakes but perhaps I should love them too. Interesting thought but difficult to put into practice.Only a real sage could get his head around that.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 756(1/16/04 6:06 pm)Reply  | Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you <hr/> DEL: For thousands of years woman has been a symbol of a group of people. Urrgh!? While trying to derive meaning from this explanation my best guess would be that you are trying to equate the idea of feminity with the idea of collectivism, which is frankly a little odd. I am not sure if that is what you are trying to say, but if it is you need to build a foundation of reason for this argument instead of merely repeating it. So a church community for example is considered feminine. Even with a generous amount of goodwill I can't follow you there. Why are church communities considered female? |

Thomas

B0ndi

Registered User

Posts: 269

(1/16/04 7:20 pm)

Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

DEL: For thousands of years woman has been a symbol of a group of people.

Thomas: Urrgh!?! (...)

---

Whilst it's insomuch obvious that people cannot even notice. Consider the Anglo-Saxon naming conventions for every 'collective' thing: you use the feminine personal pronoun. For a country, you say "she". For Nature, you say "She". And so on.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 758

(1/16/04 9:44 pm)

Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

DEL: Whilst it's insomuch obvious that people cannot even notice. Consider the Anglo-Saxon naming conventions for every 'collective' thing: you use the feminine personal pronoun. For a country, you say "she". For Nature, you say "She". And so on.

This evidence is anecdotal at best. In German the word 'country' is neuter; in Spanish the word is male. Then there is the 'fatherland', the 'father tribe', the 'father nation'. It all depends, doesn't it?

Thomas

Naturyl

Registered User

Posts: 47

(1/17/04 1:47 pm)

Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

The best relationships between man and woman are when the man is distant physically. He should visit from time to time of course but not too often. This is a universal principle.

---

I tend to agree. Once they begin to co-habitate, most men will simply not be able to maintain the woman's respect. When the respect goes, it all pretty much goes down the toilet. This is also a universal principle. The exceptions serve only to prove the rule.

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1284

(1/17/04 2:15 pm)

Reply

--

---

Quote:

---

Why are church communities considered female?

---

Maybe it has something to do with the fact that the deity is male, the religion was founded by a man, its writings are the writings of men, the interpretations of the writings are the interpretations of men, the ones making the rules and doing the voting are men, the administrators are men, whereas the women sing in the choir (not always) and wash the robes.

Quote:

---

For a country, you say "she". For Nature, you say "She".

---

Russians say "the Fatherland" but express their deepest love and devotion when they say "Mother Russia." Nature is she because she is the womb of life. Because she contains inner secrets, difficult to probe. Ships are she because they are containers, like women. The earth is a mother for the same reason as nature.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2064
(1/17/04 4:36 pm)
Reply

Re: --

---

I consider church communities to be female because the values they promote are submission, passivity, emotional orgies, social harmony, matronly style compassion, etc. There is almost no emphasis on individuality, rationality, striving for wisdom, reaching for spiritual greatness, and the like. It doesn't matter that these communities are created and run by men; they are still promoting feminine values.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2083
(1/18/04 12:30 am)
Reply

----

---

Church communities are examples of declining life. The values they promote are not 'feminine' or 'masculine' but ones of 'weakness'.

Emphasis on "striving for wisdom" or "reaching for spiritual greatness" would go against wisdom and greatness. As for emphasis on "individuality", for all that has been achieved by this, it has made scarcer, and continues to do so, the conditions by which a wise and great individual may arise. It is very much a case of creating wrong-headed revelations:-"Wow, everybody is an individual, thus everybody must be given a chance!" --As though everybody does not already possess their chance.

Go about and first look at those you would wake. There are many who need their sleep.

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 272
(1/19/04 1:42 am)
Reply

Re: I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

---

B.: Whilst it's insomuch obvious that people cannot even notice. Consider the Anglo-Saxon naming conventions for every 'collective' thing: you use the feminine personal pronoun. For a country, you say "she". For Nature, you say "She". And so on.

T.: This evidence is anecdotal at best. In German the word 'country' is neuter; in Spanish the word is male. Then there is the 'fatherland', the 'father tribe', the 'father nation'. It all depends, doesn't it?

---

I wrote Anglo-Saxon, not Latin, nor Germanic.

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 273
(1/19/04 1:51 am)
Reply

Re: --

---

Quote:

---

I consider church communities to be female because the values they promote are submission, passivity, emotional orgies, social harmony, matronly style compassion, etc. There is almost no emphasis on individuality, rationality, striving for wisdom, reaching for spiritual greatness, and the like. It doesn't matter that these communities are created and run by men; they are still promoting feminine values.

---

That is because Christian clergy is inherently lunaric in its essence, i. e. reflective. The Truth is wholly external for them (a "God"). They declined because they thought that the Truth is something discursive and can be expressed in almost any favourable way.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 925
(1/19/04 8:29 am)
Reply

I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Anciently the community used to sacrifice the King.
When the man is at his peak and has delivered his message the collective will decide that it is time for him to die.
If he will not die then they must conclude he is made of Godlike material.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1293
(1/19/04 12:45 pm)
Reply

Re: --

---

Quote:

---

There is almost no emphasis on individuality, rationality, striving for wisdom, reaching for spiritual greatness, and the like.

---

The church I grew up in did value these things. they also promoted those other things, with the exception of emotional orgies.

Quote:

---

It doesn't matter that these communities are created and run by men; they are still promoting feminine values.

---

So all these men got together and created exactly what they wanted, start to finish, and what do they come up with - something you find very feminine and lowbrow. So how does that bode for men in control?

Despite that lots of people talk to me, it often seems my best points get ignored. Of course I take that as a quiet admission of defeat by my opponents, but it lacks satisfaction. One point I made long ago is that when things are outwardly unbalanced such as giving males all the say and all the control, that there will be an underbelly of femininity, but not the best kind. Always good to have things out in the light of day.

And another point I have made more than once is that obedience and submission are male obsessions, and males excel at them.

DEL
Registered User
Posts: 927
(1/19/04 6:25 pm)
Reply

I love you, I hate you, I love you

---

Quote:

birdofhermes

And another point I have made more than once is that obedience and submission are male obsessions, and males excel at them.

---

This is correct. The only way to get significant quantities of useful minerals and secrets out of the female earth is by mining. Therefore as engineers we have to create management structures with our technology to dig into the earth and extract what we need. Earth resists the penetration but becomes more beautiful as a result.

The analysis of a man's fetish will reveal the ultimate strengths and weaknesses of his tools. Men you must admit and understand your fetish to know yourself.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

- > GENIUS FORUM
- > Icons of Evolution

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                      | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 806(2/19/04 1:42 pm)Reply  | Icons of Evolution <hr/> Book Review: Icons of EvolutionJonathan Wells, 2000Regnery Publishing By Thomas Knierim Icons of Evolution is a book by Jonathan Wells that attempts an attack on the mainstream evolution paradigm. Wells identifies ten teaching examples commonly found in biology textbooks dealing with evolution. He calls these “icons of evolution” and discusses each of them individually. The author’s objective is to discredit Darwinism by raising doubts about the evidence. Wells holds that Darwinism is an unscientific myth that gets into the way of true science and the search for truth. He pronounces the relatively serious charge that “students and the public are being systematically misinformed about the evidence for evolution.” In addition, he accuses well-known biologists and institutions of distorting scientific facts in favor of the Darwinist theory. As a countermeasure, Wells suggests to attach warning labels to biology textbooks that warn students about the supposedly hypothetical nature of the findings that confirm evolution theory. The technical level of this book is notably above that of run-off-the-mill creationist attacks. Jonathan Wells holds a Ph.D. in molecular and cell biology and he is a senior fellow at the Discovery Institute for the Renewal of Science and Culture, an organization that supports the idea of intelligent design. It is somewhat peculiar that Wells does not mention the words “God” | or “intelligent design” a single time in his book. Although he wants his readers to disbelieve the standard scientific view of evolution, he offers no alternative explanation on his own for the observed phenomena. Instead, the material presented amounts to a scientific conspiracy theory. At the end of the book, Wells labels mainstream biologists as “dogmatic Darwinists that misrepresent the truth to keep themselves in power.” It is obvious from the chosen examples and arguments that the author’s target audience are laymen with limited knowledge of biology. In the following section I introduce the ten “icons”, each representing a chapter in the book, by the warning label text suggested by Wells:

(1) Wells: The Miller-Urey experiment probably did not simulate the Earth’s early atmosphere; it does not demonstrate how life’s building blocks originated.

The Miller-Urey experiment makes certain assumptions about the composition of the Earth atmosphere around 4.6 to 3.8 mya. Contrary to what Wells says, these assumptions have a high probability, since the Miller-Urey experiment can be varied to work with a number of different compositions, although all of them require the absence of large amounts of oxygen. There is reason to believe there wasn’t much oxygen in the early Earth’s atmosphere. Uraninite and incompletely oxidized iron deposits in the oldest rock formations indicate that the early atmosphere was anoxic or weakly reducing. In addition to Miller-Urey style synthesis, there are other viable mechanisms of amino acid production, such as submarine vents, chemicals dissolved in water or minerals in porous rocks or clays. Wells also “forgets” to mention the extraterrestrial amino acids we found in meteorites (the Murchison meteorite for example), which indicate that similar synthesis processes took place elsewhere in the solar system.

(2) Wells: Darwin’s tree of life does not fit the fossil record of the Cambrian explosion and molecular evidence does not support a simple branching tree-pattern.

Wells makes the somewhat outlandish proposition that the fossil record contradicts phylogenetic trees. He thus attempts to raise doubt over common ancestry and Darwin’s progenitor hypothesis. Fact is that Darwin –although having proposed common ancestry– never drew phylogenetic trees. It was Haeckel who did. A phylogenetic tree shows genealogical relationships of taxa. There are occasional disparities between molecular and morphological phylogenies, and phylogenic methodologies themselves are not unproblematic. However, this does neither disprove common ancestry nor speciation. On the contrary, the majority of phylogenetic trees fit perfectly with the fossil record. To say that the Cambrian explosion puts the tree of live topsy-turvy can only be interpreted as a bluff attempt, because ancestral lines can be followed well up into the Precambrian period (i.e. 10 million years and more).

(3) Wells: If homology is defined as similarity due to common ancestry, it cannot be used as evidence for common ancestry; whatever its cause may be it is not similar genes.

Wells makes the case that biology books employ circular reasoning by explaining homology (structural similarities such as the limbs of vertebrates) in terms of common ancestry, which they were supposed to prove in the first place. Wells maybe a biology Ph.D., but he is certainly not a logician. If there were a fallacy to be observed, it would not be that of circular reasoning, but “affirming the consequent” (invalid reversal of modus ponens). This is, however, not the case. Homology is defined as structural similarity. When one looks at the bone structure of forelimbs of a human and compares them with, for example, a bat wing, a porpoise flipper, and a horse forelimb, they all look strikingly similar despite the fact that they serve different functions. One can't help to notice that this points to common ancestry. So, the proper argument structure is (p1) homologous bone structure -> (c1) common ancestry.

(4) Wells: The pictures of Haeckel's embryos make vertebrate embryos look more similar than they really are; it is not true that vertebrate embryos are most similar in their earliest stages.

Okay, Haeckel's embryo drawings are not the most accurate. Since these drawings are 19th century woodcarvings this shouldn't really come as a surprise. I haven't seen any of Haeckel's drawings in textbooks that I own; in fact, the first time I came across them was in Wells' book. Wells is certainly right in saying that Haeckel's recapitulationism is flawed. The view that ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny, i.e. that the embryo passes through a series of developmental stages that correspond to evolutionary stages, has been dismissed as “not fitting the evidence” at the beginning of the 20th century. However, this doesn't mean –as Wells wants to make us believe– that comparative embryology offers no support for evolution theory at all. It certainly does. The developmental patterns of closely related organisms are similar, and they have more developmental features in common than distantly related organisms. This is a homology that supports the same argument as in (3) and it can be used to construct or reinforce phylogenetic trees.

(5) Wells: Archaeopteryx is probably not the ancestor of modern birds, and its own ancestors remain highly controversial; other missing links are now being sought.

This chapter exemplifies the method of Wells' argument building. Whether archaeopteryx is ancestral to modern birds is actually irrelevant. What is important is that this fossil represents an intermediate between two vertebrate classes, namely birds and reptiles. It supports the theory that birds descended from dinosaurs. Wells conveniently forgets to mention other fossils of feathered and/or avian-like dinosaurs, though archaeopteryx is undeniably the clearest transitional example. Wells suggests that there are "missing links" to modern birds, thereby insinuating that the class of birds must be derived from a single (missing) ancestor, which is irrelevant and possibly wrong. He makes up for it by throwing in a humorous anecdote how scientists "discovered" bird DNA in a fossil that was surprisingly similar to that of the modern turkey, where it turned out that someone handling the fossil had a turkey sandwich that day.

(6) Wells: Peppered moths do not rest on tree trunks in the wild, and photos showing them on tree trunks have been staged; Kettlewell's experiments are now being questioned.

This may be the most poorly conceived chapter of the book. Wells attempts to question the observation that moths in Southern England get selected for their wing color. Peppered moths (Lepidoptera) come in two colors, black (melanic) and white (normal). Obviously, the white moths are more visible on black tree stems while the black ones are more conspicuous on white stems. Therefore, their color relates to the rate at which they are spotted and eaten by birds. Now, during the middle of the 20th century, parts of Southern England were heavily polluted and trees became blacker. Consequently, populations of melanic moths rose while those of white moths decreased during that period. This phenomenon is known as "industrial melanism"; it is a textbook example of natural selection. Today, pollution in Southern England has declined on account of environmental laws and bright-colored moths are again dominant. Wells tries to poke holes into Kettlewell's moth studies by noting that moths don't rest on tree stems. He says that Kettlewell's studies are inaccurate and he complains about staged textbook photos of moths resting on tree stems. Contrary to what Wells says, Kettlewell's observations are essentially correct. They have been verified almost fifty years later by Michael Majerus. Majerus established that 25% of all moths do actually rest on trunks and that bird predation is the major factor of Lepidoptera selection.

(7) Wells: The Galapagos finches did not inspire Darwin with the idea of evolution, and oscillating natural selection on their beaks produces no observable net change.

The Galapagos finches, discovered by Charles Darwin, are an example of adaptive radiation. Adaptive radiation is a process where an ancestral species enters a new environment with unoccupied niches and evolves adaptations to exploit these niches. Adaptation may lead to speciation where an original species radiates into several descendent species, each adapted for its respective niche. This progression is thought to have occurred in the Galapagos finches. Although today's finches look different, they are morphologically very similar to each other, only varying in beak size, song, and behavior. Wells questions the long-term studies of Galapagos finches conducted by Grant/Grant which relate the finches' beak size to precipitation and thus to abundance and hardness of food. Wells criticism focuses on the method of extrapolation. He argues that beak size oscillates with the amount of precipitation and that speciation isn't proven by the observed changes. At this point, he seems to have accepted natural selection as a fact (which runs contrary to the point he makes in chapter six), and he merely argues against the possibility of speciation. He ignores that none of the involved scientists claimed that speciation can be observed directly at a time scale of only a few decades and that instead the mechanisms of food specialization and selection have been observed.

(8) Wells: Four-winged fruit flies must be artificially bred, and their extra wings lack muscles; these disabled mutants are not raw material for evolution.

This is probably the only chapter that deserves positive mentioning. Wells builds up the argument that random mutations do not usually lead to beneficial phenotypic enhancements. He illustrates this with the example of drosophila. The fruit fly can be mutated in the laboratory to grow an extra pair of wings, but these wings don't have muscles and thus disable the fly. No biologist would oppose the general thrust of this argument. Most random mutations are indeed not beneficial to the organism, only very few are. According to standard theory, those lineages with (rare) beneficial alterations are selected. Unfortunately, after making this point, Wells wanders off into the realm of fantasy by suggesting that beneficial morphological mutations are impossible. Actually, there are a number of plants that exemplify beneficial morphological mutation, such as the monkeyflower. There are also the well-known examples of insect DDT resistance and bacterial penicillin resistance, which provide further evidence that mutations can benefit the organism. However, the chapter deserves positive mentioning for another reason: Wells brings up the topics of epigenetics and evo-devo, which receive far too little attention from non-experts. These are new fields that the interested reader may wish to investigate.

(9) Wells: Evidence from fossil horses does not justify the claim that evolution was undirected, which is based on materialistic philosophy rather than empirical science.

At this advanced point in the book, Wells seems to have miraculously accepted the basic tenets of homology and common ancestry. He illustrates evolutionary branches leading from Hyracotherium to the modern Equus. This is somewhat confusing, since Wells seemed to have denied the same concepts earlier in the book. He argues that horse fossils suggest directed evolution. Directed evolution? By orthogenesis? The argument flow becomes puzzling. First, Wells first describes how the old paradigm of linear horse evolution has been refuted by contemporary science. Subsequently he tells the reader how this refutation might be flawed. After all, he can draw a straight line from the Eocene horse to the modern horse. Naturally, the reader can also draw straight lines from the Eohippus to all the extinct horse lineages. And the point is?

(10) Wells: Theories about human origin are subjective and controversial, and they rest on little evidence; all drawings of ancestors are hypothetical.

The theory about human origin is about as controversial as the sphericity of Earth. In other words, the existence of a small number of flat-earth advocates does not call for labeling models of the globe hypothetical. Likewise, the existence of religious minority groups does not call for labeling the primate ancestry of modern humans hypothetical. Wells criticizes what in his view is the ultimate icon, the famous illustrations of a band led by a modern human and trailed by a quadrupedal ape with intermediate apemen in between them. These illustrations are indeed inaccurate, because –as in the case of the horse– they suggest a linear progression from one form to another, whereas in reality things are an order of magnitude more complex. Wells says: “Artists’ drawings of ape-like humans are used to justify materialistic claims that we are just animals and our existence is a mere accident, but fossil experts cannot even agree on who our supposed ancestors were or what they looked like.” I can’t figure out what relevance the first clause has to the second, yet the second clause is not quite correct. There is general agreement that australopithecine, homo habilis, and homo erectus are intermediate forms between apes and modern humans and there is general agreement about Linnaean taxonomy which puts humans into the order of primates and assigns to us the pongidae family where we also find orang-utans, bonobos, chimpanzees, and gorillas.

Summary

Although Jonathan Wells is not a creationist, his method of argument resembles the creationist approach. The principle strategy is to raise a smoke screen around the theory of evolution by citing a multitude of perplexing facts and details, each of them designed to create doubt about a certain aspect of evolution. The emerging picture is hardly coherent, yet it manages to confound readers with lacking scientific background and possibly creates distrust towards evolution theory. Wells repeatedly labels Darwinism as unscientific, but he fails to come up with an alternative theory. Although he is an intelligent design proponent, he neither mentions intelligent design in his book nor does he give us any clue on how directed evolution might work. Upon looking up the author's biography on the Internet, it turns out that Mr. Wells holds another Ph.D. in Religious Studies at Yale where he wrote a dissertation on "Argument to design" and that he is a follower of the Reverend Sun Myung Moon. From this it may be concluded that Wells' attack on Darwinism is primarily motivated by religion and not by scientific doubts, as he claims. It therefore seems wise that the warning not to base scientific views on philosophical views –which Wells pronounces several times in the book– should be first applied to himself.

Related Web Pages

Icons of Evolution Website

"Icons of Evolution" at Amazon

The Discovery Institute

Alan D. Gishlick's Rebuttal, National Center for Science Education

Nic Tamzek's Rebuttal

29 Evidences for Macroevolution

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1473
(2/19/04 2:36 pm)
Reply

Icons of Evolution

---

Why did you read this? Relatively linear fossil record in many animal and plant species, geological layering and carbon dating, current developing bacterial resistance to antibiotics...

But then again, we have the bible so I am sure is still unresolved.

Tharan

|                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 807(2/19/04 4:15 pm)Reply   | Re: Icons of Evolution <hr/> Wolf: Why did you read this? For two reasons; Anna suggested it and the author has a Ph.D. in biology. Thomas                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1475(2/19/04 5:55 pm)Reply                                                                                     | Re: Icons of Evolution <hr/> Ah ok.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| MGregoryRegistered UserPosts: 388(2/20/04 2:22 am)Reply                                                                                         | Re: Icons of Evolution <hr/> That was an excellent review Thomas! I wonder what would happen if this site had a book review section?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1425(2/26/04 4:21 am)Reply  | Re: Icons of Evolution <hr/> Chapter 4, homology. Quote: <hr/> If there were a fallacy to be observed, it would not be that of circular reasoning, but “affirming the consequent” (invalid reversal of modus ponens). This is, however, not the case. Homology is defined as structural similarity. When one looks at the bone structure of forelimbs of a human and compares them with, for example, a bat wing, a porpoise flipper, and a horse forelimb, they all look strikingly similar despite the fact that they serve different functions. One can’t help to notice that this points to common ancestry. So, the proper argument structure is (p1) homologous bone structure -&gt; (c1) common ancestry. <hr/> Thomas, come down off that high horse and speak English. All you did in |

the above paragraph is reiterate the definition of homology. I'm going to have to accuse you of not having read the chapter. What he says later in the chapter is the real meat of it. Although I think the circularity argument holds. I should figure out how to work the scanner.

I think you should go back to page 71, Evidence from developmental Pathways, and give a more detailed critique.

Actually, rereading it myself, the problem of the distal-less gene seems less important (page 75) because although the gene seems to be involved in nonhomologous structures, it could simply mean that the gene has a role that differs according to what other genes it interacts with, i.e., in what sort of embryo the gene finds itself.

It seems I have read about this in greater detail, though. I'll see if I can find something in the Milton book.

The bit about people having almost no brains, I have read about elsewhere. Something about people who have hydrocephaly managing to function despite the condition having obliterated large portions of their brains. but the ones who really have almost no brain aren't in good shape, and often even die. But it is a remarkable phenomenon and bodes further study. first of all, the condition arose in the fetus, so there you would have the greatest flexibility for compensation mechanisms.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 821
(2/26/04 1:55 pm)
Reply

Re: Icons of Evolution

---

Anna: Thomas, come down off that high horse and speak English. All you did in the above paragraph is reiterate the definition of homology. I'm going to have to accuse you of not having read the chapter. What he says later in the chapter is the real meat of it. Although I think the circularity argument holds. I should figure out how to work the scanner.

The "real meat" of that chapter -if there is indeed any meat at all- is the charge of circular reasoning. Wells says that contemporary Darwinists tend to make the claim that common ancestry results in homology, whereas -if you are not already convinced of the concept of common ancestry- this doesn't constitute valid reasoning. Wells develops this charge over several pages, supplies a number of examples, and finally summarizes the circularity allegation at the end of the book where he suggests to deface biology textbooks with his "warning labels".

From the perspective of (in)formal logic, the charge of circularity doesn't apply. It surprises me that none of Wells' critics have noticed this, since it constitutes a fairly obvious glitch. The invalid argument structure that Wells points out is actually reversal of modus ponens, known to logicians as affirming the consequent. Now, you could say "whatever", but this does point to academic sloppiness, or doesn't it?

Wells' chapter on homology achieves only one thing: it thoroughly confuses the reader. Homology is minute structural similarity observed in phenotypes without any functional necessity. Homology it is not limited to morphology; it can be developmental, genetic, and even behavioral. Naturally, morphological homologies are the most obvious ones. Why does a porpoise flipper look so similar to a human hand? What about body plan similarities in general? Would we observe homology if there was an "intelligent designer"? It seems that an intelligent designer could have done better to implement a certain function in an animal. If every animal was created individually by an intelligent creator, there would be little reason for the minute body plan similarities we observe.

Anna: I think you should go back to page 71, Evidence from developmental Pathways, and give a more detailed critique. Actually, rereading it myself, the problem of the distal-less gene seems less important (page 75) because although the gene seems to be involved in nonhomologous structures, it could simply mean that the gene has a role that differs according to what other genes it interacts with, i.e., in what sort of embryo the gene finds itself.

I am not sure what you mean with this. Can you summarize the part you find important or convincing in Wells' argument?

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1429

(2/28/04 7:01 am)

Reply

evolution

---

Alas, Thomas, it has come down to the fact that I am addicted to these forums, to the detriment of my other life, and I am going to have to quit.

I do after all have a job, a man, children, interests such as yoga, reading, exercise, and even simple chores that I neglect. I tried to increase my willpower by getting the man to agree with my assessment that I'm neglecting him, but all he could point to is that I leave dishes around. I had to be honest and inform him that I have always been a miserable housekeeper and have always left dishes around. I used to be much worse, though. My first husband had to actually teach me to clear the table sometime before the next day or two, and wash the dishes. As one of my friends in West Virginia (Appalachia, country folk) said, "You ain't had no fetchin' up."

I plan to continue this thread though. So while I am getting up a reply, I want to remind you that I still do not understand what Buddha supposedly rejected about the concept of Atman, or reincarnation. I do favor Hindu Advaitist philosophy.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Interesting fact, Re Science

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 257(1/15/04 12:47 am)Reply     | Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> Most of the matter in the observable Universe is so-called "Dark Matter", but we don't even know what it is! There could be a lot of "dark matter" in our immediate proximity (ie, within metres of us), but we are unaware of it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| ChrisSaikRegistered UserPosts: 81(1/15/04 12:59 am)Reply    | Re: Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> I don't know much about Dark Matter, but I am curious as to why you bring it up. Edited by: ChrisSaik at: 1/15/04 1:04 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| WolfsonJakkRegistered UserPosts: 1410(1/15/04 2:28 am)Reply | Re: Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> Because clinging to "truths" about the appearances of matter, like many amateur and professional scientists, can lead to an upheaval in your belief system at any moment. Some new Einsteinian discovery can completely overturn the life's work of many individuals who might have strong attachments to the path they have chosen. They have found comfort in their mathematical models only to have it swept away in an instant. Such is the dance of maya. |

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 598(1/15/04 4:41 am)Reply                                                                                        | Re: Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> I highly doubt the universe can ever be known in such a way. All observations about things are subject to fallacy. The only absolute truth is existence-consciousness, which is yourself.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| ksolwayRegistered UserPosts: 258(1/15/04 8:48 am)Reply                                                                                        | Re: Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> Quote: <hr/> I am curious as to why you bring it up. <hr/> I just find it interesting how very little we know about the physical Universe we live in. Yet so many in the scientific "religion" are so cock-sure of themselves - probably for a lack of anything else to believe in. Edited by: ksolway at: 1/15/04 8:49 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 876(1/15/04 10:10 am)Reply  | Re: Interesting fact, Re Science <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Kevin: Most of the matter in the observable Universe is so-called "Dark Matter", but we don't even know what it is! There could be a lot of "dark matter" in our immediate proximity (ie, within metres of us), but we are unaware of it. Straight Man: I don't know much about Dark Matter, but I am curious as to why you bring it up. Kevin: I just find it interesting how very little we know about the physical Universe we live in. Yet so many in the scientific "religion" are so cock-sure of themselves - probably for a lack of anything else to believe in. <hr/> |

Ha, how childlike.

Quote:

---

Most of the matter in the observable Universe is so-called "Dark Matter", but we don't even know what it is!

---

Yes, though you don't phrase it very well.

Quote:

---

There could be a lot of "dark matter" in our immediate proximity (ie, within metres of us), but we are unaware of it.

---

There could well be and probably is, then again there might not be. This speculation serves no purpose but to re-illustrate your intended point that we don't know what type of matter dark matter is.

Quote:

---

I just find it interesting how very little we know about the physical Universe we live in.

---

Your statement is misleading and represents faulty reasoning.

How do you know that we know very little? How could you know? You sound so cocksure.

To quote a well known statesman, "There are known knowns; there are things we know we know. We also know there are known unknowns; that is to say we know there are some things we do not know. But there are also unknown unknowns — the ones we don't know we don't know.", which makes perfect sense to me.

So, beyond the known unknowns, how can you possibly know how much we don't know?

You are almost certainly right with your guess, of course, but almost-certainly-right-with-your-guess is thankfully not an acceptable answer to the scientific form of investigation. And after all, science is only the rigorous application of logic and reason to experiment and observation, so why does your practiced reason fail you here; where is your logic and discernment? Has it gone the way of prejudice? Are you letting your feelings cloud your judgement?

Quote:

---

Yet so many in the scientific "religion" are so cock-sure of themselves

---

What a ridiculous statement. So many people in almost any walk of life are so cocksure of themselves. And being cocksure of yourself is not necessarily a product of the methodology involved in your job/interest.

If you mean to say that so many scientists are so cocksure of their world view and the irrefutability and all-encompassing nature of their knowledge, then you are wrong. You will find that most good scientists are partially, if not as fully-as-possible, aware of the scope of their knowledge, and the knowledge of science as a whole.

You will also find that any good scientist will not blindly ignore evidence to the contrary of their world view, like some cocksure philosophers might do.

Quote:

---

- probably for a lack of anything else to believe in.

---

That's a thing about logic. You can, as you have done, start off with incorrect premises and yet end up with the correct conclusion.

For the cocksure scientist, they likely have not come across anything better to believe in than themselves.

For the scientist who thinks science knows more than it does, they likely have not come across anything better to believe in than science. And to a certain extent, who can blame them, being as science has illuminated the path to the relative mastery we have over reality in comparison to those pre-science.

Perhaps if these people were to come across certain lines of philosophical thought, they might change their world view and become cocksure about something else, then again perhaps they won't. And who could prove either choice to be irrefutably right/wrong - good/bad?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 877
(1/15/04 10:16 am)
Reply

Re: Interesting fact, Re Science

---

Quote:

---

Wolf: Because clinging to "truths" about the appearances of matter, like many amateur and professional scientists, can lead to an upheaval in your belief system at any moment. Some new Einsteinian discovery can completely overturn the life's work of many individuals who might have strong attachments to the path they have chosen. They have found comfort in their mathematical models only to have it swept away in an instant. Such is the dance of maya.

---

The phenomenal world does so much more than dance, though the understanding thereof is simply a matter of learning the steps.

Some bloke who's read too many koans lately.

WolfsonJakk
Registered User
Posts: 1414
(1/15/04 1:45 pm)
Reply

Re: Interesting fact, Re Science

---

Even if we broaden the definition of dance? It is really simple to do, you know. Just make it fit the theory. :-)

A monk came to Joshu and asked "What is Zen?"

Joshu replied "Have you eaten your rice?"

The monk said "Yes."

Joshu responded "Well, go ahead and have seconds. There's plenty enough to go around!"

Hearing this, the monk was not enlightened.

---a bloke with a Brooklyn accent

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 264

(1/15/04 6:38 pm)

Reply

Re: Interesting fact, Re Science

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

KS: I just find it interesting how very little we know about the physical Universe we live in.

DT: Your statement is misleading and represents faulty reasoning.

How do you know that we know very little? How could you know? You sound so cocksure.

---

One thing is for sure, and that is that there is a lot we don't know. Exactly how much of a "lot" that is, I grant that we don't know. "Dark Matter" might turn out to be something really mundane, like hydrogen. Or it might have qualities totally strange to us, and highly complex, or even organized.

Quote:

---

So, beyond the known unknowns, how can you possibly know how much we don't know?

---

If there is a lot we don't know about the known world, then we can extrapolate that there is also a lot we don't know about the unknown world. That makes at least two "lots". :-) Anyway, that makes sense to me!

Quote:

---

Are you letting your feelings cloud your judgement?

---

I just like to imagine the possibilities of all this "Dark Matter", which may be composed of a whole lot of different, and interesting things - a whole

"universe" so to speak. I also like to imagine the possibility that learning about this Dark Matter, which seems to be the commonest of all matter, or the norm, will overturn quite a deal of what Science currently believes is perfected knowledge . . . though it may not.

Quote:

---

KS: Yet so many in the scientific "religion" are so cock-sure of themselves.

DT: What a ridiculous statement. So many people in almost any walk of life are so cocksure of themselves. And being cocksure of yourself is not necessarily a product of the methodology involved in your job/interest.

---

To me, scientists are the new "preists", and are thus the most comical of all people. Though I would agree that Christianity is not to blame for priests, nor science for scientists.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 748
(1/15/04 8:27 pm)
Reply

Re: Interesting fact, Re Science

---

Kevin: "Dark Matter" might turn out to be something really mundane, like hydrogen.

If you were informed about dark matter you would know that we can exclude this possibility almost certainly. Hydrogen in such large quantities would emit light and, hence, wouldn't be dark. The best guess is currently that dark matter is made up of weak interacting massive particles (WIMPS), although the expression is almost an oxymoron since particles as we know them are either massive or weak interacting, or none, but not both. Neutrinos are the next best guess. Perhaps they're not massless after all. It has also been suggested that dark matter isn't really matter, but a property of space, which implies that gravity and -Einsteinian spacetime curvature- are not due to matter, but that the reverse is the case.

Dark matter has been discussed for roughly two decades now, but did you hear of dark energy? Here is a brief introduction.

Dark Energy Fills The Cosmos
by Paul Preuss

In an article titled "The Cosmic Triangle: Revealing the State of the Universe," which appears in the May 28, 1999 issue of the journal Science, a group of cosmologists and physicists from Princeton University and Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory survey the wide range of evidence which, they write, "is forcing us to consider the possibility that some cosmic dark energy exists that opposes the self-attraction of matter and causes the expansion of the universe to accelerate."

Dark energy is hardly science fiction, although no less intriguing and full of mystery for being real science.

"The universe is made mostly of dark matter and dark energy," says Saul Perlmutter, leader of the Supernova Cosmology Project headquartered at Berkeley Lab, "and we don't know what either of them is." He credits University of Chicago cosmologist Michael Turner with coining the phrase "dark energy" in an article they wrote together with Martin White of the University of Illinois for Physical Review Letters.

In the May 28 Science article, Perlmutter and Neta Bahcall, Jeremiah Ostriker, and Paul Steinhardt of Princeton use the concept of dark energy in discussing their graphic approach to understanding the past, present, and future status of the universe. The Cosmic Triangle is the authors' way of presenting the major questions cosmology must answer: "How much matter is in the universe? Is the expansion rate slowing down or speeding up? And, is the universe flat?"

The possible answers are values for three terms in an equation that describes the evolution of the universe according to the general theory of relativity. By plotting the best experimental observations and estimates within the triangle, scientists can make preliminary choices among competing models.

The mass density of the universe is estimated by deriving the ratio of visible light to mass in large systems such as clusters of galaxies, and in several other ways. For several decades the evidence has been building that mass density is low and that most of the matter in the universe is dark.

Changes in expansion rate are estimated by comparing the redshifts of distant galaxies with the apparent brightness of Type 1a supernovae found in them. These measurements suggest that the expansion of the universe is accelerating.

Curvature is estimated from measurements of the anisotropy (temperature fluctuation) of the cosmic microwave background radiation (CMB), a remnant of the Big Bang. Although uncertainty is large, current results suggest a flat universe.

The Cosmic Triangle eliminates some popular models, such as a high-density universe that is slowing down and will eventually recollapse, as well as a nearly empty universe with no dark energy and low mass. While the evidence from galactic clusters shows that mass density is low, supernova evidence for acceleration shows that dark energy must be abundant.

"These two legs of the Cosmic Triangle agree with the evidence from the CMB that the universe is flat," Perlmutter says, adding that "this is a remarkable agreement for these early days of empirical cosmology."

Thus the Cosmic Triangle suggests that the standard inflationary scenario is on the right track: one of its key predictions is a flat universe.

Various types of dark energy have been proposed, including a cosmic field associated with inflation; a different, low-energy field dubbed "quintessence"; and the cosmological constant, or vacuum energy of empty space. Unlike Einstein's famous fudge factor, the cosmological constant in its present incarnation doesn't delicately (and artificially) balance gravity in order to maintain a static universe; instead, it has "negative pressure" that causes expansion to accelerate.

"The term Cosmic Triangle sounds kind of New Agey," says Perlmutter, "but it's a good way to portray the quantities in these comparisons, and it's fun for people who like to plot the possibilities" -- an evolving task that, among other choices, will require finding an answer to "the most provocative and profound" issue of all, the nature of cosmic dark energy.

The Berkeley Lab is a U.S. Department of Energy national laboratory located in Berkeley, California. It conducts unclassified scientific research and is managed by the University of California.

Edited by: Thomas Knierim at: 1/15/04 8:29 pm

B0ndi
Registered User
Posts: 268
(1/15/04 9:18 pm)
Reply

Scientifical mythology

---

Quote:

---

Most of the matter in the observable Universe is so-called "Dark Matter", but we don't even know what it is!

There could be a lot of "dark matter" in our immediate proximity (ie, within metres of us), but we are unaware of it.

---

So there's one more thing to add to the mythology of modern science. And one more proof that there's nothing we can do with the "pure facts" without preconceptions.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1274
(1/16/04 3:31 am)
Reply

cosmos

---

Quote:

---

It has also been suggested that dark matter isn't really matter, but a property of space, which implies that gravity and - Einsteinian spacetime curvature- are not due to matter, but that the reverse is the case.

---

Matter arises out of gravity and spacetime? Matter arises from dark matter?

Quote:

---

the wide range of evidence which, they write, "is forcing us to consider the possibility that some cosmic dark energy exists that opposes the self-attraction of matter and causes the expansion of the universe to accelerate."

---

Wow, I got some shivers when I read that. I have thought there is something missing from the momentum + gravity equation. Heavenly bodies should be colliding.

Quote:

---

The Cosmic Triangle eliminates some popular models, such as a high-density universe that is slowing down and will eventually recollapse,

---

What?! What about the breath of Brahma? It has to recollapse! What sense would there be for the universe not to be cyclic?

Quote:

---

Unlike Einstein's famous fudge factor, the cosmological constant in its present incarnation doesn't delicately (and artificially) balance gravity in order to maintain a static universe; instead, it has "negative pressure" that causes expansion to accelerate.

---

The Elegant Universe didn't mention the fudge factor, but why should it be negative pressure? Why not positive pressure? If it is negative pressure, then we essentially have two forms of negative pressure, one of gravity and one of the outer vacuum. Actually, I like it either way.

And who can deny the Great Yin and Yang, the endless coitus that is this universe?

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 754
(1/16/04 2:38 pm)
Reply

Re: cosmos

---

Wow, I got some shivers when I read that. I have thought there is something missing from the momentum + gravity equation. Heavenly bodies should be colliding.

Yeah, the problem with the Newtonian universe is that it must be in a delicate state of balance. A single meteor impact on a planet, altering its orbit, could lead to gravitational collapse of the solar system, the galaxy, and eventually the universe. The problem was (partly) solved by Hubble's discovery, but even Hubble had no idea why the universe is expanding.

Anna: What?! What about the breath of Brahma? It has to recollapse! What sense would there be for the universe not to be cyclic?

It is an aesthetically appealing idea, isn't it? Seeing the beauty of Brahma's breath, the universe ought to contract, dammit! Even Stephen Hawking favored the cyclic universe theory. Unfortunately, today most evidence points towards an open universe.

Anna: The Elegant Universe didn't mention the fudge factor, but why should it be negative pressure? Why not positive pressure? If it is negative pressure, then we essentially have two forms of negative pressure, one of gravity and one of the outer vacuum.

Naturally, Einstein did not call it fudge factor, but 'cosmological constant'. It was necessary to introduce this factor into his equations in order to 'make them right', i.e. in agreement with the observation that the universe doesn't suffer gravitational collapse. A stable universe would be impossible without a negative value counteracting gravitation. The value of the cosmological constant that would explain current observations is on the order of  $10^{-36} \text{sec}^{-2}$ . However, if the expansion really accelerates as the 1998 observations suggest, then the constant would hardly be a constant.

Thomas

ksolway
Registered User
Posts: 270
(1/16/04 7:46 pm)
Reply

Re: cosmos

---

Quote:

---

Unfortunately, today most evidence points towards an open universe

---

Keep in mind that what scientists call our "universe" is in reality just a drop in the ocean - or the equivalent of one grain of sand in an infinite number of beaches of sand.

Imagine an infinite number of "big-bangs" happening in space - for it would seem very unlikely indeed that ours is the only one.

Even if our "big bang" is "open", eventually the matter/energy from it is going to run into the matter from another "big bang".

Sapius

Registered User

Posts: 273

(1/16/04 9:57 pm)

Reply

Re: cosmos

Thomas quoted

---

Quote:

---

The mass density of the universe is estimated by deriving the ratio of visible light to mass in large systems such as clusters of galaxies.....

Changes in expansion rate are estimated by comparing the redshifts of distant galaxies with the apparent brightness.....

Curvature is estimated from measurements of the anisotropy (temperature fluctuation) of the cosmic microwave background radiation.....

---

Is not the above based on observations? And does not that raise the question whether we are observing all that there is to observe? The above observations could surely give us the right conclusion at this point of time according to our experiences till date, but past experiences tell us that experiences are not stagnant.

Keeping this in mind.....

Kevin wrote.

Quote:

---

Imagine an infinite number of "big-bangs" happening.....

---

I guess one does not need a great imagination to see the possibility. Is there any reason to believe otherwise?

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1283
(1/17/04 2:03 pm)
Reply

cosmos

---

Quote:

---

Keep in mind that what scientists call our "universe" is in reality just a drop in the ocean - or the equivalent of one grain of sand in an infinite number of beaches of sand.

Imagine an infinite number of "big-bangs" happening in space - for it would seem very unlikely indeed that ours is the only one.

Even if our "big bang" is "open", eventually the matter/energy from it is going to run into the matter from another "big bang".

---

Whew! I feel better.

An open universe is too dismal to contemplate.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2079
(1/17/04 2:43 pm)
Reply

----

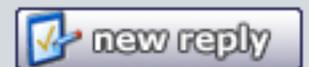

---

A 'closed' universe provides metaphor for mendicants.

Cosmology, really, begins in a universe that is open.

I think Anna has a crush on Kevin.

|                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1295(1/19/04 1:00 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> A 'closed' universe provides metaphor for mendicants. <hr/> Another strong opinion without supporting ideas. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2089(1/19/04 1:03 pm)Reply      | ---- <hr/> It supports itself. There is no such thing as a closed universe.                                                                                                                                           |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1298(1/19/04 2:39 pm)Reply | Re: ---- <hr/> Are you lazy, obstinate, or both? And why don't you be a bartender? I can see you doing that.                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2094(1/19/04 5:15 pm)Reply      | --- <hr/> Let it remain enough for you that I am correct. About my becoming a bartender, I do not like the smell of stale beer enough.                                                                         |

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Interesting fact, Re Science

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DELRegistered UserPosts: 928(1/19/04 6:33 pm)Reply                                                                                                | Dark Matter <hr/> Dark matter is the ether in Alchemy. The 5th element. You can utilise it through oscillations, spin and tension.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Thomas KnierimRegistered UserPosts: 764(1/19/04 10:19 pm)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> It is possible that the universe is open yet ending. This has been suggested by Caldwell's Big Rip theory, which I have posted some time ago when it was formulated. Since it's pertaining I post the article again, hoping that Anna might warm to the idea of an open universe. --- The Big Rip --- A rather harrowing new theory about the death of the universe paints a picture of "phantom energy" ripping apart galaxies, stars, planets and eventually every speck of matter in a fantastical end to time. Scientifically it is just about the most repulsive notion ever conceived. The speculative but serious cosmology is described as a "pretty fantastic possibility" even by its lead author, Robert Caldwell of Dartmouth University. It explains one possible outcome for solid astronomical observations made in the late 1990s -- that the universe is expanding at an ever-increasing pace, and that something unknown is vacuuming everything outward. |

The question Caldwell and his colleagues posed is, what would happen if the rate of acceleration increased?

Their answer is that the eventual, phenomenal pace would overwhelm the normal, trusted effects of gravity right down to the local level. Even the nuclear forces that bind things in the subatomic world will cease to be effective.

"The expansion becomes so fast that it literally rips apart all bound objects," Caldwell explained in a telephone interview. "It rips apart clusters of galaxies. It rips apart stars. It rips apart planets and solar systems. And it eventually rips apart all matter."

He calls it, as you might guess, the Big Rip.

The standard view

Driving the known acceleration of the universe's expansion is a mysterious thing is called dark energy, thought of by scientists as anti-gravity working over large distances.

Conventional wisdom holds that the acceleration will proceed at a constant rate, akin to a car that moves 10 mph faster with each mile traveled. With nothing to cap the acceleration, all galaxies will eventually recede from one another at the speed of light, leaving each galaxy alone in a cold, dark universe within 100 billion years. We would not be able to see any galaxies outside our Milky Way, even with the most powerful telescopes.

That's the conventional view, remarkable as it sounds. The Big Rip theory has dark energy's prowess increasing with time, until it's an out-of-control phantom energy. Think of our car accelerating an additional 10 mph every half mile, then every hundred yards, then every foot.

Before long, the bumpers are bound to fly off. Sooner or later, our hypothetical engine will come apart, regardless of how much we spend on motor oil.

Countdown to demise

Other theorists who have reviewed the Big Rip theory are not yet sold on the idea. Meanwhile, Caldwell's team has provided a precise countdown to total demise. The projected end is, reassuringly, 20 billion years away. If our species survives the next 19 billion years (and there are serious doubts about this, given our Sun's projected fate) here are some signs that scientists of the future will want to look for.

A billion years before the end, all galaxies will have receded so far and so fast from our own as to be erased from the sky, as in no longer visible.

When the Milky Way begins to fly apart, there are 60 million years left.

Planets in our solar system will start to wing away from the Sun three months before the end of time.

When Earth explodes, the end is momentarily near.

At this point, there is still a short interval before atoms and even their nuclei break apart. "There's about 30 minutes left," Caldwell said, "But it's not quality time."

And then what? Does the universe recycle itself? Is there something after nothing?

"We're not sure what happens after that," Caldwell says. "On the face of it, it would look like time ends."

The first explosion

Caldwell's study had humble beginnings. He and his colleagues, Marc Kamionkowski and Nevin Weinberg at Caltech, were considering how a sphere of matter collapses under its own weight to form a galaxy. In computer models, they tweaked with the dark energy factor and found that too much of it would actually prevent the sphere from collapsing. In extreme cases, the sphere exploded.

"That was our hint that there was something really unusual going on," Caldwell said.

It wasn't long ago, just before the accelerated expansion was discovered, that many cosmologists believed the universe might reverse course, that normal gravity would win, and that everything would fall back in a Big Crunch. More recently, solid observational data has all but assured the infinite-expansion model and the cold, dark, never-ending end.

The Caldwell group decided there might be a third possibility, leading to their new paper, which has been submitted to the Physical Review.

But there are many unknowns. It is not clear if the dark energy driving expansion is a force not currently described by physics, or if it is merely a different manifestation of gravity over huge distances. The repulsion could be a response to dark matter, unseen stuff that is known to comprise 23 percent of the universe, based on firm observations.

Dark matter has unknown properties, and it may be related to dark energy, Caldwell said. He notes that even Einstein considered that gravity might work repulsively, in a manner consistent with his theory of general relativity.

Dark energy, being quantified only recently, tends to be discussed as some strange new force, in addition to the four fundamental forces: gravity, electromagnetism, and the strong and weak nuclear forces that govern atoms. But the repulsion is possibly just the way gravity behaves in the presence of dark energy, Caldwell said. In that sense, it is not a new force.

Cautious reception

To turn dark energy into destructive phantom energy, Caldwell and his colleagues had to play around with a thing called the cosmological constant, a mathematical fix that Einstein applied to general relativity. Einstein later called it his greatest mistake, when Edwin Hubble found in the 1920s that the universe was expanding (seven decades later, that expansion would be seen accelerating).

The cosmological constant has been recently revived. Attempts to describe dark energy differ in how the density of dark energy varies with time. In some models, the density decreases slowly. For the cosmological constant, the density is a constant. For phantom energy, it must grow with time. "We considered a more exotic form of dark energy which was more repulsive," as Caldwell explains is.

Abraham Loeb, a theoretician at the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics, has quantified the lonely effects of a forever-expanding universe. Loeb stands by that scenario, but he said Caldwell's idea is nonetheless interesting to explore.

"I think it's a logical possibility," Loeb told SPACE.com. But he cautioned that altering the cosmological constant goes against current consensus.

"If I had to place a bet, I would bet in favor of the standard cosmological constant," Loeb said.

Sci-fi to reality

If Caldwell's team is right, cosmology would undergo a revolution. Sci-fi ideas like wormholes and time travel might suddenly enter the realm of hard science. All of this could sort itself out pretty soon, Caldwell believes. Observations over the next few years may actually show whether his phantom energy is possible.

"Who knows if it is right or wrong," Caldwell said of his theory. "I think we'll find out pretty soon."

In fact, recent observations from NASA's WMAP space probe have pinned down the physics of the universe with surprising accuracy. A little wiggle room remains for the cosmological constant. Yet more WMAP data are expected over the next four years. Other missions, including one called the Supernova Acceleration Probe (SNAP), could provide answers, Caldwell said.

Even if the Big Rip is a big bust, there's no guarantee of a pleasant ending.

Alternate final chapter

Paul Steinhardt, a Princeton University physicist, is, like Caldwell and Loeb, no stranger to strange ideas. Steinhardt advocates a cyclical universe, one that has no beginning or end but which instead is constantly starting over again.

Steinhardt theorizes within the generally accepted standards of the cosmological constant. He said the Big Rip is more exotic than most ideas but still conceivable, a projected possible result that is "straightforward and obvious for cosmologists."

Yet there is another entirely different possibility for the final moments of time as we know it.

In a theory put forth two years ago by Steinhardt and his colleagues, our universe is but a membrane, or brane, floating in a five-dimensional space. It is destined to collide dramatically with another brane. The idea, labeled the Ekpyrotic Universe, would replace portions of the Big Bang scenario while sticking to the presently accepted estimates of acceleration.

"Lest you get too optimistic, galaxies are destroyed in a far more violent way," Steinhardt said of the brane scenario. "They are vaporized at the next 'bang' -- the collision between branes ... so, you either rip them apart or you vaporize them."

By Robert Roy Britt
Senior Science Write, www.space.com

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1302(1/20/04 1:44 am)Reply                                                                                  | Re: --- <hr/> Well, it is pretty, and I like that. The colliding membranes are great as well. Wouldn't you like to watch? I do remember reading this, but I had of course forgotten it : ) When the rest of the galaxies disappear, the Christians should be happy.                                                                                                                                                                           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2102(1/20/04 11:26 am)Reply                                                                                      | --- <hr/> I am from today supposed to work for the dole! I will not! I can now choose the life of a hermit in the bush, or a life of crime, neither of which I would be particularly good at!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 891(1/20/04 11:39 am)Reply  | Re: --- <hr/> Crime's got all the pros though. But you would be too confounding a master criminal/Ubervillain. &lt;Insert 007 style Zag-as-master-criminal-and-being-confounding scenario here. Maybe have him being stroked by a huge white cat or something.&gt;                                                                                                                                                                            |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1305(1/20/04 11:45 am)Reply                                                                                 | Re: --- <hr/> ----- Let it remain enough for you that I am correct. About my becoming a bartender, I do not like the smell of stale beer enough. ----- Oh, I forgot arrogant. Look, the beer isn't stale most of the time. What kind of dole do you get? In america, the dole is pretty small, almost impossible to live on unless you have some sort of housing break. You could work maybe 3 nights a week and still live OK. |

|                                                                         |                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2102(1/20/04 1:34 pm)Reply | -----<hr/> Mori malo quam servus esse |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|

Page 1 2

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

Email This To a Friend

Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

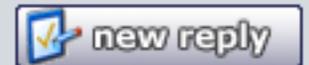

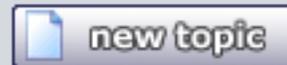

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2182(2/12/04 9:40 am)Reply  | Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics <hr/> Hello everyone, There is a common perception at the moment that quantum mechanics "demonstrates" events happen without cause in the sub-atomic realm. It is a view regularly expressed on this forum by the followers of science, or more accurately, by those who like to read popular books on science. I thought it would be interesting to travel around some physics forums and ask serious observers of quantum theory what they think. The results were very interesting. Almost no one agreed with the idea that events happen without cause in the quantum realms. Most believed this constituted a gross misunderstanding of quantum theory. They believed that while things are "indeterministic" in the quantum realms in terms of our ability to predict events, the quantum realm is nevertheless fully causal. This is exactly what Kevin, Dan and I have been arguing for years. The first post I sent into these forums was this: Quote: <hr/> I was wondering if an expert in quantum physics can clarify a couple of things for me. I read this in the Wikipedia: Interpretation of Quantum Mechanics: |

Quantum mechanics is a physical theory which is extremely non-intuitive. The equations have been very successful in predicting experimental results, but there have been a wide range of interpretations of what those equations mean.

The need for a large range of interpretations of quantum mechanics becomes clearer once it is mathematically demonstrated that no quantum theory can have all of the properties one would like quantum mechanics to have.

One intuitively would like a theory of quantum mechanics

- that is complete and not requiring any outside theory

- that is local in that the events at one point are only effected by nearby areas

- that is deterministic which is that given one set of circumstances, there is only one possible outcome

- that has no hidden variables

- that predicts only one universe

However, Bell's theorem appears to prevent quantum mechanics from having all of these properties. Which property is removed results in different interpretations of quantum mechanics.

This seems to suggest that are at least five different interpretations of quantum mechanics, each one the result of eliminating one of the five properties listed above.

My questions:

(a) Do any of these interpretations conflict with what is physically observed in the quantum realm?

(b) Do any of these interpretations hinder the practical application of the theory and its equations?

---

In every forum, the standard response to both questions was "no". It doesn't matter what interpretation you adopt from the five listed above, the practical application of quantum theory remains unaffected. Indeed, the majority of respondents thought that quantum mechanics shouldn't be interpreted at all, that physicists should just "shut up and calculate".

I then asked them this:

Quote:

---

If that is the case, then why has the "Copenhagen interpretation" - which removes the 3rd property listed above - gained currency in the scientific and non-scientific communities?

This is particularly strange, given that the removal of the 1st property (that QM is complete and not requiring any outside theory) would seem the most reasonable thing to do. The fact that physicists have chosen to reject determinism in the quantum realm, instead of accepting that QM is an incomplete theory, seems incomprehensible to me.

Can you explain this?

---

Here are some of the responses from a couple of the more intelligent forums:

--

The Copenhagen interpretation is a kind of pretense that physicists had adopted so they can stop calculating useful things for a while and discuss it with people that aren't interested in the math. The Copenhagen interpretation was an early effort, I think it was the first attempt to interpret the theory, and you'll find a lot of dissatisfaction with it. The whole "collapse of the wavefunction" thing and the role of the conscious observer, in my opinion, comes from a misguided effort to consider an observer to not be a quantum system.

Gregory L. Hanson (Science Forum)

--

The interpretations are attempts to express QM, to some degree, in terms of things with which we are familiar. Some people find that this helps them get a feel for the subject. However, when physicists were polled on which interpretation they preferred, the 'shut-up-and-calculate' interpretation came top.

In other words the results of QM are so weird that attempts to express them in terms of everyday experience fail, or at least lead to bizarre situations. Of course these are always useful for adding dramatic appeal to the subject.

Martin Hogbin (Science Forum)

--

If all you want to do is use QM to solve a particular problem then you do the "shut up and calculate" thing. But that is not very helpful if you want to have science progress and see if there is something more fundamental than QM. The mind is a wonderful thing in that we can imagine all kinds of scenarios. And imaginative scenarios based on past history can be very powerful. A basic mindset right now is that of "turtles all the way down". If we find something more fundamental to QM then what is more fundamental to that? So why not just stop somewhere and call it quits since we can calculate many useful things. Quantum field theory is that spot for right now. But eventually our knowledge will progress to the point of realizing something more fundamental than QM. It is just a matter of time really.

FrediFizzx (Science Forum)

--

I question the "need" for interpretations. It is not a duty of a theory to be "interpretable". Its only function is to be able to produce reliably correct answers to questions put to it. Besides, what does it mean to "interpret" a theory? To crudely reword it in terms of what the state of our intuition requires at the moment? Why bother, apart from the intellectual pleasure it gives some to venture into metaphysics.

Franz Heymann (Science Forum)

--

If you could lay hand on a copy of a book by Franco Selleri that was prefaced by Karl Popper, you would get a rather clean explanation about this.

I suppose it has been translated to English, but my own copy is in French and it's the only title I can refer you to:

"Le grand débat de la théorie quantique", by Franco Selleri.

As you may gather, the possible English title could very well turn out to be "The Great Debate of Quantum Theory", but who knows!

Of course there are as many opinions on this as there are authors, as I observed as I went through quite a few of them, but Selleri's account seems quite objective and thorough.

Although there is talk and rationalization about many interpretations, they all boil down to either causalist or non-causalist, all non-causalists on last analysis turning out to be plain and simple followers of the Copenhagen school of thought.

What seems to have happened is this:

The most famous causalists (Einstein, Planck, Schrödinger, de Broglie, et al.) believed that fundamental objective reality, that underlies the theories that we elaborate about it, is not chaotic and obeys logical laws that can be identified and understood, while the Copenhagen-Göttingen school of thought headed by Bohr, Eisenberg, et al. believed that there exists no fundamental reality beyond what Quantum Mechanics can describe.

A strange turn of history seems to be responsible for the debate to eventually die down, even before Einstein passed away, for lack of fighters on the causalist side. Arnold Sommerfeld for example, a major original proponent of the Copenhagen view, was so viscerally opposed to it, that he apparently taught for an extended period of his career only the Copenhagen view to group after group of students.

He was thus almost single handedly, at the origin of a complete generation of eminent professors who had apparently only superficially glanced at the other side of the coin and who concluded, with no reason other than the conviction of their eminent teacher that the idea was worthless, which translated into the causalists views and theories to progressively cease being referred to in textbooks and thus came to not even be minimally explained to students of the following generations.

The non-causalist ball had started rolling and is still in full swing.

Today, physicists are unknowingly trained from the start as Copenhagenists in almost all colleges and universities without really being made aware of the fact, and if they never personally question their own philosophical orientation with respect to reality, naturally tend to not even become aware that they are.

No reference book expounds anymore on the causalist viewpoint beyond a few well known traditional showcases, like the EPR experiment for example, which have simply become traditional causalists scapegoats to be flogged in public, presumably because it simply is not possible to completely disregard the major contribution of causalist scientists.

In fact, so little consideration has come to be afforded to causalists' opinions at the international level, that despite his immense stature as the last remaining major architect of modern physics, Louis de Broglie's, last book seems not to even have been translated to English, although he possibly was the keenest mind on electromagnetism of the 20th century!

From my analysis, the wide acceptance of the non-causalist option finds its roots in the copenhagenist philosophy which involves the acceptance of irrational premises as an integral part of Quantum Mechanics, which in turn seems to make it easier for the promoters to more readily accept other irrational explanations to rationalize every observation that does not logically fit accepted theories, which seems to satisfy them sufficiently for them to consider searching for other explanations a waste of time.

In other words, indeterminism simply is the easy way out.

Doesn't everybody love magic? :-]

Regards

André Michaud (sci.physics.particle)

--

I believe that is not the only reason. The "underlying" reason is that in doctoral programs excellence in philosophy has been entirely and without second thought divorced from the requirements to obtain a PhD degree. Today, we educate science automatons, not scientists and for that unphilosophical unconscious drones of today's "big and glorious science" are sufficient.

Otherwise, a moderate physicist who had had a fleeting glance of philosophy of mind would have known that statistical behavior might not be primarily caused by a fundamental existence of randomness. Fortunately, the school of Leibniz has been revived and through works of digital physicists we are seeing a formidable alternative to the Copenhagen interpretation!

Regards,

Eray (sci.physics.particle)

--

As I recall the Copenhagen interpretation evolved out of Bohr's desire to present a unified interpretation to the world, and Heisenberg's regard for his old teacher, together with a few bits from other contributors. I think it was most accurately described in sci.physics as a sort of Danish Smorgasbord, from which you take the bits you like.

Bohr's central contribution seems to have been the notion of complementarity, the idea that something can be both wave and particle, and that we only seen a part of its nature in any type of experiment. This idea has itself been taken to mean different things by different people but is widely subscribed, particularly in , and is probably at the centre of most of the "crackpot" arguments about quantum mechanics on sci.physics. From my general reading I have become convinced that Heisenberg did not subscribe to complementarity, but I regret that I have not read any of Heisenberg's own writings, and am about to correct this by getting one of his books from Amazon. From what I do know of his discussion of uncertainty, I think it was pretty on the ball, and lead into the Dirac interpretation and indeed to my own understanding of uncertainty - namely that the (crisp) position of an object cannot be defined or discussed except relative to other matter, and since the (crisp) position of other matter equally cannot be defined or discussed except relative to still other matter, any definition of position in classical (two valued) logic is bound to degenerate into recursive argument.

If Heisenberg was not 100% clear, either in his own mind or to his readers about this discussion, I think the reason is that he was struggling with these ideas for the first time in history. Moreover many valued logic was in its infancy, and there was no way that Heisenberg could distinguish crisp from unclear statements, and this stuff is extremely difficult to talk about if one is restricted to making statements in crisp logic (classical or two valued logic, in which every statement is either absolutely true or absolutely false).

Regards

Charles Francis (sci.physics.particle)

--

DQ: I've been repeatedly told, by scientists and non-scientists alike, that quantum physics has proven that things arise without cause in the quantum realm. Now I find that this is not true at all. It is just one particular interpretation that has been adopted by the physics community at the expense of rejecting the commonsense view that QM is an incomplete theory. I find this extraordinary.

Franz Heymann: That is horse dung. Whoever told you that did not know his arse from his elbow. QM is fully causal, but not fully deterministic.

(Science Forum)

--

I think the main reason that the Copenhagen interpretation has been the preferred one is that it was the first, and most people will stubbornly cling to the earliest version of a theory, especially when later versions supply no additional working predictions, and so maintain the same old physical content.

I also think that the notion of non-determinism in QM has been overstated. So you can't predict with certainty how a system will evolve in phase space, but we should not be too concerned about that. The quantum realm has its own set of rules and we have to live with them. Certainly, the wave function evolves in a deterministic way in its own space. If you look at it that way, I think you can take a lot of the mystery out of the theory . . . . .

André Michaud (sci.physics.particle)

--

All through history, self appointed "judges" of political correctness of potential discoveries (today they name themselves "peer review panels") have granted themselves the right to accept or refuse publication of potentially promising papers based strictly on their own understanding of the subjects. Understanding that can certainly be questioned if the premises of the papers proposed were currently unpopular.

As far back as the beginning of the 20th century, Poincaré himself considered that they were not wrong in doing so and that they ran no risk of smothering any serious discovery, for, as he explains: « If you had asked academics [regarding this], they would have answered: "We have compared the probability that an unknown scientist had found what we have been looking for in vain for so long, to that of there being one more fool on the Earth, the second would have appeared greater" .

Paradoxically, to explain the reluctance of academics to consider any new idea and their recurring belief that all has already been discovered, Poincaré wrote in the same book: "Each of us carries within himself his own conception of the world, which he cannot so easily dismiss." ; which, of course, is a psychological problem that affects all humans and has nothing whatsoever to do with science.

After having invested years of their life becoming comfortable with Minkowski's 4-dimensional space geometry, Special Relativity, General Relativity, Quantum Mechanics and QED, fledgling physicists then tend subscribe to them for good.

They are afterwards very unlikely to ever risk again losing intellectual footing by reconsidering the whole structure, including the premises.

Unfortunately, despite the importance of the remaining problems, orthodox theories always seem too satisfactory, and life too short, for them to consider investing even part of their precious remaining time and required effort in looking for potentially more appropriate alternatives at the fundamental level.

To them, reconsidering fundamental space geometry, for example, or trying to explore where would lead the idea that electron spin could be due to pulsating instead of spinning, seem like useless extreme mindbenders, or quite wrongly feel inadequate to deal with such re-questioning, even if it could potentially cause our theories to evolve towards solving the remaining problems.

Peer pressure to conform to the norm is also a major extinguisher of personal initiatives.

André Michaud (sci.physics.particle)

--

Contrary to the common perception quantum mechanics becomes intuitive when you grasp the difference between a fluid-like quantity and a quantized quantity.

Be that your wife/girlfriend/concubine acts very different to your idea of 'the women'. The fact that you may or may not *** at a certain time is also expressed by a probability.

Company owners /CEOs who consider their mass of workers as fluid are overlooking that few key persons at the right places decide over success or failure of a project.

Rene Tschaggelar (Science Forum)

--

If you look and dig long enough, you will eventually come to the conclusion that under the thick cloak of flashy mathematics that fill so much space in so many physics papers and books, the real stuff is not increasing in complexity, and the complexity of the math cover often simply is an indication of the circuitous way that the author used to get at some minute side detail of the main subject.

André Michaud (sci.physics.particle)

--

FreddiFizz: If all you want to do is use QM to solve a particular problem then you do the "shut up and calculate" thing. But that is not very helpful if you want to have science progress and see if there is something more fundamental than QM. The mind is a wonderful thing in that we can imagine all kinds of scenarios. And imaginative scenarios based on past history can be very powerful. A basic mindset right now is that of "turtles all the way down". If we find something more fundamental to QM then what is more fundamental to that? So why not just stop somewhere and call it quits since we can calculate many useful things. Quantum field theory is that spot for right now. But eventually our knowledge will progress to the point of realizing something more fundamental than QM. It is just a matter of time really.

DQ: You seem to be saying that the "Copenhagen interpretation" is a kind of pretense that physicists have adopted so that they can stop for awhile and calculate many useful things. Is that correct?

If so, it raises another couple of interesting questions:

- Why do physicists need to create a pretence in order to "stop for a while"? Why can't they just stop for a while (in the knowledge that QM is a transient, incomplete theory) and get on with their calculations? Why all this extral bullshit?

Franz Heymann: Physicists generally speaking *don't* concern themselves with what you (rightly) call this extra bullshit. They get on with their experiments and their calculations. It is the folk who are concerned with the philosophy of science who bother with "interpretations". In that respect they do not indulge in physics, but in metaphysics.

DQ: - And secondly, if they had known all along that the "Copenhagen interpretation" is merely a pretense, a kind of metaphysical tool of convenience, then why has indeterminism been presented to the general public for the past eight decades as though it were a firm philosophic truth?

FH: That is a good question. Probably because pop science writers have a good nose for what makes exciting reading, and because religious proselytisers rather fancy the idea that there is a god somewhere who pulls strings in the background and manipulates the uncertainties.

DQ: Why do I feel like I've been lied to by the physics community?

FH: You have been lied to by the *metaphysics* community. You would be quite safe to disregard all they have to say.

The Copenhagen interpretation is not physics. Physics would progress in its merry way whether the Copenhagen interpretation is true or false. The interpretation of a theory is itself a set of philosophical statements about a theory. As such it is *metaphysics*.

(Science Forum)

-----

Science Forum

sci.physics.particle

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 944
(2/13/04 9:32 am)
Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

Interesting David.

What do you suggest this data which you have gathered shows us?

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 84
(2/13/04 11:46 am)
Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

It's the same Ultimate Rationalization, David. Debunk science as merely "popular" when it does not subscribe to your UR...but go looking for those more "sophisticated" scientists who...well...sort of do.

Like all psuedo-intellectual approaches your whole agenda revolves, by and large, around seeing what you believe. In my view, you're the philosophical equivalent of a confidence man. Sucker in the benighted minds with arcane, jargonological "analysis" and play on their psychological yearning for the TOE. I mean, if you can con yourself into embracing The Truth how hard can it be to play the grifter around others?

But over and again the same refusal to integrate the Definitions and Concepts into anything resembling actual human interactions. You don't because you can't.

But you have far too much invested in it now to ever back away, right? So you weld the blinders on all the more and go out looking for more facts to hammer into the theory. And since you don't really situate your ideas in anything other than more ideas...no one can really refute what you say because, push coming to shove, you are not really saying anything SUBSTANTIAL at all. It's all just about What Words Mean. And we can make mere words mean pretty much whatever we want them to, can't we?

Biggie

drowden

Forum Host

Posts: 1639

(2/13/04 12:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

How does wanting to put something into proper perspective constitute an attempt to "debunk"?

Dan Rowden

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2184

(2/13/04 2:47 pm)

Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

Dave Toast wrote:

Quote:

---

Interesting David.

What do you suggest this data which you have gathered shows us?

---

At the very least, it shows us that the "proof" of non-causality in the quantum realm, as preached by Thomas Knierim and Natyryl and company, is groundless, as it is based on an irrational interpretation of QM.

Secondly, it shows us that most physicists don't care if they are being irrational in a philosophic sense. When faced with a choice between rejecting the concept of causality or rejecting the idea that QM is a complete theory, the mainstream physics community has, for decades, chosen the former - which, to my mind, is an action so incredible that it is beyond belief. I can only put it down to the fact that physicists simply do not care whether they are being rational or irrational in a larger sense, beyond their work.

Thirdly, it shows us that we cannot trust scientists in anything they say about their work. We can trust them to do the experiments and the maths, but as soon as they step outside of this realm and begin to philosophically interpret their work, we should be extremely wary.

chaosrambler
Registered User
Posts: 11
(2/14/04 1:10 am)
Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

Hmm...this is really none of my business and I'm not anybody around here... but I disagree with your post.

For one thing, I don't know if it is normal practice to deride somebody like you did while (seemingly) not providing any useful criticism.

Anyway, I disagree with your assessment that DQ is trying to debunk science. On the contrary it seems to me that he was seeking understanding/clarification of the definition/theory of QM, and that is what he got.

DQ's post here is very interesting and I take it as educational about the trappings of QM and it's followers.

So then he went on to say that one should be "wary". Well that is true of any theory or science that mankind studies, and for that matter, anything of mankind period. Nothing new. If you aren't wary then you aren't questioning the "facts" that have been fed to you. There is a place for blind faith and it is not in science (though I have to admit there is a lot of faith necessary to believe in science, but to me it is about pursuing ways to replace the faith with real experiences). Anyway, that is just how I see it from my little hole.

Ok I'm done rambling...

Thanks for the post DQ.

Biggier
Registered User
Posts: 85
(2/14/04 1:30 am)
Reply

Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics

---

Dan,

I don't have a problem with the substance of David's post. I thought it was quite interesting and it makes points I agree with myself. The question of cause and effect and QM is hardly an either/or perspective. There is still much debate raging in and out of the field about its implications for human interactions on more macrocosmic levels.

What I was reacting to, instead, is what I perceive to be his hypocritical stance regarding science. I have broached the subject of science with him in other posts. Generally, his attitude towards science IS to debunk it when the conjectures offered are not to his liking. When I suggested, for example, that he take his UR to a group of scientists to validate its premises he was quite disdainful of what he calls "popular science".

|                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                       | Now he goes out and finds scientists who are saying things that seem to lend credence to his own speculations. THESE scientists are really swell folks, it seems. That's hypocrisy. Biggie                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| BiggierRegistered UserPosts: 86(2/14/04 1:41 am)Reply      | Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics <hr/> Chaos, The GF is advertized as "the thinking man's minefield". Polemics abound. I love polemics and I genuinely appreciate the fact that David allows it in his venue. Try it in other venues [like the Ponderer's Guild] and you will be promptly warned...and then kicked out of the discussions if you persist. This is not a criticism of the PG, however. Different strokes for different folks I always say. Polemics is defined by Websters as "the ART of disputation". My "attacks" are never meant to be personal. I have, in fact, explained this previously in here. The idea is to tweak exceptional minds because they will tweak yours right back. That, in fact, is the challenge inherently embedded in polemics. If I did not have respect for David's mind [though I disagree with his views consdierably] I would not waste my time probing and critiquing them. Biggie |
| chaosramblerRegistered UserPosts: 12(2/14/04 2:38 am)Reply | Re: Interpretations of Quantum Mechanics <hr/> I suppose it has to do with the way that I perceive the post, perhaps I'm adding my own "tone" to it. The derision I perceived was probably of my own fabrication. I need to remind myself not to post in hasty emotion and continue to be the lurking observer that I should be. Old habits from time spent in forums that have a more childish leaning to them. I certainly don't consider myself to have an exceptional mind, especially in the sense that is useful here. And here I am again adding useless fodder to an otherwise interesting post. I'm just like a little kid that wants to jump in the conversation but has nothing to say! Crikey.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

Lbartoli
Registered User
Posts: 369
(2/14/04 12:42 pm)
Reply

QM

---

Quote:
Interesting David.

What do you suggest this data which you have gathered shows us?
-----

DQ:

At the very least, it shows us that the "proof" of non-causality in the quantum realm, as preached by Thomas Knierim and Naturyl and company, is groundless, as it is based on an irrational interpretation of QM.

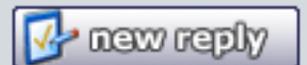

Secondly, it shows us that most physicists don't care if they are being irrational in a philosophic sense. When faced with a choice between rejecting the concept of causality or rejecting the idea that QM is a complete theory, the mainstream physics community has, for decades, chosen the former - which, to my mind, is an action so incredible that it is beyond belief. I can only put it down to the fact that physicists simply do not care whether they are being rational or irrational in a larger sense, beyond their work.

LB: Perhaps they're not sure whether it's a complete theory or not, and don't wish to exclude this possibility.

??/Leo

Thirdly, it shows us that we cannot trust scientists in anything they say about their work. We can trust them to do the experiments and the maths, but as soon as they step outside of this realm and begin to philosophically interpret their work, we should be extremely wary.

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Interview with philosopher on Weininger

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

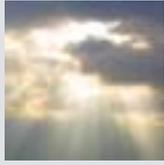

| Author                                                                                                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| G ShantzRegistered UserPosts: 433(2/26/04 2:20 am)Reply | Interview with philosopher on Weininger<hr/> Allan Janik on Weininger's Viennahttp://www.eurozine.com/article/2003-10-06-janik-en.html |
| voce ioRegistered UserPosts: 745(2/26/04 3:00 am)Reply  | Re: Interview with philosopher on Weininger<hr/> Thank you.                                                                                                                                                       |

MGregory

Posts: 484

(3/7/04 11:35 am)

Reply

My favorite quote

---

Quote:

---

[Weininger] emphasizes that the ability to see the world correctly is an act of will; it is not the result of a line of reasoning. To be able to think differently one must live differently.

---

Well, it was almost good. Does that count? I would argue that it is the result of a line of reasoning, just one that won't be found without living it.

MGregory

Posts: 485

(3/7/04 5:14 pm)

Reply

Re: My favorite quote

---

Quote:

---

To be able to think differently one must live differently.

---

Make yourself.

avidaloca

Registered User

Posts: 152

(3/7/04 11:24 pm)

Reply

Re: Weininger and Anti-Semitism

---

From the article:

Quote:

---

To cut a long story very short: Weininger is difficult to categorize, though if one doesn't think too much about it, he comes through as a "bad guy". Some people delight in having ready to hand someone at whom they can point an accusing finger and make a scapegoat. But it's not that simple. It is fatal to believe that whenever people say something derogatory about Jews, Judaism or Jewishness, they are Nazis. The history of Judenfeindschaft, animosity towards Jews, is extremely complicated, but it need not be equated with fanatical anti-Semitism. On the contrary, it was a stance taken by assimilated Jews themselves, who were prone to self-criticism. It found expression as internal Jewish polemics and politics, and became known as "self-hatred". The fact that Weininger overstated his view should not overshadow the fact that he clearly pointed out in his book that he was himself a Jew. This in turn indicates that his criticism was at heart affirmation of a strongly assimilated Jewish identity. Viewed in this light, Weininger gives expression, in a representative manner, to moral values that were typical of assimilated Jews in his day even if their rhetorical expression was exaggerated. We can see that in the perspective of the time, though not later, and most certainly not after 1945. It is easy to forget that both the success of women's lib and the nightmare of Nazism are phenomena that Weininger did not live long enough to see. But he was, at least, prescient enough to foresee and reject misogynous and anti-Semitic interpretations of his writings. The result is that, although it may be politically correct, in endeavouring to expose with the aid of present-day concepts of enlightened values what we see as his prejudices, we are just as pathetic, intellectually speaking, as we accuse Weininger of being.

---

Without a doubt. But is there a high-priest of political correctness out there who will disagree?

wounded bird

Posts: 9

(3/8/04 1:22 pm)

Reply

my take...

---

“The central proposition in Weininger's Geschlecht und Charakter is that sexuality is never morally legitimate, not even within marriage, as sex always entails treating oneself or some other person as a source of pleasure or means of satisfying one's desire, and not as an object in itself. For that reason, to be a rational, moral person, to act in accordance with one's duty, one needs must lead a lonely, loveless life - a life which one must not only see through to the end but also embrace as the very meaning of existence on earth. "Man is alone in the universe, in an infinite, eternal solitude," Weininger writes. "No one in fin-de-siècle Vienna is further removed from modern tastes, moral values and intellectual trends than Weininger," says Allan Janik. This we understand when we consider Weininger's tone and substance. He claims that an elevated mental life is linked to "masculine" qualities, whereas the "feminine" can be reduced to sexuality. There is also this: "Both Jew and Woman lack personality." Weininger's opinions were hotly debated in Norway, among others by Hulda Garborg in his book Kvinden skabt af Manden (Woman Created by Man).”

I suppose that if we look at the strict biblical scenario, one created so many years after the fact that it is beyond legitimacy but for purpose of argument woman was created for man, to reduce his loneliness. She was allegedly created from man, which would defy Weininger’s first argument as the man would, in essence, be loving himself, his other part, given that a man finds his mate and the two remain together forever. Unless a man is genetically incapable of having biological needs, he is not complete until he does. To live as such does not make man any less rational, less moral or less inclined to one’s duty, however, monk-like seclusion from the world could perhaps allow a man more freedom to think. I do not think that a monk is any less or more of a man than one who chooses to marry.

I would not go so far as to say that a woman’s qualities are reduced “strictly” to sexuality as neither a man’s qualities are elevated to “strictly” intellectual functions, for in my lifetime I have heard stories abounding and know of facts where the wife/woman is the intellectual and the husband/man is the “stay at home mom”. However, he may be meaning masculine and feminine in a different light than man and woman, but defining traits as in the sacred, but I think I'm giving him too much credit.

A further argument is that not all men are intellectuals and desire to be squirreled away alone to sit and ponder the universe. I believe you can also find numerous men that would disagree with sexuality being a “reduction” and intellect an “elevation”.

I would say that a woman’s viewpoint, which may not always be in the same realm as a “masculine” viewpoint, offers insight into another area that perhaps the man did not see, the "feminine" angle. This is especially true in dealing with people where emotions are involved...in other words, men can be callous and trite at times, especially those who don’t want to be bothered with trying to socialize with the masses, as it were.

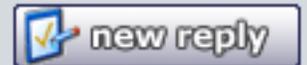

But then again, we were warned of Weininger’s caustic opinions. It is interesting to note that Weininger is the son of wealthy aristocrats. He was highly intelligent and got into trouble at school so he invented his own lessons. A master at many languages but also very depressed and had suicidal tendencies, until one day when his work was not well received, he shot himself.

I cannot fault the man and his genius regardless of how some of his ideas were misplaced and harmful, but men of this type can be trite. It seems the smarter they are the more socially inept. The following is, to me, the most important of all the rest of the verbage written in the article, and it needs no further comment from me. It is what it is:

“The idea that there is a limit to the self can be traced to Weininger's influence on Wittgenstein - to his contention that it is necessary to accept the world as a limited whole. The distinction between saying and proving has its philosophical roots in Goethe, Boltzmann and, to some extent, Schopenhauer. But it was Weininger who convinced Wittgenstein that this difference is of moral significance, that it is not only a question of theoretical learning but one of character. He emphasizes that the ability to see the world correctly is an act of will; it is not the result of a line of reasoning. To be able to think differently one must live differently.”

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

Click to receive email notification of replies

Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                        | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 77(2/27/04 6:48 pm)Reply |  Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof <hr/> I have been reading the book by 'Dr. J. J. van der Leeuw' that Leo has been advocating and came across this - it says basically that intuition is the main tool in recognising truth. I happen to agree but many don't, of course! Sorry for the long post but I thought this piece was rather good and would appreciate any feed-back. John INTUITIVE KNOWLEDGE AND LOGICAL PROOF There are two fallacies which at this stage we must face the fallacy of logical proof leading to truth, and the fallacy that the intuition had no part to play in the truth thus revealed. The logical method of exposition of any doctrine or theory is one in which each statement follows from the previous one in such a way that what is said in the later statement is contained in principle in the previous ones and nothing new is introduced without being properly linked up. Logic as such, with all its rules and principle in the previous ones and nothing new is introduced without being properly linked up. Logic as such, with all its rules and principles, is obedience to a law of mental cause and effect, the entire chain of reasoning being causally connected with certain premises or axiomata, which are thus worked out logically. Logic is the method of the intellect, it is intellectual technique and in itself always unproductive. It is essential, for without it we cannot explain to our ordinary consciousness the | truth which the intuition may have seen, but logic never brings forth truth by its own power.

Mathematical reasoning is perhaps the purest example of the logical method; yet in mathematics nothing new is produced as truth and the conclusions to which we come are contained in the principles or axiomata from which we started, even though we may not recognize them there. These axiomata themselves are self-evident to us; we do not feel that they need proving and recognize them intuitively. Thus all mathematical proof is based on principles which cannot be proved and, since, when working on a mathematical problem we never contribute anything new, but rather develop in a process of argumentation certain conclusions from our principles, these conclusions ultimately rest on the intuition which accepted without proof the truth of the axiomata. Hence, if we accept different axiomata as true our mathematics and our conclusions are correspondingly different. Of this the new mathematics presents many examples and its conclusions are necessarily different from those of the Euclidian mathematics and the classical mechanics based on the latter. Hence also the difference between the new physics, based on the new mathematics, and the older physics.

As it is in mathematics so it is also in philosophy according to the principles from which we start and which we assume as self-evident we reach certain conclusions which appear to be logically true, but which in reality are already conceived in the principles from which we started and which we recognized intuitively. Thus, in philosophy too, logic is the method of exposition and as such exceedingly valuable, but it does not lead to truth or produce truth; it is only the intuition which recognizes truth.

We have a craving to see our favourite beliefs logically proved; in fact, most of us are addicted to proof, it is for us the hallmark of intellectual respectability. A doctrine presented to us without proof is as a stranger without papers or introductions; we look at him askance and can hardly bring ourselves to accept him at his own value as a human being. He too must be 'proved' for us, he must be linked up in the chain of known quantities of which our conventional life is composed. A doctrine or truth, presenting itself without proof on the bare value of its own nobility it is disturbing a factor to the majority of men as would be the stranger without name or country. We are afraid of it; it is to us as an invasion from an unknown world. And such it is, it is an invasion from another world, from the only real world, the world of Reality; it is the vision of truth, or intuition, which, in that world, knows with lightning-like rapidity and with immediate certainty and which flashes down its message of truth into the dullness of our illusion-bound intellect. The intellect stands bewildered at such a visitation from on high. It is as if a God from high Olympus descended into a suburban drawing-room; consternation and a helpless impotence in the face of the unknown would follow. We should be afraid of the naked stranger who, from the world of divinity, descended in our midst and hurriedly clothe him in the garments of respectability and usher him into the world of convention as our cousin from abroad. Thus he is linked up with our conventional world, he is somebody's son, he has a name and a country.

In the same surreptitious way does our bewildered intellect clothe the visiting stranger from on high—Intuition. When the intuition flashes down into our comfortable and well-ordered world of logic he is hurriedly clothed in the garments of logic before our neighbours have seen him and he is introduced to the expectant world as the logical offspring of premises well known to them. Then, and then alone, do we feel that we can safely accept him and shall not be compromised by our association with divinity.

There is not a philosophy of importance that has not known such visitation from on high, that is not rooted in revelation. When we read the lives or letters of great philosophers we find how in their youth, perhaps for many years, they thought about the problems of life, they felt the hunger, the yearning to know, they knew the craving for truth, and with every atom of their being strained towards the unknown. For years they read and studied, if not in the books of men than in the Book of Life, they gathered the raw material out of which the creative mind might build its structure. But the moment came for all of them that, for a brief moment, the veil was lifted and they had their revelation, they experienced living truth. Does not Nietzsche tell us how, when he walked in the woods of Sils-Maris, the heavens opened and the world of truth spoke to him with no little voice? In such moments, often when the intellect is disengaged and dwells but lightly on life, the vision of the intuition breaks like a flash of lightning upon the darkness of our mental life and we know with utter certainty.

Thus, in the domain of science, there was the moment of illumination in Newton's life while he watched the fall of an apple and found what he had been searching for. No doubt his mind was not dwelling on great and weighty problems at the moment, possibly he was but remembering with contentment some small event of daily life and giving himself over to the serenity of the moment. But it is just in these rare silences of our busy lives that the intuition can speak to us; it is only when the illusion-bound intellect with its noisy self-assertion is quiet for a while that the voice of living truth can be heard. The moment of illumination may well be the outcome of years of mental search, calling forth, as it were, by induction a corresponding activity in the world of the Real, where the untrammelled mind sees the vision and speaks to the mind in prison. But it is always the flash of intuition that shows us the truth and co-ordinates our laboriously gathered intellectual material.

It would show a refreshing sincerity if, some day, we found ourselves able to acknowledge these children of ours, born of the vision of truth, without feeling the urge of respectability to provide them with a legitimate and inevitable outcome of logical reasoning. Instead of saying at the beginning of our exposition this have I seen, thus do I know we put on a false air of innocent ignorance and, after reasoning logically and profoundly through many hundreds of weighty pages, we bring forth as our conclusion the one thing at which we were aiming all the time and with well simulated surprise we stand amazed at the wonderful outcome of our logical reasoning. We have 'proved' our truth, no trace of the outlaw intuition can be found in our logical exposition; is it not clear that we started reasoning with an entirely unprejudiced mind and that our doctrine is the logical outcome of our intellectual penetration? We are like the conjurer who produces the rabbit out his top hat where he had it concealed all the time, yet it appears as the marvelous result of his magical passes and incantations. Thus our scientists and philosophers often sign their wearisome incantations through many heavy tomes and, like the conjurer, produce their little rabbit at the very end, whereas they had it in their pocket at the beginning of the first chapter.

It is very rare, even in science, that a discovery emerges from experiments which did not tend in that direction. Generally the intuition sees a possible explanation or theory and the experiments which afterwards prove it are but a testing out of the hypothesis or theory already present. Columbus knew that he would reach land sailing West and but proved it by his action.

Yet we must not ever disdain logical exposition and proof. They are valuable, they are essential for a full intellectual appreciation, but they are not productive. It is only when logic and proof claim that they have produced truth and proved that it cannot be otherwise, that we find quarrel with them, that it becomes necessary to put them into the humbler, though equally necessary, position which is theirs by nature. What we need to overcome is our unfounded suspicion of the intuition as the stranger from nowhere; we must begin to realize, especially in philosophy, that all man has ever thought of any worth in the history of philosophy, he has taught as the result of that inner and direct awareness of truth which we call intuition and not as the prodigious result of wearisome reasoning.

Oriental philosophy has never pretended that it obtained its results by logic and proof, but has ever plainly stated its doctrines, saying thus I know. In consequence treatises like the Bhagavad Gita or the Tao Te King consist of a number of aphorisms or philosophical axiomata which need to be thought and pondered over so that we may understand them fully in their context. A great advantage of this method of philosophizing is the extreme briefness of the books produced; compared to the ponderous tomes of Western philosophy the brief Eastern treatises are like a refreshing breath from heaven.

I do not know whether we should lose anything of real value by following their methods; as it is our logical reasoning, our proof and counter proof, never convince any one of a theory which he does not recognize within as true. A conclusive reasoning and apparently irrefutable proof may seem successful for the moment and leave us speechless and acquiescent, but when we come home we are as little convinced as we were before; all that has been gained was our temporary grudging assent for lack of a suitable counter argument. Hence the futility of debates; the nimbler wit and readier answer win the day rather than the greater wisdom.

It needs, however, the faculty of discerning and recognizing truth if we are to discriminate between living wisdom, even when coming to us in simple and unassuming garb, and a brilliant but empty intellectual scintillation, even though it appears in all the rich and ornate garments which clever argument and apt reply provide. There are but few in these days of worship of the intellect who are able to recognize the voice of the intuition, and yet, if the intuition is lacking, it cannot be replaced by the crutches of logic and argument.

To many the intuitive recognition of truth as the legitimate way to knowledge is associated with ideas of uncertainty and vagueness. They feel that when a doctrine is presented on the basis of logical argument and conclusive reasoning there is at least something to support it, and, even if the argument or logic may not quite prove the point, yet they provide us with a standard for our approval or condemnation. When, however, all that is presented to us is someone's intuition that this or that is right, how are we to distinguish between a right and a wrong intuition, and how are we to guard ourselves against error? But, how do we guard ourselves against error at present, while the intuition is but disguised by reasoning and so-called proof? In philosophy especially we should by now be accustomed to the fact that there is not a doctrine or theory that was not proved at one time as conclusively as it was disproved at another. In reality, when we come to analyze it, we find our judgment at present to be as much an intuitive one as it would be if the doctrine were presented to us on its face value without the pretence of proof. What happens now is that we need not fear to acknowledge our beliefs because they are clad in the respectable garments of logic. It is fear that holds us back, fear to let go the one support which our intellect knows, --argument and logical proof. As the intuition becomes more widely recognized as a legitimate path to knowledge, the uncertainty which at present accompanies its occasional visitations will disappear; a new organ or function will ever be uncertain in its initial workings. It may reassure us, however, to realize that the greatest teachers of all times have ever presented their conclusions on their inner worth as intuitions; we do not find a Christ or Buddha proving conclusively that what he says is right, or reasoning out logically his doctrines. They can disdain to use such make-belief of proof and yet they spoke as no man ever spoke, and the hundreds of millions who have followed them have found sufficient conviction in their words through the very spirit of truth and spoke through them. It is only when that spirit is absent that proof and logical reasoning must fill the gap and disguise the emptiness within.

Yet we should ever recognize the value of logical reasoning and intellectual proof as a technique of communicating to our fellow-men that which we know within. It enriches the doctrine we bring forward and links it up to all that is familiar and known to us, when it is presented, not as a naked fact, in the domain of science this will ever be the appropriate way of presenting a doctrine or truth, since there the experiment which corroborates the assertion constitutes the proof; in philosophy such experimental proof is but rarely, if ever, possible.

Edited by: John at: 2/27/04 6:49 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 823
(2/27/04 9:59 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Overall I agree with Leeuw says in this article. I have two objections, though:

(1) Leeuw says: "Logic is the method of the intellect, it is intellectual technique and in itself always unproductive," and later, "...in mathematics nothing new is produced as truth and the conclusions to which we come are contained in the principles or axiomata." I think that Leeuw is wrong about this. Pure logic has on many occasions led to quite astonishing new insights without the introduction of new premises. An example of this would be the discovery of the logical hole of the Cantor/Frege set theory by Russell/Zermelo, or the Einstein-Podolsky-Rosen paradox which started out as a theoretical thought experiment questioning quantum mechanics. When the EPR paradox was verified experimentally later, it caused quite an uproar. There are many more examples and I will gladly list them if you are curious. My point is that "logical pathways" are not always obvious. On the contrary; they can become extremely complex and difficult to see.

(2) Leeuw says: "Logic as such, with all its rules and principles, is obedience to a law of mental cause and effect, the entire chain of reasoning being causally connected with certain premises or axiomata..." I think that Leeuw's understanding of logic is too mechanistic. Logic itself is quite fluid; it is not something given that must be rigidly applied, in fact there are different logics, such as classical logic, predicate logic, modal logic, intuitionistic logic, multivalued logic which employ subtly different methods and rules. In my view, the rules of logic themselves (the rules of inference) are based on intuitive insight. Each logical rule is therefore an atomic, reproducible "insight granule" -for the lack of a better word- that can be combined to form complex argument.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 78
(2/27/04 10:42 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Thomas,

Quote:

---

Overall I agree with Leeuw says in this article. I have two objections, though

(1) Leeuw says: "Logic is the method of the intellect, it is intellectual technique and in itself always unproductive," and later, "...in mathematics nothing new is produced as truth and the conclusions to which we come are contained in the principles or axiomata." I think that Leeuw is wrong about this. Pure logic has on many occasions led to quite astonishing new insights without the introduction of new premises. An example of this would be the discovery of the logical hole of the Cantor/Frege set theory by Russell/Zermelo, or the Einstein-Podolsky-Rosen paradox which started out as a theoretical thought experiment questioning quantum mechanics. When the EPR paradox was verified experimentally later, it caused quite an uproar. There are many more examples and I will gladly list them if you are curious.

---

No that's ok, I did think he was over zealous with some of his statements. For example, that logic is unproductive was a little skewed. I was more interested with the overall view he expressed and I see you basically agree.

Quote:

---

in fact there are different logics, such as classical logic, predicate logic, modal logic, intuitionistic logic, multivalued logic which employ subtly different methods and rules.

---

I didn't know there are different types of logic. Can you give me a link that will explain the differences?

John

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 824

(2/27/04 11:22 pm)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John: I didn't know there are different types of logic. Can you give me a link that will explain the differences?

Unfortunately, I have not yet found any website that explains formal logic concisely and without much academic deadweight. Perhaps this would constitute a nice new future project for my own website. For the moment, I can only offer you a couple of "suboptimal" tips. Wikipedia might be a good starting point. I posted a brief commentary on intuition and logic here. If you like the topic, I can recommend two books: "LOGIC - Schaum's Outlines, Second Edition" and "Mathematics: The Science of Patterns" by Keith Devlin. I can also send you two papers on Linear Logic and Lukasiewicz's multivalued logic, but these contain a fair amount of math.

Thomas

ksolway

Registered User

Posts: 367

(2/27/04 11:43 pm)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

I didn't know there are different types of logic.

---

As your intuition probably informs you, there is only one kind of logic, which boils down to the fact that  $A = A$ .

There are however many different ways of applying logic, and these give rise to what are called the "differing types of logic".

But if you fully understand  $A = A$ , then you will necessarily understand all logic.

John

Registered User

Posts: 79

(2/28/04 12:18 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Thomas,

Quote:

---

Unfortunately, I have not yet found any website that explains formal logic concisely and without much academic deadweight.... Wikipedia might be a good starting point.

---

Ok thanks.

John

John
Registered User
Posts: 80
(2/28/04 12:20 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Kevin,

Quote:

---

But if you fully understand  $A = A$ , then you will necessarily understand all logic.

---

You say that but I see is much disputation on this topic - it obviously is not that straight forward otherwise people would not disagree so much.

For example I have watched you and Thomas debate this issue and there is not much agreement between you. So would you say that people who do not agree with you do not understand  $A = A$ ? Or is it that you are applying logic in a different way?

John

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 430
(2/28/04 1:25 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

I see intuition like this: the subconscious mind naturally makes connections between things somehow and these connections float up into consciousness. The connections that are made in the subconscious mind are a result of a person's conditioning. A person who studies and meditates on mathematics will have mathematical intuitions. Their mathematical knowledge will become intuitive in the sense that they no longer struggle to remember the rules of mathematics, so their intuitions naturally accord with the rules of mathematics.

Most people don't study anything, so their intuitions are not logical at all. They think about sex all the time, for example, so their intuitions are full of sex. The intuitions of a person who thinks logically a lot will naturally be more logical than a person who doesn't.

I agree with van der Leeuw that intuition is the creative part of the mind and we should strive to be aware of our intuitions, but intuitions are not necessarily logical and need to be verified logically before they can be considered truth.

John
Registered User
Posts: 81
(2/28/04 2:35 am)
Reply

Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

MGregory

Quote:

---

I see intuition like this: the subconscious mind naturally makes connections between things somehow and these connections float up into consciousness.

---

Yes agreed.

Quote:

---

I agree with van der Leeuw that intuition is the creative part of the mind and we should strive to be aware of our intuitions, but intuitions are not necessarily logical and need to be verified logically before they can be considered truth.

---

Intuitions are most easily recognised when the mind is quiet. Or better, when the individual generally has a quiet mind. I don't personally see that logic is the arbiter of truth which you and others seem to be recommending. It is higher than logic and when through experience it has been listened to over a long period there is no necessity for logic. Truths are not necessarily representable in words so logic could not be applied in those cases.

John

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2224

(2/28/04 8:08 am)

Reply

Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

Kevin: But if you fully understand  $A = A$ , then you will necessarily understand all logic.

John: You say that but I see is much disputation on this topic - it obviously is not that straight forward otherwise people would not disagree so much.

---

There is a lot of dispute between various schools of Christian fundamentalism, yet we can dismiss the whole lot with one simple wave of the hand. Such a dismissal has no affect upon Jesus and his ilk, whose wisdom is simple and timeless.

Quote:

---

For example I have watched you and Thomas debate this issue and there is not much agreement between you. So would you say that people who do not agree with you do not understand  $A = A$ ? Or is it that you are applying logic in a different way?

---

Thomas does not want to deal with fundamentals as it would take him outside the world of conventional academia and force him to think for himself.

The principle of deductive logic ( $A=A$ ) necessarily underlines all of the various forms of academic logic, otherwise we wouldn't be able to construct or understand them.  $A=A$  is the trunk of logic, while the various forms of academic logic are its branches.

Importantly, you don't need to know anything about these other forms of logic in order to comprehend Reality. These other forms of logic only have a limited, specialized application within a particular area of science. Spiritually speaking, they are nothing more than a distraction. There are far more crucial matters to direct one's logic towards!

Van der Leeuw wrote:

Quote:

---

Mathematical reasoning is perhaps the purest example of the logical method;

---

I would say that mathematical reasoning is the most harmless expression of logic, as it only deals with abstract concepts that have no connection to human life. Philosophical reasoning is just as pure as mathematical reasoning, but far more dangerous, which is why everyone feels a need to reign it in, slag it off, smear its reputation, tell lies about it, and generally do everything they can to undermine its effectiveness.

MGregory
Registered User
Posts: 433
(2/28/04 11:33 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

John: Intuitions are most easily recognised when the mind is quiet. Or better, when the individual generally has a quiet mind.

---

Logic is the destructive part of the mind, and its consistent use and practice will make the mind quiet.

Quote:

---

I don't personally see that logic is the arbiter of truth which you and others seem to be recommending. It is higher than logic and when through experience it has been listened to over a long period there is no necessity for logic. Truths are not necessarily representable in words so logic could not be applied in those cases.

---

Anything that we experience or that otherwise enters consciousness is the result of a logical process. At the very least, it has to be identified by the mind, which is the fundamental function of logic.

Edited by: MGregory at: 2/28/04 1:50 pm

John
Registered User
Posts: 83
(2/28/04 6:07 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

DavidQuinn

Quote:

---

There is a lot of dispute between various schools of Christian fundamentalism, yet we can dismiss the whole lot with one simple wave of the hand. Such a dismissal has no affect upon Jesus and his ilk, whose wisdom is simple and timeless.

---

Agreed but at no time did he advocate reason/logic either as far as I know.

Quote:

---

Importantly, you don't need to know anything about these other forms of logic in order to comprehend Reality. These other forms of logic only have a limited, specialized application within a particular area of science. Spiritually speaking, they are nothing more than a distraction. There are far more crucial matters to direct one's logic towards!

---

I asked you once to explain your feminine stance with respect to logic and all you could do is show me bias. I have seen no reason here to believe that you follow your own advice.

edit:

Forget the above, I don't want to talk about the feminine again.

Perhaps you could explain how your logic deals with the Buddhist four propositions?

end edit:

Quote:

---

Philosophical reasoning is just as pure as mathematical reasoning, but far more dangerous, which is why everyone feels a need to reign it in, slag it off, smear its reputation, tell lies about it, and generally do everything they can to undermine its effectiveness.

---

That 'everyone' does not include me but neither am I enamoured with logic as presented here.

John

Edited by: John at: 2/28/04 6:48 pm

John
Registered User
Posts: 84
(2/28/04 6:08 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

MGregory

Quote:

---

Logic is the destructive part of the mind, and its consistent use and practice will make the mind quiet.

---

I wouldn't know as I have never bothered with logic as a system but there are other methods.

Quote:

---

Anything that we experience or that otherwise enters consciousness is the result of a logical process. At the very least, it has to be identified by the mind, which is the fundamental function of logic.

---

You must have a different definition of logic to me.

John

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2233

(2/29/04 8:43 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: There is a lot of dispute between various schools of Christian fundamentalism, yet we can dismiss the whole lot with one simple wave of the hand. Such a dismissal has no affect upon Jesus and his ilk, whose wisdom is simple and timeless.

John: Agreed but at no time did he advocate reason/logic either as far as I know.

---

It is implied in the text. For example:

He said to the crowd: "When you see a cloud rising in the west, immediately you say, 'It's going to rain,' and it does. And when the south wind blows, you say, 'It's going to be hot,' and it is. Hypocrites! You know how to interpret the appearance of the earth and the sky. How is it that you don't know how to interpret this present time?

Why don't you judge for yourselves what is right?

Luke 12:54

Quote:

---

DQ: Importantly, you don't need to know anything about these other forms of logic in order to comprehend Reality. These other forms of logic only have a limited, specialized application within a particular area of science. Spiritually speaking, they are nothing more than a distraction. There are far more crucial matters to direct one's logic towards!

J: Perhaps you could explain how your logic deals with the Buddhist four propositions?

---

The four noble truths? That the Buddha used logic to construct them is too obvious for words. It's not even an issue. Perhaps it would be easier for all concerned if you simply explained where he didn't use logic.

Quote:

---

DQ: Philosophical reasoning is just as pure as mathematical reasoning, but far more dangerous, which is why everyone feels a need to reign it in, slag it off, smear its reputation, tell lies about it, and generally do everything they can to undermine its effectiveness.

J: That 'everyone' does not include me but neither am I enamoured with logic as presented here.

---

It's not so much an enamouring on our parts, but rather the attempt to counter the obsession to avoid reason at all costs by most of the human race. That is say, it is a reaction to the human race's enamoured desire to use their brains as little as possible and remain ignorant.

In Buddhas, the use of logic is as natural and as unremarkable as breathing.

John
Registered User
Posts: 86
(2/29/04 5:56 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

DavidQuinn

Quote:

---

John: Agreed but at no time did he advocate reason/logic either as far as I know.

It is implied in the text. For example:

He said to the crowd: "When you see a cloud rising in the west, immediately you say, 'It's going to rain,' and it does. And when the south wind blows, you say, 'It's going to be hot,' and it is. Hypocrites! You know how to interpret the appearance of the earth and the sky. How is it that you don't know how to interpret this present time? Why don't you judge for yourselves what is right?

Luke 12:54

---

You impute much in an attempt to reinforce your own position. There can be no doubt that the NT advocates love and meditation as the main forms leading to liberation.

Quote:

---

J: Perhaps you could explain how your logic deals with the Buddhist four propositions?

The four noble truths?

---

No. The four propositions - the four propositions are refuted and they are

It exists

It does not exist

It both exists and does not exist

It neither exists nor does not exist

Quote:

---

J: That 'everyone' does not include me but neither am I enamoured with logic as presented here.

It's not so much an enamouring on our parts, but rather the attempt to counter the obsession to avoid reason at all costs by most of the human race. That is say, it is a reaction to the human race's enamoured desire to use their brains as little as possible and remain ignorant.

---

Well, I do not avoid reason at all costs but neither do I recognise this extreme value you seem to attach to thinking. My own experience is that it is by lessening mental activity that the mind is more able to 'see into' this matter. This lessening is not a form of unconsciousness, on the contrary, it leads to heightened awareness if done correctly.

John

voce io

Registered User

Posts: 771

(3/1/04 2:50 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Logic is the destructive part of the mind, and its consistent use and practice will make the mind quiet.

That's right. Its like moving to a city you haven't been to before; if you're trying to find office building 436, you will most likely be scattered in your searching. You'll go down Broadway Avenue, Lincoln Street, Sunset Boulevard...all in a search just to find the simple office building 436. Once you realize that office building 436 is on Douglas Drive, you stop going to Broadway, Lincoln and Sunset. There's just no reason anymore. Same with the mind. Lets say you want to approach a famous novelist to ask them a question about one of their books, yet you're afraid of going because they might do whatever or say whatever. You apply logic, weigh the impending circumstances...and you have a goal and a will. There are no obstacles other than the ones you have just destroyed by thinking. There's no reason to think of the obstacles anymore, seeing as how you now understand that your fear was pointless anyway. Things become clear.

...I just wanted to expand on that.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2234

(3/1/04 9:17 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

John: Agreed but at no time did [Jesus] advocate reason/logic either as far as I know.

DQ: It is implied in the text. For example:

He said to the crowd: "When you see a cloud rising in the west, immediately you say, 'It's going to rain,' and it does. And when the south wind blows, you say, 'It's going to be hot,' and it is. Hypocrites! You know how to interpret the appearance of the earth and the sky. How is it that you don't know how to interpret this present time? Why don't you judge for yourselves what is right?

John: You impute much in an attempt to reinforce your own position. There can be no doubt that the NT advocates love and meditation as the main forms leading to liberation.

---

If anyone comes to me and does not hate father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters—yes, even life itself—such a person cannot be my disciple.

- Luke 14:26

Do not suppose that I have come to bring peace to the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword. For I have come to turn " 'a man against his father, a daughter against her mother, a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law— your enemies will be the members of your own household.'

- Matthew 10:34

I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled! But I have a baptism to undergo, and what constraint I am under until it is completed! Do you think I came to bring peace on earth? No, I tell you, but division.

- Luke 12:49

Quote:

---

J: Perhaps you could explain how your logic deals with the Buddhist four propositions?

DQ: The four noble truths?

J: No. The four propositions - the four propositions are refuted and they are

It exists

It does not exist

It both exists and does not exist

It neither exists nor does not exist

---

No sweat. But be warned, this reasoning is far too deep for most people.

1. Reality does not exist because it is not a finite thing with form. Only finite things with form are capable of existing.
2. Reality does not not-exist because, as our experiences demonstrate, it is not nothing whatsoever.
3. Reality does not both "exist and not exist" because we have already demonstrated that it neither exists nor not exists. That is to say, proposition 3 is defeated by the defeat of propositions 1 and 2.
4. Finally, Reality cannot be said to "neither exist nor not exist" because it constitutes the totality of all there is.

Quote:

---

J: That 'everyone' does not include me but neither am I enamoured with logic as presented here.

DQ: It's not so much an enamouring on our parts, but rather the attempt to counter the obsession to avoid reason at all costs by most of the human race. That is say, it is a reaction to the human race's enamoured desire to use their brains as little as possible and remain ignorant.

J: Well, I do not avoid reason at all costs but neither do I recognise this extreme value you seem to attach to thinking. My own experience is that it is by lessening mental activity that the mind is more able to 'see into' this matter. This lessening is not a form of unconsciousness, on the contrary, it leads to heightened awareness if done correctly.

---

The lessening of mental activity can definitely lead to certain kinds of altered states, which people often mistake for enlightenment. But unless a person is powered along by reason, he is not going to understand the altered states that he experiences. He is going to misinterpret them, and he is going to stagnate in the lower stages of the path.

Just like modern Zen.

MGregory

Posts: 449

(3/1/04 10:36 am)

Reply

---

☐ Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

I take "lessening of mental activity" to mean: not grabbing onto a thought like it was a galloping horse and riding off. I don't believe that enlightenment stops the mind, just as I don't believe it stops sight or any other "skandha". If there's any stopping involved it's certainly not a physical type of stopping.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1001

(3/1/04 12:35 pm)

Reply

---

☐ Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

1. Reality does not exist because it is not a finite thing with form. Only finite things with form are capable of existing.

---

1. Reality is Totality. Reality is infinite.

1. Things may exist. Things are finite. Things are not real.

Quote:

---

2. Reality does not not-exist because, as our experiences demonstrate, it is not nothing whatsoever.

---

2. Totality comprises experience.

2. Experience may exist.

Quote:

---

3. Reality does not both "exist and not exist" because we have already demonstrated that it neither exists nor not exists. That is to say, proposition 3 is defeated by the defeat of propositions 1 and 2.

---

3. Reality cannot be both infinite and finite.

3. Experience cannot be (real and not real). Experience cannot comprise totality.

Quote:

---

4. Finally, Reality cannot be said to "neither exist nor not exist" because it constitutes the totality of all there is.

---

4. Totality is reality. Experience is of reality.

4. Totality is not a thing. Reality is not finite. Experience is not finite. Experience is not of things. Things are of experience. Things are of reality. Things are not reality. Existence is not reality. Experience is reality.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 3/1/04 12:58 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 826
(3/1/04 1:59 pm)
Reply

Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

David: Thomas does not want to deal with fundamentals as it would take him outside the world of conventional academia and force him to think for himself.

When you compare syllogistic (classical) logic to intuitionistic logic, for example, you ARE at the fundamental level. It doesn't get more fundamental than that.

David: The principle of deductive logic ( $A=A$ ) necessarily underlines all of the various forms of academic logic, otherwise we wouldn't be able to construct or understand them.

This is piffle.  $A=A$  is not a deductive principle. You are uninformed about logic.  $A=A$  expresses reflexivity and nothing follows from it, not even identity, since identity also requires commutativity and transitivity. You have presumably pinched this from Aristotle's ontological concept of identity = the idea that everything that exists has a specific nature. Aristotle didn't even express it that way.

A=A is the trunk of logic, while the various forms of academic logic are its branches.

A=A isn't a trunk and nothing branches from it.

David: Importantly, you don't need to know anything about these other forms of logic in order to comprehend Reality. These other forms of logic only have a limited, specialized application within a particular area of science.

Since this comes from someone who is fundamentally ignorant of logic, why follow your advice? It sounds a bit like Hippocrates saying: "if you understand the four humors, you don't need to learn any more about medicine. Anatomy, surgery and pharmacology only have limited applications."

Oh yeah.

Thomas

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2238

(3/1/04 3:02 pm)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

David: Thomas does not want to deal with fundamentals as it would take him outside the world of conventional academia and force him to think for himself.

Thomas: When you compare syllogistic (classical) logic to intuitionistic logic, for example, you ARE at the fundamental level. It doesn't get more fundamental than that.

---

Ah, such blindness!

Quote:

---

David: The principle of deductive logic ( $A=A$ ) necessarily underlines all of the various forms of academic logic, otherwise we wouldn't be able to construct or understand them.

Thomas: This is piffle.  $A=A$  is not a deductive principle. You are uninformed about logic.  $A=A$  expresses reflexivity and nothing follows from it, not even identity, since identity also requires commutativity and transitivity.

---

$A=A$  can express whatever we want it to express. Personally, I like to use it to express the shared foundations of logic and direct perception.

Quote:

---

You have presumably pinched this from Aristotle's ontological concept of identity = the idea that everything that exists has a specific nature. Aristotle didn't even express it that way.

---

Didn't he? Oh my God, I'm stuffed, then.

Quote:

---

David:  $A=A$  is the trunk of logic, while the various forms of academic logic are its branches.

Thomas:  $A=A$  isn't a trunk and nothing branches from it.

---

They do from my  $A=A$ . You must have a dud.

Quote:

---

David: Importantly, you don't need to know anything about these other forms of logic in order to comprehend Reality. These other forms of logic only have a limited, specialized application within a particular area of science.

Thomas: Since this comes from someone who is fundamentally ignorant of logic, why follow your advice? It sounds a bit like Hippocrates saying: "if you understand the four humors, you don't need to learn any more about medicine. Anatomy, surgery and pharmacology only have limited applications."

---

I see it differently. The academic obsessive focus on devising various kinds of specialized logics and other trivial matters, while neglecting to resolve the Great Matter of life and death, is like Hippocrates saying, "Gentlemen, we have discovered the wonderful potential to cure all illnesses with the science of medicine. But let's instead analyze the semantic roots of the word "medicine" for the next thousand years. Nothing can be done until that is sorted, as I'm sure you will all agree.

"And then, after that, we can concentrate on filing and categorizing the various medical tools that, hopefully, someone one day will create. And then, should we have time, we can have an in-depth debate about what colour medical coats should be. That should keep us going for another couple of centuries."

--

Two men went into a garden. The worldly-wise man no sooner entered the gate than he began to count the number of the mango-trees, how many mangoes each tree bore, and what might be the approximate price of the whole orchard. The other went to the owner, made his acquaintance, and quietly going under a mangoe tree began to pluck the fruit and eat it with the owners consent.

Now who is the wiser of the two? Eat mangoes, it will satisfy your hunger. What is the good of counting the leaves and making vain calculations? The vain man of intellect is uselessly busy in finding out the "why and wherefore" of creation while the humble man of wisdom makes acquaintance with the creator and enjoys the supreme bliss of this world.

- Ramakrishna

--

Edited by: DavidQuinn000 at: 3/1/04 3:22 pm

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

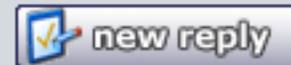

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                       | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| JohnRegistered UserPosts: 89(3/1/04 5:50 pm)Reply |  Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof <hr/> DavidQuinn000 Quote: <hr/> John: You impute much in an attempt to reinforce your own position. There can be no doubt that the NT advocates love and meditation as the main forms leading to liberation. If anyone comes to me and does not hate father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters—yes, even life itself—such a person cannot be my disciple. - Luke 14:26 &lt;snip&gt; <hr/> All good quotes but they do not bolster your position. To impute that the Way the NT advocates is logic is wishful on your part. Quote: <hr/> |

It exists
It does not exist
It both exists and does not exist
It neither exists nor does not exist

No sweat. But be warned, this reasoning is far too deep for most people.

1. Reality does not exist because it is not a finite thing with form. Only finite things with form are capable of existing.

2. Reality does not not-exist because, as our experiences demonstrate, it is not nothing whatsoever.

3. Reality does not both "exist and not exist" because we have already demonstrated that it neither exists nor not exists. That is to say, proposition 3 is defeated by the defeat of propositions 1 and 2.

4. Finally, Reality cannot be said to "neither exist nor not exist" because it constitutes the totality of all there is.

---

Ok, but I'll stick to Buddhist texts for that thanks.

What I do ask though is why this place seems to state that things do not exist on a regular basis, let's not bother with half truths. The four propositions apply to all dharmas, all dharmas are in a condition of Suchness.

Quote:

---

J: Well, I do not avoid reason at all costs but neither do I recognise this extreme value you seem to attach to thinking. My own experience is that it is by lessening mental activity that the mind is more able to 'see into' this matter. This lessening is not a form of unconsciousness, on the contrary, it leads to heightened awareness if done correctly.

The lessening of mental activity can definitely lead to certain kinds of altered states, which people often mistake for enlightenment. But unless a person is powered along by reason, he is not going to understand the altered states that he experiences. He is going to misinterpret them, and he is going to stagnate in the lower stages of the path. Just like modern Zen.

---

I don't agree with that assessment at all. The lessening of mental activity is not about altered states but about seeing clearly. It is the constant machinations of our minds that cloud true seeing.

John

John
Registered User
Posts: 90
(3/1/04 5:52 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

MGregory

Quote:

---

I take "lessening of mental activity" to mean: not grabbing onto a thought like it was a galloping horse and riding off.

---

It can mean that but because the ordinary mind is so habituated to the normal thinking process other more drastic measures are used to break the habit.

Quote:

---

I don't believe that enlightenment stops the mind, just as I don't believe it stops sight or any other "skandha". If there's any stopping involved it's certainly not a physical type of stopping.

---

A Buddha certainly has thoughts but has no need to think as normal humans do. One practice is to let go of all thoughts as soon as they arise, this will eventually lead to a condition where thinking has ceased to be a necessity. It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game you will know what I mean.

John

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 829
(3/1/04 6:03 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

David: They do from my  $A=A$ . You must have a dud.

Ah, you must be in a merry mood today. I am glad you finally admit to approaching logic from the perspective of gardening. If you stare long enough at a dead trunk your imagination will do the branching. Mind is a funny flower, isn't it?

Thomas (eating a mango)

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2243
(3/1/04 7:56 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

All good quotes but they do not bolster your position. To impute that the Way the NT advocates is logic is wishful on your part.

---

The New Testament cannot help but use logic in each of its sentences, just as you and I cannot help but use logic in everything that we think and do. To the degree that we are conscious and functional, we will always be using it. It is hard-wired into our brains. The only question is whether we choose to use logic wisely and properly (which is the way of Buddhas), or foolishly and improperly (which is the way of the world).

Quote:

---

DQ: 1. Reality does not exist because it is not a finite thing with form. Only finite things with form are capable of existing.

2. Reality does not not-exist because, as our experiences demonstrate, it is not nothing whatsoever.

3. Reality does not both "exist and not exist" because we have already demonstrated that it neither exists nor not exists. That is to say, proposition 3 is defeated by the defeat of propositions 1 and 2.

4. Finally, Reality cannot be said to "neither exist nor not exist" because it constitutes the totality of all there is.

John: Ok, but I'll stick to Buddhist texts for that thanks.

---

T'is best. You're probably too old to start thinking for yourself, without the texts.

Quote:

---

What I do ask though is why this place seems to state that things do not exist on a regular basis, let's not bother with half truths. The four propositions apply to all dharmas, all dharmas are in a condition of Suchness.

---

The non-existence of things is stressed in order to counter the crude but very popular belief, held by nearly everyone on the planet, that things inherently exist.

Most people in this world are not in a position to understand Suchness. They have too many delusions concerning the nature of existence. One has to ease them slowly past one pitfall at a time. To start talking about more advanced truths would only confuse them.

Quote:

---

DQ: The lessening of mental activity can definitely lead to certain kinds of altered states, which people often mistake for enlightenment. But unless a person is powered along by reason, he is not going to understand the altered states that he experiences. He is going to misinterpret them, and he is going to stagnate in the lower stages of the path. Just like modern Zen.

John: I don't agree with that assessment at all. The lessening of mental activity is not about altered states but about seeing clearly. It is the constant machinations of our minds that cloud true seeing.

---

If you saw truly, you would see that thinking doesn't hinder true seeing in the slightest. The enlightened person can churn out thoughts all day and not lose sight of his true nature for an instant. You've been horribly misled by your "masters" in this issue. Willingly, no doubt.

False thinking - i.e. thinking that affirms one's deepest illusions - certainly hinders true seeing, but not the crystal-clear, infinite thinking that spontaneously arises out of true seeing and is grounded in God.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2244

(3/1/04 8:39 pm)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

A Buddha certainly has thoughts but has no need to think as normal humans do.

---

Indeed, he has no need of irrational thoughts, or evasive thoughts, or emotional thoughts, or violent thoughts. Nor does he have a need to consult texts to tell him what to believe in, or entertain submissive thoughts towards a guru, or romantic thoughts towards a member of the opposite sex.

He does, however, have plenty of use for calm, penetrative, insightful thoughts.

Quote:

---

One practice is to let go of all thoughts as soon as they arise, this will eventually lead to a condition where _thinking_ has ceased to be a necessity.

---

Our thoughts are never ever "held" in the first place, so how can they be let go? They are already spontaneous and free.

In your desire to experience a thoughtless heaven, you are creating a false prison for yourself.

Quote:

---

It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will will know what I mean.

---

So how does this relate to reflecting upon the world's problems? Or analyzing human psychology in an effort to understand people? Or deciding upon the wisest course of action in a particular situation? Or making plans for the future?

John
Registered User
Posts: 92
(3/1/04 9:46 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

DavidQuinn

Quote:

---

All good quotes but they do not bolster your position. To impute that the Way the NT advocates is logic is wishful on your part.

The New Testament cannot help but use logic in each of its sentences

---

That does not address the issue.

Quote:

---

just as you and I cannot help but use logic in everything that we think and do. To the degree that we are conscious and functional, we will always be using it.

---

Nonsense, you obviously have not experienced anything else or at least not noticed it.

Quote:

---

John: Ok, but I'll stick to Buddhist texts for that thanks.

T'is best. You're probably too old to start thinking for yourself, without the texts.

---

I meant that the Buddhist texts are better than yours, if I wanted to read it I would choose the Buddhist texts.

Quote:

---

Most people in this world are not in a position to understand Suchness. They have too many delusions concerning the nature of existence. One has to ease them slowly past one pitfall at a time. To start talking about more advanced truths would only confuse them.

---

I think you underestimate people.

Quote:

---

Quote: DQ: The lessening of mental activity can definitely lead to certain kinds of altered states, which people often mistake for enlightenment. But unless a person is powered along by reason, he is not going to understand the altered states that he experiences. He is going to misinterpret them, and he is going to stagnate in the lower stages of the path. Just like modern Zen.

John: I don't agree with that assessment at all. The lessening of mental activity is not about altered states but about seeing clearly. It is the constant machinations of our minds that cloud true seeing.

If you saw truly, you would see that thinking doesn't hinder true seeing in the slightest.

---

I am talking about people who are deluded and are in need of practice not those that are already complete.

Quote:

---

The enlightened person can churn out thoughts all day and not lose sight of his true nature for an instant. You've been horribly misled by your "masters" in this issue. Willingly, no doubt.

---

You are constantly misleading yourself.

John

John
Registered User
Posts: 93
(3/1/04 9:47 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

DavidQuinn

Quote:

---

Quote:A Buddha certainly has thoughts but has no need to think as normal humans do.

He does, however, have plenty of use for calm, penetrative, insightful thoughts.

---

Read my sentence again.

Quote:

---

Quote: One practice is to let go of all thoughts as soon as they arise, this will eventually lead to a condition where _thinking_ has ceased to be a necessity.

Our thoughts are never ever "held" in the first place, so how can they be let go? They are already spontaneous and free.

---

Again you miss the point, what normal humans do is grab onto a thought and start an interminable train of deluded thoughts from there.

Quote:

---

In your desire to experience a thoughtless heaven, you are creating a false prison for yourself.

---

Nowhere have I suggested that one should try for a thoughtless heaven. How you do imagine things, project onto others etc.

Quote:

---

Quote: It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will know what I mean.

So how does this relate to reflecting upon the world's problems? Or analyzing human psychology in an effort to understand people? Or deciding upon the wisest course of action in a particular situation? Or making plans for the future?

---

Heaven, saves us from the Quinn! :) A Buddha deals with each situation spontaneously, effortlessly and appropriately.

John

MGregory

Posts: 452

(3/2/04 2:47 am)

Reply

☐ Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

John: One practice is to let go of all thoughts as soon as they arise, this will eventually lead to a condition where _thinking_ has ceased to be a necessity.

David: Our thoughts are never ever "held" in the first place, so how can they be let go? They are already spontaneous and free.

John: Again you miss the point, what normal humans do is grab onto a thought and start an interminable train of deluded thoughts from there.

---

I think the deluded mind "grabs on" in the sense that he forgets about his true nature and begins believing his thoughts are his mind. "Grabbing" in my mind doesn't involve holding the same thought in the mind.

Quote:

---

John: It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will know what I mean.

---

Yes, I know what you mean. I can "stop thinking" for awhile and sometimes it helps in playing the game. But that only works for short periods of time. If someone wants to play an arcade game perfectly, he has to practice a lot. He has to basically learn how the game operates, and play it such that his actions perfectly conform to winning the game. It takes a lot of thought to figure out which moves are winning moves and discipline to remember not to make losing moves. So I think the principle of non-thinking breaks down after a period of time, whereas someone who has spent hours and hours mastering Pac-Man can walk up to any Pac-Man machine and play one game as long as he likes, insofar as he stays in practice. I doubt that any Buddha or Bodhisattva anywhere could play a game of Pac-Man perfectly.

Quote:

---

David: So how does this relate to reflecting upon the world's problems? Or analyzing human psychology in an effort to understand people? Or deciding upon the wisest course of action in a particular situation? Or making plans for the future?

John: Heaven, saves us from the Quinn! :) A Buddha deals with each situation spontaneously, effortlessly and appropriately.

---

Effortlessly? What about writing a sutra? I don't believe that someone just dashed it off in one night. I'm sure it took many years of effort to write some of them. Not only does the author need to have wisdom, but he also needs to study students and their delusions so he can address the right topics and in an appropriate manner. I don't believe such knowledge comes without a considerable amount of study. I wouldn't be surprised if it took decades or even centuries to write some of them.

John
Registered User
Posts: 95
(3/2/04 5:58 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

MGregory

Quote:

---

John: Again you miss the point, what normal humans do is grab onto a thought and start an interminable train of deluded thoughts from there.

I think the deluded mind "grabs on" in the sense that he forgets about his true nature and begins believing his thoughts are his mind. "Grabbing" in my mind doesn't involve holding the same thought in the mind.

---

I didn't say it was holding the same thought in the mind.

Quote:

---

Quote:John: It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will know what I mean.

Yes, I know what you mean. I can "stop thinking" for awhile and sometimes it helps in playing the game. But that only works for short periods of time. If someone wants to play an arcade game perfectly, he has to practice a lot.

---

Of course this applies to any game. Take basketball for instance, in a good fast game there is no time to think whilst in action, ones actions are appropriate for each situation, depending on how good the player is of course.

Quote:

---

He has to basically learn how the game operates, and play it such that his actions perfectly conform to winning the game. It takes a lot of thought to figure out which moves are winning moves and discipline to remember not to make losing moves. So I think the principle of non-thinking breaks down after a period of time, whereas someone who has spent hours and hours mastering Pac-Man can walk up to any Pac-Man machine and play one game as long as he likes, insofar as he stays in practice. I doubt that any Buddha or Bodhisattva anywhere could play a game of Pac-Man perfectly.

---

Once the game has been mastered wu-wei is the norm.

Quote:

---

John: Heaven, saves us from the Quinn! :) A Buddha deals with each situation spontaneously, effortlessly and appropriately.

Effortlessly? What about writing a sutra? I don't believe that someone just dashed it off in one night. I'm sure it took many years of effort to write some of them. Not only does the author need to have wisdom, but he also needs to study students and their delusions so he can address the right topics and in an appropriate manner. I don't believe such knowledge comes without a considerable amount of study. I wouldn't be surprised if it took decades or even centuries to write some of them.

---

Effortless action, or as it some times called non-action, wu-wei. As a Taoist book says, a baby can cry all day and not get hoarse.

John

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2246

(3/2/04 8:59 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John wrote:

Quote:

---

DQ: To the degree that we are conscious and functional, we will always be using it.

J: Nonsense, you obviously have not experienced anything else or at least not noticed it.

---

I don't think you realize how pervasive logical thought is. Whenever we experience understanding or mental coherence of any kind, we are engaging in logic, either consciously or subconsciously. Even the sublime understandings that are experienced in altered states are composed of logic. It is a universal law of mind: wherever there is understanding, there is logic.

It may not be the cumbersome conscious act of trying to reason things out, which is what people normally associate with logic. That is only one subset of the entire spectrum of logical activity. Most logical processes occur subconsciously and effortlessly, beneath the awareness of most people.

Again, the point of mentioning all of this is to emphasize that trying to stop or lessen thought is a false spiritual practice. Not only is it misguided, but it is futile. Far from taking one to Buddhahood, it will only lead one to the blissful altered states of the vegetable kingdom.

Quote:

---

John: Ok, but I'll stick to Buddhist texts for that thanks.

DQ: T'is best. You're probably too old to start thinking for yourself, without the texts.

John: I meant that the Buddhist texts are better than yours, if I wanted to read it I would choose the Buddhist texts.

---

I think you'll find that the Buddhist texts, like those from Nagarjuna, employ similar reasonings - albeit more verbosely. Indeed, Nagarjuna is very similar to Spock in his approach to Buddhism.

Can you post in the appropriate section from a Buddhist text, so that we can all have a look at it?

Quote:

---

John: Quote: One practice is to let go of all thoughts as soon as they arise, this will eventually lead to a condition where _thinking_ has ceased to be a necessity.

DQ: Our thoughts are never ever "held" in the first place, so how can they be let go? They are already spontaneous and free.

John: Again you miss the point, what normal humans do is grab onto a thought and start an interminable train of deluded thoughts from there.

---

If that is the case, then the idea should be to stop grabbing hold of them in the first place, rather than trying to let them go from an already grabbed state.

So how does one stop grabbing them in the first place?

Quote:

---

DQ: In your desire to experience a thoughtless heaven, you are creating a false prison for yourself.

John: Nowhere have I suggested that one should try for a thoughtless heaven. How you do imagine things, project onto others etc.

---

Does abandoning thought also mean abandoning memory? You've made it plain that you're striving for a realm in which there is no logical activity (i.e thought) at all. For example, in this thread alone, you wrote:

Quote:

---

I don't personally see that logic is the arbiter of truth which you and others seem to be recommending. It is higher than logic and when through experience it has been listened to over a long period there is no necessity for logic. Truths are not necessarily representable in words so logic could not be applied in those cases.

---

And:

Quote:

---

My own experience is that it is by lessening mental activity that the mind is more able to 'see into' this matter. This lessening is not a form of unconsciousness, on the contrary, it leads to heightened awareness if done correctly.

---

According to your dictum, the less mental activity, the more "seeing". That is to say, no mental activity = perfect seeing. A thoughtless heaven.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 31

(3/2/04 9:42 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

This is an extremely subtle matter and I appreciate this dialogue.

What I've come to see is this: "thinking" or "not-thinking" ultimately have nothing to do with the realization of fundamental Reality.

The common, "earlier-stage" view of enlightenment is that it "brought about" by the cessation of thought, with the resulting "direct experience of Reality", undistorted by the movement of thought (something like the clouds parting, to reveal the Sun, which was always there, only obscured).

But as we deepen our investigation of this, we see that it's not so simple.

Reason being, is that "thought" is nothing but a modification of consciousness itself, a fluctuating "wave" on the Ocean of consciousness. But -- and this is a crucial point -- these "waves" are arising spontaneously and without any "controlling entity" in the background "pulling levers" to bring them about.

How can we "catch a thought" before it arises in consciousness? We cannot. By the time we go to "catch it", it has already arisen.

How do we think a thought? What sort of procedure are we going through in order to bring about the appearance of a thought?

Has anyone ever truly controlled this process, in the sense of identifying *clearly* a controlling entity who is deciding, in the background, "now I am going to think this thought!"

We cannot locate such a "controlling entity", a kind of "construction foreman" on the "building site" of intellectual activity, because the job is unfilled. There is no "construction foreman" there.

We cannot clearly know the process by which we think a thought, simply because we can't recognize a thought *until we think the thought*.

Therefore, the only approach to cultivate in meditation that makes any sense is the attitude that "it doesn't matter if I'm thinking, or not-thinking".

This attitude leads to a deepening of Acceptance of what is present now, i.e., consciousness itself. It is a profound relaxation in which intellect is sharpened and made more economical in usage. It works as it's needed.

For example, if we go for a walk, then come home and sit in front of our computer and continue to move our legs like we are walking, then we are likely going mad or something.

Likewise, for the mind to be working continuously while appreciating a beautiful sunset, or a flower garden, or some children playing, or a silent moment with a close friend, etc., would be unnecessary. But so too, nor is it necessary to regard thinking as a hindrance to recognition of Reality. Thinking is simply what it is, just as the flower is simply what it is, and the sunset is simply what it is.

This deep acceptance of the movement of thought allows us to see directly into the emptiness (shunyata) of self, and the root anxiety of existence. We cease struggling with existence, and with the constant need to validate our apparent existence within an apparent universe.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1004
(3/2/04 11:12 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

Reason being, is that "thought" is nothing but a modification of consciousness itself, a fluctuating "wave" on the Ocean of consciousness. But -- and this is a crucial point -- these "waves" are arising spontaneously and without any "controlling entity" in the background "pulling levers" to bring them about.

How can we "catch a thought" before it arises in consciousness? We cannot. By the time we go to "catch it", it has already arisen.

How do we think a thought? What sort of procedure are we going through in order to bring about the appearance of a thought?

Has anyone ever truly controlled this process, in the sense of identifying *clearly* a controlling entity who is deciding, in the background, "now I am going to think this thought!"

We cannot locate such a "controlling entity", a kind of "construction foreman" on the "building site" of intellectual activity, because the job is unfilled. There is no "construction foreman" there.

We cannot clearly know the process by which we think a thought, simply because we can't recognize a thought *until we think the thought*.

---

This is one way of looking at it, and being as we can't know for sure, it's a good honest theory.

I'd like to offer an alternative, more speculative theory, one which allows for the controlling foreman entity, and perhaps spontaneity as well.

Conscious experience is where thoughts occur, so quite clearly we cannot "catch a thought" before it arises in conscious experience, but that is not to say that there is necessarily no 'consciousness' involved in it's conception, prior to experience. I know it to be a tested and scientifically proven fact there is electrical activity - neurons firing in the brain - fractionally before thought is registered consciously, or experienced. This implies that there is indeed brain activity which precedes the conscious experience of any particular thought.

I would like to suggest the possibility that this activity is generated by a 'self', which crucially is distinct from the experience of the self on that fully actualised conscious level. I would suggest the possibility that this self is the nexus between the causes accumulated in the memory, and the conscious experience immediately antecedent to the present. This recursive procedure would control thought spontaneously according to immediate antecedent experience and it's connection to pertinent memory.

Perhaps we seek to identify with this self, as opposed to the experience of it.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 3/2/04 11:14 am

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 831
(3/2/04 1:23 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Philip: We cannot locate such a "controlling entity", a kind of "construction foreman" on the "building site" of intellectual activity, because the job is unfilled. There is no "construction foreman" there.

The human brain has evolved a neocortex on which symbolic thought seems to rely and it is likely that language and social complexity have coevolved with the neocortex. Of course, you cannot consciously locate a thought in the neocortex, nor can you locate any other percept spatially in the brain, simply because the nervous system is not conscious of itself. Yet, from a neurological point of view it is certainly possible to speak of mental "construction sites", since excitations of different areas of the brain are responsible for different functions. This does neither imply functional autarky nor any controlling agency. The principle fallacy is Cartesian; it is assuming that doing requires a doer, or as Descartes would have it that thinking requires a thinker.

Dave: I would like to suggest the possibility that this activity is generated by a 'self', which crucially is distinct from the experience of the self on that fully actualised conscious level.

How can that be? The 'self' is a product of reflexivity. It arises from linking mental experience (qualia) and memory reflexively to the idea of self. The self is itself a concept. This means that developing self-consciousness requires symbolic thought. There needs to be a distinct symbolic capability, otherwise reflexive association would be impossible. Still, the "self" is more than a thin conceptual layer. That which makes it appear 'real' is first-person experience, something that we share even with the dinosaurs. In proper evolutionary order, the conceptual "self" can then be understood as a quaternary extension of first-person "limbic" experience.

Thomas

John
Registered User
Posts: 96
(3/2/04 5:40 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Philip

Mara is a trickster. (short version)

The problem as I see it is that people so strongly/deeply identify with the thinking process that the illusion, 'I think therefore I am' is very hard to break. In fact provided we continue with interminable thinking we will always be perpetuating the illusion, be it ever so subtle.

So subtle can this illusion be that some 'think' it doesn't exist anymore for them. They can continue to pontificate about shunyata all the while the foreman is still, albeit softly and secretly directing proceedings.

A stone woman bears a child by night
A wooden horse romps unbridled in spring.

John

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1011
(3/3/04 11:54 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

Thomas: How can that be?

---

I wasn't even sure if it could be. It was a product of the contents of my memory, conscious experience, and hasty reflection thereon ;-)
But I guess the idea of throwing it out there was that it might be scrutinised by such as yourself, perhaps leading to clarification or, more likely, falsification.

Quote:

---

Thomas: The 'self' is a product of reflexivity. It arises from linking mental experience (qualia) and memory reflexively to the idea of self. The self is itself a concept.

---

Doesn't this only mean that 'the concept of self' is itself a concept. The 'self' doesn't need to be a product of conceptualisation and therefore doesn't need to be derived from a reflexive relation between qualia and memorised conceptions on qualia, in relation to itself; rather it is simply itself. The 'self' itself must surely be prior to 'the conception of self'? Is the self-which-has-no-concept-of-self, not a self, merely by that fact alone?

Quote:

---

This means that developing self-consciousness requires symbolic thought. There needs to be a distinct symbolic capability, otherwise reflexive association would be impossible.

---

With regard to 'the concept of self', this is of course true. 'The concept of self' is a symbolic, conceptual relationship between the thinker (self) and the thought (concept), but is it the thinker itself?

Quote:

---

Still, the "self" is more than a thin conceptual layer. That which makes it appear 'real' is first-person experience, something that we share even with the dinosaurs.

---

If that is what makes it "appear to be 'real'", what makes it appear?

Quote:

---

In proper evolutionary order, the conceptual "self" can then be understood as a quaternary extension of first-person "limbic" experience.

---

Yes indeed, the 'conceptual self' is likely of the prefrontal cortex primarily, amongst other areas no doubt, in conjunction with the limbic system and sensual input. But what of the possessor of these things - that which is granted the gift of conceptualisation and self-conceptualisation thereby, yet is not in itself a concept?

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2507
(3/4/04 12:22 am)
Reply

 ---

---

Strange as it seems, and doesn't, the self and conception of self are one.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1012
(3/4/04 1:18 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

Not one, not two.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2508
(3/4/04 11:36 am)
Reply

 ----

---

An infinity. So yes 1, yes 2, 3, 4, more.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 845
(3/4/04 5:51 pm)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Dave: Doesn't this only mean that 'the concept of self' is itself a concept.

Yup. It's a wordy version of 'the self is a concept'.

Dave: The 'self' itself must surely be prior to 'the conception of self'?

No, I think that the inference of an 'a priori' self is a historical mistake. It is especially defining for Western dualism. There is no thinker, no doer, no self. All agency is imagined. A dog suspects agency behind a curtain moving in the wind. An uneducated man conjectures agency in nature. Think about evolution, organisms, body plans, all this wonderful miraculous creatures on Earth. Design doesn't require a designer. Nature doesn't require a creator. Thinking doesn't require a thinker. Everything is just a process.

Is the self-which-has-no-concept-of-self, not a self, merely by that fact alone?

You can call it a 'self' as long as you acknowledge that it is a changeable, transient phenomenon, not an absolute entity.

Thomas

Owen1234

Registered User

Posts: 23

(3/4/04 5:58 pm)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

John: I didn't know there are different types of logic.

ksoloway: As your intuition probably informs you, there is only one kind of logic, which boils down to the fact that  $A = A$ .

Nonsense! For example, See: Principia Mathematica, Whitehead and Russell, chapter 13.

The definition of identity and the theorems involving identity are clearly deduced from axioms that do not include identity.

\*13.01  $x=y$ , defined,  $Fx \leftrightarrow Fy$  ..for all F's.

$(x=y)$  if and only if (x has the property F, iff, y has the property F) ..for all F.

What system of: propositional logic, Boolean logic, and Syllogistic logic, has  $x=x$  as an axiom?

None of these systems require identity in their logical expressions nor do they require the notion of identity in their proofs.

Free logic, denies the validity of  $x=x$  for all x.

It is a theorem of classical logic that  $x=x$  if and only if x exists.

$(x=x, \text{ for all } x)$  is a belief of many logical systems, but, it most certainly is not a part of all logical systems as you allege.

ksoloway: There are however many different ways of applying logic, and these give rise to what are called the "differing types of logic".

Wrong again.

ksoloway: But if you fully understand  $A = A$ , then you will necessarily understand all logic.

???

Where do you get this gibberish from???

Can you demonstrate any of your claims?

Sage indeed. You would fail 'logic 101'.

Wittgenstein, Tractatus 5.533 "The identity-sign, therefore, is not an essential constituent of conceptual notation."

Owen

Edited by: Owen1234 at: 3/4/04 6:37 pm

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2259(3/6/04 6:54 am)Reply  |  Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof <hr/> John wrote: Quote: <hr/> J: Quote: It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will know what I mean. DQ: So how does this relate to reflecting upon the world's problems? Or analyzing human psychology in an effort to understand people? Or deciding upon the wisest course of action in a particular situation? Or making plans for the future? J: Heaven, saves us from the Quinn! :) A Buddha deals with each situation spontaneously, effortlessly and appropriately. <hr/> Agreed. And the reason why he is able to do this is not because he has spent years in meditation trying to quieten his thought-processes, but because he has abandoned all of his emotional attachments. Not having any attachments means that he no longer has to waste mental | energy trying to protect things which don't actually exist - such as his own self, or his own future happiness, or the selves and happiness of others. His mind is thus free and open to face each situation with the utmost efficiency.

This is the fundamental flaw with the practice of meditation as taught by Eastern gurus. While they are happy to give you techniques which attempt to artificially quieten the mind, they don't really address the core factors which produce the turbulent, ignorant mind to begin with. Out of fear of alienating their followers, they shy away from dealing with the subject of attachments, and thus the spiritual benefit they provide to people is quite minimal.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2262

(3/6/04 8:00 am)

Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

How can we "catch a thought" before it arises in consciousness? We cannot. By the time we go to "catch it", it has already arisen.

---

And what would we catch? An illusion that is already disappearing as we are catching it.

There is nothing to catch, just as there is nothing to let go.

Quote:

---

How do we think a thought? What sort of procedure are we going through in order to bring about the appearance of a thought?

Has anyone ever truly controlled this process, in the sense of identifying *clearly* a controlling entity who is deciding, in the background, "now I am going to think this thought!"

---

Even if we could identify such a controller, he would necessarily be in the same boat as us. The essential problem would remain unchanged. We would have to start looking for the controller's controller.

Quote:

---

We cannot clearly know the process by which we think a thought, simply because we can't recognize a thought *until we think the thought*.

---

We can know that it is a product of causation, and essentially no different to a cloud that evolves into being in the sky.

Quote:

---

Therefore, the only approach to cultivate in meditation that makes any sense is the attitude that "it doesn't matter if I'm thinking, or not-thinking".

---

All is empty!

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1020
(3/6/04 11:26 am)
Reply

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

Quote:

---

Dave: The 'self' itself must surely be prior to 'the conception of self'?

Thomas: No, I think that the inference of an 'a priori' self is a historical mistake. It is especially defining for Western dualism. There is no thinker, no doer, no self. All agency is imagined. A dog suspects agency behind a curtain moving in the wind. An uneducated man conjectures agency in nature. Think about evolution, organisms, body plans, all this wonderful miraculous creatures on Earth. Design doesn't require a designer. Nature doesn't require a creator. Thinking doesn't require a thinker. Everything is just a process.

---

Aren't you going a bit far there and defining true existence itself out of existence? Nature surely requires the capacity to manifest it's forms?

There is 'something', there must be.

How would you define free will BTW?

All agency is imagined.

Imagined by what though? All imagination is....?

There is no thinker, no doer, no self.

And yet there is awareness of thoughts and doings.

Thinking doesn't require a thinker.

Does a thinker not think?

Nature doesn't require a creator.

And yet Nature has a nature. Everything requires creation, and therefore a created creator, no?

Everything is just a process.

Is a process not agency?

Quote:

---

Dave: Is the self-which-has-no-concept-of-self, not a self, merely by that fact alone?

Thomas: You can call it a 'self' as long as you acknowledge that it is a changeable, transient phenomenon, not an absolute entity.

---

Yep, a constantly redefined subset within the set of all sets. Just like any phenomenon. No absolute entity, but absolute agency?

John
Registered User
Posts: 100
(3/6/04 6:24 pm)
Reply

Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

DavidQuinn

Quote:

---

J: It's a little like playing certain sports where great skill is required, thinking will definitely interfere with the correct flow. If you have ever played a fast interactive game will know what I mean.

DQ: So how does this relate to reflecting upon the world's problems? Or analyzing human psychology in an effort to understand people? Or deciding upon the wisest course of action in a particular situation? Or making plans for the future?

J: Heaven, saves us from the Quinn! :) A Buddha deals with each situation spontaneously, effortlessly and appropriately.

Agreed. And the reason why he is able to do this is not because he has spent years in meditation trying to quieten his thought-processes,

---

You must know he spent an extraordinary amount of time meditating. This meditation 'thing' is not a quaint only-do-it-if-you-want-to practice, it is integral to the path that has been trodden by our forebears. Ch'an Buddhism without Dhyana does not exist and as you profess interest in and respect of these Ch'an masters I find it peculiar that you have ignored this aspect.

Quote:

---

but because he has abandoned all of his emotional attachments.

---

It is precisely these emotional attachments (and conceptual attachments) that contribute to the frenetic thinking process that keep people enmeshed in their own false world - quietening one's thinking does help greatly in dispelling these endarkening dharmas.

Read Hakuin's Zazen Wasan (Song in Praise of Meditation)

Three translations of the same lines.

'As to Mahayana Sitting-Meditation,
No praise can exalt it fully.'

'As regards the Meditation practiced in the Mahayana,
We have no words to praise it fully.'

'As to Zazen taught in the Mahayana,
No amount of praise can exhaust its merits.'

I will not even attempt to describe it partially.

The impression I have of you is that you only take from ancient writings what appears to fit your own view - meditation is, always was and always will be an integral part of the way.

Quote:

---

Not having any attachments means that he no longer has to waste mental energy trying to protect things which don't actually exist - such as his own self, or his own future happiness, or the selves and happiness of others. His mind is thus free and open to face each situation with the utmost efficiency.

---

Agreed.

Quote:

---

This is the fundamental flaw with the practice of meditation as taught by Eastern gurus. While they are happy to give you techniques which attempt to artificially quieten the mind, they don't really address the core factors which produce the turbulent, ignorant mind to begin with.

Out of fear of alienating their followers, they shy away from dealing with the subject of attachments, and thus the spiritual benefit they provide to people is quite minimal.

---

:) You really should get out more and perhaps meet some good modern practitioners. You would need to foster an open mind however to appreciate what is on offer because you appear to have lost that quality.

Only a little research is enough to show that meditation has been and is an important practice in Theravada, Mahayana, all Tibetan forms of Buddhism, Ch'an/Zen and many forms within Hinduism.

John

Edited by: John at: 3/6/04 8:00 pm

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 34

(3/6/04 7:27 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

---

David Q. --

Quote:

---

PM: How can we "catch a thought" before it arises in consciousness? We cannot. By the time we go to "catch it", it has already arisen.

DQ: And what would we catch? An illusion that is already disappearing as we are catching it.

---

And thus, thought=emptiness.

How ironic that thought itself can bring about the recognition of its own non-existence.

Quote:

---

DQ: There is nothing to catch, just as there is nothing to let go.

---

Because the thought is empty. Yes, part of the "deepening" process I underwent two years back involved this insight that when thought is penetrated with consciousness (seeing), it is revealed to be empty, much as when a cloud is penetrated, it is revealed to be insubstantial.

Quote:

---

PM: How do we think a thought? What sort of procedure are we going through in order to bring about the appearance of a thought?

Has anyone ever truly controlled this process, in the sense of identifying *clearly* a controlling entity who is deciding, in the background, "now I am going to think this thought!"

DQ: Even if we could identify such a controller, he would necessarily be in the same boat as us. The essential problem would remain unchanged. We would have to start looking for the controller's controller.

---

Yes, but who is this "us"? Who is the one "looking"? What is looking? That was the point behind my insight...that the "controller" cannot be found because the final irreducible point is consciousness itself...which is fundamentally empty. That is, there is nothing "behind" it, it cannot be "broken down" into constituent parts. But this does not make it a "controlling entity" either. It both is, and is not.

Quote:

---

PM: Therefore, the only approach to cultivate in meditation that makes any sense is the attitude that "it doesn't matter if I'm thinking, or not-thinking".

DQ: All is empty!

---

Yes.

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 3/6/04 7:28 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2540
(3/7/04 12:13 am)
Reply

 ----

---

Tom:--

Quote:

---

There is no thinker, no doer, no self.

---

Yes there is! Why else wouldn't they be 'required' as you say?!

MGregory
Posts: 483
(3/7/04 5:53 am)
Reply

 Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

David: All is empty!

Philip: Yes.

---

Empty in relation to the fullness of what?

Paul
Registered User
Posts: 493
(3/7/04 6:04 am)
Reply

 ---

---

Playing with words is empty too, isn't it.

(Grumbling.)

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 36

(3/8/04 11:15 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

MGregory --

My understanding of the matter is this -- the Sanskrit words "shunya" ("void") and "purna" ("fullness") are often used interchangeably, being understood as two conceptual pointers to Reality. But they are just pointers. They are not Reality itself.

A good English hybrid version might be, "emptiful".

So my understanding is that these concepts ("emptiness", "fullness", "infinite", etc.), are utilized as symbols that direct the mind toward Reality...until there is a kind of "quantum leap" and the concepts/symbols/words are momentarily discarded as Reality is revealed.

So emptiness is not finally understood as being in relation to any polar opposite ("fullness", etc.) but is rather radically transcended as any sort of defining, or limiting, concept.

MGregory

Posts: 491

(3/8/04 12:26 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Hey Philip, how do you view existence? What is it?

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 37

(3/8/04 2:42 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

MGregory

Posts: 494

(3/8/04 2:49 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Sky, clouds, sunlight, sea, waves, reflection, sand, driftwood, puddle?

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 38

(3/8/04 2:51 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

That was the short of it, Matt. The long of it would be that I experience Existence as this eternal arising of form within the vast spacious emptiness of awareness. The deeper I look, the less I find "me", and the more there is only this.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 39

(3/8/04 2:53 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

How about you?

Paul

Registered User

Posts: 496

(3/8/04 2:53 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Finally we're going to the pics.

Philip is a hell, and a heaven, of Genius.

Thank you, Mr. Philip!

MGregory

Posts: 495

(3/8/04 2:56 pm)

Reply

☐ Re: Emptiness

What about the path to enlightenment? That's what I really meant. Do you see it as a logical process, or one of meditation or what?

MGregory

Posts: 496

(3/8/04 2:59 pm)

Reply

☐ Re: Emptiness

How about me? I see it in two different ways. I experience things as separate unless I'm thinking of them specifically as dualistic creations of Reality. I try to think of Reality all the time, but I forget a lot.

Edit: I should probably clarify this. Duality and Non-Duality are the same, by virtue of the fact that consciousness is by nature dualistic, so there is nothing in the Universe that isn't dualistic. Hopefully, that will help. It's just an intellectual understanding that I have.

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/8/04 3:08 pm

🕒 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 40

(3/8/04 3:26 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

☐ Re: Emptiness

Matt, I spent about two decades in various meditation practices before coming to the conclusion that no one ever "gets enlightened" strictly via meditation. But I don't think that reading the entire corpus of extant philosophical texts, and thinking about the Ultimate, does it either.

I think that both logical thought and meditation are important and necessary, but in the end the "quantum" leap I was referring to above occurs in such a fashion as to be something akin to water boiling...prior to reaching 100 Centigrade the water is "heating up", which both clear, rational thinking and meditation can aid in bringing about, but at the point of 100 C., the water undergoes a change in property, so to speak, and "shifts gears" entirely.

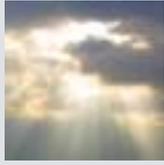

This "shifting gears" is not an act of will. (At least, not how I experienced it). It was more of the nature of waking up from a long dream, spontaneous and naturally occurring.

MGregory

Posts: 497

(3/8/04 3:45 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

The founders of this forum (they haven't formed a group or anything, they are just two individuals) maintain that "faith" in reason is the force that gives reason power to become enlightened. By "faith" they mean the will to change one's life and thought processes in complete accordance with reason. Thinking alone isn't enough. For example, one's love life has to go because of the feelings of separation it causes, dragging one back into thinking of things as separate. What do you think of this idea?

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 41

(3/9/04 10:34 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

Matt --

Quote:

---

The founders of this forum (they haven't formed a group or anything, they are just two individuals) maintain that "faith" in reason is the force that gives reason power to become enlightened. By "faith" they mean the will to change one's life and thought processes in complete accordance with reason. Thinking alone isn't enough. For example, one's love life has to go because of the feelings of separation it causes, dragging one back into thinking of things as separate. What do you think of this idea?

---

"Faith" in reason I would understand as what I call the "impulse to awaken", a force that arises from outside of our conventional mindset.

As for one's "love life having to go", I'm not sure about that. I think it depends on the growth requirements of the particular individual.

There is a fine line between Enlightenment and madness. Both penetrate beyond the superficialities of conventional mind/society. But one is balanced, and the other is out of balance. One is grounded, the other is not.

For many people, to embrace relationship is the means by which to remain grounded in this world -- "IN the world, but not OF it".

For others, it seems to be necessary to abandon conventional relationship because their sensitivity mandates them to pursue Truth in an utterly safe and insulated environment. In that regard, the Internet can function as a welcome means by which to fulfill needs to interrelate, without compromising the safety factor and the need to be free of conditioning one's behaviour in any way for others.

So I think it all depends on what *your* optimum path for growth is. That requires deep self-honesty and the importance of being free of excessive influence from others.

In my years of looking at this matter, I've found it to work roughly like this...three "types" of Truth-seekers/finders...

1. The Arhat. The solitary seeker/finder of Truth. Prefers study, meditation, simplicity. Has no excessive motivation to "enlighten others", but will happily share what he knows if these "others" cross his path and ask for such counsel. The Arhat is almost always celibate and uninterested in sexual relationship. Their primary orientation is *within*.

2. The Bodhisattva. This is the truth seeker/finder who is motivated primarily via the love of *sharing truth* with others. In the more advanced stages, the Bodhisattva is capable of great compassion and of working with many different types of people. They are often high profile teachers with many students. Sometimes they are quiet, low profile, but are still concerned with helping to "share Truth with all beings". A Bodhisattva may or may not be in relationship with a "mate". Their primary orientation is *sharing*. In the less developed stages they gravitate toward spiritual community and prefer to do their seeking/studying in the company of like minded others.

3. The Tantrica. The authentic, Realized Tantrica is someone who was once a Bodhisattva but has gone beyond the need to help others...and yet, is not really an Arhat either. The Tantrica may have many students... or may have hardly any. They may be known, or unknown. They may live as a householder, or in the wilds. They may have lovers (or a spouse) or they may have none.

A *real* Tantrica is rare...much more common is to find pretenders, or seekers disguising themselves as Tantricas as a way to justify their attachments to lust, personal love, gluttony, etc.

The "middle-staged" Tantrica is one who realizes that attempting to circumvent, suppress, or transcend their human energies -- sexual desire, desire for a mate, love of community, etc. -- in favour of ultimate Truth, just isn't working very well. They somehow feel too dry, lacking passion, can't pay their bills, feel lonely, have too many skeletons in closets, etc. Often this "out of balance" quality seems to be related to some sort of fundamental denial of who they uniquely are, and of trying too hard to emulate the teaching and/or personality of others who may be more disposed toward solitude.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

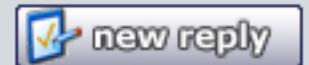

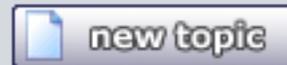

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 502(3/9/04 1:47 pm)Reply  |  Re: Emptiness <hr/> Quote: <hr/> "Faith" in reason I would understand as what I call the "impulse to awaken", a force that arises from outside of our conventional mindset. As for one's "love life having to go", I'm not sure about that. I think it depends on the growth requirements of the particular individual. <hr/> I agree. Speaking from experience, I wouldn't recommend dropping anything. Attachments naturally fall away so long as one is sufficiently devoted to Truth. I do think, though, that incompatibilities with a life of Truth need to be recognized so the path can be understood, otherwise one's growth will remain stunted. The distortion that the attachment causes in one's thought processes needs to be minimized. One has to have a conscience about these things. Quote: <hr/> There is a fine line between Enlightenment and madness. Both penetrate beyond the superficialities of conventional mind/society. But one is balanced, and the other is out of | balance. One is grounded, the other is not.

For many people, to embrace relationship is the means by which to remain grounded in this world -- "IN the world, but not OF it".

---

But the desire to be grounded in the world is a product of madness, and should be recognized as antithetical to being grounded in Truth, as is the idea of balance. The pursuit of Truth cannot be balanced with anything without completely undermining it. It is an all-or-nothing affair.

Quote:

---

So I think it all depends on what **your** optimum path for growth is. That requires deep self-honesty and the importance of being free of excessive influence from others.

---

I agree that the path is individual in the sense that a person's delusions are particular to him and the method he uses should be his own, which might include having a mate if his delusions demand it and he cannot presently overcome the need for that. But it can't be stressed enough that this a flaw and has to be acknowledged as such and the suffering of that admission felt, otherwise one is moving away from the spiritual path and in all likelihood won't be recoverable. Once the window of opportunity for enlightenment is closed, it won't open again, like the window for an Olympic gold medal.

Quote:

---

2. The Bodhisattva. This is the truth seeker/finder who is motivated primarily via the love of **sharing truth** with others. In the more advanced stages, the Bodhisattva is capable of great compassion and of working with many different types of people. They are often high profile teachers with many students. Sometimes they are quiet, low profile, but are still concerned with helping to "share Truth with all beings". A Bodhisattva may or many not be in relationship with a "mate". Their primary orientation is **sharing**. In the less developed stages they gravitate toward spiritual community and prefer to do their seeking/studying in the company of like minded others.

---

I think anyone who has a mate and claims to be a Bodhisattva is a fraud. A Bodhisattva, as it is traditionally defined in Buddhism, is a very advanced being who puts Truth before himself and pursues it at all costs. In fact, he is the most advanced being (the only exception is in the case of a Buddha, who is a flawless Bodhisattva). It's not other people that the Bodhisattva loves, but Truth. He doesn't share Truth with others for the sake of the others, but for the sake of wisdom. He knows others are not real so he does not value them, except insofar as they are capable of being vehicles for preserving wisdom. The thought of keeping a mate is in total opposition to this ideal.

Philip Mislberger

Posts: 42

(3/9/04 3:01 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

Hi Matt --

Quote:

---

But the desire to be grounded in the world is a product of madness, and should be recognized as antithetical to being grounded in Truth, as is the idea of balance. The pursuit of Truth cannot be balanced with anything without completely undermining it. It is an all-or-nothing affair.

---

Yes, being grounded in the world without prioritizing Truth only is a potential recipe for "madness", or at the least, a sleepy life. But prioritizing Truth as chiefly an intellectual abstraction at the expense of being grounded in the world lends itself easily to a closed heart or a very spiritualized ego.

By being "grounded in the world" I'm not referring to being an automaton within the "Matrix" of mass hypnosis. I'm referring to the simple capacity to be responsible, to function in the body, to be able to express and communicate, to be able to operate within the world without being caught up in the mass distractions and collective delusions. In short, what Zen sometimes refers to as "chop wood, carry water from the well".

You may have heard this Buddhist expression "Nirvana is Samsara". It refers to the deeper realization that "Truth" and "world" are finally not separate. But granted, this takes deep understanding, and in the beginning, and often for a long time to come, Truth must get prioritized over "the world" -- but never so far (barring specific retreats, etc.) that one abandons the specific spiritual lessons connected to being a *physical* being in a *physical* body.

Quote:

---

I agree that the path is individual in the sense that a person's delusions are particular to him and the method he uses should be his own, which might include having a mate if his delusions demand it and he cannot presently overcome the need for that. But it can't be stressed enough that this a flaw and has to be acknowledged as such and the suffering of that admission felt, otherwise one is moving away from the spiritual path and in all likelihood won't be recoverable. Once the window of opportunity for enlightenment is closed, it won't open again, like the window for an Olympic gold medal.

---

I would differ with you on that. I don't think there is any such thing as "one window of opportunity" for enlightenment. That sounds remarkably similar to a Christian saying "surrender now to Jesus or be damned to hell forever!" No, the love of Truth and the deep desire to Realize it can surface more than once in one's life, and under almost any circumstance.

Quote:

---

I think anyone who has a mate and claims to be a Bodhisattva is a fraud. A Bodhisattva, as it is traditionally defined in Buddhism, is a very advanced being who puts Truth before himself and pursues it at all costs. In fact, he is the most advanced being (the only exception is in the case of a Buddha, who is a flawless Bodhisattva).

---

Yes, but I was not going by strict textbook definitions. Those categories I described and the interpretations of them were not looked up in a book, they were the result of my own observations of spiritual seekers/finders over a long period of time. True, I used traditional terms (arhat, bodhisattva), but they were not intended in the strictly traditional sense.

Quote:

---

It's not other people that the Bodhisattva loves, but Truth. He doesn't share Truth with others for the sake of the others, but for the sake of wisdom. He knows others are not real so he does not value them, except insofar as they are capable of being vehicles for preserving wisdom. The thought of keeping a mate is in total opposition to this ideal.

---

How have you come to this view, Matt? Would you say that this view you've expressed is chiefly the result of what you've seen from the writings and teachings of others?

Edited by: Philip Mistlberger at: 3/9/04 3:04 pm

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 861
(3/9/04 4:10 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

MGregory: But the desire to be grounded in the world is a product of madness, and should be recognized as antithetical to being grounded in Truth.

Absolutely not. There is no difference between "world" and "truth". You study the world, you study truth.

MGrgeory: Once the window of opportunity for enlightenment is closed, it won't open again, like the window for an Olympic gold medal.

Absolutely not. That window is wide open during all of your lifetime. Mostly you just ignore it.

MGregory: I think anyone who has a mate and claims to be a Bodhisattva is a fraud.

Absolutely not. Relationships are simply part of being human. Everyone has mates, even bodhisattvas.

MGregory: He knows others are not real so he does not value them.

Absolutely not. Others are not different from him and that's why he values them.

Thomas

MGregory

Posts: 505

(3/9/04 8:18 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Philip,

Quote:

---

Yes, being grounded in the world without prioritizing Truth only is a potential recipe for "madness", or at the least, a sleepy life.

---

Yes, that's how I look at it.

Quote:

---

But prioritizing Truth as chiefly an intellectual abstraction at the expense of being grounded in the world lends itself easily to a closed heart or a very spiritualized ego.

---

That's true, but that's only temporary until one's ego sufficiently identifies itself with Truth. I don't see anything wrong with a stage like that, as long as the person doesn't get stuck in it. One has to have conviction in what he is doing, otherwise he will be constantly derailed by social pressure. And anyway, most people have grown up grounded in the world, so it's hardly anything you have to teach them about.

Quote:

---

By being "grounded in the world" I'm not referring to being an automaton within the "Matrix" of mass hypnosis. I'm referring to the simple capacity to be responsible, to function in the body, to be able to express and communicate, to be able to operate within the world without being caught up in the mass distractions and collective delusions. In short, what Zen sometimes refers to as "chop wood, carry water from the well".

---

Yes, I agree that those things are important. Obviously, we have to stay alive and avoid killing ourselves and other people.

Quote:

---

You may have heard this Buddhist expression "Nirvana is Samsara". It refers to the deeper realization that "Truth" and "world" are finally not separate. But granted, this takes deep understanding, and in the beginning, and often for a long time to come, Truth must get prioritized over "the world" -- but never so far (barring specific retreats, etc.) that one abandons the specific spiritual lessons connected to being a **physical** being in a **physical** body.

---

Yes, I don't see care of the physical body as being antithetical to Truth. I think it's very important that people take good care of themselves, and they should be encouraged to do that even if they have no interest whatsoever in enlightenment. A healthy body is good for the mind.

Quote:

---

I would differ with you on that. I don't think there is any such thing as "one window of opportunity" for enlightenment. That sounds remarkably similar to a Christian saying "surrender now to Jesus or be damned to hell forever!" No, the love of Truth and the deep desire to Realize it can surface more than once in one's life, and under almost any circumstance.

---

Well sure, but one's body and mind may not be up to the task. Both the body and the mind become hardened with habits over time, and enlightenment is a major transformation to instill in oneself. It's one of the most difficult tasks a person could undertake. Not to mention the sooner you can become enlightened, the more time you will have to perfect yourself, which includes other people. But I think everyone should strive for wisdom no matter how old they are. The best time is always now.

Quote:

---

Matt: It's not other people that the Bodhisattva loves, but Truth. He doesn't share Truth with others for the sake of the others, but for the sake of wisdom. He knows others are not real so he does not value them, except insofar as they are capable of being vehicles for preserving wisdom. The thought of keeping a mate is in total opposition to this ideal.

Philip: How have you come to this view, Matt? Would you say that this view you've expressed is chiefly the result of what you've seen from the writings and teachings of others?

---

The idea originally came to me through writings and teachings, yes, but it follows logically from the fact that you and everything else is in fact Ultimate Reality, and if Ultimate Reality is your highest value, then all things would be valued as manifestations of Ultimate Reality, not as things in themselves, which is what a person is: a thing, a dualistic construction. However, you need to act in the world. You have a body, therefore you are always taking action even if it is doing nothing. So even though you know things are illusory, you need to think about them and value some things over other things. Not emotionally, but logically so you can best direct your actions for the benefit of wisdom. Therefore, knowing that you and other people have the capacity for wisdom, this capacity is what you would concern yourself with when you act in the world as a Bodhisattva.

But having a mate or a sexual partner or whatever is an expression of valuing the person not as a vehicle of wisdom, but as an ordinary physical object. It's insulting to treat them as a thing no better than an animal, it's a disservice to them to influence them into becoming attached to you, and it sets a bad example for everyone else, even if you yourself have no attachment to the situation, which I would have serious doubts about, since there is no logical reason to have a mate with six billion ignorant people on the planet and growing. That's a lot of people in need of teaching!

This planet hardly needs more people. We have to learn how to take care of it first, to ensure the survival of the species, and thus the survival of wisdom. Right now I think it's a toss-up as to whether or not the human race will still exist in a thousand years. The world's population doubles about every 40 years. But most people would rather not be so inconvenienced as to thinking about the ramifications of that.

I see no reason to take such foolish risks with something so important. But the fact is, people don't care about life nor the meaning of life nor its purpose. They only care about pleasing themselves emotionally by having babies. I don't see how any wise person could promote that or anything related to it or resembling it. Surely you agree that we should be working for quality of life over quantity?

Matt

Philip Mislberger

Posts: 46

(3/11/04 7:19 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Emptiness

Matt --

Quote:

---

But having a mate or a sexual partner or whatever is an expression of valuing the person not as a vehicle of wisdom, but as an ordinary physical object.

---

So Matt, if you could be a very Enlightened man, *and* enjoy the companionship of a woman whom you felt deep love for, would you turn your back on that because you thought it meant you saw her only as a body? Grant this universe its mystery that is much, much bigger than your current understanding of wisdom.

The mystery is inherent in this very moment -- a small group of people are communicating via this Internet message board. The technology that allows this is recent, and would not have been possible ten or fifteen years ago. This BBS shows about 560 members...I notice a current regular posting "core" of about 30, perhaps. Why these 30? Why "MGregory" and "birdofhermes" and "Ksolway" and others? Why these specific people?

These are *koans*, rationally insoluble questions. I suggest to you that the question of whether or not you (or anyone) will be "with a mate" is an equal mystery. You just don't know, and nor can you know what your ultimate destiny will be in that regard.

Buddha himself was originally married. Yes, he left that relationship as part of his quest for perfection, but one can see that it was part of his destiny to have the experience of marriage and fathering a child. We cannot argue that he "should never have gotten married".

Although I don't have hard statistics, I have heard, gathered from general reading, and learned from my travels and years in various spiritual communities, that roughly 50% of serious spiritual seekers/finders have mates, including many generally recognized as enlightened or at least very wise.

The Tibetan tradition is perhaps instructive there. The four chief lineages of Tibetan Buddhism have generally been known as Nyingma, Kargyu, Sakya, and Gelugpa. Of those, the first two are usually non-monastic, involve many lay-practitioners, and lamas (senior teachers) are frequently married. The second two, Sakya and Gelugpa, are essentially monastic traditions and most practitioners are celibate monks or nuns (the Dalai Lama comes out of the Gelugpa lineage).

Quote:

---

It's insulting to treat them as a thing no better than an animal, it's a disservice to them to influence them into becoming attached to you, and it sets a bad example for everyone else, even if you yourself have no attachment to the situation, which I would have serious doubts about, since there is no logical reason to have a mate with six billion ignorant people on the planet and growing. That's a lot of people in need of teaching!

---

One does not "have a mate" in a spiritual context in order to "make babies". But even so, if Matt was to get married to a woman he loved, have a child, and if that child was to grow up to be a Buddha, then clearly this Buddha would have been deprived of his opportunity to share his light on Earth if Matt had opted for monkhood instead.

I've known many, many wonderful spiritual women, Matt. I've had relationships with some of them. They weren't always easy, but I regretted none of them because after each relationship I emerged a deeper, larger man, with a heart capable of more compassion.

But, that was my path. You will have to find yours.

MGregory

Posts: 517

(3/12/04 12:13 am)

Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

So Matt, if you could be a very Enlightened man, *and* enjoy the companionship of a woman whom you felt deep love for, would you turn your back on that because you thought it meant you saw her only as a body? Grant this universe its mystery that is much, much bigger than your current understanding of wisdom.

---

Sure, I will grant you that, but if I were enlightened, I would be too busy pursuing perfection, so I wouldn't have time to enjoy anything.

Quote:

---

The mystery is inherent in this very moment -- a small group of people are communicating via this Internet message board. The technology that allows this is recent, and would not have been possible ten or fifteen years ago. This BBS shows about 560 members...I notice a current regular posting "core" of about 30, perhaps. Why these 30? Why "MGregory" and "birdofhermes" and "Ksolway" and others? Why these specific people?

These are *koans*, rationally insoluble questions.

---

No, these are things middle school students think about when they're waiting for the bell. Why are people caused to do the things they do?

Quote:

---

I suggest to you that the question of whether or not you (or anyone) will be "with a mate" is an equal mystery. You just don't know, and nor can you know what your ultimate destiny will be in that regard.

---

If I cared, I would spend my time reading horoscopes.

Quote:

---

Buddha himself was originally married. Yes, he left that relationship as part of his quest for perfection, but one can see that it was part of his destiny to have the experience of marriage and fathering a child. We cannot argue that he "should never have gotten married".

---

Nor would I try.

Quote:

---

Although I don't have hard statistics, I have heard, gathered from general reading, and learned from my travels and years in various spiritual communities, that roughly 50% of serious spiritual seekers/finders have mates, including many generally recognized as enlightened or at least very wise.

---

That doesn't surprise me in the least. It means nothing to me, though. I don't model myself after the things I read, nor spiritual communities, nor what is generally said about people. I am not much of a gambler.

Quote:

---

The Tibetan tradition is perhaps instructive there. The four chief lineages of Tibetan Buddhism have generally been known as Nyingma, Kargyu, Sakya, and Gelugpa. Of those, the first two are usually non-monastic, involve many lay-practitioners, and lamas (senior teachers) are frequently married. The second two, Sakya and Gelugpa, are essentially monastic traditions and most practitioners are celibate monks or nuns (the Dalai Lama comes out of the Gelukpa lineage).

---

I don't follow any tradition, so they don't interest me much.

Quote:

---

One does not "have a mate" in a spiritual context in order to "make babies". But even so, if Matt was to get married to a woman he loved, have a child, and if that child was to grow up to be a Buddha, then clearly this Buddha would have been deprived of his opportunity to share his light on Earth if Matt had opted for monkhood instead.

---

Sure, and if I went out and killed a few people, I could be saving a Buddha from being murdered by one of them. Do you honestly think one should base their decisions on remote possibilities?

Quote:

---

I've known many, many wonderful spiritual women, Matt. I've had relationships with some of them. They weren't always easy, but I regretted none of them because after each relationship I emerged a deeper, larger man, with a heart capable of more compassion.

---

I am different in that I regret none of my regrets.

Quote:

---

But, that was my path. You will have to find yours.

---

So your path is finished, I take it? That was quick.

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2279

(3/12/04 7:57 am)

Reply

Re: Emptiness

Philip wrote:

Quote:

---

So Matt, if you could be a very Enlightened man, *and* enjoy the companionship of a woman whom you felt deep love for, would you turn your back on that because you thought it meant you saw her only as a body? Grant this universe its mystery that is much, much bigger than your current understanding of wisdom.

---

The core question is, what would an enlightened person personally gain from being in an intimate relationship?

The answer is, nothing.

So the only way he could justify being in an intimate relationship is by determining that it aided the cause of wisdom.

The question thus becomes: How does trying himself down to one particular person, and looking after her needs to the exclusion of everyone else, benefit the cause of wisdom?

What are your thoughts on this, Philip?

Quote:

---

I suggest to you that the question of whether or not you (or anyone) will be "with a mate" is an equal mystery. You just don't know, and nor can you know what your ultimate destiny will be in that regard.

---

I'm a bit disappointed in this comment because it indicates a lack of desire on your part to determine your own destiny. A sage doesn't leave anything to chance if he can possibly help it. He consciously creates his own fate.

Quote:

---

Buddha himself was originally married. Yes, he left that relationship as part of his quest for perfection, but one can see that it was part of his destiny to have the experience of marriage and fathering a child. We cannot argue that he "should never have gotten married".

---

St Paul once said that it is better to marry than burn - meaning that if it is too difficult to be single and it is causing you to lose your physical and mental health, then forming an emotional relationship with someone else is probably the sensible thing to do. But those are pretty extreme circumstances - albeit circumstances that most of the human race currently finds itself in.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 47

(3/12/04 9:23 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Sure, I will grant you that, but if I were enlightened, I would be too busy pursuing perfection, so I wouldn't have time to enjoy anything.

---

If you were enlightened, you wouldn't be concerned with "pursuit". You'd be immersed in the immensity of eternity, of Life. This is pure en-JOY-ment.

Quote:

---

PM: I suggest to you that the question of whether or not you (or anyone) will be "with a mate" is an equal mystery. You just don't know, and nor can you know what your ultimate destiny will be in that regard.

MG: If I cared, I would spend my time reading horoscopes.

---

You don't care about your ultimate destiny?

Quote:

---

PM: Although I don't have hard statistics, I have heard, gathered from general reading, and learned from my travels and years in various spiritual communities, that roughly 50% of serious spiritual seekers/finders have mates, including many generally recognized as enlightened or at least very wise.

MG: That doesn't surprise me in the least. It means nothing to me, though. I don't model myself after the things I read, nor spiritual communities, nor what is generally said about people. I am not much of a gambler.

---

I suspect you do, in part, "model yourself after spiritual communities". This "Genius Forum" is a "spiritual community". Its essence is spirituality, and the fact that it is comprised of a regular group of interacting entities makes it a "community". If you can honestly say that you don't in any way "model yourself" after any of the teachings here, or at the least, the spirit of inquiry here, I'd be surprised.

Quote:

---

PM: The Tibetan tradition is perhaps instructive there. The four chief lineages of Tibetan Buddhism have generally been known as Nyingma, Kargyu, Sakya, and Gelugpa. Of those, the first two are usually non-monastic, involve many lay-practitioners, and lamas (senior teachers) are frequently married. The second two, Sakya and Gelugpa, are essentially monastic traditions and most practitioners are celibate monks or nuns (the Dalai Lama comes out of the Gelukpa lineage).

MG: I don't follow any tradition, so they don't interest me much.

---

You don't have to "follow a tradition" to learn something from it. I would hope you'd be open-minded enough to know a thing or two about certain spiritually oriented cultures (like Tibetan Buddhism) that survived for over a thousand years, and produced many great practitioners and teachers -- or at the least, to be **curious** about them. Much as one can be interested in the tradition of Western philosophy, and its many exponents, without subscribing to the lifestyle of an 18th century European philosopher, for example.

Quote:

---

PM: One does not "have a mate" in a spiritual context in order to "make babies". But even so, if Matt was to get married to a woman he loved, have a child, and if that child was to grow up to be a Buddha, then clearly this Buddha would have been deprived of his opportunity to share his light on Earth if Matt had opted for monkhood instead.

MG: Sure, and if I went out and killed a few people, I could be saving a Buddha from being murdered by one of them. Do you honestly think one should base their decisions on remote possibilities?

---

I am saying that your comments about "over-population" on Earth are as general and vague and far removed from your own direct life lessons as is your own ability to know your ultimate fate in this life.

I know many adult spiritual practitioners who happened to have mates, and children. In practically all cases these children grew up to be fine young adults.

Yes, obviously overpopulation is a great concern -- but this is chiefly for large 3rd World nations with spiralling birth rates. Most large Western nations have virtually zero population growth rate, or very near that. The cultural lessons and challenges are unique to different parts of the globe.

We cannot hide behind "global concerns" when looking at our own personal **optimum** path to follow. Yours may indeed involve having a mate -- I'm saying, stay open to the possibility. Don't be a closed book.

Quote:

---

PM: I've known many, many wonderful spiritual women, Matt. I've had relationships with some of them. They weren't always easy, but I regretted none of them because after each relationship I emerged a deeper, larger man, with a heart capable of more compassion.

MG: I am different in that I regret none of my regrets.

---

How can you "not regret" a "regret"? This is a tacit admission that you have regrets. If you have regrets, then you regret.

An equivalent expression would be, "I'm not angry about my anger". It's a cute word play but doesn't change that fact that you are angry.

Quote:

---

PM: But, that was my path. You will have to find yours.

MG: So your path is finished, I take it? That was quick.

---

Was my path -- *past* tense. Read carefully. I do not know what my future holds, because I do not know the future.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 48

(3/12/04 10:29 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

David --

Quote:

---

So the only way he could justify being in an intimate relationship is by determining that it aided the cause of wisdom.

The question thus becomes: How does trying himself down to one particular person, and looking after her needs to the exclusion of everyone else, benefit the cause of wisdom?

What are your thoughts on this, Philip?

---

I'll try to answer this one from my own personal experiences.

As I mentioned in the other thread, I spent close to two decades in several different spiritual communities. Most of these communities embraced the idea of the "yoga of relationship", or, as it's more commonly (though often inaccurately) known as, "Red Tantra".

Red Tantra as a philosophy and teaching derives originally from northern India, from the Bengali Tantric traditions. (I'm certain these ideas and teachings were found in other traditions around the world, but were very developed in north India). The tradition of Tantra that migrated to Tibet to become "Vajrayana" or "Diamond Way" Buddhism is often commonly known as "White Tantra". It's completely distinct from Red Tantra.

The basic idea is that White Tantra involves a solitary life, usually celibate, and deals with one's personal relationship with the Whole Cosmos. One pursues one's Enlightenment alone or in the general company of other celibate practitioners.

Red Tantra involves utilizing the *actual relationship with a mate* as a means to spiritual awakening and Realization. This can and does involve many specific practices and methods, the crux of which involves utilizing the relationship as a vehicle to more deeply understand one's own mind.

That doesn't imply that "relationship yoga" is some effortless and even clinical venture in which two people are somehow magically "enlightening" each other without getting attached to each other. Not at all. In the cases of some very mature practitioners and couples, there may indeed be virtually no attachment, but it is admittedly rare.

The idea behind "conscious relationship" is that it partly becomes a laboratory for people to directly and honestly face the demons of the subconscious.

These "demons" are not created by the conditions of the relationship, but are already there, the result of years, and even generations, of culturally conditioned blocks to living a free, unattached life.

In "relationship-yoga", the heart of the "work" is to understand, deeply and directly, the power of the mind to *project* and thus distort Reality.

Psychologically, a projection is, essentially, "what I see in you, that I don't want to, or can't, see in myself".

Projection is at the heart of much global misery and global enmity, and most certainly at the heart of most deadly emotional reactionism. (Most crimes are "crimes of passion", usually based on the need to get vengeance on someone who broke an unwritten "contract" not to give their personal energy to any other person except the "mate" or designated "special person").

So, the main idea behind "relationship yoga" is to have a "learning partner", or as it's sometimes called, a "healing partner", in which to use the relationship as a kind of laboratory to grasp how projection works, and how it has the power to mold our perception of Reality. (Granted, this requires a mate who is interested in such matters and willing to share in the mutual investigation of them. I was fortunate more than once to be with such a partner).

Essentially, *projection = perception*. That is, we generally see the contents of our own filters, not much else. The Enlightenment process, as I've come to understand it, involves this Shift from mere perception, to actual knowingness. The knowingness comes about as we go beyond projection itself.

What I've found is that some solitary practitioners fool themselves into how far they've actually come in growing beyond their own tendency to project onto Reality. They do so because they often times have lacked sufficient intimate contact with others in order to experience more directly the darker, repressed parts of their minds, which are originating in generations of culturally programmed stuff.

Certainly, the other side of the ledger exists as well, those people unable to let go of relationship for fear of being alone, and confronting their subconscious shadows in that form. I can say that I've faced both; plenty of time in intimate relationship with women "on a spiritual path", and plenty of time on my own. In both case I have no doubt that the "cause of wisdom" was benefitted, even if it didn't always look pretty.

Quote:

---

PM: I suggest to you that the question of whether or not you (or anyone) will be "with a mate" is an equal mystery. You just don't know, and nor can you know what your ultimate destiny will be in that regard.

DQ: I'm a bit disappointed in this comment because it indicates a lack of desire on your part to determine your own destiny. A sage doesn't leave anything to chance if he can possibly help it. He consciously creates his own fate.

---

Agreed about the importance of being impeccable in terms of one's intention for Truth. My reference was in a different direction, one we can perhaps explore here. It goes off on a line of inquiry that finally has nothing to do with being in an intimate relationship or not. It has more to do with the pure Advaita Vedanta teachings regarding "free will".

As I'm sure you know David, in pure Advaita there is the idea put forth that "free will" is ultimately seen to be an illusion. Over the past couple of years, much of my "deepening" has involved seeing this Truth in more and more resolution.

But it is very subtle. It doesn't mean that we can't make choices. Obviously, we make apparent choices all the time. The Advaitan idea has more to do with the direct inquiry into the "me" that is apparently making the choice. As one sees the insubstantiality of this "me", one sees a Vaster Presence through which all apparent decisions are unfolding.

This Vast Presence is so purely Infinite as to "outshine" or "eclipse" the small "personal me" that seems to be making these decisions.

The "personal me" is largely based on projection and perception of the apparent universe.

The Vast Presence does not project, nor perceive. It simply rests in **knowing**, but this "resting" is, paradoxically, not passive. It is both still and silent and deeply involved and active at the same time.

So in the context of "knowing our future", or "our destiny" (and whether or not that involves being with a mate, etc.), I was referring more to this deepening alignment with the Vast Impersonal Will, and how, from the point of view of a small personal self with concerns and ambitions related to spiritual enlightenment, the details of this unfolding Destiny are unknowable.

Quote:

---

St Paul once said that it is better to marry than burn - meaning that if it is too difficult to be single and it is causing you to lose your physical and mental health, then forming an emotional relationship with someone else is probably the sensible thing to do. But those are pretty extreme circumstances - albeit circumstances that most of the human race currently finds itself in.'

---

Sure, this is a universal ego-condition, the fear of being alone. But I was referring more to our Greater Destiny as it unfolds in Reality.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 221

(3/12/04 11:12 am)

Reply

Quote:

---

But it is very subtle. It doesn't mean that we can't make choices. Obviously, we make apparent choices all the time. The Advaitan idea has more to do with the direct inquiry into the "me" that is apparently making the choice. As one sees the insubstantiality of this "me", one sees a Vaster Presence through which all apparent decisions are unfolding.

This Vast Presence is so purely Infinite as to "outshine" or "eclipse" the small "personal me" that seems to be making these decisions.

The "personal me" is largely based on projection and perception of the apparent universe.

The Vast Presence does not project, nor perceive. It simply rests in *knowing*, but this "resting" is, paradoxically, not passive. It is both still and silent and deeply involved and active at the same time.

---

I find this Vast Presence thing kind of lame. There is not an "I" who is doing things, but that doesn't mean that there is a Vast Presence. It only means that there's no schism between action and actor. They are one and the same.

If there is a Vast Presence, it's completely detached from EVERYTHING, making it irrelevant. It doesn't have a thing to do with our awareness, our consciousness or our actions.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 49

(3/12/04 11:31 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: ...

---

Quote:

---

I find this Vast Presence thing kind of lame. There is not an "I" who is doing things, but that doesn't mean that there is a Vast Presence. It only means that there's no schism between action and actor. They are one and the same.

---

You can call it "Vast Presence", or you can call it "no schism between action and actor". Both are just fingers pointing toward the Moon.

Quote:

---

If there is a Vast Presence, it's completely detached from EVERYTHING, making it irrelevant. It doesn't have a thing to do with our awareness, our consciousness or our actions

---

Rairun, my experience of this "empty vastness" (another term for it) is that it's not at all "detached from everything". On the contrary, *everything* is arising within it.

Here's an analogy. Think of a landscape -- with clouds, land formations, weather, etc.

Clouds are something like thoughts, forming and dissolving in the pure sky.

The weather is something like emotion -- sometimes calm, sometimes stormy.

Land formations are something like bodies, and physical reality. Appearing to be a bit more stable, but changing all the time as well.

The "vastness" I was referring to is not *any one thing* in the landscape -- it is rather the entire landscape. It is space, but also not-space, thing, and not-thing. It contains all, while also being empty.

From the point of view of an individual cloud, or a weather pattern, or a land formation, there does indeed appear to be a distinct entity making decisions. But from the point of view of the entire landscape, it is all just unfolding.

But as I've come to understand it, Enlightenment doesn't involve the forced, artificial "leap-frog" into the Greater View at the expense of becoming passive and neglecting bodily existence. It is rather a simultaneous awareness of both Bigger View, and individual existence in a body.

What does become more clear, however, is how the apparent individual "doer" within is seen to be insubstantial.

MGregory

Posts: 519

(3/12/04 11:45 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

If you were enlightened, you wouldn't be concerned with "pursuit". You'd be immersed in the immensity of eternity, of Life. This is pure en-JOY-ment.

---

No, you are wrong there. Anyone who stops the pursuit short of perfection, which includes all living beings in the universe, has fallen off the path and into egotism. I think you are vastly underestimating the power of the ego. Even enlightenment is not a permanent destruction of it. Enlightenment is only the beginning. To take a rest at that point is a serious error that can leave one in a worse state than they were in before their enlightenment.

Quote:

---

You don't care about your ultimate destiny?

---

Well, I don't care about wondering what it is going to be. It's not anything that isn't taken care of in the present.

Quote:

---

I suspect you do, in part, "model yourself after spiritual communities". This "Genius Forum" is a "spiritual community". Its essence is spirituality, and the fact that it is comprised of a regular group of interacting entities makes it a "community". If you can honestly say that you don't in any way "model yourself" after any of the teachings here, or at the least, the spirit of inquiry here, I'd be surprised.

---

What I mean is, I don't consciously follow anything but my own reasoning. I don't come here looking for role models or friends or anything. This is strictly business.

Quote:

---

You don't have to "follow a tradition" to learn something from it. I would hope you'd be open-minded enough to know a thing or two about certain spiritually oriented cultures (like Tibetan Buddhism) that survived for over a thousand years, and produced many great practitioners and teachers -- or at the least, to be **curious** about them. Much as one can be interested in the tradition of Western philosophy, and its many exponents, without subscribing to the lifestyle of an 18th century European philosopher, for example.

---

I am somewhat interested in Western philosophy, but only because many of the people on these boards follow that tradition, so I study it primarily to understand the people around me. It has come up with a few interesting ideas, but they are pretty rare. I don't know any Buddhists or anything. If I did I might be inclined to study their traditions. As far as Buddhism is concerned, I pretty much only study their scriptures. There is only so much material that I have time to study, so I have to be selective.

Quote:

---

We cannot hide behind "global concerns" when looking at our own personal *optimum* path to follow. Yours may indeed involve having a mate -- I'm saying, stay open to the possibility. Don't be a closed book.

---

I don't base my decisions on these things. I was merely trying to show you how irrational it is to think that dating is in any way spiritual or indeed has any benefit to anyone at all. But I'm not a closed book: if someone can't deal with the dread of the path and their thoughts turn hopeless and suicidal, then they should by all means get a girlfriend and chill out for awhile. There's nothing wrong with that. But if someone is doing well spiritually, then what would be the point? It would be like a novelist working one night on his magnum opus, who, in the middle of a great surge of creativity and inspiration, suddenly stops and goes outside to play on a swing set. That's what you're asking me to be "open" to, but there is no logic in that.

The optimum path consists of dropping one's emotional attachments. It's not a big mystery. The only reason people even notice a person's sex is because of their attachment to it.

Quote:

---

How can you "not regret" a "regret"? This is a tacit admission that you have regrets. If you have regrets, then you regret.

---

What I'm saying is that I don't regret having them or having had them. In other words, I don't consider regret to be a bad thing.

Quote:

---

Was my path -- *past* tense. Read carefully. I do not know what my future holds, because I do not know the future.

---

No, write carefully. You're saying that you are no longer on the path because it is now in the past.

Rairun

Registered User

Posts: 222

(3/12/04 12:00 pm)

Reply

 ...

---

Yeah, I know what you mean by it... it's like poetry in a sense, and it's valid as that. But if I take it in an objective way, it doesn't explain exactly how I perceive things to be happening.

I don't identify myself with some sort of emptiness from where all things arise. I identify myself with thought. At any given moment, I am what I am thinking. I don't mean I am a red cow if I think "red cow" though. I am the thought "red cow". I'm not the content of the thought, but the thought itself.

That way, the concept of doing things doesn't cross my mind at all. I don't move, I am movement. That's all I know. I guess I can assume that I am being moved, if I want to create a doer, but I don't know anything about it. It's probably my brain or some shit.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 872

(3/12/04 3:18 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Philip: Red Tantra involves utilizing the *actual relationship with a mate* as a means to spiritual awakening and Realization. This can and does involve many specific practices and methods, the crux of which involves utilizing the relationship as a vehicle to more deeply understand one's own mind.

It's interesting that you mention this. What you call Red Tantra path must then run pretty much against the convictions of the founders of this discussion board (David, Kevin, and Dan = QRS) who have stated on many occasions that relationships, especially love/mate relationships, are a fundamental barrier to spiritual growth.

Their argument is that such relationships can only exist as a consequence of egotistic attachments and can only function on the basis of mutual (selfish) exploitation. In particular, they have stated that the male's spiritual energy is stalled and corrupted by the inferior female. I remember that David has on one occasion compared love relationships with leprosy and that he frequently speaks of married couples as 'spiritually dead' people.

In addition, QRS hold that males have an inherently higher potential for enlightenment than females, because they are more logical. According to this line of thought, the best thing a woman can do is to abolish her femaleness and become entirely male in character.

It would be interesting to know what you think about these issues.

Thomas

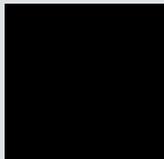

Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 50

(3/14/04 3:22 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

No, you are wrong there. Anyone who stops the pursuit short of perfection, which includes all living beings in the universe, has fallen off the path and into egotism. I think you are vastly underestimating the power of the ego. Even enlightenment is not a permanent destruction of it.

Enlightenment is only the beginning. To take a rest at that point is a serious error that can leave one in a worse state than they were in before their enlightenment.

---

Are you enlightened, Matt? If not, then your statements about what **follows** enlightenment would seem to amount to just excerpts of memorized information. It's no different from a conventional religionist saying what is going to happen to you **after** death, etc., when he himself has not died.

I'd suggest, first become enlightened, then find out whether my statement about "not being **concerned** with pursuit" (which does **not** imply stagnation or lack of deepening in understanding) and being "immersed in pure Life" is true or not.

Quote:

---

I am somewhat interested in Western philosophy, but only because many of the people on these boards follow that tradition, so I study it primarily to understand the people around me. It has come up with a few interesting ideas, but they are pretty rare. I don't know any Buddhists or anything. If I did I might be inclined to study their traditions. As far as Buddhism is concerned, I pretty much only study their scriptures. There is only so much material that I have time to study, so I have to be selective.

---

I've been studying Buddhism seriously since about 1975. I've pretty much looked into all of its branches and sub-branches. I also wrote the Forward to the book "Freeing the Buddha", by Brian Ruhe, a close friend of mine who is was a Theravadin monk in Thailand. My own opinion is that the highest teachings of Buddhism are found in the Tibetan traditions, and in Zen.

Quote:

---

I don't base my decisions on these things. I was merely trying to show you how irrational it is to think that dating is in any way spiritual or indeed has any benefit to anyone at all. But I'm not a closed book: if someone can't deal with the dread of the path and their thoughts turn hopeless and suicidal, then they should by all means get a girlfriend and chill out for awhile. There's nothing wrong with that. But if someone is doing well spiritually, then what would be the point? It would be like a novelist working one night on his magnum opus, who, in the middle of a great surge of creativity and inspiration, suddenly stops and goes outside to play on a swing set. That's what you're asking me to be "open" to, but there is no logic in that.

---

You may indeed have to "play on a swing set" if you're writing material on your novel about how a child is seeing the world. In order to "inhabit" that character you may indeed need to see things from the child's perspective. The best novelists in the world write about things they are very familiar with. The power of their writing stems from their direct experience.

Similarly, only a very rare soul can transcend relationship/sexuality without having first deeply experienced it, or at the very least, tasted it, so that it doesn't just exist as some deeply repressed desire based on pure fantasy.

Quote:

---

The optimum path consists of dropping one's emotional attachments. It's not a big mystery. The only reason people even notice a person's sex is because of their attachment to it.

---

Yes, but the whole point is about **how** to go beyond those attachments.

That's what my last post was touching on -- the key point that there is more than one way to "get beyond" attachments. Simply shunning relationship/sex is the path of the bramacharya, or celibate monk. Very few can do this approach without repressing parts of themselves, or living a life of fantasy/masturbation alongside their spiritual practices. This often involves simple denial, or hiding away parts of oneself. Enlightenment has nothing to do with denial, or hiding away parts of oneself.

Celibacy/bramacharya may be your path. Or it may not. You're likely too young yet to know with certainty whether being with a mate or not will be your optimum spiritual path. My only caution is to avoid getting into a hardend mindset -- "I will never have a mate because to do so is bad for Enlightenment". Avoid such fundamentalism.

Quote:

---

PM: Was my path -- **past** tense. Read carefully. I do not know what my future holds, because I do not know the future.

MG: No, write carefully. You're saying that you are no longer on the path because it is now in the past.

---

"That was my path" -- **my** path. Not **the** path.

In my current condition (for the past two years, roughly) I don't experience a "path" anymore. At least I wouldn't call it by that lable. It has shifted more into a direct experience of who I am. This still includes investigation, but no longer **seeking** and thus no longer **following** some path*.

Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 51

(3/14/04 3:39 pm)

Reply

ezSupporter

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

It's interesting that you mention this. What you call Red Tantra path must then run pretty much against the convictions of the founders of this discussion board (David, Kevin, and Dan = QRS) who have stated on many occasions that relationships, especially love/mate relationships, are a fundamental barrier to spiritual growth.

Their argument is that such relationships can only exist as a consequence of egotistic attachments and can only function on the basis of mutual (selfish) exploitation. In particular, they have stated that the male's spiritual energy is stalled and corrupted by the inferior female. I remember that David has on one occasion compared love relationships with leprosy and that he frequently speaks of married couples as 'spiritually dead' people.

---

Thomas, I would understand that as David's and Kevin's route to Reality. If they are Awakened to their true nature, then how they got there is less concern to me in any universally applicable sense.

There's an old Tibetan fable of a spiritual seeker who attains to Enlightenment while studying under a man who only afterward reveals that he is in fact a con man. But by that time, the student is already Enlightened, so it doesn't matter who or what the "master" was.

The fable is a teaching about *purity of intent*. The idea is that with purity of intent anything is possible. The particular angle of approach we make, or who we study with, is finally less important than our sincerity and pure intention to know Truth.

So if someone has arrived at a Truth-full recognition of their being, and they are not deluded, then I'm happy for them. But that doesn't necessarily mean that the way they got there is the *only* way to get there.

Quote:

---

In addition, QRS hold that males have an inherently higher potential for enlightenment than females, because they are more logical. According to this line of thought, the best thing a woman can do is to abolish her femaleness and become entirely male in character.

It would be interesting to know what you think about these issues.

---

I'm sure that their argument is ultimately more comprehensive and more subtle than simply a woman needing to "abolish femaleness". But I'm sure that is a matter for a book-length debate/study.

The crucial point would seem to be, are there any genuinely Enlightened women? I believe I have met some. They are definitely not as high-profile as male teachers, but they are there.

MGregory

Posts: 531

(3/15/04 10:21 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Philip: Are you enlightened, Matt? If not, then your statements about what **follows** enlightenment would seem to amount to just excerpts of memorized information. It's no different from a conventional religionist saying what is going to happen to you **after** death, etc., when he himself has not died.

I'd suggest, first become enlightened, then find out whether my statement about "not being **concerned** with pursuit" (which does **not** imply stagnation or lack of deepening in understanding) and being "immersed in pure Life" is true or not.

---

Well, you started it by claiming that a Bodhisattva becomes enlightened and then goes off to find a girlfriend as if that were a spiritual activity. I object to the idea that any activity is spiritual.

Quote:

---

Similarly, only a very rare soul can transcend relationship/sexuality without having first deeply experienced it, or at the very least, tasted it, so that it doesn't just exist as some deeply repressed desire based on pure fantasy.

---

That could be, but I don't see the point in encouraging people to be unrare souls.

Quote:

---

That's what my last post was touching on -- the key point that there is more than one way to "get beyond" attachments. Simply shunning relationship/sex is the path of the bramacharya, or celibate monk. Very few can do this approach without repressing parts of themselves, or living a life of fantasy/masturbation alongside their spiritual practices. This often involves simple denial, or hiding away parts of oneself. Enlightenment has nothing to do with denial, or hiding away parts of oneself.

---

I agree, I'm not trying to say that. But I would venture to say that most married men repress parts of themselves anyway, so I don't think there is a simple solution.

Quote:

---

Celibacy/bramacharya may be your path. Or it may not. You're likely too young yet to know with certainty whether being with a mate or not will be your optimum spiritual path. My only caution is to avoid getting into a hardened mindset -- "I will never have a mate because to do so is bad for Enlightenment". Avoid such fundamentalism.

---

I only have a hardened mindset about the ideal of spirituality. I don't think it's useful to water down our ideals for the sake of "sensitivity", or the idea that we can't live up to them. In my view, it would destroy a perfectly good teaching method.

Quote:

---

In my current condition (for the past two years, roughly) I don't experience a "path" anymore. At least I wouldn't call it by that name. It has shifted more into a direct experience of who I am. This still includes investigation, but no longer *seeking* and thus no longer *following some path*.

---

I would call that "the path". In fact, I would consider that the beginning of the path, since before that time we are basically looking for it. It's not just a question of terminology, but one of ideals.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 874
(3/15/04 1:23 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

MGregory: I agree, I'm not trying to say that. But I would venture to say that most married men repress parts of themselves anyway, so I don't think there is a simple solution.

Okay, let me take a shot at it.

David and Kevin seem to promote the "celibate hermit" path to enlightenment. While I think that this is a possible approach, I believe that it is unsuitable for the majority of people. Hermit life requires a very unusual amount of resolution, discipline, and independence. You stand on one leg, so to speak, and you topple down easily without the aforementioned qualities. The hermit path is great for periods of intense study, meditation, or in situations where a similar endeavor becomes one's focus in life. But otherwise the inherent dangers outweigh its advantages.

I think that for a young male repressed sexual desires can become quite an obstacle to hermit life. "Celibate" means no sex. Obviously, you are not celibate when you masturbate or engage in casual sex, and the latter two are spiritually inferior. For most people, celibacy is difficult enough to maintain in a monastery where the community reaffirms celibacy vows constantly. It is even more difficult in the absence of such a support system.

Most people, however, choose to live in a relationship with a permanent mate. What does this arrangement offer spiritually? Well, obviously, it depends quite a bit on your mate. If you chose unwisely it may be even worse than living alone. :- ( On the other hand, marriage can be beneficial to spiritual growth if you find a way to tune in with your partner. Women often excel males in compassion and loving kindness, so a man can learn compassion and loving kindness from his wife and his family. Both partners learn from honoring the vow that a marriage represents. Finally, being a parent provides a couple with the opportunity to develop generosity, selflessness, and endurance. Since mates support each other, couple life is less susceptible to external disturbances than hermit life.

What concerns spiritual development, neither married life nor bachelor life is inherently superior. The main advantage I see in staying single is that you are free to devote time to spiritual endeavors, for example within a religious community. The main advantage I see in married life is that it provides you with an opportunity to learn from your partner. The partners can help each other to overcome limitations. In addition, the bond offers a protection that the bachelor doesn't enjoy.

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1461

(3/15/04 2:02 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

I was thinking more about all this last night, and it seemed to me even more absurd for enlightenment religions to focus on celibacy and disdain family life. If that is what it is about, then it is irrelevant to humanity. What humans need to do, is to figure out how to live and how to perceive. People need to learn how to live right here in a magnificent condition of love and awareness. If they can disembody or stop reincarnating or become enlightened in monasticism, fine, but what has that to do with the people who are, after all, people? People who are going to continue the human line.

In fact, spiritually great people should be required to have children. If the spiritually minded are continually siphoned away from the gene pool that is totally antievolutionary for the human race. And no nonsense about how the enlightened provide help for humanity. They cannot provide real, substantial help if there is a divide between those who reproduce and those who make spiritual progress. And the twain will be ever further apart.

"For when the leaven has lost its leaven, with what shall the bread be leavened?" (Or something like that.)

SDWangmo

Registered User

Posts: 122

(3/15/04 2:52 pm)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

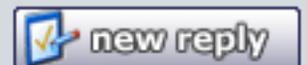

---

Re 'enlightenment religions' focusing on celibacy & disdaining family life, this is not always the case. There are some Tibetan Buddhist traditions which are non-celibate & non-monastic, where one is encouraged to use the material of everyday life as the basis for practice. There are stories of the 84 Mahasiddhas of ancient India who attained realization through practicing in the context of their various life circumstances (thief, housewife, etc). There are people practicing in this style today.

Many people seem to have trouble reconciling spirituality with anything having to do with the body - especially sex. It is a kind of neo-Puritanism that's popular in the West today where, on the one hand, sex is supposed to be the great motivator of all activity, but on the other it is considered sinful & degraded. Many people are comforted by the thought of 'pure' monks having only the remotest connection to the physical world. But if one has truly transcended duality (body/mind, pure/impure, spiritual/mundane) how could any activity be separate from the enlightened state?

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

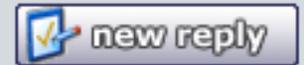

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                          | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| MGregoryPosts: 535(3/16/04 12:14 am)Reply |  Marriage and Spirit <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Thomas: David and Kevin seem to promote the "celibate hermit" path to enlightenment. While I think that this is a possible approach, I believe that it is unsuitable for the majority of people. Hermit life requires a very unusual amount of resolution, discipline, and independence. You stand on one leg, so to speak, and you topple down easily without the aforementioned qualities. The hermit path is great for periods of intense study, meditation, or in situations where a similar endeavor becomes one's focus in life. But otherwise the inherent dangers outweigh its advantages. <hr/> The dangers are precisely what makes it so valuable! A person isn't going to approach God (or Nonduality, if you prefer) if they experience comfort all the time. There has to be a profound dissatisfaction with one's state of affairs to generate the sufficient motivational force to overcome oneself. But you don't want to be completely overwhelmed with suffering, either, or you'll spend your time thinking about relieving it, so I think it's a question of balancing one's pushing of oneself and one's ability to deal with suffering without becoming distracted by it. Another person in the equation just makes this needlessly difficult. That a person would topple down in attempting this strikes me as a fearful thing to say. I mean, so what? Does spirituality involve avoiding all challenges or | something? I say not. Spirituality is above all a conquest. Fear of failure is probably the number one reason why there are so few great men and women. It's all the rage to be concerned for personal safety these days. Everyone's crying about how unsafe everything is. I don't think it's possible to buy something at the grocery store without a warning pointing out some grave danger. It really is pathetic. Are we really so babyish?

Quote:

---

I think that for a young male repressed sexual desires can become quite an obstacle to hermit life. "Celibate" means no sex. Obviously, you are not celibate when you masturbate or engage in casual sex, and the latter two are spiritually inferior. For most people, celibacy is difficult enough to maintain in a monastery where the community reaffirms celibacy vows constantly. It is even more difficult in the absence of such a support system.

---

Well, I don't know about monastic communities, but I don't think celibacy is all that difficult to maintain once you get over the initial hump and are able to take it seriously. That's really the only hard part about it, taking it seriously. It's actually a lot more peaceful than masturbating or having sex because it quiets the whole drive. The most difficult part about it is dealing with women in a nonsexual way, which is not a natural thing for a man to do. He tends to want to give in to her ego, which is the beginning of the sexual act and will slowly drag him down into it. One has to be very vigilant about one's mind. It also helps to watch your diet. I do think there is something to the "five pungent plants". I was taking these vitamins for awhile that have a bunch of aphrodisiacs like garlic and Damiana in them. It helped tremendously once I quit taking them.

Quote:

---

Most people, however, choose to live in a relationship with a permanent mate. What does this arrangement offer spiritually? Well, obviously, it depends quite a bit on your mate. If you chose unwisely it may be even worse than living alone. :-( On the other hand, marriage can be beneficial to spiritual growth if you find a way to tune in with your partner. Women often excel males in compassion and loving kindness, so a man can learn compassion and loving kindness from his wife and his family. Both partners learn from honoring the vow that a marriage represents. Finally, being a parent provides a couple with the opportunity to develop generosity, selflessness, and endurance. Since mates support each other, couple life is less susceptible to external disturbances than hermit life.

---

This is a major disadvantage, and I would say it's impossible to pursue spirituality in such an arrangement. A person just won't have any need of it.

Quote:

---

What concerns spiritual development, neither married life nor bachelor life is inherently superior. The main advantage I see in staying single is that you are free to devote time to spiritual endeavors, for example within a religious community. The main advantage I see in married life is that it provides you with an opportunity to learn from your partner. The partners can help each other to overcome limitations. In addition, the bond offers a protection that the bachelor doesn't enjoy.

---

That's not a protection, that's a total surrender to what the spiritual man should be protecting himself against: contentment with the ego!

Your view of spirituality is based on human error #1: that "the people who love me are inherently good and spiritual". It's not a particularly deep view, to say the least, but you can believe whatever you wish as far as I'm concerned. I just think it's too arrogant for words to try and justify it in the name of spirituality as if it could be anthropocentric, or that a human relationship could somehow not be.

MGregory

Posts: 536

(3/16/04 12:22 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Anna: I was thinking more about all this last night, and it seemed to me even more absurd for enlightenment religions to focus on celibacy and disdain family life. If that is what it is about, then it is irrelevant to humanity.

---

All I can say is, tough beans. Don't join such a religion if it bothers you.

Quote:

---

In fact, spiritually great people should be required to have children.

---

I don't know who you are referring to here, but genius can't be inherited. It's like saying someone with a great marriage will have children with an equally great marriage. Genius is a relationship to Reality, not a personal quality.

Edited by: MGregory at: 3/16/04 12:28 am

MGregory
Posts: 537
(3/16/04 12:28 am)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Shardrol: But if one has truly transcended duality (body/mind, pure/impure, spiritual/mundane) how could any activity be separate from the enlightened state?

---

Well, personally speaking, I don't worry about the enlightened state, but the ignorant state.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 878
(3/16/04 12:29 am)
Reply

 Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

MGregory: The dangers are precisely what makes it so valuable! [...] That a person would topple down in attempting this strikes me as a fearful thing to say. I mean, so what?

Matt, how old are you? What is your experience with married life/ celibate hermit style life so far?

Thomas

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1525

(3/16/04 12:40 am)

Reply

☐ Marriage and Spirit

---

Quote:

---

The most difficult part about it is dealing with women in a nonsexual way, which is not a natural thing for a man to do.

---

This is a very interesting observation. I wouldn't call the behavior "difficult" but it can be uncomfortable. Both women and men are used to this behavior; to playing this game. Everyone knows their own relative attractiveness value and it usually reflects in their behavior and expectations.

At work, we have, in particular, two very beautiful women that Steve and I (the Lab Medicine sys admins) encounter nearly every day; one an Asian office worker, the other a Caucasian post-doc researcher. I treat both like I would treat any other network user.

For the office worker, I think it made her uncomfortable at first. Is he gay? Oh, I am married (that must explain it). I can see the game, I just don't play it (and it is not because I am married). For the researcher, I think she was relieved when I was simply straightforward with her. Steve on the other hand starts to smile, crack jokes, talk about something "amazing" he did recently, or something interesting he heard about. I think he does it almost unconsciously. And he is a good-looking, well-paid guy with a girlfriend. But there it is.

On the opposite end of that, I have recently noticed the middle aged, somewhat overweight women being surprised when I say "Hi" to them. Men (and women) are so predictable.

Tharan

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1463

(3/16/04 3:41 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Tough beans? Such an answer means you didn't understand my post. All sorts of things are inherited. Interests, talents, proclivities, religiosity all appear to be somewhat or largely inherited. Also, if someone is wise, they should have children and grandchildren because their direct, personal influence will be very beneficial. There are actual physical changes in brain waves and other frequencies coming from the bodies of enlightened people. A reason some people react strongly to the presence of an enlightened person is that their brain/body reacts to a tuning-fork-like effect in their presence. People also react to highly nervous and anxious people. Children pick up on thousands of tiny little reactions that they see in their parents as they live in the world. They look deeply into the faces of people and watch them react. They have a hundred, five hundred lessons per day about the nature of reality, how to be honest or dishonest in one's dealings, what is important and not important... and many of these lessons are pretty low-level. A child comes into this world full of potential and open as the sky. They shut down day by day because they watch their parents (and others) who all respond like insane and deranged people to an insane and deranged world. Anxiety, anxiety, anxiety. Imagine if an infant saw a parent honest, open, and not full of anxiety?

But my main point is that humanity, not the celibates, are the ones who are going to survive into the future. If humanity as a reproducing terrestrial angel (spiritual mammal) cannot improve themselves spiritually, then humanity is lost. If humanity cannot live a spiritual life as regular men, women, children and families, then all our evolution these past couple billion years was a waste of time.

Quote:

---

A person isn't going to approach God (or Nonduality, if you prefer) if they experience comfort all the time. There has to be a profound dissatisfaction with one's state of affairs to generate the sufficient motivational force to overcome oneself.

---

This is pure baloney. The only needed dissatisfaction is the desire to know more, be more, experience more of Reality. Unhappiness of a life-situation variety is not necessary as a motivating factor. And, you are promoting the idea that marriage is bliss and monasticism creates dissatisfaction. Whereas marriage creates both moments of bliss and more problems than a more stable and quiet monastic life.

Quote:

---

Spirituality is above all a conquest.

---

It is no such thing.

Quote:

---

This is a major disadvantage, and I would say it's impossible to pursue spirituality in such an arrangement. A person just won't have any need of it.

---

This is a major delusion. There is no situation which is unfitted for the pursuit of spiritual attainment. And besides, if you want a dissatisfaction driver, just try marrying someone that you later regret marrying. Lots of grist for the mill!

Quote:

---

That a person would topple down in attempting this strikes me as a fearful thing to say.

---

I agree one should not allow a fear-driven foundation to one's path. I don't think the dangers are much influenced by whether or not you are married. Perhaps when the refusal of marriage is coming from negativities in one's psyche and are lovingly stoked and increased by one's attachment to the celibate life, that is, to the rejection of women, then the dangers might be accentuated. But the dangers come from ego and can be overcome or not in either situation.

Owen1234

Registered User

Posts: 42

(3/16/04 5:22 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

birdofhermes:

All sorts of things are inherited. Interests, talents, proclivities, religiosity all appear to be somewhat or largely inherited.

Nonsense at best.

How do we inherit the notion of 'the trinity' or of 'The Mahamed'.

Is religiosity, genetic for you?

It seems clear enough to me that religion is a personal choice that one may or may not make.

How can there be (DNA) choices?

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1035

(3/16/04 7:50 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

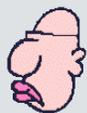

---

Like any 'talent', said to be 'inherited', it is not the talent itself which is inherited, but the proclivity or capability for the talent.

Religiosity itself is not inherited, but the talent for/against religiosity is inherited in the shape of a developed/undeveloped 'God Module' in the brain, which is a product of evolution. It's just the same as the talent for/against spatial abilities, for example, can be inherited in the shape of un/developed things like the right parietal regions, and the compartmentalisation of the right side of the brain in general, as well as the memory abilities of the frontal cortex.

A developed God Module will assume a high place in the decision making hierarchy (often, as we see, higher even than reason) and leave one open to religiosity when confronted with existential life.

It's not DNA choices, it's DNA proclivities which can influence our mental and physical lives much more than most currently think, as DNA sequencing is helping us to rapidly discover.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 342
(3/16/04 9:02 am)
Reply | Edit

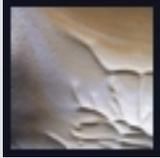

Re: Emptiness

---

We have an innate (primal) predisposition to sex, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 344
(3/16/04 9:50 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: Emptiness

---

Hi Philip,

Quote:

---

Similarly, only a very rare soul can transcend relationship/sexuality without having first deeply experienced it, or at the very least, tasted it, so that it doesn't just exist as some deeply repressed desire based on pure fantasy.

Quote:

-----

The optimum path consists of dropping one's emotional attachments. It's not a big mystery. The only reason people even notice a person's sex is because of their attachment to it.

-----

Yes, but the whole point is about **how** to go beyond those attachments.

That's what my last post was touching on -- the key point that there is more than one way to "get beyond" attachments. Simply shunning relationship/sex is the path of the bramacharya, or celibate monk. Very few can do this approach without repressing parts of themselves, or living a life of fantasy/masturbation alongside their spiritual practices. This often involves simple denial, or hiding away parts of oneself. Enlightenment has nothing to do with denial, or hiding away parts of oneself.

Celibacy/bramacharya may be your path. Or it may not. You're likely too young yet to know with certainty whether being with a mate or not will be your optimum spiritual path. My only caution is to avoid getting into a hardend mindset -- "I will never have a mate because to do so is bad for Enlightenment". Avoid such fundamentalism.

---

How much value to spirituality would you place on person number [2.], if i give 100 points to person [1.], and zero points to person [3.]?

1. The person that becomes enlightened, and is thus completely free of sexuality, relationships, attachment, etc.
2. The person that has a strong interest in spiritual matters, but has a wife and kids.
3. A conventional person.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1037
(3/16/04 10:36 am)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: The optimum path consists of dropping one's emotional attachments.

---

The optimum path results in one's attachments dropping away.

Quote:

---

It's not a big mystery. The only reason people even notice a person's sex is because of their attachment to it.

---

And yet the only reason a person would not notice a person's sex would be because of their attachment to not noticing it.

The only reason people are concerned with a person's sex is because of their attachment to self.

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1038
(3/16/04 10:46 am)
Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: We have an innate (primal) predisposition to sex, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

---

We have an innate (primal) predisposition to attachment, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

Quote:

---

Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

---

Whilst in any age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to overcome these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

Poverty and riches are the very same imposters.

Thomas Knierim

Registered User

Posts: 882

(3/16/04 2:06 pm)

Reply

Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

Matt: The dangers are precisely what makes it so valuable!

Aaww, could you please explain this sentence in a rational fashion? I was'nt talking about any real dangers, but about the 'danger' of efforts being spent in an entirely futile manner. Please notice the apostrophes. Such an attempt would seem foolish rather than brave. I hope we can agree that there is a difference between courage and foolishness.

Matt: Spirituality is above all a conquest.

I see Nietzsche shining through.

No, it is not a conquest in the common sense. It is an awakening. Possibly such an awakening is preceded by struggle and hence it may appear to you as a conquest from the pre-awakening perspective. But who is the conqueror and what is being conquered?

Matt: That a person would topple down in attempting this strikes me as a fearful thing to say.

I talked about this with many Buddhist teachers, most of whom agreed that you cannot achieve a real transformation on your own, or that it is at least very difficult. You usually need the support of a community, unless you are already a master yourself. I think the celibate hermit path is suitable for someone with monastic training, or someone who brings in equivalent karma.

What you are currently doing is something different. You are not yet a hermit. You have your work life (do you?) and you still participate in this community. What you do is called 'taking the precepts' in Buddhism; it is basically sobering up for a limited period of time. The experience becomes more worthwhile if you also refrain from alcohol, meat, television, and any entertainment in combination with refraining from sex.

Matt: I don't think it's possible to buy something at the grocery store without a warning pointing out some grave danger.

Not in my country.

Matt: Your view of spirituality is based on human error #1: that "the people who love me are inherently good and spiritual". It's not a particularly deep view, to say the least, but you can believe whatever you wish as far as I'm concerned. I just think it's too arrogant for words to try and justify it in the name of spirituality as if it could be anthropocentric, or that a human relationship could somehow not be.

I think you completely misunderstand this. It is characteristic that you say "the people who love me...", instead of "the people I love...". You seem to define it from the receiving end rather than from the giving end. That would indeed be an example of poor judgment, since there is no particular reason for receiving love, nor is there any level of control over it. It is just the response of childlike ego perception. Your idea seems to coincide with the classical QRS error about love, i.e. identifying love with attachment. But that's not what it is about.

Thomas

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1468

(3/16/04 3:53 pm)

Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Nonsense at best.

How do we inherit the notion of 'the trinity' or of 'The Mahamed'.

Is religiosity, genetic for you?

---

We do not inherit the notion of trinity or the words to nursery rhymes. I said no such thing. But we may inherit broader tendencies, temperaments, general interests, music appreciation/talent, and yes, religiosity. It might be genetic for me. I see tremendous patterns of inheritance. My son has inherited many subtle qualities from my brother, whom he has hardly seen since he was small, and none that I can see from my other brother, whom he has seen more often. My son and my brother are so alike that even though I haven't seen my brother in probably 15 years, when I think of my son, who lives nearby, I often see my brother's face. It's not that they look so much alike - it's more that they have such a similar personality. My two children who look very alike are also far more similar in temperament and sympathies. My other child got a very different mix. We are fond of her, but none of us really understand her.

MGregory

Posts: 542

(3/17/04 12:15 am)

Reply

Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

Quote:

---

Thomas: Matt, how old are you? What is your experience with married life/ celibate hermit style life so far?

---

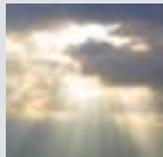

I'll have to think about if I want to answer that or not.

MGregory

Posts: 543

(3/17/04 12:26 am)

Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Anna: Tough beans? Such an answer means you didn't understand my post. All sorts of things are inherited. Interests, talents, proclivities, religiosity all appear to be somewhat or largely inherited. Also, if someone is wise, they should have children and grandchildren because their direct, personal influence will be very beneficial. There are actual physical changes in brain waves and other frequencies coming from the bodies of enlightened people. A reason some people react strongly to the presence of an enlightened person is that their brain/body reacts to a tuning-fork-like effect in their presence. People also react to highly nervous and anxious people. Children pick up on thousands of tiny little reactions that they see in their parents as they live in the world. They look deeply into the faces of people and watch them react. They have a hundred, five hundred lessons per day about the nature of reality, how to be honest or dishonest in one's dealings, what is important and not important... and many of these lessons are pretty low-level. A child comes into this world full of potential and open as the sky. They shut down day by day because they watch their parents (and others) who all respond like insane and deranged people to an insane and deranged world. Anxiety, anxiety, anxiety. Imagine if an infant saw a parent honest, open, and not full of anxiety?

But my main point is that humanity, not the celibates, are the ones who are going to survive into the future. If humanity as a reproducing terrestrial angel (spiritual mammal) cannot improve themselves spiritually, then humanity is lost. If humanity cannot live a spiritual life as regular men, women, children and families, then all our evolution these past couple billion years was a waste of time.

---

No really, none of this has anything to do with the price of eggs. If humanity is your concern, then be a humanitarian.

Quote:

---

Matt: A person isn't going to approach God (or Nonduality, if you prefer) if they experience comfort all the time. There has to be a profound dissatisfaction with one's state of affairs to generate the sufficient motivational force to overcome oneself.

Anna: This is pure baloney. The only needed dissatisfaction is the desire to know more, be more, experience more of Reality. Unhappiness of a life-situation variety is not necessary as a motivating factor. And, you are promoting the idea that marriage is bliss and monasticism creates dissatisfaction. Whereas marriage creates both moments of bliss and more problems than a more stable and quiet monastic life.

---

Marriage creates bliss and problems that are non-spiritual, and that's the problem with it. It's something that pulls you outside yourself all the time. You have to look inside your own mind to find anything spiritual.

Quote:

---

Matt: Spirituality is above all a conquest.

Anna: It is no such thing.

---

Then we're not talking about the same thing and I have nothing more to say about it.

MGregory

Posts: 544

(3/17/04 12:31 am)

Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Dave: The only reason people are concerned with a person's sex is because of their attachment to self.

---

Yeah, that's a better way to put it.

MGregory

Posts: 545

(3/17/04 1:23 am)

Reply

Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

Quote:

---

Matt: The dangers are precisely what makes it so valuable!

Thomas: Aaww, could you please explain this sentence in a rational fashion? I was'nt talking about any real dangers, but about the 'danger' of efforts being spent in an entirely futile manner. Please notice the apostrophes. Such an attempt would seem foolish rather than brave. I hope we can agree that there is a difference between courage and foolishness.

---

Sure, I'll explain it like this: you're never going to protect yourself from psychological danger without protecting yourself from Truth. That's just how it is. If your mind is being heavily stimulated, and you lack the motivation to Truth to keep you on track, you could wind up doing some damage to yourself and maybe even going insane.

Quote:

---

No, it is not a conquest in the common sense. It is an awakening. Possibly such an awakening is preceeded by struggle and hence it may appear to you as a conquest from the pre-awakening perspective. But who is the conqueror and what is being conquered?

---

Well, one has conquer one's ignorance about the nature of Reality. It's easy to say that there is no conqueror and conquered, but who really believes it? Who even knows what it means?

Quote:

---

I talked about this with many Buddhist teachers, most of whom agreed that you cannot achieve a real transformation on your own, or that it is at least very difficult. You usually need the support of a community, unless you are already a master yourself. I think the celibate hermit path is suitable for someone with monastic training, or someone who brings in equivalent karma.

What you are currently doing is something different. You are not yet a hermit. You have your work life (do you?) and you still participate in this community. What you do is called 'taking the precepts' in Buddhism; it is basically sobering up for a limited period of time. The experience becomes more worthwhile if you also refrain from alcohol, meat, television, and any entertainment in combination with refraining from sex.

---

Well, I'm just defending what I do, which as far I know is perfectly legitimate for me. I don't have any ambition to tell people what they should do, nor do I think I am in any position to do so. I don't really think that enlightenment is for everyone. I do think it would be nice if people who are not interested in it admitted it to themselves, but I know that's never going to happen. Everyone feels they are already enlightened.

Quote:

---

I think you completely misunderstand this. It is characteristic that you say "the people who love me...", instead of "the people I love...". You seem to define it from the receiving end rather than from the giving end. That would indeed be an example of poor judgment, since there is no particular reason for receiving love, nor is there any level of control over it. It is just the response of childlike ego perception. Your idea seems to coincide with the classical QRS error about love, i.e. identifying love with attachment. But that's not what it is about.

---

Would you have married a woman that has no respect for you and wants to suck you dry like a leech and leave you? I mean, it's a two-way street. We don't love people unless they give us some benefit. In fact, it's precisely the benefit that we do love, not the person. We love ourselves and that's about it. Love can't extend outside oneself, you have to basically show someone that you love them, otherwise they won't believe it. If you could truly love another person, it seems to me that they would be able to feel it. If you were to think about how much you love your wife continuously all the time, yet you totally ignored her otherwise, I bet after awhile she would think you stopped loving her. So who is the loved and who is the lover?

birdofhermes

Registered User

Posts: 1469

(3/17/04 4:48 am)

Reply

Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

Quote:

---

I'll have to think about if I want to answer that or not.

---

I can't help but find it pertinent to this question a remark you made at PG, that having had sex with a woman you had some love for left you psychotic and took a year to recover from. That is pretty unusual, although if you are speaking of grief at rejection, that is not unusual.

Quote:

---

No really, none of this has anything to do with the price of eggs. If humanity is your concern, then be a humanitarian.

---

Of course humanity is my concern! I must be a boddhicitta. It has everything to do with the price of eggs (free range hens only!) I'm talking about real people being able to live a spiritually aware existence while also, you know, carrying on the race.

Quote:

---

Marriage creates bliss and problems that are non-spiritual, and that's the problem with it. It's something that pulls you outside yourself all the time. You have to look inside your own mind to find anything spiritual.

---

There are no problems that are not spiritual. There are no situations that are not spiritual. There are no objects that are not spiritual.

There is nothing spiritual outside of your mind?

Quote:

---

you're never going to protect yourself from psychological danger without protecting yourself from Truth.

---

Yes, but the danger you speak of is just like fear of the boogey man. Truth turns out to be a relief, not a stress.

Quote:

---

If your mind is being heavily stimulated, and you lack the motivation to Truth to keep you on track, you could wind up doing some damage to yourself and maybe even going insane.

---

What sort of situation might you be describing here? Matt, you have made one too many comments indicating you feel it rather hard to hold yourself together against breakdown. This is becoming more common, I've noticed. Are you American? The answer is not a tighter lid, the answer is less pressure. These kinds of emotions need to be resolved if you want a genuine spiritual life. That which is kept in the subconscious mind will NOT go away without some way to resolve it.

Quote:

---

It's easy to say that there is no conqueror and conquered, but who really believes it? Who even knows what it means?

---

Well, enlightened, or highly evolved people do.

Quote:

---

I don't really think that enlightenment is for everyone.

---

Now that we have embarked upon the path of knowledge of good and evil, we need to have a radical change such that the prevailing view and leadership of society is openly spiritual and idealistic. Otherwise our canoe is going over the falls.

Quote:

---

Everyone feels they are already enlightened.

---

They do??? Gosh, I don't know where you live, but here everyone is saved!

Quote:

---

We don't love people unless they give us some benefit. In fact, it's precisely the benefit that we do love, not the person.

---

That is only the beginning of love. It isn't real love.

Quote:

---

We love ourselves and that's about it.

---

Certainly, that goes with the above.

Quote:

---

Love can't extend outside oneself,

---

Love is, quite literally, filling this universe. You are saying that you have never, ever, extended your love outside yourself to even the smallest degree? This should be causing you some pain, as it is primal male nature to love outside himself.

Quote:

---

you have to basically show someone that you love them, otherwise they won't believe it.

---

Remember that the persons you are dealing with also have trouble in this area, full of ego and fear. As to showing them, why would your love not be at one with your words, your actions, and your facial expression?

Quote:

---

If you could truly love another person, it seems to me that they would be able to feel it.

---

Do you mean they should feel your thoughts? Or be able to perceive the emotions locked deep inside you, which you are not expressing in any way? Probably if she is very mature and wise, she will.

 Philip Mistlberger

Posts: 52

(3/17/04 8:14 am)

Reply

ezSupporter

 Re: Emptiness

---

Matt --

Quote:

---

Well, you started it by claiming that a Bodhisattva becomes enlightened and then goes off to find a girlfriend as if that were a spiritual activity. I object to the idea that any activity is spiritual.

---

I never said a "Bodhisattva goes off to find a girlfriend". I said a Bodhisattva may or may not have a mate. I base this statement on close to 30 years of learning on this matter.

Quote:

---

PM: Similarly, only a very rare soul can transcend relationship/sexuality without having first deeply experienced it, or at the very least, tasted it, so that it doesn't just exist as some deeply repressed desire based on pure fantasy.

MG: That could be, but I don't see the point in encouraging people to be unrare souls.

---

That's not the point. The point is to find out what is true for you. But once you find out what is true for you, avoid developing a philosophy that implies that your path is the *true and only path*. That's what this issue boils down to -- clarifying the difference between purity of intent, and a fundamentalist mindset. The two easily become confused. Many a well-intentioned seeker has drifted into a mere representative of a school of ideas.

Anyway, I suspect that the notion of an "enlightened condition" that includes a possible relationship with a mate perhaps disturbs you at some level, otherwise you would not be taking such issue with it. Thou dost protest too much, methinks. ;-)

Quote:

---

I only have a hardened mindset about the ideal of spirituality. I don't think it's useful to water down our ideals for the sake of "sensibility", or the idea that we can't live up to them. In my view, it would destroy a perfectly good teaching method.

---

Once again, I'm not talking about "watering down ideals". I'm simply saying that your purity of intent to become Enlightened need not *necessitate* a specific pathway approach (in this case, celibacy, solitary living).

Clearly, it is your path for now. That may change some day. Or maybe not. Simply avoid the constrictive attitude that implies you know the future. You don't, and you can't. The future doesn't exist. Therefore any belief system or attitude that claims sole legitimacy to one particular approach to Truth is based on a fallacy because it is founded on the notion that the future is real, and that the future can be known.

Fundamentalism is based on the fear of the unknown. It is an attempt to control life by making the future "real". This is why religionists will proclaim you must do it "this way" or else in the future such and such will happen to you. They attempt to make the future into a "thing" that exists and can be known and controlled. It's all founded on the deep psychological fear of losing control.

The heart of the sexual impulse (and relationship in its many forms) is about being "out of control". Impulse-control has been an essential ingredient in civilization-building, to be sure, but the shadow side of it is a kind of character-armor and rigidity that systematizes Truth into a set of precepts and conditions that are believed in time to be inviolable. This is religion. Most of organized religion is an elaborate attempt to control the primal impulses of human nature.

I'd offer that the true sage does not fall prey to the energy-loss and mere depletion of vitality found in so much of standard relationship politics, but nor does he get trapped in the rigid confines of specific systems of ideas that allow for only a very narrow band of lifestyle. He walks the "Middle Path" between the extremes of mere indulgence and arid asceticism.

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

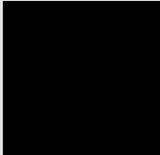

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|  Philip Mistlberger           Posts: 53           (3/17/04 8:25 am)           Reply           ezSupporter  |  Re: Emptiness <hr/> Hi Rhett -- Quote: <hr/> How much value to spirituality would you place on person number [2.], if i give 100 points to person [1.], and zero points to person [3.]? <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. The person that becomes enlightened, and is thus completely free of sexuality, relationships, attachment, etc.</li> <li>2. The person that has a strong interest in spiritual matters, but has a wife and kids.</li> <li>3. A conventional person.</li> </ol> <hr/> I don't agree with your statement #1, so the scheme breaks down for me and I can't answer it as a result. That is, I don't agree that "Enlightenment" necessitates "being free of relationships". I do agree that Enlightenment means being free of attachments. But an Enlightened person may indeed have a mate or consort. For starters, see the | entire tradition of Tantra, especially in its north Indian and Tibetan (Nyingmapa and Kargyu lineages) forms, for more on this.

XXX STATIC X

Registered User

Posts: 104

(3/17/04 8:42 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

women are part of the material world too. all you really need is that voice in your head. or do you not have that "intuition" or feeling that it's not you?

DavidQuinn000

Forum Host

Posts: 2286

(3/17/04 9:45 am)

Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Bird wrote:

Quote:

---

Matt: A person isn't going to approach God (or Nonduality, if you prefer) if they experience comfort all the time. There has to be a profound dissatisfaction with one's state of affairs to generate the sufficient motivational force to overcome oneself.

Bird: This is pure baloney. The only needed dissatisfaction is the desire to know more, be more, experience more of Reality.

---

Anna, are you really sure of this?

Are you so enlightened than you can now speak authoritatively about what is needed (and not needed) to make the all-important breakthrough into the highest wisdom?

Are you not concened that you might have shut the door in people's faces and discouraged them from putting in the all-consuming effort that is needed to experience and comprehend the Infinite?

What motivates you to snap so angrily at Matt's perfectly reasonable comment?

Rairun
Registered User
Posts: 232
(3/17/04 10:00 am)
Reply

 ...

---

Love isn't always "love for love"; I think we can love just for the sake of it. It doesn't always matter that an action gives us tangible rewards, be them emotional or material. Sometimes we love just because that's what we will. It's selfish, but not in the sense that we are looking for rewards. We are just being who we are, and I don't think it should be considered virtuous by any means.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 345
(3/17/04 11:04 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

---

Rhett: The optimum path consists of dropping one's emotional attachments.

---

The optimum path results in one's attachments dropping away.

---

I think it was Matt that wrote that.

I think that both are fair comments.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 346
(3/17/04 11:36 am)
Reply | Edit

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Quote:

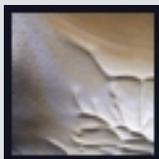

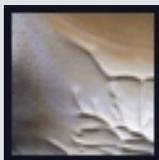

---

---

Rhett: We have an innate (primal) predisposition to sex, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

---

We have an innate (primal) predisposition to attachment, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

---

I think this is a major topic - i.e. worthy of a new thread.

[I'm under the impression that there is a lot of good scientific evidence to back up my statement.

If attachment was all that human primivity was disposed towards, how do you explain humanities gross attachment to sexuality over other possible attachments? I think that sex is too troublesome an attachment to become so favoured in the absence of genetic predispositions.

What about all the people that are driven to engage in sex that is without any real attachment, other than to sex itself (e.g. prostitution)?]

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

---

Whilst in any age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to overcome these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

---

What about the future...?

I agree with your substitution of the word overcome, i tried to think of a better term at the time but couldn't.

Rhett Hamilton
Registered User
Posts: 347
(3/17/04 11:56 am)
Reply | Edit

Re: Emptiness

Hi Philip,

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

How much value to spirituality would you place on person number [2.], if i give 100 points to person [1.], and zero points to person [3.]?

1. The person that becomes enlightened, and is thus completely free of sexuality, relationships, attachment, etc.
  2. The person that has a strong interest in spiritual matters, but has a wife and kids.
  3. A conventional person.
-

I don't agree with your statement #1, so the scheme breaks down for me and I can't answer it as a result.

That is, I don't agree that "Enlightenment" necessitates "being free of relationships".

I do agree that Enlightenment means being free of *attachments*. But an Enlightened person may indeed have a mate or consort. For starters, see the entire tradition of Tantra, especially in its north Indian and Tibetan (Nyingmapa and Kargyu lineages) forms, for more on this.

---

Okay, we could theorise about relationships that are free of attachment, but i think that few people can even come close to imagining it, never mind doing it. Thus, i use the word relationship with the implication of at least some degree of attachment, which is enough to destroy one's enlightenment, or potential for it.

Sure, people relate, but for the above reasons i refuse to use the word relationships in regards to non-attached interactions. It's simply too misleading.

Would you be comfortable with answering my original question now, given the clarification of my definitions?

Edited by: Rhett Hamilton at: 3/18/04 11:08 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1039
(3/17/04 12:22 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: I think it was Matt that wrote that.

---

So he did. I assumed it was you as you quoted it without credits at the top of a post in conversation with Philip.

Quote:

---

I think that both are fair comments.

---

I think they say two different things about the same thing. Most especially in the context of it's conjunction with the other paragraphs in the same post:

Quote:

---

Matt: It's not a big mystery. The only reason people even notice a person's sex is because of their attachment to it.

DT: And yet the only reason a person would not notice a person's sex would be because of their attachment to not noticing it.

The only reason people are concerned with a person's sex is because of their attachment to self.

---

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1526
(3/17/04 12:23 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

What about all the people that are driven to engage in sex that is without any real attachment, other than to sex itself (e.g. prostitution)?]

The Enlightened Prostitute

What role did the mother/wife/prostitute archetype play on Jesus's Will to Truth? Was she a motivator or an impediment?

Tharan

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1527
(3/17/04 12:24 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Dave Toast wrote,

Quote:

---

The optimum path results in one's attachments dropping away.

---

Nice

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 884
(3/17/04 12:56 pm)
Reply

 Re: Marriage and Spirit

---

Matt: I'll have to think about if I want to answer that or not.

Why not? If we discuss marriage, celibacy, and hermitage then your personal experience with these is pertinent. These are not abstract matters to you, are they?

Matt: you're never going to protect yourself from psychological danger without protecting yourself from Truth. That's just how it is.

This opinion is based on the idea that there is protection from truth. There isn't. Facing truth is inevitable, even for people who utilize escape mechanisms, lies, pretense, etc. There are only skillfull and unskillful ways to face truth.

Matt: Well, one has conquer one's ignorance about the nature of Reality.

Aren't you aiming a bit high?

Matt: It's easy to say that there is no conqueror and conquered, but who really believes it? Who even knows what it means?

Try to think back and remember your past struggles. While you were struggling, the issues you struggled with seemed pressing, uncomfortable, and real. Once you won a struggle, those issues somehow seemed less real. That's what I meant.

Matt: Well, I'm just defending what I do, which as far I know is perfectly legitimate for me.

Okay. But first it sounded like you were saying that having mates and relationships is generally detrimental.

Matt: Everyone feels they are already enlightened.

Only QRS do.

Matt: In fact, it's precisely the benefit that we do love, not the person. We love ourselves and that's about it.

That's not true. Self-love is only the beginning of love. But love can extend to almost any person and any thing. It grows to encompass your partner, your family, your friends, and finally everybody. Love cannot be compartmentalized.

Thomas

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1040
(3/17/04 12:58 pm)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Also in context with this too.

Quote:

---

Rhett: We have an innate (primal) predisposition to sex, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

DT: We have an innate (primal) predisposition to attachment, and it's well and truly brought to life and reinforced by society & culture. But it's quite obviously not conducive to the clear-minded experience of the Truth.

Rhett: I think this is a major topic - i.e. worthy of a new thread.

---

I'm sure you do. Start a new thread if you wish.

Quote:

---

[I'm under the impression that there is a lot of good scientific evidence to back up my statement.

---

No doubt. I wouldn't argue with your first sentence. Your second sentence has no empirical basis though, and so no scientific back up.

Quote:

---

If attachment was all that human primivity was disposed towards,

---

I didn't say that.

Quote:

---

how do you explain humanities gross attachment to sexuality over other possible attachments?

---

I'll presume you mean gross in the quantative sense. I'd explain it in a good few ways encompassing Natural Selection, Genetics, Endocrinology, Memetics, Psychology, etc.

Quote:

---

I think that sex is too troublesome an attachment to become so favoured in the absence of genetic predispositions.

---

I'm not saying that it's not, though I'd use a different phraseology.

The point I was making, within the original context, was that my statement cut to the heart of the matter and was consistent with the second sentence of the statement. Whilst your statement was simply an arbitrary deliniation of the matter at hand (so missing the point), and inconsistent with the second sentence of the statement thereby.

Quote:

---

What about all the people that are driven to engage in sex that is without any real attachment, other than to sex itself (e.g. prostitution)?

---

You don't really think that is without attachment do you? You're applying conventional meaning to the spiritual terminology there. And illustrating my point too.

In any case, as I said, I wouldn't argue with the first sentence of your statement, who would.

Quote:

---

Rhett: Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently

DT: Whilst in any age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to overcome these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

Rhett: I agree with your substitution of the word overcome, i tried to think of a better term at the time but couldn't.

---

You realise that the two statements say two completely different things, and are of a different theoretical basis?

Quote:

---

What about the future...?

---

The context of my statement was attachment, not sexuality. There will never be an age when attachment and self will not be there to be overcome, the process dictates thus. This is also part of my over all context.

birdofhermes
Registered User
Posts: 1470
(3/18/04 1:46 am)
Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

-----

Matt: A person isn't going to approach God (or Nonduality, if you prefer) if they experience comfort all the time. There has to be a profound dissatisfaction with one's state of affairs to generate the sufficient motivational force to overcome oneself.

Bird: This is pure baloney. The only needed dissatisfaction is the desire to know more, be more, experience more of Reality.

-----

Quote:

---

Anna, are you really sure of this? Are you so enlightened than you can now speak authoritatively about what is needed (and not needed) to make the all-important breakthrough into the highest wisdom?

---

Yes, I'm sure. It was Matt who pronounced that one must be driven by dissatisfaction before pursuing spiritual matters, as if it were the only scenario. I merely said it is not necessary. From what people have said here, it is the case for Xpercentage of people. However, I assume that is one reason so many don't make it. If the motive for spiritual truth is the removal of emotional discomfort, then when a comfort zone is attained the person will likely stop. And when they stop, a logical justification structure will be erected, cemented together with emotional motivation, and said seeker will move in to live, pointing only to the logical walls of his cage, never seeing the cement. The main barrier I see to attainment is a preference for something else before truth. Only when the motive toward truth is primary will you have the willingness to let go of ego.

Quote:

---

Are you not concerned that you might have shut the door in people's faces and discouraged them from putting in the all-consuming effort that is needed to experience and comprehend the Infinite?

---

I certainly can't imagine that I have done so. But you might be concerned that by encouraging people up some blind egotistical alley of autistical head banging that you have given them false and narrow visions which will lock them in as described above, in a comfort zone of self-referential delusion.

How would I discourage someone from putting in effort? By spreading good news? I see in all the religions the same negative insistence, dressed up in different stories. The Christians and Muslims insist upon a wretched God who will throw most of humanity into hell unless propitiated. They leave little calling cards on restaurant tables saying, IF YOU DIED TONIGHT - WOULD YOU GO TO HELL?? The Buddhists talk of needing a human body for enlightenment, and they say that a human body is attained after a wait like a rock on the seashore that is brushed once per hundred years by the feather of a bird flying over it, and when the rock is worn away, a human body is attained. And then, of course almost no humans get enlightened per lifetime, so its back in line. GUILT. Is this much better than preaching hell? There's some guy named Meyer Baba who says that only on this planet can people attain enlightenment, although planets filled with life are everywhere. ANTHROPOCENTRIC IMAGINATION.

Do you find it necessary to convince young men that their only route to salvation is through "profound dissatisfaction" and that if they want to be saved they had better erect strong mental barriers against life and other beings must be disparaged? Must we live in such a niggardly universe?

I have the distinct impression that many such religious proponents whose form of "spirituality" consists of heaven/hell obsessions, would utterly lose interest if it could somehow be proved to them that God is good, all forgiving, and there is no eternal punishment. Which means they never were spiritual in the first place, have no love of God. Is God the lesser of evils, that we must be driven out of the frying pan and into the fire?

Quote:

---

What motivates you to snap so angrily at Matt's perfectly reasonable comment?

---

It was not so angry at all. God is everywhere slandered. I defend God.

|                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| scarythoughtsRegistered UserPosts: 1(3/18/04 3:22 am)Reply                                                                                  |  it only stands to reason that if.... then.... <hr/> This is logic: 1 + 1 = 2.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| XXX STATIC XRegistered UserPosts: 106(3/18/04 3:45 am)Reply                                                                                 |  Re: it only stands to reason that if.... then.... <hr/>   +   =     Bit logic   +   +   = "triangle" Computer logic?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| PaulRegistered UserPosts: 513(3/18/04 11:23 am)Reply                                                                                        |  Re: it only stands to reason that if.... then.... <hr/> Nuts, XXX STATIC X, completely nuts.But you seem to like being nuts, so it's okay.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| DavidQuinn000Forum HostPosts: 2289(3/18/04 5:41 pm)Reply  |  Re: Marriage and Spirit <hr/> Thomas wrote: Quote: <hr/> Facing truth is inevitable, even for people who utilize escape mechanisms, lies, pretense, etc. There are only skilfull and unskillful ways to face truth. <hr/> You're dreaming, as per usual. A person who remains a fundamentalist Christian to his death probably never faces truth in a single moment of his life. One cannot even call his behaviour an "unskillful way to face truth". Rather, it is just pure evasion. Most people are like this. Quote: <hr/> Matt: Well, one has conquer one's ignorance about the nature of |

Reality.

Thomas: Aren't you aiming a bit high?

---

Not if one is already high to begin with.

Quote:

---

Matt: Everyone feels they are already enlightened.

Thomas: Only QRS do.

---

Anyone who speaks about enlightenment in an authoritative manner believes that they are enlightened.

Quote:

---

Matt: In fact, it's precisely the benefit that we do love, not the person. We love ourselves and that's about it.

That's not true. Self-love is only the beginning of love. But love can extend to almost any person and any thing. It grows to encompass your partner, your family, your friends, and finally everybody.

---

Even the man who seduces your wife behind your back and causes her to want to leave you? Or the cruel man who tortures your dogs and kills them slowly?

Love is necessarily attachment, otherwise it wouldn't be emotional in nature.

Quote:

---

Love cannot be compartmentalized.

---

You have already compartmentalized it by confining it to people who give you emotional happiness.

Thomas Knierim
Registered User
Posts: 890
(3/18/04 6:13 pm)
Reply

Re: Marriage and Spirit

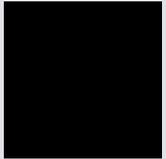

---

David,

I cannot help to notice that your answers are becoming mechanical and uninspired. They have become pure reaction. Instead of looking into the subject at hand, you merely blurt out antilogy without much thought. I regret that our dialogue has deteriorated to such a degree. Although there are interesting subjects which I would like to discuss -such as that of love and whether it includes the man who tortures my dogs- I am skeptical with regard to your current attitude. If you would like to discuss this any further, please tell me why love is necessarily attachment, why emotions necessarily involve attachment, or why attachment necessarily involve emotions (I have seen you maintaining both positions in the past) and give me a reasonably detailed account on your understanding of love, so that I may be able to respond in a meaningful way.

Thomas

 Philip Mistlberger
Posts: 55
(3/18/04 8:55 pm)
Reply
ezSupporter

Re: Emptiness

---

Rhett --

Quote:

---

How much value to spirituality would you place on person number [2.], if i give 100 points to person [1.], and zero points to person [3.]?

1. The person that becomes enlightened, and is thus completely free of sexuality, relationships, attachment, etc.
  2. The person that has a strong interest in spiritual matters, but has a wife and kids.
  3. A conventional person
-

Can't do it, Rhett, because you're asking me to conform to parameters regarding your concept of Enlightenment that are yours, not mine.

That is, you are asking me to answer something that is based on certain essential points in your scheme that I don't agree with (an "Enlightened" person is necessarily "free of relationships").

However, I would be curious to see how you would answer your own test.

DavidQuinn000
Forum Host
Posts: 2293
(3/18/04 9:27 pm)
Reply

 Re: Marriage and Spirit

Thomas wrote:

Quote:

---

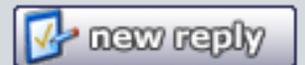

Although there are interesting subjects which I would like to discuss -such as that of love and whether it includes the man who tortures my dogs- I am skeptical with regard to your current attitude. If you would like to discuss this any further, please tell me why love is necessarily attachment, why emotions necessarily involve attachment, or why attachment necessarily involve emotions (I have seen you maintaining both positions in the past) and give me a reasonably detailed account on your understanding of love, so that I may be able to respond in a meaningful way.

---

Let's take a lump of dirt, such as what might exist outside your front door or on the street. Do you ever experience feelings of love for such an entity? If so, why? Or if not, why not?

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

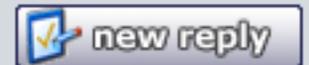

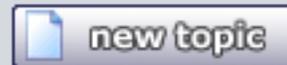

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 349(3/19/04 9:07 am)Reply   Edit  |  Re: Emptiness <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Rhett: [What about all the people that are driven to engage in sex that is without any real attachment, other than to sex itself (e.g. prostitution)?] Tharan: The Enlightened Prostitute <hr/> I was referring to the men, not the prostitutes. I agree that i didn't make the point very well, but I was rather thrown by my interpretation of Dave's comment, it was pretty far-out-there. I think he should have been clearer about it. Quote: <hr/> Quote: ----- DT: The optimum path results in one's attachments dropping away. |

---

Tharan: Nice

---

Of course you (Tharan) and David Toast like this version better than Matt's, it's open to a feminine, passive interpretation, whereas Matt's emphasises the masculine element, the willing component of the breakdown of attachments.

Given that the two of you think that you can continue on largely as you do, and that by the age of around 250 you'll both be completely attachment free - whilst still being in sexual relationships . . . i think it's quite obvious that Matt's version is actually far more appropriate to the two of you.

Dave's version is appropriate to people that are far more spiritually advanced than yourselves.

Quote:

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently

DT: Whilst in any age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to overcome these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

Rhett: I agree with your substitution of the word overcome, i tried to think of a better term at the time but couldn't.

---

DT: You realise that the two statements say two completely different things, and are of a different theoretical basis?

---

"Go against", "overcome", . . . both apply in varying measure.

WolfsonJakk
Posts: 1529
(3/19/04 9:22 am)
Reply

 Re: Emptiness

---

Rhett proclaimed,

Quote:

---

Of course you (Tharan) and David Toast like this version better than Matt's, it's open to a feminine, passive interpretation, whereas Matt's emphasises the masculine element, the willing component of the breakdown of attachments

---

I dance around in flowery panties as I feel myself becoming lighter and lighter afoot.

Quote:

---

Given that the two of you think that you can continue on largely as you do, and that by the age of around 250 you'll both be completely attachment free - whilst still being in sexual relationships . . . i think it's quite obvious that Matt's version is actually far more appropriate to the two of you.

---

Please, tell me more about what you think you know about me...

Quote:

---

Dave's version is appropriate to people that are far more spiritually advanced than yourselves.

---

Ah, yes. Thank you. You're Quinn impression is getting pretty good. As us married guys say, Keep it up!

Tharan

Kellyven

Posts: 54

(3/19/04 10:18 am)

Reply

 sex and/or attachment

---

For one who experiences sexual desire or urges rarely, my experiences over the last week gave me some insight into sexual desire as psychological not biological - meaning the lust for permanence that is sexual is not found in other attachment.

My experience: I was struggling last week with understanding "non-action" (how to practise non-dualism in a dualistic framework). Experiencing intense despondency, i entered a comfort-eating / intense over-exercise phase, obviously creating a big bout of unconsciousness. Consuming daily around 8000 kJ or so (nutritious, but excessive) and cycling around the mountainous Fleurieu peninsula (around 60km a day for 8 days) while challenging myself to focus on emptiness palliated my struggles, but left me mentally depleted and my desire for security unmet.

My mind at night was thronged with animal desires - desiring someone to share the heavy burden of spiritual solitude with (dire irony) and sexual release through grasping at some security.

For me, sexual desire is linked to the desire for safety. It is delusional.

Sexual desire is mostly psychological because it is based on the need to submit to unconsciousness, to egotistical confirmations (bodily pleasure, comfort, social security, conformity, hope for help from someone else, etc.).

I think that great stigma is placed on sex and women for the spiritual learner because of the horrific burdens that social systems create for men (to found a stable group and to be the head engineer, to lead women and children, to seek comfort and recreation in animality). Because the average man has submitted his spirit to carrying these burdens - and upholding them since he must be the strong one - women are objectified as the apotheosis of evil.

Such is the strength of men's attachment to sex - or lust for permanence. Women are not this, since they don't exist, but in order to dismantle the attachment to the object of desire, a medicine of object-disgust is compulsory.

Only when there is no such thing as woman for a man will the man also see himself as no (such) thing, and his own self construct dismantled.

My resolution of the nightly turmoil was to keep my body cool while sleeping, not to eat within a few hours of going to sleep, and to keep focussing my mind on understanding true Reality.

To avoid a repetition of the entire process, i eat simply and mindfully, have given up cycletouring, and steadily focus my mind on the infinite.

Kelly

Sapius
Registered User
Posts: 275
(3/19/04 10:39 am)
Reply

 Re: sex and/or attachment

---

David wrote:

Quote:

---

Let's take a lump of dirt, such as what might exist outside your front door or on the street. Do you ever experience feelings of love for such an entity? If so, why? Or if not, why not?

---

If I may.....

Yes. I would love that lump of dirt. Why? Just because it is a part of a causal process. A process on which my existence is also dependent upon, which in turn has given me the chance to think about some profound and lofty concepts, but that does not mean that I will smear that dirt on my face or go to bed with it for obvious reasons of course. Need I explain?

How did I do, David?

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1041
(3/19/04 12:21 pm)
Reply

Re: Emptiness

---

Quote:

---

Rhett: I agree that i didn't make the point very well, but I was rather thrown by my interpretation of Dave's comment, it was pretty far-out-there.

---

Your interpretation, yes.

Quote:

---

I think he should have been clearer about it.

---

It was as clear as day.

You spoke inconsistently of sex and the spiritual path, I spoke consistently of the spiritual path and spirituality, you misinterpreted this as my speaking about sex; it's all so obvious.

Quote:

---

DT: The optimum path results in one's attachments dropping away.

Tharan: Nice.

Rhett: Of course you (Tharan) and David Toast like this version better than Matt's, it's open to a feminine, passive interpretation, whereas Matt's emphasises the masculine element,....

---

Anything is open to any interpretation Rhett.

Quote:

---

....the willing component of the breakdown of attachments.

---

Attachments can be broken down, gone against (however you want to put it) by will, but can never be overcome, just transformed.

When attachment is overcome, attachments drop away.

Quote:

---

Given that the two of you think that you can continue on largely as you do, and that by the age of around 250 you'll both be completely attachment free - whilst still being in sexual relationships . . . i think it's quite obvious that Matt's version is actually far more appropriate to the two of you.

Dave's version is appropriate to people that are far more spiritually advanced than yourselves.

---

You have turned spirituality into dogma, and now you spout it in conjunction with your projected judgementalism in a style any fundamentalist preacher would be proud of.

Wake up Rhett.

Quote:

---

Rhett: Whilst in this present age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to go against these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently

DT: Whilst in any age it takes an enormity of consciousness within an individual to overcome these factors, it can be done if it is approached intelligently.

Rhett: I agree with your substitution of the word overcome, i tried to think of a better term at the time but couldn't

DT: You realise that the two statements say two completely different things, and are of a different theoretical basis?

"Go against", "overcome", . . . both apply in varying measure.

---

And still you don't get it. You're talking about sex, I'm talking about the spiritual path.

Going against any attachments is sublimation and can only result in substitution. Overcoming attachment is the only way to free you from the spectre of your masochistic torturous self.

Quit trying to make a sow's ear from a silk purse.

Edited by: Dave Toast at: 3/20/04 3:08 am

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1042
(3/19/04 12:22 pm)
Reply

 Re: sex and/or attachment

---

Quote:

---

Kelly: Only when there is no such thing as woman for a man will the man also see himself as no (such) thing, and his own self construct dismantled.

---

No.

Only when his own self construct is dismantled, will man attach to no such thing as man or woman.

Kellyven

Posts: 59

(3/19/04 3:23 pm)

Reply

 Re: sex and/or attachment

---

Dave,

Quote:

---

Kelly: Only when there is no such thing as woman for a man will the man also see himself as no (such) thing, and his own self construct dismantled.

---

Quote:

---

DaveT: No.

Only when his own self construct is dismantled, will man attach to no such thing as man or woman.

---

Yes, this is a better way of saying it. However, the "man" construct only exists because of the "woman" construct - just as the self construct is dismantled by the not-self (that there are no boundaries). So they arise and fall together.

Actually i would say that the attachment is not dismantled, but grown out of, no longer using what doesn't fit.

Dave Toast

Registered User

Posts: 1043

(3/19/04 4:12 pm)

Reply

 Re: sex and/or attachment

---

Seems to me that the self construct is what should be dismantled, and the self construct is composed entirely of attachment, attachment in and of itself. Specific attachments themselves may be grown out of along the way, but these are really only the proverbial drops in the ocean. Only on overcoming attachment itself, altogether, will the dam break. Anything else is simply the thwarting of the beaver, shoring up the dam; some of it can even be helping him.

Kellyven

Posts: 60

(3/19/04 6:43 pm)

Reply

re: attachment and a question

Seems to me that the self construct is what should be dismantled, and the self construct is composed entirely of attachment, attachment in and of itself. Specific attachments themselves may be grown out of along the way, but these are really only the proverbial drops in the ocean. Only on overcoming attachment itself, altogether, will the dam break. Anything else is simply the thwarting of the beaver, shoring up the dam; some of it can even be helping him.

I had a strong awakening this afternoon, in which the self construct was grown out of rather instantly - and i was not focussing on "overcoming attachment". It came out of a question. Since i'd like to invite responses to this question, my explanation will become clearer below.

Questions about understanding Ultimate Reality

- (1) Since Ultimate Reality includes that which does not appear (cannot be focussed on), what is the experience of Nirvana if it is not an appearance?
- (2) That is, does the mind reflect directly that which is, by removing the separation of observer and object, i.e. no intermediary/interpreter?
- (3) If Ultimate Reality can never appear to mind, how can a Buddha be aware of the experience of Nirvana?

My answers would be:

- (1) Nirvana is experienced without appearing to mind: categories are so dissolved that awareness makes no distinction between what appears and what doesn't - i.e. one is aware of Ultimate Reality by way of a kind of ultimate consciousness, having a kind of logical inferential mental state whereby Reality is no longer validated by what appears and what doesn't.
- (2) Awareness is so ego- and self-less that there is literally no separation between observer and field: everything that appears appears. Thus awareness becomes everything, or rather, there is no Barrier between what is perceived (and what is perceived!).
- (3) The Buddha has no ordinary mind: appearances lose their categorical states, and awareness also loses its categorical state. Nirvana (all interactions that have ever been and will be) is the merging of appearances and awareness, so that there is no barrier between that which appears and

|                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                          | that which doesn't. My strong awakening came while writing (2): the realisation of awareness having no self. I think perhaps the key is that the ego is completely gone for Nirvana to arise (no barrier).                                                                                                                                                                 |
| birdofhermesRegistered UserPosts: 1484(3/20/04 1:14 pm)Reply  |  Re: re: attachment and a question <hr/> That is a very nice insight.                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| KellyvenPosts: 64(3/21/04 12:36 pm)Reply                                                                                                           |  attachment and a question <hr/> Anna, Why a "very nice" insight? Why not fundamentally True?                                                                                                                                                                               |
| november rainsRegistered UserPosts: 1(7/6/04 5:54 pm)Reply                                                                                    |  What in the hell is this post about? <hr/> I mean. Was that the whole conclusion of the matter? That was it? hmmm...                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2744(7/7/04 1:10 pm)Reply      |  Re: What in the hell is this post about? <hr/> Kelly:-- Quote: <hr/> My strong awakening came while writing (2): the realisation of awareness having no self. I think perhaps the key is that the ego is completely gone for Nirvana to arise (no barrier). <hr/> |

You are mistaken in your realization. 'The key' as you call it, is no key.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 207

(7/7/04 7:47 pm)

Reply

Re: History

---

Quote:

---

Kelly: My strong awakening came while writing (2): the realisation of awareness having no self. I think perhaps the key is that the ego is completely gone for Nirvana to arise (no barrier).

Suergaz: You are mistaken in your realization. 'The key' as you call it, is no key.

---

Do you recall the basis of the "Apology" thread that i started in late April?

A quick recount: i was mistaking the "hidden void" for Truth, meaning, i thought that all appearances and experiences were false, and that a "dim, dark emptiness" was Reality. The obvious error was that this was also an appearance.

My erroneous idea was of having a true self of emptiness, which "didn't really appear". All along it was a mental image (a concept).

Nirvana is egoless because all things are realised to be empty of inherent existence, including the idea of a single independent self. Nevertheless, things do exist as and when they are causally created.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 7/7/04 7:49 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2746
(7/7/04 10:52 pm)
Reply

---

Quote:

---

Nirvana is egoless because all things are realised to be empty of inherent existence, including the idea of a single independent self. Nevertheless, things do exist as and when they are causally created.

---

All things have their inherent existence. What do you mean 'when' things are causally created?! Things are caused. Any human state cannot be 'egoless'-----

What do you mean by nirvana?

Jones Kelly
Posts: 208
(7/8/04 12:19 pm)
Reply

Re: Inherent existence

---

Quote:

---

K: Nirvana is egoless because all things are realised to be empty of inherent existence, including the idea of a single independent self. Nevertheless, things do exist as and when they are causally created.

S: All things have their inherent existence. What do you mean 'when' things are causally created?! Things are caused. Any human state cannot be 'egoless'-----

What do you mean by nirvana?

---

'When' or 'at the moment of' being causally created, a thing exists, and lacks independence from its causes. To be inherently existing, a thing requires at least independence from causation. Thus an "inherently existing thing" is a self-contradiction.

Egolessness is consciousness without the delusion of inherently existing things. If a human self seems to exist inherently, that is ego. Since egolessness is not really a fixed state, your statement is correct Suergaz. However, in the sense that egolessness can be defined (and therefore fixed), in terms of consciousness, it is still a "state".

Nirvana is freedom from the delusion of inherent existence, and is the opposite of samsara. It is not separation from causal processes, but it is absence of cause and effect, because Nirvana itself is realised to be caused and empty of inherent existence.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2747
(7/8/04 3:03 pm)
Reply

 ---Kelly

---

Quote:

---

'When' or 'at the moment of' being causally created, a thing exists, and lacks independence from its causes.

---

With you so far.

Quote:

---

To be inherently existing, a thing requires at least independence from causation. Thus an "inherently existing thing" is a self-contradiction.

---

To be inherently existing, a thing requires nothing but what it is. To say it requires at least independence from causation is impossible so why bring it up before the actuality of existence, completely missing the aim of the adjective 'inherent'? A thing cannot exist apart from everything else, this is inherent existence! The inherent existence of any particular 'thing' within 'everything' ---how couldn't all that is not inherently be what it is? In all becoming this is true.

Quote:

---

Egolessness is consciousness without the delusion of inherently existing things. If a human self seems to exist inherently, that is ego. Since egolessness is not really a fixed state, your statement is correct Suergaz. However, in the sense that egolessness can be defined (and therefore fixed), in terms of consciousness, it is still a "state".

Nirvana is freedom from the delusion of inherent existence, and is the opposite of samsara. It is not separation from causal processes, but it is absence of cause and effect, because Nirvana itself is realised to be caused and empty of inherent existence.

---

So nirvana is egolessness is it?! Then that is death.

We are in complete disagreement (as we've always been) about the meaning of the word inherent still! (:D)

Jones Kelly

Posts: 216

(7/8/04 4:16 pm)

Reply

 Re: ---Kelly

---

Quote:

---

Kelly: To be inherently existing, a thing requires at least independence from causation. Thus an "inherently existing thing" is a self-contradiction.

Suergaz: To be inherently existing, a thing requires nothing but what it is.

---

A thing's identity is based on properties (its parts). The identity is dependent on those properties. The thing itself is the "gluing" together of properties: an illusory cluster of causes.

Inherent existence is impossible, because the cluster is an illusion, and inseparable from its conditions (requirements). What a thing 'is' is those conditions.

Quote:

---

To say it requires at least independence from causation is impossible so why bring it up before the actuality of existence, completely missing the aim of the adjective 'inherent'?

---

This is exactly the problem: inherent existence is impossible for any thing, because all things are causally created.

Inherent existence is only possible for 'what' is uncaused, namely causality itself, and consciousness. That is, 'existence' which does not apply to finite, condition-dependent things.

Quote:

---

A thing cannot exist apart from everything else, this is inherent existence!

---

There is a crucial difference between 'existence' (as in, things exist) and 'inherent existence' (as in, uncaused, uncreated).

Quote:

---

The inherent existence of any particular 'thing' within 'everything' ---how couldn't all that is not inherently be what it is? In all becoming this is true.

---

If a thing is defined as "not-something-else", its definitive property is based on a relationship. Its existence is dependent on the other, and both are dependent on a momentary perspective. All identities are based on a perspective of the thing, ultimately the perspective of what causes consciousness.

Consciousness is a synthesis of actuality (finitude) and possibility (infinite), not defined as itself, nor inherently existing as a relationship, because it is always becoming (possible) yet already existing (necessary). It inherently exists because it is all things, and what exists outside consciousness (the hidden void) is experienced as a concept created within consciousness. It is causality manifested.

N0X23

Registered User
Posts: 170
(7/8/04 4:39 pm)

Reply

 Re: ---Kelly

---

Kelly:

Quote:

---

Inherent existence is only possible for 'what' is uncaused,

---

So Nirvana inherently exists?

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 2749
(7/8/04 4:49 pm)

Reply

 ---

---

Quote:

---

A thing's identity is based on properties (its parts). The identity is dependent on those properties. The thing itself is the "gluing" together of properties: an illusory cluster of causes.

Inherent existence is impossible, because the cluster is an illusion, and inseparable from its conditions (requirements). What a thing 'is' is those conditions.

---

You do not understand the meaning of the word inherent!

Quote:

---

This is exactly the problem: inherent existence is impossible for any thing, because all things are causally created.

---

Not at all, that all things are caused makes inherent existence not only possible, but actual.

Quote:

---

Inherent existence is only possible for 'what' is uncaused, namely causality itself, and consciousness. That is, 'existence' which does not apply to finite, condition-dependent things.

---

Everything is what you are calling 'causality itself' and it has, as you say, inherent existence. Something with existence (no matter how limited) within an inherent existence, can only have inherent existence! In plain english, all existence is inherent!

Quote:

Quote:

---

There is a crucial difference between 'existence' (as in, things exist) and 'inherent existence' (as in, uncaused, uncreated).

---

Well there would be if the definition you provide for inherent existence held in any way whatsoever. What is uncaused and uncreated has no existence.

Quote:

---

If a thing is defined as "not-something-else", its definitive property is based on a relationship. Its existence is dependent on the other, and both are dependent on a momentary perspective. All identities are based on a perspective of the thing, ultimately the perspective of what causes consciousness.

Consciousness is a synthesis of actuality (finitude) and possibility (infinite), not defined as itself, nor inherently existing as a relationship, because it is always becoming (possible) yet already existing (necessary). It inherently exists because it is all things, and what exists outside consciousness (the hidden void) is experienced as a concept created within consciousness. It is causality manifested.

---

Consciousness inherently exists, but not because it is all things!

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| silentsalRegistered UserPosts: 114(7/9/04 2:20 am)Reply |  Re: --- Reality Check! <hr/> Quote: <hr/> One of the women said, "All of us have the four basic necessities of life. We have the seven rare treasures as well. There are, however, three things we would like. A tree without roots. A piece of land where there is neither light nor shade. Some corner of a mountain valley where a shout does not echo." <hr/> This koan can reveal inherent existence, thanks Bird for your inciteful offering on the above. |

Jones Kelly
Posts: 225
(7/9/04 1:42 pm)
Reply

 Re: ---Kelly

---

Quote:

---

K: Inherent existence is only possible for 'what' is uncaused...

N: So Nirvana inherently exists?

---

Is Nirvana caused? Is Samsara caused?

Jones Kelly
Posts: 226
(7/9/04 1:45 pm)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

S:

Quote:

---

Well there would be if the definition you provide for inherent existence held in any way whatsoever. What is uncaused and uncreated has no existence.

---

And that is why all things lack inherent existence.

To clarify: a thing exists, and therefore "existence" is an inherent property of a thing.

A thing is not independent of its properties, but by having properties, it inherently has properties. Ie. a thing inherently has causal existence.

This is not at all the same as saying a thing inherently exists, intrinsically, and apart from its conditions. The thing is its conditions.

The upshot of this, Suergaz, is that the nature of all things is that they are inherently caused, inherently have properties, inherently have the nature of existing. Thus, the idea that Suergaz exists as an independent self, that is not caused, that has existence apart from its conditions, is false.

Suergaz, in fact, is an inherently conditional existence.

Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 7/9/04 1:54 pm

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2755

(7/9/04 2:03 pm)

Reply

 ---

---

Quote:

---

Thus, the idea that Suergaz exists as an independent self, that is not caused, that has existence apart from its conditions, is false.

---

When has this idea ever surfaced kelly? A thing may exist, intrinsically, but this is not to say it exists apart from its conditions and everything else.

This is about the meaning of the word inherent.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 229

(7/9/04 2:14 pm)

Reply

 Re: ---

---

Quote:

---

K: Thus, the idea that Suergaz exists as an independent self, that is not caused, that has existence apart from its conditions, is false.

S: When has this idea ever surfaced kelly? A thing may exist, intrinsically, but this is not to say it exists apart from its conditions and everything else.

This is about the meaning of the word inherent.

---

This is about understanding the nature of existence. A thing never exists intrinsically, ie be by not being, exist without existing, be a thing that is not a thing.

A shadow falling across the floor exists because it is causally created, meaning its existence is inherently caused.

Why bother with your definition? To say a thing inherently exists because existence is inherently existence and not not-existence, is a tautology, and is useless to an exploration of the nature of existence (because it goes nowhere).

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2758

(7/9/04 2:21 pm)

Reply

 ----

---

Quote:

---

A shadow falling across the floor exists because it is causally created, meaning its existence is inherently caused.

---

Inherently caused, and inherently extant.

Your idea of what constitutes a tautology is poor.

The existence of everything is inherent.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 231

(7/9/04 2:36 pm)

Reply

 Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

Suergaz: Inherently caused, and inherently extant.

---

extant

adj : still in existence; not extinct or destroyed or lost; "extant manuscripts";

This is your error: you have deviously taken the idea of "existence inherently being existence", called it "inherent existence", and thus misapplied the truth that "all things have the inherent property of existence" to "particular things permanently and eternally exist".

Evidence of your emotional attachment to "inherent existence", that disables your rationality and potential understanding of Reality.

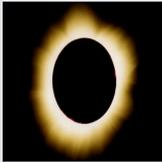

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2760

(7/9/04 2:39 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Bullshit.

I have only made clear the idea that in an inherently existing universe, things, no matter their causal relationships, can only be inherent.

My understanding is greater than yours.

Jones Kelly

Posts: 233

(7/9/04 3:01 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

S:

Quote:

---

I have only made clear the idea that in an inherently existing universe, things, no matter their causal relationships, can only be inherent.

---

You've just stepped into another error.

Not only did you turn the "existence is inherently existence" definition into "a particular something inherently exists", and made it permanent and eternal ("Universe"), but you have also claimed a thing only has this same property (as "Universe") when it is in relationship to the "Universe".

If a thing only has this property when it is dependent on another thing that has this property, then you have made the existence of all things inherently dependent on non-existence.

That's pure illogic: all things inherently exist because non-existence exists.

suergaz

Registered User
Posts: 2762
(7/9/04 3:09 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

You've twisted what I've said. I have not made out the existence of all things to be inherently dependent on 'non-existence'. A thing can only be in relationship to the universe(everything). Such desire to be right! Why are you afraid I'm right?! I don't have anything against you that I know of!

Why do you not address my statement that I have greater understanding than yourself?! (:D)

jimhaz

Registered User
Posts: 709
(7/9/04 3:23 pm)
Reply

Re: ----

extant

adj : still in existence; not extinct or destroyed or lost; "extant manuscripts";

This is the point Suergaz is making. If a thing exists then it always exists - in terms of the phrase "inherent existence" it doesn't matter that its properties existence is temporary and that its properties are spread about by the forces of cause and effect. Nothing is created or destroyed.

birdofhermes

Registered User
Posts: 1531
(7/10/04 12:05 am)
Reply

Re: ----

I agree that existence itself is inherent. Noninherent existence means that a form exists as that form temporarily, and that its boundaries are not absolute. When the tree is gone you no longer perceive a tree. Its matter or energy is not destroyed but the tree is gone.

I think perhaps they belabor this point too much. A valuable insight but one of limited usefulness.

WolfsonJakk

Posts: 1696

(7/10/04 3:05 am)

Reply

 ...

---

I am a bit disappointed. This is really not that difficult.

in·her·ent ( P ) Pronunciation Key (n-hîrnt, -hr-)

adj.

(1)Existing as an essential constituent or characteristic; intrinsic.

(2)Occurring as a natural part or consequence.

(3)Permanently existing in something; inseparably attached or connected; naturally pertaining to; innate; inalienable; as, polarity is an inherent quality of the magnet; the inherent right of men to life, liberty, and protection.

(4)existing as an essential constituent or characteristic.

--- from dictionary.com

Definitions 1 and 2 are dependent on an external object for the word to function; thus is contingent and non-inherent as far as it's existence is concerned.

Definitions 3 and 4 are what are being used for the most part when using the phrase "inherent existence."

All existence and physical matter, and the concepts that might arise from certain physical entities, is causal and thus contingent and non-inherent.

Tharan

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2765

(7/10/04 2:12 pm)

Reply

 ---

---

Wolf

Quote:

---

All existence and physical matter, and the concepts that might arise from certain physical entities, is causal and thus contingent and non-inherent.

---

Those definitions only prove what to me seems too obvious to have to prove:--Inherent existence!

The contingent and causal nature of everything does not make everything

"non-inherent"

(:D)

You'll understand one day, I promise!

Jones Kelly

Posts: 237

(7/10/04 2:59 pm)

Reply

 Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

S: I have only made clear the idea that in an inherently existing universe, things, no matter their causal relationships, can only be inherent.

K: You've just stepped into another error.

Not only did you turn the "existence is inherently existence" definition into "a particular something inherently exists", and made it permanent and eternal ("Universe"), but you have also claimed a thing only has this same property (as "Universe") when it is in relationship to the "Universe".

If a thing only has this property when it is dependent on another thing that has this property, then you have made the existence of all things inherently dependent on non-existence.

That's pure illogic: all things inherently exist because non-existence exists.

S: You've twisted what I've said. I have not made out the existence of all things to be inherently dependent on 'non-existence'. A thing can only be in relationship to the universe (everything). Such desire to be right! Why are you afraid I'm right?! I don't have anything against you that I know of!

Why do you not address my statement that I have greater understanding than yourself?! (:D)

---

The problem i see with your logic is this: when a thing is regarded to inherently exist because it is dependent on its relationship to the totality of all things, the totality of all things becomes a causal condition (another thing).

The error is simply that the totality of all things cannot be a thing, because it would then be caused by something else.

If the totality is created (finite, bounded), then it is not at all the totality.

As i said, to make the totality dependent on the existence (thing-ness) of non-existence is illogical.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2769
(7/10/04 3:10 pm)
Reply

 ----

---

Now that is quite clearly expressed! I'm impressed. But the error is yours. It cannot truthfully be concluded that regarding the dependence of everything upon everything else makes everything dependent on something that is not itself, ie. that everything is then somehow a 'thing' and not what it is, which is everything. At the same time it also cannot truthfully be concluded that the totality of all things causes itself, but this is because we cannot posit 'how' this is so, where, in regard to everything not being a thing, infinity allows us a 'how'.

Jones Kelly
Posts: 238
(7/10/04 3:11 pm)
Reply

 Re: ----

---

Jimhaz:

Quote:

---

extant

adj : still in existence; not extinct or destroyed or lost; "extant manuscripts";

This is the point Suergaz is making. If a thing exists then it always exists - in terms of the phrase "inherent existence" it doesn't matter that its properties existence is temporary and that its properties are spread about by the forces of cause and effect. Nothing is created or destroyed.

---

Can you show me where this "permanent existence" is? Give it to me. It's simply a construct, like "temporal", "forces", "cause and effect" projected by reason, onto how Reality appears.

Anna:

Quote:

---

I agree that existence itself is inherent. Noninherent existence means that a form exists as that form temporarily, and that its boundaries are not absolute. When the tree is gone you no longer perceive a tree. Its matter or energy is not destroyed but the tree is gone.

---

You seem to think that time, matter, energy, etc. have some kind of permanent existence, beyond the projection of boundaries of your imagination.

Quote:

---

A: I think perhaps they belabor this point too much. A valuable insight but one of limited usefulness.

---

If the fundamental truth of causation and the emptiness of all things is not understood, then all labour is worthless. This insight is absolutely essential, infinitely useful, and is the cornerstone of all understanding.

The answer to the koan is much simpler than you think. It is always a logic puzzle, not an allegory or piece of poetic allusion.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2770

(7/10/04 3:16 pm)

Reply

---

Kelly, neither Anna nor Jimhaz have spoken of 'permanent' existence! They mean eternity! For something to always exist, it need only exist! Once soemthign comes into existence, it is a causally tied to everything else.... Forever!!!

Jones Kelly

Posts: 240

(7/10/04 3:45 pm)

Reply

Re: ----

---

Quote:

---

S: It cannot truthfully be concluded that regarding the dependence of everything upon everything else makes everything dependent on something that is not itself, ie. that everything is then somehow a 'thing' and not what it is, which is everything. At the same time it also cannot truthfully be concluded that the totality of all things causes itself, but this is because we cannot posit 'how' this is so, where, in regard to everything not being a thing, infinity allows us a 'how'.

---

Sorry for interrupting -- but how can the totality of all things be dependent on "everything else", since there is nothing beyond the Totality?

That's a false conclusion, so i wouldn't start there. (The Totality isn't actually dependent on something else, since causation doesn't apply beyond the Totality).

You seem to be implying that, because all things have the intrinsic property of existence, this thing "existence" has an independent existence as the Totality.

The problem is that the Totality is not a thing, but a philosophical concept, pointing to the fact that existence is causal, never something that can be "forever" grasped.

To conclude that things have some permanent form (in time, as matter or energy, etc.) and intrinsic existence, because philosophical concepts are intrinsically caused to exist, is to overlook the fact that philosophical concepts are themselves only pointers, and therefore self-referential.

Look around: all you will ever see are these philosophical constructs. By understanding that's what reasoning does, is to see what is really there.

And of course, to give it a name is to miss the point...

silentsal

Registered User

Posts: 117

(7/10/04 4:15 pm)

Reply

 Re: ----

---

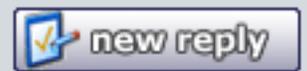

taken from Nagajuna's Sunyata

Quote:

---

Ultimate Truth. This is the truth that teaches the ultimate nature of all things. In the mundane truth, it is said that all things are empty of inherent existence, that they have a determinate, conditioned, and impermanent nature. The ultimate truth recognizes that this mundane truth itself is determinate, conditioned, and thus not absolute. In other words, if everything is relative, then the statement that everything is relative is itself relative. Or, more concisely, the conditionedness of the conditioned is itself conditioned. Consequently, the relative world and the Absolute can not be distinguished. For then they would be related to each other as opposites. But the Absolute would then be relative to the relative world. This is nonsense since the Absolute is by definition free from all relation and determination. Thus the ultimate truth has the consequence that this whole relative world is ultimately identical to the Absolute, that there is really no division between the relative world and the Absolute. But whenever we engage in the conventions of the relative world, the mundane truth applies, for by its very definition the relative world is characterized by impermanence and emptiness of inherent existence. The mundane truth teaches us to become free of the illusion that the relative world is itself real, while the ultimate truth teaches us that it is real after all, but not in the exclusive sense in which we originally took it to be.

---

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

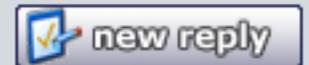

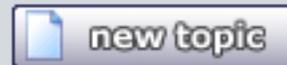

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Intuitive Knowledge and Logic Proof

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2772(7/10/04 9:58 pm)Reply |  --- <hr/> Kelly: Quote: <hr/> Sorry for interrupting -- but how can the totality of all things be dependent on "everything else", since there is nothing beyond the Totality? <hr/> My saying that everything depends on everything else, if you weren't so keen to find fault with my reasoning, you would have understood to mean, as I meant it, that 'the totality' is dependent on itself alone. Quote: <hr/> That's a false conclusion, so i wouldn't start there. (The Totality isn't actually dependent on something else, since causation doesn't apply beyond the Totality). <hr/> I didn't. |

Quote:

---

You seem to be implying that, because all things have the intrinsic property of existence, this thing "existence" has an independent existence as the Totality.

---

Yes, existence is everything, how couldn't it be?

Quote:

---

The problem is that the Totality is not a thing, but a philosophical concept, pointing to the fact that existence is causal, never something that can be "forever" grasped.

---

If the totality were a philosophical concept as you are saying, it would be a thing wouldn't it? It is everything. Nothing less. So long as we exist, we can always grasp existence.

Quote:

---

To conclude that things have some permanent form (in time, as matter or energy, etc.) and intrinsic existence, because philosophical concepts are intrinsically caused to exist, is to overlook the fact that philosophical concepts are themselves only pointers, and therefore self-referential.

---

Who has come to such a conclusion?

Quote:

---

Look around: all you will ever see are these philosophical constructs. By understanding that's what reasoning does, is to see what is really there.

And of course, to give it a name is to miss the point...

---

Do you love it?

Bumpbert
Registered User
Posts: 2
(7/11/04 3:07 am)
Reply

 Re: ---

---

If you claim that any process of valid reasoning ultimately runs up against a brick wall of intuition, doesn't that ignore the fact that we arbitrarily set up the parameters for truth?

We don't need to 'intuit' what truth is, we merely have to say what it is. For example, David, Kevin, or Dan might say that truth is any statement which conforms to "A = A." This provides them with some absolutely certain knowledge claims.

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2779
(7/11/04 3:12 am)
Reply

 ----

---

We merely have to say what it is? But this is what I've always thought! So let us take the language apart if necessary.

Bumpbert
Registered User
Posts: 4
(7/11/04 3:14 am)
Reply

 Re: ----

---

Sounds like it would take an awful long time. :p But anyway, I wasn't contradicting you; I didn't read your post. In fact, I was replying to the first post in the thread. (I know, I'm late)

Edited by: Bumpbert at: 7/11/04 12:18 pm

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2784
(7/11/04 3:29 am)
Reply

 ---

---

Forever is too long for you? And everyone else in this place but me! (Or so it seems!)

Jones Kelly

Posts: 242

(7/11/04 10:30 am)

Reply

Re: ---

S:

Quote:

---

S: I have only made clear the idea that in an inherently existing universe, things, no matter their causal relationships, can only be inherent.

S: My saying that everything depends on everything else, if you weren't so keen to find fault with my reasoning, you would have understood to mean, as I meant it, that 'the totality' is dependent on itself alone.

---

I don't really see how that logic works. You think particular things inherently exist, because:

(i) the nature of all things is to exist, and the designation 'existence' is inherent to all things (so that all things have this inherent designation)?

or

(ii) the totality is independent of all things (since it cannot be caused)?

or

(iii) the totalilty is dependent on being caused to exist by its causes (itself=all things)?

If you can work out the problems with those yourself, you'll understand why reasoning is the core source of "inherent existence" - as someone else has said, "mere adventitious designations"...

As Silentsal's post from Nagarjuna points out, every designation is relative to other designations, and never anything beyond reason. This means that reason is essential to undercutting its own delusional creations, because nothing else can.

Quote:

---

K: You seem to be implying that, because all things have the intrinsic property of existence, this thing "existence" has an independent existence as the Totality.

S: Yes, existence is everything, how couldn't it be?

---

The problem with your simple statement is that it can be highly misleading.

Because a thing has some way of being distinguished from every other thing that it is not, it has existence, or being-ness. Thus, every thing can be distinguished in some way, and described using abstractions.

The Totality (all things) has existence in a similar way, because it is distinguished negatively: from non-existence. The humour in this, is that non-existence (not-of-things) itself is distinguished from existence, therefore it too forms part of the Totality -- or does it?

So, can it be established that the Totality (everything) is an abstraction that doesn't inherently exist, because abstractions lack any kind of objective reality -- or is it an abstraction that does inherently exist, because existence is an abstraction meaning 'existence'?

Quote:

---

K: The problem is that the Totality is not a thing, but a philosophical concept, pointing to the fact that existence is causal, never something that can be "forever" grasped.

S: If the totality were a philosophical concept as you are saying, it would be a thing wouldn't it? It is everything. Nothing less. So long as we exist, we can always grasp existence.

---

As you say, the Totality isn't one thing but all things. In other words, the philosophical concept refers to all things in existence.

Your last sentence is incorrect: if there is reasoning, there are abstract constructs, such as 'existence', and the potential for delusional belief that these constructs are objectively real things beyond the mind.

In a deluded mind, the constructed reality is believed to have an existence beyond the mind (existence inherent to itself, and uncaused by the mind), such as the constructions of "universe" or "self" or "mind".

In an undeluded mind, the separative capacity of reason actually unseparates these constructions, grounding one transparently in Reality.

Quote:

---

K: To conclude that things have some permanent form (in time, as matter or energy, etc.) and intrinsic existence, because philosophical concepts are intrinsically caused to exist, is to overlook the fact that philosophical concepts are themselves only pointers, and therefore self-referential.

S: Who has come to such a conclusion?

---

It seems to me that you haven't dug deep enough with your awareness of causation. Back a month or two ago, you avoided the questions about the causation of yourself. It isn't surprising, because you are still grossly deluded in the belief that you are master of your constructions, and that you aren't simply an abstract construction of mind.

You continue to avoid the essential question of what self is - by such questions as above - which indicates a cowardly nature. Your aptitude for reasoning is high, but your defiant nature is shown by wanting to be this reasoning, at the expense of applying it to yourself.

Your self is an illusory glued-together-by-reason amalgamation of illusions (abstractions), such as reason, sensation, experience, images, etc. which the deluded mind constantly interprets as 'concrete', rather than constantly becoming.

Quote:

---

K: Look around: all you will ever see are these philosophical constructs. By understanding that's what reasoning does, is to see what is really there.

And of course, to give it a name is to miss the point...

S: Do you love it?

---

|                                                                                     |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                     | I see you didn't get the point. Edited by: Jones Kelly at: 7/11/04 11:11 am                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2788(7/11/04 11:54 am)Reply |  --- <hr/> And the point is?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Jones KellyPosts: 245(7/11/04 12:13 pm)Reply                  |  Re: --- <hr/> You continue to avoid the essential question of what self is - by such questions as above - which indicates a cowardly nature. Your aptitude for reasoning is high, but your defiant nature is shown by wanting to be this reasoning, at the expense of applying it to yourself. Your self is an illusory glued-together-by-reason amalgamation of illusions (abstractions), such as reason, sensation, experience, images, etc. which the deluded mind constantly interprets as 'concrete', rather than constantly becoming. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2792(7/11/04 12:31 pm)Reply |  --- <hr/> You've already said that. I asked you what you think the point is, since you think I missed it.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Jones KellyPosts: 248(7/11/04 1:11 pm)Reply                   |  Re: --- <hr/> Quote: <hr/> S: I asked you what you think the point is, since you think I missed it. <hr/> I said it twice, and you still missed it. Go on, it's going to require some courage, Suergaz. A king of fantasies can legitimately rebel at any moment, and is constantly showing himself to be                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                    | king of nothing. Do you really think this is a fruitful way to exist - destroying your mind at every turn?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2796(7/11/04 1:20 pm)Reply |  --- <hr/> Don't talk to me about courage girl who is afraid of hobgoblins in cemeteries at night. What do you love?! It's a pissy little game you're playing.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Jones KellyPosts: 250(7/11/04 1:49 pm)Reply                  |  Re: --- <hr/> You're baulking from thinking about the causes of the self. When i mentioned the deeply ingrained superstitions of ghosts, i neglected to mention that i stopped and analysed what had spooked me: after i had taken a step, i then heard grass crackling behind me. I was certain there was no one else around. Because the sound of crackling grass is usually associated with the step, made by a person, i associated the oddness with the cemetery. I thought that was illogical, so i stopped and listened, then bent down, and realised the crackling was the sound of water rushing back in to fill the cavity of the imprint in the grass. Suergaz, why don't you apply your analytical powers to the causes of self? Have you taken refuge in this self, so that you think it would be an extreme injustice to "you" (the illusion) to abandon the illusion? This is something like you: If the despairing self is active, then really it is constantly relating to itself only experimentally, no matter what it undertakes, however great, however amazing and with whatever perseverance. It recognises no power over itself; therefore in the final instance it lacks seriousness and can only conjure forth an appearance of seriousness, even when it bestows upon its experiments its greatest possible attention. That is a specious seriousness. As with Prometheus' theft of fire from the gods, this is stealing from God the thought - which is seriousness - that God takes notice of one, in place of which the despairing self is content with taking notice of itself, which is meant to bestow infinite interest and significance on its enterprises, and which is exactly what makes them experiments. For even if this self does | not go so far in its despair as to become an experimental god, no derived self, by taking notice of itself, can make itself more than it already is; it remains itself from first to last, in its self-duplication it still becomes neither more nor less than the self. In so far as the self, in the despairing endeavour of its wish to be itself, works its way into the exact opposite, it really becomes no self. In the whole dialectic in which it acts there is nothing firm; at no moment does what the self amount to stand firm, that is eternally firm. The negative form of the self exerts the loosening as much as the binding power; it can, at any moment, start quite arbitrarily all over again and, however far an idea is pursued in practice, the entire action is contained within a hypothesis. So, far from the self succeeding increasingly in being itself, it becomes increasingly obvious that it is a hypothetical self. The self is its own master, absolutely (as one says) its own master; and exactly this is the despair, but also what it regards as its pleasure and joy. But it is easy on closer examination to see that this absolute ruler is a king without a country, that really he rules over nothing; his position, his kingdom, his sovereignty, are subject to the dialect that rebellion is legitimate at any moment. Ultimately it is arbitrarily based upon the self itself.

Consequently, the despairing self is forever building only castles in the air, and is always only fencing with an imaginary opponent. All these experimental virtues look very splendid; they fascinate for a moment, like oriental poetry; such self-discipline, such imperturbability, such ataraxy, etc. border almost on the fabulous. Yes, that they do for sure, and beneath it all there is nothing. The self wants in its despair to savour to the full the satisfaction of making itself into itself, of developing itself, of being itself; it wants to take the credit for this fictional, masterly project, its own way of understanding itself. And yet what it understands itself to be is in the final instance a riddle; just when it seems on the point of having the building finished, at a whim it can dissolve the whole thing into nothing.

suergaz

Registered User

Posts: 2801

(7/11/04 5:23 pm)

Reply

What exceptional self doesn't despair at some point in its course?! What are you trying to say, that essentially mine is a self that despairs?! You silly superstitious girl!

Jones Kelly
Posts: 254
(7/12/04 5:47 pm)
Reply

 Re: ----

S:

Quote:

---

What exceptional self doesn't despair at some point in its course?! What are you trying to say, that essentially mine is a self that despairs?! You silly superstitious girl!

---

All exceptional selves recognise and accept that a heightened despair is inherent to their exceptionality - not simply something that "occurs at some point in its course".

Virtually all selves are in despair, since it is so very rare for a self to be itself.

Ending the despair is either a matter of a real act of suicide ('its own' death), or a spiritual suicide: understanding it is a causal relationship to God, rather than a concrete, independently existing being.

I note your "current question" was To Be. Spiritual suicide is not so much "not to be", but understanding and accepting both "to be" and "not to be" are both illusions.

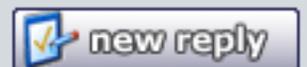

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2814
(7/13/04 1:05 am)
Reply

 ----

---

Read my words again you God-infested maniac! It was my current answer.

Very simply, at some point in its course, any exceptional self, ie. a self for which it is not rare to be itself.

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

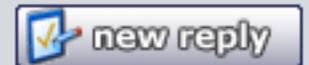

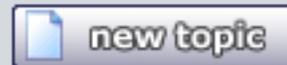

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Ironic Forum Name

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                                                                                                                | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| KristjanGRegistered UserPosts: 1(6/24/04 8:55 am)Reply                                                                                     |  Ironic Forum Name <hr/> Its funny that a forum frequented by people seeking to extinguish the self and merge with the infinite has a name that can only have been designed to stroke the ego...-K |
| MKFaiziRegistered UserPosts: 1234(6/24/04 2:47 pm)Reply  |  Re: Ironic Forum Name <hr/> You have not been here long enough.I have been here for years. Nothing here stokes the ego.Faizi                                                          |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2697(6/24/04 3:00 pm)Reply                                                                                    |  --- <hr/> There are people here seeking to extinguish the self?! (:D) Edited by: drowden at: 6/26/04 9:49 am                                                                           |

Jones Kelly
Posts: 171
(6/24/04 4:39 pm)
Reply

☐ Re: ---

---

A compound thing originates from its conditions. Therefore, it is sunya by nature.

KristjanG
Registered User
Posts: 3
(6/25/04 2:16 am)
Reply

☐ seemed funny at the time...

---

Well, I was just reading thru some of the posts, and noticed a lot of the 'ol "embrace nothingness" type of comments.
It seemed amusing at the time given the title of the forum.
After all, people prolly wouldn't give this forum the once over if they didn't think that they might be some sort of "genius".
And of course, due to the emphasis placed on intelligence in the modern day, and the association of "genius" with intelligence, I would doubt that most of the self diagnosed geniuses here do not carry a certain pride in their geniusness?
I for one sure do!;-)
And god damn does pride ever seem to make thinking clearly difficult!
Word out!
-K

PS- this post wasn't meant to disrespect. I'm aware of the advertising potential of the forum title;-)

Dave Toast
Registered User
Posts: 1127
(6/25/04 8:13 am)
Reply

☐ Re: seemed funny at the time...

---

Quote:

---

Kristjan: Its funny that a forum frequented by people seeking to extinguish the self and merge with the infinite has a name that can only have been designed to stroke the ego...

---

Out of the mouth of babes.

Hi Kristjan, welcome. You've certainly hit on a prescient point there, considering you're new. Around here, the ego is that much more subtle than the norm, wearing many disguises one on top of another. You may also notice the willfulness of this non-ego-with-ego, and the background malevolence.

|                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dave ToastRegistered UserPosts: 1128(6/25/04 8:15 am)Reply              |  Re: seemed funny at the time... <hr/> Quote: <hr/> Kelly: A compound thing originates from its conditions.Therefore, it is sunya by nature. <hr/> Kelly, would you care to expand on this statement for me?                                                                 |
| Rhett HamiltonRegistered UserPosts: 414(6/25/04 11:16 am)Reply   Edit  |  Re: Ironic Forum Name <hr/> I think the title is good, because in our current age the term 'genius' is symbolic of the highest achievement. I also think that those people that aspire to perfection will find that the title brings to mind their deficiencies, rather than stroke their ego. |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2707(6/25/04 2:21 pm)Reply                                                                                                 |  --- <hr/> Which deficiency of yours does the title of this forum bring to mind Rhett?(:D)                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Jones KellyPosts: 173(6/25/04 3:37 pm)Reply                                                                                                                  |  Re: seemed funny at the time... <hr/> Dave wrote: Quote: <hr/> "A compound thing originates from its conditions. Therefore, it is sunya by nature." Kelly, would you care to expand on this statement for me? <hr/>                                                     |

It was a joke, referring to Suergaz's post.

It refers to everything [aka: all things are causally created, and lack intrinsic existence]. I was struck by the comparative sunya of the empty screen, which caused me to perceive the for-self as a mere creation.

And again.

And again.

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1721
(6/25/04 3:39 pm)
Reply

Re: ---

There is nothing at all ironic in the title of this board. If you would care to look at the welcome forum messages you would understand that. This is not a board for people who think they are geniuses, but one for the discussion of matters concerning the nature of genius and the attainment of same - which to the board's owners means the same as enlightenment. It's just that "enlightenment" is a term that is almost ubiquitous on spiritual and philosophical discussion boards and has lost some of its "bite".

Anyway, why does a declaration of genius have to have egotistical content?

Dan Rowden

suergaz
Registered User
Posts: 2709
(6/25/04 10:52 pm)
Reply

---

You mean this is not a forum for geniuses but only those who wish to attain genius?! A fan-club?!

This is the "truth genius forum"! I've personally never understood the 'truth' bit of the title, and threatened to remove my genius from here if it wasn't changed, you may as well change the name of this place to "happy tree plenty fun time"

drowden
Forum Host
Posts: 1726
(6/26/04 9:59 am)
Reply

Re: ---

Firstly, I edited your post where you inadvertantly left a huge empty space at the end before I noticed Kelly's reply to that aspect of it. So, that part of her reply probably won't make much sense now. I wish people (i.e. you) would learn to use the edit button when they screw up.

Secondly, I perhaps should have said the forum is not specifically or exclusively for those who claim genius. It's obviously also for those who might rightly make that claim and also pretenders such as yourself. And it is indicative of your lack of true imagination and flexibility of mind that you have never worked out what the "truth" part of the forum logo means. Look at it again - it is obvious that the image suggests that the forum unveals things like the truth; it also intimates the unveiling of other things. I left that to the imagination of the viewer. It is suggestive, invocative, provocative.

|                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                                                                                                                 | Wasted on you, obviously. :) Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2712(6/26/04 10:02 am)Reply                                                                             |  ---- <hr/> That's fucking magnificent! The unVEALing!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1729(6/26/04 10:06 am)Reply  |  Re: --- <hr/> Well, I'm glad you are so pleased by matters so small as spelling errors. Another indicator of your mind state. Dan Rowden                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 2714(6/26/04 10:26 am)Reply                                                                             |  --- <hr/> It is remarkable you don't know how to spell 'unveil' at your ripe old age Dan!                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Jones KellyPosts: 174(6/26/04 12:11 pm)Reply                                                                                              |  Re: Revealing how to unveil the Veil <hr/> It may be a spelling error, but it comes from the same root. An act of God/Genius perhaps? re·veal1 ( P ) Pronunciation Key (r-vl)tr.v. re·vealed, re·veal·ing, re·veals To make known (something concealed or secret): revealed a confidence.To bring to view; show.To make known by supernatural or divine means: “For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven” (Romans 1:18). [Middle English revelen, from Old French reveler, from Latin revlre : re-, re- + vlre, to cover (from vlum, veil).] |

|                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| WolfsonJakk Posts: 1667 (6/26/04 2:09 pm) Reply                                                                                                                |  ... <hr/> I think Dan had Bambi on his mind. So tender and young...                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Rhett Hamilton Registered User Posts: 428 (6/27/04 1:24 pm) Reply   Edit  |  Re: ... <hr/> I often stumble with the English language, because it is my second language. Reality is my first language.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| suergaz Registered User Posts: 2720 (6/27/04 2:10 pm) Reply                                                                                               |  -- <hr/> It's everyones first language. You often stumble with the english language because you mustn't love your first one well enough. *(edit) Or is it that you love it too well? I don't believe that. Edited by: suergaz at: 6/27/04 2:32 pm                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| KristjanG Registered User Posts: 6 (6/30/04 7:49 am) Reply                                                                                                |  . <hr/> Wow, that's a great discussion. The only thing I can think to add is this: In western society, "Genius" is used as a compliment. As in "wow man, that was some genius work!". That's why I would say it strokes the ego to be called a genius. If other folks around here grew up with a different perception of the idea of genius, then my little joke falls apart. But yeah, this forum really seeeeeems to be more a discussion about enlightenment as Drowden has suggested. on to the next topic! -K |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31q
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> IS SPIRITUALITY MORE IN LETTER THAN IN SPIRIT ?

New Topic

Add Reply

<< Prev Topic |

| Author                                                                             | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Hiren shahRegistered UserPosts: 4(8/5/03 11:48 pm)Reply | New Post IS SPIRITUALITY MORE IN LETTER THAN IN SPIRIT ? <hr/> Religion-“Man will struggle for religion, write for religion, fight for religion, do anything but live religion” is an adage that applies today as well. In recent times, events of September 11 and some incidents of violence in India in Gujarat where people were burnt alive come to mind. It shows that man still does not hesitate to kill in the name of religion when the opportunity arises. According to renowned Indian thinker Krishnamurthy, Man has only advanced technologically but psychologically he is as he was. “ According to him, the existence of various religions which espouse spirituality are itself the prime source of conflict which is against spirituality. His quote ”There is a hindu belief, a Christian belief, a Buddhist belief. Is it possible in this world to live without a belief- not change beliefs, not substitute one belief for another but be entirely free of all beliefs so that one meets life anew each minute.” This is the real solution for mankind’s problem. Know thyself- Anybody who is fond of reading spiritual books would know that spiritual literature is replete with the word “ Know thyself” However even in the 21st century people have to learn by trial and error the basic purpose of their lives. Many times, people are qualified for something but end up doing something totally different. It is commonsense that when the basic purpose of life itself is unfulfilled and one is miserable in a majority of his working hours, how can he be peaceful and happy i.e spiritual. The irony is the literal meaning of the word education is to draw out what is already in and not blindly stuff in. Know thyself like other aspects of spirituality are | more in letter than in spirit.

Competition- My father in law works in a Jain temple on a voluntary basis after retirement. He told me once that just by becoming a monk and shaving one's head one cannot change what is inside one's head. Then he apprised me of temple politics which was unbelievable. One has also come across the words spiritual ambition, spiritual one-up manship and spiritual professionals who distort religion for their own selfish motives which is the very antithesis of spirituality. The irony here again is that the very meaning of the word competition is "seeking together" . Therefore, it is a double thumbs down for spirituality.

Socialism – "God does not comfort us to make us comfortable but to comfort others."

Spiritual literature is replete with such examples which advocate socialism. Then isn't it any irony that is capitalism that prevails the world over after the collapse of the Soviet union and it is capitalism that is perceived to be the better of the two systems. I am not advocating socialism but I do believe that neither socialism nor capitalism is perfect- the truth lies somewhere in between. I am for voluntary and responsible socialism alongside the enterprise of capitalism because that alone can solve some of the problems that have beset humanity. In India, somewhere in the Darshan Shastras, it is written that unless pure and noble people ensure equality of Income and wealth, there was no point talking about spirituality.

Honesty- Let us examine the following statements which speak for themselves:-

"It is discouraging to think how many people are shocked by honesty and how few by deceit" - Noel Coward

We must make the world honest before we can honestly say to our children that honesty is the best policy- George Bernard Shaw

“You cannot make people honest by an act of Parliament.” – Anonymous

Peace- Considering the time around which Buddha and Christ existed, spirituality took a headstart over applied science which really blossomed only after the seventeenth century or the Industrial revolution. Considering that it had such a big advantage, it is a wonder how nuclear weapons were invented and allowed to blossom. If spirituality had been successful as science has been, there would have been better equality of wealth, more religious tolerance, practically no crime, no drug addiction, no nuclear weapons etc. Sadly, man has remained psychologically as he was.

Happiness and equanimity – From some of the things mentioned above, it is clear that considering the kind of headstart spirituality had over science, in broad conclusion it can be stated that the world would have been in a far better place to live in. Even today there is no dearth of people who are envious, regressive and catering to their own vested interest rather for the broader humanitarian interests. Politicians are despised the world over. How can anybody claim any success for spirituality in implementation. ?

Recent Events, Practices - After the Iraq war was over, the weapons of mass destruction which was the primary motive for waging the war were never found. Before the Iraq war commenced, there was a lot of literature on how powerful vested interests were behind Iraq's oil. These events only go on to show that even in the 21st century, religious conflict and vested interests hold sway which again implies that applied spirituality is conspicuous by its absence.

This is what Mother Teresa had to say on relationships "Often endless hours are spent in conversation, expressing our frustration about what we find objectionable, and verbally exchanging insults and examples of what is so exasperating. It is true on some level that communication is the key to successful relationships but it seems that the more the words are exchanged, the less successful the outcome " Emotional conflicts are hardly conducive to spirituality and a famous psychiatrist also said once that the best way to resolve conflicts was to listen to each other without interruption.

Considering all this, when one comes across various community forums on the internet, one wonders why people hide their real identities even in spiritual forums. The forums are an excellent way of exchanging information without vitiating the atmosphere because the other person is forced to listen completely. They actually enable to respond and not to react because I have myself seen several verbal spats deteriorate into blows even among educated, civilized people. When one has such a first class facility as the internet for the first time in history for common people all over the world to interact with one another, why should people want to hide identities unless it is with the intention of taking potshots at one another or not having the confidence to resolve a dispute amicably. The forums are an actual spiritual tool but the inner motives of man rarely change.

Law of Karma-It would not be out of place to mention the theory of Karma which is mentioned in Buddhism, Hinduism and Jainism. According to that the one atones for the deeds of one's previous life in current life and of one's current life in future life. Had this problem been implemented in letter and spirit, India's biggest hurdle the population problem would not have been there in the first place. Not only that, if this theory had been implemented practically, a majority of the problems that mankind is beset with shall go automatically. A religious preacher said once " We only believe in the Bhagvat Geeta*, we do not follow it". Geeta is the most revered hindu scripture.

It can be inferred that spirituality is there more in letter than spirit. It can give the excuse that the world would have been a worse off place to live in had it not been around but the fact remains that its implementation leaves a lot to be desired

|                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| drowdenForum HostPosts: 1310(8/6/03 1:34 pm)Reply       | New Post The Individual <hr/> Yes, it is discouraging how little people value truth, but what matters is how much we value it as individuals. Ultimately, the others can please themselves.... Dan Rowden |
| FiramirRegistered UserPosts: 4(8/9/03 8:34 am)Reply     | New Post Spirituality <hr/> No, politics is in letters, it is a religious screen for the aesthetic. True religion surpasses words and practices and dogmas and appears just like normal life.                           |
| suergazRegistered UserPosts: 1361(8/14/03 2:37 pm)Reply | New Post --- <hr/> You don't know what you're talking about.                                                                                                                                                                   |

<< Prev Topic |

Add Reply

Email This To a Friend Email This To a Friend

Topic Control Image Topic Commands

Cli Click to receive email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

THE THINKING MAN'S MINEFIELD

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Is the brain necessary?

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

| Author                                                                               | Comment                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 242(2/4/04 3:04 am)Reply | Is the brain necessary? <hr/> I was listening to a lecture and there was a mention of Neurologist John Lorber and his discovery of humans functioning in society, many of which have high IQs, but virtually no brain... Article: Is the Brain Really Necessary? (Or What and Where Is Consciousness) This was the question asked by British neurologist John Lorber when he addressed a conference of pediatricians in 1980. Such a frivolous sounding question was sparked by case studies Lorber had been involved in since the mid sixties. The case studies involve victims of an ailment known as hydrocephalus, more commonly known as water on the brain. The condition results from an abnormal build up of cerebrospinal fluid and can cause severe retardation and death if not treated. Two young children with hydrocephalus referred to Lorber presented with normal mental development for their age. In both children, there was no evidence of a cerebral cortex. One of the children died at age three months, the second at twelve months was still following a normal development profile with the exception of the apparent lack of cerebral tissue shown by repeated medical testing. An account of the children was published in |

Developmental Medicine and Child Neurology.

Later, a colleague at Sheffield University became aware of a young man with a larger than normal head. He was referred to Lorber even though it had not caused him any difficulty. Although the boy had an IQ of 126 and had a first class honors degree in mathematics, he had "virtually no brain".

A noninvasive measurement of radio density known as CAT scan showed the boy's skull was lined with a thin layer of brain cells to a millimeter in thickness. The rest of his skull was filled with cerebrospinal fluid. The young man continues a normal life with the exception of his knowledge that he has no brain.

Although anecdotal accounts may be found in medical literature, Lorber is the first to provide a systematic study of such cases. He has documented over 600 scans of people with hydrocephalus and has broken them into four groups:

those with nearly normal brains.

those with 50-70% of the cranium filled with CSF

those with 70-90% of the cranium filled with CSF and the most severe group with 95% of the cranial cavity filled with cerebrospinal fluid.

Of the last group, which comprised less than ten percent of the study, half were profoundly retarded. The remaining half had IQs greater than 100.

Skeptics have claimed that it was an error of interpretation of the scans themselves. Lorber himself admits that reading a CAT scan can be tricky. He also has said that one would not make such a claim without evidence.

In answer to attacks that he has not precisely quantified the amount of brain tissue missing, he adds, "I can't say whether the mathematics student has a brain weighing 50 grams or 150 grams, but it is clear that it is nowhere near the normal 1.5 kilograms."

Many neurologists feel that this is a tribute to the brains redundancy and it's ability to reassign functions. Others, however, are not so sure. Patrick Wall, professor of anatomy at University College, London states "To talk of redundancy is a copout to get around something you don't understand."

Norman Geschwind, a neurologist at Bostons Beth Israel Hospital agrees: "Certainly the brain has a remarkable capacity for reassigning functions following trauma, but you can usually pick up some kind of deficit with the right tests, even after apparently full recovery."

Anthony Smith "The Mind" New York Viking Press, 1984, p.230

Roger Lewin "Is Your Brain Really Necessary?" Science 210 December 1980, p. 1232 -----

Taken from KeelyNet BBS (214) 324-3501

Sponsored by Vanguard Sciences

PO BOX 1031

Mesquite, TX 75150

There are ABSOLUTELY NO RESTRICTIONS on duplicating, publishing or distributing the files on KeelyNet except where noted!

October 30, 1993

WolfsonJakk

Registered User

Posts: 1443

(2/4/04 6:39 am)

Reply

Is the brain necessary?

---

Perhaps there is another explanation? If I had no brain, I probably wouldn't bother spending too much time thinking about it.

jimhaz

Registered User

Posts: 561

(2/4/04 9:18 am)

Reply

Re: Is the brain necessary?

---

It is rubbish.

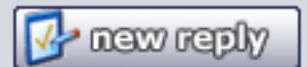

They are not really talking about no brain or even almost no brain, but severely restricted brains.

It doesn't take much brain size to do most of the things we do. The mathematics kid has an honours degree, only because the part of his brain least affected is the processing areas, lets say the frontal lobes, and he also has sufficient segments of the brain left to store memories. I'd say the lack of a storage area may have helped him, as the processing area would become more developed and would waste far less resources 'searching' memory for memories relevant to what he was doing at any one time. I'll bet you his life wasn't really normal.

Note also that he had a larger than normal head, which if as the layer was inside that sphere would be more volume of brain matter, as compared to a normal size head.

|                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                                                                            | Plus scientists make things up to produce the results they want, by making stats lie and inadequate testing. Notice that in the other 600 cases the range was up to 95%, which in the worst case scenario someone had 5% of the brain left and was probably one of the severely retarded ones. I bet you also that what they are referring to as the brain is only the grey lumpy bit not the whole brain, it was done in the 60's-80. |
| cassiopeiaeRegistered UserPosts: 242(2/4/04 10:00 am)Reply | Re: Is the brain necessary?<hr/> If I can find the article, there were additional studies carried out by other scientists suggesting the same results, only the apparent portion of the brain that was actually in existence was the brainstem.                                                                                                                                                                                    |

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

 Email This To a Friend

 Delete Topic Commands

 Click to receive email notification of replies

 Click to stop receiving email notification of replies

jump to:

- GENIUS FORUM - GENIUS FORUM - Genius News -

Powered By ezboard® Ver. 7.31p
Copyright ©1999-2003 ezboard, Inc.

Genius Forum

Causality • Courage • Rationality • Determination • Logic • Integrity • Thinking • Ideals
Wisdom • Reason • Discipline • Truth • Masculinity • Perfection • Universe

Genius News

David Quinn's Site

The Thinking Man's Minefield

EZB Edit

GENIUS FORUM

> GENIUS FORUM

> Islam

Page 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

<< Prev Topic | Next Topic >>

